W. W. BURTON,

President.

VOTES No. 64. FRIDAY, 23 JULY, 1858.

13. Landed Property in cases of Intestacy Descent Bill :—Mr. Jones moved, pursuant to notice, That the proceedings of the Select Committee appointed in 1854 and 1855 to inquire into the Administration of Intestate Estates be referred to the Committee now sitting on the Landed Property in cases of Intestacy Descent Bill.
Question put and passed.

VOTES No. 113. WEDNESDAY, 3 NOVEMBER, 1858.

1. Landed Property in cases of Intestacy Descent Bill :—Mr. Murray, as Chairman, brought up a Progress Report from, and laid upon the Table the Evidence taken before, the Select Committee to whom this Bill was referred on the 2nd July last. Ordered to be printed, together with the Minutes of Proceedings and Appendix.

LANDED PROPERTY IN CASES OF INTESTACY DESCENT BILL.

PROGRESS REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE of the Legislative Assembly, appointed on the 2nd July last, "to take evidence and Report upon the Landed Property in cases of Intestacy Descent Bill," and to whom on the 23rd of the same month were referred "the Proceedings of the Select Committee appointed in 1854 and 1855 to inquire into the Administration of Intestate Estates,"—have agreed to the following Progress Report:—

Your Committee append hereunto the evidence of several gentlemen whose opinions are deserving of great attention upon the important subject submitted to them. This evidence, however, is so conflicting—not so much upon the main principle of the Bill as upon the details which might be involved in its practical working—that your Committee recommend the resumption of the inquiry during the next Session of Parliament.

T. A. MURRAY,
Chairman.

Legislative Assembly Chamber,
Sydney, 3 November, 1858.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE COMMITTEE.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE

THE SELECT COMMITTEE

ON

LANDED PROPERTY IN CASES OF INTESTACY DESCENT BILL.

TUESDAY, 13 JULY, 1858.

Present:—

MR. FAUCETT,
MR. FORSTER,
MR. JONES,MR. MURRAY,
MR. PARKES,
MR. PIDDINGTON.

T. A. MURRAY, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

Charles Riley, Esq., called in and examined:—

1. By the Chairman: You are a Barrister? Yes.
2. Will you be good enough to inform the Committee what constitutes the difference between real and personal estate? In the one case, if there be no disposition by will, it passes to the heir-at-law; and in the other, it is divided between the next of kin.
3. Is that the only difference? It is the only practical difference, I think.
4. Real estate, of course, is immovable—it consists of land? Yes.
5. But property in land may be personalty as well as realty? It may, and so personal property may be real. By your will you may convert realty into personalty, or personalty into realty.
6. You may make chattel property real? You may make actual money real property. Suppose, for instance, a trust to invest a certain sum of money in landed property;—the mere trust converts it into realty.
7. Still the main difference between personal and real property is that which you have pointed out? Yes.
8. Will you be good enough to look at the first clause of the Bill which is before you. It is proposed by that clause to enact that, "from and after the passing of this Act all lands and hereditaments within the Colony shall for all purposes be deemed adjudged and taken to be chattels real." Supposing the distinction between personal and real property to be virtually that which you have pointed out,—do you see any objection, in an enactment for the purpose for which this Bill is proposed, to allow those words to stand as they are; the object in view being to provide for the legal distribution of real property among the children of an intestate father, in the same way as personal property is now distributed? I see no objection to it.
9. Worded as it is? I do not know whether there is any necessity for employing the words chattels real.
10. You do not object to the principle? No, not to the principle.
11. What is your opinion as to the expediency of changing the law in this Colony in the manner proposed? I think it very desirable the change should be effected.
12. Reverting to the second clause of the Bill: it is proposed there that "the statute concerning uses"—the words "and wills" seem to have been inserted inadvertently—"shall be deemed and taken to apply to chattels real"—do you think it desirable that the Statute of Uses referred to should be extended so as to refer to chattels real? I see no objection to it.
13. Do you think it necessary or advisable, considering that the great object of that statute was to give the party beneficially interested in a trust the sole right of disposing of it? It appears to me of very little moment whether the statute is applied to chattels real or not.

Charles Riley,
Esq.
13 July, 1858.

- Charles Riley, Esq.
13 July, 1858.
14. Then, of course, if it is of little moment, it is not necessary to apply it? The only effect of the clause would be, that in a case where a surviving trustee was conveying trust property to himself and another there would be no necessity to have two deeds, as at present.
15. Would that be an improvement, do you think? Really the second deed is so short that it is not worth speaking of. The expense is a mere nothing. It appears to me that there is a more scientific way of dealing with this subject, and that is by attacking the law which necessitates the use of the two deeds. The law is, that a man cannot convey to himself. He may do it, however, by taking advantage of the Statute of Uses; but the Statute of Uses does not apply to chattels real; therefore, the Statute of Uses cannot be made use of. Now, if the law were altered, and it were declared that a man might convey directly to himself, there would be no necessity for two deeds.
16. The Statute of Uses does apply to real estate? To freehold.
17. Freehold is what constitutes real estate? Yes. The Statute of Uses only applies where there is a seizin, and there can only be a seizin where there is a freehold.
18. An estate held for nine hundred and ninety-nine years is not a freehold? No.
19. In framing this Bill it was thought desirable to guard against any collusive sales of lands coming under its provisions, and for that purpose to impose some check over administrators or the Curator of Intestate Estates; with this view it is proposed by the third clause that all sales shall be subject to the approval of the Judges of the Supreme Court: What is your opinion as to the expediency of having some provision for that purpose? I do not see the necessity for it. The 15th Vic., No 8, contains such a provision when the property is under the charge of the Curator.
20. The Curator of Intestate Estates has at present no right to dispose of landed property, but sales of personal property effected under his direction are generally very ruinous—they cause great loss, do they not? I do not know. I think estates are consigned to the care of the Curator of Intestate Estates merely as a temporary arrangement. There may be administrators appointed, as in ordinary cases.
21. Who would have power to regulate the sales? I think so. Realty being converted into personalty would be dealt with by them as personalty. An administrator has an unrestricted power of sale. I believe in England the Court upholds the sale, even where it has been made in bad faith on the part of the administrator.
22. You have never known an instance of the kind here? Never.
23. Have administrators to give security? Yes.
24. Have you ever known any bonds given by administrators of intestate estates to be insisted upon? No, I have not.
25. Do you know if it is not in practice a dead letter? I do not know it.
26. On the whole, you consider such an Act as this is desirable? I think it most desirable.
27. By Mr. Faucett: Have you considered the bearing of the first clause at all, or have you given your opinion upon it from merely reading it now? I have seen it before.
28. Have you considered the effect of that clause upon the present state of the law? Not very attentively, but I know the whole Act will cause great changes in the law, some of which I was about to point out.
29. I take it you are in favor of the principle of making intestate estates devolve like personalty? Yes.
30. That you believe would be beneficial to the Colony? Yes.
31. Setting out with that principle, do I understand you to state that you have not considered the bearing of this first clause which is intended to carry it out? I have.
32. Have you at all considered the great changes in the law that would follow from that clause? I have.
33. Will you be good enough to state some of the leading changes? There is one statute with which it will very materially interfere,—the statute for facilitating the payment of debts out of real estate. At the present time, when a person dies indebted leaving real property, the only means of getting at that property is by instituting a suit in Equity. This Act will render it unnecessary, in cases of intestacy, to go to Equity at all. The administrator will be enabled to sell immediately under this Act, and the expense of an Equity suit will be saved. But there is a proviso at the end of one of the sections which declares that creditors by specialty in which heirs are bound shall have their debts paid before creditors by specialty in which heirs are not bound. This Bill, I take it, will repeal that proviso.
34. Does it strike you that the Act to which you have just referred is an advance towards the principle contained in this Bill? I think it is.
35. This Bill merely advances that principle still further? I think so.
36. You think it will be an improvement? A great improvement. I was about to say also that I think there ought to be some provision made in this Bill for trust estates and estates in mortgage. I think it should be declared to apply or not to apply to such estates, one or the other. The Bill as it stands appears to me to apply only to property in which the intestate was beneficially interested. But the question might arise whether it might not include trust estates and estates in mortgage also.
37. What provision would you suggest in this Bill? I would propose a mere declaration, such as I have alluded to in my last answer. It appears to me that it would be more beneficial to allow trust estates to come under the Act, because then there would be an administrator who is an adult, and in the Colony, and therefore able to deal with the estate; whereas the heirs, in many cases, are infants, or out of the Colony, and their infancy or absence necessitates an application to the Court of Equity, which is attended with inconvenience and expense.
38. Are you aware that one of the objections that has been made to this clause is, that it will in some degree affect settlements? I do not think that. A person would not take by descent under a settlement — I beg pardon; I see the first clause and the preamble do not tally.

39. Reconsidering your answer, would you alter it? I think I would.

40. Are you now prepared to say the first clause might stand as it does at present? I think it should be confined to intestacy. I do not think it is desirable to interfere with the right of persons to deal with their property as they may think fit. With regard to mortgages, I think also that the Act should be declared to apply to them, or not.

Charles Riley,
Esq.

13 July, 1858.

41. Which would you prefer? I would prefer that it should apply. At present a mortgage debt belongs to the executor, but the fee descends to the heir-at-law; consequently there are two persons to convey upon the sale, transfer, or re-conveyance of the mortgaged lands. I would make the legal estate vest in the administrator, and then there would be but one. The heir of the mortgagee is sometimes an infant, or out of the Colony, which necessitates an application to the Court of Equity, such as I have before mentioned in connexion with trust estates. It is considered advisable upon the sale, transfer, or re-conveyance of mortgaged lands to have the signature of the executor; and you might just as well allow him to convey the legal estate as well as the personal interest.

42. With regard to the Statute of Uses, you see no objection to making that apply? I see no objection to it.

43. By Mr. Jones: Will you explain to the Committee the exact nature of this Statute of Uses? It is simply a statute which declares that where a person has the use he shall also have the legal estate. It was the habit in former days to convey property to one person for the use of another person. It was a way of evading the Statute of Mortmain. And to prevent this, the Statute of Uses was passed. The Chairman spoke of the third clause, requiring that all sales under this Act shall be subject to the approval of the Judges: I do not think that advisable.

44. By Mr. Faucett: Do you not think some provision should be made in this Bill giving the administrator, or the Curator of Intestate Estates, power to sell lands? I do not think so. With personalty an administrator clearly has a right to sell. This Bill converts realty into personalty, and therefore the power arises at once. He has all the powers which attach to personalty. I do not see that it is at all necessary to give this power. If you wish to do so, I think the better way would be to have a statutory will.

45. By Mr. Piddington: Would you approve of the Curator of Intestate Estates having power to sell real estate by private contract? I do not see why he should not sell by private contract as well as by auction.

46. At his discretion, without any announcement of the offer made to him? I would not interfere with him: He is a responsible officer; and I do not think he would do anything improper.

47. By Mr. Faucett: Do you not know, as a matter of fact, that the most valuable properties in this Colony are personalty—stations and stock—they are not realty? No, they are not realty; the runs being merely held by lease.

48. Therefore any change that might be made in the law would not affect them? No. We must bear in mind that there are some decisions of the Court in which individuals have got the fee merely by occupancy. But I do not think they would get a fee as against the Crown; though the Statute of Limitations is said by Sugden to apply to the Crown.

49. By Mr. Forster: Do you not think the third clause would unnecessarily hamper the alienation of property? I think so.

50. Has not the tendency of the Courts generally been to encourage alienation? Undoubtedly.

51. Do you not think that at present, under the present laws, sufficient protection is afforded? Yes.

52. Would you recommend the expunging of this third clause? I would. In law the presumption is, that where an administrator sells he does so for the purpose of discharging his duties. I do not think a purchaser would be affected by any mala fides on his part. I think an administrator under this Bill should be placed in the same position as an executor or trustee empowered to sell.

53. As this Bill stands now, might there not be some danger of other lands transmitted by will being brought under the operation of the Bill. Supposing that by some equitable construction, as I think it is called, the word administrator were presumed to include executors? If there were no executors of a will there might be an administrator with the will annexed appointed, and such an administrator might be brought within the meaning of this Bill.

54. Might not the Bill as it stands now be construed to apply to lands which do not at all come within the scope of its principle? It might, if something be not inserted in the first clause restricting its operation to cases of intestacy.

55. Retaining the first and third clauses as they are, might not the Bill apply to lands transmitted by will? It might, certainly.

56. Is there not a possibility also that the alienation of all lands whatever may, under the present wording of this Bill, be subject to the approval of the Judges, which would really be hampering the alienation of such property to a very great extent? There is. It would be an advantage in many cases in which applications have now to be made to Parliament for power to sell property comprised in wills that do not contain powers of sale if sales in such cases could be made by the approbation of the Supreme Court. It would save a vast deal of expense.

57. That only applies to particular cases? There may be many other cases where application would be made were it not for the expense.

58. By Mr. Faucett: You think a power might prudently be given to the Supreme Court to allow of sales in such cases, but not to make the sale of all lands subject to their approval? Yes. Where a power of sale is not given, it may be presumed that it was not the intention of the testator that a sale should be effected; but a price so splendid may be offered that it would be manifestly to the advantage of the parties interested to accept it if they could.

And

Charles Riley, Esq. And where the power of sale has been inadvertently left out, I think there should be some easy means of remedying the defect, without applying to Parliament.

13 July, 1858. 59. You think the cheapest way would be to give power to the Supreme Court to authorise a sale? Yes.

60. By Mr. Jones: That would not properly come within the scope of this Bill? No. I think the Bill had better be confined to the object contemplated by it.

61. By Mr. Piddington: In the event of the third clause being expunged, who would then be empowered to sell real estate in cases of intestacy? The administrator.

62. Who appoints the administrator—must he be an officer of the Court? Not necessarily. The general rule is to appoint one of the next of kin, if there be any.

63. Would it not be more desirable to empower the official Curator of Intestate Estates to sell real property in cases of intestacy, in the same way as he is now empowered to sell personalty? I do not see why it should be done by the Curator in preference to the administrator.

64. Is it not the practice that the Curator of Intestate Estates has authority to dispose of the personal property of intestates? Yes, under the direction of the Supreme Court, or a Judge of it.

65. Do you see any objection to the Curator of Intestate Estates being empowered to dispose of real property which may come under his charge? There is none that I am aware of.

66. Either by auction or by private contract? At his discretion.

67. If the Curator be empowered to sell by private contract, do you not think it would be desirable that some check should be established, to provide against the sale of property at an improperly low rate? I would never interfere with any responsible officer in the discharge of his duties. You must leave him a large discretion.

68. Do you think it is necessary to leave such a large discretion as this in the hands of any officer? Yes, I think it is. It is easy to ascertain the value of any property.

69. My question refers to the possibility of landed estate being sold by private contract without any previous test of value? It would be valued, I take it, by some competent person beforehand.

70. You think there is no danger in devolving such a discretion on a public officer? I do not anticipate any danger.

71. By the Chairman: I think I understood you to say that as this Bill stands at present it might be so construed that the right of individuals to dispose of their property by will would be in some degree imperilled? I think it might.

72. But you think the insertion of the words "in cases of intestacy" would remove all doubt? Yes.

73. And therefore it would be better to have them introduced? Yes, I think so. I think the preamble as it is would certainly control the other parts of the Bill; but it is better to be on the safe side.

74. By Mr. Jones: Would the passing of an Act of this kind lead necessarily to any great subdivision of landed properties? Not necessarily; because the land might be sold in one block, and the money be distributed, instead of the land itself being divided.

75. It would by no means follow that the landed property of an intestate should be divided among the children or heirs? No; if all the claimants should be of age, and elect to take the property as land, then it might be divided and broken up. I found my opinion as to the advisability of this change in the law on this fact, that in half the wills made here realty is actually converted into personalty for purposes of distribution; and in the other half there is usually a discretion given to trustees to convert it whenever they think fit; and where it is not so, the property is generally equally divided by the will. I think it is impossible in ordinary wills here ever to discover who is the heir-at-law. I think in this Colony there is really no difference made between realty and personalty in disposing of property by will.

76. So that, so far as can be gathered from the wills that have come within your knowledge, parents in this Colony make wills leaving their property rateably among their children? Yes. I have never found it left to the heir as such.

77. I understood you to say that the passing of this Bill would not lead to any minute subdivision of landed property? I do not think it would, necessarily.

78. In the generality of cases, if this Bill were passed would not land be converted into money for purposes of division? Yes.

79. That would be the general operation of the law? Yes, decidedly.

80. Cases where the land itself would be divided would be exceptions? It would depend on whether the next of kin were of age: if of age they might elect to take the land as land.

81. Do you not think there would be great practical difficulty in dividing land so as to satisfy the persons interested, especially where there were properties situated in different places? There would be no option then but to sell and divide the proceeds, or to institute a suit in Equity for partition.

82. So that the probable operation of the law would lead to the sale of realty for purposes of division? It would be necessary if the persons interested could not agree.

83. You do not apprehend then that any evil would be likely to accrue from minute subdivision of estates? No.

84. By Mr. Faucett: You are aware that the great families are kept up in England more by settlements than by the law of primogeniture? Entirely by settlements.

85. These settlements are either altered or renewed every generation? Every time the tenant-in-tail comes of age or marries he bars the entail, and then the property is re-settled.

APPENDIX A.

*Remarks to supplement the foregoing Evidence.*Charles Riley,
Esq.

13 July, 1858.

It has struck me that this Bill, by altering the character of real property, will effect an enormous change in the law relating to the mutual rights of husbands and wives in each other's lands. By law as at present established, a widow is, under no circumstances, entitled to more than a life estate in one-third of her deceased husband's real property. By the conversion of the realty into personalty, she would, if there were children, become absolutely entitled to one-third, and if there were no children, to one-half.

The husband, if he survive his wife and have issue by her that might by possibility inherit her estate as her heir, becomes entitled to an estate merely for the residue of his life in her estate. To her chattels real he is absolutely entitled. The effect of the Bill therefore, in the latter case, would be merely to substitute the husband for the heir.

These are changes which I believe are not contemplated by the Bill, and if such changes would inevitably follow, the intention of the framers would be defeated. I would therefore suggest that the first clause should be in a form as follows:—

"The real estate of intestates shall descend to their issue in equal shares as tenants in common and per stirpes, and in case there should be no issue to their next of kin in equal shares as tenants in common and per stirpes."

By adopting this form, the character of the property would not be altered, and numerous difficulties would be avoided which must arise, but which cannot be foreseen.

WEDNESDAY, 14 JULY, 1858.

Present:—

MR. FAUCETT,
MR. FORSTER,
MR. JONES,MR. MACARTHUR,
MR. MURRAY,
MR. PARKES,

MR. PIDDINGTON.

T. A. MURRAY, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

John Hubert Plunkett, Esq., Q. C., called in and examined:—

1. By the Chairman: You have been Attorney General of this Colony for many years? J.H. Plunkett, Esq., Q.C.
- Yes; I was appointed Solicitor General in October, 1831; I continued in that office till March 1836, when I was promoted to the office of Attorney General, and I continued in that office until I was released from office on the introduction of Responsible Government. 14 July, 1858.
2. Will you be good enough to mention to the Committee what is the difference between real and personal estate? I apprehend the distinction you mean is rather between a real estate and chattel property, because landed property by lease is included in chattel property.
3. What is the difference then between real estate and chattel property? Real property comes under the head of freehold, that is, from fee simple to an estate for life, and a variety of other estates that are of inheritance. A man may hold a lease for a thousand years, still it is chattel property, and the laws of descent would operate differently upon it.
4. Does that constitute the great difference between the one description of property and the other, that the laws of descent affect them in a different manner? At the present time that is the principal difference; the laws of England as to landed estates have in a variety of ways changed so much. The principal difference that occurs to me at this moment is with respect to the laws of descent. Here, we know the Sheriff can, under a writ of fieri facias, dispose of equities of redemption as well as chattels.
5. These are modern improvements in the law with reference to landed property, those which make land subject to sale for debt? I think there is a statute in England, 3 and 4 William IV., by which landed property is made assets available for simple contract debts. I speak independently of the Bankrupt Laws, or Insolvent Acts, which reach landed property not already limited or settled under the law of entail or marriage settlement.
6. Then the great difference between the two descriptions of property is this, that by the law of descent the real estate in cases of intestacy will go to the heir-at-law, while the chattel property will be rateably distributed among the kin? Yes.
7. What do you think of altering the law so far as to make freehold property subject to the same law of distribution as prevails with regard to chattel property? I am favorable to it, so far as it can be effected, for many reasons. In the first place, the law of primogeniture, as handed to us from England, we can trace entirely to feudal principles that now no longer exist. In Saxon times this law did not exist; it was introduced by the Normans. The Kentish people resisted it, so that they preserve to this day, intact, their own Saxon laws, under the name of gavelkind; by which law all the sons inherit instead of being excluded by the property devolving upon the eldest. Also, there is another tenure in England which has been always preserved—that of Borough English.
8. The youngest son inherits under that? The youngest son inherits there.
9. Do you know the reason of that law of Borough English? There are many reasons given for it. It related to houses and property in towns, and it was considered that the youngest son, being more immediately with the father, was his more natural heir, it being supposed that the eldest son had been provided for before. I find in Blackstone's Commentary, vol. ii, p. p. 82 & 83, the following:—"Tenure in burgage is described by Glanvil, and is expressly said by Littleton to be but tenure in socage, and it is where the King or "other

J.H. Plunkett, Esq., Q.C.

"other person is lord of an ancient borough, in which the tenements are held by a rent certain. It is indeed only a kind of town socage, as common socage, by which other lands are holden, is usually of a rural nature. A borough, as we have formerly seen, is usually distinguished from other towns by the right of sending members to Parliament; and where the right of election is by burgage tenure, that alone is a proof of the antiquity of the borough. Tenure in burgage, therefore, or burgage tenure, is where houses, or lands which were formerly the sites of houses, in an ancient borough, are held of some lord in common socage by a certain established rent; and these seem to have withstood the shock of the Norman encroachments principally on account of their insignificance, which made it not worth while to compel them to an alteration of tenure, as an hundred of them put together would scarce have amounted to a knight's fee. Besides, the owners of them being chiefly artificers and persons engaged in trade, could not with any tolerable propriety be put on such a military establishment as the tenure in chivalry was. And here also we have again an instance where a tenure is confessedly in socage, and yet could not possibly ever have been held by plough service; since the tenants must have been citizens or burghers, the situation frequently a walled town, the tenement a single house, so that none of the owners was probably master of a plough, or was able to use one if he had it. The free socage, therefore, in which these tenements are held, seems to be plainly a remnant of Saxon liberty; which may also account for the great variety of customs affecting many of these tenements so held in ancient burgage, the principal and most remarkable of which is that called Borough English, so named in contradistinction as it were to the Norman customs, and which is taken notice of by Glanvil and by Littleton, viz., that the youngest son, and not the eldest, succeeds to the burgage tenement on the death of his father; for which Littleton gives this reason,—because the younger son, by reason of his tender age, is not so capable as the rest of his brethren to help himself. Other authors have indeed given a much stranger reason for this custom; as if the lord of the fee had anciently a right of concubinage with his tenant's wife on her wedding night, and that therefore the tenement descended not to the eldest, but to the youngest son, who was more certainly the offspring of the tenant. But I cannot learn that ever this custom prevailed in England, though it certainly did in Scotland. (under the name of me.cheta or marcheta;) till abolished by Malcolm III. And perhaps a more rational account than either may be fetched (though at a sufficient distance) from the practice of the Tartars; among whom, according to Father Duhalde, this custom of descent to the youngest son also prevails. That nation is composed totally of shepherds and herdsmen, and the elder sons, as soon as they are capable of leading a pastoral life, migrate from their father with a certain allotment of cattle, and go to seek a new habitation. The youngest son, therefore, who continues latest with the father, is naturally the heir of his house, the rest being already provided for. And thus we find that among many other northern nations it was the custom for all the sons but one to migrate from the father, which one became his heir—so that possibly this custom, wherever it prevails, may be the remnant of that pastoral state of our British and German ancestors which Cæsar and Tacitus described." These are the reasons given for it; but there can be no doubt that the law of primogeniture, which gives all to the eldest son, was introduced purely for reasons growing out of the feudal system.

10. Do you think there is any good reason for abiding by that law in this Colony? I certainly think not. I think in many instances it has been, and may be, the cause of cruel injustice.

11. Have any instances of that kind come under your own notice? I have heard of many. I know of one instance which has occurred within the last two years. I was acquainted with the parties, who were in comparatively humble life. That case alone convinced me that the law was liable to act very prejudicially. It was the case of a man in Illawarra, a comfortable farmer, who had purchased some ground, and gone to considerable expense in clearing and tilling it—there were about a couple of hundred acres all cleared and very valuable. He had several children—I do not know how many—and I know he intended to make a will; but his death was sudden, and he did not carry his intention into effect. The consequence was that his youngest children were left totally unprovided for, there being little or no personal estate, and all the property devolved on the eldest son: he was by law the owner of it, and he consulted me, knowing I was acquainted with his family, as to what it would be right to do. I told him exactly the state of things, and what I would be likely to do myself under such circumstances, and he very honorably made provision for the family of his father, who were thus entirely at his mercy. If he had been a person of a different description the rest of the family might have starved or have come to the Benevolent Asylum.

12. Do you think the alteration that is proposed in the law would have the effect of breaking up large landed properties? As our law stands at present, there is nothing but a marriage settlement, or such like deed, which must be entered into by the parties themselves, to prevent a man doing what he likes with his property, and dividing it as he pleases.

13. Supposing the Bill now before the Committee to pass, it would not militate against a man's right to dispose of his property by will, his right would not in any way be impaired, but, in case he were not to make a will, then all his property, realty and personalty, would be distributed rateably among those interested? I was going to say that the law as it at present stands gives a person full power, except in case of marriage settlement, which may entail the property, to dispose of his property as he pleases, even to the exclusion of his own family; but so unnatural a course is very rare, if at all, heard of among us—to the credit of our nation be it spoken. But when the father has the power to divide his property equally among his children, his natural justice would, I think, prompt him to act in that way. I think the division of property ought rather to be encouraged in a new country, and that it would be a great improvement in our law to abolish this remnant of feudal times, which there is no good reason, reason, at least in this country, for preserving. In England there are good reasons for retaining it, as, for instance, to preserve an aristocracy that do not exist here. J.H. Plunkett, Esq., Q.C.

14. You do not think there is much weight in the objection that it would have the effect of breaking up large landed estates, so long as proprietors were not interfered with in regard to leaving their lands as they please, by will, or disposing of them by settlement? I think not. I see no good to be effected by keeping large landed property in the hands of one individual, at the same time leaving it to the owner to do as he thought proper. 14 July, 1858.

15. This was one of the objections to the Bill—that it would have the effect of breaking up large landed property, and of establishing a system, similar to that which exists in France, of compulsory distribution. You are aware that in Ireland in the reign of Queen Anne, an Act was passed which had for its object the breaking up of the old Catholic aristocracy in the country, and the law of primogeniture was abolished; but the law went further, and while it allowed the proprietor the right of selling if he chose during his life time, it deprived him of the right of making a testamentary disposition of his property—the distribution was compulsory among his sons? I do not recollect at this moment the law you allude to; but I think if the law of primogeniture had been abolished in Ireland generally in the reign of Queen Anne, the Encumbered Estates Bill, which has been of late years so useful in simplifying the law concerning landed property in Ireland, would have been unnecessary, and the country would be in a more prosperous state. Because, I think among the great causes of the embarrassments and evils of the country the law of entail and of primogeniture have had a large share. The eldest son in Ireland had a sort of family pride to keep up expenses and show, that the incumbrances on his property did not at all warrant. That state of things made parents in Ireland ambitious rather to leave their eldest son a great man, by reason of his large landed possessions, than to leave him a man of cultivated intellect, who would be respected in the country by reason of his own worth; and it also, I think, led to the national negligence amongst the gentry of Ireland for improving and educating their children for higher purposes than fox hunting and idle amusements, which tended to demoralize the higher classes themselves, and ultimately brought about that unfortunate state of Ireland which made the Encumbered Estates Bill a blessing to the country, by putting at once an end to such a state of things.

16. The law I allude to as having been passed in the time of Queen Anne had the effect of destroying the old Catholic aristocracy—to break it up; but it was not in consequence of the abolition of the law of primogeniture, but from the prevention of persons disposing of their property by will. That law was repealed in the time of George the Third, and it is since that time the evils you speak of have arisen in Ireland? All the laws that were made, having for their object the abolition of Popery, signally failed. They were evaded in various ways. In my own family we could for two generations trace the property through Protestant trustees, who in law were actually the owners, but who were honorable enough to hold the properties strictly in trust, and as soon as these laws were abolished to give them over to those who were morally and justly entitled to them. Generally speaking, the old properties that are still in the hands, or were lately in the hands of Roman Catholic families, were held in that way, by an evasion of the law. I should say that any of these laws may serve as beacons to avoid, but not as guides to follow.

17. However, this law I speak of virtually did break up the old Catholic aristocracy of Ireland, and sunk the descendants of the ancient princes of the country to the position of mere laborers. Such were its injurious effects, that in the time of George the Third it was repealed. Do you know the operation of the old Brehon law in Ireland, with regard to the descent of landed property? These laws in Ireland, so far as I can judge, were more regulated by right than by force. The Brehon law was only abolished in the reign of James the First, and then by a decision of the Court of King's Bench.

18. That was a very excellent code of laws? But very imperfectly acted upon; and gave rise to intestine dissensions, as we find in Sir J. Davis' reports.

19. One of the features of that code was, that landed property descended also according to the rule of gavelkind — You are clearly of opinion that no evil is to be apprehended in this country from the abolition of the right of primogeniture in regard to the descent of property? I think not; I think it is natural and just that all children should be provided for. I cannot imagine a more melancholy state of things than that which may frequently occur before our eyes from the present state of the law. If a father, having an ambition to vest all his property in land, and happening to have one son and half a dozen daughters, dies, without having been provident enough to make his will, all his property goes to the son, and the daughters are completely at the mercy of their brother—in fact, left penniless. If they are educated and accomplished women, the only resource open to them is to become governesses—a position in which the accomplishments and mental acquirements of the females are not valued as they ought to be; on the contrary, persons in this country, as well as in England and elsewhere, grudge to accomplished women, for the educating of their daughters, the wages of common housemaids. I think in such a country as this it is but just and wise that females should never be left in such a situation. If a father has property, it ought to be equally divided among his children; indeed, I think females ought to be even more protected by law than males, because in this new country a man who has a decent education, with health and strength, can always earn his bread, if sober and industrious. There are many occupations open to a young man, but there are very few open to the females of a family, and the more highly they are accomplished the more they are to be pitied when they are left penniless. Instead of excluding females from sharing in the property of their father, I would see a law (if a change were to be made) that would specially provide in all cases for females, though I am not an advocate for changing the law to that extent at the present moment, still I conceive if such a law were made it would make parents think of the consequences that might follow by throwing females on the world, and it is not improbable that the wisdom of such a law would become popular among

J.H.Plunkett, among parents, and induce them to provide in a proper way for the female members of their family more amply than they do at present.

Esq., Q.C.

14 July, 1858.

20. Then, I presume, you must be of opinion that an adherence to the law as it now stands in a country like this would be barbarous under such circumstances, and the sooner we get rid of it the better? I think it a remnant of barbarism.

21. Wholly inapplicable to the circumstances of this Colony? Yes. Real estate at the present moment can be sold by the Sheriff in the way before mentioned, and if the parent or owner of the real estate become insolvent, there is no distinction between it and personal estate, and I see no reason at all for keeping up the difference in cases of intestacy so as to leave all but one child unprovided for.

22. By Mr. Forster: You say you have not given any great consideration to this Bill? I have not seen this Bill before I came into this room.

23. You are aware that its general intention is to assimilate real to personal estate in cases of intestacy—I think you may gather that from the title? Yes: I see by the preamble the intention of the Bill.

24. I think you have stated you are favorable to so much of the object of the Bill that is to the assimilation of real to personal estate in cases of intestacy? Yes; but I think the better plan would be to put the sons and daughters in the position the daughters are in now in the event of their having no brother; for if a parent dies with real property leaving no son, it goes among all his daughters, in what is called coparcenery—all his daughters would share equally.

25. In case real was assimilated to personal estate in cases of intestacy, personal estate would then be distributed by the Statute of Distribution, would it not? Yes.

26. Are you of opinion the Statute of Distributions itself should be allowed to remain as it is, or might any improvement be effected upon that—do you think the mode of distribution provided by that statute the best in all cases? I would rather, as I stated in my last answer, follow the rule that at present exists in the case of coparcenery. Now, if the principle of the law of primogeniture be abolished in cases of intestacy, all the family should be placed in the same situation that females are in at present where there are no sons.

27. In the case you suppose, the widow would have the right to dower—she would not come in as a coparcener? When she has the right to dower I would not interfere with it.

28. Under the Statute of Distributions, does not the widow take rather a larger share than her daughters in the distribution of the personal estate? I think the widow gets one-third where there is issue, and a half where there are no children.

29. What I want to gather from you is whether, supposing this Bill should be carried out with the present intention—that is, that both real and personal estate should be treated as personal, which, in fact, would bring real estate under the operation of the Statute of Distributions—we should follow the Statute of Distributions, or whether a better mode of distribution might be adopted by the Bill when it is put in a perfect shape? I think it would be better not to mix up the two laws. The Statute of Distribution is made entirely for chattel property, and I do not see how the right to dower could be adjusted under it.

30. If you look at the Bill I think you will see that it is inevitable, because by this Bill real estate will be, in fact, personal estate; and in that case will be distributed under the Statute of Distributions? I am afraid there would be some difficulty in applying the Statute of Distributions to real property.

31. I think you will see by this Bill that real estate will be made personal, and will have to be distributed in that way? I am afraid that would create confusion, and would clash with certain principles and landmarks of the law. Without giving a great deal of attention to it, I cannot see how you can apply it; but as the object of the Bill, judging from the recital here, is merely to alter the mode of descent of real property, I think the abolition of primogeniture, and the allowing in cases of intestacy property to go equally among all the children, as it would go now to females in cases where there were no males, would best carry out the object of the Bill.

32. Would not the mode you suggest of carrying out the objects of the Bill be, in fact, a more complicated mode than is prescribed by this Bill? I think not.

33. It would require an entire alteration of the Bill? Yes; but the Bill is very short.

34. This Bill would not carry out the objects in the way you mention. Will you read the first clause? I think that clause is going beyond the object of the Bill, and would lead to unnecessary confusion.

35. It is already admitted that the clause as it now stands would be going beyond the object intended by the Bill; but, limiting the words “all purposes” to “the purposes of the Act,” would not that be then the simplest way of carrying it out? I do not think it would. We know that in France next to the love of country the love of a French peasant is for the land—for the piece of land of which he is proprietor. That is one of the national characteristics, and I think it is desirable to encourage that love of land in every country; and if you allow land to descend among the children equally, I think it might ultimately settle down in the same way that it has in France, so that the land may remain in the family if they so arrange. All the members of a family may have a certain pride in having the land of their fathers still continuing in their family. One son may be more suitable than another for living on the land, and the other members of the family may enter into an arrangement with him to assist in its cultivation, or it may be large enough to admit of partition, and still remain in the family; whereas if you put it under the Statute of Distributions, the inevitable consequence would be that it would be sold, and perhaps sold under a great disadvantage.

36. Then, if I understand you rightly, you are rather disposed to favor the continual subdivision of landed estate? Yes, in cases of intestacy.

37. Have you not heard it said that in France a great deal of evil has been produced by that constant compulsory subdivision of property? Such is the notion in England, but we know that that the national opinion in France is as hostile to the law of entail and primogeniture of England as the national feeling of England is against the system of France.

38. Is not the system in France a compulsory division? Yes: the system in France does not allow the father to will, I think, more than one-third from his family, the rest must go among the children. I do not advocate a system of that kind—I do not advocate any system that would fetter the owner of property, but would leave him to do what he likes with it.

J.H. Plunkett,
Esq., Q.C.
14 July, 1858.

39. But in cases of intestacy you would prefer retaining the distinction between real and personal estate, and make it descend, in fact, as if there were no single heir-at-law? Yes; as if the law of primogeniture were abolished. If a father does not choose, or neglects to make a will, the land should go among all his children, and be divided as in case of estates of coparcenery by the present law, but among all the males and females.

40. Do you not think the mode devised by this Bill, without reference to consequences, is a more simple mode than that which you propose? The sale of the property, which I apprehend must be contemplated, would be calculated altogether to dis sever the connection of landed property and families, perhaps against the wishes of those families; for all our families, I think, from the highest to the lowest, have a sort of family pride connected with land; and I think it desirable to encourage that, so far as it can be encouraged with due regard to justice and equity to all members of the family.

41. Suppose the Committee determined on carrying out the provisions of this Bill, do you think the mode of distribution carried into operation by the Statute of Distributions is the best mode of dividing any property, whether personal or real? We are so accustomed to it, it is so familiar to the national habits, and has been so long in operation, that I see no reason for making any change in the Statute of Distributions, as it affects personal property.

42. In that case, if the Committee were to determine on assimilating real to personal estate in cases of intestacy, you think that mode of distribution might be still retained? I think it would meet with more universal consent than any new plan that could be devised, as far as it can be made applicable.

43. Then I need scarcely ask you whether you approve of the assimilation of real to personal estate in all cases? If it could be done without breeding litigation, which it is very undesirable to do, I would abolish the distinction; but I do not think it can be wholly done; besides, I think it desirable to encourage the national ambition to be the proprietor of a piece of land, and to hold that in the family; and I think ultimately it would lead to the same national feeling that is preserved in France, notwithstanding the division of property there, by which we see that very old families do keep the land of their forefathers by arrangement among themselves. The division in France is very different from the subdivision of property that has entailed such monstrous evils on Ireland, because the tenure is different. In France they are all proprietors; here, I take it, they would be all proprietors, not tenants, paying rents at the will of any great landlord, and liable to be turned out. When a man has a piece of land of his own it makes him think more of himself—gives him more foresight—makes him respect the rights of property of others. These are feelings that are not generally encouraged by the unfortunate system that prevails in Ireland—there they have a system of rack rents; this causes subserviency to landlords, servility, want of foresight, and a train of evils.

44. Admitting all you say—do you not think the best way to encourage feelings of independence is to simplify the alienation of land, to allow men easily to become possessed of land? Yes, most certainly.

45. Are not the present laws of real property so many obstructions in the way of its alienation—do they not complicate the matter so as to make its acquisition more difficult? If entails are introduced, or if it be encumbered by mortgage—but you can hardly prevent that—they do complicate the matter; but the alienation of landed property is not complicated in any other way.

46. Do you not think the distinction between real and personal property is in itself a complication for which there is no necessity? In the nature of things there must be a distinction. Landed property you cannot hand over as you can personal property. There must be a writing or some solemnity, if there were not, it would lead to all kinds of confusion and misunderstanding between individuals. Personal property you can give manual possession of from one to another.

47. But that only goes to the distinction between the mode of transfer—if a deed is to be taken as equivalent to the act of manual delivery in the case of personal property, is the other distinction called for? All distinctions not necessary I would abolish, and that is the prevailing tendency of opinion among many persons in England at the present moment. All the reports of Commissioners upon the laws of real property tend in that direction even in England, where the law of entail and primogeniture were not and can hardly be dispensed with: even in the present state of the national feeling, remarkable changes have been made in England.

48. In a Colony like this do you not think there is much less reason for keeping up these complications than in England? Certainly we are unfettered and unembarrassed by details that obstruct these matters in England.

49. Even as to the law of entail at home they have provided the means of getting rid of the entail if the owner chooses? Yes.

50. By Mr. Jones: Have you any general knowledge of the character of the wills made in this Colony—as to how persons dispose of their property by will generally—whether they generally leave it mainly to their eldest sons, or to be divided rateably among their children or next of kin? I have no means of ascertaining generally how property is distributed; but I have seen a great many wills that have come before me where it appeared to me that families have been provided for well and equitably according to the claims the parent thinks the family have upon him.

51. So that if a Bill of this kind were to pass, providing that where no wills were made the property should be divided among the next of kin, do you think such a law would be in general accordance with the wills made in the Colony? It would be in accordance with natural justice and equity; and, as I presume every parent must think that all his children have a right to share in his bounty, the best distribution would be to divide his property equally among his children, according to the natural rule.

 14 July, 1858.

52. So far as you have had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the wills made in this Colony, would such a change in the law be in accordance with the provisions of those wills generally? I think it would be, and that it would not do violence to the feelings of any one here—I mean in this Colony.

53. I speak of this country—supposing the law were altered as this Bill proposes to alter it, would such an alteration affect the trusts or settlements made on landed property—would it in any way defeat them? There might be some increase of litigation in adjusting rights if property were to be sold under all circumstances as they would be under the Statute of Distributions: the executor would, I apprehend, be bound to sell.

54. Is he bound to sell, or only empowered to sell? He is bound to realise as soon as possible, and we know that at certain times in this Colony sales are made under great disadvantage; but I am not prepared to give a general answer in the case of settlements and trusts, as to how they would be affected; they must be affected in some degree when the property passes into strange hands by sale; but settlements and trusts made before the case of intestacy occurs would override a law that would guide intestacy. It would, however, be necessary, for the protection of their interests, to appear in any suit, and thus would be dragged into expense.

55. That is to say, this law would not set aside these trusts and settlements—these would have still to be observed and carried out? Yes; but it might be difficult to adjust them without embarrassment and expense.

56. If the person beneficially interested in these trusts or settlements objected to the land being disposed of, I presume that would actually prevent the land being disposed of? No; because, I presume, the interest to be disposed of would be over and above his vested interest.

57. But he could still retain his interest in the land—he could still refuse to surrender? The land would be sold subject to trusts or liabilities: I am afraid it would generate litigation.

58. Do you think it desirable that any provision should be introduced into the Bill to provide for cases of this kind where trusts or settlements exist on landed property which has not been devised by will, and which would in any way obviate unnecessary litigation, or injustice? If real property is to go according to the Statute of Distributions, like chattel property at present, there certainly ought to be a large discretion left to the person into whose hands it would come to work it to wait for a favorable market, if it must be sold.

59. By Mr. Faucett: To the administrator or curator? Yes.

60. By Mr. Jones: You have stated one case that has come within your knowledge of the existing law working great injustice in a family—do you think if the law were altered, as proposed by this Bill, any such case could arise? I think not; it would be no injustice to one son when the law says he shall not be made a rich man in the family and the rest be all beggars. No one son ought to have any right, by the law of the land, in case of intestacy to step into his father's property to the exclusion of all the rest of his family.

61. Have you reason to believe that injustice has not infrequently been occasioned by the present laws? I am afraid it has, very frequently.

62. Then, while the existing law may, and does work injustice to the younger children of a family, such an alteration as that now proposed could not result in injustice to any children? I think not. I think the natural principles of equity would then guide; and in all cases where property was left every member of the family would have something for his education, and to start him in life. But in such a case as I before mentioned, where all is given to one, and the younger members of the family are left without anything, I think, looking at it in a national and public point of view, besides the injustice to individuals, it is a great misfortune, because they might be left without the means of maintenance or of education, whereas, if the property were equally distributed they would have the means of education; and I think, in our present circumstances, that the Legislature of the country ought to keep in view, as their pole-star, that it is their bounden duty to encourage, in every way, the education of all persons in the country.

63. By Mr. Macarthur: I would put this case to you: Suppose a family to consist of seven children—four sons and three daughters—that three of the younger sons and the three daughters have been provided for before the death of the owner of the landed estate, and that he dies intestate—would there not be a very great injustice to the eldest son, who, under this Bill, would be entitled only to an equal portion with his younger brothers, whereas all the junior branches of the family have been provided for in some way already, probably out of the proceeds of the estate, or, it may have been, out of the exertions of the eldest son? A case of that kind might be provided for by the Bill, as certainly there would be injustice in it; and English law already provides, in the case of coparcenary and other cases, what lawyers call hotchpot, and if the law of hotchpot were in such cases as that made applicable, I think there would be no injustice at all—it would meet exactly the case you suppose.

64. I understood that the principle you recommend is, that the law should provide for the equitable distribution of real estate, not simply an equal, but an equitable distribution? If a proprietor dies intestate, an equitable distribution would be synonymous with an equal distribution to all, both males and females. In the case of children being provided for, so that some would not require so much as the rest, I think it would be equitable then that the law of hotchpot should be brought in aid. So that, supposing a daughter or a son had received a marriage portion, that should be considered in the distribution.

65. I understood you to say that in France, although the law prescribed a partition of the real real estate, that families, among themselves, come to an arrangement to avoid that partition in some instances? So far as I can learn they do so among the peasantry—where the property is too small for subdivision the brothers agree among themselves that one shall have the property, and that all shall assist in working, or they take a consideration for it. In short, they make some arrangement that will keep the property in the family. J.H. Plunkett,

Esq., Q.C.
14 July, 1853.

66. Have you never heard of a considerable inconvenience arising from that state of things: for instance, that a vineyard, or even an olive tree, might become the property of several persons, and it would be necessary before the crop could be gathered that the whole of those parties should agree to the gathering of the crop;—are you not aware that not only inconvenience but serious loss sometimes arises in that way? I am not aware of the details leading to any inconvenience, but it would be to the interest of all parties to remedy such inconvenience or loss. I can, however, imagine no such evil result as would follow from a man of ample property dying, and leaving a number of his children wholly unprovided for, entirely destitute, without either the means of maintaining or educating themselves, at an age when it would be all important to themselves, as well as to the country, that they should have the means and opportunity of being educated. I can conceive of no such inconvenience as that arising out of any subdivision of property. The subdivision of property, I believe, exists in Switzerland in the most thriving cantons, as it does in France, and is there as popular among the people as it is in France. The feelings of the people are engrafted upon it, and what may appear to us inconvenient, and likely to lead to great evils, has not that effect in those countries where the division of property by the laws of descent is allowed.

67. I understood you to be opposed to any law which would enforce upon the proprietor of an estate a compulsory distribution of it, in a way which would not accord with his own special views? Yes; I would not advocate the restriction of the owner of property in any way in disposing of it as he likes, but I think, in a national point of view, that the system of primogeniture according to the present law is likely to lead to great evils. The young heir-at-law to his father's property is more likely to take less trouble in educating himself, fitting himself for the business of the country, and making himself a really respectable man, than the younger sons, who know they will have to look out to make their own fortunes. Instead of desiring to have great men by reason of their landed possessions, I think we should encourage men to become great by the cultivation of their intellects, which they are not likely to do if they are not somewhat thrown on their own resources.

68. Still I understood you to say you quite concurred in the principle that love of country sprung very much from love of a particular locality—what may be termed love of the soil itself—and the improvements that may have continued to be made in it through a series of years from generation to generation in the same family? No doubt; but in this country, where it is so much more easy to get land than in the old country, and in which it ought to be still easier, that love for a particular spot of the earth may be as deeply planted in what a man gets himself as in that which he inherits from his ancestors.

69. Have you not had opportunities of observing that in this country there is the same attachment to particular spots on the part of families as what you have alluded to as existing in older countries? It is a principle engrafted in our nature to be fond of particular localities. I think the human species something like cats in that respect—they have strong local attachments; but I think the principle of primogeniture is quite foreign to it. If one individual is to possess all the property of his father, and all the rest have no share, they will naturally regard him who takes all the valued spot of land with some degree of envy.

70. By Mr. Piddington: Suppose the Legislature of this country abolished the law of primogeniture, do you think cases would occur, as put by Mr. Macarthur, where six out of seven children were provided for and no provision were made for the eldest—do you think a provident father would forget the interest of his eldest son? It might occur in cases of intestacy, unless provided against; and I know that men are so prone to postpone the making of their wills in this country particularly, that such cases are very likely to occur. I have myself frequently urged persons who I knew had not their wills made to attend to the matter, in order that their intention respecting the disposition of their property might be carried out. People postpone the matter from time to time, in some cases because they absurdly think it draws them nearer to the grave. There are, however, many persons in the remote bush who are not influenced by the foolish feeling I have alluded to, but who, from the want of the professional assistance which all men like to have in such cases, and which it is desirable they should have, postpone making their wills until they come to town, and perhaps die in the meantime.

71. In cases where a parent has been already sufficiently provident to provide for six children out of seven, is it not a violent supposition to imagine that he would forget the interest of the seventh? He might from mere negligence; I cannot suppose any provident parent would do so. But I can fancy a case of this kind:—If a man had made an arrangement to-day to convert the personal property he had yesterday into land, the property as it was yesterday would have been equally distributed among his children in the event of his death; but if, after this conversion of personal property into land, and before making a will he were to die suddenly, the property would, under the present law, go into a different channel; the eldest son would in such case take it all, to the exclusion of all the other children.

72. The first clause of this Bill provides that in cases of intestacy all lands should be held to be chattels real—if that clause were agreed to would not landed property follow the same course of distribution as personal property? Yes; it would amount to a declaration of law that would be equivalent to a will to the same effect. But even in drawing a will there are certain technical details to be kept in view, to guard against confusion or litigation.

73. You know no reason why the laws applicable to the distribution of personal property should be altered? No, I would not touch them, certainly; the Statute of Distributions is so interwoven into our law that any disturbance of it might lead to mischievous consequences.

J.H. Plunkett, 74. You see nothing inequitable in the present law? No.

Esq., Q.C.

14 July, 1858.

75. For the purposes of distribution in cases under this Bill, the land will not necessarily be divided; it does not follow as a necessary consequence that the land shall be divided? I take it that it would be sold if the administrator or curator, or whatever else the person may be called, into whose hands it would come, could not be expected to farm, improve, or act in the same way with it as the proprietor.

76. Nor necessarily to partition the property for sale? Nor to partition the property; but if it were to go in the way I suggested, as property does to females and co-heiresses, then it would be partitioned, and be equitably and fairly distributed, without doing violence to family feelings or to the love for the land that may exist in the breasts of the particular family.

77. You are not prepared to suggest any arbitrary scheme for the distribution of property apart from the law as it exists? No. I think the abolition of primogeniture would do everything; it would then follow in the natural channel, well understood by all lawyers, as in the case of co-heiresses.

78. The third clause provides, that all sales of land under the Bill shall be subject to the approval of the Judges—do you not think a clause of this nature is desirable to be retained? If the first clause is retained in its present shape I think it would be well to vest a discretion somewhere to prevent the unnecessary sale of properties. But I think it should go further, and in case it be unnecessary or undesirable to sell the property, discretion should then be vested somewhere for its proper management.

79. Do you think it would be advisable to provide for the continued management of the property of an intestate? In some cases it would be necessary. Some of the parties entitled might be out of the country, and in the interim, until the wishes of all parties concerned were ascertained, it would be necessary to make some provision for the management of it.

80. Do you think it absolutely necessary to contemplate the management of landed property by agents in cases of intestacy? If land is to be taken into the hands of an officer of the Court or the Government, and if it is not to be sold at once, it would follow, as a matter of course, that some provision should be made for its management. A receiver or manager should be appointed, otherwise it would be waste. That was one of the difficulties felt with reference to the present Intestacy Act, regulating the duties of curator, that no provision was made for the management of landed property. I have known landed properties here that were not attended to at all. I recollect, in one instance, the next heir happened to be in England, he did not know that the property had come to him, and it took a long time before a power of attorney could be sent out for any one to act. In the case of the late Colonel Leahy, who had purchased several grants in Illawarra, and left very large property—property which I should say at the present time would be worth £50,000—he died suddenly at the Club House, and had no relative in the Colony, and there was no one to take charge of the landed property. At length his brother sent out a power of attorney to the Messrs. Campbell, of the wharf, but before that reached here, I understood the property was very much injured, and gone to waste for want of some person to look after it.

81. Do you not think it is more in accordance with good policy that the Curator of Intestate Estates, or some official of the Supreme Court, should possess the absolute power of sale without any restriction? I think it would be well to have some check over any officers, such as the third clause provides.

82. Admitting that such check should exist, do you not think that the officers—the curators or administrators—should possess an absolute power of sale, subject to the examination or approval of the Judges? I have stated before that that might do violence to family feelings, and that those beneficially interested in the land ought to be consulted, and their feelings ought to have some control in the matter.

83. Would not the proceeds of such a sale be held in trust for the interest of the family? Of course; but they might wish to have the land itself in the family, and if a sale were imperative, it might be brought into the market in times such as we all recollect—the years 1843 and 1844—when property did not produce one-tenth of its value.

84. By Mr. Faucett: You attribute a great many of the evils of Ireland to the state of the laws of descent—are you aware of any difference between the laws of England and Ireland in that respect? Under the old feudal law in England, in the natural course of things an aristocracy sprung up that is respected by the country, and interwoven with its constitution. In Ireland, there never was such an aristocracy since the law of primogeniture was introduced into it, and the would-be aristocracy that sprung out of it in Ireland was never worthy of the respect in which the English aristocracy have ever been held.

85. Have not the two states of things sprung up under the same system of laws? No; the English laws were never entirely engrafted upon the Irish. The law of Poynings was introduced into Ireland, not at the wish of the Irish themselves, but the English laws were forced upon Ireland, and transplanted to a soil which was never congenial or natural to them, and in which they never flourished; and the consequence was, that a mongrel aristocracy sprung up in Ireland, not respected in the same way as the English aristocracy is in England.

86. I am speaking now simply of the law of primogeniture—is not the law of primogeniture the same in England as in Ireland, and has it not been for centuries? Yes, but not for the same length of time: it exists in Ireland only since James the First.

87. Then if a different state of things exists in Ireland than that which exists in England must it not be attributed to some cause besides the law of primogeniture? The evils of Ireland branch into many different directions, and we must look at them as a whole; but I think the law of primogeniture has had a great share in producing them; for instance, in many parts of Ireland I know there are to this day, or were up to the time when I last knew it, very large domains in the hands of proprietors to whom they had come by the law of primogeniture, large parks and waste lands kept up merely for family pride. These could never get into the hands of those who would make them profitable to the country—I speak of places where agrarian outrages had arisen, in consequence of the want of land where there was the greatest demand for land—these large wastes were in the hands of large proprietors in Ireland, kept for sheep and cattle, or merely from family pride, without producing anything at all worth speaking of; and if these had been divisible, the law of primogeniture was the cause of this state of things, and if it had been abolished it would have been a great blessing to the country. J.H. Plunkett, Esq., Q.C.

14 July, 1858.

88. The law of primogeniture in fact affects no other estates than those that are intestate? The law of primogeniture introduces a feeling in the country that generates the entails to lock up these large estates in one member of the family.

89. I am not speaking now of the feeling with respect to the law. You are aware that the law of primogeniture cannot affect any estates but intestate estates? Not immediately—not directly.

90. You have used the expression "the law of entail"—what is it you mean by the law of entail? The marriage settlements that are made to carry out the spirit of the law of primogeniture,—that gives to the eldest son, with a great many incumbrances, the family property,—these incumbrances going from father to son, and from son to grandson, for generations, have locked up estates in such a way that they are not available to the community. Holding them in that way, the unfortunate eldest sons, who were themselves the victims of such a state of things, were almost persuaded that they were men of property, and lived as hospitably and expensively as their ancestors, forgetting all the encumbrances put upon the property by those very ancestors. Many who were perhaps not worth a farthing considered themselves men of property, and lived in that extravagant way.

91. Still there was no law compelling this entail—this marriage settlement? There was no direct law of compulsion; but I attribute the existence of this state of things to the law of primogeniture, because that induced a feeling which made people blindly follow this course as being proper.

92. Then, to use your argument, the marriage settlements by which estates are entailed have arisen from a feeling of anxiety to carry still further the law of primogeniture? All these marriage settlements are guided by those feelings that are generated by the laws of primogeniture, and that I think to be injurious to the general welfare of the country.

93. You state that the marriage settlements, and the entails in those settlements, have arisen from a desire on the part of the people to carry out the spirit of the law of primogeniture? Yes, of the landed proprietors—not the people.

94. If that be so, does it not rather shew that those who make these marriage settlements approve of the law of entail than that they are adverse to it? It proves that that feeling among the landed classes of Ireland was prevalent; but when I speak of Ireland I look to the general interest of the nation.

95. I am not asking as to the benefits of it, but merely as to the effects and arguments to be deduced from the facts you have stated. Do not you think the substance of the statements you have made comes to this, that the effort on the part of those who are making settlements, to make those settlements in accordance with the law of primogeniture, shews on their part a desire to carry still further that law? Most decidedly; but they find now (and the operation of the Encumbered Estates Act is the best proof of it), that they have themselves been the victims of that very state of things.

96. That is, they have been the victims of improvident settlements? No, rather of the improvidence produced by those settlements.

97. And flowing from the settlements? And flowing from the settlements. In truth, the result of my reflections on the subject is, that the notions of the old landed interest of Ireland were not in accordance with the general good of the country. I know there are many what in Ireland are called mountains kept merely for shooting grouse upon them. These, like our waste lands here, if sold, could be reclaimed and made productive; indeed, there would be sufficient cultivable land for the wants of thousands of the people without emigrating at all; but the great desire to have large landed possessions, I think, mars the best interests of the country.

98. With respect to the transfer of lands—at present the transfer of lands is in many cases very simple? Yes.

99. Land can be transferred in a room without the parties ever seeing it, and this is commonly done here? Yes, but by deed or writing. Upon that subject there is a very instructive chapter in Lord St. Leonard's little book lately published, which it would be well worth the while of any member of the Committee to read.

100. Do you think it would be advisable to reduce the method of transferring land, as nearly as possible, to the simplicity of method used in transferring railway shares? I am afraid that would be impossible. Even in the many suggestions made by Lord Brougham for shortening forms I do not see that he recommends such a course. I fear it would lead to confusion.

101. In principle is not a railway, not considering the movable or moving stock upon it, as much landed property as any land in the world? Of course.

102. Then the interest in a railway is the same as the interest in land? That depends upon the circumstances—there may be shares in the profits of working without an interest in the land.

103. Take the case of an ordinary private company—the company own the railway and own the land—is there any difference between the interest the company have in the railway and the interest a private individual has in his landed estate? I think there is some difference, because the company have the land for a particular purpose, and cannot deviate from that purpose; whereas a proprietor of land may do what he likes with his own land. The members of a company are bound to each other for a certain state of things. They are new companies, but by the old law mining companies are considered to be regulated by the principles that regulate landed property, and I suppose the same principles would guide railways.

- J.H. Plunkett, Esq., Q.C.
14 July, 1838.
104. Take a mining company: Suppose a company purchase a piece of land for the purpose of mining, has not the company, as a body, the same interest in that land as a private individual would have if he had purchased it? It is a different sort of interest, for it is purchased for one purpose.
105. They purchase the land out-and-out, but they know it is good for mining, and they use it for mining? Yes.
106. If the company wanted to transfer their interest they would have to do it in the same way as private persons? Yes, I believe so.
107. I understood you to say you thought it advisable landed estate should be distributed in some manner different from personal estate—that is, in some manner different from the Statute of Distributions. I have here Blackstone; with reference to the Statute of Distributions, he says, "One-third shall go to the widow of the intestate, and the residue in equal proportions to his children, or, if dead, to their representatives; if there are no children or legal representatives subsisting, then a moiety shall go the widow, and a moiety to the next of kindred, in equal degree, and their representatives," and so on. Now if the principle of this Bill be carried out, do you think that would be a fair distribution? I think it is a distribution that is acknowledged to be just.
108. I assume that to be just with regard to personalty—? It has been in force since the reign of Charles 2nd, and it has not been complained of. There is one observation I beg to make with respect to the widow. I do not know whether it is intended as part of the scheme proposed by this Bill to interfere with the dower of a widow. Unless barred in the way prescribed by the present law, she would have an inherent right to her thirds of the land during her life only, and some provision should be made in that case that she should, if the Statute of Distributions is taken to be the guide, be put to her election. Where she would be entitled to thirds by right of dower she should not also be entitled to the one-third or half of the land under the Statute of Distributions. That should be provided for expressly.
109. If the Act stands as it is, that all real property be reduced to chattels real, that, you say, would do away with the right of dower as it now stands? According to the Statute of Distributions, in the case of no issue the widow would be entitled to one-half, that is more than the law of dower ever gave to a wife, even for her life.
110. If the Bill passed in this way, would it not take away altogether the widow's right of dower? Not entirely; because the right of dower is inherent upon the marriage, which of course precedes the intestacy.
111. That is on the principle that the land remains freehold, not if the land becomes chattels—the right of dower does not remain if the land is reduced to chattels: in other words, if this Bill passes will the right of dower be seriously affected? I think not, because, as this Bill contemplates that real estate shall only be interfered with in cases of intestacy, and it cannot impliedly interfere with dower, because by marriage the wife has an inherent right to one-third of the land, and therefore she would, unless barred, have her third, whether the husband made a will or not.
112. That is in the present state of the law? Yes.
113. As that Bill stands, would not that right be altogether taken away? I think not. It appears to me as that Bill stands, and as the Statute of Distributions would operate, the wife would have not only her thirds by common law relating to dower, but she would be entitled to half over and above.
114. Then, according to your opinion, I understand that she would have, if this Bill passed, first one-third, according to the Statute of Distributions here, and secondly the right of dower in addition—is that what I understand? Yes; she would have more than the law contemplated or ought to contemplate; first, she would have her right to dower, and then, if there were not some express provision to the contrary, she would be entitled, not to an estate for life, but would come in to have one-half entirely, the same as the others. It is not life estate the Statute of Distributions contemplates, but the whole, so that if the real property of an estate were sold, and he had left no children, his widow would be entitled to one-half of the whole estate over and above what she would be entitled to at present.
115. Then, according to that, she would be entitled to two-thirds if this Bill passed—first, to her third by right of dower, and second, to her third under the Statute of Distributions? Yes; but I think no wife ought to have more out of the land by law than she is entitled to by common law, that is one-third during her life. If it is intended that the Statute of Distributions should operate, I think she should be put to her election, and if she rests on the right she has under the Dower Act she should have no more; her life interest should then be calculated, and she should get her share according to that calculation, and the rest should go among the children.
116. As you have not considered this Bill, of course some of these questions must come upon you by surprise—Do you not think the object of this first clause is to take away all right of dower, and to give the third, or whatever portion it is that is given by the Statute of Distributions? If that is the object, it is necessary to express it, which it does not do at present; and I think it ought to be a matter of consideration whether the dower which a wife is entitled to, which is only a life estate, should be converted into an absolute estate, for it makes all the difference—the distribution among the children would be a distribution of the whole unreservedly, whereas the wife, under our law, is only entitled to an estate for her own life out of the land of her husband; and I think any calculation with respect to land should be made upon the old law of her life estate.
117. Then you think an express provision to that effect should be introduced into the Act? Certainly, or the greatest confusion would arise.
118. With respect to the sales of these large squatting properties—which are all personalty—where they come into the hands of the administrator, the administrator has the power to manage it at his discretion, like any other property? I believe he takes a discretion, but I doubt doubt whether, according to the strict law, and the policy of the law, any officer of any kind is allowed to manage; his business is to sell, and convert everything into cash. J.H. Plunkett, Esq., Q.C.

119. Do you think an express provision, giving the administrator or curator a discretion to sell at whatever period he may find advantageous, should be introduced into the Bill? I think it would be wise to do so, and also that all parties concerned should have a voice as to the expediency or desirableness of selling at all. I think it might safely be left in the hands of the Court. 14 July, 1853.

120. When you consider that the administrator is the next of kin, or "the next friend," as he is called, do you think a sufficient security is given by that means, so that he might be trusted with a discretionary power? I would rather leave the discretion in the hands of the Court than in any administrator. The fact of a man being connected by blood is not a sufficient guarantee that he will exercise a wise discretion, or disinterested one.

121. By Mr. Forster: The right of dower is a common law right you say? Yes.

122. It attaches only to real estate, and not to personalty? Yes.

123. Then if real estate by this Act were expressly converted into personalty, how can you suppose the right of dower attaches to it? It is converted into personalty only if the proprietor dies without making a will—it is treated from that moment as personal estate; but suppose he has married ten years before he dies intestate, unless his wife has barred the dower, by jointure or by other way, she has the inherent right to the thirds of the land. Whether sold in the life time of her husband or not, the right of dower must be sold along with it. The contingency of her living after him in case he disposes of it in his life time must be considered by the purchaser. It is a common law right dating from her marriage, and she cannot be divested of that by her husband dying intestate.

124. Did you not say that in cases of jointure, and also of some settlements, she is divested of right of dower? Yes; but I speak of cases where the wife is entitled to dower where it is not barred.

125. There are many cases where a jointure will bar a dower, even where it is not expressly barred? Jointure is, I believe, always given in lieu of dower.

126. Are there not cases of settlement where the dower is impliedly barred? There is no difficulty in barring dower, but if a man gets married to a woman without any settlement at all, if he gets a deed or conveyance of inheritable land without barring her, she has a common law right that will attach.

127. But the dower can be barred now by a simple deed? Yes.

128. If that be the case, what becomes of this inherent right? There is no inherent right if it is barred; but I speak of ordinary cases. There are very few marriage settlements here, and all who obtain grants from the Crown get those grants without ever thinking of having dower barred; but it would be very easy to guard against dower attaching.

129. By Mr. Faucett: I will put a very simple case that will shew my meaning:—Suppose a grant from the Crown to be made to a man, his wife that moment acquires what you call the inherent right to dower; he makes no will, and during his life she possesses that inherent right,—if that Bill should pass now, and he should die intestate, would not that Bill deprive her at once of the right of dower? I think not, as it stands at present.

130. By Mr. Piddington: Not taking into consideration the actual alteration of real property into personalty effected by the first clause, by that clause immediately on his decease the character of the property changes? That change of character would give to her under the Statute of Distributions over and above what is vested in her before. That, I think, would be the effect; but it would be very easy to give her the option. You cannot interfere with her marital right without altering the law of dower altogether; but you might require her to elect which she would take, so as not to give her both.

131. Upon the supposition that she has a right to dower? Yes; but I question very much whether the wife ought to be entitled under the Statute of Distributions at all to the entire part of the produce of landed property.

132. To the proceeds absolutely? To the proceeds absolutely, because a man and his wife may live together for fifty years and the wife at the time of her husband's death may be so old and feeble that no insurance company would insure her life for one year. In such a case, I think, it would be hard on the family that she should have her share under the Statute of Distributions equally with the other members.

133. By Mr. Faucett: Under this Bill she gets one-third of the proceeds of this land in fee? I think that is more than she should have, she should have her third during life, and that might be a life that no insurance company would insure for a year, and if you transfer property, as contemplated by this Bill in the case of a widow having no family, she would actually have one-half her husband's property to give, or would descend to her own relatives, away from her husband's family,—that I think would be unjust in principle.

134. By the Chairman: Has the wife any right of dower in chattels real? None; only in estates of inheritance.

135. A proviso might be made restricting the wife to the alternative to have either her dower or her share under the Statute of Distributions? That is what I suggest, calculating only a life interest in respect to the land.

FRIDAY, 16 JULY, 1858.

Present:—

MR. MURRAY,
MR. FORSTER,MR. J. MACARTHUR,
MR. PIDDINGTON.

T. A. MURRAY, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

The Hon. James Norton, Esq., M.L.C., called in and examined:—

The Hon.
James Norton,
Esq., M.L.C.

16 July, 1858.

1. By the Chairman: You are a solicitor in Sydney? I am.
2. Have you been very long in practice in the town? Nearly 40 years.
3. Do you know what in law constitutes the difference between real and personal property? I do.
4. What is the difference? Real estate is that property which has the quality of immobility and legal indeterminate duration, which is transferred by a deed, (that is, an instrument under seal,) and is the subject of uses. Real estate descends to the eldest son. If no son, daughters, however numerous, constitute one heir, and are denominated coparceners. Personal estate, called chattels, consists of all movable property, including money, and what are called chattels real, which comprise terms for years in lands, presentation to a church, elegit, and other things, which arise out of real estate, and have the quality of immobility, but want the other quality of real estate, indeterminate duration, and this want constitutes them chattels.
5. Well, copyhold estate is not freehold? No.
6. An estate held for 999 years is not real estate? No.
7. Yet land held under these tenures are immovable as any other lands? No doubt the land is, but the party entitled has only the use of the land under certain conditions, not the land itself, and his interest is limited. The owner of copyhold lands formerly held at the will of the lord or owner in fee. That will has been much restrained and modified, but when a sale takes place the land is still surrendered to the lord, who re-grants to the purchaser; some copyholds descend to the heir-at-law, and are called copyholds of inheritance; some descend to the eldest sister or niece; some, by custom, to all children equally. The owner is never capable of transmitting the property except by means of a surrender to the lord and a re-grant by him.
8. But the peculiar characteristics which you have adverted to as properly belonging to real estate, and distinguishing real estate from personal estate, apply just as strongly to copyhold land held by copyhold, and to the land held under a lease for years, as they do to freehold property, the immovability of the thing being the same? Yes.
9. Well, you adverted to the laws of descent as affecting two descriptions of property in a different manner—in the case of intestacy, the freehold property goes to the heir-at-law? Yes.
10. But, in cases of intestacy, land held under copyhold, or under a lease, goes to the children—is divided among the sons generally? Copyholds generally descend to all the children equally; leasehold lands always.
11. But lands held under copyhold have passed from generation to generation? Yes, by means of surrender and re-grant.
12. In the course of your experience have you any information of any evil resulting from the descent of land by copyhold or lease for years? I am not aware that any inconvenience has resulted from such modes of holding lands. I cannot suppose that a tenant for a term of years, however long, supposes that it would descend to his heir-at-law, or to any particular member of his family.
13. Then, in fact, the descent of the land by primogeniture in the event of intestacy is the great peculiarity which distinguishes real property from personal property? It is one of the peculiarities.
14. Now, can you inform the Committee when that law of primogeniture first began to affect landed property in that way? I am not able to answer the question without a reference to authorities. The law may possibly have come into operation at various dates. It is, however, part of the feudal law, and has been recognised for so many generations that Englishmen have conformed to its operation.
15. It is altogether a feudal institution? Possibly so.
16. Introduced into England at the time of the Conquest? I cannot say that. It is extremely probable that it might have existed in Scotland before the Conquest. It is impossible to read the obscure and early history of clanship without suspecting that the law of primogeniture was in operation long before the Conquest.
17. You are aware of the law of gavelkind—is that not a remnant of the Saxon law? It is, and I believe that it has long been entirely confined to some parts of Kent.
18. Is it not established in Kent rather in consequence of the Kentishmen at the time of the Conquest having insisted on the maintenance of their own Saxon laws? Possibly; but had I been aware of your intention to put the question I would have looked into the history of the law. Practically, it is not important to know when or under what circumstances the law was introduced, but in what manner it affects those who are brought under its operation.
19. Are you aware that any evil at all has resulted from the existence of this law of gavelkind in Kent, which law is so much at variance with the common law generally in reference to landed property? I have had no opportunity of judging. I never lived in Kent, I believe the only part of England in which lands are held on this tenure, and without local experience I could express no opinion. I cannot, however, conceive any difficulty to result from the law. I may, however, add, that lands in gavelkind descend to the sons only, in exclusion of the daughters, and the difficulty arising from the disability of married women does not therefore affect the parties holding.

20. You cannot conceive any difficulty from the alteration in the law? No; I cannot conceive that any difficulty is felt by those who hold under that particular law, because, I suppose, they have conformed to it. The Hon.
James Norton,
Esq., M.L.C.

21. Well, in a country like this, new as it is, we may suppose that the people would also conform to a particular law? The alteration of the law of descent may, no doubt, be less mischievous in a new country than in an old one. 16 July, 1858.

22. Then there may be objections to any alterations of the law in this respect in England which do not at all apply to a country like this? Certainly.

23. But you perceive by the law under consideration that no interference whatsoever with the rights of individuals in the disposal of their own property by will is contemplated? I assume that we are not pursuing the course adopted by France, that is, to take away the right of the owner to devise his lands in such way as he may think proper.

24. Well, have you become acquainted, in your experience as a solicitor, with cases of hardship which have arisen in consequence of the distribution of landed property in families in consequence of the law of primogeniture? I know of one case of hardship—not of great hardship, because the only question was whether certain children should each have land worth a few hundred pounds, or whether the whole should go to the heir-at-law. I cannot doubt that there may be many cases of hardship.

25. That information comes under your own knowledge? Yes. I have known an heir-at-law possess himself of the entire real estate of his father without making any provision for his sisters and younger brothers.

26. Do you know anything of the case of the late Mr. B——? I have heard that he died with an imperfect will, or with no will at all. Under the old will Act, lands acquired, after publication, did not pass. Wills now speak from the death of the testator. There are comparatively few cases affected by wills prepared before the present Act came into operation.

27. But it is clear that such cases as that of Mr. B—— are not likely to occur again. But the fact is, Mr. B—— died intestate, and other men will die intestate? I assume, of course, that men do frequently die intestate. The cases of real estate acquired after the date of a will, prepared under the old will Act, may be cured by a Colonial enactment, passed to declare that a will under the old shall in future, like a will under the present Act, speak from the death of the testator.

28. But men will continue to die intestate? Inevitably men will do so.

29. Well then, can you give any good reason why, in the present state of things in this Colony, and in all that we may reasonably contemplate in regard to the future social condition of this country, it is at all advisable that our legislation here should abide by that law of primogeniture? It would be impossible to explain my views without a lengthened address.

30. We will put it all down? I do not think it proper to do so. I shall, however, be happy to give you my opinion upon the subject, and afterwards to answer any questions you may think it expedient to put to me. The question involves infinitely more than you conceive. Men do not neglect to make wills because they are careless or unfeeling, but because they are incapable of knowing how to make them, because they have not advisers capable of directing them, and because where they are ever so well directed they deal with the mysterious future. As you have been pleased to ask my opinion of the expediency of abolishing, in this young Colony, the descent to the eldest son of real estates, I will endeavor with all candour to explain what I conceive would be the operation of the change in the law proposed in the present Bill. Whatever may be the operation in America of a law for the equal distribution amongst the children of an intestate of his real estate, I believe that in this Colony it would be most injurious. Speculation may be said to be the genius of America. Her citizens are found in all parts of the world, and push their adventures into all lands. This genius does not at present distinguish the people of this Colony; I hope it never will do so. I believe that true Englishmen carry with them into all lands a respect for the laws of the parent land; and it may be fairly assumed that many who die without wills intend to adopt the law which gives their lands to their eldest sons. If the distribution of real estate amongst all the children be most beneficial to the community, surely the people would be benefited by the enactment of the law of France, and the division of real estate between all the children of every parent who dies seized of lands; but I believe that in the great majority of cases brought under the operation of a law for the equal distribution of land amongst the children of a deceased proprietor, the property would be totally destroyed. What benefit has resulted to the French people from such a law? Certainly not the maintenance of the class of gentlemen who are returned to the House of Commons. It has been justly said that England is distinguished from France by the existence in the former country of a vast body of gentlemen at all times prepared to support the character of their country and uphold her institutions, and who constitute the great Conservative class—gentlemen who could at once lay down £20,000 for the purchase of an estate, and who by the training and education of their sons qualify them to fill the highest offices in the state, and who are never absent from the post of danger when the interest or the honour of their country demands their support. Look at the "stately homes of England," how many are possessed by untitled gentlemen! In these homes, transmitted from sire to son without the intervention of a will, a noble shelter has ever been found for the widow and younger children of the ancestor. I take the law of descent to have followed, as most laws do, and as all laws should do, the taste of the people. I take the law to have perpetuated in the absence of a will the course of descent the testator himself would, in the vast majority of cases, have devised. It is the great object of English gentlemen to leave their fine estate in the hands of representatives who can sustain the character which distinguished their ancestors and themselves, and who shall themselves belong to the Parliament of their country—who shall be heard in the national councils. It is an object with such gentlemen to lay by fortunes for the younger or less gifted branches of their families.

James Norton,
Esq., M.L.C.

families, to embark them in mercantile pursuits, to enable them to sustain the honour of their country in embassies, and to guard that country with their arms. I believe that the law of primogeniture prescribes a course of descent which the owner of the estate, had he made his will, would generally have adopted. I believe this pre-eminently to be the case with Scotland. It is impossible to look at that country, with all her snowy hills and barren heaths, without feeling that this law has preserved her high character. There we find that one son inherits the mountains of his ancestor, or his fertile plains, and that the rest are trained from their infancy to understand that they must rely on their own exertions for their fortunes. They, from their earliest years, exert themselves to provide the means of establishing, in other lands and under other circumstances, a home, in place of that which is to them a schoolhouse, or a place of temporary residence. I cannot look at the great men who have served England so well, who have found places of the highest distinction in all lands, without feeling that they owe much to the law of primogeniture. I turn to France, and there I find a dozen children each of whom claims his right to a participation in the estate of his father. They have no disposition to wander into the world. Without the genius of America, they turn their attention to the pittance that will become their own: they fall back upon their paltry estate, unaroused to that exertion which would enable them to strike into a nobler path. They feel that, at all events, they shall be provided for, and they cling to their miserable inheritance. It is obvious to every person of reflection that eventually this mode of distribution must come to an end. I know it is too often said that in new countries the lands are unbounded—so is the poverty of the people. It is difficult enough to make of the sterile wilderness a habitable place. The man who settles in a new country generally finds it necessary to expend all his means upon the establishment of his domain, too often to mortgage it, and very often deeply to encumber himself, in order to provide a house for his family, and to educate and qualify his younger children for the exercise of the professions and callings which belong to a new country, or which ought to belong to it. The father dies, and the eldest son takes possession, and I believe that there are few cases either here or in England in which the eldest son has not afforded shelter to his mother and the younger children. The affection of the widow and children lingers round their early home, and finds a resting place on the domestic hearth. What owner of land, I would ask, would labor to provide a home for his children that may at his death be disposed of at a forced sale or destroyed by a miserable partition? What heir would expel from his home his younger brothers and sisters—forget the mother who made his domestic hearth the rallying place of those she loved. Who would substitute for the sacred ties that bind him to his family the barren obligations of an Act of Parliament? By the proposed law of distribution, children of tender age are to leave scenes endeared to them by the presence of those they have been accustomed to revere and love, to leave a home which is to pass into the hands of the unscrupulous publican or the successful cattle dealer, and that for the purpose of making a provision for them. How, I would ask, are they to be provided for by this law? How is the estate to be distributed? Are you to have a partition suit, or are you to cut up the estate and cheat the infants? Are you to make a forced sale, or are you to charge a Judge, who has already vast duties cast upon him, with the consideration of a case of which he is profoundly ignorant, and of the interest of a family with the genius and character of which he is perfectly unacquainted? Is the estate to be sold, if a purchaser can be found, at any price, and the family to be turned out of doors? Everything to be broken up, and that which the anxious owner thought would afford a shelter to his family be thrown away for a sum of money too small even to meet their immediate wants. First, you must consider the case of the widow. She, poor woman, turned out of the house, is compelled to apply herself to the humble occupations which are alone open to her. She must, I suppose, have one-third of the money resulting from a sale of her husband's real estate, and this money her pressing wants will, too probably, compel her to expend in clothing and feeding her helpless children. But two-thirds are to be invested for the benefit of the infants. Invested! Where is investment to be found? Real estate is gone for ever. But it can be invested in the purchase of debentures at 4 or 5 per cent. The security, perhaps, of a Government involved in all the follies that Governments, in such countries as this, do become involved in—a security the Government may be unable to provide the interest for; yet such may be the only investment to be found for her children's share of the property—an investment that may in a few years take the complexion of Brazilian Bonds, and involve the total loss of the pittance these poor children are entitled to. But they may actually receive $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on £120. Better be deprived of everything. Better they should not be cheated into the belief that a provision had been made for them out of the wreck of their poor father's estate. To avoid these difficulties, perhaps the estate is to be actually divided amongst the children. This course, however, is beset with difficulties. Is a partition suit to be filed in the Court of Chancery? or by what other means is partition to be made? Surely those who have a right to the estate have a right to keep and use it. Why should their interests be destroyed by a ruinous and forced sale? Why should not the poor child who is entitled to one-tenth part of the estate have it? But if there be a mansion, whose shall the mansion be? There are ten children! Is one unfortunate man to have a mansion he cannot live in, and that without land to sustain it? and another to have land without a shelter from the rain? Seven of these persons happen to be of full age. They may agree among themselves. Perhaps one is rich enough to buy the whole; but what are you to do with the infants? Is it proposed to make a law to deprive infancy of the protection which has by the laws now in force been so solemnly drawn around it, so strictly applied as often to lead to undue tenderness in the administration of justice? But how would the parties to whom the lands descended take? By the proposed law necessarily as joint tenants. Suppose three of these joint tenants to be married women, and infants, how could they agree to a partition? But get over the difficult question as to the mode of division, and imagine it to have been completed. Suppose that that during their minorities three of the ten children die, leaving numerous children—what is to become of them? The estates of their joint tenant parents do not go to them, but to the surviving joint tenants, and the children of the parties so dying are cheated, are deprived of all interest in their parents' lands. Suppose, to avoid this injustice, you enact that the children shall take as tenants in common: what then? The estate must still be divided, perhaps between seventeen children and grandchildren, many of the latter infants. How is this to be accomplished? Is an endless partition suit to swallow up the value of the estate? Is it proposed that we should legislate upon a subject in ignorance of the consequences of the law—in the hope that some mode of dealing with the question may be found in America? My experience of partition suits, under much more favorable circumstances, compels me to believe that they must ever be most expensive, frequently most unsatisfactory. I was concerned in a partition suit in which the surveyors received upwards of £3,000—and their charges were not unreasonable. Are you to distribute estates, or are you to give them to any low fellow who may happen to have a little money in his pocket, and against whom nobody else is inclined to bid? If the estate be divided the widow must take one-third. She may marry again, and have a family by her second husband. She cannot make a will. She dies and leaves five children by her second husband. Now this estate descended from Jobson, but in the distribution of her estate the children of the second husband must participate with those of her first husband. How greatly is the difficulty of distribution increased. The second marriage of the widow is only one of the contingencies which may arise. Suppose the owner of lands to leave a great many children, married and unmarried, some of age and some not of age. The children are joint tenants, or tenants in common. If joint tenants, the issue of all children but the last survivor would be deprived of all interest. This can hardly be the object of the proposed Act. But if the children are tenants in common—some in Ireland, some in Scotland, and some in England, or possibly scattered over the world—how are they to be reached? They die before partition can be effected, and leave innumerable representatives perfectly unknown. Who is to find them out—who to guard their interests? Are you to sell their property for whatever it will bring, and, should they be discovered, to tell them that the noble possession their ancestor intended for them was thrown away, but that a pittance had been invested in the purchase of a debenture, possibly unsaleable? But there is another class of persons who would be affected by the proposed law—mortgagees, those who lent their money before the proposed law was thought of—how are they to get back their money, or obtain a title to the mortgaged estate? The mortgagee may have a power of sale—most mortgagees have—but with all his powers of sale he has to find a purchaser. If the estate will not sell what is he to do? Take possession! Alas! with no knowledge which would enable him to manage it. What could a trustee under a will, or a settlement, do with the lands on which he held a mortgage, and for which he might be unable to obtain a tenant? Against whom could the mortgagee foreclose the estate? He must first find out the representatives of the mortgagor. A foreclosure will fail to give the mortgagee a title to the land unless every person who has an interest in it, however small, be made a party to the suit. What are trustees of existing marriage settlements to do? They are generally directed to invest the moneys entrusted to them in Government or real securities. Marriage settlements are the acts of the provident, and are entitled to the highest protection—are they to be cast to the winds? I happen to be acquainted with a gentleman of high character and great understanding, who resided for several years at the Cape of Good Hope, in which Colony the estates descend to all the children equally. I have heard that gentleman say that intestacies were there of frequent occurrence; and he added, "I can hardly charge myself with an instance in which animosity did not spring up between parties entitled to the property, entirely fatal to their peace and unity." In a great number of cases family ties were completely destroyed. In the desire to purchase the family property the parties entitled bid against each other with the hostility of savages, and frequently ruin each other; and those who have been reared together separate with a determination never to acknowledge the relationship that exists between them, while their hatred is transmitted from father to son, and concentrated into the bitterness that formerly divided one Highland clan from another.

31. By the Chairman: Does anything of that kind exist in Kent, do you know? I cannot say what exists in Kent; it is enough that it may exist somewhere.

32. Perhaps the Kentish men make their wills? There may be grievances in Kent we are unacquainted with; and by adopting one of their laws we may rush on evils we have never contemplated. The question is, not what mischief a law does, but what it may do. How is it proposed to get over the difficulty of partition—how to provide for money investment? How are you to provide for vast numbers of absent persons? England is occupied by people who can generally be found on the spot—who are easily traced. That is not the condition of the people of this country; one is from Ireland, another is from Scotland, another from Germany, some from all parts of the world. Our relations are spread over the world; theirs are concentrated.

33. By Mr. Piddington: You are aware that the county of Kent is one of the most flourishing counties in England? It may be so; but it does not follow that its flourishing condition is owing to its law of gavelkind.

34. Are you not aware that the law of gavelkind is considered a privilege? Anything may be thought a privilege. There is, I believe, in one part of England a law under which the youngest son, not the eldest, is the heir-at-law; and this is thought to be a privilege, although it is said to have its origin in a privilege the most degrading. But the question is, not what is thought to be a privilege, but what laws it is necessary or expedient to introduce into the Colony; whether it is desirable to overturn what is also thought to be a high privilege—to inherit the noble laws of England; to inherit laws of descent intimately connected with the high character and glory of that country;—whether we should adopt principles principles which, whether wise or not, have sustained the most distinguished nobility, the most highly-gifted commonalty.

35. But it is not intended by this Bill, or by the supporters of the Bill, to interfere with the right of entail? How are you to entail personal estate? If the question were entirely new, and we had assembled from all parts of the world to frame laws for our government, the inquiry would have assumed a very different aspect; but we are not in that condition; we have brought with us our laws, our prejudices, and our institutions, and we have no right to trifle with laws so beneficial to the parent land by experiments that may unsettle those laws without the assurance of certain advantage to the community. I think that the proposed law would ruin the very persons it is intended to provide for. I believe to sweep away the domestic relations, to destroy our early homes, and wholly to blot from memory the scenes of childhood, would be an unwarrantable and most dangerous act. I do believe that the character of Englishmen is bound up with such things, and I hope to see this Colony walking, at however great a distance, in the footsteps of a country that has numbered amongst her sons men that have commanded the respect of all civilized nations.

36. But the law of primogeniture still exists in England? Certainly.

37. And it has not been sufficient to preserve England from the profanation you expect? Possibly not.

38. Very poor security then? I should think very little of the wisdom of those who, because they were on certain occasions unable to keep out injudicious innovations, therefore abandoned the principles they professed.

39. I should suppose that you thought the law of primogeniture a very impervious and strong fence? You are mistaken; but I believe the law of primogeniture to be intimately connected with national character and security.

40. By the Chairman: Might I have the honor of asking one question: Is there any thing in the nature of landed property which entitles it to be dealt with in a different manner to personal property? I conceive that it has a tendency to encourage and support all the relations that spring out of fixed residence and family ties.

41. Therefore, you would give the land in cases of intestacy to one individual and leave the rest destitute? The younger branches of a family may find a shelter in the house of their brother, which would be destroyed by the proposed law.

42. By Mr. Piddington: From what you have said, I should gather that your reverence for landed property arises from connecting the land with the idea of immovability, to a great extent? No; but from its creation of families, and its influence on the character.

43. But although real estate is immovable the possessors are not immovable; they are liable to the changes of this mortal sphere? Very true.

44. They glide away from the possession of real estate as rapidly as from personal estate? Why then facilitate the destruction of ties and relationships already too ephemeral?

45. Do you see any necessary connection between the law abolishing the custom of primogeniture and the French law which you have alluded to? I do; I see that it is so much French as the proposed law operates: it may be one-tenth, or one-fourth, but to the full extent of its operation it is the French law.

46. Are you aware what is the French law existing now in reference to the division of landed property? I understand that the law is absolute now—that it compels the equal division of all landed property amongst all the descendants.

47. Admitting that it be the French law that the owner of landed property is deprived of absolute power to divide his property—in cases of intestacy, is there any connection between that law, and the law which simply abolishes the custom of primogeniture? The French law enacts that all lands shall descend, and the proposed law that certain lands shall descend, in such a way. The connection between them is a rule of three question. I should not be much surprised, if this law were carried into effect, at a proposition that the right of making wills should be taken away, on the ground that it is a scandalous thing that a man should legislate for his family, and that he ought, like the Frenchman, to be deprived of the power to interfere with the law.

48. That is merely a matter of opinion, is it not? I suppose that if the law is opposed to the usual testamentary disposition, the inference must necessarily follow that the right to make a will is not consistent with the general public interest.

49. By the Chairman: But the object of this Bill is simply this:—in the event of intestacy, to divide the property rateably among the members of the family, in accordance with what must be presumed to be the dictates of natural affection and right? I think it natural that in case of intestacy the property should go to one member of the family only.

50. Why should you presume, or assume, then, from legislation which has for its object merely the maintenance of natural right, that there will be a tendency to the opposite extreme—to abolish the right of bequest altogether? I have endeavoured to point out the practical difficulties which I conceive would make this Act inoperative, and to shew that it is absolutely at issue with a great moral principle. I have also endeavoured to shew the impossibility of executing the proposed law without the destruction of the interests it is its object to preserve.

51. We have had some lawyers examined in this Committee; for instance, Mr. Plunkett, who was long Attorney General of this Colony, was examined yesterday, and he is quite in favor of the principles of this Bill. He did not point out any objection in its practical details, except this: that he said it would be necessary some provision should be made to guard against a wife receiving her dower under the Bill, and also her share of the personal estate? Mr. Plunkett might not have been aware of the objections.

52. By Mr. Piddington: Do you think the question of partition could not be carried out by the official Curator of Intestate Estates, under the control of the Judges? I think it would be unwarrantable and unwise to trust the Judges with this power. Unwarrantable—because they have not time to execute it: unwise—because they never could be competent judges of the interests involved in the question.

53. By the Chairman: In the ordinary cases of intestacy the administrator must give security for his trust. Well, under this Bill, we must assume that the Curator of Intestate Estates would not be called upon to interfere in the absence of the family: he gives security for it, and it is a family affair which they settle among themselves? I do not know anything that has worked such enormous ill, or operated so injuriously as the principle of security. The man most entitled to be trusted—best qualified to discharge the trust—is very commonly unable to find sureties, or give security; and too many who find sureties let in innocent parties to cover their defaults.

The Hon.
James Norton,
Esq., M.L.C.
16 July, 1858.

54. You adverted to the difficulty in which mortgagees might be placed in the event of this Act passing? Yes.

55. And you spoke of the Trust Company. They have mortgages over estates throughout the Colony: but is it not a fact that the sums lent upon these mortgages are far below the ordinary market value of the land so mortgaged? No.

56. It is their principle? It is—but they may be misled.

57. Supposing such a law as this had passed, would it have the effect of injuring the Trust Company in regard to those properties? Unquestionably.

58. But how could the operation of a law like that affect the mortgages? Suppose they could not sell them, and were therefore compelled to foreclose?

59. But they have the right of sale? They might be unable to find a purchaser.

60. But that would not result from the operation of this law? The law might deprive them of the power to foreclose: that is, it might let in representatives of a mortgagor they could never trace out.

61. The Trust Company have a mortgage over an estate; they wish to exercise the power of sale which they have given to them; they put up the land for sale, and it may or may not sell—according to the state of the market at that time: but how can the operation of that Bill affect the state of the market? If they could not sell the land they would desire to foreclose, and the proposed law might prevent them from doing so. Until a recent law was passed the Trust Company could not hold lands.

62. It is not from any consideration for the Trust Company that that law was passed, but for the convenience of the parties who held? I witnessed the introduction of this Bill as a new era which shed a light upon this country that my own imagination never conceived. I know Mr. Wentworth did propose a Bill for restricting all interests to a certain rate.

63. By Mr. Piddington: I think Mr. Wentworth proposed a Bill to confiscate their right—to rob them? That would have been the effect of his Bill.

64. What I advert to is this: I think we might make all these companies—like the English banks, and so on—contribute something to our revenues, for instance, making a charge upon notes?

FRIDAY, 23 JULY, 1858.

Present:—

MR. JONES,
MR. PIDDINGTON,

MR. MACARTHUR,
MR. FORSTER.

R. JONES, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

The Hon. Sir Alfred Stephen, Knight, Chief Justice, called in and examined:—

1. By the Chairman: You are Chief Justice of the Colony? I am.

2. Would you be good enough to state to the Committee what the present state of the law is in regard to intestate estates? It is simply that landed property descends to the eldest son; or, if there be daughters, to them jointly; or, if there be no children, in a regulated course of descent on the same principle: and, in the case of personal property, it goes to the administrator, or, if none be appointed, then to the Curator of Intestate Estates.

The Hon.
Sir A. Stephen,
Knight, C.J.
23 July, 1858.

3. And the personalty is divided equally among the children, if there be any? If there be children the proceeds of the personal property, not the property specifically, is divided among the children in equal shares—the widow, however, if there be one, taking one-third; or, if there be no children, then she takes half.

4. In the event of a man dying intestate possessing landed property, and that landed property encumbered—subject to certain claims—and leaving also some personal property, would the personal property become liable for the payment of the debts on the real property, or would the entire proceeds of the personal property pass to the whole of the children of the intestate person, leaving the claims on the landed property to be defrayed from any moneys arising from the sale or rental of that property? The old law was, that the interest of the heir was preferred to that of the administrator; and he was entitled, consequently, to have his inheritance free of incumbrances, if they could be satisfied out of the personalty. The same law applied equally to devisees. But the law on this head has, I think, been altered by a recent enactment—I cannot recollect distinctly when *

5. Is there any difference between the English law in relation to intestate estates and the local law of the Colony? There is none; excepting that in this Colony landed property has always been unqualifiably subject to the payment of debts, in the first instance, of every kind; whereas in England, ordinarily, the land was subject only to debts of a higher order, binding the heir—such as debts by recognizance, or bond, or other instrument under seal.†

* The Chief Justice has, since his examination, supplemented this answer by referring to the 18 Vict., c. 113 (August 1854,) adopted in this Colony in 1855.

† The Chief Justice has desired to add, that the English law has been assimilated in this respect to the Colonial, by the 4 W. 4 c. 104—passed in August 1833.

The Hon.
Sir A. Stephen,
Knight, C.J.
23 July, 1858.

6. But unless there has been an alteration of the English law within the last year or two—to which you have alluded with some degree of uncertainty—personalty left intestate would be liable in this Colony, primarily, to the payment of any debts with which that landed property was encumbered? In a Court of Equity, as between the heir and the administrator, such would be the law. The creditor however, has his own independent rights, and he might always resort to either one or the other at his discretion.
7. The heir might then, by suit against the administrator, compel the redemption of the land in so far as any claims affected that primarily, and from the proceeds of the personalty left by the intestate? Just so.
8. Have you seen the Bill which has been introduced in the Legislative Assembly to regulate the descent of landed property in cases of intestacy? I have.
9. Have you examined the provisions of that Bill? Yes.
10. Do you see any objection to the alteration which is contemplated by that Bill on any ground? I see great objections to the Bill.
11. Would you be good enough to state to the Committee the objections you see to the measure being passed into law? In the first place, the term "chattels real" is a wholly inappropriate term; and, properly understood, cannot I suppose have been intended by the framers. A chattel real necessarily implies a fixed or determinate interest, or, in other words, an interest in land for a stated and ascertained period; whereas, I presume, the object of the Bill is to destroy entirely the law of inheritance, and to place real property on the same footing as chattels. But both real and personal property are, in respect of the interest of the owner therein, undeterminate in duration; and subject to no abbreviation, except such as is unavoidable by eventual decay. The term "chattels real" is therefore a phrase ignorantly, or, I would say, inconsiderately applied.
12. The term "chattels real" would apply, for instance, to leasehold property determinate at a certain time? Any interest terminable in a given period.
13. I presume the objection would be met by altering "chattels real" to "chattels or personalty"? Yes; but the mistake shows that the Bill can hardly have been well considered, by men of much legal learning.
14. What other objections do you see to the Bill? The chief objection is, in respect to its operation, that it entirely abolishes the law of inheritance; and, by changing wholly the tenure of landed property, introduces a novel and unprecedented state of things, the consequences of which I think there is no man in this Colony learned enough to foresee or calculate. The law of limitations for instance, in common with the law of inheritance throughout, the law of dower, the law effecting settlements, and the like, will all be shaken or destroyed. The effect on existing settlements, or on future settlements, I am unprepared to state—the subject being a very large one, and requiring a greater amount of study than I could at present devote to it. There will, from the time of the passing of this Act, be no such thing as an heir or person possible. That simple statement involves, of course, a complete revolution in all that affects landed property. The land in this Colony belongs in point of law to the Crown, and it will, at present, descend to her successors to the throne: but, by the operation of this law, it would go, apparently, to Her Majesty's executors. And so on, in other cases probably not thought of. Then, in reference to social and political consequences:—my opinion is, that the Bill will tend to defeat family attachments to the land, as well as to prevent the accumulation of landed property in one individual, or in one family; and so will tend to equalise property, and thereby prevent the existence of an independent order of landed proprietors, superior to the ordinary working classes of the community.
15. The Bill would, as a matter of course, affect the law of inheritance, because it is the specific object of the measure to make a change in that respect; but would you be kind enough to explain how it would affect the tenure of land—what change it would make in the tenure of land? After the passing of this Bill, no man could possibly take land by inheritance. It would be impossible, under any circumstances.
16. By Mr. Macarthur: I beg pardon; except under a will? No. You would then take by that will, and not by inheritance.
17. By the Chairman: If land were settled as at present, with various limitations, contingent and otherwise, the universal course is to create those limitations to some heir or heirs, and ultimately to the heir—one selected person? How settlements of land are in future to be drawn I am hardly prepared to say. But the existing tenure of land will be destroyed, because that tenure is to a man and his heirs; whereas land, if this Bill pass, will no longer be held to a man and his heirs, but to him and his executors or administrators.
18. That is, in cases of intestacy? In all cases. An "heir" exists only in cases of intestacy: or, more accurately speaking, a person who takes land as heir, takes it only by the rules applicable to cases of intestacy.
19. And the change you allude to in the tenure of land is a change inseparably connected with almost any change in the law of inheritance? Any radical change in the law of inheritance necessarily involves, as I apprehend, a radical change in the tenure of property.
20. It is a different way of expressing the same terms? Yes.
21. In the event of a Bill of this nature passing, would not any land on which settlements have been made—on which any incumbrance has been incurred—remain as much liable to the satisfaction of those settlements or incumbrances, as it does under the existing law? Land settled, or land mortgaged, would, as a matter of course, remain (at least so I presume) in some shape or other, subject to the liabilities created, whatever they were:—but what I want to know is, in what mode, and in whose hands?—from whom is the land to be obtained in cases of intestacy? The administrator is to take lands, says the Bill. If so, I presume that he must find security, as usual, for the due administration of the assets. But an administrator will rarely be able to tell, beforehand, what estate may descend on him; for there may be ultimate limitations, and contingent interests in the land, devolving on him, of which which he would know nothing. Then again, a man may make a will as to some of his lands, and die intestate as to other portions of them.

22. In a case where a person dies intestate and leaves land with certain settlements on it—or, with certain incumbrances on it—the administrator, in the event of a Bill of this kind passing, would have no more power to defeat those settlements, or those incumbrances, than the intestate person himself before his death—he cannot, I presume, sell the land, except subject to the claim of the mortgagee, or the person who has an interest in the settlement:—that person's claim, under the law now proposed to be enacted, would be as good and as valid in law, as though the estate passed to the heir, would it not? Certainly. I think that a former answer of mine has already expressed this opinion.

23. Then the passing of this Bill, as I understand, would not defeat the claim of any mortgagee to land left by an intestate person, or would not set aside the interests of any person, who had any settlement secured on that land? I think not.

24. It would not therefore, I presume, involve any injustice to parties who at the time of the passing of the law had acquired rights or claims of this character? Not at all, so far as I can discover. The difficulties are entirely of another kind. I see, to speak plainly, no dishonesty in the Bill. The rights of creditors would be left untouched by it, so far as I can see—neither improved nor deteriorated. I think the proposition maintainable, moreover, that the mode of descent of property is a matter for legislation; or, in other words, that it is a thing depending on positive law, and not on natural right.

25. Do you think that the passing of a Bill of this nature, to regulate the descent of landed property in cases of intestacy, would in any way affect the rights of the Crown in regard to the nominal or real ownership of the unsold lands of the Colony? Not at all. It is a mistake, however, to call the Bill one to regulate the descent of landed property in cases of intestacy only. You might as well pass a Bill to punish murder, "in cases where life was taken." For murder cannot possibly be committed unless there be life taken. And so, to regulate the "descent" of landed property implies, in itself, that there is intestacy in the case. If there be a will applying to the land, there is no intestacy as to that land, and, therefore, the question of descent cannot arise. The Bill, therefore, is here again wrong in expression, if not in idea.

26. A kind of contradiction? A redundancy: it is like saying that such a man murdered another, and also killed him. If you say to regulate the descent of landed property, but only in cases of intestacy, you involve a contradiction. The Bill is one to alter the descent of landed property; or, rather, to destroy it—for "descend," in the true sense, it never will.

27. "To provide, in cases of intestacy, that lands should be dealt with as personal property" is now dealt with? That would be more correct, certainly, than the present title.

28. But if I understood rightly, I think, in an answer you gave as to the objections you had to the Bill, you said that the passing of a Bill of this kind would so far change the tenure of real property, and the law of inheritance, as to cause the waste lands—the Crown Lands of the Colony—to pass, not to Her Majesty's Heir, but to Her Majesty's Successors: Would a Bill of this kind affect in any way the rights of the Crown, either in succession, or in any other way, to the Crown lands of the Colony? Well, I think that, as the Bill now stands framed, the effect might be to vest the Crown lands in Her Majesty's Executors, and not Her Heir, if she died intestate as to those lands.

29. But would not an enactment of this kind be overridden by the imperial law, so far as the rights of Her Majesty were concerned? I do not know. I give my impression, of course, without argument, and also without any very extensive reading on such points, or any reading specifically on this point:—but it strikes me, that if you abolish the law of descent of all landed property in this Colony, in the sweeping terms here used, the Heir of the Crown would no more take the land than any other heir would.

30. But I presume that Her Majesty, in effect, stands rather in the position of a trustee, with regard to the lands of this Colony, than in the position of an ordinary holder of the land? The Crown is, of course (in a certain sense) only a trustee. But your Bill abolishes the law of descent, equally in trust cases as in others. If a trustee, having at present land vested in him were to die intestate, the land so vested would by your Bill go to his executors, and not as at present to his heir, why not then in the case of the Crown?

31. I apprehend that the rights of the Crown being affected in that way, would be provided for by the provision, if I recollect rightly in the existing land laws of the Colony—in the Acts of Parliament—which provide that the land shall vest in Her Majesty, Her Heirs and Successors. A Bill of this kind would not override any provisions which might exist in the Imperial enactments affecting the lands of this Colony, I presume? I take it for granted that the difficulty suggested may be met in some way; and, perhaps, the Bill as to this portion would be simply void; but as the difficulty has been pointed out, a clause will perhaps be thought prudent to anticipate and obviate it. I do not state the point as an insuperable objection; I desire merely to shew the possible extensive consequences of such a Bill, so framed; and it can, of course, be altered at the discretion of its framers.

32. This particular objection, I apprehend, could be completely got rid of by the insertion of a provision to the effect that it should not affect the right of the Crown? Yes. I recollect no such law, however, as that to which you have referred, vesting the lands of this Colony in the Crown, and the heirs and successors of the Crown. The Sovereign takes these lands by the same constitutional right which gives Her the Crown itself.

33. By Mr. Piddington: And, upon that constitutional principle, might I ask, does the Crown ever die—can there be any comparison between the demise of the Crown and the demise of an individual? The Crown, in contemplation of law, certainly never dies; but, nevertheless, the Crown lands would by the present law descend to Her Majesty's Heir, which can only be on Her demise. The Bill, however, professes in terms to alter the descent of land, in cases of intestacy; and makes no exception whatever. Now, it may be, for I am not going to decide the point, that the Crown lands might so descend, notwithstanding this Bill: but the difficulty is of that startling character, that no man who is cautious, and desirous of avoiding needless litigation, would I think be willing to leave the Bill as it now stands, without making a provision which may easily be so made. The change is a very sweeping one; not in any sense less than an entire revolution in the law, as to the tenure and descent of landed property. The consequences of such a revolution, as I have already said, cannot be in a moment foreseen. But every possible inconvenient consequence should, surely, be guarded against.

34. By the Chairman: Referring to the objections which you have pointed out to the Bill on the score of policy, do you not think that a law which would provide that where a parent died intestate his property should be divided amongst all his children,—is more likely to cement family attachment, than a law which provides that in a case of that kind one person, the eldest son, shall take the whole of the property, if the whole be landed property—leaving the other members of the family destitute, or dependent upon his good will or brotherly affection? Well, I think not. I am happy to confess myself a great believer in the thing called family affection:—and, in a majority of instances, I think that the eldest son would be likely to give his mother a home, in the place probably where he and his brothers and sisters had been born; and that he would not be deaf to their claims while infants upon him. Heartless instances to the contrary doubtless may be adduced; but, by your present Bill, the land must be sold away from the family in all cases, and the proceeds divided. The widow will take her one-third in money. The shares of the children must be set apart for them separately, in money. If of age, each will take his own. As to the rest, the risks of investment, or of misappropriation, I think will be found to counterbalance the supposed advantages. The sums will be comparatively small, in most instances, to each child, and each will be made independent of the others; none therefore having a claim above another in respect of the property. The administrator may be an honest man, but in a great number of instances I fear that he turns out, in the course of years, to be either a dishonest one, or an improvident, imprudent, or careless one; and I believe that the property stands as good a chance of being thus dissipated as by the present system it has of being absorbed exclusively by the heir. On the other hand, I quite admit that many cases may be adduced, in which a system of division between the children in some mode or other, such as by setting apart portions of the property for the younger children, in intestate cases, according to their requirements, might be wise, and in every way desirable. But, if this be what is sought to be done, it may be done without selling off the property, or even passing it into the hands of an administrator; and without encountering any of the risks and difficulties to which I have adverted, or touching in any way the law of Inheritance. I do not see why the heir should not be compelled by law to provide for his brothers and sisters, and also for his mother, out of the property. But, assuming even that in all cases the mother becomes administrator, and gives the usual security as such, I am by no means prepared to say that the chances of the children would be invariably much better than they would be in other hands. For, admitting her to be better in all other respects, what security is there for her prudence? I perceive that by section 3 of this Bill, sales of lands, and, as I read the section, the appropriation, too, of the proceeds, are in a great degree made subject to the control of the Judges. My belief is, in the first place, that at least one additional Judge would be required for that special duty; for in effect all these estates would thus be thrown into Chancery. If the Judges are to have any control in such cases, they could as easily exert that control over the heir as over the administrator; and then the descent of property would be left undisturbed.

35. But do you not think, that where a number of brothers and sisters are dependent upon the brotherly affection of the eldest son of the family—(and also his mother)—instead of upon legal right, all the parties there are in rather a false position with regard to each other; that the younger members of the family, and the females of the family, are placed in a position of dependency upon the personal character, or personal caprice of the elder brother, which they ought not to be subjected to—having as good a natural right to share in the property of their common parent as the elder one? I do not acknowledge that assumption. I do not admit that all have the same natural right. The natural right of the children is to have so much of their deceased father's property as they necessarily require. Some may require a good deal, some very little, and some none at all. I do not admit the right of a grown man of full age, in a flourishing business, to have (for example) the tenth of £5,000 left by the father, while perhaps three or four sisters or brothers under 12 or 14 years may require much more each than their tenth respectively to support and educate them. One of the children, moreover, might be a cripple, or the like. The mother, also, might require more (or perhaps much less) than her third share. I think that by this equal division between children of the proceeds of the father's property, in money, while their birthplace and homestead are sold away from them all, family ties and family affection would rather be impaired than cemented.

36. But I presume that the natural rights of a man's children are all alike: that is, the natural right they may have to share in his property—to get so much of it as they may require; there is no special natural right which the eldest son has to a particular share of the property, or to the whole of the property, to the prejudice of his younger brothers and sisters? That I entirely concede. I recognize no natural right in the eldest son to take the whole of the property to the exclusion of his brothers and sisters, and believe the law of primogeniture or other heirship to be a mere creature of positive law. I may add, that in one county in England, which retains ancient usages more I believe than any other, there is to this day an equal division of the father's land among all the sons alike.

37. In the County of Kent? Yes: the most Saxon county of England. A large, if not the greater, part of the lands there are to this day so descendible. As far as I recollect, such is supposed to have been the ancient British law prior to the Conquest; and I believe the law of primogeniture to be owing entirely to the feudal system, which the Normans then introduced into England.

38. Do not the views you have expressed, with regard to the greater necessity under which the younger children are supposed to labor, for some provision from their parent, as compared with the elder members of the family, and especially the elder sons,—does not that strangely militate against the handing over to the eldest son, who may be generally in a position to win his own way in life, the whole of the landed property, to the prejudice of the younger members of the same family? Some instances of practical injustice and hardship, as I have already said, may be adduced as flowing from the present law. I ought perhaps to say of hardship, not of injustice; because the Legislature, in any country, has a right to regulate the descent of landed property in that country. Therefore, in the strict sense, there can be no injustice in the matter. The law of England is framed, throughout, with a remarkable disregard to particular instances, because of its wide scope and large general views of things; general and ultimate consequences being its care. The law of primogeniture in England, referentially to real property, is founded rather upon political and national considerations, connected with our constitutional monarchy, than on any other—moral, social, or domestic. The preservation of an aristocracy, or, at least of an independent landed class, attached to the soil, not easily swayed by popular commotions or clamour, and yet able and quite sufficiently disposed to withstand unitedly the Crown itself, whenever necessary,—the creation of families, connected with possessions held by them for generations,—the selection for these purposes of some one member in each, who, as representing the family, should be both an educated person and a man of consequence,—such are the views, doubtless, which have maintained that law in England; although, in its initiation, the immediate or sole object was the having of one person, in each family, who should be an effective military retainer. Under a law distributing property, or exciting the trading spirit only, by causing it to be sold and the proceeds divided in cash, that gallant chivalry, and those sturdy yeomen who fought and won the battles of Cressy and of Agincourt would never have existed.

The Hon.
Sir A. Stephen,
Knight, C.J.
23 July, 1858.

39. You have expressed an opinion that the natural rights of all a man's children to share in his property alike are equal—to have so much of the property of their deceased parent as will maintain them: in that case do you not think that, where the law is called into action at all, it ought to secure those natural rights, instead of interfering for the particular benefit of one particular member of the family, to the prejudice of all the other members of the family? Supposing the wants of each member of a family to be equal, my opinion would be that each has a fair equal claim to the pecuniary distribution. But the answer to your question will depend on this; whether we are to regard particular instances of inconvenience, or even of occasional distress in some of the younger members of a family, where the eldest enjoys ample means of relieving it, as more the objects of Legislative solicitude than the political and national considerations to which I have adverted. Your question assumes, moreover, that the succession of the eldest son is to the prejudice of all the others:—which is part of the very matter in debate. In some points of view, indeed, the younger should not be left to depend upon the bounty of the elder; but yet, such a position I think induces kindly feelings. It gives occasion for the exercise of many virtues. And it is not more unnatural, to my apprehension, than the idea of each son having his father's property sold off, the proceeds divided, and then each left to shift for himself elsewhere, as best he may.

40. Can you say what the common or ordinary practice is of persons who are possessed of property, and more especially landed property—whether it is the general practice to make wills, or to leave their property to be disposed of in accordance with the law of the country? If the meaning be, whether men who do make wills leave their property more generally to the eldest son, or more largely to him than to the other children, I cannot tell you. I have no data to furnish any answer upon the subject. But the number of intestacy cases predominates considerably, I believe, over the number of wills.

41. Do you not think that the application of this law would be only in exceptional cases—that in the great majority of instances, where persons had any considerable amount of property, and especially of landed property, they would provide for the disposal or descent of that property by will, and actually do so? One would think that persons possessed of landed or of personal property would generally make wills; but I know as a fact, that there is a singular, almost a superstitious reluctance in men to make wills at all; and that the duty is frequently deferred until death overtakes them. I doubt whether men ever die intestate designedly.

42. By Mr. Macarthur: Does not the reluctance to which you allude arise, possibly, in many instances, from the great difficulty parties may experience as to the mode in which they shall distribute and leave their property; I do not mean merely the legal difficulty? It may be one cause of a man's postponing his will that he is uncertain as to the best mode of distribution or settlement; and he may expect changes in his property, or changes in the state of his family. Of course those things do happen. Still, those are not insuperable objections to the making of a will, nor do they impose except rarely a serious difficulty. A codicil, or a series of codicils, would settle matters in all such respects. I know, however, from solicitors, that many men are unable to distribute their own property rightly, and at the last consult their legal advisers on the subject.

43. As to their properties? Yes. I have known a man go to his lawyer, being disposed to make one particular distribution, and after conference determine on making another.

44. So that in fact the lawyer made the will, and not the proprietor himself? Yes. But the latter, I have no doubt, acted wisely in taking the advice given him.

45. By the Chairman: You say that a law substantially similar to the Bill now before the Committee has always prevailed in the County of Kent, with regard to most properties there? Yes:—a law dividing the property itself, or giving it equally to all:—not dividing the proceeds.

46. Are you aware whether that has led to the prevention of the growth of a landed gentry or aristocracy in Kent, as compared with any other county of England—is Kent remarkable now for the small subdivisions of property, and the absence of gentry, or even of an

The Hon.
Sir A. Stephen,
Knight, C.J.

aristocracy? I should say certainly not. The aristocratic spirit prevails so extensively in England, that settlements of land in families to enormous amounts, and favoring out of all proportion the eldest son, are there almost universal. And where an hereditary title exists in a family, the descent of a large portion of the land conjointly with the title is of course always provided for.

47. Does it not seem to follow that the passing of a law of this kind, either in this Colony or in England, will not necessarily prevent the growth of a landed gentry? I have never suggested that it would "necessarily" prevent the growth of a landed gentry, but that its tendency is in that direction. The tendency of the law will be, I conceive, to equalize property:—or certainly to discourage, if not prevent, the accumulation of property in the hands of one person in one family—and indeed its continued possession in any family. Such a tendency may, of course, be counteracted by wills and settlements; but the disposition perhaps may be itself discouraged by such a law.

48. But does not the actual result of the existence of a law of this kind in the County of Kent show that it can scarcely be said to have any such tendency—considering the actual condition of property there. You speak of the existence there of distinguished families, and of large properties held in that county? Large properties. I have already said that, in England, men generally have such a love of accumulating and transmitting landed property in their family, and vesting it therefore in one individual as its heir, that settlements or wills for that purpose are almost universal; defeating consequently the tendency of the law. I do not know, however, what the effect may be in the case of small landholders; and perhaps in Kent there are few comparatively of that class.

49. Do you not think that Englishmen will naturally bring with them the same personal characteristics to this country which in England leads to the accumulation of property in the hands of one individual; and that thus a corrective will be furnished here to the tendency which you suppose this Bill will have to lead to the subdivision of estates? I think not. There is here such a disruption of old ties, and even of old associations, and such an isolation in the particular member of any family who may have emigrated hither, that old ideas and feelings change; and the disposition of which we have been speaking has yet, I think, to be created in this Colony, in the mass of cases. There are men here of no mean family, but they are younger sons, almost exclusively; and when they acquire fortunes, I fear it will be found that they will go back to England, just as so many of our rich squatters have done. There is as yet no such thing prevalent in this Colony, so far as I have observed, as respect for family; and the desire to found one, therefore, is not likely to be very general. There are few examples of recognized claims to distinction; and the tendency of the community is, as it seems to me, for each man to think himself perfectly equal to every other.

50. But is that not rather a distinct feeling from the natural tendency that a man would have to create a family name for himself and those that might succeed him—has not almost every Englishman a kind of instinctive tendency to create for himself a family name? I do not know. I used to think so in England. I have not thought so in this Colony. I should not say so with respect to Australians in general.

51. I presume that if it can be shown that in the great majority of cases men who have property to leave, and especially landed property to leave, do bequeath that property by will, and that this law would only come into operation in exceptional cases, it could not then produce any sensible effect on the subdivision of property, or upon the prevention or promotion of the growth of a landed aristocracy, or a landed gentry, in the Colony? If men be determined to found a family, and to perpetuate the name by landed possessions, this law will of course not prevent them.

52. But I mean that, supposing the number of wills which are known to exist, as compared with the number of persons who are proved to die intestate, is in the former case very great as compared with the latter, would not that go to show that a Bill of this nature can have no sensible effect upon the general disposition of property in the Colony, or upon the growth of a landed gentry? Exactly so. If it be found that men, generally speaking, who have landed estate, provide for the disposal of it in their own way, a proof will be thereby afforded that the law, in whatever shape, will not, or does not, furnish the rule as to the disposition of property.

53. In cases of intestacy, where the deceased person leaves personal property, that personal property is administered, I suppose, either by the person administering the estate, or by the Curator of Intestate Estates: There would, I presume, be no more risk of the improper application of property converted into personalty, than there is by this Bill in the case of property left by intestate persons to be dealt with as personal property? Certainly not. The risk will only be greater by so much as the amount to be applied is greater.

54. But there would be nothing in the conversion of real property into personal property which would tend to increase the risk attending property which had passed to the administrator as personal property, or which in its nature was personal property according to the ordinary law? Not at all. But in this Colony the second marriage of widows who have property is a very common occurrence, although they also have children to be maintained out of it: and I much fear that in many such cases the children do not benefit, to the full extent of their rights, by the law which prescribes the distribution of its proceeds among them.

55. But they can, I presume, obtain protection from the Courts, if malappropriation of their property is going on by the administrator? The children have, of course, the right of protection; and the Court always does its best to assist them—when a suit is instituted, and the facts are proved. But, considering the helplessness of children in such a position, the idea of redress is practically fallacious—an idle fancy, in most cases.

56. By reason of what? Chiefly the difficulty of procuring evidence. For who, after a few years, knows anything about the property? There may still be, indeed, the mother: but the property is gone; and who would impeach her in such a matter. It is not that the mother's affection affection has been wanting; but she has not the means left of assisting the children. She is married again, and perhaps the money was expended with no bad designs originally. And where are the children? They are perhaps seven or eight years old; or the eldest not sixteen. Who is to institute and prosecute a suit for them? You have no "Orphan Chamber" here; and men are so engaged with their own affairs, that (except in politics) they cannot attend to the affairs of others. The Judges are so constantly occupied, that they could not interpose in such matters, even if it were their province. But we will suppose that these children look after their own property when they grow up. The mother however is now gone; the father-in-law is gone; and the property is gone. They state their case to an attorney. He requires money to set him in motion; for the task will be no easy one—and the suit is no labor of love to him. But the children have no money to give, and the case ends before it has begun.

The Hon.
Sir A. Stephen,
Knight, C.J.
23 July, 1868.

57. Do you think that an alteration of the law, such as that now proposed, would be likely to lead to increased litigation, between members of the same family and the next of kin in cases of intestacy? I do not see why it should. The property will have to be sold, and the proceeds divided; and there, except as to the shares of the children under age, will be an end of the matter.

58. By Mr. Macarthur: You do not contemplate the possibility of dividing the property? No. If the Bill proposed that, I should consider it many times more objectionable. There is, however, nothing to prevent subdivision by will. A man may make what distribution he pleases, and the land may be sold to strangers, or subdivided at his discretion.

59. By the Chairman: The natural result of the alteration would lead to landed property being realised, and the proceeds being divided? Certainly.

60. Do you consider that, in the event of a Bill of this nature passing, it would be advisable to bring the sales of land in intestate estates under the control of the Supreme Court? I should say not. I do not see why the Judges should have anything to do with such matters. Where the Court administers an estate, it of necessity directs sales:—but I presume that you do not propose really to throw all these cases into the Court.

61. You see no reason why they should have more control over the sale of land than over personal property? No. If the Judges were required to say what sales were wanted, and when a sale would be prudent, and what sums were necessary for the children, and, in short, to administer landed estates as the Court does in Equity, that would be a different thing. But you will require an additional Judge expressly for the duty, and probably an additional Master in Equity. In administering an estate in Equity, the Court makes allowances for the bringing up of children, and appoints receivers and guardians, and so on. I did so myself, indeed, in one case where there was no suit; but there the estate was in the hands of the Curator, and so, in a degree, under our control. In that case the deceased had taken to drinking, and, it is said, drowned his wife, of course by accident, and shortly afterwards he drank himself to death, and the whole of the children were thrown upon the Court. In that case, after a good deal of trouble, I found suitable persons who were kind enough to undertake the duty of guardians, and I made them an allowance for the poor orphans. But we have not often time to do these things; and there is great responsibility, and often serious risk incurred, by the doing of any act of kindness in such cases.

62. I understand you to say, that unless the Court is made the administrator of the intestate estate, you see no reason why the sales of land in intestate estates should be more under the control of the Supreme Court than the sales of ordinary property? There is no reason that I can see. It appears to me that the duty which the Judges are called upon to discharge here is, in terms, more the duty of an auctioneer. The words are "with the approval of the Judges;"—or at their discretion.

63. It gives them a certain amount of power? The power to say that it is a good time to sell, or that it is not. And if we decide that it is a bad time to sell, what is to be done with the children; who want food, clothes, and education. If you give the Judges the powers which they have in Equity,—if you will really take the duties of parens patriæ upon yourselves,—you may do a large amount of good. The property of families might then be properly looked after. But the scheme, to be effective, would cost a good deal of money; much more than the Assembly will give.

64. But in that case, I presume, if you provided that the Judges should have the administration of estates where there happens to be landed property, it would be desirable that they should have the control over intestate estates in all cases; and see that they are properly administered for the benefit of the children and next of kin? Not equally desirable; for the amount of personal property in general would be far less. But, assuming the amount in either case to be the same, there would be practically no distinction.

65. Do I understand you to say that it would be desirable to constitute such a court; or to give the Supreme Court power to administer intestate estates? I think that, if the powers of the Court of Equity were enlarged, and regulated, so as to make it similar to what I understand the "Orphan Chamber" is under the Roman Dutch law, great good would be attained. But practically that would be to constitute such a tribunal the general administrator or curator of all intestate estates, and to take them out of the hands of individuals. Or it would be a tribunal merely in aid of administrators, as the law might provide. Property would be thereby secured, and perhaps occasionally better discretion might be exercised, than by administrators. But it would be necessary to simplify and cheapen the proceedings in such a tribunal to the utmost, or the smaller estates might be nearly absorbed in costs. In spite of every effort, I am afraid that the losses in intestacy cases are even now very large.

66. Have you any other suggestions to offer as to the alterations proposed in the Bill, or as to additions, or as to any measure in substitution of this Bill, which would practically accomplish the same results? I fear that under such a Bill, however framed, family mansions, and landed property, to which families frequently are attached, and to which families born on it ought to to attached,—since the love of country is intimately interwoven with such a state of things,—will be universally sold away from the family, wherever the last owner shall have unhappily died without making a will. I imagine that section three was framed with some vague notion of enabling the Judges to interfere in such cases; but I do not see how they could interfere, or what test or guide could ever regulate the interminable questions which may arise.

67. But I would ask whether the passing of a law of this kind would prevent a number of the children, in a family where the parent had died intestate, from agreeing among themselves to allow the eldest son to retain any portion of the landed property—such, for instance, as the family mansion;—whether the passing of this Bill would prevent them from so agreeing, with the consent of the administrator? I do not see, in such a case, (unless all the children were of age) how the administrator could consent. Who is to bind the younger children? Who is to prove that it is for their interest? What is to guide the administrator in giving his consent? His duty would be to protect, pecuniarily, all alike. He has nothing to do with family considerations. If the eldest son, or the mother, wishes the mansion to be retained, why is that to influence him? It appears to me that such considerations, practically, could never be allowed to operate. The affair must be merely commercial. And if the mother herself were the administratrix, I do not see that she could with safety act otherwise.

68. It would lead therefore to landed property being realized? No doubt of it. A favorite horse, that a child has been accustomed to ride, that his father may have given him, or allowed him the use of, must in an intestacy case be sold. But these things may be managed. A friend may come in and say, "Oh! it is a small matter, here is £20; you had better buy it." The administrator, however, could not keep it back.

69. Could you now lay before the Committee any suggestions you may be prepared to offer in regard to the measure before the Committee? Well, in the first place, if this Bill passes there is the question, will there ever be in any case an heir? Where the eldest son takes at all, he will take under his father's will. What will in any case descend to him? There are tombstones, for example: what is to become of them? Or there is some lapsed devise: who is to get that?

70. By Mr. Forster: Giving landed property to all the children, males and females, in the same way that it descends to daughters—that was the suggestion of a legal witness the other day? That is worse than ever. You cannot cut a house into portions. The owning of property in coparcenary leads generally, I believe, to this result:—when the girls come of age, they make a bargain among themselves for the division. We have sometimes had cases in Equity for partition, and I always find that they are most expensive affairs. People cry out about the lawyers; but the lawyers get about one-third, to the surveyors' two-thirds. The charges for dividing the Riley Estate were enormous; and in Collins' case they were very large. Then there are marriage settlements. What is to be done in regard to them under this Bill? I settle a property for the use of my daughter for her life, and after her death for her children. In the event of their all dying, or of her dying without any child, then for the use of my own heirs. In cases of that kind where would the property vest? As to that property I should die intestate; for no man dreams of making a will, (or in fact men rarely make any,) in reference to land conveyed away by a settlement, or the like. By this Bill you will have provided, that all lands and hereditaments shall be taken to be chattels. Therefore there can be no "heir" to them.

71. By Mr. Piddington: But assuming that the law is changed in conformity to the Bill, I presume that persons can provide for such cases? No doubt; but I do not see how such settlements will operate in future. No doubt there are settlements of personal property; and probably the lawyers will prepare settlements of land, as if it was in all respects personal property.

72. By Mr. Forster: As to mortgages; Mr. Norton seems to think that enormous difficulties would ensue in the case of mortgages? There may be difficulties also in such cases. And there are others. Thus; there is at present a presumption in favor of the heir, that a man dies intestate as to all that he has not clearly devised. Now what is to be done with this presumption? That presumption probably would no longer exist; because the law will be the same in reference to both landed and personal property. You must find out the intention, therefore, as well as you can, without any such rule. Then, where a deceased proprietor leaves only daughters, what is to be done? In that case might you not leave the law undisturbed? Take next the case of a woman getting dower. At present she gets the law undisturbed? Take next the case of a woman getting dower. At present she gets her dower, unless it has been prevented by the terms of the conveyance. But by and by there will be no such thing as dower. Under the law regulating the distribution of personal property, however, the widow always gets one-third; and this not only for life, (as is the case with regard to land,) but an absolute dower to that extent at once. And then the widow marries again—almost invariably.

73. By the Chairman: Is not that the case all over the world? Not so much so, I suspect, as in this Colony. I think that a vast number of men come out here in every sense "on spec." And there are fewer women, comparatively. Take next the subject of Reversions. That again is a matter which should be provided for. A man has executed a long lease, (take the case of the Cooper estate for instance,) for 99 years. The reversion, in every one of those instances is in his heir; or in the heir of his eldest son. What is to be done in this case? If all land is to be made personal property, where will this reversion vest? I do not see an answer to that question at present; but I have not time to look carefully into it. Again:—will estates pass, in future, without words of inheritance? At present they would not; but, under this new law, probably they will. If a man, therefore, shall convey landed property to another by a scrap of paper, though perhaps such may not be his meaning, it would pass to the devisee and his representatives, and their assigns, for ever. But is this intended by the framers of the Bill? Or have they bestowed a thought on the subject? The next point which occurs to me, is that of forfeiture. At present, chattels chattels are forfeited on conviction for crime, but land is not. But if land be put on the footing of a chattel, will it not be forfeited as well as other chattels?

74. By the Chairman: Is that law operative? Yes; and operated on too, whenever the Crown Officers know of forfeited property. But criminals are clever enough frequently to make over their property before conviction.

75. By Mr. Piddington: Criminals convicted who are possessed of landed property? Yes.

76. By Mr. Forster: The Crown will give up the forfeiture in certain cases? Yes. And sometimes the Crown's right to land is given up. But that never was forfeited except in capital cases:—in other words, cases of attainder. I now come to a more important subject, against whom will (in legal phraseology) time run hereafter, in cases of intestacy? By the Statute of Limitations, time runs only as against the party entitled to enter. When a man dies, therefore, whose heir ought to enter, the limited period for his suing begins to count from that death; and if within 20 years the heir does not sue, he loses his right. Will the time run, in future, in intestacy cases, against the administrator? If so, from what date is it to begin? Then, in whose favor are the several exceptions in that statute to operate? There are several exceptions; i. e. when the party entitled is insane, or a married woman, or an infant, or beyond sea. But which of these will apply to an administrator? Take the late case of Devine's heir. The ancestor there died,—as to the land in contest,—intestate. Under this Bill, his son or grandson could not inherit; for the land would descend only to an administrator. What do you intend to do with the statute, in such a case? Would the person who, as Devine's great nephew, came out here to claim his rights have to take out administration? If he did, why should the youngest of the parties entitled to share be barred, till twenty years had run out against the latter? Would or not an administrator have to give security that he will divide the proceeds? If he need not, what protection would the younger brothers have against the administrator's misappropriation? And if he must, who could find security for two hundred thousand pounds? Surely, the gentlemen who have brought in the Bill ought to make some provision for matters like these.

77. In personal estates some of those difficulties might occur? With respect to the Statute of Limitations, none at all. There is no difficulty in respect to personalty, you cannot bring an action against an administrator, nor can he sue ordinarily, after six years; (with one or two exceptions) after six years.

78. By Mr. Piddington: Are you aware that a Bill almost precisely similar to this has been passed by the Legislature of South Australia—are you acquainted with that fact, or are you aware of any difficulties which have arisen there since the passing of the Act? I have understood that there has been such a law recently passed in South Australia; but I have never seen it, and I know nothing of its working. Such a measure can be developed only by time. I regard this as a levelling measure, and that Colony is supposed to be a very democratic one. It is certainly a new Colony compared with this; and difficulties there would be more easily met as they arise, than here. If, however, the law prove to be a good one in South Australia, I should say that that fact would be a very good argument in favor of its adoption in New South Wales. Nevertheless, I have shown quite enough to expose its short comings and defects, whatever merits it may be proved to possess.

79. I think you stated that if this Bill becomes law there would be no heir—that there could be no heir to real estate? Yes; I did say so.

80. Could not a power to convey real estate be conferred upon the Curator of Intestate Estates under a Bill of this nature? Certainly. He is simply an administrator. I was examined as a witness two years ago, before a Committee of this House, of which Mr. Murray was chairman, respecting sales of land by the Curator of Intestate Estates; and I gave my opinion then that such a power was highly desirable. But that is a very different thing from altering the descent, or the legal character of landed estate. There are many instances of land and houses in this Colony, as I am told, lying in the hands of persons without a shadow of title, and therefore generally unimproved, and in some cases falling to decay, because the heir is not known, or is an infant, and absent. In all such cases, I would confer a power on the Court to sell the land, in order that a title may be made, and the land improved—preserving the proceeds for the heir, whenever he might appear.

81. My question only refers to cases of intestacy? Of course. But, by the present Bill, the Curator of Intestate Estates will have power to sell land in all cases where there shall be no administrator. His duties will thereby be very largely increased; for he will have to distribute the property, unless superseded by an administrator properly so called.

82. By the Chairman: But supposing landed property to be sold under the operation of this Act, the Curator could give a valid title to the person who bought that property:—either he, or the administrator, would be able to give a title under the operation of this Act? He would, of course, be able to sell the title of the deceased, whatever it was. But titles will be no more freed from difficulties, by any such sale or by the operation of this Bill, than they are now. He or the administrator could only give to a purchaser the title which the intestate had. And I think that the value of all land purchased from an administrator, or from Curator, would be depreciated; because no such person could be expected to give, or would give, a covenant for title. A measure for simplifying titles, and enabling the Court to give an unincumbered title, as under the Incumbered Estates Bill in Ireland, would be a great boon to the country. But such a measure will require thought and legal learning. I hope that the first step has been already taken in that direction by the Land Titles Bill, recently passed in this Colony. Possibly the desired object might be attained by requiring the Curator to disclose his title to the Court; and, if the Court be satisfied with that title, enacting that it should for ever thereafter be unimpeached. Such an Act, however, with whatever caution drawn, would doubtless occasionally extinguish just but remote claims. For my own part, I would willingly advocate any well considered plan to simplify titles; and I have looked into Mr. Torrens's recent Bill, with that view: But really one has not time to

The Hon.
Sir A. Stephen,
Knight, C.J.
23 July, 1858.

sutdy adequately such a subject. I am at present favorably disposed to that measure; though I fear it will by no means operate as the author hopes that it will. The law passed in New Zealand for the registration of conveyances seems to me a good one; and our own is probably the worst in any dependency under the Crown.

83. By Mr. Piddington: Might not the Curator of Intestate Estates possess a discretion, within a certain limit, in reference to the time of sale? I cannot answer that question satisfactorily. His duty, I think, like that of an ordinary administrator, will be in general to realize, as soon as he can, without sacrificing the property.

84. But have you any objection to a discretion being given, within a defined limit, with respect to time: a discretion with regard to the sale of landed estate, limited by six months, or twelve months, as may be deemed advisable? I see danger and difficulties in any enactment on such a subject. An administrator already has a certain amount of discretion, as to the time of sale; and, if you extend the discretion too far, you may induce difficulties of another kind. Any such measure will give rise to litigation; for, out of many children one is sure to be dissatisfied, let the administrator do what he will. Personal property, you will remember, is generally of much smaller concern and value than landed estate; and when you have increased the stake to be contended for, you will increase the chances of litigation on the part of any child who may think himself ill-used. One child may say, I do not like to have my mother turned out. Another may urge a sale; saying I think the property is likely to be deteriorated. And, in point of fact, no kind of property fluctuates so much, or so rapidly, as real estate.

85. If the Curator of Intestate Estates, or any administrator appointed under this Bill, possesses the authority by law within the limit of twelve months to sell the estate, can any cause of action arise on the part of the children who might choose to quarrel with him—he being clothed by law with a discretion within the limit of that fixed time? If the administrator does not exceed the particular discretion, which is or may be reposed in him, he will of course succeed in his suit. But my remark is, that a discontented child will complain that the administrator has exercised his discretion unwisely. If, however, an absolute discretion be given to the administrator to sell or not within a specified time, as he may think fit, and that time be not exceeded, it follows of course that he will be safe. But, on the other hand, creditors may sue him, and take the land in execution.

86. I think you stated that you had not heard of any inconvenience arising from the prevalence of a law something similar to this in the County of Kent—You know there is the law there of gavelkind? I have no information, or means of knowledge whatever on that subject. I know Kent very well as a locality, and I did in early life know several persons resident there; but on this particular point I know nothing.

87. There is nothing in this Bill to prevent the owner of property from entailing his estate, so far as the English law limiting the power to entail sanctions? I see nothing in the Bill to prevent the owner's making any disposition whatever, by will or otherwise.

88. Do you not think that the law of entail is the true means by which estates are kept in the hands of one individual member of a family? A large portion of property, doubtless, comes to the eldest son in consequence of some settlement or will, and not by descent. And of course a proprietor may entail, or settle his property, as he pleases.

89. Is it not almost universally the practice in England, among the large owners of land—whether titled or untitled—to provide for the transmission of their landed estate by strict settlement, under the law of entail? I think that it is so; but that is in order to carry the law of descent on still further;—that is to say, to prevent the eldest son from selling the property, and so to ensure the perpetuation of the estate in the family. For such a purpose, a settlement or will is of course essential.

90. Such entails are subsidiary to the law of primogeniture? They may be so considered. The father prescribes, in effect, that his eldest son shall get the estate, on condition that he shall not sell it when he has got it.

91. Are you not of opinion that the power of entailing landed estates is that power by which great properties in England are kept together in the hands of one individual? Practically it may be so; but settlements and wills are more generally made, I suspect, to ensure the payment of jointures, and portions for younger children. I think that but for such purposes, and to prevent an improvident or spendthrift heir from selling the property, there would be few settlements in England, and that a man would be content to leave his estate to be disposed of by the general law of inheritance.

92. Even the law of England with respect to the disposition of landed estate, I believe, limits the right to entail within very narrow bounds, does it not? That touches a different question altogether. The law opposes itself to perpetual or long continued restrictions upon the right of the proper owner to deal with his property. It is hostile also to unreasonable accumulations, and undue limits imposed on trading in land, at the will of one man only; who happens to be desirous of enriching descendants in the fifth or sixth generation, at the expense of his own children and grand-children. The law, therefore, while it gives landed property to the eldest son, causes it to descend free and unshackled.

93. If the owner of landed property had the power of carrying the system of entail farther than the law of England now permits, would not that incur the probability that landed property would be retained in the hands of one individual? If the law in that respect were altered, and no other limitation substituted, it of course would follow that a man could tie up property, in the hands of all his descendants in succession, to the end of time.

94. And so maintain an aristocratic class? Yes. But the law of England is practical, and avoids extremes. Its object in imposing the restraints spoken of was, I have no doubt, that which I have explained. It would be intolerable that an owner of property should be allowed, not merely to compel its descent in a prescribed mode for two generations, but for any number of generations. The interests of the State require that restraints on the alienation of land should be reasonable. As a general rule, it ought to be saleable like other other property. Landed property would otherwise, in process of time, stagnate, and only a few be benefited by its ever unchanging ownership. Our law never favored the holding of lands in mortmain.

The Hon.
Sir A. Stephen,
Knight, C.J.

23 July, 1858.

95. Yes; but it would be a capital means of establishing a landed aristocracy? The law never designed, I conceive, to establish arbitrarily an aristocracy; and still less at the expense of every other interest.

96. Are you of opinion that if the law or custom of primogeniture be abolished the owner of real property will be damnified? Not at all. I do not see how his position would be affected. The land would still be land, and be improvable, and transmissible as he thinks fit. So far, I see no objection to the Bill.

97. Lands and houses leased for a thousand years, I believe, are not subject to the custom of primogeniture, whatever may be the extent of the land leased, or the value? Exactly so.

98. Are you aware of any dangers arising from that circumstance? None at all. And if the custom were universal to execute leases for a thousand years, land, no doubt, would practically become personal property. Moreover, if a man so pleases, he can always convert his land into personalty by that simple process. Ultimately, however, even those thousand years will run out; and then who will, by your law, get the property?

99. And no cases of danger or difficulty have come under your notice in respect to lands and houses that have been leased for a lengthened period, and which have been divided among the children of an intestate person? I know of none:—but I can at present call to mind no such instance.

100. By Mr. Mucarthur: Have any such cases come under your notice? There are instances of long leases, in cases litigated before the Court, which leases always go to the executor or administrator—subject to the reversionary right of the landlord or his heir. But the nature of the land, in all these cases, remains as it was before; and very long terms of years, except in connexion with the fee simple, are rare.

101. By Mr. Piddington: Have you had any opportunity of becoming acquainted with the wills of inhabitants of the Colony? I have not. Or, rather, I know little of them. The contents of a will never came before me, unless in some question under litigation.

102. You have no means of ascertaining from experience what the desire of parents in this Colony is with reference to the division of their property among their children? I have very ample means, by simply reading those wills; but of course this is not a kind of reading in which I indulge. By comparing the number of wills, however, with the number of intestacies, and then looking at the nature of the property in each case, and its mode of disposal by will, some opinion could be formed as to that matter.

103. In cases where you have read the wills of testators possessed of land, have you seen any indication that the testators are desirous that their children should not share and share alike in that property? I cannot undertake to give an accurate answer to that question. But my impression is, that the eldest son is almost always more liberally provided for than the younger ones.

104. By Mr. Forster: Has not the operation of English legislation, and of legal decisions also, been rather to divest heirs of privileges which they possessed in former times:—For instance, those privileges relating to debts, which formerly (I think you alluded to them) were chargeable upon land? Certainly. The tendency of modern legislation has been, to make men pay their debts; and, with that view, to make land as well as chattels answerable for debts, whether in the hands of the debtor himself, or his heir.

105. And in fact to deprive the heir of certain privileges which he formerly possessed as heir? Just so. The heir in ancient times,—and indeed until a comparatively recent period,—was responsible only for certain classes of debts; and might take the land, therefore, free from a large portion of his ancestor's liabilities. That state of things was, I need hardly say, a disgrace to our law, and now it no longer exists.

106. Has not also the tendency of legislation and of legal decisions been, to abolish the rights of dower? The tendency of legislation has been, also, to defeat or abolish dower.

107. Do you think that the tendency of the law in these respects has been beneficial? In the former case, I think that the law has simply been honest; and that it is monstrous to permit any heir to take his ancestor's land, freed of all liability to that ancestor's debts. This, however, is irrespective of any question of descent. In the particular case of dower, modern enactments have simply put it in the husband's power to deprive his wife of that interest, and in her's to bar it, by a more inexpensive and easy process than formerly.

108. Then the law, in fact, is not disposed to recognise any natural rights in any of those cases? I do not know that the law ever has done so. Nor that there was supposed to be any such right.

109. If the intentions of this Bill were carried out,—supposing the language and phraseology to be altered, and put into a better shape, it would, would it not, go only rather farther than our modern legislation has been going, but in the same direction? I do not think so at all. I see nothing in English legislation to justify the idea that the course of descent was ever meant to be touched. But, when land did descend, the law has endeavoured to make it descend untrammelled, and liable to its former owner's debts.

110. Do you consider the mode of distribution of the proceeds of property adopted by the Statute of Distributions to be a reasonable and equitable mode? I do not know that it is otherwise. That is to say, if there must be a fixed rule.

111. Do you think that it might be improved upon? I do not know that it could. It proceeds upon the assumption, that, whether the property be less or more, the widow always requires one-third, and the children always require the other two-thirds; and these last always in equal shares. Now the actual case is frequently very different. But, supposing that one uniform rule is essential, because discretionary distribution would be impracticable, then I think the present mode of distribution a good one.

112. Well, supposing the best mode of distribution of personal property arrived at, do you think

The Hon.
Sir A. Stephen,
Knight, C.J.

23 July, 1858.

think that it would be unreasonable, in those limited cases where the State is called upon to stand in loco parentis, to deal with real estate—would it be unreasonable to adopt the same mode of distribution of the proceeds in those particular cases? If one uniform rule must be adopted, I see no reason for a different one, in distributing the proceeds of land, than that which obtains in distributing the proceeds of chattels. Except, indeed, that landed property is usually so much more valuable; and that some portion of that land might not unnaturally be separated from the rest, and set apart for the family generally. The family mansion, for example.

113. Do you not think that nearly the same objections as those you have alluded to, as regards the advantage of retaining the family mansion, and other things, might apply to pastoral properties, which, I presume, under the present law would be treated entirely as personal property? I fear that I do not rightly collect what you mean.

114. Such as squatting stations. There may be family mansions on squattages. I believe that there are some now, as on other estates. There may be children born in these places; and they may be just as much attached to family mansions as others? It is scarcely possible for me to answer any question about squattages; because I do not certainly know what that kind of property is—whether it be anything or nothing.

115. At present it is personal estate only: a station has the right to it? I do not, at present, know what the right to a station is. My idea of a squattage is, a great wild place extending nobody knows where, and nobody can tell how far, upon which people live as long as they can, make as much money as they can, and then go to England:—neither building churches, nor schools, nor houses of any kind—worthy the name; nor indeed leaving anything to record the occupier's presence, except a few blackened stumps. Give the squatters, however, a permanent interest in these tracts, and we may perhaps see a better state of things.

116. With regard to a suggestion of yours, that land, though descending under the present system, might be charged with the maintenance of the younger children and the widow, or the younger children at least—might it not sometimes happen, in the very fluctuating values which attach to property in this country, that the heir in many cases would refuse the inheritance altogether, and then the same sort of difficulties would occur as if a law of this kind had not been passed? I do not perceive the difficulty. If he refused to enjoy the inheritance, the title would still have vested in him; and the law could compel him to provide for the widow, and the younger children, or make the estate over to some person who would, exactly the same.

117. Could the law compel him, if he refused, to have anything to do with the estate—would the law compel him to make the title over? No doubt it would. In either case, his liability could not extend beyond the value of the property, of course.

118. I presume it would be the same if land was left to the eldest son or any other person charged with the maintenance of others—if he refused the bequest would the law take it from him altogether, and give a title to another person? The law would compel the devisee to carry out the trusts to the extent of the value of the property. If he refused to do so, or rejected the devise altogether, he could be compelled to convey the title to some one else.

119. It would not attach as a personal debt to him? Certainly not. The charge would be a liability on the estate only.

120. The land would be sold? The charge would be like a mortgage. The deceased owner having subjected the land to certain charges, it would be liable to them just the same as if he had executed a mortgage on it.

121. Then it would be sold, and if there was a family mansion upon it that mansion would go away? Exactly. So it would in any other case, where the owner of land died with charges on his land. If a man devises his estate, and is insolvent, it will go to pay his debts. So it will, if he died insolvent and intestate. In all such cases, the first claim is in honesty that of the creditors. Whatever your law of descent, the property of a deceased debtor will always, I presume, go first to pay his debts.

122. The point I was aiming at is, that this suggestion of yours, of enabling the Supreme Court to charge landed property with the maintenance of children might end in doing just the same thing? No doubt, if the estate is insolvent. But no system is framed for exceptional cases. A hopelessly incumbered estate may, nominally, devolve or be distributed as you please:—the result will obviously be the same. This has nothing to do, therefore, with any question as to the mode of descent.

123. By Mr. Macarthur: In the early part of your evidence you alluded to the law of gavelkind. That is an exception to the general principle of the law of England as to the descent of property. The law of primogeniture being the general principle of the law of England, all intestate estates would descend upon that principle; but, as this Bill proposes to introduce the principle of equal distribution amongst the members of the family, is it not probable that the tendency of such a law would be, to produce the opposite state of things to that which exists in England under the law of primogeniture? That is to say, is it or not my opinion that the tendency of this Bill will be to spread and divide property?

124. The principle of the law of England is, that property goes to the eldest son. The law of gavelkind in Kent is a very insignificant exception from that law. There the general custom or general principle of primogeniture, in the course of years, and in the general operation of things, produces an effect upon the exceptional case. But here we propose, to make the principle which governs the exceptional case the general principle of the law. Would not the natural consequence in the course of years be, to produce here very opposite results to those which we see existing with reference to landed property in England? It strikes me, that such would probably be the tendency of such a measure. Its natural tendency will be, I conceive, to destroy attachment to the soil generally; and indirectly to impair the love of family, or the desire to perpetuate a name. Its effect will be also, I think, to equalize property, by rendering sales in all intestacy cases unavoidable. In England, it is certain that many intestacies occur, in which the land goes exclusively to the eldest son; yet I do not believe that, in those cases, the younger sons are left to starve. Suppose now a man of landed property, settled in some country where probably his ancestors have lived for generations before him. He knows and feels that he is the "gentleman" of his neighbourhood or village. The people look up to him; and he attends to their wants, and protects their interests. He discharges, in short, all the duties of his station, which we see performed in England by so many country gentlemen; living almost as a father does in a large family. He knows that his eldest son, his heir, is to be the gentleman of the place after him; owner of the same possessions, lord of the same manor, and the like. In this way you see, blended, the love of a family name and attachment to the land, with which that name itself has been so long associated. These two affections tend to unite families and neighbourhoods together; and to make men take a permanent interest in their country's welfare. By this succession to the soil, too, there is perpetuated an independent race and class; and a not offensive family pride is induced, the effect of which is favorable to character.

The Hon.
Sir A. Stephen,
Knight, C.J.
23 July, 1853.

125. When we speak of natural right in the children to succeed to the property of the parents, does not that right derive its existence from the feeling of family: I cannot conceive that it exists in any other way? I do not at all admit, myself, the right which has been mentioned. It appears to me to be just and natural that the children should be provided for according to their wants. Except in reference to this, I no more recognise the right of the eldest, or any one of them, than the right of another. Every such claim, however, rests only on the recognised right of succession in a family. It seems to me, that the property of the parent should be made to assist his children, in proportion to their wants. This seems the natural law of the case. A mother devotes her chief attention and care to the child who most requires it. The law of natural affection, which ordinarily pervades a family, supplies here the guide. Every natural right must be in conformity with those laws, of which the author is God.

126. So that the best possible distribution of property amongst a family would be that which best accorded with the claims of family affection—which carried out the claims of family affection? That is my opinion. The natural right, in such cases, seems to me to be that which natural affection dictates. But the succession of one son alone, on whom his mother and sisters or brothers may have a natural claim, (if the ties of family be once recognised,) as strong as on the deceased father, for assistance from the family patrimony, is not necessarily inconsistent with natural rights—while that mode of succession may subserve some of the highest social and public objects.

127. Where families are properly brought up, the eldest son considers himself as inheriting the duties of the possessor of the estate towards the whole family, as well as any peculiar advantage to himself? Unless thoroughly debased by selfishness, he certainly will. Property entails duties, quite as much as it confers rights; and in many cases, (I should hope the majority,) those who succeed to the rights, do by no means feel absolved from the duties of their position. But, lest heirs should neglect them, to the injury of the younger children, the law may perhaps wisely interpose, by enforcing the performance of those duties.

128. Where the eldest son, supposing him to succeed to the property, neglects those duties, and forgets the observance of the natural right, founded on the laws of God, to which you have alluded, he is in fact to be looked upon as an exception, at all events, from those principles which ought to govern human beings? As far as my own impressions extend, though probably I could specify few instances either way, I think the case does form the exception.

129. And I think you have said, in an early part of your examination, that we should never legislate for exceptional cases—that we should endeavour to legislate upon general principles, rather than exceptional cases? All legislation, it seems to me, should be founded upon broad and general views, and with reference to the mass of cases which arise or are likely to arise, rather than with a view of meeting such as form exceptional instances. We have spoken of the custom of gavelkind. There is another; that of Borough-English, as it is called. The origin of this may have been, that the youngest son was the one most likely to need the property; or it may have been a desire to retain the property, for a certainly longer period, in at all events the same family. This seems to be the most ancient tenure known in England.

130. Supposing this Bill to pass into law, do you think that it will obviate cases of hardship and distress, such as may possibly have existed under the operation of the present law? Not at all. My opinion is that it will rather tend to aggravate them. The estate, instead of being kept together by the son, or by the mother in his behalf, must in every case be sold, and the proceeds distributed or kept for distribution; each child getting, or being entitled to get, an equal share, after deducting the mother's third. The family at large will, I think, in most cases, not be benefited in the long run, or its members individually be made more contented, by this change. It is well known among lawyers, that a hard case makes a bad law:—it is a proverbial expression, implying that no general rule should be relaxed because it may operate harshly in some particular instance. I suspect that two or three flagrant cases of hardship, coming under the observation of certain Members of the Legislature have induced them to favor this Bill. But, with all respect to them, I would suggest that the remedy may introduce evils in the opposite extreme; and that some inconveniences and cases of hardship will arise, make what law you will on this subject.

John Fletcher Hargrave, Esq., called in and examined:—

J.F. Hargrave
Esq.

26 Aug., 1858.

1. By the Chairman: You are a Barrister of the Supreme Court? Yes.
2. A Bill, the object of which is to alter the state of the law in regard to the succession or descent of landed property in cases of intestacy, has been referred to this Committee—would you be good enough to state your opinion as to the expediency or propriety of passing such a measure as that? The first difficulty I should feel in answering such a question would be this:—The necessity of such a measure seems to be entirely dependent upon some peculiar circumstances of the Colony, as the preamble states, and my residence here has been so short that I do not feel myself competent to give an opinion on the subject of such peculiar circumstances.
3. Under what circumstances do you think it would be desirable, in a Colony like this, to maintain the law as it now stands? I should think, under all circumstances, where you are desirous of improving a Colony, and making it as nearly as possible similar to the Mother Country—to England—I should say continue the same tenure of property as in the Mother Country.
4. In all cases? Yes. I am not aware of any case in which I should suggest any improvement or alteration of the law of tenure that would benefit any Colony. With reference to the transfer and descent of lands held in fee simple, I have always considered that the law of primogeniture lies at the root of the simplification of the law of tenure of land in England, by doing away with the Saxon tenures, in so far as titles to such lands are concerned. The political object and effect of the law of primogeniture, as part of the feudal system, has been to provide for the settlement and permanent location of the Mother Country from the time of William the Conqueror, whose feudal barons became fixed to their several lordships by the law of primogeniture, more than by any other circumstance of that age; and carrying the system down to the inferior barons and seigneurs, and freehold tenants, the law of primogeniture lies at the root of the general settlement and improvement of all landed property, which would not have gone on as it did, nor will it ever go on, so far as I can understand the policy of the law, or can recollect from the constitutional history of England, if directly a baron or any other freehold tenant died his land was divisible; because no man would like to lay out labor or money in building, either in castles or farm-houses, or upon such improvements, if they were to be divided immediately. That is the notion I have of it, looking at it as a mere matter of policy in promoting improvements of the soil of the most permanent and substantial nature.
5. That system might have been very judicious in old feudal times, but how can it apply, or what is there in common in the state of this Colony with the feudalism of old times? I am looking at it merely as to the improvement of the land. When a man buys land in fee simple, that is, to him and his heirs for ever, it is not to sit down upon it and leave it as it is, but to lay out money upon it for the purpose of improving it; and he begins at once by fencing it in, and then proceeds by putting up a hut, a house, or a castle upon it; and I really can see no distinction in principle between the feudal age and our own, so far as the law of primogeniture is concerned. The non-subdivision of land in case of intestacy lies at the root of all permanent improvements of the highest classes.
6. The investment of money in land is prima facie proof that the party who invests will seek for some return from the land? Now or hereafter the amount he will expend, and the substantiality of his improvements, will depend on the length of his tenure.
7. So that at any time when persons invested money in land their object naturally would be to cultivate it, and derive some return from it? Yes—first by cultivating it. He begins by improving it in some way.
8. Then do you think the alteration proposed in the law would be a bar to the improvement of land in this Colony? Most distinctly. I state it with great deference; but we see the same principle at work around us in every class of improvements of land. No man will ever build on a leasehold tenure if he could obtain a freehold of inheritance, and the shorter the lease the less substantial the building or other improvement; and so as to the freeholds themselves, no man would build a substantial house even on a freehold, except for the law of primogeniture. Of course this point must be considered wholly without reference to the alienation of the land by devise or otherwise. The Bill compels us to look at the question solely as if land were always to go by intestacies; my remarks have reference solely to such a state of things, which is the only just and sound way of considering such a Bill as this appears to be.
9. You think, then, that if in a case of intestacy the landed property were equally divided amongst all the children of the deceased party, that the land so falling to them would be less likely to be cultivated than if it fell into the hands of one individual? Yes; because each such person taking by this species of division would see that his share of the land would go on in the same way of division throughout; why then should he improve his land in the way I have mentioned?—I mean with buildings and permanent improvements, not mere agricultural improvements,—though as to these also I think the subdivision of the freehold in case of intestacy would be a bar to improvements of every kind. I say this: a person taking in the first instance a grant from the Crown would find a difficulty in improving it himself in

- in the degree I have mentioned, and also in getting tenants to take leases, if it were divisible among all the children of the first grantee, instead of going to the heir-at-law. The first difficulty of a tenant under such a state of things would be, that if the grantee or original landlord died without a will the tenant would have to pay the rent to all the heirs. The tenant could not tell to whom, or to how many the rent was to be paid; each heir in gavelkind is, as the lawyers say, seized of the freehold per mie and per tout, that is, the tenant must obtain the receipt for his rent not merely from the first heir, but have to pay each portion of his rent to all the children, including the youngest infant; so multiplying all questions of legitimacy, marriage, &c. That would be a very great difficulty. The way the difficulty comes before us in that part of England where the law of gavelkind exists (in Kent) is this: either by special Act of Parliament, a Bill of partition in Equity where infants are interested, or by mutual conveyances among the heirs in gavelkind, you at once obtain a division; and then each tenant improves his own share as well as he can; but the same difficulty must always arise hereafter on every intestacy. If you were to disavow all these lands, that is, make them subject to the law of primogeniture, none of these expensive divisions would ever become necessary, and the improvement goes on smooth enough.
10. Then, in order to improve the condition of a country, intestacy should be very common—should not be a mere accident, but the rule prevailing in the country? Your Bill legislates on that assumption. I have merely considered the simple Bill before me. I have no idea of the larger question you now suggest. I dare say it may be so. Your Bill does not affect the right of devise, which has effectually prevented, since the reign of Henry the Eighth, any mischief from the law of primogeniture. As soon as a man improves his grant, or even contemplates improving it, he takes care to make his will; unless he wishes the law of primogeniture to give all his grants to his eldest son. Every man knows at least that much of the law of the land, and if he does not devise his land otherwise, we must assume that he meant what has resulted from intestacy.
11. But I think you stated just now that you thought the political condition of the country would be affected by it? I do not think people would improve the soil so permanently as under the law of primogeniture. I did not enter into the politics of the Bill further.
12. But it is not proposed under this Bill that any right which persons have now to dispose of their property by law should be taken away? No; I understand that; but my observations have reference simply to the Bill as it stands, which, in effect, abolishes the law of primogeniture.
13. Cases of intestacy would of course be exceptional cases? Yes; but the Bill in its terms and effect goes far beyond exceptional cases. For instance, it would raise a difficulty with regard to existing titles. Suppose on looking into a title at the present moment I find that the grantee died ten years ago, and that he was intestate, as the first clause of this Act stands; I have to trace the title through all his children. Suppose I go back to the beginning of the Colony, to the first grantee in 1788—he is dead, and his heir—tracing it by the law of primogeniture—A. B. is also dead. If this Bill passes now, I should have to trace the title of that grant, at great expense and labor, from 1788 to the present time, and through every one of his children and their children, so that title becomes valueless. That is the case, and if you start from the present time, it seems to me this will henceforth hereafter always be the case; just as in a gavelkind title to a freehold in Kent. Whenever we come to an intestacy in a gavelkind title, conveyancers well know the consequences.
14. But is not there some limitation? There is the Statute of Limitations, which, of course, applies to all cases alike, and has nothing to do with the proposed Bill either way, so far as I can see.
15. Do you think the existence of such a law as that proposed would prevent the cultivation of land? The tendency of such a law would be against any improvements, and therefore against cultivation. But I was trying to show how the Bill would increase the difficulty of tracing titles, and every lawyer knows very well, and, I dare say, every landowner not a lawyer has experienced that the expense of tracing titles is too great; even as titles are now, this expense interferes very much with the free alienation of land, and therefore with its improvement. In England, under the law of gavelkind in Kent, the cost of proving the title strictly would be sometimes half the value of the property, and may easily exceed the whole value, unless met by special conditions of sale.
16. But may not that arise from the complicated state of the law in regard to landed property in England? It is the simple case I am putting of the succession in cases of intestacy by gavelkind, as proposed by this Bill.
17. It has been held by a very high authority that it requires almost a lifetime to master the law of England in regard to landed property? Certainly; but the point before us now is only one point of that law.
18. Then it must in consequence be very complicated? Yes; but the Bill before us does not enter into these complications.
19. And under what state of things has that complicated system risen—under the old feudal system? Not at all. The difficulties arose from the system of conveyancing, whereby the lawyers have been obliged to frame instruments of every possible variety to meet the infinitely variable schemes and projects of landowners, thereby giving rise to long and intricate titles, and all the questions of construction. I think the want of a good system of registration has a great deal to do with the complication of titles; but that subject I have not recently thought much about. In my opinion the present system of conveyancing, and the long and expensive abstracts, are very great impediments to the free alienation and improvement of land.
20. I presume, then, that you do think the existence of the law as it now stands facilitates the improvement of land? I think the simple point before us on this Bill is the descent of the title to one child, or a single individual, ascertained on the death of the owner dying intestate,—that simple point of law improves the land in every point of view that I can see it, rather than its division among all the children, or among a class of individuals.

- J.F. Hargrave Esq.
21. I will read you this letter, and perhaps you will give me an answer to a question or two concerning it:—"Pardon the liberty an humble unknown individual takes in troubling you with some information on a subject he is deeply interested in, viz., the Bill you have now before Parliament—on the injustice of the eldest son becoming heir to all the landed property, with a share of all moneys, goods, and chattels. Eight years and a half since my sister-in-law was married to a widower, whose first wife died two years before giving birth to the fourth boy. The husband was as stout and strong a man as I have seen. Twelve months after, when riding into Braidwood alone, he was seized with apoplexy, and was found in the bush after having lain four hours in a scorching January sun. He was speechless and helpless, and continued so for three days, when he died, intestate. I was at a loss how to act. His property left consisted of a farm of 50 acres, about 3,000 sheep (for which he rented a run), some 200 head of cattle, and a few horses, with two allotments of land in Braidwood. Thus were the four fatherless and motherless children left in the care of a young female, so incapable of conducting the affairs that I saw it to be my duty, having no children of my own, to give up my own farm, and with my wife to live with them and do all in our power for them, as if they were our own. The runs being limited and scrubby the sheep cannot be increased. The wool and cattle with a small dairy keeps the wolf from the door. But with educating and clothing the children and expensive wages it requires great labor and economy. Now the hardship is this: the two allotments in Braidwood would have been an independence to the whole family could the land be built upon and improved—the rents a regular income. But it cannot be done, for by so doing the other members of the family would be robbed of their hard earnings to the enriching of the heir-at-law. And the same with the farm, whereon we have built a stone cottage with out-houses and fencing, &c., all which they that have labored most for must part with and give up to the more fortunate one that came first into existence. And what is to become of the widow, and the other four youths left homeless by him that should have acted a father's part?" &c. That seems to me to be an instance where the existing state of things prevents the improvements of landed property very materially? In what respect? the title descends to the eldest son, who can do what he pleases with it.
22. But years must pass away before he attains his majority? I did not catch that. The writer of this letter does not specify the infancy of the heir-at-law, which is the only legal bar to the improvement of the land. If the owner of all this property and the father of these children, and the husband of this "young female incapable of conducting these affairs," chose to surround himself day by day with these properties and these objects of care without altering the familiar devolution of his property, it is he that it is to blame, if any one. But I can see no blame to any one, because I cannot assume him not to have intended these results, and therefore why should the world or the Legislature interfere with him or his property.
23. But in a country like this do you think it desirable that the distinction which exists should be maintained between real property and personal property? Yes. When you say "in a country like this," I repeat, as at first, that I do not understand nor observe any peculiarities of this country yet. I think—(but with great deference to the opinions of others) that the more you fix the population—which it is admitted is the political effect of the law of primogeniture—the more you induce them to fix themselves:—by giving them the same hereditary title they take from the Crown "to them and their heirs for ever"—the more inducement people have to stay. But if you make the allotment as movable as cattle, the people will become as movable—they will sell and go as readily.
24. That must be in accordance with their own inclination? Yes; but I think the inducement to stay is suggested to their minds by the knowledge that the land into which they put the spade for the purpose of improvement—which they cultivate or improve to any extent, descends to them and to their heirs for ever. My experience in England has led me to believe so. I have often heard laboring men in England, when talking about the pound an acre as the Australian price of the freehold, discuss all the improvements and uses they would make of the land, and not even in Kent would any laboring man wish his tenure to be gavelkind—no such notion would enter any one's head in England. I think we also see the same principle inducing every working man in England to become a member of one or other of the numerous Freehold Land Societies—anxious to get a freehold, not so much for the franchise, though that was the origin of these societies, but that he may have an allotment where every shilling expended in improvement, and every hour of spare time employed in cultivation, is for the benefit of his children, which he knows can only be by the law of primogeniture.
25. But do you think the Government of a country has any right, directly or indirectly to impede liberty of action? No. The Government ought not to interfere in any way; but with the political view of this Bill, I beg to be understood as speaking without consideration, merely as the matter strikes me, being unacquainted with the special circumstances of the Colony.
26. But what has the Government of a country to do with a man selling his land or not; he is the best judge of his own interests, whether he desires to sell a farm or a horse? Yes. If he takes a grant he may sell it on the same day, or whenever he likes. That is quite another subject from the present question, whether it would be beneficial to the country that the land should, without either deed or will of any kind, descend to one individual rather than to three or even a dozen.
27. But it bears upon the question whether there should be any distinction between personal property and real estate? The distinction we start with from the first grant: A man takes from the Crown and the Crown transfers to the subject by the simple "grant" the whole title to the land, the same as Her Majesty has in the Crown. It is to Her and Her heirs for ever, subject to forfeiture under the Act of Settlement; so with the tenure of an allotment—it is to him and to his heirs for ever. That is what Englishmen are generally very very anxious to get; and I think they tolerably well understand the meaning and effect of J.F. Hargrave Esq. the words "heritage," "heirship," "heirs," and so on. If you say instead you shall take a grant for a thousand years you fulfil the grand object of this Act. It will then descend as chattels real divisible among all, and you can do without a word of this Act. Such a grant will then pass to the executors or administrators, or to the Curator of Intestate Estates. Why not from the date of operation of this Act stop the issue of any grant except for 10,000 years, and enact that, as to existing grants, the words "heirs for ever," and similar expressions, shall "be deemed, adjudged, and taken for all purposes to be executors, administrators, and assigns for 10,000 years?" 26 Aug., 1853.

28. Are you aware that for a very long period of time the course of reform in regard to landed property has had the tendency of breaking through the old feudal system? The feudal system had lost all its bad effects by the statutes of uses and of wills in Henry the Eighth's reign; and from that time land became gradually available for all the purposes of family provisions and commerce, as easily as personalty, the last nominal relics of feudalism being abolished in Charles the Second's time. But the tendency of all sound law reformers in England since Lord Eldon's time, and since the uprooting of the old tory system, has been, not to abolish the freehold tenures of land, but to make them stronger and more serviceable for their real uses and purposes. We have been doing away with technical absurdities in law which the change of manners and circumstances enabled us to get rid of without peril to the social or political fabric; but we have not been altering the main principles of one law of property, except by assimilating all the copyhold and other less tenures to the simple freehold tenure "to a man and his heirs for ever," with all the incidents of that tenure, especially the descent to one heir, instead of being divided among many inheritors, which I consider quite as essential a part of what we like to have in England as that the Monarch's title to the Crown should be indivisible. I do not think any of the tendencies of reform have been in the direction of this Bill from the time of the Reform Bill to the present time. Of course all the legal reforms have taken place since then. In one of the Real Property Commissioners' reports, upon which all English law reforms have been founded, as to the subject before us, there is a separate report on the question of gavelkind tenure of Kent, and the propriety of disavailing those lands by a general Act, but it was not done, and for very good reasons; but no one ever considered for a moment that any possible advantage could result from the extension of the system to the whole country, as by this Bill. Every lawyer knows very well that there is not a single advantage in the gavelkind tenure, and that its disadvantages and inconveniences are numerous and great, though somewhat diminished by its other peculiarities, as, for example, in the right of alienation by the heirs in gavelkind at the age of 17 instead of 21, but then only by feoffment. It is many years since I had occasion to look into the Real Property Commissioners' reports, but I never heard any suggestions of there being any ground to prefer the gavelkind tenure to the common tenure. The penal laws in Ireland which imposed the gavelkind tenure as a penalty on the Roman Catholic landowners of Ireland from the reign of Queen Anne to the reign of George the Third, show pretty well that the tendency of the gavelkind tenure is against improvement. The object was to put down the old Irish families—the Roman Catholic families—who had supported the Stuart cause in Ireland, and to reduce their landed influence. The mere prevalence of this gavelkind tenure for 30 years introduced also a tendency for that subdivision of property in Ireland which has always been considered so injurious to every rank of Irish landowners, down to the mere cottier and conacre tenant. I could not illustrate my meaning better than by referring to the former condition of Ireland as described by Arthur Young and other writers.

29. But was not that law introduced in the reign of Queen Anne, coupled with other conditions which had the effect in a greater degree than the law itself? The main point I recollect was this—that if I was within the scope of those penal laws at the time of my death and left freehold lands or entail —

30. You could not will it? No.

31. By Mr. Deniehy: You could exercise no function at all in connection with it? Yes. Of course it did not apply to bona fide sales; but if it did not, the object of it was to subdivide property if it descended. That was the main object of it.

32. By the Chairman: You see that law you refer to was coupled with a condition which we never dream of now? I do not understand how the question before us is affected by that. The owner could sell for a bona fide consideration.

33. By Mr. Faucett: But he could not bequeath land by will? I am not aware how that circumstance affects the point before us. The descent in gavelkind broke up the properties, and prevented improvements. The forbidding to devise the lands only made the mischief general; the mischief was in the subdivision, and was so understood, I believe, by all who have considered the subject, and it strikes me so now. I should like to see that Act of Queen Anne's reign. Supposing, now, under a will a man devises lands to his heirs in tail male or tail female, or tail special of any kind, what construction would have to be put upon that, because the Bill says all lands and hereditaments shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be chattels real for all purposes?

34. By the Chairman: It is proposed to alter that clause thus:—"From and after the passing of this Act all lands and hereditaments within the said Colony shall, in cases of intestacy, be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be chattels real?" That alters the case before us now; but I do not see how that would settle the many questions that might arise by such an Act.

35. By Mr. Deniehy: It is only where an individual has died without signifying his own wish—we do not wish to interfere with the liberty of disposal of effects real or personal? Certainly, the words inserted may make a difference, as to which I cannot see how the Act would be construed in the cases I put; and then there is the second clause; referring to uses and "wills."

- J. F. Hargrave Esq. 36. By the Chairman: That, also, is to be altered. It is a misprint. The word "wills" will be struck out, and even then, perhaps, the clause will require some further consideration? I do not know what the effect of such a clause as this would be, enacting that an Imperial Act of Parliament shall apply were, in fact, it does not. The Act of Parliament of Henry the Eighth does not apply to chattels real—I mean the Statute of Uses. What will be the effect of the operation of a clause of this sort in this Colony—in what respect will the Statute of Uses apply? It does, no doubt, apply now to chattels real, pro tanto. You can create a term of years under the Statute of Uses. It is utterly impossible to predict the effect of such a clause as this is. I think the case of the infant mentioned in the letter which you read might be met, as it is in England, by giving the Court of Chancery power to deal with such estates, whether by granting improving leases or otherwise. In England, if an infant heir-at-law is entitled to property, without trustees or other guardians, the whole of that property goes into Chancery, and the Court can grant leases and improve it. I suppose a simple application of that Act here would meet the difficulty mentioned, so far as improvement is concerned.
37. You think, then, that it is inexpedient to alter the law? I would not go so far as that. I would say that I do not see any reason for altering the descent of lands of intestates.
38. Are you aware that cases of grievous individual hardship occur in the law as it stands? No, I am not. It is possible that the third section would meet all the difficulty; that is, that the power of sale should be invested in the Judges of the Supreme Court. You would then give them exactly the power the Court of Chancery has in England in dealing with infants' estates. So far as the State is concerned, that seems to me to be all that can be wanted—that the property shall not remain in the hands of an infant heir incapable of improving it; but the subdivision of the property is another question altogether, and I am not sure that the State should interfere for the merely exceptional cases you allude to.
39. By Mr. Deniehy: Do you see any difficulty in carrying out those provisions. In looking at the Act I should divide it into two points of view—first, as affecting the tenure and the construction of instruments which regard existing titles. That is the first part. Suppose we take a title from the Crown: the first section says, "from and after the passing of this Act all lands and hereditaments in the Colony shall, in cases of intestacy, be taken to be chattels real." You see we are not going to make it retrospective, and open up all sorts of questions about existing tenures? There is not a better way than to let the grants that issue from this time be for a thousand or for ten thousand years. There it is: there is no freehold tenure then in such grants.
40. That is in order to have a technical completeness; but supposing we do not disturb anything at present existing? If you go beyond the grants that are issued after the present time you must affect existing titles.
41. As I understand the matter, it is to make this Act prospective and not retrospective. It would not, therefore, affect titles already in existence? I do not see how you can help it if you make the clause read "All lands and hereditaments shall be taken as chattels real in cases of intestacy after the passing of this Act."
42. Henceforth, it is simply that if any individual shall die intestate, notwithstanding the nature of any instrument under which the intestate dies seized the land shall be divided equally? But supposing in tracing a title back through an heir-at-law who died 20 or 30 years ago there is an intestacy occurs in that title.
43. That is before this Act shall come into operation? There is nothing, as I see it in this Act, to say that it shall not be affected.
44. I wish it not to have a retrospective operation; we would make it law from the date when it is passed? And only from the deaths at the present time?
45. By the Chairman: I think if we tried to do that we could not —? Is not that the effect of the first section? By enacting so as to affect existing properties you must make the Act retrospective.
46. By Mr. Deniehy: The words are so general? That is what I am afraid of; you alter the tenure, and therefore affect existing interests. For example, a man now seized in fee knows and intends that his land will descend to his eldest son, subject to dower to his widow, without any other act on his part. By this Act you compel to make a will to accomplish these intentions, and so expose him to all the uncertainties of due execution of the will, interpretation of his meaning, construction of words used, and so on. Is not that making the Act retrospective? can you avoid this effect, and is it understood that these effects are beneficial?
47. But the first clause is, that all lands and hereditaments shall in cases of intestacy be taken to be chattels real after the passing of the Act—that plainly contemplates after the passing of the Act? Then that had better be put in it—persons dying after the passing of this Act. Let the Act apply merely to cases of intestacy from that date.
48. By Mr. Faucett: This is the clause of the statute of Anne which has been referred to: "And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all lands, tenements, and hereditaments, whereof any papist now is or hereafter shall be seized in fee simple or fee-tail, shall from henceforth, so long as any papist shall be seized of or entitled to the same in fee simple or fee tail be of the nature of gavelkind, and if not sold, aliened, or disposed of by such papist in his lifetime, for good and valuable consideration of money really and bona fide paid, shall for such estate from such papist descend to and be inherited by all and every the sons of such papist any way inheritable to such estate, share and share alike, and not descend on or come to the eldest of such sons only, being a papist, as heir-at-law; and shall in like manner from such respective sons, being papists, descend to and be inherited by all and every the sons of such sons, share and share alike, and not descend to the eldest of such sons, being a papist, as heir-at-law only, and that for want of issue male of such papist, the same shall descend to all his daughters any way inheritable to such estate in equal proportions; and for want of such issue among the collateral kindred of such papist, of the kin of his father any way inheritable to such estate in equal degree, and for

"for want of such kindred to the collateral kindred of such papist of the kin of his mother J.F. Hargrave Esq.
 "any way inheritable to such estate and not otherwise; notwithstanding any grant, settle"ment, or disposition by will or otherwise that shall be made by such papist otherwise than "such sale, alienation, or disposition be made by such papist as aforesaid; subject never"theless to all such debts and real incumbrances at the time of the decease of such papist
 "charging such estate"? Under the Wills Act of course they could devise it as they pleased, if not sold or disposed of for good and valuable consideration of money really and bona fide paid. 26 Aug. 1858.

49. By Mr. Deniehy: Is there any difficulty you feel with regard to the second clause being worded thus:—"Shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be chattels real"—If the word "real" had been left out, would your difficulty have been overcome? The difficulty I feel is this: supposing I take the Statute of Uses in my hand, and went through the different clauses and applied them to chattels real—

50. Chattels—not chattels real? Chattels real—a term of years.

51. But if we strike out "real"? Then chattels without the word "real," would mean—

52. Just effects like money? It is impossible to say what would be the effect of that statute—what would be the effect of enacting by the Colonial law that all the clauses of the Statute of Uses shall apply to "chattels real," or even to "chattels," I cannot say.

53. By the Chairman: I take it that this is the object of the law: that law was passed in the time of Henry the Eighth, to give parties who had land in use the right of disposing of it, and it was held to apply to real estate—positive real estate—landed property held in fee simple; and there was a decision given in the Courts that it did not apply to chattels real—that is for an estate held for a term of years, and the object of this clause was to let the Act apply to landed property generally—to give the same application of that Act to terms which had been before given to land in fee simple? That would open up a great many questions which would apply to the interpretations of instruments that had been drawn under that Act. The statute of Henry the Eighth was held to apply merely to freehold, because it uses the words that whoever shall be "seized" of the use shall be held to have the same meaning in the possession as it has in the estate. It does not use the word possession in the enacting clause. The Judges, evading the operation of the Act, made it apply to the terms of years, notwithstanding the absence of the word possession, by introducing a few words into the clause—only three words were introduced, which repealed that Act so far as its political effect was intended; but I think that that second section will open a great many questions of the difficult construction upon existing instruments. If you apply it to Acts in regard to real and personal estate under the Statute of Uses, and enact that the Statute of Uses, in all its words from the beginning to the end, shall apply to chattels real, I should be afraid it would open a great many questions of construction in reference to existing instruments. I do not see what is the object of it in this Act itself, because the first section and the third, providing that the sales of all lands under the Act by any administrator or the Curator of Intestate Estates should be subject to the approval of the Judges of the Supreme Court, will meet every case of intestacy and hardship.

54. The first section? The first and the third together. If an infant heir-at-law is seized of estates which are unimproved and would remain so, then the Curator might be authorized to take possession and sell them under the direction of the Supreme Court, or grant infant's leases, or do what they please for the benefit of the infant. With regard to the division of the real property among all the children, that is for the father himself to decide, and we consider in England that the fraternal affection between the elder and the younger children will meet any accidental failure of the father's intention. The eldest son is generally supposed to do what his father would have done, and not to hold all the lands exclusively to his own benefit, because his father died without a will accidentally, or from some error in the execution of his will; but the law should not legislate for these exceptional cases.

55. By Mr. Forster: You mean to say that the non-application of the Statute of Uses to chattels real does not arise from any specific words in the statute, but from certain incidents to that particular sort of estate? Yes; it arises from the omission of that word "possessed" after the word "seized." The words of the Act are, that where one person shall be seized to the use of another—where A shall be seized to the use of B, B shall be held to have the same estate in the land as he had in the use.

56. So that in fact the statute did not apply, because there are certain incidents which could not apply to that particular species of personal estate? Yes; and terms of years did not exist then.

57. These difficulties will scarcely affect the object intended if these incidents did belong to chattels real—that would make the statute operate? Yes, if you could be "seized" for a term of years.

58. So that in fact a clause like this cannot confer those incidents upon that species of personal estate? That is my impression.

59. And consequently the clause is useless? Yes. I think the proper way to accomplish the proposed alteration of tenure would be to follow as nearly as could be the Act of Queen Anne, omitting all the words referring to religion. You would then get into none of those difficulties of construction applicable to a new form of words, but specifically declare that where any person dies without having sold his land, or is seized of land in fee simple or fee tail, it shall descend to the children, to be equally divided among the sons and daughters, precisely in the words of Queen Anne's Act, if such is the intention of this Bill. Then you get rid of all these difficulties and questions about chattels real. As the Act stands, the first clause reads to me as if the Legislature enacted that every acre of land shall be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be for all purposes a mob of cattle.

60. But it has been suggested that the better expression would be personal estate? But I do not see what you gain by these new forms of legislation, as personal estate is already divided.

- J.F. Hargrave Esq. 61. But supposing that to be the case, all lands would then be distributed under the Statute of Distribution, instead of as now? But you have an Act to that effect, 54 George III., which to some extent enacts that all realty shall be personalty, and you have already one of your Equity Statutes for the administration of estates founded upon that, viz., the adopting the corresponding English Act. The Legislature here has not adopted the English Act. For instance, a creditor previously to this Act for reforming the law in this respect, that is to say, under the law as it stood in Lord Eldon's time, might borrow money, lay it out in England in land, and the heir took the land, and if there was no personal estate the creditor got neither land nor money. Among the first Acts for reforming the law after King William IV. came to the throne was this Act of 1832, to stop that by making lands liable to simple contract debts under a due course of administration of all estates in equity. Any creditor could file a bill and make all the debtor's land assets for the payment of all his debts. That Act has never been adopted here, but instead of that you have only the Act which declares the lands of traders to be for all purposes of personalty. That Act, it struck me—I have not looked at it for some weeks—it struck me that an extension of that Act would meet very nearly the whole that this Act purposes, or ought to purpose. And to what extent it does not meet the hardship there is an Act to that effect, 54 George III.
62. So it would be desirable to abolish the distinction of real estate and personal estate? Yes. There are no good grounds for distributing the administration of property of that kind among creditors in a different way, when they get into the public hands, and have to be administered. I think the rights of property with regard to real estate and personal estate are very different. I think we start with that. The very foundation of our laws is built upon a difference between them, and to what extent they produce mischief we have met these mischiefs by commensurate statutes. With regard to creditors, that has been met—a creditor can get at the land of a debtor as at his personalty.
63. That was one of the distinctions between real and personal estate which produced great injustice? Yes.
64. And that has been remedied? Yes.
65. And have not the other distinctions been remedied—the law has been gradually reformed, has it not? It has not altered the law of tenure, but merely the administration of the rights of creditors. Where a creditor ought to be paid to all notions of justice and equity the law has stepped in and met the mischief by a corresponding remedy.
66. Then, so far as the public were at any time called upon to exercise the right over the administration of estates either real or personal the tendency of the law has been to rather assimilate the two? This law can only be put in force by a creditor, and therefore only affects the property of debtors dying without making provision for the payment of their debts. All debtors should be just to their creditors before they are generous to their devisees.
67. And, so far as public right has been concerned, has not the effect been to assimilate the two estates? No; the law did not interfere with the tenure of the estate, but prevented injustice, which would otherwise arise from the neglect or fraud of the debtor.
68. I am not speaking of the character of these estates in other cases; but where public right is exercised over them, do you not think the tendency has been to assimilate the character of the two estates? No; the public would never have interfered at all had it not been for two or three gross cases, where a man borrowed money and bought an estate, and then died, without paying the debt, or leaving provision to pay it, as the law stood before the Act of William IV.
69. That is what I understand by the exercise of a public right. The creditor being unable to enforce his claim, the public then in a court of justice exercise their right to administer a remedy to the injustice created by the distinction? But that does not affect the tenure of the land; the Act very wisely limited the remedy to the mischief.
70. Not of course where the right of private property is exercised—the right of private proprietors to do what they like with their own property; but do you not think that where the administration of property is exercised it should be done as simply as possible? Yes; but I am not prepared to say that land should be transferred as stock in a bank, or shares in a railway.
71. What is the objection to transferring land as readily and as easily as railway stock, provided no rights are touched, in cases where the public have to step in between persons injured? I do not see any objection; but I think the more easy and simple it is the better.
72. Is the mode of distribution of personal property under the Statute of Distributions in itself in any way inequitable? No; I do not see anything inequitable in its operation.
73. Then do you not think it would be reasonable to administer the proceeds of landed property that fell into public hands as they would under this law, under the same system? I think difficulties would arise in consequence of other estates which have been carved out of land and not out of movable personalty, with regard to leases, settlements, and existing limitations of all kinds.
74. But I presume it would be possible for lawyers to get over those difficulties—that they are not insuperable? I think that as to future legal instruments they might be diminished. I think that gradually has been done by several modern Acts of Parliament, simplifying conveyancing in many respects.
75. Then you admit that the intention of this Bill (if those difficulties can be overcome) would be a beneficial one? No, I do not think that; but I think the more you can simplify the transfer of land the better—I mean the transfer of absolute indefeasible estates of inheritance from one individual to another. The more you can shorten the conveyance and abstracts and do away with uncertainty the better; but these uncertainties do not arise from the law so much as from the various and intricate intentions of the owners; and it seems to me that in any case of intestacy arising you would increase the expense as to all these matters matters consequent upon the intestacy; because you would have to trace the title (whatever it might be) through every one of the children, instead of one only, in case of intestacy. The title to land as property passing by deeds, &c., would be much affected by these unqualified words of the proposed Bill. The question is one of simplifying the transfer of land by abolishing the law of primogeniture, which would have exactly the reverse of simplification.

J.F. Hargrave
Esq.

76. But if the intention of this Bill—I would not say the intention of it as it may be construed—if the intention was carried out of administering landed property by the same system by which personal property is now administered in the particular cases to which the Act refers, would it not so far be a simpler mode of dealing with the question of administering intestate estates? I quite agree with you in regard to administration. I think land should be administered; but by administration I understand the distribution of its proceeds among people who have certain equitable rights—as creditors, legatees, and others—to a compulsory sale, not the subdivision of the legal interest among a class of individuals, where every one who ever owned a freehold estate intended it to go to a succession of individuals, unless by deed, will, or otherwise, he expressed a different intention, or unless the law of contract created other rights as for creditors; and that is always done under our shortest English bill in Equity. Administration of it, as between the creditors, that I consider to be met by the 3rd section of the Act, either through the Curator of Intestate Estates or through the administrator when he takes out letters of administration and proceeds in due course justly and duly to administer the same; and I assume, under the law as it stands at present, paying all the debts out of real and personal estate according to the equitable rules of marshalling assets.

77. But suppose there are no creditors, is there any particular reason why landed estates should descend to one son—to the eldest son? Is there any better reason for that than for distributing the proceeds in the way this Bill would under the Statute of Distribution? There you raise up all those questions about the advantages of the law of primogeniture. I have always been accustomed to consider—and I have seen nothing to induce me to alter my opinion—that it is one of the principles of tenure which has the greatest possible tendency to improve property. It provides that a man shall have the land, or that it shall be to him and his heirs for ever; and it descends to his eldest son, in order that it may descend to him and his heirs for ever, instead of being divided into subdivisions ad infinitum. And all our laws of real property as to dower, and the innumerable other legal incidents of freeholds of inheritance, would be affected by this first clause to an extent which I cannot foresee.

78. But is there any necessity for subdivision under this Bill? Yes; the first thing a man entitled to real estate of an intestate would do after the death of the intestate, would be to file a bill in Equity for partition. If there is an infant interested he must do so, if this law passed into operation.

79. But under the operation of this Bill the estate need not be divided, need it, because it could be sold in its integrity? By the administrator! That would not deprive any one of the children of the power to file a bill for the partition, which might eat up every sixpence of the money. You might as well throw your money away, in most cases of this sort, as move for a bill of partition. Every lawyer practising in Courts of Equity knows that the costs of the commission alone for dividing the land is often more than the land is worth. The costs of surveyors are frequently very great, and so are the difficulties attending on division. Supposing there are five children, and that one portion of the land to be divided has a house upon it, how is the property to be equitably divided; that is, supposing the man to have left his land to be equally divided among his children? Any directions or trusts for dividing landed estates are sure to lead to expense and litigation. The trustees cannot act with safety or without liability.

80. That is a case under a will? Yes; but it is just the same right if you make it a chattel real. I do not understand this Act to affect the rights of partition.

81. But under this Bill, would not the operation be to sell the estate in its integrity and divide the proceeds? By the administrator?

82. By the administrator—is not that rather a mode of getting rid of the difficulty? Yes, that would be a good mode, if it is compulsory, and would put a stop to these bills of partition; but can you so alter the tenure of land, and ought you to do so?

83. By Mr. Denichy: I have always understood that is the effect of it? I only looked at the Bill the other night, and gave it my best consideration. If this last clause could have the effect of stopping bills for partition, and the other consequences of the first clause, it would be well.

84. By Mr. Faucett: If what is intended to be accomplished is accomplished, the result would be that lands of all kinds would come under the administration of the law for intestate estates, and would be liable to be sold by the administrator precisely as in chattels? The administrator has a species of discretionary power to sell, at present, and you would have of course the same discretionary power to sell if this Act were passed and the object attained? To that extent it certainly would be a very great advantage. I have no question it would in that case be very beneficial, especially by putting a stop to bills of partition.

85. Suppose you could separate altogether any recollection of feudal tenure, or Saxon tenure, or any other tenure—laying aside all considerations of that kind—is there any reason whatever why there should be a difference in the descent of land that is held by a person for a term of years, and the descent of land that is held in fee?—Taking it on principle alone, is there any natural or just reason why there should be a difference? No; I am not aware of any.

86. I will give you an example:—A person has a leasehold, we will call it for 999 years; another person has an estate in fee—is there any reason why a difference of law should exist with respect to these two kinds of estate? Unless there may have been some political reason in the institution for the different modes of granting, in the first instance.

87. I am putting political reasons aside altogether, and taking a case of simple justice? Certainly

J.F. Hargrave Esq. Certainly not, provided you do not deprive a present owner of fee simple land of his present right to allow the land to descend to his eldest son, unless ousted by some formal written instrument, as will, or such like.

26 Aug., 1858.

88. Then the words "seized" and "possessed," that lawyers are so very familiar with, are of course technical terms to designate particular species of estate, and nothing more? Yes.

89. And saying that a person cannot be seized of a chattel, saying that that is an absurdity, is simply saying that it is a wrong expression, and nothing more—that it is an improper use of a technical word? The word seizin implied a great many rights and liabilities as to the person granting and taking the seizin.

90. It implied no more with respect to an estate in fee than the word "possessed" with respect to an estate for years; the one expressed the liabilities of one estate, and the other the liabilities of the other? It does not now; because by conveyance you are enabled to carry out as much with respect to one as to the other.

91. Now, taking this Debts Act in England, and the Debts Act you referred to, 54 Geo. III.—the Colonial Statute—do not these two Acts entirely assimilate the law of freehold estate to chattel estate in land with respect to debts? My impression, on looking at them sometime ago was, that they had that effect; I know they have been acted upon for that, subject, however, to the rights of marshalling in Equity, as between the creditors and legatees, if any.

92. This statute of 54 Geo. III. makes the houses, land, and other hereditaments or real estates in the Colony, belonging to any person indebted, liable to and chargeable with all just debts, dues, and demands, which shall and may be assets for the satisfaction thereof, in like manner as real estates? Then you see a difficult question would arise upon that. You see that is 54 Geo. III. Our Act in England passed in William the Fourth's reign was subsequent to that many years, and it may be questioned whether that Act would incorporate into our practice an Act passed many years after.

93. But making them assets in Equity and assets in Common Law is no distinction in principle? I dare say it is not.

94. But, laying aside the mere technical lawyer, surely there is no distinction between making real estate liable for men's debts in Equity and liable for men's debts at Law—in principle there is no difference? No, I do not think there is.

95. Is not the only difference the manner of administration? The difficulty arises in my mind in this way:—I find in your Colonial Statute you have adopted the first of the English Acts, 11 Geo. IV and 1 Wm. IV, c. 47, for consolidating and amending the laws for facilitating the payment of debts out of real estate; and then I do not find the other, 3 and 4 Wm. IV, c. 104, to render freehold and copyhold estates assets for the payment of simple contract debts; and I could not see the reason for that omission.

96. This Colonial Statute seems to be more general than the English statute? It is; but why adopt the Traders' Act, if they did not adopt the other?

97. Well, going a step further, is there any reason in principle, any reason in justice, why the law as to intestate estates should be different with respect to terms in land or lands held in fee—laying aside again political reasons, or reasons of tenure, or anything of that kind, and simply confining yourself to considerations of justice and Equity? No; I do not see any reason why if a man lays out his money upon land it should not have the same rights and duties as regards personalty, excepting that he does lay it out upon land which he knows will have different rights.

98. I will take again the same instance: suppose a person has a term in land for 999 years, and another person has an estate in fee in land, is there any reason why, when both these people die, the land of one should descend in a certain line, and the land of the other in a different line? No, excepting that when a man bought it in the first instance he had a motive, one would suppose, for buying that particular description of property.

99. Well, if he buys after this law shall be passed, will there be in such cases any injustice or wrong? The only injustice and wrong will be this:—A man cannot buy land which shall descend to his eldest son if he dies intestate.

100. At present the injustice is the other way—he cannot buy land which will descend to all his children? He may divide it as much as he likes, either by deed or will. The simple question is, on which side should the onus lie, on the individual or the class, to show a written proof of their title. At present the onus lies on the class to show the intention to disinherit the heir.

101. Confining your view to the principle of justice, do you see any distinction in principle between the descent of a term of 999 years and an estate in fee—is there any reason why one should descend in one line and the other in another line? No; I do not see any reason why they should.

102. The general tendency of the law of late years has been to simplify conveyances more than to change the principle of descent—there has been an effort, no doubt, made in England to alter the principle in reference to estates in intestacy? No doubt.

103. Now, coming to the next matter—supposing we assent to the principle of this Act, and considering the first clause, can you form any opinion as to whether that clause would affect settlements that have been already made in any way? Looking at the clause up to the present time, I should have thought that the words enacting that all lands and hereditaments shall for all purposes be adjudged to be taken as chattels real, were for all purposes too wide to meet the case and include existing rights to some extent. That is the difficulty I felt in my own mind, but there may be nothing in it.

104. Supposing a settlement were being made, do you think this Act would affect such settlements in any way. If there were any reservation in the Act, do you think any doubt could be raised about it? Yes; I think if now a freeholder were settling his property that the first section would render necessary very great consideration as to how he should draw his conveyances, and as to how he should frame his limitations.

105. Could you at present suggest any alteration which would be desirable? No, not at J.F. Hargrave Esq. this moment.
106. In the distribution under the Wills Act—in the present distribution of intestate estates, chattels real are administered by the administrator and reduced to money. Now, is there any difficulty in treating lands in the same way, and in placing lands in fee in the hands of an administrator in the same manner? There is no difficulty, for this Act of Parliament by its first clause professes expressly to do it, if the Act of Parliament has the power to do it. But how would you ascertain—supposing a man dies and the administrator takes possession of the chattels or stock, and sells everything he can find; and with regard to his lands—how can he ascertain the parcels of his land—the quantity of land to sell—excepting by reference to his grants, and by some complete and full and accurate maps and proper system of registration. But supposing that to be all done; there is no reason whatever why he should not do it; but then these being matters which are fixed in the country, you have to identify them in a different manner, and by different evidences of title.
107. But to come now to the matter of title—you say that it simplifies titles, especially in estate in fee to a man and his heirs for ever? I do not mean to say that. It is the largest title a man can have, no doubt.
108. I understand you to say that allowing land still to continue to descend to the eldest son simplified the matter? In this respect, that you have only to prove the heirship of one individual instead of a number of individuals.
109. That is what often occurs in the present instance where lands descend to the family? Then you have a troublesome title.
110. By the Chairman: But that constantly occurs? Very seldom in England, and I should think no person having only daughters would allow it to occur, for he would immediately execute a will with proper trusts to sell and divide the money, otherwise the daughters must have their bill of partition.
111. There can be no doubt a descent of that kind will render the tracing of titles more—I will not say difficult—but more troublesome? No doubt of it.
112. Still, that also is a mere matter of detail? Yes, that is all; if you had a perfect system of registration it would be nothing, of course. With a perfect and compulsory system of registration of all titles as well as of births, and description of parcels by reference to maps also under Government care, there would be no difficulty about that—it would only lead to the producing of five registers, perhaps, instead of one. But as we have a very imperfect system it multiplies the difficulty so many fold where you have an intestacy. If that occurs fifty years hence you have to trace so many titles down. There are also other objections to any such system of registration.
113. But this Act, of course, will not interfere in any way with the control a person has over his property? No, probably not.
114. But do you think this Bill, if passed into an Act, would have any effect in inducing people to be more particular about making wills? I think it would make them very much more particular in making wills.
115. If they were anxious to found a family for instance—an anxiety indeed very general in England, whatever the tendency may be here—do you think that this Act would or would not have the effect of inducing them to make wills—to be more particular in that respect? I should think any person acquiring freehold estate, the first thing he should do would be to make a will in reference to it, otherwise he knows it must go to his eldest son. Of course, if he does not wish that to take place he makes a will declaring his other intention.
116. That is if he disapproved of the form of descent? Yes.
117. By Mr. Denichy: I understand you to see no objection to the principle itself, but that you see some difficulty in carrying out the administrative details? I do not see any objection to the principle other than I have stated.
118. You see no reason why landed estate should not be distributed as chattels are under the present law? I do not see any reason, excepting that a person by buying property of that class does not seem to wish it to be so.
119. But, irrespective of that, you see no reason in justice or equity why it should not be so? No.
120. Then, if the present system of records in the transfers of land were kept up as it is now with the system of registration you allude to, do you think that would remove the difficulties? If you had a perfect system of registration of births so as to be able to trace the pedigree, I think the difficulty would be quite met, so far as the heirship is concerned.
121. And the system of registration and transfer of lands precisely as if there were no alteration in the character? If you had a perfect system of registration—the system of registers of transfer may be perfect—I have not looked into it.
122. If a system of registration for transfers of lands from person to person such as we see at present exists, continued notwithstanding the change in the character, you think there would be no difficulty? No, not with the particular objections about the subdivision of property, I do not think there is any difficulty whatever, except the multiplication of evidences; it would be as easy theoretically to trace for five as for one, but then you would have to prove the negative—that the intestate left no other children.
123. In the instance of an intestate's property being sold by an administrator and the proceeds distributed—the administrator conveying as the Court would convey—can you see any difficulty then? No; he would convey as perfect a title to the freehold under the order of the Court.
124. As the individual living could have done himself? Yes.
125. And, seeing that the administrator would convey subject to any outstanding estates, what becomes then of the difficulties with respect to the small estates to which you have referred? I do not understand the question.
126. Supposing the intestate has died leaving his estate subject to small outstanding titles,

26 Aug., 1858.

J.F. Hargrave titles, and the administrator sells subject to those—subject to whatever titles and the proceeds he gets for the sale of such land he distributes—would not that obviate all the difficulties of the minor titles in the estate of an intestate? I am not aware what would be the effect under the Intestate Estates Act. If you make the title an Act of Parliament title, of course it would have that effect. The title is looked into by the Court, and whatever incumbrances exist, notice is given that if they are not paid off the estate is sold subject to them.

26 Aug., 1858.

127. For instance, supposing an intestate was seized with an estate charged with an annuity, it is sold subject to the annuity, and there is no difficulty about the matter? No.

128. By Mr. Jones: And the annuity would be in quite as good a position? Yes.

129. And the same with regard to any similar settlement? Yes.

130. By Mr. Dench: Then you see no reason why, among the various species of titles to land, there should not be this by which the administrator under order conveys intestate estate to the purchaser, just as a trustee would under other circumstances? I think that is desirable. There should be some officer or person who had power to make the title to the freehold, precisely as the assignee in bankruptcy.

131. The only difficulty you see is the possibility of one or more of the descendants harassing the administrator by filing bills in equity for partition, which this law would not take away as it at present stands? No; it would not take that away.

132. But what I meant to say is, you see no possible interference from any other cause, but filing bills of partition by descendants of the intestate? No, I do not, I confess. The clause seems to me to be perfectly strong enough to prevent anything of that sort.

133. Then any similar clause taking away the power of filing such bills you think would operate fully? Yes; but it is very likely that is met by the Curator of Intestate Estate's Act.

134. What do you think would be the effect of this change on settlements? I think the words "for all purposes" so wide as to open up many questions with regard to the effect consequent on an alteration of the law declaring that all lands within this Colony should, for all purposes you can possibly conceive of, be adjudged to be chattels real, so that settlements would require some modification, and fresh settlements to be drawn up in a different way. I dare say there is no difficulty in it, and that it might be very well managed by a slight alteration of the present forms of settlement.

135. You see no insuperable or serious difficulty? No; it might be very beneficial.

136. There would be no difficulty about settlements, but you think it would act beneficially. How do you think it would operate upon mortgages? Very likely in the same way, because it would certainly make both forms of instruments identical.

137. The older mortgages are frequently treated in that way—created a term? Yes, and you have the Act, which provides that a freehold shall be as personal estate for debts of all sorts.

138. Then you would treat it as chattels real? That would be the first question to be decided, although I do not know whether the Courts would treat it so; such a clause as this might create very many difficult questions which I do not foresee.

139. You, yourself, see no difficulty in treating a mortgage under the change proposed to be brought about by this Act? Only the difficulty of dealing with a new Act of Parliament. I would much rather adhere to the old modes of conveyance than adopt new ones, the effect of which I did not know. Almost every statute in England has been covered with interpretations and decisions.

140. With respect to mortgages which have been made upon fee, and which would have to be dealt with under this Act, do you see any difficulty? No. I dare say there would be no difficulty; but I have not considered it.

141. Treated as fee under the old law: in dealing with them under this law would you see any difficulty? No; except that which one always feels on deciding new points.

142. Then it is simply a matter of difficulty, and not of insuperable objections? I dare say it is. All Acts of Parliament seem to lead to a great many difficult decisions.

143. Mortgaged land sold under the operation of this Act will, of course, be sold subject to the mortgagee's claim? Of course.

144. By Mr. Jones: It could not be put in any worse position? It could not be intended to do so, and I do not think it would have that effect.

145. Not by any possibility? I think not. That could not be the intention of the Act.

146. You stated that, under the operation of the law of gavelkind in Kent, the expense of titles was very much increased? Very much so.

147. Sometimes to the extent of half the property? Yes; to any conceivable amount.

148. To what do you attribute this increased cost? Tracing the title through all the children instead of one. A few years ago I recollect a house being sold for five or six hundred pounds. An intestacy had occurred, and there were five children to trace the title to instead of one; two were in America, and one in India, and we were only able to find two of them.

149. One of your objections to this Act, as it is now drawn, is, that you fear it would lead to a similar increase in the cost of titles? It must certainly do so, if you have to trace the title through these intestacies; but it struck me that this might be met by the third clause, which purports to create an Act of Parliament title through the Curator.

150. Could it not be provided in a bill of this kind that in cases of intestacy land should be realised, and the administrators give a title? As in the Act for administering the encumbered estates of Ireland; but I am speaking of difficulties which would arise hereafter—from the date of this Act.

151. There would then be no more difficulty in tracing titles? No; if you have a perfect system of registration. Where deeds are transferred from one person to another you have a simple mode of conveyance—simply substituting the Curator for the —

152. Heir-at-law? Exactly.

153. And a clause providing for that would meet the objections which you urged against the Act on account of the increased cost resulting from the operation of the law of gavelkind in Kent? Yes; and it is very likely the third section would have that effect.
154. By Mr. Deniehy: The administrator makes sale of the estate for the benefit of the children, would there then be any necessity for looking to the heir-at-law at all? I should think the administrator would take his place.
155. Do you see any difficulties in connection with the interference of heirs-at-law? Not if you put them out of ownership, as by the first section—it never descends upon him.
156. By Mr. Forster: What would be the effect of such a law as this upon rights following the inheritance—family rights and commonage rights? They arise simply from custom. You have no system creating customary commons out here.
157. Family properties which follow the inheritance—what would become of those—family vaults, and all that sort of thing? They would pass under the word hereditaments. I think the freehold of the family vaults is in the parson of the parish. It is a question what would be the effect of that.
158. By Mr. Liddington: Does the parson of the parish part with that portion of the freehold in the churchyard? I have seen some documents where he purports to part with it to A or B and his heirs for ever, but I think it is the same right of occupation as the occupation of a pew inside the church. I do not think it gives the grantee any right to sell to a mere stranger. I think it is a right which may be kept up by the executor or some of the family by keeping the tomb in repair, but I am under the impression that the freehold remains in the parson.
159. In some cases they descend, I believe, with the inheritance? Inheritance of what? A parson could grant to his parishioners but not to a mere stranger. The residence within the parish used to give the old liability to pay tithes, and among the rest the right to have a pew in the parish church, and the right to be buried there if you paid certain extra money for it.

WEDNESDAY, 1 SEPTEMBER, 1858.

Present:—

MR. R. CAMPBELL,

MR. FAUCETT,

MR. MURRAY.

T. A. MURRAY, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

John Nicholas Beit, Esq., called in and examined:—

1. By the Chairman: This Committee has been appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the law in regard to the succession of landed property in cases of intestacy, and we wish to have your opinion upon the subject? I have looked at the Bill, but I do not feel at all competent to express an opinion in reference to its construction, because it scarcely expresses that which I have understood from the discussion upon the subject to be its real object, namely, the abolition of the law of primogeniture.
2. I must explain to you that the sole object of those who support the question is to alter the law so far as it relates to the succession of landed property in cases of intestacy, that is, that if a person dies intestate and possessed of landed property, that landed property shall be subject to division in the same manner as chattel property,—that is the sole object. The object is not to interfere with the right of any parties to dispose of property by law, if they choose to make wills, but simply that the eldest son shall not possess to the exclusion of all the other members of the family in cases of intestacy? That is what I have understood.
3. The construction of the Bill is a matter of secondary consideration. The principle, the expediency of altering the law, is the question upon which we want your opinion. It will be necessary to be very careful—to employ professional people in order to work out that object? I have a general objection to any Bill which on the face of it does not show its object. With respect to that which is in point of fact the law of primogeniture in cases of intestacy, I may say that that is a matter which, in consequence of being in early life employed upon administrative purposes, has come particularly under my consideration, and I am clearly of opinion that in a free country the object of this Committee is a matter, not of expediency, but an absolute matter of necessity. I cannot conceive how it is possible to continue the law of primogeniture as it is in the British dominions. There is no possibility that it can work for any good, and every probability and frequent occurrence that it works great evil. Therefore it has been abolished in nearly all the more highly civilized European States except Great Britain.
4. Is it abolished in the German States? In the Northern German States: in all the Protestant States.
5. In the North of Europe is it abolished? It is abolished.
6. And in Southern Europe—in Spain? I am not sufficiently acquainted to speak positively upon the subject.
7. Then, in Germany, do the possessors of large landed properties dispose of them by will? By will; but under the best legislation which now exists upon the subject—the Prussian—the disposal of property by will even is to a certain degree restricted, which I understand is not the object of the present Bill.
8. In Prussia there is a restriction? There are certain restrictions.
9. As to the right of disposing of property by will? Yes; for example, you cannot dispose of inherited property by will away from the natural descendants.

J. N. Beit,
Esq.

J. N. Beit,
Esq.

1 Sept., 1858.

10. You cannot leave it out of the family? You cannot leave it out of your own family—(there are some other provisions)—nor can a man dispose of the property which he has received by marriage with his wife other than to her children.

11. Then the property that the mother has got in her own right is secured to her own children? Yes.

12. Their marriage law, then, must be different to ours? Their laws are very different. I believe both in Prussia and Saxony that the laws in that respect are far superior to the British laws. There is a special—you might call it a court—established to take care of the minors. There is the superior college of pupils; but I do not think all that affects the present inquiry.

13. No, but it is interesting matter in connection with the subject? Yes. All these particular matters have been so fully studied by some (I believe) of the greatest philosophical thinkers and statesmen of the age. Immediately after the war, when it was first promised that the Northern German States should have constitutional Government, all the students at that time applied themselves to the study of the British Constitution, and comparisons were made with the existing German States. A great many alterations have been beneficially made by the existing despotic Governments, and very great improvements have been enacted, all except constitutional Government.

14. You are of opinion, then, that it would be advisable to alter the law in this Colony? I think if you do not alter it (the sooner the better) very great evil will arise. I think it has already existed too long. Combinations of the most fatal kind arise in every country where the law of primogeniture is carried on in the way in which it is carried on here. I have not heard from any quarter any sound argument in favor of upholding it. I should be very glad to hear any argument which can be adduced in favor of it, because I think I am fully prepared to show the entire groundlessness of it.

15. It has been said that it has the effect of supporting families—maintaining families? You mean of maintaining a certain part of the family. You should say to maintain one part of a family at the expense of the other.

16. By Mr. Faucett: To preserve the family name and importance? The vanity of sacrificing a large proportion of the family for the purpose of the other branch—it cannot be anything else. But as you propose to do away with the law only as far as it regards intestate estates, there is nothing to prevent any individual so inclined to sacrifice one part of his family for the benefit of the other; as it remains in the breast of any individual to leave his property to his eldest, or to any other son. But it has been found necessary in modern legislation to impose some restrictions. In Prussia and Saxony there is a power to create what they call majorats, which is in point of fact the same, that is to give to the eldest of the family the priority of succeeding to certain estates—which is in some respects equal to our entails. But the law has provided that a man shall only be allowed to create a certain proportion of his property majorats.

17. It is something like the French law? No; the French law is somewhat different still.

18. The principle is the same? The French law imposes, I believe, greater restriction.

19. But the principle is somewhat of the same kind? Yes, the principle is of the same kind. In point of fact, the Commissioners that drew up the Code Napoleon visited the German Universities to inquire into these particular laws.

20. By the Chairman: Great stress has been thrown upon the argument that the necessity under which the junior members of a family are thrown by the law of primogeniture of working out their own way in the world, has a most beneficial effect, not only in the promotion of the fortunes of the junior members of families, but also in regard to the country at large—do you think there is any weight in that argument? I think the weight is the other way, especially in England. In no country does it operate, it appears to me, so fatally as in England. In England where the peerage is hereditary, and gives the right of legislation, you should prevent by all means the want of activity in an elder son, who is destined to be the hereditary legislator. In taking away from him all inducement to distinguish himself by his personal acquirements, you find that the result is, that only the junior branches of the family ever attain to any distinction.

21. By Mr. Campbell: The Chairman's question does not apply only to the peerage? I believe my reply was strictly an answer to the question of the Chairman.

22. There are numbers of landed proprietors in England who are not in the peerage—your remarks would apply, not to the sons of the landed gentry, but only to the peers? It applies to the peers to some extent, but it applies equally to the landed proprietors, because you find that it is only the junior members of large landed proprietors who distinguish themselves either in the professions or in the House of Commons. You very seldom see the head of a considerable family so distinguished.

23. By the Chairman: But the great mass of mankind in almost every country in the world are thrown upon their own resources, and are obliged to exert themselves in order to obtain a position in the world? But why should a legislature ever wish to produce that heart-burning, that ill-feeling, and that distress in the lower walks of life, (because there it applies only,) which that law must necessarily produce? The power remains in individuals of considerable property to will according to their particular intent. If any family wishes that it should remain in the old state, there is nothing to prevent its being done; but the law as it stands frequently proves most painful in its effects, inasmuch as people that have acquired a moderate amount of property, and are not sufficiently prudent to make a will, or who put off the duty from time to time, die intestate, and the son, or the successor of the son, comes in and sweeps the property away from the whole family. It is to that I refer when I say that the law as it stands can only produce mischief, and can never produce any beneficial result.

24. On the contrary, the dependence in which the junior branches of families are thrown upon the elder representative of the family has a most demoralizing effect? Most extraordinary ordinary; and I believe that a great many of the evil effects which we have witnessed in all countries, and especially in England, are attributable to it.

J. N. Bell,
Esq.

1 Sept., 1858.

25. You think then that there is no weight in the argument—that the necessity of the younger branches of the family working their own way in the world, and depending upon their own energies, does good not only to themselves but also to the country? No.

26. The great mass of mankind are thrown just as much upon their energies; nine-tenths have to work their own way in the world. This will be but an infinitesimal addition to those, perhaps, who have to fight their own way in life? I do not know whether anybody here present, or many men in the world, have had an opportunity of experiencing the much greater difficulty which is thrown upon a man of opulent family and expectations to work his way in the world left without means, as compared with those upon whom the world makes no equal demands.

27. Have you known any instance of hardship arising from the existence of the law of primogeniture in this Colony? I cannot name anybody in particular. I have heard of matters, but being only distantly connected I cannot refer to them.

28. By Mr. Campbell: Will you state the evils that you know to have occurred in England? I could not refer to names.

29. Could you refer to cases? Well, there have been a great many to which, in the course of my stay in England, and particularly in London, I paid particular attention. A great many very painful cases have been brought under my notice.

30. By Mr. Faucett: Perhaps you could give a general idea of the nature of those cases? Very numerous cases have occurred to people in middling life—farmers, and so on. I have known of people who have retired from business of various description, who have purchased landed estate and lived upon the revenue derived therefrom. They have postponed making their wills, when it was well known that their intentions were to provide for the junior branches of their family; but where, in consequence of the head of the family dying intestate, they have been thrown entirely upon the world. Cases are so numerous, and can be obtained in such numbers in England, that I think the evidence of a single individual witness would scarcely be of sufficient weight.

31. By Mr. Campbell: But how are you to determine, where such cases occurred, that it was not done with the concurrence of the deceased? Because he has not expressed it.

32. The expression is in not having done it, to my mind? That he wanted the younger members of the family to go without any share?

33. That he wanted the younger members to go in the way the law directed? You mean that he wished the eldest son to take the whole of the property—that, knowing the law gave the whole of the property to the eldest son, he on that account declined to make a will—that, being satisfied with the provision of the law, he thought there was no need to express himself on the subject. I think that a wise Legislature should most particularly prohibit such a fraudulent proceeding on the part of any man, because his only object can be this:—he would not like to put his own hand to an instrument to rob the younger part of his family, and therefore he makes use of the bad state of the law to do that which he would not have the courage to do; but that his family should not know that he had done it with his absolute will, he leaves the matter of his intent in doubt. I consider it to be nothing better than a mere fraud.

34. How can it be fraudulent? Anything which a man does that he has not the courage to express is, to a certain extent, a fraud, in my opinion.

35. But you assume that the man does it without feeling—you only assume it? I do say, if he has got the intention of doing that which he does under the cover of the law as it stands—if he has the intention to do it, and the courage to avow it, he will still be able to do it under the law which you now propose—if he means to do it in the way I describe, and which I designate as fraudulent.

36. But may not the same conclusions be the other way? I think that all his deprived children will be inclined to think in the way which I attribute. I happen to be an elder son, and an only son, and therefore I never felt partially in the matter.

37. Then you are interested in this question? I am not at all interested in it.

38. By having been disinherited? No; I am an elder son, and an only son, and therefore I am perfectly disinterested in every shape. I have, however, a large family myself, and I know what my own feelings would be upon the subject.

39. The assumption of it being that the deceased intended to make a will—I do not think you could prove that by the instance you have given to this Committee? That he intended to make a will! I do not want to prove the intention of the deceased.

40. I understood that the question from the Chairman was to the effect that there were so many instances of deceased persons not having made wills when they intended it? No; I did not hear such a question.

41. That it was necessary to provide for the omission of that deceased person? No; I understood the Chairman to say, that in cases where a person had died without making a will the consequences had been fatal.

42. Well, I ask for an instance where they were so? I have mentioned to you that they are so numerous that I cannot now bring to my mind particular matters. To do this, one must be perfectly acquainted with the circumstances.

43. Then, with reference to the principle of this Bill—the providing that where a deceased dies without a will his property shall be divided—do you not think, if it becomes law, greater litigation will ensue amongst the heirs of parties so dying, than would be the case under the present law? Why, what litigation can there be?

44. A person dies, leaving distant connections as his heirs? Well.

45. And under the provisions of this law it is necessary that each gets a share? No.

46. And the difficulty will be to find out the distant relations? Distant relations are not all entitled.

- J. N. Peit, Esq.
1 Sept., 1858.
47. Well, cousins? It is only the next of kin, I suppose, according to the law of descent.
48. Well, they are all to go share and share alike? If they are members of the same degree of consanguinity of course they would share alike.
49. There would be great difficulty in finding out the heirs? Not at all. I never find that there is any difficulty in finding out people who are to take.
50. The present law as it stands saves a great multiplication of deeds, does it not? Ah! there you hit upon the right point. There, indeed, I expected—hoped, in fact—the Committee would in some respects come upon the difficulties which exist under the British laws. There is one of the laws which have remained in Great Britain—an heritage of the same feudal times as the law of primogeniture—that is the holding of property. In all these countries which I have named to the Committee in which the law of primogeniture has been altered, there has also been made that alteration in the law of holding property which has simplified it in every possible way. Not only are the transfers and subdivision facilitated, but all litigation is absolutely avoided—I may almost say rendered impossible. I know it would appear to every English lawyer difficult; but the holding of property in Prussia, Saxony, Hanstown, and all the northern parts of Germany is so that it is impossible to litigate. But it is no part of the law; it is part of the administration. When once the holding is secured there is no possibility of litigation; and, with respect to the divisions, such cases as are here considered difficult on account of the deeds are remedied there with the greatest ease.
51. That is when there is a multiplication of deeds, but I allude to the multiplication which will arise if this Act be passed. Every man must make a will? Not at all.
52. If he wants his property to be left to his children either equally or unequally? Not if he wants it to be equally divided.
53. It compels a person who wishes to give his heritable estates to his eldest son to make a will, which under the present law he need not do? Yes.
54. Then, if this law were passed, it tends to multiplication of deeds? No; it will make so many less deeds, because every man under the present system who will not absolutely disinherit his younger children is compelled to make a will.
55. But if this law passes it compels every one to make a will? No.
56. To ensure his property going in the way he desires? If he is not satisfied to let his children share and share alike.
57. By Mr. Faucett: Mr. Campbell's statement is this:—If a person does not wish his property to go share and share alike among his children, then he must make a will? Will you allow me to ask you a question, Mr. Faucett?
58. Certainly? In this Bill it is stated that the statute concerning uses and wills passed in the twenty-seventh year of Henry the Eighth's reign shall be deemed and taken to apply to chattels real.
59. The words "and wills" will be struck out? Does that constitute equal division?
60. No, that is a mere technicality? What is the law of England if you abolish the law of primogeniture?
61. That is too large a question? No. I mean the law of descent—the law of division of property.
62. The chattel property—not freehold—is divided now in a particular way amongst the children and the wife? Amongst the children only, share and share alike.
63. The wife gets one portion and the children share the other? Yes.
64. By Mr. Campbell: If this law were passed it would involve the making of more wills than are made at present? I say, on the contrary, that less wills would be required.
65. By the present law you state that an eldest son inheriting from his father requires no deed, he inherits by descent—now, if this law passes it will make the owner of heritable estate make a will? What for—why should they?
66. Supposing he has sons and daughters, he must make a will if he wants his property to go to his eldest son? Yes.
67. He must make a will? Yes.
68. Therefore it is a multiplication of deeds? I cannot see it.
69. By Mr. Faucett: In the present state of the law, if a person wishes his property to be divided between his sons and daughters he must make a will? If you say the generality of parents —
70. I am not speaking generally? Well, any one that will be so unjust as to give his property to one —
71. I did not ask with reference to that, but merely concerning the multiplication of deeds. I say more wills will be made than under the old law, inasmuch as by the old law—where the holder of heritable estate intended to give it to the eldest son—he had no occasion to make a will, because the law gave it to him; but if this law passes he will be obliged to make a will—therefore it includes a multiplication of deeds, does it not? No, I think quite the contrary. You will not have one quarter the wills, because by rendering this division equal among the children you do not compel the father to make a will in order not to exclude the other children. According to the law as it at present stands, every right-feeling father is obliged to make a will to prevent an injustice to his children. But under the law contemplated it is only necessary for him to make a will in cases where from some motive, whatever it may be—pride, vanity, or any other motive—he wants to commit a great injustice to the mass of the children. There is just this difference: as the law now stands every man is obliged to make a will if he would not commit an injustice to his children in the one case, while in the other he is only obliged to make a will if he intends to commit an injustice.
72. By Mr. Campbell: Very often wills are made which give rise to great litigation, are there not? Well, that may be so.
73. Don't you know instances of it? I know that wills have been contested, but that has been in consequence of that very law. They have always arisen out of the law of primogeniture—not always, perhaps, that is going a little too far—but very often.

74. There are many wills contested from the way in which they have been drawn up by the solicitors? Yes; but a great many contests have always arisen in consequence of the operation of the law of primogeniture. J. N. Beit, Esq.
75. Is it not likely that if this law be passed more wills will be made, and more litigation arise in consequence? I deny that there will be more wills. I think there will not be a quarter the wills which are made at present, but that the people will be content with the course of law. 1 Sept, 1853.
76. By Mr. Faucett: You stated at the commencement of your examination that in a free country it was a matter of necessity to destroy the law of primogeniture? Yes.
77. In the first place, what do you mean by the law of primogeniture, using it in that way? I mean where the eldest son inherits the whole of the landed property.
78. Whether by will or by settlement—in either case? By will, it is not by primogeniture.
79. Would you be kind enough to say how the freedom of a country is in any way connected with the question? The freedom of the country is greatly affected by it, by the feelings which arise in the country—by that mock aristocracy which is created by this law of primogeniture—an aristocracy of mere possessions.
80. That is what you call a mock aristocracy—an aristocracy of possessions? Yes.
81. That is an aristocracy which has nothing to boast of but property? They are a sort of aristocracy by virtue of their possessions, and not by virtue of that which the word implies—the best of the people.
82. In fact an aristocracy in consequence of the law and not in consequence of merit? Yes.
83. England is a very free country, notwithstanding this law—is that in spite of the law? It is in spite of the law; but they are not so free in their social relations.
84. England? Yes; they are not so free in their social relations as despotic countries, where they have no Constitutional Government.
85. Then your statement does not contain your argument. They have abolished the law of primogeniture in these despotic countries? Yes.
86. And is the freedom of those countries promoted in the slightest degree by the abolition? Yes, the social freedom.
87. Not the political freedom? I am speaking of social freedom.
88. But there must be some restriction upon social freedom? When I said at first that in a free country the abolition of the law of primogeniture was a necessity, I meant by that, that it is a necessity to prevent a description of revolution. With the high degree of civilization which the descendants of the present Anglo-Saxon race (as you please to call yourselves) boast, for the high civilized nations of Europe, although in a new country to establish anything which has the faults of the old feudal system must lead, I believe, to revolutions; but it can be done by reform, and it is that reform which we are now contemplating.
89. At all events, whatever way property descends the descent must arise from the regulation of law? Not necessarily.
90. There is no natural descent for property—not natural course of descent? There is a natural course of descent—the will of the deceased.
91. That is the artificial course—the expressed intention? Yes.
92. There is no natural course of descent? Then you might as well say that there is no natural right of property.
93. No: perhaps I might go so far as that if I wanted to go to first principles: the right of property is artificial? But it is one of those rights which are merged in society and civilization.
94. I imagine that the right of property is one of the first steps towards civilization? It is the result of civilization.
95. It is the result and a step in advance, because it is a check on barbarism? Well, perhaps that might lead us away into metaphysical research. The rights of property are pretty well recognized in all civilized countries, and the rights of transmission are also recognized.
96. But, coming away to the more practical and less theoretical matter, you are aware, I suppose, that the law of primogeniture as you call it only applies to real property in this country? Yes.
97. Landed property—freehold property? Yes.
98. You may have a quantity of money, for instance—it does not apply to that? No.
99. Do you know any reason whatever why there should be a distinction between the two estates—why £100,000 in money placed in a bank and property of the same value in land should descend the one in a different way from the other? None whatever. That is what I have before stated. I cannot imagine any valid argument to maintain the law of primogeniture. That is the only difference I believe of descent. But allow me to ask you one question, which I am not particularly clear upon, because I have forgotten these things: According to the British law, if a man dies possessed of landed property and a chattel estate—both of considerable amount—the eldest son inherits (the father having died intestate) the landed estate; but how does he share in the personal estate?
100. That does not affect the question. The particular division we are not considering just at present? But does he participate in the chattel estate as well?
101. Yes; if there is no will my impression is that he does. But we are not talking of that matter at this particular moment. Coming to the question again, I think you stated, Mr. Beit, that the younger sons of landed proprietors were the only persons that obtained distinction in England? I say generally.
102. Well, of course you are aware of many eminent, very eminent persons who were the eldest sons? Eldest sons!
103. Many noblemen of great distinction? I cannot say that I am at present. There may be.
104. Do you think there is greater difficulty in the younger sons of men of property getting on than in young people who have no property whatever? Yes.

J. N. Beit,
Esq.

1 Sept., 1858.

105. Tell me how that difficulty is greater? In one way you propose to me to speak of the sons of noblemen and of high families; in the other you want to apply my answer to the great community of life.

106. Just so—to young people who have no property—who are thrown on the broad of their backs at the commencement of their life without connections and without money? I say that the sons, generally speaking, of persons of no property at all—who die without property—have not so much difficulty as the sons of opulent parents who leave them nothing.

107. With respect to the holding of property in the continental states which you have been speaking about, you said it was a matter, not of the law, but of the administration? Yes.

108. Do you mean to say that the holding of property and its descent determines upon the administration of the Government? Not the descent. The descent remains, necessarily, in the Courts of law.

109. It is fixed by law? It is fixed by law, and determined by the Courts. But after that determination is come to the administrator of the minor receives the order of the Court, and it is simply entered in the public register.

110. Then, do I understand you to say that there is a system of registration there that simplifies the descent? It does not simplify the descent. Anybody that comes to the registrar, and says "this property is mine now," has to justify it by an order of the Court.

111. What do you mean by the minors' Court you spoke of? The minors' Court is a Court which is understood to watch over the interests of minors.

112. It is similar, I suppose, to a branch of the Equity jurisdiction in our Courts where the Lord Chancellor has a jurisdiction over minors? Over certain minors—only wards of Court.

113. Any minor may be made a ward of Court? In the College I spoke of every guardian that stands under that Court must account to that Court. He cannot dispose of anything without.

114. I suppose that Court is similar to that branch of our Equity Court? It is more simple and more general, and it extends to the smallest person—to all minors. In point of fact it is called the High College of Guardians.

115. You think, then, that on the whole this alteration in the law of intestate estates would be beneficial to the community at large—still more so than to the small number of large landed proprietors? It is for the community at large that it is of the greatest importance. I should suppose the large landed proprietors would take care to devise by will in this country.

116. You say that you have had a great deal of experience in intestacy matters? Not in intestacy matters; in administrative matters.

117. Well, in your experience of administrative matters, did you ever know an instance, even one instance, of a person in England who had made a fortune and invested it in land—had bought land—and who afterwards made a will dividing that land equally among all his children—did you ever know one solitary instance of a will to that effect? I have never heard of such an instance, but I am not sufficiently acquainted with such matters.

118. Well, then, if a person in the present state of the law having landed property does not make a will, does not that raise a strong presumption that he wishes his property to descend according to the law? Well, I should be sorry to impute to the people in general so heinous an intention.

119. Is not that a fair presumption, when a person knows the property will descend in a particular way if he leaves it to descend in that way? I think not. I think it is not fair to draw a presumption which implies a sort of guilt.

120. You attribute it to carelessness, and also to unwillingness to make a will? I consider that, in the great majority of cases, either carelessness or in consequence of postponement, or, as you say, unwillingness to make a will. To that I should attribute it in the great majority of cases. That a man should have it in his mind to deprive his family of any of his means for the purpose of giving all to his eldest son, and in order to do this, makes no will—I consider to be criminal.

121. It simply comes to this, that whenever a person who has landed estate that he can dispose of by will settles that upon his eldest son, he commits a heinous crime in your eyes? Yes, if he has got no other means wherewith to provide for his other children.

122. You said that wills were contested in consequence of the law of primogeniture? Frequently.

123. How does that arise? By the heirs-at-law claiming against any will which will deprive them of that which they would receive.

124. But supposing a change in the law took place, and if a person made a will leaving his landed property to his eldest son, the other children would contest in the same way? They might do so.

125. In fact, it would be removing the contesting party; it would, in fact, be simply altering the position of the contesting party? It might be so—it would not be so heinous.

126. With respect to the number of deeds that might be executed—if this law were altered you do not think it would cause that increase in the number of wills? I cannot see how it is possible, because the great majority of people certainly do not wish to deprive their younger children of a fair share of their property.

127. You think they would all be satisfied that the landed property should be divided in the same way as money is now divided? I have not the slightest doubt that they would. Either a man is possessed only of landed property, or landed property and chattel property; and, if he is possessed of landed property only, I think that he would certainly wish that that landed property should be divided. If he is possessed of both it can make no difference, because they they will all share alike; but the present law appears to me to be so unnatural—so against human nature—so against justice and right—that the eldest son should sweep away all the landed property, and, if there is any chattel property, to take a share of that also. To anybody who studies the matter it appears monstrous. But will you allow me to suggest to the Committee one matter which has been raised. It is the only objection which appears to me to have some validity, although it is only superficial. It has been said that it leads to too great a division of landed property. That is, I believe the only tenable argument which has ever been raised against the law of equal division. It has been said that in France, for example, it has taken place. Now I do not think it has taken place even in France to the extent which has been said. In the Prussian and Saxon dominions it is partly provided against. I cannot tell you whether it is by law or by local custom; but it has been greatly facilitated by that which I have alluded to before—by a method of registration. Families in these parts of Germany—families of some respectability (without going to the magnates of the land) wish even moderate estates to keep together, and they will it so that the estate shall not be divided; but, notwithstanding that, every child gets his fair share. But it is only one who administered the estate, and the others only hold mortgages upon it. Suppose I die and leave an estate worth £10,000, and I have got five children—they are each entitled to £2,000. The estate is valued at £10,000, and either the eldest or one of the others, as they can understand each other, becomes the immediate possessor of the estate, and each of the other children have £2,000 inscribed upon it as priority of mortgage. By a manner of registration where the law is so simple and so easily transferred there is not any hardship upon any one of them, because the son or daughter who remains in possession either pays the others their mortgages out, or they transfer them to anybody who will have them. It is done so constantly with so little difficulty, and such great facility, that, in point of fact, persons get their money immediately.

128. That reduces the eldest son to this position—he receives the property largely embarrassed, causing one of the terrible difficulties which occurred in reference to property in Ireland? That has been from the nature of the holdings of the property in Ireland, where you have encumbered an estate with something unreal—not part of the inheritance.

129. Where a person inherits incumbrances weightier in fact than the estate can bear? If I have an estate of £10,000, and my son is only entitled to £2,000, he can choose how he will have it. He can sell the estate at once. There is nothing to prevent him selling it. Or, I may leave it in such a manner that the estate is not to be divided, so that the estate must be sold in its integrity. There is no hardship. There is never any trouble in these matters, where the law of inheritance in that respect has been fairly laid down. There have been difficulties existing in the Prussian dominions, but those matters have been most satisfactorily settled. It was thought it never could be done. The difficulties there were much greater on account of the feudal services which were in existence, and which were inherited with the estates. A man did not merely inherit a piece of land, but he had also the services of the serfs upon the estate. There was great difficulty there to divide these matters, but it has now been most effectually and satisfactorily done, and the country has attained through it a degree of prosperity which she had never known before.

130. Notwithstanding the despotism? Notwithstanding the despotism.

131. And on the whole you prefer what you call social freedom with a despotism to political freedom without social institutions? You should allow me to answer the question, and not answer it for me. I have not said so.

132. Well, is it so? There is a great deal to be said on that subject. It requires more elucidation than you would like to see upon the minutes this Committee.

133. You say that no such thing as law-suits about property take place in Prussia—how is that possible? About property! Not about property—against the holder.

134. Two persons never contend about the right to be holders of a property? After it has once become the property of one. It is impossible. You might just as well say you will contest the right of holding a thousand pounds in the funds in England when once it is in your name.

135. When once it is determined that A is the owner of the property B cannot come in; but you frequently have A and B contending about the right to a property in Prussia? About the right to a property—that is property which at that time has no living owner.

136. Are there not contests as to the right of ownership of lands in Prussia? After a person has been acknowledged owner? I must put you that question, because very frequently in England and the British dominions, in fact all over the world, law-suits have arisen against persons who actually thought they had a good title to the land they held. If you have once a title such as the law gives in Prussia there is no possibility of any one else coming in; there is an end of it.

137. But that is the same thing in England, I suppose. Where the Court has once decided in England that a person is the owner of property, that person is for ever the owner. There is no further possibility of disputing that? But you may purchase land from somebody. He transfers it to you. You go to your solicitor about it. He consults counsel. You get an opinion that the title is good, and you make the purchase; but after paying your money somebody else comes and disputes it, and shows that there is a flaw in the title. There is no possibility of anything of the kind in Prussia.

138. They must be very honest there? There is no honesty involved in the matter at all.

139. What is the Statute of Limitations in Prussia—how many years' possession give a title? It gives no title at all.

140. No title except by deeds? No title except by the public registers.

141. Then, whenever a person is registered in Prussia as the owner of a certain property, the law pronounces that person to be the owner? He is the only owner.

142. Then, in fact, it is a kind of parliamentary title he gets? It is a parliamentary title, if

J. N. Beit,
Esq.

J. N. Beit,
Esq.

if you please to call it so. It is very simply done. Some time or other there must have been an original title, no doubt. Whatever it has been that title is registered. That is Mr. Faucett's land. It is described, and it cannot be transferred but by Mr. Faucett in person, with two witnesses to identify Mr. Faucett, or by decree of a competent Court.

143. So, then, it does occasionally come before a Court of law? It need not. Suppose Mr. Faucett dies, and his heir claims this property, he must go through that Court which decides about wills and descents, and he gets a simple order—the same as you get from the Arches Court in England—to prove that he is the person entitled to it.

144. There has been a great objection raised to the passing of any such law as this that is proposed—to establish that equal division in cases of intestacy—on the score of its upsetting to an immense extent the law which now relates to landed property; do you think that an objection of that nature ought to be regarded as insurmountable? It upsets the law of landed property—Do you mean retrospectively or prospectively?

145. Both prospectively and retrospectively? Prospectively it can have no weight whatever. I cannot see how you can attach any weight to it prospectively. But retrospectively I am not sufficiently aware in what way it can operate. It is just possible there may be some such considerations which I cannot perceive, and I should be very sorry to express a decided opinion that they do not exist because I cannot see them.

146. By the Chairman: Do you think it would affect the rights of mortgagees at all? How can they be in a position to be affected by such a change?

147. It has been said here that the securities of mortgagees would be affected by it? Impossible. As you have mentioned this proposition to me, I may say that I think the only parties who could be affected by it would be the holders of post obit bonds, and for them I would not have much consideration. Of course it is clear that if any of these settlements are made in regard to landed property, such as mortgages, marriage settlements, and the like, they would hold good—they would all be inscribed on the property.

148. By Mr. Faucett: Suppose here a person in the present state of the law buys land from the Crown, that land is "to him and his heirs for ever," to use a legal phrase. The meaning of that is, that if he dies without making a will the land will descend to his eldest son, and so on. That is, in other words, a settlement. Although it is called a grant, it is in fact a settlement? No; it is a settlement upon his heirs.

149. It is a settlement made by him to go to his heirs for ever. Does it not go a little farther: is it not to his heirs and assigns? Oh! yes; but that is nothing. To him and his heirs for ever is quite sufficient. That, however, is a settlement so long as it remains; because, if he makes no will, then that land goes of necessity to his eldest son. He has bought it and got it settled in that way. If he chose he could have got it settled in any other way. No doubt if we repeal the law we affect grants of that kind, although made before the alteration of the law. We alter the line of descent, and make it different from what the purchaser of the land intended? Not in the slightest degree, because he has the power to do it if he wishes to do it. For the sake of your argument you say that it is to a man and his heirs, but it is no such thing; the grant is made to his heirs and assigns.

150. But if he does not assign, it goes to his heirs; assigning must be an act of his done subsequently? If he is solvent.

151. We are supposing that he is solvent, of course? I want to show you this; because it is to come to the heir without entail it does not prevent the creditor taking in preference to the heir. Why should the children be in a worse position? They have as much claim upon the father as any debts which he may have incurred. It is a most savage law. I do not utter my own sentiments merely. You will find that some of the greatest authorities on jurisprudence for the last fifty years have expressed it over and over again. In the German Universities, and in forming the Code Napoleon, all these matters have been so fully discussed and so ably handled as to show that it is a remnant of barbarism which ought not to be tolerated.

ADDENDUM.

Since giving the foregoing evidence I have been reminded of the case of a highly respected gentleman, residing for many years in this Colony, who we will call X. X was the youngest son of a large family, whose father was the possessor of a large landed estate in Kent, of the value of £4,000 or £5,000 a-year. The father died intestate, the eldest son was killed in battle soon after the decease of the father, and the estate descended upon the second son, a scape-grace, who had previously become involved, and who shortly dissipated the whole estate. The whole of the family were left destitute, and left dependent upon relatives, who fortunately were able to educate them, and to prevent their descending entirely from a position in society.

Legislative Assembly.
NEW SOUTH WALES.

DISTRICT COURT.
(PETITION IN FAVOR OF ESTABLISHMENT OF, AT GUNDAGAI.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 9 April, 1858.

To the Honorable the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, in Parliament assembled.

The Humble Petition of the Magistrates, Licensed Graziers, Stock and Landholders, Farmers, Storekeepers, Licensed Victuallers, Tradesmen, Mechanics, Laborers, and other Inhabitants of Gundagai and the adjoining Districts,—

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH :—

That Gundagai is an important Police District, in the Pastoral District of the Lachlan, on the main trunk line of road of the Colony, uniting it with the Sister Colonies of Victoria and South Australia.

That Gundagai, from its central situation as a Police Station, as shewn by its lock-up being the receptacle for prisoners from nine different Police Districts, renders it an eligible place at which an Assize Town should be established as the seat of a District Court with a jurisdiction in criminal cases.

That, owing to the non-existence of any such institution nearer than Goulburn, parties are, in many instances, deterred from prosecuting criminals, preferring to put up with the first loss rather than incur the great inconvenience of travelling over almost impassable roads, at a great loss of time to themselves, and of serious injury to their business; and that, under these circumstances, many criminals are allowed to go unpunished.

That the convenience and well-being of a population of upwards of nine thousand would be studied by the extension to Gundagai of an Assize Court, or the establishment of a District Court; and that five thousand would at once receive immediate benefit therefrom, Gundagai being a convenient distance from Burrowa, Binalong, Tumut, (whose population is rapidly increasing,) and Wagga Wagga.

That during the past and present year, one hundred and twenty-five prisoners have been received and forwarded from the lock-up at Gundagai to Goulburn, the whole of whom could have been dealt with at Gundagai had such Courts as above specified been in existence; and thus, the enormous expense incurred by witnesses in travelling to Goulburn would have been saved, and the great risk of prisoners escaping would have been avoided, as there are no receiving houses on the road between Gundagai and Goulburn.

Your Petitioners respectfully submit, that the very large revenue derived from the sale of lands and other sources in this Unsettled District, entitle them to the favorable consideration of Parliament, more particularly as they have not, hitherto, received any benefit from the expenditure of public moneys.

Your Petitioners, therefore, pray that your Honorable House will take the above premises into your favorable consideration, and will extend a Court of Assize, or a District Court having Civil and Criminal Jurisdiction, to Gundagai.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Legislative Assembly.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

ASSIZE COURT.

(PETITION IN FAVOR OF ESTABLISHMENT OF, AT TAMWORTH.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 9 April, 1858.

To the Honorable the Legislative Assembly of the Colony of New South Wales, in Parliament Assembled.

The Petition of the Magistrates, Licensees of Crown Lands, Miners of the Hanging Rock and Peel River Gold Fields, and other residents of the Town of Tamworth and the Pastoral Districts of Liverpool Plains and the Gwydir,—

HUMBLY SHEWETH:—

We, the undersigned Magistrates, Licensees of Crown Lands, Miners of the Hanging Rock and Peel River Gold Fields, and residents of the Town of Tamworth and the Pastoral Districts of Liverpool Plains and the Gwydir, humbly approach your Honorable House on a subject affecting, to a considerable extent, our social position and welfare.

We beg to draw the attention of your Honorable House to the great distance at which your Petitioners reside from an Assize Town, and to the circumstance of much crime passing unnoticed, to the serious prejudice of society, on account of the great loss of time occasioned by prosecuting at the Assize Court in Maitland, thereby involving a lengthened absence of individuals from their homes and occupations.

Your Petitioners would wish especially to press upon your Honorable House that from the position of Tamworth it forms the central dépôt for the reception of prisoners from the Northern and Western portions of this part of the Colony on their transit to Maitland, and that a large portion of Police in their respective districts, but more particularly in the Police District of Tamworth, are almost exclusively employed in the escort of prisoners.

As evidence of the correctness of these views, your Petitioners would beg to submit to your Honorable House the respective distances of the following Benches from the nearest Assize Court, held in Maitland:—

	Miles.
Tamworth, distant from Maitland	170
Nundle and Hanging Rock, ditto	162
Wee Waa, ditto	275
Warialda, ditto	300
Armidale, ditto	240
Wellingrove, ditto	282
Tenterfield, ditto	326

In addition to which, your Petitioners desire to remark, that although the distances are computed from Maitland, the Police Districts extend, in most cases, fully 100 miles further, thereby increasing the expenditure.

Your Petitioners desire further to show how well adapted Tamworth is, from its central position, for an Assize Town in the Northern Districts. From Maitland, the present Assize Town, to the extreme of New England is 360 miles, and Tamworth being but 170 miles from the former, and 190 miles from the latter, it is but 10 miles from the centre, while Armidale is 60 miles from it. Presuming that the twenty-eighth degree of parallel will be the boundary of the new Colony of Moreton Bay, your Petitioners would still be of opinion that Tamworth would be more central than Armidale as a place for an Assize Court in the Northern Districts of New South Wales; and in proof thereof, your Petitioners respectfully beg to submit, for the consideration of your Honorable House, the following Table:—

	Miles.		Miles.
Murrurundi to Tamworth	65	To Armidale	140
Nundle and Hanging Rock to ditto ...	40	To ditto	110
Wee Waa to ditto	130	" "	200
Warialda "	130	" "	200
Bingera "	70	" "	140
Woolshed "	50	" "	120
Wellingrove "	170	" "	100
Tenterfield "	190	" "	120

Which, in the aggregate, proves that at each sittings of Assize and Quarter Sessions, supposing that there are but two cases from each Bench and six witnesses, 27,360 miles would be saved by Tamworth, instead of Armidale, being created an Assize Town; this saving of mileage would consequently be attended with a vast saving of expense to the Government—resulting from the allowances in the shape of travelling expenses to witnesses, the escort of prisoners, and the travelling expenses of the Judge and Crown Law Officers. Your Petitioners are of opinion, that at least £3,000 per annum would be saved.

But there being every reason to believe that the thirtieth degree of parallel will be the boundary of the new Colony of Moreton Bay, thereby fixing the boundary within thirty miles north of Armidale, your Petitioners would respectfully observe, that it would be inconvenient and unnecessary to have the Assize Courts of the Northern Districts at two extreme ends, viz., Maitland and Armidale.

Should the boundary of the new Colony be fixed at the thirtieth degree of parallel, then the following Table would evidence most strongly the centrality of Tamworth, and its claim, from position, to an Assize Court:—

	Miles.		Miles.
Murrurundi to Tamworth	65	To Armidale	140
Nundle and Hanging Rock to ditto ...	40	" "	110
Wee Waa to ditto	130	" "	200
Warialda "	130	" "	200
Bingera "	70	" "	140
Woolshed "	50	" "	120
	485		910

Wellingrove and Tenterfield being in the new Colony, those Benches would cease to have any connection with New South Wales; consequently the aggregate in mileage here shown, supposing that there are two cases and six witnesses from each Bench at each sitting of Assize and Quarter Sessions, proves that upwards of 30,000 miles would be saved to witnesses, &c., by Tamworth, and not Armidale, being the Assize Town; this saving of mileage would be accompanied with an additional saving of expense to Government.

As an additional evidence in favor of Tamworth being created into an Assize Town, arising from its position, your Petitioners beg respectfully to remind your Honorable House, that when in the year 1848 the Law Commissioners' Report was submitted for the consideration of the Honorable the Legislative Council, the Colonial Secretary recommended Tamworth as a suitable place for an Assize Town.

It is the confirmed opinion of your Petitioners, that many persons refrain from prosecuting owing to the great distance of the Assize Court from their respective abodes, and consequent expense; and what is of more importance, the serious inconvenience to individuals, in whatever employments they may be engaged. These remarks apply still more to witnesses not interested in the prosecution.

In committing this Petition to the favorable consideration of your Honorable House, your Petitioners beg to say that Tamworth, from its central position, as well as from its vast increase of population, and the extensive operations, both in Commercial, Mining, Pastoral, and Agricultural pursuits of the extensive districts surrounding it, has every claim to be created an Assize Town; and, having every confidence of the wisdom of your Honorable House, your Petitioners entrust this their Petition to its most favorable consideration.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Legislative Assembly.
NEW SOUTH WALES.

COURT AND RESIDENT JUDGE AT ALBURY.

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 11 May, 1858.

To the Honorable the Members of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales.

The Petition of the undersigned Inhabitants of the Town and District of Albury,—

HUMBLY SHEWETH:—

That your Petitioners, as inhabitants of the Colony of New South Wales, deem themselves entitled to share in the benefits of British law, as administered in the ordinary Courts of Justice.

That the Murrumbidgee District contains, according to the last Census, upwards of nine thousand inhabitants, and that, with the exception of the Police Courts and Small Debts Courts, no legal tribunal has ever sat within the limits of this extensive territory. That the aforesaid nine thousand people are thus virtually deprived of their rights as British Subjects, and that the denial of these rights amounts to a denial of justice.

That your Petitioners have been agitating for seven years, with a view to obtain their constitutional privileges in this particular; but their numerous Petitions, Memorials, and Addresses, have hitherto failed in the objects sought,—that measures for the institution of District Courts in the interior have been prepared and debated upon, under the present and preceding Cabinets, but that ministerial changes have, on each occasion, interfered to prevent the realization of your Petitioners.

That your Petitioners consider it almost unnecessary again to particularize the various hardships to which they are exposed, in having to travel 220 miles to prosecute offenders, or to attend the sittings of the County Court in Goulburn. That the lawless condition of the interior districts, and the impunity enjoyed by criminals and vagabonds, particularly horse and cattle stealers, owing to the unwillingness of prosecutors and witnesses to incur the serious loss involved by a journey to Goulburn, are also matters of notoriety.

That the case of your Petitioners is none the less urgent on that account, but every day's delay increases the loss and inconvenience suffered by your Petitioners, and consequently adds to their discontent.

That your Petitioners feel convinced that a Judge, if making periodical visits from Sydney, must necessarily spend nearly the whole of his time in travelling from place to place, owing to the very extensive tract of country to be travelled over. That, whatever may be the pecuniary loss to the legal profession in Sydney, your Petitioners consider themselves entitled to the services of a Resident Judge, believing that by no other means can the suppression of crime in the Murrumbidgee District be successfully accomplished.

Your Petitioners therefore humbly pray, that a Bill for the establishment of Civil and Criminal Courts at Albury, may receive the early consideration of your Honorable House, and that the question of appointing a Resident Judge may be also entertained in connection with the measure.

And your Petitioners will ever pray.

Legislative Assembly.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

DISTRICT COURT AT WAGGA WAGGA.

(PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 18 May, 1858.

To the Honorable the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales.

The humble Petition of the undersigned Inhabitants of the Police
District of Wagga Wagga,—

SHEWETH :—

That your Petitioners, appreciating the importance of the measure before your Honorable House for the establishment of District Courts, beg most respectfully to direct your attention to the necessity there exists for one of those Courts at Wagga Wagga.

That your Petitioners having in a former petition fully set forth the great advantage to the community in the Southern Districts the establishment of a District Court in a central position would confer, beg most strongly to reiterate the superior claims of Wagga Wagga as a central place for a Court,—being in the middle of a large grazing and agricultural community; distant from Gundagai on the east 50 miles, from Tumut on the south-east 70 miles, from Albury, on the south, 85 miles, from the Billy Bong and Lower Murrumbidgee, on the west, about 60 miles, and from the “Levels” leading to Burrowa and Binalong, on the north, about 60 miles; all of which several places, as well as the whole course of the Lower Murrumbidgee and Murray to the Darling, would participate in the benefit of such a Court.

That the nearest Court, at Goulburn, is 183 miles distant, and consequently many offenders escape with impunity.

That the population of the Wagga Wagga District is rapidly increasing, from which respectable and intelligent jurors could at all times be impannelled for the trial of cases.

That the Court House at Wagga Wagga is so constructed as to admit of enlargement for the purpose of holding a District Court.

That, from its very central position, and being the great thoroughfare to the Colony of Victoria, via Deniliquin, together with its growing importance, the public convenience would be greatly benefited by a Court.

Your Petitioners, therefore, most humbly, yet earnestly pray, that your Honorable House will be pleased to consider the necessity for establishing such Court at Wagga Wagga.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Legislative Assembly.
NEW SOUTH WALES.

DISTRICT COURTS.

(PETITION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF AT YASS.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 4 June, 1858.

To the Honorable the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, in Parliament assembled.

The Petition of the undersigned Inhabitants of the Town and District of Yass,—

HUMBLY SHEWETH:—

That the central position of the Town of Yass, situated as it is in the midst of the surrounding Districts of Goulburn, Queanbeyan, Burrowa, and Gundagai, renders it a peculiarly proper place for the establishment of a District Court; and the circumstance of there being a Court House and large lock-up already built in Yass, is an additional reason why such a Court should at once be established there.

That the population of the Districts of Yass, Queanbeyan, Burrowa, and Gundagai, amounted, according to the last Census (taken in 1856) to 7,687 souls; and that much inconvenience is felt by the inhabitants of those districts in having to prosecute criminals and recover any debts amounting to more than £10, at Goulburn—the nearest Assize Town.

That the great expense attendant upon criminal prosecutions, when the offenders are tried at Goulburn, frequently deters parties from prosecuting in cases of felony, and not unfrequently induces persons to commit crimes which they know are not likely to be prosecuted, for the above reason; and your Petitioners cannot too earnestly impress upon your Honorable House the necessity which they feel exists for giving to the District Courts Bill now before the Assembly an extensive criminal as well as civil jurisdiction; for they feel assured, that without the former the Bill will be shorn of more than half its advantages; and with respect to the extent of civil jurisdiction to be conferred, your Petitioners respectfully submit that such jurisdiction should not be less than £200, as originally proposed by your Honorable House. Your Petitioners further respectfully suggest, that a clause be inserted in the District Courts Bill enabling the wives of plaintiffs and defendants to give evidence on behalf of their husbands, whose just claims are frequently defeated by the absence of such a provision in the present law of evidence; and, although your Petitioners are aware that a Bill is now before the Legislative Council which has for its object the admission of the evidence of wives on behalf of their husbands, your Petitioners see no reason why (in the present state of the business before your Honorable House, and in the uncertainty which must attend the passing of that Bill in so short a Session as the present is likely to be,) the clause above suggested should not at once, as was done in the late Masters' and Servants' Act, (which has been found to work well in that respect,) be added to the provisions of the District Courts Bill, which your Petitioners earnestly hope may be perfected during the present Session of your Honorable House.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

Legislative Assembly.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

DISTRICT COURTS.

(PETITION FROM CERTAIN COLONISTS IN THE SOUTHERN DISTRICTS.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 2 November, 1858.

To the Honorable the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales.

Petition of the undersigned Colonists,—

SHEWETH :—

1. That your Petitioners have to deplore the many and great impediments thrown in the way of the public in these districts in the attempts made to prosecute parties suspected and accused of crime.

2. That these impediments arise in consequence of the very long distance which the Courts of Assize and of Quarter Sessions are held, viz., in the town of Goulburn.

3. That Goulburn is distant from Deniliquin 400 miles, from Moama 450 miles, from the Moulamein 470 miles, from Balranald 520 miles, and the outlying portions of the Police Districts above-named are proportionably further from Goulburn than these townships.

4. That the journeys to Goulburn to carry out the law against criminals committed for trial prove seriously, and oftentimes ruinously, expensive to prosecutors and witnesses in these districts, and that in a large number of instances parties will not prosecute, and quietly submit to being robbed and otherwise seriously injured in property and person rather than undergo the perils and expenses of a journey to Goulburn to prosecute.

5. That there are now residing in these districts about 4,000 persons.

6. That in this great extent of country, in a population so scattered, many badly disposed persons secrete themselves, some of whom are charged with the highest crimes against life and property, and that of late several desperate characters, who for a long time eluded justice, have been apprehended here.

7. That in the preliminary judicial investigations before the various Benches of Magistrates, your Petitioners have discovered on many occasions an utter reluctance on the part of prosecutors and witnesses to give direct evidence against accused parties, in consequence of the fear attendant on a journey to Goulburn; that, therefore, this obstacle has a demoralizing influence, inasmuch as the truth is often on oath denied or evaded.

8. That, not only do these evils entail great expenses on private persons, as prosecutors and witnesses, but the public also suffer hereby, inasmuch as parties summarily convicted before the local Benches have to be sent to Goulburn at an enormous cost.

9. That in consequence of the continuance of these evils, for many years past there has been a growing discontent in the minds of many of the well-disposed ; that this discontent has extended in too many cases to disaffection to the Government of New South Wales, as at present constituted, because the disaffected conceive that their wants are totally disregarded, and that they do not enjoy that protection to which as British subjects they are entitled.

10. That your Petitioners, while they share in this discontent, they do not participate in the disaffection, because they are satisfied that your Honorable House has the power and will to do justice to all classes, however remotely situated from the seat of Government.

11. That your Petitioners have looked with unfeigned pleasure on the inauguration of Responsible Government in the Colony, in the certain hope that the evils of which your Petitioners now so loudly complain will receive speedy attention, and proper remedies be forthwith applied.

12. That Deniliquin is distant from Moama, 50 miles, from the Moulamein 70 miles, and from the extreme boundary of New South Wales in this direction 270 miles.

13. That the whole of the Billabong District, extending to the Murrumbidgee and up the river last named, and around a large tract of country towards the Upper Murray, are within easy distance of Deniliquin ; that, therefore, your Petitioners submit to your Honorable House that Deniliquin is admirably and centrally situated for the purpose of holding superior Courts of Justice, and that the local advantages far outweigh those offered by any other town in this great district.

Your Petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that your Honorable House will, with all reasonable despatch, sanction the establishment at Deniliquin of Courts embracing criminal and civil jurisdiction.

(PEARCE v. BAYLY.)

PROGRESS REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE of the Legislative Assembly appointed on the 18th February, 1858, "to inquire into the state of the Magistracy of this Colony," and to whom were referred on the 22nd July last, "a copy of the Proceedings in the case of Pearce v. Bayly, tried before the Bench of Magistrates at Liverpool, in November, 1857," have agreed to the following Progress Report,—

Your Committee deem it their duty to bring the facts connected with this case immediately under the notice of your Honorable House, as they not only serve to indicate the state of the Magistracy in certain instances, but also illustrate the dilatoriness of the Government in dealing with such cases, even so far as mere investigation is concerned. Vide proceedings in the case appended.

The Attorney General, on the part of the Government, called for these proceedings on the 7th of December last, and they were transmitted to him from the Police Office at Liverpool on the following day. But although very nearly nine months have since elapsed, no further action, according to the evidence of *Mr. Plunkett, Secretary to the Crown Law Officers, (hereunto appended) has been since taken in the matter. *Vide evidence appended.

These facts appear to your Committee to demand immediate attention, for they serve to prejudice the public interest, and bring the administration of justice into disregard.

T. A. MURRAY,
Chairman.

Legislative Assembly Chamber,

PROCEEDINGS OF THE COMMITTEE.

(EXTRACT.)

FRIDAY, 3 SEPTEMBER, 1858.

Members Present :—

The Honorable T. A. Murray, Esquire, in the Chair.

Mr. Forster, | Mr. Piddington,
 Mr. Egan.

* * * * *

By direction of the Chairman, Resolutions of the House referring to the Committee, on 22nd July last.

"A copy of the Proceedings in the case of Pearce v. Bayly, tried before the Bench
" of Magistrates at Liverpool, in November, 1857."

on 27th ultimo,—

"A copy of the Report of the Commission appointed by the Government to inquire into the conduct of Charles Luke Bayly, Esquire, J.P.,"—moved for by Mr. Forster, under a Resolution agreed to by the Committee, on the 21st July last.—

read by the Clerk.

Committee deliberated.

Certain of the documents attached to the "inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Bayly" having been read by the Chairman, the subject matter therein was found to be irrelevant to the proceedings in the case of Pearce v. Bayly.

The Chairman having then laid before the Committee,—Letter from C. Luke Bayly, Esquire, J.P., dated 21st ultimo, requesting to be heard by the Committee prior to their consideration of, and decision respecting, the depositions in the case of Pearce v. Bayly,—

Read the same.

Deliberation continued.

Motion made (Mr. Forster) and Question—"That it is expedient that the immediate attendance of the Secretary to the Crown Law Officers be requested, for the purpose of ascertaining whether any action has been taken by the Executive Government with respect to the case of Pearce v. Bayly, since the 8th December last"—agreed to.

Mr. W. E. Plunkett, Secretary to the Crown Law Officers, examined.

Committee then Resolved :—

“(1.) That this Committee having taken into consideration the proceedings before “ the Bench of Magistrates at Liverpool in the case of Pearce v. Bayly, and,
“ having examined the Secretary to the Crown Law Officers, are of opinion “ that the conduct of the Government in neglecting to take further action
“ with respect to this matter ought to be immediately brought under the notice “ of the House, inasmuch as such neglect is calculated to prejudice the public “ interest, and bring the administration of justice into contempt.

" (2.) That the purport of this Resolution be embodied in a Progress Report.

" (3.) That such Progress Report be brought up, and laid upon the Table of the " House by the Chairman this day.

" (4) That the Chairman do give notice that he will move for the adoption of the " said Report, and that an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor
" General, transmitting a copy of the same."

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE

THE SELECT COMMITTEE

ON THE

STATE OF THE MAGISTRACY.

(PEARCE v. BAYLY.)

FRIDAY, 3 SEPTEMBER, 1858.

Present :—

MR. EGAN,
MR. FORSTER,MR. MURRAY,
MR. PIDDINGTON.

T. A. MURRAY, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

William Edward Plunkett, Esq., called in and examined :—

1. By the Chairman: You are Secretary to the Attorney General? I am Secretary to the Crown Law Officers.
2. Have you any knowledge of the case of Pearce v. Bayly, which you see on record in a paper ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be printed, 22nd July, 1858? I am aware of the correspondence which took place on the subject, and a copy of the whole correspondence relating to the charge of assault I believe was furnished to the Committee.
3. What correspondence took place in reference to this case of Pearce v. Bayly? The circumstance was reported to the Attorney General, among other statements made respecting Mr. Bayly's conduct, and a copy of the proceedings was written for.
4. That is the answer to the letter written on the subject? (Referring to Captain Moore's letter of 8th December, 1857.) Yes, that is the reply.
5. Did you write the letter applying for a copy of the proceedings? Yes.
6. That is Captain Moore's answer, forwarding the proceedings? Yes.
7. What was done subsequently to that? I did not bring the whole of the papers with me to refresh my memory.
8. We wish to know whether anything was done? No further notice was taken by the Government, that I am aware.
9. The proceedings were received in December last? About that time.
10. And nothing more has been done? No.
11. There has been no further correspondence? No.
12. No action has been taken? No action has been taken by the Government, that I am aware of.
13. Do you think it likely that any action could have been taken without your knowledge? The Attorney General said it would be desirable to have the matter brought under the notice of the Executive, and instructed me, I believe—I speak from recollection—to write to the Bench for a copy of the proceedings, or the original proceedings. Captain Moore forwarded the proceedings to the office, with the view, I believe, of the papers being placed before the Executive. They were laid before the Attorney General, and I am not aware that anything more was done.
14. You are not aware whether they were ever laid before the Executive Council? I think not.

Charles Luke Bayly charged with assaulting and beating one Thomas Pearce, on the 20th day of November last.—Pleads guilty.

Thomas Pearce, of Liverpool, in the Colony of New South Wales, butcher, being duly sworn, on oath states:—

I have heard the information now read in Court; it is true; Mr. Bayly was in a state of intoxication at the time; when I left the place he followed me and spit in my face again; when I went to leave the place altogether, Mr. Bayly shut the door and would not let me out, until Mr. Andrews ordered him to leave the place.

By Mr. Bayly: I state you were intoxicated; I know you were because of your manner, because you could not walk straight; this occurred at the bar of Andrews' Hotel; when you left the bar I saw you walking round Mr. Andrews' sitting-room; you followed me into the bar; you were standing in the street at Andrews' gate, going into the parlour.

By the Bench: I was perfectly sober at the time; Mr. Bayly staggered when he walked across the room; this took place about half-past two o'clock in the afternoon.

John Andrews, in the Colony of New South Wales, publican, being duly sworn, on oath states:—

By the Bench: I recollect the 20th of last month; Mr. Thomas Pearce was at my house in the afternoon somewhere about 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon; I saw Mr. Bayly spit in Mr. Thomas Pearce's face several times without any provocation being given by Mr. Thomas Pearce; this occurred in the tap room; not any other persons present; Mr. Pearce got over the railing which divides the tap room from the parlour and Mr. Bayly followed him into the private room attached to the bar, and attempted or did close the door in fact to prevent Mr. Pearce going out; I was in the room; Mr. Pearce took a poker up to defend himself; I before insisted that the door should be opened; I then opened the door; I saw Mr. Bayly again spit in Mr. Pearce's face; Mr. Pearce afterwards went out; Mr. Bayly was not quite sober, he had a little drink; the plaintiff first entered the bar followed shortly afterwards by the defendant; I did not supply the defendant with any drink during the time that Mr. Pearce was there; I do not recollect Mr. Bayly calling for a glass of brandy; I have not the recollection of serving it.

By Mr. Bayly: I do not recollect serving him with any thing at all; by your manner I considered you to be slightly intoxicated.

SECOND PROGRESS REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE of the Legislative Assembly, appointed on the 18th May, 1858, "to inquire into the State of the Magistracy of this Colony," and who, on the 3rd September last, brought up "a Progress Report in reference to the case of Pearce v. Your Committee beg to lay before your Honorable House a Letter addressed by the Reverend C. F. D. Priddle, of Liverpool, to the Clerk of the Assembly, on the 5th ultimo, requesting to be allowed the sum of £2 by way of compensation for certain expenses incurred by him in attending upon three different occasions, when summoned, for the purpose of giving evidence before your Committee.

As the ruling† of the Speaker on the 19th August last, with respect to the bearing of the 44th Section of the Standing Orders, precludes your Committee from awarding payment of expenses to an ordinary witness, summoned in an ordinary way, merely to give evidence, they deem it expedient to bring Mr. Priddle's application under the consideration of your Honorable House.

STATE OF THE MAGISTRACY.

FINAL REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE of the Legislative Assembly, appointed on the 18th May, 1858, "to inquire into the State of the Magistracy of this Colony," and to whom were referred, on the 13th July last, "Return to Address in reference to cases in which the Attorney General declined to prosecute;" on the 15th July last, "Return to Order in reference to Arthur E. Halloran, Esquire;" on the 22nd July last, "A copy of the Proceedings in the case of Pearce v. Bayly, tried before the Bench of Magistrates at Liverpool in November, 1857;" on the 27th July last, "the Petition of Mr. E. B. Uhr, J.P.," "in reference to the conduct of Arthur E. Halloran, Esquire, J.P.;" on the 27th August last, "Return to Address in reference to the Inquiry into the conduct of Charles Luke Bayly, Esquire, J.P.,"—have agreed to the following Final Report:—

It appears from the evidence before your Committee that the principal portion of the judicial business of the Colony is transacted in the Police Courts; that the great mass of the people, and especially the poorer classes, are dependent on those Courts for the administration of justice; and that the cases tried in them are as important to the parties concerned as those of the higher Courts are to the litigants therein.

It appears also that while there are checks on the administration of justice in the higher Courts in which Judges of high education and great legal attainments preside, and where a watchful bar is in attendance, no corresponding checks exist in the Police Courts in which Magistrates—in some instances but indifferently if at all qualified for the office they fill—exercise summary jurisdiction, a power unknown to the common law, with which the Judges of even the Supreme Court are never invested.

In the Police Courts the Magistrates adjudicate in cases under the Small Debts Act, the Tenements Recovery Act, the Deserted Wives and Children's Act, the Master and Servants' Act, the Impounding Act, the Scab in Sheep Act, the Cattle Stealing Prevention Act, the Publicans' Licensing Act, &c., &c. They fine and imprison, and in themselves constitute judge and jury; yet their responsibility is so slight, that His Honor the Chief Justice regards it as a mere nothing unless they exceed their jurisdiction.

Under such circumstances, it is obvious that the office of Justice of the Peace is a most important one; and that scrupulous care should be taken that the gentlemen placed in it should be unexceptionable in character and ability. And this seems the more necessary when it is considered that they are liable, especially in the Country Districts, to the bias of their own general interest in many of the cases they decide—such as those between Masters and Servants, and under the Impounding Act—and may be regarded in such instances, according to the evidence of the Chief Justice, as to some extent Judges in their own cause.

But, although favorable opinions were expressed by many of the witnesses, of the Magistrates as a body, it appears to your Committee that sufficient care has not been uniformly exercised in the selections made for the Commission of the Peace; that, on the contrary, persons have, in some instances, under all Governments, but more so of late years than formerly, been appointed as much by way of compliment to themselves or their friends as from any other consideration.

Nor has the system of Responsible Government effected any improvement in this respect. Notwithstanding that the Commission of the Peace already comprised the names of 600 or 700 gentlemen, three hundred and ninety-one have been added since the inauguration of our new regime,—of these 174 were appointed by Sir W. Parker, and 210 by the present Government. It is alleged that political considerations have led to several of these appointments. This may be regarded as to some extent proved by the fact which comes within within the knowledge of your Committee, that during a late administration 14 gentlemen in one district were placed in the Commission on the recommendation of one Member of Parliament

Under these circumstances, the general character of the Magistracy may reasonably be regarded as impaired by injudicious appointments. Sir Alfred Stephen stated in his evidence, that he had "repeatedly seen persons sworn in whom he thought, "judging by their appearance, manner, and style of reading, to be utterly inadequate in "point of education, and to be of an inferior grade generally." He added, "that the bad "appointments of late years—say the last five—had been worse than all those made in the "previous fourteen"; and that he had known "two instances of habitual drunkards on the "Bench, of whom he had seen one in that state in the streets." Mr. Justice Therry said, he "had seen persons sworn in who could not read very well, and whose educational "attainments were of very humble pretensions." Judge Dickinson, "that he had on "several occasions, not in a great many, but on several occasions, more so lately than "formerly, been struck with the deficiencies of the Magistrates in point of education, "by the manner in which they read the oaths." He added, he had seen gentlemen of this class "whose whole demeanour betokened inferiority." These remarks, however, apply to particular cases. Their Honors expressed favorable opinions of the Magistrates generally; but as was urged by Sir Alfred Stephen, "one decidedly bad appointment "to the Magistracy in a district, is highly prejudicial, and tends to bring the whole body "into disesteem. It has the further effect of alienating the more competent and more "respectable portion of the Magistrates from their duties; and it is quite impossible not "to have observed that the instances referred to have already tended to lower the estimate "in which the Magistracy as a body should be held."

That this result has followed in many districts is shewn by the evidence. Judge Therry states that "there is great distrust in the Benches on which such Magistrates appear—"that confidence in the Police Courts is thus destroyed." Mr. Owen says, "The Magistrates, "so far as I can judge, have not the confidence of the public. The mode of appointment at "present is very unsatisfactory." Mr. Plunkett, "I think, looking to the body of the "Magistracy, there are as good Magistrates—men as of high qualifications for the office—"in this country, as in any part of the British dominions; but they are so diversified, and "so many persons not highly, or perhaps at all qualified for the office are among them, that "I do not think they are such altogether as to command the confidence to be wished in the "administration of justice." Mr. Deniehy states that "the decisions of the Justices in the "Police Courts are by no means satisfactory to the public at large." Mr. C. H. Walsh, that "generally speaking there is a want of confidence in the administration of justice by the "Magistrates."

Your Committee attribute this want of confidence to the disregard of the essential qualifications for the office which is manifest in several instances in the appointments made to the Commission of the Peace. The Minister of the day is doubtless, placed in an embarrassing position through the applications which pour in upon him under the present system. If he disregards the recommendations of Parliamentary supporters, he may lose votes in the House—if those of influential electors, possibly his next election.

But the administration of justice should not be dependent on such influences as these. The Courts of the country, high or low, should all bear the same character, and be such that the humblest individual could enter them with full confidence that every case in which he had an interest would be fairly, honestly, and ably dealt with. In so far, however, as undesirable appointments are made, is the risk of erroneous decisions multiplied.

And scrupulous care as to the appointments made seems the more necessary when it is considered that the administration of the law in the country districts by Justices of the Peace, even under favorable circumstances, although on the whole convenient, is nevertheless in itself, in some respects, liable to strong objection. To use the words of Mr. Owen,—“One "of the greatest evils which at present, as it appears to me, interferes with the proper course "of justice, is that the Magistrates sitting from day to day have all their local associations, "and are in some way or another immediately connected, in their business or in their family "relations, with a large proportion of the neighbourhood; and if it be that there are two "litigants, the one not within their circle and the other within it, the bias is, according to "the ordinary principles of human nature, in favour of their connexions or friends.”—“Another objection is, that gentlemen not possessing any legal attainments do not see the

"force of the objection which exists to any previous acquaintance with the matter in litigation; and it so happens that, from the peculiar position of the Magistracy at present existing, they generally obtain a previous knowledge of the matter that comes before the Court, and in a great number of cases it is privately discussed. The consequence is, that labor as you may, even with the advantages of legal assistance, the matter is decided before it comes into Court, without the parties knowing it, perhaps without the Magistrates being aware of it." In these opinions your Committee to a great extent concur; and they feel satisfied that these causes produce erroneous decisions in many instances. And it is to be remarked that redress under such circumstances is a matter of great difficulty to many of those against whom wrong judgments may have been given. The ordinary mode of obtaining it would be by writ of prohibition, but the expense of obtaining one ranges from £12 to £25 for each side. Mr. Owen adds:—"Unless corruption be shown against the Magistrates, the Judges do not visit them with the applicant's costs, although the application is successful. If the decision of the Bench be declared wrong, the applicant has still to pay heavy costs. A man in humble circumstances cannot therefore resist an erroneous judgment of any Bench." Sir Alfred Stephen says:—"The infrequency of appeals either to the Quarter Sessions or the Supreme Court against magisterial decisions, is no accurate test of the correctness of magisterial decisions; because the poverty, or ignorance, or indifference of parties in small cases, will naturally induce them to avoid litigation, even where they feel that the Magistrate is wrong. I know personally of some serious mistakes by Magistrates which have never come before the Court."

And—it is to be borne in mind—the very same causes which lead to injudicious and objectionable appointments, prevent the removal of persons from the Commission, however questionable their fitness or blameable their conduct may be. In fact it rarely happens that any man is superseded, even when there is good reason for it. From the returns laid before your Committee, it appears that only four writs of supersedeas have been issued since the commencement of Responsible Government. One of these occurred through insolvency—two of the other cases were brought under the notice of your Honorable House before the Government took action upon them. One of them was of a very serious nature, all the circumstances of which were communicated to the Attorney General in November, 1857; yet in this case the Magistrate concerned was retained in the Commission until your Committee, in September last, specially reported upon it, and brought the dilatoriness of the Government in regard to it prominently before you. The delay in this instance, to which your Committee need not now more particularly refer, clearly shows how necessary it is to guard "in limine" against objectionable appointments.

It is clear that the present system works badly—it is necessary, therefore, that it should be improved; but, though many suggestions have been made, your Committee have had some difficulty in adopting any one of them. All are liable to objection; but, after great consideration, they have agreed to the following recommendations as well worthy of attention, and, as likely to lead to improvement in the general character of the Magistracy as any that have been offered:—

- 1st. That the names of all gentlemen proposed for the Commission of the Peace shall be submitted to the Judges of the Supreme Court, for their opinion, previously to their appointments being submitted for final consideration by the Executive Government.
- 2nd. That a new Commission be issued at intervals of five years.
- 3rd. That it is inexpedient that legal practitioners, or persons in the employment of others, should be placed in the Commission of the Peace.
- 4th. That mere social position constitutes no reason for placing in the Commission of the Peace persons who in character and education are not clearly eligible for the office, or for excluding those who are known to be eligible in these respects.

With respect to the case of Mr. O'Halloran and Mr. Uhr's Petition thereupon, which were specially referred to them, your Committee are of opinion that the subject matter of the complaint and Petition came properly under the cognizance of the Executive Government, by whom it has already been decided.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

The Hon. T. A. Murray, Esquire, in the Chair.

Mr. Forster,	Mr. Jones,
Mr. Marks,	Mr. Egan,
Mr. Parkes.

The Chairman laid before the Committee a letter from Mr. H. M. Oxley, from Wingecarribbee, Berrima, dated 6th instant, containing certain observations relative to the state of the Magistracy of the Colony.

Ordered to be printed in Appendix. (Vide "Separate Appendix A.")

Mr. D. H. Deniehy, M. P., and

Dr. Goodwin, of Scone, examined.

And Dr. Goodwin, in the course of his examination, entering into certain charges of a private nature against the Bench of Magistrates at Scone;—

Mr. Jones, a Member of the Committee, called attention thereto, and requested the opinion of the Committee as to the propriety of admitting evidence of a private nature, such as that now given by Dr. Goodwin, into an inquiry appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the state of the Magistracy generally.

Committee thereupon deliberated,—and being of opinion that it would be inexpedient to receive the evidence of Dr. Goodwin as to any private charges such as those now preferred by him, inasmuch as such charges ought properly to be made to the Executive Government;—

The Chairman informed Dr. Goodwin to this effect, and directed him to confine his evidence to the state of the Magistracy of the Colony generally.

Dr. Goodwin's examination then continued.

At the close of his examination, witness withdrew.

The Chairman then, at the request of the Committee, directed the Short-hand Writer in attendance (Mr. Palmer) to read from his notes the evidence of Dr. Goodwin as taken by him,—and

Mr. Palmer read such evidence accordingly,—

And it appearing that portions thereof, at the commencement, entered into charges of a private nature against certain Magistrates,—

Committee deliberated, and it was Resolved:—

"That the Short-hand Writer do strike out such portions of Dr. Goodwin's evidence
"as shall appear to him to have a tendency to enter upon private charges; but "shall retain, as evidence, that portion which bears upon the state of the "Magistracy of the Colony generally."

Ordered

Ordered to be printed in Appendix. (Vide "Separate Appendix D.")

The Chairman then laid before the Committee a letter from Mr. G. T. Rowe, dated 5th instant, requesting the omission from the evidence given by him on the 29th ultimo of the latter part of his answer to the last question, and desired the opinion of the Committee as to the expediency of allowing such omission.

Committee deliberated, and it was Resolved :—

"That as the part of the answer referred to relates to a personal matter, which Mr. Rowe has since ascertained to have been incorrectly stated by him, it is expedient to comply with that gentleman's request, and omit the same therefrom."

[Adjourned till Wednesday next, at Eleven o'clock.]

FRIDAY, 3 SEPTEMBER, 1858.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

The Hon. T. A. Murray, Esquire, in the Chair.

Mr. Forster,

Mr. Piddington,

Mr. Egan.

By direction of the Chairman, Resolution of the House referring to the Committee,—

On 27th ultimo "a Petition from E. B. Uhr, Esquire, J.P., complaining of having been insulted on the Bench by A. E. Halloran, Esquire, Commissioner of Crown Lands for the District of Wide Bay and Burnett, and praying redress;"—

read by the Clerk.

The Chairman then stated that he had caused the meeting of the Committee to be convened for this day for the purpose of considering the course to be pursued with respect to this Petition, and certain other documents referred to the Committee.

Petition then read by the Chairman.

Committee deliberated thereupon.

Motion made and Question put—"That this Committee are of opinion that the subject matter of Mr. Uhr's petition comes properly under the cognizance of the Executive Government, whose decision has already been given upon it."
Committee divided.

Ayes, 2.
Mr. Piddington,
Mr. Egan,

Mr. Forster.

By direction of the Chairman, Resolutions of the House referring to the Committee, on 22nd July last,—

"A copy of the Proceedings in the case of Pearce v. Bayly, tried before the Bench of Magistrates at Liverpool, in November, 1857 ;"

on 27th ultimo,—

"A copy of the Report of the Commission appointed by the Government to inquire into the conduct of Charles Luke Bayly, Esquire, J.P.,"—moved for by Mr. Forster, under a Resolution agreed to by the Committee, on the 21st July last,—

read by the Clerk.

Committee deliberated.

Certain of the documents attached to the "inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Bayly" having been read by the Chairman, the subject matter therein was found to be irrelevant to the proceedings in the case of Pearce v. Bayly.

The Chairman having then laid before the Committee,—Letter from C. Luke Bayly, Esquire, J.P., dated 21st ultimo, requesting to be heard by the Committee prior to their consideration of, and decision respecting, the depositions in the case of Pearce v. Bayly,—read the same.

Deliberation continued.

Motion made (Mr. Forster) and Question—"That it is expedient that the immediate attendance of the Secretary to the Crown Law Officers be requested, for the purpose of ascertaining whether any action has been taken by the Executive Government with respect to the case of Pearce v. Bayly, since the 8th December last"—agreed to.

Deliberation further continued.

Mr. W. E. Plunkett, Secretary to the Crown Law Officers, examined.

Committee then Resolved :—

- "(1.) That this Committee having taken into consideration the proceedings before the Bench of Magistrates at Liverpool in the case of Pearce v. Bayly, and, having examined the Secretary to the Crown Law Officers, are of opinion that the conduct of the Government in neglecting to take further action with respect to this matter ought to be immediately brought under the notice of the House, inasmuch as such neglect is calculated to prejudice the public interest, and bring the administration of justice into contempt.
- "(2.) That the purport of this Resolution be embodied in a Progress Report.
- "(3.) That such Progress Report be brought up, and laid upon the Table of the House by the Chairman this day.
- "(4.) That the Chairman do give notice that he will move for the adoption of the said Report, and that an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting a copy of the same.

The Chairman then laid before the Committee,—Letter from J. Busby, Esquire, dated 30th ultimo, complaining of the conduct of the Bench of Magistrates at Durham, in refusing his application to have the lease of one of his tenants cancelled, who had been guilty of a breach of covenant and non-payment of his rent, without his giving 6 months notice to such tenant.

Committee deliberated, and it was Resolved :—

- "(1.) That in the opinion of this Committee the matter complained of in Mr. Busby's communication is not within the scope of their inquiry, and cannot therefore be entertained by them without its special reference for that purpose."
- "(2.) That Mr. Busby be informed to this effect."

The Chairman also laid before the Committee letter, without name or date, giving a biographical sketch of the various Magistrates on the Macleay River Bench.

Committee further deliberated.

[Adjourned]

TUESDAY, 2 NOVEMBER, 1858.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

The Hon. T. A. Murray, Esquire, in the Chair.

Mr. Forster, | Mr. Piddington.

By direction of the Chairman,—Resolution of the House moving that the following Papers, viz :—

Depositions taken in Police Court of Mudgee in the cases of—

1. Turvey v. Caplin.
2. Caplin v. Inder.
3. Inder v. Harris.
4. Regina v. Turvey.
5. Also, a receipt from Turvey to Inder.

6. Receipt from Mills (for Harris) to Caplin.
 7. Letter of the Attorney General to Bench of Mudgee, respecting the above-mentioned cases.
 8. The Letters of Dr. Harris to the Colonial Secretary, respecting the above-mentioned cases.
 9. Affidavit of J. W. Devereaux, verifying certain facts.
 10. All other Papers and Communications relating to these cases;—
- be laid upon the Table of the House, with a view to their being then referred to the Committee,—read by the Clerk.

Mr. William Elyard, Principal Under Secretary, examined.

Witness withdrew.

And Mr. Elyard having informed the Committee, during the course of his examination, that Mr. Charles Luke Bayly had been removed, by the Executive Government, from his office of Justice of the Peace,— Committee thereupon deliberated as to the necessity, in such event, of moving for the Adoption of the Progress Report made by them to the House on the 3rd September last.

Motion made (Mr. Forster) and Question—“That the final decision relative to this “matter be deferred until the next meeting of the Committee”—agreed to.

The Chairman then laid before the Committee,—Letter from the Reverend C. F. D. Priddle, who was examined before the Committee on 21st July last, to the Clerk of the Assembly, dated, Liverpool, 5th October, 1858, requesting payment of certain expenses, amounting to £2, incurred by him in attending on three occasions for the purpose of giving such evidence,—

Committee deliberated, and it was Resolved :—

“That the Chairman do move in the House, as a matter of Order, that the letter “be referred to the Standing Orders Committee for their consideration and “Report.”

Committee then deliberated as to the expediency of taking further evidence, or of at once Reporting to the House, and it was Resolved :—

“1. That sufficient evidence has already been taken for the purposes of this “inquiry.”

“2. That a meeting of the Committee be convened for to-morrow, to consider the “expediency of at once Reporting to the House, and as to what should be the “nature of such Report.”

The Chairman desired the opinion of the Committee as to the advisability of moving that Mr. Plunkett be added to the Committee in the room of Mr. Parkes; and, it was Resolved :—

“That the Chairman do move in the House, That Mr. Plunkett be appointed a “Member of the Committee, in the room of Mr. Parkes.”

Mr. Charles Luke Bayly, who was duly summoned before the Committee, as a Witness, for this day, was not in attendance in answer such summons.

[Adjourned till to-morrow, at half-past Eleven o'clock.]

WEDNESDAY, 3 NOVEMBER, 1858.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

The Hon. T. A. Murray, Esquire, in the Chair.

Mr. G. Macleay,
Mr. Piddington,

Mr. Forster,
Mr. Egan,

Mr. Deniehy.

Committee further deliberated as to the necessity of moving for the adoption of the Progress Report made to the House on the 3rd September last in reference to the case of Mr. Charles Luke Bayly.

Motion made (Mr. Forster) and Question proposed—“That the Chairman be “requested to move in the House for the adoption of the Progress Report of 3rd September “last.”

Committee deliberated.

Question put.

Committee divided.

Mr. Forster,
Mr. Piddington,
Mr. G. Macleay,
Mr. Deniehy.

No, 1.

Mr. Egan.

Committee then deliberated as to the heads of Final Report.

Deliberation adjourned.

The Chairman requested the Committee to reconsider a Resolution agreed to by them yesterday, in reference to the application made by the Reverend C. F. D. Priddle for payment of certain expenses incurred by him in attending for the purpose of giving evidence before the Committee, as it appeared that it was incompetent for them to bring the matter under the notice of the House in the manner determined on therein.

Committee thereupon deliberated, and it was Resolved :—

“1. That it is expedient that the letter from the Reverend C. F. D. Priddle should “be laid upon the Table of the House, inasmuch as the ruling of the Speaker “on the 19th August last, with respect to the bearing of the 44th section of “the

- " the Standing Orders, precludes the Committee from awarding payment of " expenses to an ordinary witness, summoned in an ordinary way, merely to
 " to give evidence.
 " 2. That the purport of this Resolution be embodied in a Second Progress Report.
 " 3. That such Report be forthwith brought up, and laid upon the Table of the " House, and a motion made to the effect that the same be referred to the " Standing Orders Committee."

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE

THE SELECT COMMITTEE

ON THE

STATE OF THE MAGISTRACY.

TUESDAY, 1 JUNE, 1858.

Present:—

MR. MURRAY,
MR. FORSTER,
MR. MARKS,MR. PIDDINGTON,
MR. LEE,
MR. PARKES.

T. A. MURRAY, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

His Honor Mr. Justice Therry, M.L.C., called in and examined:—

1. By the Chairman: You are, I believe, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court? Yes.
2. In your capacity as a Judge, you have had frequent opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the state of the magistracy in the Colony? Yes; I have had considerable opportunity.
3. And what is your opinion of the body, generally? There are some very good, useful, and competent magistrates; but, I think, there are some who do not merit that character.
4. Have you been of opinion for some time that it is desirable, as a body, that the magistracy should be reformed? I think there is much need of revision and reformation. I think the mode of appointment is not satisfactory. I believe the mode of appointment of magistrates is embarrassing to the Government and unsatisfactory for the purpose of a judicious selection. It is, moreover, an increasing embarrassment, because, under the present state of our Government—the Ministers having the power and right of appointment, it is with great difficulty they can refuse an application enforced by the recommendation of their political supporters. I say this of course with indifference as to whether one party or not is in power. I think it is difficult for any party in power to refuse applications that may be thus pressed upon them.
5. Do you think the state of the magistracy about ten or twenty years ago was better? I think it was much better. I am speaking from an experience of nearly thirty years in the Colony. I believe, from what I can recollect, that the appointments were considered more satisfactory, and inspired more confidence, although, no doubt, from the vast power the magistrates had formerly, there were many things to disapprove of. I think greater care and attention was paid to the appointments, and they inspired more confidence in the community.
6. Do you think—suppose we take the days of Sir Richard Bourke—that the magistracy was in a more satisfactory state? I think it was; and also in Sir George Gipps' time. General Darling and Sir R. Bourke had opportunities of making very good selections from the many experienced military officers who were scattered in detachments over the Colony. These advantages subsequent Governors did not possess. I think Responsible Government has increased the difficulty of the Government in appointing men eligible for the office, solely on account of their fitness for the office.
7. Do you think the magistracy declined in character during the administration of Sir Charles Fitz Roy? I do.
8. From your observation of the working of the magistracy, do you think there has been any improvement since Responsible Government was introduced? I cannot say there has.

has. A great number of the adherents and friends of those who have been, or are in power, have been placed in the Commission. The Committee must bear in mind, that in general estimation to be in the Commission of the Peace is considered a decisive test of belonging to the rank of a gentleman. In fact it occurred to me, that it was somewhat like the principle that prevails in vaccination. It is believed that if a person be once vaccinated, he will never get the small-pox; and so, once the aspirant for the office gets appointed a magistrate, he will be made a gentleman evermore. If he fails in getting that appointment, he is often doubtful of his occupying that position.

9. Have you had an opportunity of observing at all what effect some of these appointments have had on the great mass of the population in the country districts? Great distrust in the Benches on which such magistrates appear; the consequence is, that parties endeavour to settle their disputed matters as best they can amongst themselves without appealing to the proper tribunal.

10. The confidence in minor courts is thus destroyed? Yes; and I have heard such expressions used as "I would go anywhere rather than before such or such a Bench of Magistrates."

11. Do you think since Responsible Government was introduced that the character of the magistracy has deteriorated? I think since Responsible Government has been introduced some very injudicious appointments have been made.

12. By all the Ministries? Yes. It is, in my opinion, attributable to the system, not to Ministers in particular.

13. Has it come to your knowledge that some statement was made in the House of Assembly, to the effect that Members were the proper persons to recommend gentlemen to be magistrates? Yes, I know that is the opinion of many; but I do not consider it a correct one. At the same time, I think a Member of a constituency is entitled to recommend, and his recommendations ought to be paid the respect and attention due to his position. The difficulty and disadvantage of the Minister appointing at the recommendation of a Member of Parliament, appear to me to lie in this:—that it often places both the Minister and Member in a position of great embarrassment. The Minister is reluctant to refuse the recommendation of a political adherent, and as to the Member, there are persons amongst his constituency who, knowing that his recommendation will be attended to, urge him to make such recommendation, without due consideration of their own fitness for the office—of the public exigency requiring the appointment,—or any other consideration but their own self advancement. It struck me—I think a judicious mode of appointment would be one of this nature. When an application is made for the office, the party making the application, or the party who recommended it, should transmit to the Minister of the day testimonials of the qualifications of the candidate—such as his educational attainments, property, and general qualities of fitness for office. The Minister should then forward this to the Minister of Justice, if there were one—if not, to the Judges of the Supreme Court; and upon their review of these testimonials, or such inquiry as they may think proper to institute, they might veto the appointment, or approve of it. You have no person here like the Lord Chancellor, or Minister of Justice; if you had any person independent of political influences, he would be the fittest person to make this appointment. I think this course might be taken in all cases. When the proposed appointment originates with the Minister, and he vouches of his own knowledge of the fitness of the party, and of the public requirement for his appointment, I apprehend no further testimonial would be required by the Judges. Greater caution would be required when the Minister is urged to act at the instance of others, and on behalf of parties of whom he has no personal knowledge.

14. You are not of opinion that it would be proper to take the appointment out of the hands of the Ministers? I don't think it would, altogether. I think the plan I have proposed would not take it altogether out of his hands. His approval from personal knowledge would invariably secure the approval of the Judges. It would thus in many instances, relieve the Minister, without depriving him of effectual power of making or procuring an appointment, whenever in his opinion it may be required. I speak of referring the testimonials to the Judges, in the absence of a Minister of Justice. I say, from their greater freedom from political influence, by reason of their position, they are in that respect, as it were, in the community though not of the community, by which I mean they are more exempt from popular influences to sway them than other persons, from the nature of their office. The mode I have ventured to point out would be, in my opinion, a relief to the Ministers themselves, because a Minister could say to the applicant, "I should be very glad to oblige you; I have submitted your qualifications to the Judges, and the answer is unfavorable," therefore, he could not then blame the Minister.

15. You think the Ministers of the day are influenced and subject to influences in the way of parliamentary support? I think they are, and they cannot be expected to be otherwise, from their position and the tenure of their office, which depends on the strength of their adherents.

16. Have they, in your opinion, given way under the influences which have been brought to bear? I should like to confine myself to the system, which I consider is bad, and not to the men who have exercised it, nor to instances of individual appointments; but, I believe injudicious appointments have been made, for the reasons I have suggested. And, moreover, I think, in such a state of things such appointments are unavoidable, be the Ministers who they may.

17. You are clearly of opinion that the present system does not work well? It does not work well, in my opinion.

18. You think it has tended to destroy confidence in the mass of the people with regard to the administration of justice by magistrates? I should rather say to weaken than destroy. My observations of the eligibility of some, 'tis true, arise from seeing some of those who have been sworn into office before the Supreme Court. So far as a man can judge of the appearance appearance and educational attainments from a hasty interview, there are some, certainly, whose appointment I have been somewhat surprised at, and some cases, also, within my more immediate knowledge, which I have been surprised at also.

19. Have you had instances of persons being sworn in who were not able to read properly? I have seen some who could not read very well, and whose educational attainments were, apparently, of very humble pretensions. The appointment of a magistrate is considered, I fear too much in this Colony, a stepping stone to rank. He feels it often raises him from a doubtful position—whether he be a gentleman or not—in which he was before, into an established and undoubted right to be regarded as one.

20. He is gazetted esquire for the first time in his life? Yes. I believe it is so in many instances.

21. You think the appointment should still rest with the Ministers of the Crown, subject to the recommendation of the Judges? In the manner in which I have suggested the testimonials should be forwarded to the Judges. The Judges have some opportunity on Circuit of becoming acquainted with intelligent persons fitted for the magisterial office, and in that way they might be able to recommend some persons themselves. The testimonials should be sent to the body of Judges, not to an individual Judge. I would only give this power to the Judges acting in their corporate capacity—the three Judges—acting collectively, not singly. I would not make the approval of the Judges so imperative on the Minister as that he should appoint if he were disposed to take on himself the responsibility of not confirming the appointment; but that would be, I apprehend, a case of rare occurrence.

22. You would not give this power to an individual Judge, but to all the Judges? Yes, as that would make them free from any unpleasantness in selecting one person in preference to another, and would impart a more judicial character to the appointment. In England the Sheriffs are selected at the instance of the Judges. The Judge on Circuit makes it part of his duty to inquire into the character of persons (three, I think, are named); he finds from their position, rank, property, and the confidence they enjoy in the neighbourhood, who are fit persons for the office of Sheriff, and he sends his returns to the Minister, who makes the choice. I think that in somewhat the same way the appointment, in some instances, might be made here. I think it would be a great relief to the Members of the Legislative Assembly and Legislative Council, and all persons in political position, to be able to say that it was not in their power to enforce their recommendation through political interest they may possess. It is unpleasant to them to have to say to a man that he is not fit for the office which he aspires to. There is an instance within my own knowledge where a Member was seriously affected in his election by injudicious selections, and by his recommendation of persons for the appointment—ill-qualified for it—in short, from the want of firmness to say no when he would, I think, have been wise to have done so.

23. How would you practically give effect to your recommendation? In the manner I suggested. If I were the Minister, I would say to the applying party (if a Member of Parliament, or indeed to any party)—“State the position of the candidate on whose behalf you apply; state what you conceive to be his educational attainments, and, from your knowledge, of him, the respect and esteem in which he is held in the country; and his general fitness for the duty.” The Member should forward this testimonial to the Minister, and he would transmit it to the Judges, for consideration. The Judges would consider these recommendations, and might avail themselves of any other opportunity they have of learning the fitness of the party, and say to the Minister they consider such an appointment desirable, or otherwise. I think that would be a practical mode of doing it. If there was a Lord Chancellor, or Minister of Justice, as in England, I would prefer that he should have this power. To the Judges it may, no doubt, be an unacceptable task; but, for the public good, in the present state of our society and Government, I should hope they may be induced not to decline it.

24. Would it be necessary to pass any Act to restrict the right of the Crown? No, I do not think so. The Crown has a right to exercise it in any way it likes.

25. It would not be necessary to frame any Act on the subject? It strikes me not, because they may adopt their own mode of selection. If you wanted to restrict the power, however, and say nobody can be appointed but in that way, of course you would require some measure of positive enactment for that purpose.

26. You would require an Act if you wanted to limit the right of the Ministry of the day, so that no appointment could take place except on the recommendation of the Judges? I think it questionable whether it would be advisable to pass so very restrictive an Act. It would perhaps suffice if by a well understood arrangement all proposed appointments were referred. If the Judges were referred to before the appointment was made, I think it would relieve the Minister of a load of responsibility. I think the Minister would hardly make the appointment after the Judges had said the person was unfit for the office. A case of this kind—that is a case of variance between the Judges and the Minister—is of so exceptional a character, and so little likely to occur, that I see no necessity for legislating in regard to it. The Judges would be surely slow to refuse their sanction to an appointment which the Minister assured them of his own knowledge was deemed requisite and advisable for the public service.

27. No doubt he would not appoint a person the Judges had declared to be unfit, but suppose he made the appointment without consulting the Judges? If the rule is to be of general benefit it should be of universal application, and a collision of the kind is so little likely to occur that I do not think it requisite to make any provision for such a case.

28. Do you think it would be desirable to adopt any mode of purifying the magistracy by the omission of names, particularly as occasions might render it desirable? It would be desirable but difficult—difficult by reason of the offence many omissions might give.

29. In England the course is to issue a new Commission, and leave out the names of those who are undesirable? It is so, I believe; yet I think it would be an ungracious act to have recourse recourse to such a course so soon after a general Commission has issued as the last one; yet it is not an easy matter to suggest how in any other way the revision and reformation, which I assume to be desirable, can take place.

30. What do you think of the suggestion made in the Bill introduced by Mr. Darvall some time ago,—that at the expiration of six months after the accession to office of each succeeding Governor or Governor General, the Commission of every unpaid Justice of the Peace in force at the time of such accession shall cease and determine? I think it would be an occasion on which there could be no objection to the issuing of a new Commission; but there are other occasions on which it might take place. In an ever changing state of society like ours, five years, or perhaps a less period, would be sufficient for the duration of a commission.

31. You think it would be a good occasion for making the revision? Yes.

32. If the new appointments were subject to revision by the Judges, do you think in that way we should have the body kept in a proper state? I think it would tend at least to a better and more impartial selection.

33. Just cast your eyes over this Bill of Mr. Darvall's. There are a few trivial alterations made to suit the case. If a Bill was passed in such a form as this, would it effect the object? I have not seen the Bill, but if you leave it with me, I will consider it.

34. It would be easy for the Minister of the day to secure the recommendation of the Judges? No doubt.

35. Do you know, as a fact, that our Ministers have given way under pressure of this kind? I cannot say I know it as a fact, (and I abstain from saying anything in respect to any particular set of Ministers,) but I have reason to believe such has been the case, and I think it is alike an unfair position to place the Minister and the Member in. We know that in small communities like those that exist in many electoral districts, an active bustling man has at an election more influence than any gentleman in the country. Now, that man may be a very fit person to promote one's election, but a very unfit person for a magistrate.

36. You spoke of the educational attainments of some magistrates being different to what they ought to be—have you had any cases under your notice of persons being in the Commission of the Peace who are at all noted for immoral conduct? There have been no doubt some such instances; but I wish to avoid individual references, such as the question suggests. I can state I only know it by rumour. I believe such has been—I will not say such is the case, though it may be so. I have very little opportunity of information on this point at present. There have been certainly well-established proofs of some magistrates appearing on the Bench in a state of inebriety. Such appearances must be fatal to confidence in the administration of justice.

37. By Mr. Forster: Is it your opinion that by the present state of deterioration to which you seem to think the magistracy has arrived, that really good and capable men are prevented from taking office? I believe it has that effect. There are some magistrates who are disposed to resign rather than be associated in the administration of justice with persons they think unfit for that office.

38. This would then have the effect of increasing the evil? Yes; because it would leave the unfit men in, and the fit men practically out of office. I know instances of gentlemen having the sentiments I am now expressing, and having acted on them.

39. I think I understand you to say that you blame the system more than the men who have been at the head of affairs? Yes; decidedly so.

40. Are you not also of opinion that even under the present system it would have been in the power of all administrations to have made a better choice if they had used the power really vested in them? I don't know how they have used the power with sufficient accuracy to pronounce an opinion upon that point. I should be slow to pronounce an expression of censure without knowing fully in what way they have exercised it. They may have been deceived; all I wish to convey is, that I think the present system on the points to which I have adverted itself is bad, and requires amendment.

41. You indicated that certain changes were desirable—was not the effect of your remarks that these changes could be carried out without a change of the law? I think it might, but if you wish to make it positive you must make a law to the effect I have suggested. If it were only done by arrangement you could not enforce it. If you wish to enforce it, you must have a law.

42. The changes you propose could be done by what is called constitutional arrangement—an arrangement sanctioned by the Assembly and agreed to by the Government—without an alteration in the law? I think it might, but not so completely as by a law; without a law there is nothing legally binding on the Ministry to observe it.

43. Do you think a resolution of the Assembly would have the effect? I am afraid not. A resolution of the Assembly is not a law, and cannot have the sanction of law.

44. You would have to make an alteration in the law, and agreed to by both Houses? Yes.

45. Do you think the Judges should submit the candidate for the office of magistrate to any examination? No, certainly not. I think no gentleman ought to be put to any examination.

46. Not before the Judges generally? No, certainly not. I never knew an instance of the kind in England. You must take the man's position—what you know of him—and the esteem he is held in by his neighbours. I beg to add, that I consider the recommendation of a Police Bench would be entitled to the greatest weight in making these appointments. The magistrates of a Bench uniting in a request that a particular person should be added to their number, and certifying to his fitness, would, in my judgment, be an admirable test of the fitness of such a person.

47. That is, the entire opinion of a Police Bench? Yes, unanimous if possible, or at least nearly so.

48. Suppose a change took place in the constitutional action of Responsible Government, so as to make the office of Attorney General permanent, and not attendant on political changes—do you think the Attorney General could be invested with such a power as you suggested?

suggested? I think he would, very properly, for in that position he might act as a Minister of Justice. I would, therefore, give him the power, and I only suggest a reference to the Judges because there is no such officer now.

49. You think, supposing the Attorney General was a permanent officer, that he would be a fit person to have this power entrusted to him? Yes, I think he would be a very fit person under such circumstances. He would be free from popular influences, to which all public officers going in and out with their party must in a greater or less degree be subjected. No man in a changeable position, subject to popular influences, can be as impartial as one would wish to see a public man to be who exercised the function of making such appointments.

50. In such a case the Attorney General could have the opinion of the Judges by having a conference with them? Yes; I think it might be so, but I should prefer entrusting the power alone to him; he would then have an undivided and sole responsibility. A conference such as is suggested for such purposes would, I fear, be attended with inconvenience.

51. With regard to the apparent want of confidence felt by the people generally in the decisions of the Benches of Magistrates in the interior, do you think the appointment of Police Magistrates has remedied the evil or restored the confidence of the people? I think the Police Magistrates are very useful and indispensable in some places. They generally inspire confidence, and are mostly well-selected. I am speaking of half a dozen I have at this moment in my mind.

52. Should you not think the position of a Police Magistrate, considering his appointment, and his not having local influences or connexions—should you not think, in general, that Police Magistrates would occupy a position that would render them of necessity more generally impartial than unpaid magistrates? Yes. I am of that opinion.

53. In that case you would consider that it would effect the objects of the Committee by rendering the appointment of Police Magistrates as general as circumstances would permit? I think so.

54. You think it would have a good effect? I think so. They are always on the spot and acting, as far as my observation of them has gone, from a sense of duty. They are paid for their labor, which stimulates them to perform their duty at all times and seasons. One is always sure of a Police Magistrate in the interior, but the other magistrates, who are obliged to attend to their local business, are not so constrained to attend to their magisterial duties. Besides, they have their pastoral or agricultural interests to attend to. I think the Police Magistrates are a very useful body of men, and have been always found to be so.

55. Would you not say, from the circumstance of their position, that their legal knowledge would be superior to unpaid magistrates? Yes, their study and business naturally make them so. It is their duty to be more acquainted with the law than unpaid magistrates.

56. By Mr. Marks: Do you think it desirable to substitute unpaid magistrates by paid magistrates? Certainly not. I should always like a gentleman to have the weight, influence, and position, his rank and the respect of his neighbours inspire.

57. What do you think should be the condition on which a Police Magistrate should be appointed,—what claim should he have in order to get that appointment? I think his general character, his experience and general qualities for the office would constitute fitness in the estimation of the Minister appointing him.

58. Do you think officers of that kind are to be found in places of importance throughout the country? I think it is very desirable that there should be these gentlemen where there are large populations. If not found there they may be easily induced to go there. I know an instance where, for twenty years, a gentleman well-known to Mr. Piddington, and I believe to the Committee generally—Mr. North—performed the duties of Police Magistrate in a large population, which extended from Windsor to Wollombi, in a most exemplary manner, and gave great satisfaction to every body for twenty years, or thereabout.

59. It is your opinion that a number of ineligible persons are in the Commission of the Peace? I think so; but again I say I must be excused from making individual references.

60. Do you think there are many eligible persons in the country districts not in the Commission of the Peace? I think there are some very eligible persons not in the Commission of the Peace.

61. Is it from any reluctance to take the duties upon themselves? Partly from that cause, and partly from an unwillingness to be associated with those already in the Commission.

62. Do you think there are many in the country eligible who are not in the Commission? Yes. There are two causes: some are unwilling to act, because they do not like to take the duties upon themselves, and others are unwilling to be associated with some of those in the Commission. I think if some alteration and improvement in the mode of selection were made, you would have men in the Commission who are not in it now, but who it would be desirable to have in it.

63. You think if the ineligible persons were got rid of by any means, a greater number of eligible persons would be had in the country districts? I certainly do. I know many men who have said—I will not go to the Bench where I meet so and so. Instances have occurred where a magistrate has adjudicated a case, and then adjourned to the public-house with the man whose case he had adjudicated upon. I know some cases of that kind myself, where a magistrate, after adjudicating on a case, has adjourned to the nearest tap, and the defeated party has there given his mind pretty freely to the magistrate who adjudicated upon the case. There, at the tavern, they meet on equal terms, and the magistrate is reminded, in pretty plain, and sometimes very unpleasant terms, that he is no longer on the Bench.

64. Do you think the number of magistrates are disproportionate to the wants of the country? I am not prepared to answer that question, not having considered the proportion of population to the magistracy; but I think there are some magistrates where they are not needed.

65. By Mr. Piddington: I think you stated there is a visible decline in respect to the comparative qualities possessed by magistrates in the last few years? I really think there is. I don't think there is the same attention and care paid to a judicious selection.

66. I think you stated that during Sir Charles Fitz Roy's administration the degeneracy appeared to commence? I think it did. Persons of inferior qualifications had been appointed in his administration in comparison to those who had been appointed before. I deem it right to add, that, in some instances, these appointments may be excused, from the difficulty of getting well-qualified persons for the magistracy in the districts in which they were required. If Police Magistrates were appointed this difficulty would be obviated. You may always rely on getting a well-qualified paid Police Magistrate, if you make a choice from qualification only, and not from favor or interest.
67. Since the inauguration of Responsible Government the appointments are by no means improved? I think not.
68. Some very improper appointments were made in his time? I think so; but a large allowance should be made, from the difficulty of making in all instances desirable selections.
69. Rather the contrary? I think rather the contrary.
70. Do you attribute that degeneracy in a great degree to the influence that Members may exercise on the Minister of the time being, in procuring the appointment for their friends? I do attribute it to that cause, in some degree, and the pressure on the Members of the respective constituencies, which, knowing the Member's good word will avail them for getting appointed, unduly press upon him to make such recommendation.
71. Are you aware that when Responsible Government was first introduced the Prime Minister of the day sent a circular, marked "Confidential," to every Member of the Assembly, inviting each Member to recommend gentlemen in his district? I believe the fact to have been so; but, however well intended, it is a course, I confess, I do not approve of. A communication, in the shape of a circular, to fifty gentlemen, could scarcely be a very close or confidential one. I never yet heard of fifty men keeping a secret.
72. And the effect of the circular having been sent by authority, you may trace the interference of Members to it? I think it did lead to it. If I were a Member of the Assembly, and the Government treated me so, I should think they were regarding me much in the same light as the Lord Lieutenant of the County is regarded in England, in giving me the power to nominate justices for them. This became generally known, and naturally led active members of a constituency to intimate, if not in words, in effect, to the candidate—"If you do not recommend me for the magistracy, I will not vote for you at the election." It may have been a well intended measure, but it was one, I think, of doubtful policy.
73. There is a strong inclination generally among country residents, according to your observation, to become magistrates? I think there is amongst some residents, but some (and these the most eligible) think it is a trespass on their time.
74. Are you not aware that there is a strong inclination to become magistrates? Yes, among some persons. I don't think generally it is considered desirable or sought for by those best fitted for the office. I think a great number of persons desire it merely, as I have before stated, for the honor of the position and advancement it confers.
75. That being the case, the desire or inclination not being considered, you believe that these persons consider it a patent of gentility the admission into the Commission? Yes.
76. When once admitted the gentility becomes indelible, and cannot be washed away? It extends to the family, and it is not at all uncommon for a man to say, I am first cousin to a magistrate of the territory. The great difficulty in this country is, that there is no regular country gentry—no class of men living on their rent rolls, and having nothing to do, as in England. Here, every man is a working man; and even a man of property has his flocks or his cattle stations to attend to, so he feels this office a great trespass on his time. It is therefore an act of kindness, and, I may add, of merit, on the part of these who take this office and attend to it properly.
77. As a matter of fact, you stated the people in the interior generally distrusted the magistrates? I did not say generally; but in many places I think they do.
78. What is the cause of that distrust? If people find inelegible persons appointed, or magistrates associating with persons beneath the rank of a person who ought to be a magistrate;—if partiality becomes manifested, they avoid the Benches where such magistrates administer justice, because they have no confidence in them. Unfit magistrates create distrust in the public mind. I believe, however, such cases are rather exceptional than general.
79. The want of confidence arises, not from the want of peculiar qualifications, but from absolute disqualifications of an observable nature? I think from both. I think educational attainment is desirable—more than some magistrates possess. They ought also to be a little conversant with Burns' Justice, Blackstone's Commentaries, and the elementary principles of law, for which some of them regard their own sense of natural justice a sufficient substitute.
80. With reference to your notion of the improvement of the present Commission, the parties appointed should be properly qualified, and have proper educational attainment? And character.
81. In what way would you test their educational attainment? I should object to any examination as a test. I really know no test that can be exercised, except a man's judgment of the character of the candidate from his conversation and the general estimate he has formed of him by acquaintance, and knowledge of his position, and his estimation amongst his neighbours.
82. His mode of speaking and acting, whether they are accompanied with intelligence? Yes. In short, his general aptitude for the office; but I would not require anything in the nature of an examination. It is different from a profession by which a man has to live.
83. I think you said it would be desirable that the Ministry should still retain the power of appointing Justices, but the Judges might veto the recommendation? They might veto them, if after examining the testimonials of the candidate they thought the person was an ineligible man. I think a Minister would be a bold man to appoint the magistrate after that; in fact, I don't think he would do so, and the retention of power by the Government for for the purpose is, I think, not worth considering. In many cases the reference to the Judges would be merely pro forma; but I would make the rule of reference universal, so that the Minister might be exempted from the liability or suspicion of making invidious exceptions.

His Honor
Mr. Justice
Therry,
M.L.C.

1 June, 1858.

84. Whoever passes the veto, has he not the real appointment? Virtually it may be so, but not really; because, I think, the Judges would pay such a respect to the recommendation of the Minister, if vouching for a person's eligibility, that they would not offer a veto as a wanton act of power; they would not do it without a reason. The veto by the Judges would be exercised mostly in cases where the Minister was importuned by undue solicitation.

85. Would it not be more constitutional, and work as well in practice, if the Judges were to recommend and the Ministry had the power of appointment and to veto, giving the initiative to the Judges, and not to the Ministry? The Minister has more knowledge of the exigencies of the country than the Judges can have; and he is the proper and usual channel through which applications of this kind come. After reference by them and approval by the Judges, there should be an end of the matter. I should therefore prefer the way I have suggested.

86. You alluded to the practice of appointing High Sheriffs in England. I believe three names are forwarded to the Crown, and the Crown selects one from the three? Yes, I believe so.

87. Is it not the practice that the Crown invariably selects the first name from among the three recommended? Yes.

88. I believe there is scarcely a departure from it? I believe not. It happens often that the second name in one year becomes first the next year.

89. So that whoever nominates the three names really nominates the Sheriff? Yes; I think in effect it is so.

90. I believe you stated that it would be well, if there was a Minister of Justice, to devolve the appointment of magistrates on him? Yes; I think he would be the proper person; he would be an officer similar to the Lord Chancellor in England.

91. You would not give this power to a Responsible Minister liable to change? I think it should be given to some person holding a judicial, or one in the nature of a judicial, office. The Attorney General might have it if his office was permanent; but that permanency would altogether alter the nature and duties of the office as it is held here and in England.

92. You would give the power to some permanent legal officer? Yes, if there were one such, as a Minister of Justice, who would inquire into the public requirements and provide for them.

93. The Lord Chancellor is an Equity Judge and does not go on Circuit? He does not.

94. He is rather a peculiar character as Judge, which removes him from all political influences to a certain extent? Yes. He is as free as a man holding a political position can be from local influences; and, I believe, pays impartial attention to the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenants of the counties, to whatever party they may belong.

95. Viewing it in the light you have explained, would the Lord Chancellor be a more competent authority than the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench? Yes, I think so. It is more suited to, and consistent with, the jurisdiction exercised by the Lord Chancellor.

96. With respect to the necessity of having an Act of Parliament, it would not be required if such necessity does not exist? I am not sure the necessity exists. I have suggested that a well understood constitutional arrangement might be made; and it would, perhaps, be found to suffice. At least I think an experiment worth trial.

97. Suppose the points our Committee recommend were to be carried out? It might be accomplished in that way; but if you want to make it binding on Ministers to refer the names of candidates to the Judges, you can only accomplish that by an Act of the whole Legislature.

98. The other is like the mere matters of rule of Responsible Government, which may be carried out or not, such as the rule with respect to Ministers resigning? Yes. No doubt it would be a matter of understood arrangement.

99. You do not wish to deprive the Minister of the power of appointment; you merely wish the Judges to have authority and a concurrent power? I should not take it by express enactment out of the hands of the Minister, because there may be exigencies within his knowledge, and of which the Judges may not be fully informed. I think it would be a bold step to appoint a person in opposition to the opinion of the Judges; still, such a case may arise, though rarely, and I would not control him; it is an extreme case, very unlikely ever to occur.

100. As a rule, you wish too see a rule established that the names of all persons proposed to be appointed as magistrates should first be submitted to the Judges for approval? In the absence of such an officer as I have described, I think it would be the most desirable course.

101. By Mr. Lee: What is your opinion with respect to appointing Police Magistrates for small towns in the distant interior? I think they are very useful men, and always on the spot when required. Of necessity, magistrates in sheep shearing time are very difficult to be had, and the Police Magistrate is the only person in the neighbourhood they can rely on getting. By a judicious selection of them you get a fair administration of justice, and they inspire a good deal of confidence in the neighbourhood in which they are established.

102. Are you aware that the inhabitants in these districts are kept week after week without having their cases decided, because the magistrates do not attend to the Bench? Yes, I am aware of it. It cannot reasonably be expected that they will attend regularly, because every man here is, as I have already remarked, a working man, and has to look after his property.

103. By the Chairman: Have you heard any suggestion at all with regard to having magistrates elected? I have heard the matter mooted. I very much disapprove of it. I would thus illustrate my objection:—A very clever busy publican in a small town or community, who, at a contested election would be a valuable adherent, would command more votes than the most respectable man in the community; now, if you were to make the office elective, that man, often a noisy, illiterate, and troublesome person, would be elected. It strikes me that this is one objection amongst many others to the plan of election.

His Honor
Mr. Justice
Therry,
M.L.C.

1 June, 1858.

104. You think it more desirable to keep to the present system, with some slight change? I should like to keep to the English custom as much as we can, and not depart from it without good grounds.

105. You are aware that in the country districts magistrates are all engaged in the same pursuits, and have a sort of fellow-feeling in adjudicating such cases as between master and servant; there they have one of the most embarrassing duties to perform? I should be glad if the District Courts Bill would relieve them from such portion of such a duty that often looks like adjudicating in their own cases.

106. You think more care ought to be used in appointing men fit for the office? Yes. I can recollect that before having a Court of Petty Sessions established, one magistrate tried all the servants of another magistrate in his own house, and had them flogged on one day. The servants of the magistrate who tried the case were brought up on the next day, and ordered to be flogged by the other magistrate. These, however, were the abuses of former days. I have no reason to suppose similar cases prevail in practice now.

107. You said once or twice that the Minister should have the power of appointment in such cases as he thought fit and proper? Yes; but if he had gone through the ordeal of submitting the testimonials to the Judges, and they said it was not an eligible appointment, it would require very cogent reasons to make the Minister make the appointment after such an ordeal. Again I repeat, I cannot anticipate the occurrence of such a serious collision of opinion. The reasons that would satisfy the Judges of the unfitness of the candidate would also satisfy the Minister.

108. Would you oblige him in all cases to submit the names? I think it is better to do so, as an uniform course. It would relieve the Minister from the suspicion of making partial selections.

109. That could only be done by Act of Parliament? You could only enforce it by Act of Parliament.

110. You would give him the liberty of acting on his own responsibility and not on the Judges? Yes; I would allow him to act on his own responsibility in such cases as I have adverted to.

111. Whether he is removed from Parliamentary influence—would it be right that he should make this reference to the Judges with regard to these appointments? If there was a Minister of Justice, or some such officer, removed from political partizanship, I think no reference to the Judges would be necessary; but if the meaning of the question be, that the person proposed to be made a magistrate is not proposed from Parliamentary influence, I still think the rule should be uniform, for it is not an easy matter to ascertain always the source from which the recommendation proceeds. I do not think any person, whether an adherent of Government or not, could find fault with a Minister who was enabled to say to the applicant—"I have submitted your name to the Judges, and they have made inquiry, and looked into your testimonials, and they do not approve of the appointment of the person you recommend." I do not, I say, suppose anybody could expect a Minister to do more.

112. Do you not think, where the Minister thinks it is absolutely necessary, from his own knowledge, to make the appointment, that an exception with regard to referring to the Judges should be made? The instances would be so rare that I doubt whether it would be worth making an exceptional provision to the uniform rule.

113. You do not think it worth making an exception? I think not, because the Minister of the day could easily procure the assent of the Judges. The Judges would not dissent from a recommendation so made to them by the Minister on his own responsibility, in any instance that I can imagine.

T. A. MURRAY, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Robert Owen, Esq., Member of the Legislative Assembly, examined:—

Robert Owen, Esq., M.L.A. 1. By the Chairman: You have been a long time resident in the Colony? Yes; seventeen or eighteen years.

2 June, 1858. 2. As a professional man you have had many opportunities of observing the working of the magistracy? Yes; particularly during the last five years.

3. In the District of Illawarra? Yes.

4. There have been many magistrates appointed there? Yes; some fourteen or fifteen.

5. You have thus had an opportunity of observing the general character of the magistracy of the Colony? I cannot say I have at other places; but, judging from what I have seen in Illawarra, I think I can form a fair opinion.

6. Do you think that, as a body, the magistracy are entitled to the confidence of the public? I think they are not sufficiently educated, as a body, and therefore they have not the confidence of the public. This want of confidence also arises from other causes. The mode of appointment at present is very unsatisfactory.

7. Have you ever formed any opinion as to the comparative amount of business transacted in the minor courts of the Colony in reference to the higher courts? Do you mean in the summary jurisdiction, the criminal jurisdiction, or the jurisdiction in the Courts of Requests? Robert Owen, Esq., M.L.A.
8. Generally. What I want to get at is this;—is not the bulk of the business of the Colony transacted in these minor courts? No doubt the great mass of business in the country districts must come before them. 2 June, 1858.
9. And the great mass of the people in the Colony, especially the poorer classes, are dependent on these courts for the administration of justice? Entirely.
10. However small or trifling in amount many cases may be, still they are of the greatest importance in many ways to the parties interested? Of the greatest importance—partly in money and partly in feeling. In a great measure, the parties perhaps care much more about the principle involved and the character at stake than they do for the mere money amount.
11. The stake at issue is just as great in every respect to the parties concerned as that involved in cases of far higher amount in the Supreme Court? Quite as great.
12. And in the summary jurisdiction in criminal cases the parties are liable to various punishments by fine and imprisonment? To very heavy penalties and very heavy imprisonment.
13. Then, of course, you must be of opinion that it is highly desirable that the parties presiding in these courts should be unquestionably well qualified for that position? Undoubtedly. The summary jurisdiction has been extending very rapidly of late years, and without any corresponding raising of the character of the Bench, either as to position or education. I think it has been a dangerous movement, as the summary jurisdiction really involves a very large mass both of money and character. In fact, it is putting on the Bench gentlemen who have not been nominated in any way by the people, and who act, not only as Judges but as jurors, and that is a principle in which there is great mistake.
14. It is an invasion of the principles of the Common Law? It is an invasion of the principles of the Common Law. No doubt, if the Benches of Magistrates could be educated, and be pure in the administration of justice, the summary jurisdiction would be of very great and beneficial importance, but not otherwise. As it stands at present I think it is injurious.
15. Then, while on the one hand the jurisdiction of the Justices of the Peace has been increased, their character and efficiency have been declining? I think so.
16. So far as you have observed, have the people at large much confidence in these courts? They have not, decidedly not.
17. Complaints are frequent? Very frequent.
18. By Mr. Egan: I presume you are alluding to your own district? I am, particularly; but I have observed that similar causes operate in other places.
19. By the Chairman: You judge from your opportunities of observation in your own neighbourhood? Yes.
20. To what do you attribute this change for the worse in the magistracy? The nominations for appointments to the Bench have gone generally, I believe, through the Members of the House; and, without imputing anything wrong to honorable gentlemen, I may say that I think they naturally support the appointment of their friends. The consequence is, that those qualifications which a magistrate ought to possess are, perhaps, in some measure lost sight of.
21. And magistrates are appointed merely from personal motives on one side or the other, and not in reference to the great end in view,—the due administration of justice? It appears to me that, in great measure, that is the case.
22. Do you remember the state of the magistracy a few years ago, during the administration of Sir George Gipps? I was in Sydney at that time, where justice has always been well administered.
23. Have you known any appointments that were at all objectionable, that were made through the influence of Members of the House? I think that is involved in what I have said,—that the qualifications which ought to be looked to are lost sight of.
24. Have you known any instances of persons being placed in the Commission of the Peace whose education has been grossly neglected? I think that in many cases gentlemen have been appointed certainly not sufficiently educated.
25. Have you observed at all whether the character of the magistracy has improved since the inauguration of Responsible Government, or not? I do not think it has.
26. Do you think it has deteriorated at all? It is really very difficult to say, because I am aware of very old appointments which are equally objectionable with some of those made under the new system of Government.
27. It has not improved, however? It has not improved.
28. That you attribute to the fact of Parliamentary or political influence being brought to bear on these appointments? Decidedly. I think the mode of appointment most objectionable; it would be impossible to convey that in too strong language.
29. Could you suggest any mode of reforming the present system? It is very difficult, perhaps, in this country, to have the same means of knowledge as at home; but there are two sources evidently within the reach of the Parliament at present. In the first place, if municipal institutions come into operation, it is very likely that will be a source from which some very good appointments may be made. Men of intelligence, selected by the public themselves, are likely to be persons of high character and superior in their position amongst their neighbours; and the administration of justice by gentlemen selected by themselves is likely to be very satisfactory to the people. That is one source from which a large number of appointments may be made. In the next place, I may say I know no other resource in this country except appointments by the Judges. They are removed, by their position, high feeling, and knowledge of what is right in these matters, from all improper influences; and they would, therefore, be an excellent channel through which parties might be selected for the magistracy. I know no other than these two sources. If there had been in this country anything analogous to the Lord-Lieutenants at home, who have the opportunity of judging of their respective districts or counties, that no doubt would have been better.

- Robert Owen, Esq., M.L.A.
2 June, 1858.
30. Which of these two modes would you recommend? I would recommend that both should be in operation. My notion is, with regard to the municipalities, either that it should be within the means of the Government to authorise certain of the members (whatever they may be called, Councillors or Aldermen,) to be magistrates, or that they should be magistrates ex officio, but with a veto from the Government in case of improper persons being elected; but no person should be entitled to act under the Commission (except the Mayor, ex officio.) with the sanction of the Executive.
31. Is the complaint of the inefficiency of the magisterial courts very general in your district? Very general.
32. The people are becoming evidently alive to the grievance? Yes; they complain very much of decisions; and I have perhaps a peculiar opportunity of judging, from having attended the court for some years, as well as having seen the administration of justice in England and in Sydney in these courts.
33. The complaints are not confined to disappointed litigants? No; there is a general feeling of discontent.
34. It has occurred to the Committee that some good may be done in the way you propose, by having the appointments subjected to the recommendation of the Judges, as a body, not of an individual Judge. What do you think of that? That no doubt would be preferable, if it were not too onerous for the Judges, as a body.
35. You think it would throw upon them great additional labor? They complain very much that they are overworked at present—I suppose the last feather breaks the camel's back—though I do not know really whether there would be much labor or not. But they ought at a glance to know better what persons are competent. If I were to sit down to devise any objectionable mode of appointment, it would be that which now exists.
36. The Minister for the time being is solicited by some Member of the House to appoint the friends of that Member? Yes. The Members for each district, I presume, are supposed to know the persons qualified in their own districts, and the friends of the Members are supposed by them to be qualified. No doubt the friends of each Member must be best known to himself; but there may be persons of very superior qualifications who may have taken an opposite course in politics or social matters, and these are overlooked.
37. Thus, gentlemen are placed in the Commission of the Peace through party influence? I do not know that I would call it party influence; it is partly that, and partly, perhaps, friendship.
38. But not regard to fitness for the office? No.
39. Do you think it is advisable that the Ministers for the time being should be subjected to the influences that may be brought to bear on them with regard to such appointments? No.
40. You think they ought to be relieved? I think they ought to be relieved. I think it is neither just to the people nor to the Government.
41. Will you be good enough to look at this Bill, which is a copy of the Bill introduced some years ago by Mr. Darvall. The first clause is to this effect:—"No person shall hereafter be appointed to the Commission of the Peace by any Governor or Governor General, unless by and with the advice and consent of the Executive Council for the time being of such Governor General." What do you think of such a course as that? I see no objection to this; but I think it goes to far, particularly in connection with what is now contemplated in the Municipal Bill. We know very well that in the Magistrates' Courts at home the best Justices are the Mayor and Aldermen of the different boroughs. Their knowledge of business, their superior acquaintance with mankind, I think, place them in this respect above gentlemen of sometimes higher education.
42. Do you think that in our thinly peopled community it is likely these municipal institutions will be extended throughout the country in any reasonable time? It is very difficult to say. I am not acquainted with the far interior, but I should say it will be some time before they will come into operation there.
43. They are only applicable where the population amounts to some thousands? Yes.
44. Then, admitting that the improvement you suggest in this respect may be desirable in every way, still it will be a long time before it will be productive of any practical benefit to the country at large, and in the meantime something must be done? Those municipal institutions that are carried into effect will pro tanto be the means of introducing efficient parties into the magistracy. Where they do not exist some other expedient may make up the deficiency. I may mention that during the period prior to the late election I had opportunities of consulting very large numbers of persons, most of them either of large or small property, and the subject of the magistracy was a constant topic—an anxious topic—and the desire was general that some change should take place; and my suggestion, that the municipal institutions would supply the medium, was received with very great satisfaction—unmixed satisfaction.
45. Will you look at the second clause of the Bill to which I have before drawn your attention:—"At the expiration of six months after the accession to office of each succeeding Governor General, the Commission of every unpaid Justice of the Peace in force at the time of such accession shall cease and determine." Do you think it advisable that the Commission of the Peace should be thus periodically subject to revision? I highly approve of that, because it avoids all those unpleasant feelings which might be directed against the Government in case of any partial revision. New appointments would be a great deal better.
46. Subject to some such check as submitting the names to the Judges would afford? Yes.
47. Thus the Commission would be to a great extent periodically purified? Yes. No doubt at intervals of a few years all objectionable persons would be observed in their conduct, and if through such a channel as the Judges, they could be dealt with, without any personal feelings.
48. It might be assumed that the Judges would be influenced only by a desire to work out the great ends of justice? I know no source so pure. Of course all human matters are subject to drawbacks.
- 49.

49. Whereas, the Ministers for the time being might be deterred from discharging their duty in this matter by political considerations? They might, and would be.
50. You have spoken of want of education in some magistrates, but it often happens that a man who has had little or no education is endowed with great natural ability and common sense, and might, therefore, be a fit person even for very high offices in the State—has it come under your knowledge that there are persons in the Commission of the Peace whose moral qualities are such as to render it highly undesirable that they should be in the position of Judges? I cannot say that it has. I can but speak with great respect of all that I know.
51. Do you think such a Bill as that to which I have directed your attention would work well? I think it goes too far. If it should stand in the terms here used, it would seem to exclude all persons under municipal institutions, except by consent of the Executive. I think the public would feel it a grievance if, under the Municipal Act, certain persons such as the Mayor, or head man of each municipality, were not declared by law ex officio magistrates, but the appointment of any inferior corporate officer to the Commission of the Peace should be subject to the control of another authority.
52. The only objection you have to that Bill is that it might prevent the free working of the municipal system in regard to magistrates, in the way in which you think it desirable it should act? I think it would stand very well as it is, with a proviso to prevent its application to such exceptions as may be made by any enactment of a Municipal Act.
53. Are there any Police Magistrates at Illawarra? No. I am of opinion they would be of great use to the country. The great deficiency, as it appears to me, of each Bench arises, not so much from a desire to do wrong, but from a want of knowledge how to do right; and this want of knowledge of business, or of the mode of conducting litigation, arises from the want of some guide. It appears to me, therefore, that if the country could not support Police Magistrates in populous districts, some very well educated gentlemen—I do not say of necessity a legal man, but at any rate some gentlemen who has studied the law to a certain extent, and has a knowledge of the law of evidence—should go circuits, so as to sit from time to time on different Benches. I think in that way a vast deal of the injustice that has been committed might have been avoided. I believe a great many of the daily errors that take place arise, not from want of intention, but from want of knowledge.
54. Is it not as much the duty of the Government to provide for the administration of justice in these minor courts as in the higher courts? I think so.
55. Then why should the country refuse the expense? It is the very worst economy. I know that in my own district, if it were possible, the people would cheerfully pay a large tax to have some competent officer.
56. Whose integrity and knowledge of the law they could rely on? Yes.
57. Has it come under your knowledge that this evil is complained of,—that the magistrates who sit on the Benches in the country are united by some of common interest; all are employers of servants, or are interested in the same sort of transactions; and thus some doubt may be entertained, whether reasonably or not, by parties who may be brought before these courts as to their impartiality? I have felt that objection very strongly throughout. A very large portion of the matters of litigation in these courts are between the employers and the employed, and, without imputing anything wrong to the Bench, their feelings naturally flow in favor of their own class; and therefore it is that I observe that the law extending the summary jurisdiction has advanced too quickly. Now, if by superior appointments from the Government, or if through the Municipal Bill, there be magistrates as it were elected by the people themselves, they would in these cases be tried by their own peers,—by their own elected magistrates. There are several serious objections to the present system, which perhaps the Committee would allow me to mention. One of the greatest evils which at present, as it appears to me, interferes with the proper course of justice is, that the magistrates sitting from day to day all have their local associations, and are in some way or another immediately connected, in their business or in their family relations, with a large proportion of the neighbourhood; and if it be that there be two litigants, the one not within their circle and the other within it, the bias is, according to the ordinary principles of human nature, in favour of their connexions or friends; and that it is impossible to avoid, as matters stand at present. Then, with respect to cases affecting servants: It appears to me, that from the nature of the present appointments—the magistrates being all persons of considerable means as employers of labour, they naturally look to the protection of their own interests. Another objection is, that gentlemen not possessing any legal attainments do not see the force of the objection which exists to any previous acquaintance with the matter in litigation; and it so happens, that from the peculiar position of the magistracy at present existing, they generally obtain a previous knowledge of the matter that comes before the court, and in a very great number of cases it is privately discussed. The consequence is, that labor as you may, even with the advantages of legal assistance, the matter is decided before it comes into court, without the parties knowing it—perhaps without even the magistrates being aware of it. But at the very root of all the present objections to the administration of justice, though gentlemen may be to a certain extent well educated, is the great defect of a want of knowledge of the rules of evidence. It is indeed very difficult to shew a layman the various shades of law relating to evidence; and as every case must depend on evidence, the foundation of justice is sapped. I should not hesitate in saying that in five cases out of every six the cases are not decided according to evidence; all sorts of evidence are introduced; the most irregular mode is adopted; cases are even decided without hearing both sides; and all arising from that defect which it appears to me is caused by the want of legal knowledge of the importance of both parties being heard, and of nothing being introduced into the case except what is positively legal evidence. Gentlemen not possessed of a knowledge of legal points or the effect of legal evidence, decide literally without knowing they are doing wrong, and they do very wrong. Of course I do not wish to mention individual instances, but I could point out, in a short period, cases of a most extraordinary description.

Robert Owen,
Esq., M.L.A.

2 June, 1868.

Robert Owen, Esq., M.L.A. 58. Has it come under your knowledge that magistrates sometimes communicate with the litigants either on one side or the other out of doors? Yes.

59. Receiving ex parte statements? Yes; I do not see how they can avoid it. They are in communication with the parties from day to day; and it is a very common thing for any person in dispute with a neighbour to fly to a magistrate at once, and probably out of kindness his tale is heard, and opinions given which any gentleman acquainted with the necessity of a pure administration of justice would shun.

60. You think then that cases are often decided on foregone conclusions? I think so.

61. You are clearly of opinion that it would be advisable to have Police Magistrates? I think a general system of police appointments, made with care, would be great economy to the country and most satisfactory indeed.

62. By Mr. Forster: You speak of a general want of confidence felt in the magistracy under the present system? Yes.

63. Do I understand you rightly that you consider that want of confidence arises from the circumstance of the present magistrates being employers of servants, from the custom that obtains of discussing cases beforehand, and from a want of legal attainment? Yes.

64. Do you think it would be possible under any system to have magistrates who would not be employers of servants? I know no other way than by appointments under the direct action of the Government.

65. Would not even Police Magistrates so appointed be in some degree interested? Not unless they were persons chosen out of the districts to which they were appointed.

66. You mean that they would not be so very much interested—they must have their own domestic servants? They would be very few.

67. Is it not usual for Police Magistrates, appointed under the present system, to be engaged in operations which they do not actually superintend; to invest money, for instance, in agricultural or pastoral pursuits? Yes; but I think appointments could be made that would avoid that.

68. Would you propose that it should be a condition of their appointment that they should not be interested in the employment of labor? I think that ought to be a condition.

69. With regard to your other objection—that matters are discussed beforehand—how do you think that could be avoided? I think the Police Magistrates should be gentlemen possessed of more than average attainments—that they should have some kind of legal education, if they were not lawyers—and they would see the absolute necessity, the great wrong that would be done even in receiving a letter in reference to any case that was to come before them magisterially.

70. Then the improvement you would suppose would be in the superior legal attainments these gentlemen would possess? Yes.

71. But if I understand you rightly, you propose that magistrates should be appointed through the municipalities? That is one mode.

72. Have you found from experience that popular election results in the appointment of persons of legal attainments? It has not been tried in the country here.

73. From what we have seen of popular election in other cases, may we not presume that the same principles would guide the electors? Sydney is the only place where it has been tried.

74. May we not presume that the same principles would guide the electors in the interior, in electing members of municipalities, as have guided them in electing gentlemen to the Assembly? No doubt.

75. Do you think superior men would be elected to municipal institutions than to the Assembly? I think they would be the best men of the districts.

76. Would they be superior to those appointed to the Assembly now by the same mode of election? I do not think they would be superior.

77. Do you think superior men would be elected at all? I do not see why they should not be as good men of business.

78. Has your experience of popular election led you to the inference that men are selected who have superior legal attainments? Certainly not. I think that persons elected to municipal institutions would be superior in this way,—that their course of conduct through life would be dictated by honor, that all their transactions would be marked by good feeling to their neighbours, and that being distinguished by their co-townsmen, they would be likely to be in the main—although there might be occasional exceptions—the best persons in the community.

79. May I ask whether you propose, as a corrective of the evils at present admitted, that the magistrates should be elected by the people? I think that one or two members of each municipal body should be magistrates; but I think that, in addition to that, and perhaps superior even to that, would be the appointment by Government of competent persons, as I have before suggested.

80. Are you in favor of the election of magistrates, as a general principle? Not as a general principle.

81. Is there not some inconsistency in the two modes you propose? No; I think they may go hand in hand. I would observe, with respect to this point, that the only instance we have of an elective magistracy is in Sydney, where the Mayors, under the present and former Corporation, have been elected persons; and, though probably I would not presume to say they have been men of very high legal education, I think the duties performed by them as magistrates have been done very satisfactorily. Connected with the administration of justice in Sydney, too, there has always been the employment of a Police Magistrate; and why should not the same thing go hand in hand in the country?

82. Do you not think that where there is a very large selection, as in Sydney, there may be less danger than where there is only a limited number of persons to choose from? No doubt Sydney has its advantages. There are crowded courts,—there is the Press, through which a large community may be said to be looking on; and these very circumstances bring out the defects

- defects of the present country system in very high relief. In the courts of thickly-peopled districts, where there is a newspaper, and perhaps a legal gentleman acting as a magistrate, the administration of justice is much improved; but in remote parts, where there are none of these advantages, I think gentlemen acting as magistrates have just as much power as a Turkish Cadi. I am quite aware that elected persons are always subject to certain objections; but it appears to me that the advantages to the public of having an officer presiding over them by their own consent, in a country like this, would render the working of such a mode of appointment in the main satisfactory.
83. May I ask whether you do not think that one of the great reasons of the want of confidence felt in the present magistracy is the actual want of responsibility? No doubt that is one part of it. The other portion is, that the parties, as I have already said, appointed are not competent to the task.
84. But surely the correction of evil appointments should be the responsibility of the persons who make the appointments? No doubt, legally, all magistrates are responsible; but then it amounts to irresponsibility in this way,—that the remedy is so expensive, and, from want of information on the part of the litigants, so inapproachable, that they are virtually irresponsible.
85. Then, I think you agree with me that a great defect of the present system is a want of virtual responsibility, which, I think you say, might be avoided by the appointment of paid officers as Police Magistrates? Yes.
86. And you think that system ought to be extended all through the interior? I do, in the strongest terms.
87. Is there not some reason to believe that want of confidence in the present magistracy arises from an inevitable social distinction being drawn between them and the persons who come to them for relief? No; I have not observed that. I do not think there is any jealousy of that kind.
88. Do you not think servants, for instance, in going before magistrates feel they are going before a tribunal opposed to them on the general merits of the case? No doubt. I think that was conveyed in a previous answer. There is a distinct division between employers and employed.
89. Are you of opinion that the evils complained of can best be remedied by legislative enactment, or that they can be corrected without? I presume no change can be carried into effect without legislative enactment.
90. Do you not think the responsibility of the Executive Government, which is supposed to be exercised in this matter, might be more strictly enforced, by requiring them to be more careful in their appointments in future? I think that would have no effect.
91. In whom then would you rest the final choice of magistrates, after having passed through these different subordinate modes of choice? In the Judges.
92. Do you think there would be no danger in allowing the Judges the final decision in matters of this kind? I think probably there would be no source without some objection; but it appears to me that that is the purest source.
93. How, in the first place, are the Judges to understand the local requirements of the districts, or even the capacity of the persons who may be appointed? That, no doubt, to a certain extent is a difficulty; but when we consider that the Judges go their circuits, and that nearly from all parts of the country within their circuits they have the means of inquiring about competent parties, we can understand that they may to a great extent be possessed of large information, although perhaps not to the fullest extent we may desire.
94. You are aware that the Judges do not go on circuit in the remote parts of the country? I am aware of that, and with respect to those districts they could not have a very full knowledge.
95. In that case would there not be some danger in giving them a final decision? No, I do not think so, because if parties are named and objections urged, no one would be so competent as a Judge to discriminate between factious and well founded opposition.
96. Supposing the office of Attorney General was rendered permanent, and not subject to political changes, do you think that officer might, to a certain extent, be entrusted with this decision? That might be an improvement on the present system; but I would not trust even the Attorney General with these appointments.
97. Not if he were a permanent officer? No.
98. Would not his connection with the Executive Government, which would be more close than that of the Judges, give him a superior knowledge of the particular cases referred to him? No, I do not think it need be so.
99. I think you state that you are in favor of the election of magistrates to a certain extent, but not to a very great extent? I should conceive the utmost settled extent would be, that the heads of corporations should be magistrates ex officio; but with respect to persons elected to minor municipal offices, I think they might be open to selection by the checking power, whether of the Judges or the Government.
100. You would not allow the principle of election to apply to those parts of the remote interior to which municipal institutions it is supposed would not extend? No; I think that would be dangerous.
101. Then there would be no remedy in those places? The Judges might obtain valuable information even from those remote parts, though not implicitly reliable; but I presume, in such cases Police Magistrates would be the only perfectly safe resource.
102. I think you say you disapprove altogether of the present mode of appointment through the Executive Government? Altogether.
103. You are aware that a system of this kind prevails in England? Perhaps it is almost impertinent in me to repeat the mode in practice there. The various corporations have their magistrates; the magistrates in other respects are recommended by the Lord Lieutenants of counties, and these recommendations go to the Chancellor; so that the

Robert Owen, character of the magistracy is sifted through some very high channels; and, with a few exceptions, the magistracy of England stands very high in public opinion.

Esq., M.L.A. 104. By Mr. Egan: I think you say you approve of having Police Magistrates? I do.

2 June, 1858. 105. Do you not think the same influence might be brought to bear on Police Magistrates as on any other magistrates? I think not.

106. Have you not heard complaints of the intimacy of Police Magistrates with persons having large numbers of servants; in consequence of which, those servants who had occasion to come before the court went forward expecting the decision to be against them? Nothing human is perfect; but I think the selection in the first instance of gentlemen of competent education would be more likely to be free from objection than any other source.

107. Can you say from your experience that the Police Magistrates that have been appointed are superior to the unpaid magistrates? I should think so; but I would not answer that question very fully, because, though I have known a few personally, I have not been in the interior to watch their conduct.

108. Do you not know that, in consequence of Police Magistrates being appointed in some of the country districts, the unpaid magistrates scarcely ever attend? I have heard so.

109. And, therefore, the whole business of the courts is left entirely to these gentlemen? It may be a very improper jealousy which causes this non-attendance. It is a display of a spirit which to me is convincing that they are not the proper parties to sit in a court.

110. Are you not aware that the public suffer very much in consequence of being unable to get magistrates to sit? Even where many magistrates are resident either in the neighbourhood of the court, or within a few miles, the attendance has been very lax, even where there has been no Police Magistrate.

111. Does it come within your knowledge that many magistrates appointed some years ago have been really useless, and scarcely ever attend a court at all? Perfectly useless, and worse than useless.

112. Then there is no reason to suppose that recent appointments of magistrates have been worse than those formerly made? They have not mended the matter.

113. But they have given greater facility to the public to obtain justice? I think not.

114. Are you speaking of your own district, or generally? I, of course, live in my own district, but I have my eyes open to observe what passes in other districts.

115. Has it come to your knowledge that actions have been brought against magistrates to any extent for acts done in their magisterial capacity? We know that it is a losing game to go to law, and I suppose that for one person feeling aggrieved who goes into court there are twenty having just right that will not go.

116. Are you aware that the business of the Police Office in the City of Sydney has been conducted by the independent magistrates in a way that has given entire satisfaction? I believe so, so far as I have known; but I think there are so many circumstances favorable to the pure administration of justice in Sydney that that may be very well accounted for without its having any bearing on the country districts.

117. Have you not heard that Police Magistrates in the country districts have been looked on by the people as acting in a most tyrannical manner? I am afraid that any one removed from public observation is very apt to run a little wrong, unless great care is taken in the appointments; but I should very much doubt whether the appointments hitherto have been made with the same care and from the source from which they ought to have been made.

118. Do you believe, with reference to the remote districts, that any person can be better competent to judge of the fitness of persons to be appointed to the Commission of the Peace than the representatives of the people, who are in the habit of visiting in their districts—would not their recommendation be equal to any other mode? It is more objectionable than any other mode, and for this reason, that any gentleman who seeks legislative honors has to go and make friends, and his friends cannot always be selected; but he may have a very ardent friend who may be a very bad magistrate, though he may have great difficulty in resisting the importunity of that friend.

119. You believe a Member of the House would recommend the appointment of a friend whom he knew to be unfit? I am afraid so.

120. Would you prefer leaving the recommendation to the Police Magistrates in the country districts? I would reject no means of information; but I would have it placed in hands that would deal with it properly.

121. Do you think the Police Magistrate would be a more correct source of information than the party who represented the district? I think, as a principle, nothing should be placed too much in one person's hands.

122. Neither in the Member's nor the Police Magistrate's? Nor any other individual; but those sources of information would be useful, and would in discriminating minds lead to appointments as little objectionable as possible.

123. You think the appointments of late days more objectionable than those of some more remote period? I think I said they were not much improved.

124. By Mr. Lee: Did I understand you to say that almost all the decisions were made out of court? No. I said it was not very unusual that these matters were discussed out of court, from gentlemen residing in the districts, and from parties naturally going to them in their trouble, and, unavoidably, from the very nature of the communication, there is a foregone conclusion.

125. Is not the complainant bound to go to a magistrate, and make his declaration that he wants a summons for a certain party? Yes; but that is a very different thing from seeking advice.

126. Do you mean that they go to the magistrates for advice? Yes, constantly.

127. Do not attorneys generally disagree with magistrates' decisions in the country? Not generally. If an attorney be an advocate, of course, if the decision is against him, he may not

not agree with it altogether; but a well-educated gentleman will as readily acquiesce, if justice be done, as if the case went with him.

128. Are there not some attorneys who, if the case were ever so clear against them, would wish to have it carried in their own way? That question almost answers itself. An advocate, whether a barrister or any other branch of the profession, naturally wishes his own client to succeed.

Esq., M.L.A.

129. You think that members elected by municipal institutions would be fit and proper persons to be appointed magistrates? Yes; for the reasons and the qualifications I have stated.

130. Do you believe the whole of the persons elected as members of these bodies would be fit and proper persons to act as magistrates? No, I should not say so.

131. By Mr. Thornton: You spoke of two great sources by which a superior order of magistracy might be obtained, namely, selection by the Judges, and through municipal institutions; now, do you think that if it were a part of any municipal law that a person elected an alderman, or councillor, as the case might be, should be ex officio a justice, that would insure a better description of candidates for the office? I think it very probable. The mass of the people have a very correct notion of the administration of justice, and of what it ought to be, and that would make them careful in the election of those persons.

132. As a lawyer, you will be able to answer my question clearly: do you think the Bill now before you, to which your attention was called by the Chairman, would in any way affect magistrates created under a municipal Act, or that statutory magistrates would be at all affected by that Bill? I think the proviso I mentioned would be sufficient to meet the case.

133. Magistrates in virtue of office would not be affected by it? They would, as it now stands, but it could be very easily modified.

134. By Mr. Piddington: I think you stated your opinion that the magistrates appointed of late years had not improved the character of the Commission, in respect to qualification, education, or position in life? I think they have not.

135. And I think you said also, that you attribute that decline to the practice of Members of Parliament nominating their respective friends or adherents? Yes.

136. And yet you seem to think that all the members of municipal councils should, indiscriminately, be appointed to the Commission of the Peace? No.

137. Then, if you do not think that all the members of municipal councils should be ex officio magistrates, what number of members or particular member of any body now existing or to be created would you limit the appointment to? I think I mentioned the Mayor, or head man of the body.

138. The Mayor alone? No; the Mayor should be ex officio a magistrate, the same as in Sydney, and the other members would be prominent persons for the appointing powers to select from, as being elected by the people, but they should not be ex officio magistrates.

139. You would limit the ex officio appointments to one individual in each corporation? Yes, but also conferring as much as possible the appointment upon the other elected officers.

140. In respect to all officers excepting the Mayor, you think the Crown should have the same right of rejection as it now possesses with respect to any other individuals? That is my opinion.

141. I think you alluded to the fact that in England members of corporations are men of high legal attainments very often? No; I think I rather said to the contrary,—that perhaps gentlemen of property were very frequently better educated, but that the corporate officers were men of clear business habits, of very high character amongst their fellow citizens, and having other qualifications which fitted them to act as magistrates.

142. When you speak of corporate officers you do not allude to the Recorders in Cities or Boroughs or to the Common Serjeants? No; that is another matter.

143. I think you stated that, in your opinion, five cases out of six decided by the magistrates of the Colony are not decided according to evidence? Not decided strictly according to evidence. I think that is done without the magistrates being aware of it.

144. I was about to say that you think these erroneous decisions are caused, not by any want of desire to decide correctly, but by want of legal knowledge? Exactly.

145. Whatever may be the cause, if you are correct in your opinion that they form so large a proportion of cases, is not that an argument against the existence of unpaid magistrates altogether? No, I do not think so, because I conceive that the appointments may be much improved. I speak of the existing system.

146. I think one reason on which you found that opinion is derived from the belief that paid magistrates should be appointed? I am very much in favor of paid magistrates being appointed generally, because the mode of appointment, and, I suppose, the principle of appointment, would be to select men duly qualified.

147. Is not that an argument again pro tanto against the continuance of unpaid magistrates? No, I do not think so.

148. Of what value is it to the country that it should have paid magistrates appointed by the State as well as an unpaid magistracy? A paid magistrate may not always be able to attend, and in many cases he may be well assisted by the unpaid. I have stated that if there were paid magistrates the mode of administration would be immensely improved, inasmuch as many of the difficulties now arise from want of knowledge.

149. You regard the appointment of paid magistrates as very desirable? Most desirable, under due precautions.

150. You have attributed the incompetency of existing magistrates to want of education? To want of education.

151. What kind of education do you allude to? General education as to one point, and very particularly the want of even the slightest reading up of any legal information; and in connection with this, I would just mention what appears to me to have been always a great want. The laws, as at present collected, are scattered over some very considerable volumes, and it is very difficult indeed to select them in practice for the administration of justice; but if there were were compiled by some legal authority, under the auspices of the Government, a well arranged selection of the laws in operation, with a very good index—an index that I have seen nothing like at present—in fact a good index is the only key to any book—with preliminary observations directed to the simple heads of evidence,—I say if such a book were placed in the hands of each magistrate, it would be of enormous importance to the administration of justice. They have no guide at present; and it is not necessary to say, that the administration of justice cannot be obtained by instinct.

152. But a mere acquaintance with the statutes existing in the Colonial Statute Book would not be of much service to a magistrate in qualifying him to judge of evidence? I think there should be plain directions as to the principal heads of evidence,—what is evidence, and so on. In the Administration of Justice Act there are some directions as to the conduct of cases, but they are so mixed up with statutory enactments that the magistrates do not know where to find them. If they had the necessary Acts, with the various heads of evidence—what is evidence—hearsay evidence not admissible except under circumstances—under distinct heads, plainly set out, it would be of very great importance indeed; I cannot over-rate it.

153. You have stated that the unpaid magistrates are not regarded by the public with confidence? Yes; as administrators of justice.

154. I think you are also in favor of leaving the appointment of magistrates in the main to the recommendation or confirmation of the Judges, as a body? Yes.

155. Are you aware of the mode of appointment of High Sheriffs of counties in England? I do not know all the machinery, but I think there is a certain day on which—

156. Three names are selected from each county? Yes.

157. Could not some scheme of the same kind be adopted in the appointment of magistrates here, giving the Judges the initiative, and not depriving the Crown of its right of appointment, but empowering the Judges to recommend three individuals, with the understanding that the Crown select one of the three, as is the practice in the appointment of High Sheriffs? I do not see any objection to that.

158. By the Chairman: In the cases you have referred to, in regard to justices not acting, as you say, in five cases out of six according to evidence, do you think they depart from substantial justice? I think you can very rarely depart from the rules of evidence without departing from justice. With every desire to arrive at the truth, without an adherence to those rules you, in all probability, shut out truth in one way, and admit error in the other.

159. Then, in these cases, you complain that justice has not been done? I think that in some of the cases justice may be hit by chance, and that is all I can say about it.

160. Have you anything further to add relative to this subject? I wish to add, in reference to the irresponsibility of magistrates, that the only way in which a decision of any Bench can be questioned is by an application to the Supreme Court for a prohibition. The usual amount of expense for such application is about £22 to £25 for each side. Unless corruption be shewn as against the magistrate, the Judges do not visit them with the applicant's costs, although such application is successful. If a decision of the Bench be declared wrong, the applicant has still to pay heavy costs. A man in humble circumstances cannot therefore resist an erroneous judgment of any Bench.

T. A. MURRAY, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

The Honorable Sir Alfred Stephen, Knight, Chief Justice, called in and examined:—

The Hon. Sir A. Stephen, Knt., C.J.
8 June, 1858.

1. By the Chairman: You are Chief Justice of the Colony? Yes.
2. How many years have you been a Judge of the Supreme Court? Nineteen years and upwards.

3. During that time you have had ample opportunities of observing the general state of the Magistracy of the Colony? If you refer to individuals—

4. No; as a body? Yes, of course, in a general way.

5. And, of course, you have observed generally the administration of the law in all the Courts of the Colony, in regard to individuals? Yes, I think I may say that I have. To a considerable extent I necessarily have.

6. Have you any idea at all of what ratio the business—that is the cases tried in the Civil Courts—what proportion they bear to the cases tried in the Supreme Court? You mean what proportion the summary proceedings cases bear to the cases tried in the Supreme Court?

7. In the Supreme Court? I have no means of knowing.

8. You are aware at all events, I presume, as a matter of fact, that there is an immense amount of business done in the Police Courts of the Colony? I am quite aware that there is a very immense amount of business done by the Magistracy both in summary cases and in ministerial; that is in aid of other Courts—commitments of people, I mean for trial.

9. And that interests, so far as the parties are concerned, are involved to fully as large an amount in the Police Courts as they are in the higher Courts? There are, doubtless, very large interests involved in the decisions of the Magistracy in cases both criminal and civil; such such as, among others, in cases arising under the Tenements Recovery Act, the Impounding Act, disputes between masters and servants, and complaints under the Deserted Wives and Children Act, against the absconding husband or father—and the like, exclusively of the ordinary criminal jurisdiction of Justices; but I cannot say whether the amount pecuniarily is or not, in the aggregate, equal to that of the cases pending in the Supreme Court.

The Hon. Sir
A. Stephen,
Knt., C.J.
8 June, 1853.

10. But, considering generally the circumstances of the parties interested, are not the sums that they sue for, or that they are fined in, of just as much moment to them as the larger amounts involved in the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court may be supposed to be to disputants in that Court? Doubtlessly; and even were it otherwise, it is of very great importance that the law should be administered in all jurisdictions with care and competent knowledge as well as with integrity.

11. And now, Sir Alfred, with regard to the Supreme Court: of course all the proceedings there are watched, not only by an intelligent public, but also by the press, and the cases pro and con are in the hands of able advocates—so that, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, that Court, at all events, is under a certain amount of control; but in the Police Courts in many parts of the Colony you are aware, I presume, that there is no professional attendance in many instances, and that it very rarely happens indeed that the cases are reported by the press? There are, certainly, checks on the administration of justice in the Supreme Court which do not exist, I apprehend, in the Magisterial Courts in any degree; and with respect to those checks which exist at all, they do not exist by any means in the same degree.

12. Do you think it desirable that such checks should exist? I certainly do; I have no doubt that the presence of advocates is of very great importance, not only as an assistance to the Bench, but as, in some degree, a check upon the Bench; and also, that the reporting of all proceedings by the press, and so attracting public attention to them, is of great importance in reference to the latter object. The presence of any intelligent audience is of importance in the same view.

13. Then, I presume, you regard the non-existence of any such checks, as these in the Police Courts, as an evil that ought to be remedied if possible? When once an advantage is admitted, it seems to follow that it should be secured if it be practicable, but in what mode this can be accomplished, with respect to Magisterial Courts in the interior, I am utterly unprepared to say.

14. So far as you have had an opportunity of observing, do you think the Magistracy of the Colony commands the confidence of the public, generally speaking—we do not want to enter into any particular instances? That is a very awkward question to answer, and one of extreme difficulty. I am, perhaps, not competent to say what is, or is not the opinion of the public at large on such a point,—but I may state that I have, in several quarters, more particularly of late, heard the appointments to the Magisterial Bench in many instances severely criticised.

15. Numbers of Magistrates, I presume, have, from time to time been sworn in before you? There have been a great number of Magistrates sworn before me, or my brother Judges in my presence.

16. Has it ever struck you, on such occasions, that the parties appointed were not qualified by education for the position in which they were placed? I have certainly repeatedly seen persons sworn in as Magistrates, whom I have thought, judging by their appearance and manner, and style of reading, to be utterly inadequate, in point of education, and to be of an inferior grade generally.

17. Have you observed many such instances? I have seen several in different parts of the Colony. I mean that it is not confined to Sydney alone; but extends to country districts.

18. Then the gentlemen thus entrusted in this instance with the administration of the law in the Police Courts of the Colony—although unfitted for that position by education, are nevertheless free from that check or responsibility which exists in the higher Courts? I have already said that Magistrates have rarely the check over their proceedings which exists with respect to the Judges; but it is clear that responsibility cannot be avoided by Magistrates in any instance. Responsibility exists under all circumstances. I wish it to be understood that, notwithstanding the particular instances alluded to by me, speaking of the body of Magistrates generally, from my personal knowledge of many, and my general observation of others, I have no reason to express myself otherwise than respectfully of them.

19. As a body? As a body; and, so far as I have the means of judging, I think that they generally discharge their duties very well. I have occasionally seen very great mistakes committed by them—chiefly in law, but sometimes in matters of fact. But, I believe on the whole, that their judgments are reasonably correct, and quite entitled to respectful mention.

20. Then, Sir Alfred, of course, I presume you consider it to be regretted that such objectionable appointments as those you have alluded to, should take place at all? I think that even one decidedly bad appointment to the Magistracy in a district, is highly prejudicial, and that it tends inevitably to bring the whole body into dis-esteem. It has the further effect of alienating the more competent and more respectable portion of the Magistrates from their duties; and it is quite impossible not to have observed that the instances which I have referred to, have already tended to lower the estimation in which the Magistracy as a body should be held personally by the public.

21. You think then, that some gentlemen who are well qualified for the office, are prevented from acting in consequence of those objectionable appointments? I do not say actually prevented; but I have heard, and I believe it to be the fact, that competent and respectable men have, in some instances, abstained from attending the Bench, rather than meet with persons whom they did not choose to recognise as associates.

22. Now, Sir Alfred, with regard to the legal responsibility which you just alluded to, in cases where publicity is and proper evidence may be brought to bear upon the case—how far does that under the law as it stands, affect the Magistrates? No Magistrate is responsible for any mere error in judgment, unless he shall have exceeded altogether his jurisdiction—a case which rarely happens; and even should he exceed his jurisdiction he is still free from liability to damages or other punishment, if the losing party shall apply to the Supreme Court by prohibition, which is now a frequent mode of setting right magisterial decisions.

The Hon. Sir
A. Stephen,
Knt., C.J.

23. If the party applying for a prohibition succeeds in his application who bears the costs;—are the costs awarded to him—in his favour? In the greater number of cases the successful party pays his own costs; but not always so. If the Magistrate has very violently erred, the Court may inflict costs upon him; but, I recollect only one instance in which this has been done. In some instances the Court has made the prosecuting party pay the costs. If the appealing party fails, he is almost invariably made to pay the costs.

24. And if he succeeds he generally has to pay his own? Generally speaking.

25. And what would the costs amount to generally—in any ordinary case? I cannot tell; I should think about £10 or £12.

26. Ten or twelve pounds? I should think so. Such cases usually involve considerable difficulty either as to the facts or the law; and counsel are generally employed.

27. The costs then in such cases—in any ordinary case—would bear a considerable proportion to the amount involved in the case itself? It is sometimes much more. I have known several instances, in which the party appealing must have known full well that he would have to pay more than the pecuniary sum at stake. But men in such cases have very often a higher object. They wish to shew that they have committed no offence, or they desire to have the law settled in similar cases for the future. There are instances where this has been avowed.

28. But at the same time, to persons in a very humble station in life in regard to property, the costs of appeal might prove an absolute bar to their being righted? Unquestionably so. On the other hand, although you may largely diminish the risk of erroneous decisions by securing a higher class of functionaries, yet it is impossible altogether to avoid error in deciding points of law. No single volume of the Reports in any Court in England can be read, without seeing instances of deliberate judgments by very able and distinguished men reversed by some superior Court.

29. But still there may be some approximation—greater or less—to that state of perfection which it may be desirable to bring the administration of the law to, if it could be done? That is a self-evident proposition. It is of great importance to secure efficiency in every department of the State; but chiefly in the law department, and all which affects the administration of justice.

30. And erroneous decisions are likely to be multiplied where objectionable appointments are made? In exact proportion as you multiply undesirable appointments in so far as mental capacity is concerned, you of course multiply the risk of error; but it is obvious that an immoral man, for instance, may be as competent to decide accurately as any other.

31. Then, generally speaking, Sir Alfred, the responsibility of Magistrates just now simply goes so far as the rectifying of decisions in the manner which you have just adverted to: If the parties appeal in the way you have just spoken of, they are precluded, I take it, from bringing any action against a magistrate individually? They are, if they proceed by prohibition.

32. Have you known many cases of actions having been successfully decided against Magistrates in consequence of their conduct on the Bench or the decisions they gave? I have known such instances, but they are few. One was an action against a Magistrate for causing certain fences to be pulled down, in a mere civil case over which he had no jurisdiction—that was in the south country. Another was where a Magistrate had convicted a man without causing him to be summoned. One instance I remember of an action for a malicious proceeding by a Magistrate; another where a Magistrate issued a warrant as for felony in a mere case of trespass. I think it a right principle, however, that a Judge, of whatever grade, should be wholly irresponsible for mere matters of mistake in judgment, provided he has jurisdiction. No Magistrate would undertake the office, subject to the responsibility of an action if he happened to be wrong. I may add, however, that the infrequency of appeals either to the Quarter Sessions, or the Supreme Court, against magisterial decisions, is no accurate test of the correctness of magisterial decisions; because the poverty, or ignorance, or indifference of parties, in small cases, will naturally induce them to avoid litigation even where they feel that the Magistrate is wrong. I know personally of some serious mistakes by Magistrates, which have never come before the Court.

33. You adverted, Sir Alfred, to the Impounding Act just now—are you aware that the Magistrates under the Impounding Act assess the damages which parties have to pay under that Act? In some cases they have that duty to discharge; and we have had an appeal from the decision of Magistrates in one case, if not in more, under that Act.

34. The Magistrates are generally in the up-country districts country gentlemen, interested more or less in landed property? They, I presume, are so; but if that implies that they are the less competent, or the less desirable as judges in that particular matter, I am not of that opinion. The only Act that I know of which seems to require another class of functionaries for adjudicating, is the Masters' and Servants' Act; because there the Magistrates are all masters, and there is no Magistrate who is a servant.

35. They are then, in both cases, to some extent—more particularly under the Masters' and Servants' Act—judges, as a body, in their own cause? With respect to the last-mentioned Act they are to a large extent,—it has always seemed to me,—judges in their own cause.

36. Have you thought it at all—at any time—desirable that the Commission of the Peace should be purified? I have latterly thought that it is of importance that it should be; but the difficulty of successfully achieving the object, appears to me to be very great.

37. Has any improvement taken place, do you think, since the inauguration of Responsible Government? I should be sorry, even by an answer to a question so worded, to connect Responsible Government with the appointment of bad Magistrates. My opinion is, however, that the bad appointments of late years—say the last five—have been worse than all those made made in the previous fourteen; and I do not object to add, that under Responsible Government individual solicitations and too facile compliances are likely to be more frequent, than under the old system.

The Hon. Sir
A. Stephen,
Knt., C.J.

38. And do you think, Sir Alfred, that it is desirable that persons should be placed in the Commission of the Peace merely upon individual solicitations or representations? I think that it is highly inexpedient.

8 June, 1858.

39. I presume you conclude that Parliamentary or party influences may be brought to bear upon the appointment of individuals? It appears to me that they have probably formed one cause of some of the objectionable appointments to which I have referred.

40. It has occurred to this Committee that some improvement might take place if the appointments were dependant upon a recommendation from the Judges: what is your opinion upon that? The Judges are personally unacquainted with all but a small minority of the inhabitants, especially in the interior; and they would not therefore be capable from their own judgment of making a selection, although they might be very useful persons to advise as to the recommendations of others, and would be less likely to be influenced than probably other functionaries by political considerations, or even by feelings of friendship, in making a selection. We must bear in mind, that in future years political status will frequently determine even appointments to the Bench, if the usual English Rules prevail. But, even should this be so, a Judge so studiously and of necessity subduces and keeps in check his political tendencies, whatever they may be, that probably he will always be the best functionary to decide in such matters, if he shall only possess the adequate knowledge of individuals sought to be appointed. In England the appointment is exclusively by the Chancellor; but he always (or almost always) acts on the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant of each county; and the Lord Lieutenant in his turn, I apprehend, is ordinarily guided by his Deputies in the different parts of the county. These latter are almost invariably men of fortune and influence, frequently of rank, and always of education. There is here, consequently, a system of personal and individual responsibility, which on the plan of consulting the Judges as a body, or the Executive as a body, or both combined, could not be attained. It is perfectly well known that responsibility divided among many is rarely felt. And accordingly the great advantage of the selection of Judges for the English Bench being exclusively vested in and exercised by the Lord Chancellor, has always been thought to be that he exercises the power alone—and independently of the Cabinet at large. The Chancellor generally consults, it is said, the Chief Justices of the several Courts, but acts on his undivided responsibility alone. The case of the Attorney or Solicitor General obtaining ordinarily the Chief Justiceship is an excepted case. By general usage those functionaries, I believe, take a vacant Chief Justiceship as a matter of course, if they think fit. There are exceptions, and particularly in modern times; but that is the general rule. The difficulty as to the appointment of Justices, however, in this Colony, will be in obtaining the local knowledge required, even if there were an individual filling the post of Minister of Justice. But much might be done by submitting all recommendations to such a Minister, if there were one, and in the meantime to the united Bench of Judges—and requiring this as preliminary to every selection to the Magistracy. Nevertheless, I conceive that these appointments should rest with the Executive; until there shall be a Minister of Justice. The Bench, as a Bench, should not, I conceive, be the parties to appoint, though they might be parties to advise on the recommendations. It has occurred to me, that each local Bench of Justices might advantageously be called upon to report as to each individual recommended for their district. They might simply state, without assigning any reason, whether in their judgment the party proposed was eligible or ineligible. They would thus discharge the duties, in this respect, of the Deputy Lieutenants in the several counties.

41. Do you think the Judges might obtain the necessary information when on Circuit in the different districts? I do not see how they can. I have on Circuit seen persons, whom by observation I should have pronounced unfit for the Magistracy, but who I found were Magistrates, and a Judge therefore can form his opinion as to an individual, to whom his attention may have been drawn. But a priori he would have no such means in respect to a party recommended who was personally unknown to him. And the idea of subjecting a gentleman whom it was proposed to appoint to the Magistracy, to personal examination by the Judge, would be offensive, and in every way undesirable. Then, as to moral character, or the like, it would be impossible for the Judges to form any opinion without personal acquaintance or local information. I have, however, known two instances of habitual drunkards on the Bench; of whom I have seen one in that state in the streets.

42. You have said, Sir Alfred, that the appointments ought, of course, to remain vested in the Crown as they are now? I think that the Crown should act, in this respect, not by the Judges, but by its Responsible Ministers—commonly termed the Executive—unless there were some judicial officer occupying the position of Minister of Justice, whose peculiar function and duty should be to attend to this department.

43. Do you think, then, that the Parliamentary responsibility of the Ministers of the day would be sufficient to ensure proper appointments? They are, I conceive, collectively, more likely to possess the requisite knowledge of individuals than the Judges can be. Unitedly, no doubt, their responsibility in such a matter will not be so much felt, as if one of them acted individually; and they will moreover as a body be led to oblige, or be compelled to disoblige, an adherent in almost every instance. So far, therefore, their selection will inevitably be biased. But still I conceive that, for constitutional reasons, the responsibility should rest with them—and we must expect them to do their duty in this case as in others.

44. What would you think of this course, Sir Alfred: that the people in the different districts should elect individuals from whom the Government might select the Magistrates? I think that it would be a bad plan; and that on principle it is objectionable. I believe that the people at large, fairly consulted, and not externally operated upon, would in general, decide as correctly in such cases as any Ministry; but, I think that the people are more generally

The Hon. Sir
A. Stephen,
Knt., C.J.
8 June, 1858.

generally so operated on, and therefore do not so decide. America is a sufficient warning to us, I conceive, not to leave the appointment of judicial officers to election by the people. All the discredit which has attached to California, from the proceedings of the Committees of Safety there, I know, from reliable information, has arisen from the bad character or gross misconduct of elected Judges. Under our English system, the appointment of a disgraceful character to the Bench is a thing unheard of. Nor, I believe, has it often occurred, that improper parties are appointed Magistrates. But it is notorious that Judges and Magistrates in America are repeatedly elected from political feeling; and the Judge of one year may be Governor of the State the next.

45. Do you think that the ends of justice, in the Police Courts of the Colony, would be advanced by the general appointment of Police Magistrates for those Courts? I think that Police Magistrates are better than Benches of Magistrates almost universally; first, because each has undivided responsibility; secondly, because he makes magisterial duties his business. It becomes thus their interest as well as their duty to act correctly. Thirdly, they have more the eye of the public at large on them; and attention is, from a variety of causes, more alive to their proceedings. Fourthly, such appointments are more easily made, being few in number comparatively, than the numerous body comprising the magistracy at large. I would here mention a plan, which has suggested itself to my mind as having considerable recommendations. It is, that the Commission of the Peace should be divided:—that there should, for example, be one for each Circuit District—so that there shall be four Commissions for the Colony instead of one; and that, by express enactment, a new Commission shall issue for each district at a stated period. By this plan, applications and recommendations could only be attended to at that period; and the duty of selection would devolve on whatever Ministry might happen then to be in power. It might be so arranged, that one new Commission—or two Commissions, if thought desirable,—should issue every year. If one only, there being four Circuit Districts, the term of appointment would be obviously four years; or two years only, if two Commissions yearly were issued. But, when Moreton Bay is separated, there will remain three Circuit Districts only. One Commission yearly might then be issued for one such district; so that each Commission should last for three years only. The County of Cumberland might have its own separate Commission; which might be issued also once in every three years—a few months after that for the Bathurst Circuit, for example. There would thus be the opportunity afforded of periodical revision; and that separately for each district. It might be enacted that from every Commission thus periodically issued, there should be omitted the name of every person known to have been culpably lax or remiss in, or found to be unfit for his duties; or to whom any well-founded objection might exist, as shown by the experience of the three preceding years.

46. It is said that the Lord Chancellor never strikes a name from the magisterial list unless the party be convicted of crime? Such a rule as that was introduced, I believe, by Lord Eldon; but it has been condemned by high authority, and it appears to me to be highly injudicious. A man may have been perfectly well conducted when appointed, or he may have been erroneously supposed to be so, contrary to the fact; and misconduct may be established against him, during his period of service, though not of a kind subjecting him to any conviction or trial quite sufficient to disqualify him for the position of a Judge. Now, on the plan suggested, every Ministry would be relieved from the invidiousness either of striking out names unnecessarily, or issuing a new Commission unnecessarily; but the duty, being imposed by law, must be exercised by the Ministry in office at the particular period in each case appointed. Nor would any difficulty arise by thus dividing the Colony; inasmuch as by enactment it could be provided that every warrant shall take effect throughout the territory as at present. The only restriction need be, that a Magistrate appointed for one Circuit District should not sit, or act in any other district. It appears to me that a Commission for the whole Colony is far too unwieldy a thing, for any one period of revision to be really sufficient for the task of proper sifting, and too cumbrous for any one Ministry without compulsion to venture upon grappling with.

47. By Mr. Piddington: I wish to ask, Sir Alfred, one or two questions; more especially in reference to the fact that I have gathered from the preceding evidence, that you are of opinion that, within the last five years as great a number of gentlemen open to exception have been appointed to the Commission as during the preceding fourteen years of your experience. I think you state, also, that you do not see any necessity for connecting such objectionable appointments with the system of Responsible Government? Just so:—because I have known persons whom I think extremely objectionable appointed to the Magistracy before Responsible Government began.

48. Does it come within your knowledge that a circular was addressed to the Members of the Assembly by the Prime Minister, upon the inauguration of Responsible Government, inviting the several Members to recommend gentlemen of their own districts who were in their opinion, fit to be appointed to the Commission? I do not know any thing as to that matter. I have heard, however, that at the time when a new Commission was proposed to be issued for the Colony, about eighteen months or two years ago, a great number of individuals, supposed to be capable of recommending, or to be entitled to recommend, persons as Magistrates, were invited to send in such recommendations. I heard that many recommendations were submitted in pursuance of that invitation; and I know that an abstract was then made of those recommendations, in order that the names of the parties recommended, and of those recommending, should be submitted to the Cabinet, and each individual Minister be enabled to form his own opinion on the subject. The discussions in the Assembly last year shew that such was the course pursued. The Judges, however, were not among the persons applied to.

49. If a circular, such as that which I have described, was sent by the Prime Minister, upon the first introduction of Responsible Government, to all the Members of the Assembly indiscriminately, inviting them to pursue such a course, would you view that as likely to introduce duce a good or a bad system into the practice of appointment of Magistrates? If it could be reasonably expected of the representatives thus applied to, that they would recommend individuals irrespectively of personal partiality and political tendencies, such a system would be a good one; because the representatives of the several districts may be assumed to possess the confidence of the majority of the voters in those districts, and therefore to know who are proper persons for the office, and to be themselves trustworthy in discharging the duty of recommending such persons only. But it does also appear to me as probable, that the gentlemen so invited will recommend their own political adherents, and not those who are opposed to them.

The Hon. Sir
A. Stephen,
Knt., C.J.
8 June, 1858.

50. Then such a system would be likely to introduce into the Commission gentlemen who were recommended on account of their political partiality? I think that, so far, that system was a bad one. If it were possible to find persons, unconnected with or uninfluenced by politics, who should discharge the duty, they would of course be the persons both to recommend and appoint to the Magistracy.

51. But taking the whole question into consideration, you are not disposed to recommend such a mode of appointment as a judicious one? I do not think that such a course, on the whole, was judicious. The Bench of Magistrates in each particular locality, I think, would be the most competent parties to recommend, or at least to report on the eligibility of the persons recommended.

52. Adverting to the fact stated, that in Magisterial Courts (in the majority of instances) there are no checks in respect to the presence of advocates or the representatives of the press, do you not think that consideration ought to induce the authorities who appoint Magistrates to be more careful, in reference to the competency and general fitness of the gentlemen appointed to the Commission? Of course. That opinion is implied in my previous answers. In a distant district, one incompetent or malicious Magistrate may, without practical responsibility, do a large amount of mischief. But such a power does not, and I think scarcely ever can reside in any Judge of the Supreme Court.

53. Adverting to the mode by which Magistrates are appointed to the Commission of the Peace in England:—Might not a Lord Lieutenant, if he were a man of strong political views, recommend the appointment of gentlemen of his own party as proper persons for the Magistracy? I have no doubt that the Lieutenants of Counties not only can, but do, recommend their own political friends in preference to others; and, on the principles common to mankind in general, I suppose that their Deputies not infrequently do the same. These tendencies, however, are largely counteracted in England by regard for personal reputation and honor; each Lord Lieutenant feeling himself individually responsible for every recommendation,—and there being also a certain amount of pride in having the Magistrates of his county on a par with those of other counties. An intelligent yeoman of Somersetshire, or of Devon, will refer with exactly that feeling to the leading men, and among these to the Magistracy of his own county, as equal or superior to those of any other county; and he would not hesitate to express publicly his opinion of an improper appointment, as disgraceful to the county.

54. Although the practice does exist in England, imposing upon the Lord Lieutenant the duty of recommending gentlemen to the Magistracy, the Lord Chancellor is the officer who really appoints, I think you stated? Yes.

55. Would not the Judges of the Supreme Court possess as much local knowledge of persons, and their fitness for the place, as the Lord Chancellor; who, as the Equity Judge, does not go on circuit? Personally, the Judges who travel into the several counties have better opportunities than the Lord Chancellor has. But in point of fact in England there exists, in the Lord Lieutenant, a known and undivided responsibility for the recommendation of Magistrates; and the party recommending, however great his bias as a politician may be, has a deep personal stake in the county—and is likely, even for his own sake, to recommend both honestly and intelligently.

56. I think, Sir, you have stated that, if a functionary such as a Minister of Justice existed in this Colony, he would be a person to whom the duty of recommending gentlemen to the Commission might be safely entrusted? I think that one person, such as a Minister of Justice, whether you call him Chancellor or by any other name, would constitute a better department than a Bench of three or four Judges; but my difficulty is, that both in the one case and in the other sufficient means would not exist of personal knowledge, or of referring to responsible parties who do possess that knowledge. You may nominate the Local Bench for the latter purpose however; and if you had one Minister of Justice you could advantageously substitute him for the Ministry.

57. Would you recommend the right of appointment to be vested in a Minister of Justice if he were a Political Minister? I think that such an officer should hold office during good behaviour; as it is contemplated that the Minister of Justice shall do in England. I think, however, for the reasons already given, that one Political Minister for such a duty is better than five Political Ministers. My opinion is altogether in favor of separate and single responsibility, wherever attainable.

58. Upon that principle, Sir Alfred, would you conceive that the Attorney General for the time being is a suitable person, notwithstanding his political character, to recommend gentlemen to the Commission? I would rather have the Attorney General for the time being alone, or the Colonial Secretary for the time being alone, than I would have jointly them and their colleagues. I should like to be able to place the finger upon some one individual, as the person who had appointed a disreputable or unfit Magistrate—whereas now the responsibility of each appointment is shared among five; and even these probably do not know who was the party recommending. Not the Ministry only, however, but the public at large, should know on whom the responsibility of recommending rested.

59. You prefer the responsibility of one individual, to the responsibility of many? In all such cases I do.

The Hon. Sir
A. Stephen,
Knt., C.J.

8 June, 1858.

60. But apart from the degree of responsibility, and the difficulty of dividing it, or fixing it, do you recommend the Attorney General as a suitable person, notwithstanding his political character, to be entrusted with the appointment of Magistrates? I am not quite sure that I understand the purport of the question.

61. The object is in reference to the possibility of improving the character of the Magistracy: and I would wish to gather from you an opinion, in reference to that object; whether the character of a Responsible Minister under Responsible Government—whether he be called Attorney General or Colonial Secretary—would make him an undesirable person in that character to appoint to the Magistracy, or a desirable person? I think that the appointments to the Magistracy should, if possible, devolve exclusively upon a person, or upon persons, whose continuance in office is independent of political considerations.

62. But you feel adverse to deprive the Crown, or the Advisers of the Crown, of the right of appointment, I think? The Executive ought to be responsible, I conceive, for appointments to the Magistracy, as well as for other appointments; so long as the system continues what it is. But if you have one Minister of Justice, who alone shall appoint, the public will understand the change and the reason of it; and if, in addition, you have some responsible person, or body of persons, to recommend men as fit for the Magistracy, the public in like manner will know the parties responsible in each case.

63. In reference to the appointment of Magistrates in this country—have you ever given your attention to the system upon which the High Sheriffs of Counties in England are recommended and appointed? I have not. But the High Sheriff of a County, or an individual likely to be appointed High Sheriff, is far more likely to be known to the Judges in England, than the several magistrates can be here. The Sheriff moreover, on every circuit in England entertains the Judges, inviting the Magistracy and others to meet them; and the Judges become thus personally acquainted with the leading gentlemen of the county.

64. Have not the Judges of the Supreme Court an equal opportunity of being brought into personal communication with the various gentlemen of their respective circuits? The Judges have the opportunity, on circuit, of seeing a few of the Magistrates on the Bench, but have rarely opportunities there of communicating with them; and the Judges usually invite the Magistracy, or some of them, to their own lodgings to dinner, that they may have the advantage of cultivating or acquiring a personal acquaintance. But the Judges have not the responsibility of any one individual, to recommend persons not being already Magistrates. The opportunities of association, however, with the Magistrates who are good enough to accept such invitations, are perhaps as great, so far, as those enjoyed in England.

65. Is it not the practice, Sir Alfred, in England, for the Judges to be entertained by Magistrates simply in that capacity? I believe that the only person who officially entertains the Judges on the circuit is the High Sheriff, or the Lord Lieutenant. And obviously, so far as the opportunity of association between the Judges and the Sheriff goes, it cannot commence until the individual is appointed High Sheriff. I take for granted, that a Judge on circuit visits without restraint his private friends. But a Magistrate, I presume, would not ask a Judge to dinner unless he were previously acquainted with him.

66. In reference to the appointment of High Sheriffs—do not the Judges of England propose the names of three gentlemen connected with the various counties as fit persons to hold that high office? Without refreshing my memory, I cannot state with accuracy the course pursued. The Judges, I believe, send in three names for each county, at a stated period; and the selection from these is called “pricking the Sheriffs,” because it used to be anciently done with a pin.

67. You think the means of information in this country, notwithstanding the comparative smallness of the population, is not sufficient to afford the Judges an opportunity of recommending a sufficient number of persons to the Crown? I think that population being in England so much more concentrated, and the means of information much more numerous and accessible, the Judges in England are better able to select Magistrates than a Judge is here. I think, however, that even in England a Judge would, without assistance from others, be extremely puzzled to select the Magistracy. There is comparatively little difficulty in suggesting two or three persons as eligible for the office of Sheriff, and perhaps the Judge could almost as easily suggest half-a-dozen; but even these, I think, it will be found are suggested to the Judge himself, by those in the county on whose responsibility he feels that he can rely—such as probably the Sheriff then in office, or the Lord Lieutenant, or some personal friends or friend in the county.

68. As I understood your plan, Sir Alfred—the dividing the country into four districts, and issuing a new Commission every year, and leaving the appointments in the hands of the Responsible Ministers:—if that be the plan proposed—would it not be open to the objection that such a plan is a mode of indirect election of Magistrates? My answer is, that it can be no more an indirect election of Magistrates than the present system is. It is no plan for transferring the power, or the recommendation, but merely for dividing the Colony for the purpose of more careful and minute examination, and sifting of names—on the simple principle that to deal with sixty names, and the pretensions of sixty persons, is easier and less dangerous than were the number two hundred and forty. This plan will also compel a periodical revision, and make it very difficult for individuals efficaciously to recommend improper persons; because when the time comes for appointing their friends, another Ministry may be in power; or, if the recommendation be at the exact period for a new Commission, more public attention will be invited to the occasion, and therefore to each new name.

69. It would restrict the Magistrates, in their right to adjudicate, to their own district, I think? Yes. But in my opinion that is desirable; and it is the system in England. A gentleman appointed to the Goulburn Circuit District for instance could not act out of that District.

70. By Mr. Forster: I think, Sir Alfred, you stated your opinion that certain general causes, which are common to all modes of Parliamentary Government, affected or impaired the the efficiency of the Magistrates of this Colony? I do not know that I can trace altogether to political partialities, in point of fact, the appointment of any one individual. This is matter merely of opinion, perhaps; but I speak of the tendencies of the human mind.

The Hon. Sir
A. Stephen,
Knt., C.J.

8 June, 1858.

71. But still, that certain evil influences, more or less, have not decreased since Responsible Government came into operation? On the contrary, I think that they have increased:—

72. And, I think, you also stated that you have not found the same causes operate, so as to impair the efficiency of the Police Magistrates? I think that the same causes will also operate there:—but the appointment itself is so much more strictly judicial, the individual's life becomes to a large extent so judicial in character, that whatever may have been the tendencies which led to the appointment they would become almost inoperative. If, moreover, such an officer be incompetent, or of discreditable character, the impropriety of the appointment is notorious, and is little likely to be screened from observation, or to obtain sympathy.

73. Then you think the same principle in some degree protects the Police Magistrate from those causes which operate to impair the efficiency of the unpaid Magistrates, to some extent? I do not suggest, observe, that political tendencies operate on the minds of unpaid Magistrates. My opinion is, merely,—

74. That inferior appointments are made, in consequence of those political influences acting? I think so, certainly.

75. But you think it does not generally act so strongly in the case of Police Magistrates? I think not. But, even if it did, the particular individual appointed,—acting as he generally does alone, and on his own responsibility,—ceases after a year or two to remember the influences which led to his appointment. The responsibility, moreover, of appointing a single Police Magistrate is necessarily felt to be something serious;—not at all like that of introducing sundry names, here and there, by way of compliment, into a crowded list, in a general Commission.

76. Then do I understand you that in the one case there is an easier mode of enforcing direct responsibility than in the other:—that that is the cause of one being a better class of men than the other? I think that there have been instances of injudicious appointments to the office of Police Magistrate: but I have explained why, as I think, such appointments are more likely to be the reverse.

77. But supposing on the whole the Police Magistrates to be generally a better class—does not that lead to the inference that one mode of correcting the evils complained of would be the extension of Police Magistrates throughout the country? I think that if there were a Police Magistrate on every Bench, justice would probably be better administered, than it is likely to be on a Bench where there was no Police Magistrate. I think so chiefly because I conceive that—supposing all other things to be equal, he who acts on not merely undivided responsibility, but a responsibility which is practical, and that affects his means of livelihood, and moreover who makes the magisterial office his study and daily duty, must be the most efficient and useful person in that office.

78. By the Chairman: Supposing those appointments were extended more generally, might not the local knowledge of the Magistrates themselves be made available to furnish the Government with information which would bear upon the subject in appointing other Magistrates—unpaid Magistrates? Exactly so. If you require a recommendation from each Bench, the Police Magistrate will participate in their deliberations.

79. In that case might not a combination of the two systems—that is, of the paid Police Magistrates, scattered throughout the country, acting with the unpaid Magistrate,—operate beneficially? Yes; I think that it would. I believe, in fact, that such is the present system. The Police Magistrates indeed do not always sit alone, even when taking on themselves the larger share of the responsibility or the labour.

80. By Mr. Forster: In parts of the country where Police Magistrates have not been appointed, owing to the distance, should not you say that there they are as much required as anywhere? I conceive that Police Magistrates are, as a general rule, more required in remote localities than they are in thickly populated towns—much more. In Sydney, for instance, if a roster for due attendance could be enforced, you might more easily dispense with a Police Magistrate, than in some of the distant districts. There is a large body of unpaid Magistrates, also, around Goulburn and Bathurst. But, in several districts, you may travel thirty miles without finding one Magistrate; and in some districts a Bench is holden, I understand, once a fortnight only.

81. You are altogether opposed to the principle of popular election to the Magistracy? Yes; decidedly.

82. In admitting such a principle, would you not consider that there would be great danger—once admitting it—that it might be extended to the higher Judges—to higher Courts? I have already intimated so much. I think such a system bad in principle. If good for Magistrates, I do not know why it should not extend to Judges of the Supreme Court; and the result, I fear, would be fatal ere long to the character of the Bench. In proportion as a man shall have made himself acceptable to the mass of the community, so will he be more or less likely to be elected a Judge. His judicial qualifications they would have little means of knowing.

I will ask leave here to add one recommendation, on a subject closely connected, indirectly, if not directly, with the subject under inquiry. It is this:—that the administration of justice by Magistrates generally would be much improved, or, at the least, facilitated and expedited, were more attention paid to the appointment of Clerks of the Bench. In very many instances, the assistance of an adequately educated clerk would be found almost invaluable. Mistakes fallen into by Magistrates are very frequently mistakes of form, or mistakes on technical points, or arising from unacquaintance with certain requisites; from most of which errors a properly instructed Clerk of the Bench would guard them. I recommended, some years ago, to the Government, that no such clerk should be appointed, or at least be allowed allowed to enter on his duties, without passing an examination (which need not be of a very rigorous kind) before a competent board. He ought to be examined in Sir John Jervis' Acts, and otherwise, as to the mode of procedure in magisterial cases; and should be expected to possess some general acquaintance with the more simple and general rules of evidence, of which Magistrates are too commonly ignorant. In England the Clerks of the several Benches are almost invariably professional men. They are allowed private practice, and the fact of holding the appointment is at once a certificate of character and a recommendation to business. A considerable portion of the smaller matters at the Police Offices in London is practically transacted by the clerks; and, in the country, their advice and legal knowledge, in cases of the greatest importance, are often found to be quite indispensable.

The Hon. Sir A. Stephen, Knt., C.J.
 8 June, 1858.

MEMORANDUM.

The Chief Justice desires to supplement his oral examination by the following observations:—He wishes so far to qualify his recommendation of a paid Magistracy, as to observe that there are political and constitutional considerations, which he thought himself not called upon to discuss, of a strongly opposing tendency; or at least highly favorable to the combined existence of the body of unpaid and independent Justices, notwithstanding any multiplication of paid functionaries. His Honor also wishes to add to his answers respecting the selection of Sheriffs, that by statute certain of the Cabinet are associated with the Judges, in the duty of selecting the three names for each county, to be submitted to the Sovereign—the Judges and Officers so associated being first sworn, to present such names only as they shall believe to be those of the fittest persons.

MR. PIDDINGTON,
MR. PARKES,MR. MURRAY,
MR. LEE,

MR. FORSTER.

T. A. MURRAY, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

His Honor Mr. Justice Dickinson called in and examined:—

His Honor
Mr. Justice
Dickinson.

9 June, 1858.

1. By the Chairman: You are one of the Judges of the Supreme Court? I am.
2. How long have you been in that position? Almost fourteen years.
3. And of course have had many opportunities of observing the state of the Magistracy of the Colony? The proceedings of the Magistracy in those matters which have come before the Court.
4. Do you think the Magistracy as a body admit of improvement or not? I have no means of answering that question; but from what I have seen of the proceedings of the Magistracy in the Court, during the fourteen years I have sat in it, I think upon the whole that the business is done very well.
5. Has it come to your knowledge that there are any objectionable persons in the Commission of the Peace? No; I have no knowledge of the matter.
6. Do you think it would be desirable that the Commission of the Peace should be subject to periodical revision? I have not considered that question at all, but I think it might not be undesirable,—once in six or seven years perhaps.
7. That is to say, on general principles, without any reference at all to the gentlemen composing the Bench? It so happens that my acquaintance is not very extensive.
8. We wish to make the inquiry general—not at all adverting to particular cases? I should think upon general principles it might be so.
9. Could you suggest any mode of effecting such a mode of periodical revision? No, that point has not occurred to me, and I really am not in a position to do so.
10. It has been brought under the notice of the Committee, that there are great objections now to the mode in which appointments are made, in consequence of the influences which are brought to bear upon the Ministers of the day, in the way of parliamentary or party support—that their friends press upon them the appointment of objectionable persons which they, from the peculiar position in which they are placed in Parliament, and also during elections, are unable to resist; and that this has led in some instances to very objectionable appointments. Do you think it desirable that we should still adhere to that plan of vesting those appointments in the Ministers of the Crown or the Government of the day? I think so; it is in accordance with my notions of constitutional government, that the appointment of magistrates should be vested in the Executive.
11. What is the course in England, in reference to the appointment of magistrates? The course is that the Lord Lieutenant of the County recommends to the Lord Chancellor, which recommendation is almost always attended to as a matter of course. There was an instance some years ago—somewhere about 1841 or 1842—in which a Mr. Paget, a gentleman of very great respectability, in Leicestershire, but in politics in opposition to the Lord Lieutenant of the County—the Duke of Newcastle applied (or his friends applied) to the Duke to nominate him. The Duke declined to nominate him, and application was made to the Lord Chancellor in person, who appointed him. Thereupon the Duke of Newcastle wrote a very intemperate letter to the Lord Chancellor, for which the Lord Chancellor deprived him of his Lord Lieutenancy. The appointment is formally made by the Lord Chancellor, but virtually by the Lord Lieutenant of the County, doubtless acting upon the suggestions of the body of magistrates of his county.

12. The appointment is made by the Crown on the recommendation of the Lord Chancellor, to whom recommendations are made by the Lord Lieutenant of the County? The Crown, by the advice of the Lord Chancellor, makes the appointments upon the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant of the County.

His Honor
Mr. Justice
Dickinson.

9 June, 1858.

13. But in this Colony it appears that the Government makes the appointment without any recommendation by any functionary? There is one general Commission of the whole Colony, instead of, as in England, a Commission for particular counties, and there is no such officer here as Lord Lieutenant coming in between the Crown and the magistracy.

14. Would you think it desirable to adopt any such plan in this Colony so far as we could in regard to particular counties or particular districts? I think it might be a desirable thing that the Crown should not appoint, unless upon the recommendation of some of the general body of the magistrates in the district. I suggest them because I know that they have a great deal to do with the recommendations of the Lords Lieutenant of the Counties in England, and there are no such persons as Lords Lieutenant here.

15. Are you aware at all whether the recommendation of Members of Parliament is sought for in England? I am not aware at all. I never heard. The recommendations of Members of Parliament are sought for ministerially, as a matter of course, and it is one of the modes by which Governments gain their adherents, or keep them, in the House of Commons—that is, recommendations with regard to offices of profit. I never heard of such recommendations being sought for in the case of county magistrates; I should think not, because all interest there must be made with the Lord Lieutenant of the County.

16. But the peculiar position in which country gentlemen are placed in this Colony must, I think, create a marked distinction between them and the country gentlemen in England? I am not sufficiently acquainted with the country gentlemen here to say, but I should have thought they had here the same analogous position that they had in England.

17. I presume a number of magistrates have from time to time been sworn in before you? Yes.

18. Have you ever been struck with the deficiencies of any in point of education, by the manner in which they read the oaths? I have on several occasions—not in a great many, but on several occasions—and I think more so lately than formerly. I think twice I have heard a gentleman reading the oath in an intonation of voice which did not seem to be that of an educated man, and say “the form of the statue in such cases made and provided,” instead of, “the form of the statute in such cases made and provided.” Then, I have seen also gentlemen come to take the oath as magistrates, who, from their appearance, evidently had been in much humbler circumstances, but whose demeanour evinced considerable intelligence and respectability. But I have seen gentlemen of the class you have mentioned, whose whole demeanour betokened inferiority.

19. But such cases as those would be very unlikely to occur in England? Very unlikely.

20. Nevertheless they do occur here? They occur here, and occasionally in England, but not very often. But in England, persons who rise from business of any kind, and make their independence—as great numbers do who go into the country, and get together a property—they very soon, if they possess conciliatory manners, and if they wish it, get into the Commission of the Peace. There is this distinction, it strikes me, between the position of magistrates in England and that of the magistrates in this Colony; there, the proceedings of the Police Courts are watched by an intelligent public, and generally by professional people, wherever there is a paid magistrate; but I do not think they often are here before country magistrates, unless in a case of murder, or of great public interest.

21. Not in Petty Sessions? I think not, judging from the newspapers. I never saw the cases reported, but they may be, for aught I know, in the country newspapers.

22. It is obviously desirable that objectionable appointments—appointments objectionable from deficiency of education, or any other cause—should be avoided? Oh! undoubtedly it is advantageous to the public. To take any other course would be lowering the dignity of the individuals who have already come forth to be appointed.

23. And tends to destroy the confidence which the under classes of society have in the administration of justice? In certain cases.

24. No moral effects are injurious? Unquestionably.

25. Could you suggest to the Committee any mode whereby a recurrence of such appointments can be guarded against? The only mode which occurs to me at present is one which I ventured to suggest to a commission, of which I was a member some ten years ago, (it was rather laughed at at the time,) which was this:—That no person should be appointed to the Commission of the Peace unless he had been at a Solicitor's or Barrister's chambers twelve months, and could produce a certificate to that effect,—having studied the law.

26. But the vocations in which men in the country are engaged would prove an insuperable bar? Yes; that was pointed out to me at the time.

27. What would you think of this that has been suggested to the Committee:—That the appointments should be dependant upon a recommendation from the Judges? I think it is highly objectionable. In the first place it would be very hard upon the Judges to begin with. It would be a very invidious office to be continually declining, as they might have to do, the names of gentlemen, and to recommend gentlemen. Secondly, it would take up a great deal of time if they discharged their duties properly, inquiring into the antecedents and respectability of individuals. It is a matter entirely foreign to their office, and a duty which they never contemplated fulfilling when they accepted the offices they hold.

28. You think the Judges, then, could not easily ascertain the information which it would be desirable to have? Oh! I think, with great difficulty. We should have to write letters to all parts of the country, and perhaps we might obtain information by means of letters begging that the name might not be mentioned, and we might be placed in a situation of deciding against the qualifications of particular gentlemen, without giving them an opportunity of being heard.

His Honor
Mr. Justice
Dickinson.

9 June, 1858.

29. Still, of course, it is very desirable that the due administration of justice should be provided for in the minor courts of the Colony? Unquestionably.
30. The poor man is entitled to have every protection given to him? Undoubtedly he is.
31. And the ensuring of that protection heightens the tone of the man's own character? Of course.
32. Then do you think that that object might be carried out by a more general appointment of Police Magistrates—paid functionaries? Yes; I think a paid functionary in every township, where a sufficiently large community existed, would be highly desirable.
33. In every township where Courts of Petty Sessions were held? Yes.
34. And that he should be well acquainted with the law? So well acquainted that, I think, he ought not to be appointed unless he underwent some kind of test.
35. The difficulties, then, that are to some extent complained of, might be obviated by that course? I think so, because he would be a great assistance to other magistrates, and if the person appointed possessed sufficient qualifications, he might be a good example to gentlemen of inferior attainments—that is to say, of inferior legal attainments.
36. It has been suggested to the Committee that the Commission of the Peace should be subject to periodical revision in this way:—that an Act should be passed, rendering it imperative on the Government, for the time being, to issue a new Commission every three years for the different districts of the Colony, and that each Commission should be subjected, in the first instance, to the approval of the Judges. Thus, for instance, a Commission of the Peace should be issued for the Southern District one year, a Commission of the Peace for the Western District another year, and a Commission of the Peace for the Northern District the third year, subject, of course, to the approval of the Judges;—then no gentleman would be in the Commission of the Peace for more than three or four years, and every three or four years it might be purged in regard to persons who notoriously became objectionable? I think that would excite a great deal of unpleasant feeling throughout the whole Colony. There might be a great many inquisitorial proceedings going on, and persons might feel highly aggrieved at the uncertain tenure of their offices, and I do not think they would value their offices or dignity so as to carry themselves in a very dignified manner. And then, with regard to the appointments being subject to the approval of the Judges, I must confess I think it is a matter altogether foreign to the judicial office, and would tend very much to bring the Judges into undesirable collision with many individuals in the community.
37. You think the Judges should be held quite aloof from all proceedings of this sort? I think so, certainly.
38. And that the substantial ends of justice in the minor courts of the Colony may be obtained by the appointment of competent Police Magistrates in all cases? I think so.
39. What would you think of such a clause as this in any Bill that may be passed on the subject—the second clause of the Bill:—“At the expiration of six months after the accession to office of each succeeding Governor, or Governor General, the Commission of every unpaid Justice of the Peace in force at the time of such accession, shall cease and determine.” Periodical revision seems a very desirable object, because it is in evidence before us—although the names are not mentioned—that certain parties, who are notorious drunkards, have been seen from time to time reeling about the streets, are still in the Commission of the Peace, and have been for years? Well, I think it would be more desirable to have a distinct proceeding against every such individual, and then and there to cashier him, if necessary, without subjecting the whole Commission to revision, and thereby diminishing their tenure of office, and, in fact making the office rather an undignified one, I think.
40. Has it come under your particular notice that gentlemen fully qualified by position and attainments rather avoid it than seek it at present? It has not; I have never heard it mentioned.
41. By Mr. Piddington: If gentlemen in this country are proposed as fit persons to hold the office of magistrate, chiefly on account of their political support rendered to a Member of the Assembly, do you think that such recommendations as those ought to be attended to by the Executive? I think the Executive never should appoint any person, by whomsoever recommended, unless they have taken some pains to find out whether he was a proper person. Having ascertained that, or having probable reason to suppose so, I think the particular quarter from which the recommendation comes should not affect the appointment itself; and, moreover, looking at the thing fairly in the face, it is unavoidable in the nature of Government. Persons in the position of legislators have certain influences upon Ministers, and their constituents would naturally seek their assistance. They could hardly look to anybody so properly, I think, as their representatives.
42. Do you think it desirable that anything like political colour of cast should be introduced into the appointment of magistrates? I do not clearly understand your meaning.
43. If the appointment of magistrates depends upon Members of the Assembly, would not such a mode of appointment necessarily tend to introduce to the magistracy gentlemen of a political cast? Every man has political views and feelings of some kind, and considering that here there is a frequent change of Ministry—considering we have a change of Ministers somewhere about every three years in England, and a change, on an average, every year here, and that there will be, probably, for some time to come—one set of politicians will counter-balance another set, probably.
44. If you will excuse me, you made use of the words “depends upon the recommendations of the Legislature.” I presume you did not intend exclusively upon their recommendation? I do not precisely understand you.
45. If a practice has grown up in this country in reference to the recommendation of magistrates that tends to make a recommendation from a political adherent of the Ministers the chief ground upon which a gentleman is appointed, would you consider that a desirable plan upon which magistrates should be appointed? No. It should certainly not be the chief ground, but I think it is a fair ground if the Ministry find, upon inquiry, that the gentleman gentleman recommended is a proper person. It is one mode in which the people at large would be appointing the magistrates, the appointments being made on the recommendation of their own representatives, by the Ministers who, by the representatives of the people, are allowed to conduct the affairs of the State.

His Honor
Mr. Justice
Dickinson.

9 June, 1858.

46. But under Responsible Government a community is generally divided into two parties, one party supporting the Ministers for the time being, and one in opposition—is it not likely, if Members of the Assembly recommended gentlemen to the appointment, that the Ministers will look with more favor upon the recommendation of one of their own supporters than upon the recommendation of one of their political opponents? As a matter of course; undoubtedly.

47. I think you referred to the case of an English magistrate—Mr. Paget—who was refused the appointment to the Commission by the Lord Lieutenant of the County, on account of his political predilections? Yes.

48. And I think you stated that the Lord Chancellor exercised his authority by appointing that gentleman without reference to the refusal of the Lord Lieutenant? He did so.

49. Those facts are facts showing that it is considered in England that political predilections ought not to be the test of the appointment of magistrates? Oh! yes, or rather that political predilections should be no bar to the appointment of a magistrate.

50. Do you think there is any very great objection to a plan propounded by His Honor the Chief Justice to the Committee, which plan appeared to be one intended to divide the Colony into three or four districts, and to make it necessary that a periodical Commission of the Peace should issue, say at an interval of two or three years? I see no objection to the division of the Colony into districts, analagous to the division of England into counties, and having a particular body to act in each district as magistrates for each county; but, for the reasons I have stated, I think it is undesirable that there should be a frequent revision of the list with a view to turn out persons in the Commission. I think the proper plan would be, when an individual has been guilty of any particular act, to deal with him in his own case, without implicating the rest of the body in his delinquency.

51. Do you think the same objection would be tenable against a proposition to issue a Commission with the advent of every new Governor? I think it would, because the general term of a Governor is six years, and no magistrate would feel that he had obtained his dignity and station in society for any secure tenure.

52. By Mr. Lee: I think I understand you to say that it was your opinion that Police Magistrates should be appointed to the country districts in particular? Yes, sir.

53. Do you think it would not be advisable for the Benches of Magistrates to approve of any person applying to be put on the Commission of the Peace? I think it is highly desirable that the Bench of Magistrates of any particular place should be consulted before an appointment is made—not to say whether they approve of him or not, but whether they can assign any reason against his appointment.

54. By Mr. Forster: I think you intimated that whatever evils had occurred in practice, you would be unwilling in any way to approve of any changes which would affect the general principle that the Executive Government is responsible for all these appointments? Yes.

55. You would not wish to divest them in any way of that undivided responsibility? Certainly not.

56. I think you stated also, that you considered that the general appointment of Police Magistrates throughout the territory would, to a great extent, obviate almost all the evils complained of, since the introduction of Responsible Government in this country, that is, so far as the character of the magistracy is concerned? Without giving an answer as to the particular time—since the advent of Responsible Government—it is my opinion if there was a Police Magistrate appointed everywhere, where there was a Bench of Magistrates, it would be a great advantage to the districts, provided the person appointed was a gentleman of legal attainments. Being a person of legal attainments, and having gone through a course of education, pro tanto, whatever his mind may have been, he would improve, and be of great assistance to the magistrates of the district. He would shew them how the business ought to be conducted, and by acting along with them, and they with him, the Bench would be improved.

57. You consider, then, that a Police Magistrate ought to be superior in point of example and authority to the other magistrates; but I do not understand whether you say you would confer any extra powers upon him by law? Oh! certainly not.

58. He should be equal? They should be equal.

59. But he should, by his example and the authority he possesses—he should in that respect have a virtual superiority over the other magistrates? My opinion is, that if a person of legal education was appointed, he would be much more likely than others to conduct the business efficiently and expeditiously, and being a paid magistrate, as he ought to be, he would in a short time, by attention, attain facility in the despatch of business; and the result of that example on the magistrates, I think, would be to enhance the efficiency of the whole Bench.

60. Are you not of opinion that the appointment of Police Magistrates would be desirable from economical considerations? Looking at the surface of the thing, I look upon the appointment of Police Magistrates as adding so much to the expenses of the country.

61. In that case, I take it that your opinion as regards the general question before us is, that the evils we complain of will in some degree correct themselves, and may also be corrected by the general appointment of Police Magistrates? I think so.

62. You do not then come to the conclusion that any alteration of the statute law is necessary? I think not.

63. I think I understood you to say, with regard to those propositions that have been placed before you as to the continual revision or the periodical revision of the magistracy—I think I understood your opinion to be, that a magistrate once appointed ought to be somewhat in the the position of a Judge—that he ought to hold office during good behaviour, and not be dismissed on a mere revision? Not for the purpose of convenience. I think you cannot make the dignity too important an one.

61. At the same time, you are of opinion, are you not, that a certain number of unpaid magistrates would be necessary in every district to act with the Police Magistrate and to be a check upon him? Yes.

65. To act almost like a jury? Why, they will always have an equal voice; it is highly desirable that there should be a Bench of unpaid magistrates along with those paid functionaries.

66. Would they not generally act as a jury in reference to the Police Magistrate? Yes, generally, if they had confidence in him, (and it is supposed that the Government would not appoint any but competent men,) and if he was a competent man, he would shew his superiority to them in points of law, and necessarily acquire their confidence.

67. Supposing a certain number of unpaid magistrates are necessary in every district, do we not arrive at the conclusion that it would be injudicious to take too high an order of education—that we must content ourselves with respectability and moral character, provided we cannot get these highly-educated men in the particular locality to which the case might refer? I think so. I think a man, shrewd, of common sense and good character, may be a very good magistrate though he is uneducated. I will mention an instance:—One of the best magistrates of the City of London is Alderman Humphrey, and he is a very uneducated man; he speaks awfully bad grammar, but he is an admirable magistrate. Sir Peter Laurie is a keen magistrate, but altogether an uneducated man.

68. But you would infer that a certain character as to respectability and moral character ought always to be insisted upon? Certainly.

69. But not too high an order of education? Certainly not.

70. With regard to another proposition that I think Sir Alfred Stephen placed before the Committee; that is, the proposition to divide the Colony into different jurisdictions—four or five—are you of opinion that it is more convenient that magistrates should have jurisdiction over the entire territory, than that it should be confined to certain districts? I have not considered that question at all; but the old system seems to have worked so successfully in England for a long time, that I think it would be better to pursue the English system. Although the magistrate's jurisdiction is confined to his own district, it can be referred, if necessary, to another district.

71. Has it come to your knowledge that any difficulties have occurred which would be obviated by the other system? I cannot say that such difficulties have occurred to my mind. I think the difficulties cannot exist, because every magistrate is really, virtually, acting for his own district.

72. Has it not occurred to you that it might rather be a convenience—considering the circumstances of the Colony, and the difficulty which sometimes exists in the transfer of warrants from one district to another—to retain jurisdiction over the entire territory? I have not given consideration to the matter; it has never been presented to my mind.

73. Supposing the convenience should be admitted, would you say there are any other cogent reasons the other way? No, certainly not.

74. By the Chairman: What would you think of the appointment of a Minister of Justice in the Colony? I think it would be highly advantageous.

75. Do you think appointments to the Commission of the Peace might depend upon his recommendation? I think they should depend upon his nomination to his brother ministers.

76. You are in favor of such an appointment? I think it would be a very great improvement.

John Hubert Plunkett, Esq., Q. C., called in and examined:—

J. H. Plunkett,
Esq., Q. C.

9 June, 1838.

1. By the Chairman: You were Attorney General of this Colony for a very long time? Yes.

2. How many years? I received my appointment as Solicitor General in October, 1831, and continued in that office until March, 1836, when I received the appointment of Attorney General—and I held the latter office until two years ago; when, on the introduction of Responsible Government, I resigned, and was released from office.

3. During that period, of course, you have had many opportunities of observing the general state of the magistracy of the Colony? Yes; for many years it was peculiarly under my control, so far as recommending and advising the Governor with respect to appointments, and considering myself responsible for those made under my advice. However, my responsibility ceased about the year 1840, as well as I can recollect, when Sir George Gipps took the matter into his own hands, and appointed without any interference or even advice of mine.

4. He made the appointments himself? Yes; and I don't know how information was received after that with a view to filling up the magistracy.

5. The appointments in the first instance were made on your own recommendation and subject to your advice? Sir Richard Bourke considered it was necessary that some one officer should be responsible, in order that it should be his business to make inquiries, and then to report to the Governor and recommend. Something in analogy to the manner in which recommendations are made in the mother country; first through the Lord Lieutenant or Custos Rotulorum of the County to the Lord Chancellor, who is the responsible Government officer ultimately to make the appointment. As well as I recollect, it was by way of analogy to that state of things that Sir Richard Bourke thought it desirable to lay down that course for himself.

6. That was in accordance with the usage in England? Yes, and in Ireland as well.

7. Did you consider yourself responsible for the appointments made during his administration after this arrangement was come to? Yes.

8. And how did you satisfy yourself as to the eligibility of parties? Why, at that time it was was much easier to ascertain the number of persons that were fit for the magistracy throughout the country than since it became more extensive, and during the time the responsibility was thrown upon me I took care to make every inquiry that it was possible to make to satisfy myself as to the fitness of the individual for the Bench before I made the recommendation, and I felt no great difficulty in doing so. I also thought it my duty to make recommendations where I thought the Bench required some fresh blood. I have recommended gentlemen who were not very palatable to some Benches at that particular time; but I never saw reason afterwards to regret having recommended them. I recollect two gentlemen particularly; one is now a Member of the Council, and has always been a Member of the Legislature since its first establishment, and one was formerly a Member of the first Legislature; both of whom were put into the Commission of the Peace on my recommendations, and some members of the Benches respectively which they afterwards formed a part of, were so angry at their appointment, that they threatened not to sit with them; however, the threat was not carried into effect, and such appointments I believe afterwards were acknowledged to be useful and satisfactory, even by those who were hostile to them at first.

9. Have you ever had any reason to question the propriety or expediency of the principle that then prevailed? I think the general principle that prevailed then was a very sound one—that is, throwing the responsibility on some one officer, whom the public could point to as the person responsible for the state of the magistracy.

10. Who is responsible now? No one in particular, that I am aware of.

11. By Mr. Forster: No individual? No individual. I may state, that after I was relieved from the responsibility by Sir George Gipps, (which I had no objection to, because it eased me of a very serious responsibility,) I was anxious to make it generally known that I was so relieved, because, as many appointments were made that I could not account for, I thought it right that I should not be answerable for either good or bad appointments with which I had nothing to do. The appointments continued to be made by the Governor without my privity, until a year or two after Sir Charles Fitz Roy came here, and then, on the issuing of a general Commission, I recollect Sir Charles Fitz Roy (in consequence of some comments in the press, I think,) went through the form of consulting the Executive Council as to the lists. He put it before the Executive Council. Numerous recommendations came in, that several individuals should be added to the Commission, from highly respectable gentlemen—Members of the Legislature, and others; and, although I gave my opinion of those candidates I knew anything about, there were a great many others of whom I knew nothing—neither did my colleagues—and I had no means of satisfying myself, as a Member of the Executive Council, whether they were proper persons or not. Not having any single responsibility, I did not feel justified in writing to any persons in the country about them, or making those particular inquiries that I not only felt I was called upon to make when the responsibility was upon myself officially and individually, and which I felt it was particularly my duty to make. And, therefore, many persons were inserted in the Commission of the Peace entirely on doubtful recommendations of irresponsible, and often interested persons, without any certain knowledge of their fitness. Some names were objected to, but afterwards inserted in the Commission.

12. By the Chairman: Were any of the names proposed at that time, during the administration of Sir Charles Fitz Roy, and which were objected to, nevertheless included in the Commission? Some of them were left out of the general Commission issued, but afterwards I found some of the same names were gazetted without consulting the Council at all.

13. Then, in point of fact, the decision of the Executive Council in the matter was null and void? I looked upon it as a form, the use of which I did not well see. When I knew at the moment, in consequence of what was stated at the Council table, some fresh information was required, or that some decided objection was made to the individuals, which put them aside for the time. Then, afterwards—in a month or two, or some short time afterwards—I found that these persons who were set aside were put in afterwards, and, so far as I could understand, it was in consequence of the pressure of applications from friends of the candidates—some who were Members of the Legislative Council, others who were not in the Council, but who pressed it as a favor to themselves that their friends should be nominated. It appeared to me a useless form.

14. Do you think, then, that in consequence of such appointments during the administration of Sir Charles Fitz Roy, that the character of the magistracy was impaired? I certainly think so. I may have peculiar, and perhaps too strict notions about the magistracy, but I think that no man ought to be appointed to the magistracy who is not known to be a person, in every respect qualified for it. I have always thought it is due to those already in the Commission not to appoint any man if there be any doubt about his entire fitness for it; therefore, I think, on account of what is due to magistrates already in the Commission, but more particularly what is due to the persons among whom justice is to be administered, no dubious appointment ought to be made; for, in the country districts more especially, the appointments to the magistracy more nearly come home to the great bulk of the people than even the appointment of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and we know one bad appointment is likely to bring discredit upon the magistracy, and to take away that confidence which the people ought to have in the administration of justice as they see it before their eyes, and as it comes home to their own feelings and interests.

15. Have you observed any improvement at all in the appointments since the inauguration of Responsible Government? I have not considered it very attentively, as I have had nothing to do with it; I did not make any very critical inquiry to satisfy myself, so as to speak with any degree of certainty about it; but I have heard that many appointments have been made which ought not to have been made, and which could not be accounted for in any way but the wish of the Ministry of the day to oblige their political friends, at the expense of the administration of justice. I have heard such observations made, and I have reason to know there is such an impression in many parts of the Colony.

J.H. Plunkett,
Esq., Q.C.

9 June, 1858.

16. Do you think, then, the magistracy as a body now commands the confidence of the great mass of the people in the country districts? I think, looking to the body of the magistracy, there are as good magistrates—men of as high qualifications for the office—in this country as in any part of the British Dominions; but they are now so diversified, and so many persons not highly, or perhaps at all, qualified for the office among them, that I do not think, altogether, it is calculated to command that confidence in the administration of justice that could be wished. In the first place, it is never certain what magistrates will sit, and it depends very much on the persons who happen to form the Bench on any particular occasion whether the people have confidence in the decisions or not.

17. Has it come under your own knowledge that any objectionable people are at present in the Commission of the Peace—we do not want names, but merely your opinion on the subject generally? I cannot speak of the present Commission with any degree of certainty, for I have not lately attended to it at all; but taking it for granted that many persons whom I considered objectionable when first appointed, still remain, there are some names which, I think ought to have been left out at the issuing of the new Commission. For instance, I have known many persons to have been appointed as a matter of local necessity in particular parts of the Colony, who would not have been appointed in the ordinary course; at the gold fields, for instance, and some particular localities where there was a pressing want of magistrates. Many of these have turned out not to be any ornament to the Bench, on account of irregular habits; and many of them leave the districts for which they have been specially appointed, on account of the necessity of the case, and carry the Commission with them to other places where they were not wanted at all, and where they are neither useful nor ornamental to the Benches to which they proceed.

18. How would you propose to revise the Commission? Why, my notion is, that the responsibility is so serious, and so important, that it ought to devolve upon some one particular member of the Government. That that person should be answerable for the appointments; and it is only in that way, I think, that the interests of the administration of justice alone are likely to be kept in view.

19. You would have the appointments, then, vested in one member of the Government? One member of the Government,—call him what you will, whether a Minister of Justice, Secretary of Justice, or whether he be Colonial Secretary, who has, nominally, these matters in his department at present, so far as correspondence —

20. But how would you make him responsible without affecting his colleagues likewise? Why, he might take the advice of his colleagues, but they, as well as himself, would be likely to look to his character being at stake—but what is every one's business is no one's business.

21. But would he not be just as much under the influence of these parliamentary agencies, to which we have just adverted, as Ministers are now? If the responsibility were thrown upon him, he must divest himself of all political considerations, as far as those appointments are concerned—as the Lord Chancellor does in England, and Ireland also.

22. Of political considerations? Yes.

23. But if he were a member of the Ministry, of course he would be most intimately mixed up in political matters? No doubt, in political matters he would, so is the Lord Chancellor at home, and objections may be made to the Lord Chancellor as a Judge on that account; but still, in the administration of justice, I have never heard any complaint of the decisions of any Lord Chancellor on account of political considerations, nor of the appointments to the magistracy there. On the contrary, the Lord Chancellor, so far as I can judge, always acts as a check upon the recommendations of the Lord Lieutenant of the County, who is generally a partizan.

24. But the country gentlemen, who form the body, chiefly, from which magistrates are taken, both in England and this Colony, stand in England in a very different position, generally speaking, from that in which they stand here. The country gentlemen in England, generally speaking, are men of education, and fixed position in society, and if recommended by the Lord Lieutenant of the County, the chance is highly in favor of the recommendation being a proper one, so far as education goes. But the cases are not parallel in this Colony. And again, the administration of justice in England, in the Police Court, is open to an intelligent public. The press is usually in attendance, or represented, and there are professional men who are engaged. But in this Colony, in the courts of the remote interior, there is scarcely any public; there are no professional men, or very few, and the press is not represented. Thus the rule that may work very well in England may not work very well here; and with regard to the Parliamentary influences, you know the Ministry at present are responsible for the appointment. The Ministry of the day may have a vote of want of confidence brought against them, in consequence of improper appointments to the Commission of the Peace, as well as on any other grounds. How would you make them responsible in a greater degree if only one individual were concerned, than they are now the whole body of them? I apprehend any one, or even more appointments to the Commission of the Peace, must be very gross and glaringly improper, to sustain a vote of want of confidence against the Ministry. The discussion in the Legislature of the merit or demerit of an individual appointed, would be too delicate and embarrassing to be carried on boldly and truthfully, and can never act as a sufficient guarantee for proper inquiry, and caution in filling the Commission. The responsibility upon the Ministry, as a body, I do not think is any great preventive; but when one individual who has his character at stake, and would be entirely responsible not only to his colleagues, but to the whole country, I think for his own sake he would be more likely to divest himself of political considerations, and to be certain of the qualifications of the persons he would recommend, than if the responsibility were divided. Besides, the necessary knowledge of fitness could be more readily and efficiently come at by one whose especial duty it would be to make inquiry, than by a Cabinet collectively.

25. You speak chiefly of moral responsibility, I imagine, as in the days that you have referred referred to? I mean that responsibility which any man who wished to maintain a character for honesty and strict integrity would keep in view.

26. That is the responsibility to which you considered yourself subjected in Sir Richard Bourke's time? Yes.

J.H. Plunkett,
Esq., Q.C.

9 June, 1858.

27. You were not subjected to any legal responsibility, or to the loss of influence, if you made a mistake in the appointments you made, or if you did not make sufficient inquiry? I do not know what you mean by legal responsibility; you have Responsible Government, about the practical meaning of which we may all differ, and as to the way the responsibility is to be brought to the test. You have no Court of Impeachment here at present, and this I consider a great want in Responsible Government, for it cannot be complete without some tribunal for impeachment. I do not see how legal responsibility, strictly speaking, could attach at the present moment.

28. Or official responsibility? Oh! official responsibility would attach to the Ministry collectively, or individually; but an adverse vote is the only penalty at present for anything short of criminal delinquency.

29. Then you think there is no responsibility at present? Practically I do not see how you can test it in an appropriate way.

30. In considering the importance of the appointments in regard to the great mass of litigants in the lower courts of the Colony—the Police Courts—is it not highly desirable some change should be made so as to make these appointments so as to ensure the appointment of properly qualified people as magistrates? I think so, decidedly. There is nothing more important. I do not think any reform is more necessary than reform in the mode in which magistrates are now appointed, for they are really the judges of the great multitude of the people—they who are brought most closely in contact with the poorer classes. Every law you pass throws some new duty on the magistrates, and I think that some system ought to be devised to inform the Government of the working of every Bench throughout the Colony, both as to the attendance of those persons who administer justice at the different Benches, the kind of business that is brought forward, and also some general report of the way in which the administration of justice is conducted in these small but most important tribunals. Otherwise, for many of the reasons alluded to already by the Chairman, it is impossible to know the extent of the injury that may be inflicted upon the communities that are subject to the jurisdiction of the magistrates, taken, as they frequently are, from occupations that do not well qualify them for the Bench, and who may not themselves be sufficiently impressed with the necessity of making themselves qualified for the important business they undertake to discharge.

31. Would you recommend, then, a Commission to be appointed to inquire into and report upon the general administration of justice in these courts? If the duty were connected with some department of the Government, as I think it ought to be, some one officer ought to be able to report from time to time, and to make a general report to the Legislature as to the state of the administration of justice.

32. The Attorney General is supposed to be pretty well acquainted with the criminal proceedings—reports are made to him at all events where the magistrates act ministerially? The Attorney General knows how the depositions are taken at the different Benches, but he has no particular knowledge as to the magistrates who attend regularly, or the magistrates of the districts who do not attend: neither has the Attorney General any cognizance of the civil jurisdiction of the Benches.

33. But how could the Attorney General make himself acquainted with the proceedings of the magistrates in civil cases in which they act judicially? I think the duties of the Attorney General, as they are now defined, are so multifarious, that it would be quite impossible he could make himself properly acquainted with everything that I think necessary to be known connected with the administration of justice as administered by the Benches of Magistrates throughout the Colony.

34. What would you think of a Commission appointed to visit the different police districts to inspect the books and modes of practising in these courts? That would be occasionally necessary, of course, whatever system is devised, and under whatever special control the matter might be placed. However, I think a good deal might be done by appointing a properly qualified class of persons as clerks of the Bench. Their office is very important to the proper working of the Benches; and, without having competent clerks of the Bench, I have always considered it very excusable in magistrates to make very great mistakes. I know that many magistrates, to whom the country are under great obligations, reside at great distances (fifteen and some of them twenty miles from the Benches). They ride in on the Bench day to administer justice, and after taking that long ride they cannot look into the details of the Bench. It is not expected they will have time to do so, and a great deal must be left to the clerks of the Bench. I think that clerks of the Bench should only be appointed after examination—that a Board should be appointed to examine clerks of the Bench to test their qualifications for the office. However, it is an office that gives more patronage to the Government than any other office, and it is very convenient, even to a Responsible Ministry, to have these appointments untrammelled by any rules of that kind.

35. I suppose the same thing applies to the appointment of gentlemen to the Commission of the Peace—the same considerations. It is very convenient for a Government for the time being to be able to make such appointments untrammelled by any conditions? No doubt; but I consider the administration of justice is so important, and involves so much the great interests of the country, that the Commission of the Peace should never be made a matter of patronage. In the mother country there are very few new appointments made. I have often watched with some interest the fresh appointments made in Ireland, in my native county and other counties, to see what new magistrates are appointed; and the small number of additions to the Commission of the Peace year after year is very remarkable. They are not appointed appointed until they are wanted, or unless some person of great consideration, or some one receiving from extensive possessions special qualifications, happens to reside near the spot. It is not because a gentleman comes into the country who has an ambition to be placed in the Commission, but they are only appointed, as far as I can observe, in order that they may be useful and ornament the Bench, and not that political friends may be made by the appointment. I am afraid a contrary course is likely to be pursued here, unless the whole system is put on a different footing.

J. H. Plunkett, Esq., Q.C.
9 June, 1833.

36. Do you know how many magistrates there are in the United Kingdom? No; but all the magistrates for the several counties and boroughs in Ireland can be seen in Thom's Irish Almanac and Directory, which is in the Parliamentary library. The numbers are very large, and depend on the size of the county, and other peculiarities.

37. In this Colony? In this Colony there are a great many. In Sydney I have always found them rather an incumbrance than a benefit.

38. But how so? For instance, in some of the Acts of Council it requires a majority of the magistrates in the district to decide. It was for many years necessary that the number of magistrates in attendance were made out by the clerk before proceeding to business. They could not go on unless the majority of those residing in the district appeared. The object of those laws was to prevent any small minority taking advantage of the absence of the majority; but then it cut in the other way very inconveniently, because in Sydney, for instance, gentlemen connected with the Banks, or some gentlemen following mercantile pursuits, never thought it their duty to attend at all. I believe there are magistrates in the Commission, who have been for years in Sydney, who never appear upon the Bench of Justice at all, and I have always considered any such system objectionable as would give the Commission to gentlemen merely to put a feather in their caps, and to give them a certain position in society, without returning any benefit to the community for it.

39. What would you propose in order to remove any persons from the Commission of the Peace who are objectionable at present upon any grounds? When a new Commission issues, the course at home is, in forming it, to omit any objectionable names,—that is the ordinary practice at home. Of course every inquiry ought to be made before any person once in the Commission should be put out of it; but if, on inquiry, it turn out that the person got into drunken habits, or, I would say, immoral habits, so as to be a scandal to the community in which he lived—and there are such instances—that would be a sufficient reason where there is the opportunity to drop the name in the new Commission. Also, if regular returns were made as to the attendance at the different Benches, and if the gentlemen who may perhaps not attend regularly at the Benches, but who may issue warrants and do other Bench business, without actually attending at the Bench, such returns would shew those who are useful in the magistracy and those who merely take the Commission to give themselves a position in society, without giving any return for it in the way of service. There are many gentlemen in Sydney—I care not what their standing or respectability may be—but I would have no hesitation—and I had no hesitation, when I was in office—in giving my opinion that they ought to be left out of the Commission. If that were generally understood, then the reason for leaving them out would be known. They would have it in their own hands whether they would remain in the Commission or not.

40. Yes—but then, I dare say, you are aware that many well qualified and unobjectionable persons decline to attend now in consequence of their being thrown in contact with others who are highly objectionable, and whom they do not wish to meet? I have heard such excuse stated, but I never thought it was a good, sufficient, or bonâ fide reason for their non-attendance. I think if a man takes upon himself the duties of the Commission of the Peace, he ought to discharge his own duty according to his conscience, and without reference to any gentleman who has the same right to sit on the Bench that he has. His responsibility is discharged to God and his country if he does his own duty; and, as I said before, I never considered it as a good, sufficient, and bonâ fide reason to excuse a magistrate for absenting himself.

41. But many persons have been put in the Commission of the Peace without their own consent? Well, then, it would be easy for these persons to resign; and as to the excuse that they neglect their duty because others whom they do not approve of, are placed on the Bench, if it were a bonâ fide reason, I think the proper course for them to take, would be to resign their commission and explain the reason.

42. It naturally enough follows that many people would object to meet on the Bench, on any particular day, a man who had been seen reeling about the streets drunk a day or two before—I put it as a suppositious case—or a man notoriously living in concubinage? It, no doubt, would not be a very pleasant contact to come into; but still I do not think it is any sufficient reason for a man to decline sitting on the Bench, unless such person misbehave himself towards his brother magistrates.

43. No doubt, at all events, you are of opinion that all objectionable people, clearly objectionable, should be put out of the Commission of the Peace? I think the administration of justice is the first and all important consideration—that it should supersede everything else, and that no questions of delicacy towards individuals ought to stand in the way of having its fountains pure, and such as to obtain the respect and confidence of the country.

44. No man has a right to be the judge over his fellow men—the conditions upon which he exercises that right are these: First, he is able to exercise it, and that, in his own conduct and conscience, he regards what is right, and, if the Government of the day have any doubt as to the competence of the party on these grounds—even a reasonable doubt—it is their duty to put that man out of the Commission—it is not a thing for legal proof, and do you think, generally speaking, we are likely to have Ministers determined and decided in their views to do what is right for some time to come—who will put these men out and expose themselves to all the party influences that may be brought to bear upon their position as Ministers? I am afraid I would be considered an ill-omened prophet at present, and I would rather rather not attempt to prophesy. I have not sufficient confidence in my own judgment to answer the latter part of the question; but, as to putting out magistrates once in the Commission of the Peace, that is a delicate matter. But, in making the appointment, where there is a doubt, the public ought to have the benefit of that doubt, and no magistrate should be appointed where there is a doubt of his respectability and general intelligence. I have, however, known persons, intelligent men, who would make it their business to administer the duties of the Bench conscientiously, according to what they conceived to be right, but who could not be taken to be acquainted with the law. And I have also, while in office, considered it my duty to give what assistance I could to the Benches on that account, and I think it is necessary that the Benches should have some legal person to refer to at all times, because country gentlemen are startled by points of law that are, in themselves, very small, and very simple to the mind of a lawyer, and very frequently they would go wrong where they intended to go right, merely for want of legal advice; and although I have been advised, and almost bullied, by some legal men here, to a different course of acting, I have always considered it part of my public duty, as long as I held a legal office, to advise the different Benches for the sake of the public interest. Questions that I could solve in the midst of my library at once, without any difficulty, the magistrates would have no means of solving, particularly, in cases where there is a difference of opinion on the Bench. Such information has always been given to the Bench by me, to act on or not, as they thought proper, because I have always impressed upon them that they were sworn to go by their own judgment, and not by the judgment of any one else.

J.H. Plunkett,
Esq., Q.C.
2 June, 1858.

45. It has been suggested to the Committee that the Judges should be referred to so far in the appointment of magistrates as to leave the appointment dependant upon a recommendation from them—what would you think of that? I do not see how the Judges could obtain the knowledge required for the discharge of such a duty without busying themselves in matters which I think would be foreign to their proper duties; and it might involve the Judges in embarrassments, political and otherwise, that Judges ought to be entirely free from.

46. Do you think the ends of justice, so far as the great mass of the people in these minor courts are concerned, would be subserved at all by the general appointment of Police Magistrates through all the districts of the Colony? No doubt it would in a great many places, if expense, in the first place, did not stand in the way, and if proper appointments were made in all instances, and if made only when required.

47. But as to expense;—since the country provides for the higher courts—for the Supreme Court and the higher courts generally—for the due administration of justice in regard to cases of great importance, in which, generally speaking, the richer classes of society are concerned—why should not the State also provide such funds as may be necessary in order that justice may be fairly administered in the Police Courts, where the poor are chiefly concerned? If the obligation to incur the expense is admitted in the one case, I take it that it ought to be admitted in the other? There can be no doubt of that. In Ireland several Police Magistrates are appointed.

48. Properly appointed, of course? When the selections are properly made, they are, in Ireland, looked upon by the people as a blessing to the country, because their decisions are free from that bias which is generally supposed to influence other magistrates in that country of partisans. But, as a general principle, I think in our Responsible Government it is much better to leave the administration of justice to the local magistrates, not only because it encourages the rising generation and men of property in the country to make themselves acquainted with the laws of the country, but also because it is likely to diffuse intelligence amongst the people. In our free Government the poorest man may expect that his son, if he is properly qualified, some day may sit on the Bench of Justice, and it ought to be regarded as an object of ambition; whereas, if Police Magistrates are generally appointed, the local magistracy will be somewhat superseded, and it will not be so great an object of ambition as to be an incentive to the gentlemen of the country, and the young men particularly of the country, to qualify themselves and to attend to its duties. I think it is one of the branches of the business of the State likely to be beneficial in the diffusion of intelligence. We know that the assizes giving jurors an opportunity of assisting in the administration of justice is a vast benefit to the country districts. The jurors who attend get a knowledge of law. They get a knowledge of the procedure of the courts, come from where they will. Even the Scotchmen, for instance, do not understand our procedure here until they see it before them in the Supreme Court. Our naturalized subjects, of course, do not; and when the people get a knowledge of the mode of administering our laws and procedure, in that way they form a check upon the smaller courts. I look upon it as part of the education of the people.

49. Would you be disposed to trust the people with the election of their own magistrates, subject to a veto on the part of the Government? That is a question I have not considered much; it is so foreign to all English notions to have a person to administer justice elected by the people. I have never properly considered it, but I must say I incline strongly against it.

50. But, then, in case of election, the educational object, at all events, would be advanced in a greater degree than it would be under the circumstances you have just alluded to? I doubt that, very much. A candidate administering justice among electors would prove a dangerous experiment.

51. But then, again, the due administration of justice is the grand object in view. The mere impulse given to the people in the country districts by way of education, is a matter of minor consideration—very important though it be; the grand end in view is the due administration of justice, and what we have to do is to secure the best mode of effecting that object? I am afraid, in the present state of the country, that it would be running a great risk, independent of the other objection. If you first lay the broad foundation, and can say that every man is educated, then it might be otherwise; but when we know that the great bulk of the people are not educated at present, the elections for magistrates would be guided by a few busy people in every part of the country, and I am afraid properly qualified persons would not be elected, but the reverse.

J.H. Plunkett, Esq., Q.C.
 June, 1858.

52. Have you been able to form any opinion upon this point—whether, notwithstanding all the objections that do exist to the Commission of the Peace, as it stands in individual instances, substantial justice has, or has not, nevertheless, been administered? Oh! I have no doubt that the magistrates as a body intend to do right; but our laws are so complicated, that questions often arise at the Benches here, which require great consideration from a lawyer sitting in the midst of his library; the duties are very multifarious, and the magistrates have not sufficient time to give their whole attention to them. I may say that while I was Solicitor General, in the early stage of the Colony, (1834, I think it was)—in acting on what I considered necessary for the public good, that is, to give legal advice to magistrates, the want of any book to guide them in their duties was so much felt, that I published a book at my own cost—a sort of manual, that would act as a guide to the magistrates. That book was in use for some years, and was the only one that they could come at. Before that was published, the only book the Benches could get was an old edition of Burn's Justice, that did not even contain the recent alterations in the criminal law, called Peel's Acts. The book I allude to was not a very large one, (I called it "The Australian Magistrate,") but it was very useful, I believe, and gave information to the magistrates that enabled them to go on without consulting the Crown Law Officers so frequently as they had occasion to do before. I found that the Crown Law Office was very much eased by the publication of this book, which I took upon myself; and in giving the magistrates general information in this way, a public benefit was conferred, besides a great deal of duty was taken off my own shoulders, by using it for reference. That book got into a second edition, and a third edition, but is now out of print. In looking into the complicated nature of the magistrates' duties now, there can be no doubt that it is very difficult for a magistrate to discharge his duty with legal accuracy, without a legal guide.

53. There were some very useful circulars issued in those days to the magistrates—in the early part of Sir Richard Bourke's administration—about 1833? Yes.

54. Do you remember them? I think I do; they were issued at my instance, before this book was published.

55. A great alteration has taken place in the law too, in consequence of Sir John Jervis's Acts being introduced here? Yes. The late George Robert Nichols published those Acts, with a commentary of his own, principally taken from a similar work published in England. That book has been very useful, and is still very useful to the magistracy of the Colony, but I believe it is also out of print.

56. Do you think it at all advisable that the magistracy, or rather the Commission of the Peace, should be subjected to periodical revision, in the mode contemplated by the second clause of that Bill which is before you—there should be a new Commission at the advent of every new Governor? I think it would be better to make the duration of the Commission certain, without reference —

57. To time? Without reference to the Governor at all.

58. That would be a limitation of the prerogative, would it not? It might be made a matter of Government regulation that every Commission was understood to last for three years.

59. Do you think that would be an improvement? I think in a new country of this kind it would be a very salutary regulation to lay down. An entire revision, I think, might be expected to be requisite every three years.

60. Do you think it would be advisable to introduce the English system here, either in part or whole. In England the magistrates are appointed for counties: do you think we might with any chance of improvement adopt that plan here, and have magistrates appointed for separate districts—for the Southern, the Western, and the Northern? Why, it had been introduced, and was acted upon, I think, in the year 1842 or 1843. It was found at that time it led to very great inconvenience that magistrates should come from Port Phillip and other parts of the Colony to sit upon the Sydney Bench, and that Sydney magistrates should go to the Country Benches, and play at cross purposes in that way; and a Commission was issued for Sydney alone, and also for other separate districts of the Colony. But some cases were brought before the Supreme Court here that showed it to be inconvenient in law. It upset two or three cases connected with the revenue—still cases—some technical details were involved in it, and Sir George Gipps then went back to the old plan of making no distinction between the entire territory and any quarter of it.

61. Then those objections would still apply to it? Oh! I think it highly desirable that the country should be divided into districts, for which Commissions should be issued and confined to those districts.

62. And would you in regard to those districts, then, have periodical Commissions issued as you propose? I think that rule might be a general one, because in those districts some magistrates leave them, and there are some new comers, perhaps, whom it might be advisable to put into the Commission in the place of the absentees; and if the rule were acted upon, it would necessarily force itself, in the ordinary course of things, upon the Government to revise the magistracy at that fixed period of time. It would not, of course, interfere with the power of the Government to add any names to the Commission in the interim that they might think the public interest required.

63. Do you think it would be convenient that all additions shall be made only at those periods? As a general rule, but cases of necessity might arise. For instance, I have frequently known, as Attorney General, that Benches were without a magistrate for two or three months, no magistrate being in the district, or all the magistrates being absent on business, although there were persons who would have been glad to take the Commission of the Peace, and the duties of which they would be qualified to discharge.

64. Then I conclude from your evidence generally, that you do not recommend that the Judges should be appealed to? Certainly not. J.H. Plunkett, Esq., Q.C.

65. And that it is not advisable to have Police Magistrates in all the districts, as a general rule? I prefer seeing the country magistrates doing the duties of the country Benches, than to see what may be called a Stipendiary Magistrate imported into the district merely for that purpose, without urgent necessity. 9 June, 1858.

66. There are some districts where it may be absolutely necessary? I have no doubt there are; but, as a general rule, I think there may be some gentleman resident in the district who, for a small consideration, would act as a Police Magistrate, and then the other magistrates would more willingly assist him, and so improve themselves; and the country would be more likely to have the benefit of a full Bench, generally speaking, than if it were known that a Stipendiary Magistrate were imported there to do all the duties. I find where that is the case the country magistrates are then more easy, or, I may say, negligent, in the discharge of their duties. They do not think it so incumbent on them to attend the Bench.

67. You think that the appointments should rest with one Minister or officer of the Government, to be responsible for the appointment? I think so.

68. And that a Commission should issue for periods of three years or so? I think it would be a good rule.

69. By Mr. Forster: Did you not state, Mr. Plunkett, that in a period within your experience, the power of appointment to the magistracy virtually rested with the Attorney General? The recommendations.

70. Recommendations which, I presume, were acted upon? Yes.

71. Did the power of dismissal equally rest in that officer—to the same extent, I mean? Of course he was consulted about it; but there have been very few dismissals, that I am aware of.

72. Did the power exercised by the Attorney General in cases of appointment extend to dismissals to the same extent—did he ever recommend persons to be dismissed, and were the recommendations acted upon in the same way? The Attorney General brought before the Governor any special circumstances connected with any particular magistrate, and in those cases they were generally laid before the Executive Council.

73. In general, I presume, recommendations of that kind were well attended to, that, as in the case of appointments, they were scarcely ever made without being adopted? It was for the Governor to decide whether, under such circumstances, they were proper persons to remain in the Commission of the Peace.

74. Did I understand you rightly, that in case of doubt you considered it a proper principle that in appointing a magistrate the presumption ought to be against him as to the appointment, and that in removing a magistrate the presumption ought to be in favour, in case of doubt as to his competency? What I stated was this, that where there was any doubt as to his qualification and competency for the office, the public should have the benefit of that doubt.

75. That would be against the magistrate? Against the appointment.

76. But in removing him, the presumption would be in his favour; you would not remove without proof? Not without proof, or what is equivalent to it.

77. Have any instances come to your knowledge of dismissals having taken place where no reasons were assigned to the magistrate in question? I know, in leaving out magistrates on the issuing of a new Commission, the Governor, Sir Richard Bourke, for instance, declined to assign reasons for leaving them out.

78. But have you any knowledge of cases of magistrates being dismissed in the individual case—I do not mean being left out in the general Commission—without any reason being assigned to them why they were dismissed? I do not recollect any case of that kind, at this moment. It would not be within my department to know whether the reasons were given or not.

79. It might have occurred without your knowing it? It might have occurred without my knowledge of the fact.

80. I think you stated, that since the period to which you refer a great many objectionable appointments have been made? Several, as far as I recollect.

81. Can you state on what grounds you consider these appointments to have been objectionable? Oh! as to moral character, principally, but some from want of competency, or education.

82. I think you stated, also, that some such appointments have been made in cases of necessity—for instance, on the gold fields? Not all as to moral character, on the gold fields and in other places; but I include persons who had not sufficient standing in the country, or who did not come up to my notions of those qualifications which give a man a fair claim to be put into the magistracy.

83. Could you state in general terms what you consider those qualifications ought to be in all cases? In the first place good moral character, general intelligence, and a certain amount of education.

84. Would you insist upon a very high standard of education? No. I know very excellent magistrates who are men I would not call highly educated men, but who can read and write with fluency, and in such a way as would not be disgraceful either to themselves or the administration of justice when their proceedings appear in our courts.

85. Should not you think that the circumstance of a man having raised himself by his own industry, and at the same time maintained a good moral character and respectability, would in itself be some ground of recommendation? Most decidedly; and I have always acted upon it in making recommendations wherever I could in former days.

86. Have you found in general that the objections taken against the appointment of magistrates, which you stated in a general way, occurred in cases of Police Magistrates? I did not refer to Police Magistrates. No doubt there were some Police Magistrates appointed who had very minor qualifications for the office.

- J.H. Plunkett, Esq., Q.C.
9 June, 1858.
87. But do you think that they generally have been a superior class of men to the unpaid magistrates? I think the mode of selecting Police Magistrates under the former system that was pursued here was not a good one.
88. But, as regards the duties of their office—as regards competence for their office—do you think they were generally better suited to perform the duties of their offices than the unpaid magistrates, or that they were not so well suited? I think the Police Magistrates, as a body, had not very high qualifications.
89. But do you think that is the case at present as to the Police Magistrates now, comparing them with the unpaid—do you think they are a class of men now more competent for their duties than the unpaid magistrates? I do not speak of the present state of things, for I do not know exactly who all the Police Magistrates are.
90. You appear rather to disapprove of the general extension of Police Magistrates throughout the country—did I understand your grand objection to be that they would supersede the unpaid magistracy? The principal objection I see to it is this, that it would take away that energy from among the country magistrates which is somewhat necessary to make them inform themselves of the business of the Bench.
91. But, supposing the interests of justice were advanced, and the knowledge of these unpaid magistrates declined, would not the effect be for the public good? For the immediate suitors, it may.
92. But is not the effect of the due administration of justice the grand object of the appointment of magistrates of any sort? No doubt it is; but I think it ought not to be lost sight of in our present Government that an incentive and an interest in the Government—particularly in the administration of justice—should run through all the veins and ramifications of the different institutions, so as to make the people inform themselves of those political institutions and make themselves qualified to discharge their respective duties, whether on the Bench, whether as jurors or municipal councillors, or in reference to all those subordinate institutions which I take to be component parts of self-government.
93. You mean to say that a sort of political training ought to be imparted to the people by all those institutions? Yes. I think that the general education of the people, to fit them for the free government we have, ought not to be lost sight of.
94. But would not that political training be sufficiently attained by the really political institutions—for instance, municipal and electoral institutions? So far as they go, but the whole policy of government should tend to the same direction.
95. Do you not think that the effective administration of justice is a far higher object, so far as the appointment of the magistracy is concerned, than any other indirect or collateral effects that may arise? The administration of justice, I think, ought to be the first and great consideration in the country. The executive police duties are of course materially connected with it.
96. Then if it could be shewn that by the extension of Police Magistrates the effective administration of justice was attained, although this other political effect should not be attained, do not you think the proper end would be answered in that case? It would be answered for the present time, but I think it would act prejudicially in future times, because it would tend to paralyse that energy which I think it right to encourage in the body of the people.
97. Is not a Police Magistrate likely, from his position, to obtain the confidence of the mass of the people more than any unpaid magistrate? I do not think so. I speak from my experience here and from what I believe to be the case at home in the counties of England, where there are retired men of the law and men of study that apply themselves, without ever being professional men—to an understanding of the law; where they reside upon their properties, and go to administer justice not only in Petty Sessions but also in the Court of Quarter Sessions, where, I believe, they command as much confidence as any stipendiary.
98. Those are unpaid magistrates in England? In England.
99. But can you get that class of men here? In many districts you cannot; but I only speak of the rule that I think it would be wise to act upon as a general rule, with a view to the education of the rising generation, and to instil into them those objects of ambition that it is desirable the Government should instil into them in every possible way, with a view to self-government.
100. In talking of the general rule, do you consider the general rule to be that this superior class of men, such as you have at home, is to be found in this Colony? I hope the next generation, with all the advantages that will, I am sure, be held out by our University and other educational institutions, will be quite as competent to discharge the duties of the Bench as the magistracy in England.
101. Then you do not consider in the present generation men of that sort, as a general rule, are to be found? In some districts they are, but you cannot expect the present generation to produce such magistrates as I have alluded to in the mother country. We have few men of sufficient leisure now.
102. But does not that superior class of men to whom you refer rise out of a condition of society which furnishes much leisure for the improvement of the mind in those particular branches of study which you refer to? There are a great many men of leisure in the class I refer to in the mother country that are not to be found here at present. But, at the same time, from my experience of the magistracy here, and their willingness to attend to the duties of the Bench, I have no doubt a sufficient number will be found in many districts who may relieve each other—may have their stated times to attend at the Bench, and so discharge the duties satisfactorily by arrangement among themselves.
103. But in the present circumstances of the Colony, and supposing those hopes of yours can be fulfilled, can you suggest any other remedy so efficacious as the extension of Police Magistrates—paid functionaries, responsible to the Government? At the present time I cannot, and in many districts it is absolutely essential that Police Magistrates should be appointed.

104. I think you spoke of this being desirable to make the magistracy an object of ambition? J.H. Plunkett, Esq., Q.C.

105. Which object would in some degree be set aside by the appointment of Police Magistrates? Is not the very circumstance of the Police Magistrate being now an object of social ambition instead of being an object for other purposes—is not that one of the reasons in consequence of which by many persons it is considered to operate to impair the magisterial efficiency, and to have led to improper appointments? The appointments that are generally considered improper appointments, and derogatory to the magistracy, are certainly calculated to take away from it as an object of ambition to persons who would be thoroughly competent, and whom it would be desirable to have in the Commission.

106. But I mean, have not many of these improper appointments been made exactly on the very principle of advancing persons to this social position to which they otherwise would never arrive? I do not know what the objects may have been, but they are very prejudicial to the magistracy and to the country. As I have said before, it does not make an appointment to the magistracy so honorable or so great an object of ambition amongst the gentlemen of the country as it was and as it ought to be. And it is much to be regretted that political considerations should enter so largely into the appointments of the magistracy as I fear it has done, and is likely to do, unless checked.

107. Is there any possibility of preventing political considerations from influencing the appointments of the magistracy—can it be possible to obviate such a defect under Parliamentary Government? I think the way best calculated is the way I have already suggested,—that the responsibility should be thrown on one individual.

108. But (I think it was the Chairman put it to you) you must admit it would be impossible to enforce this, if the Cabinet would not themselves enforce it—how can you make a Cabinet enforce this responsibility as it regards one person? If he were fit for his duty, and determined, in justice to his own character, to discharge his duty conscientiously, he would throw the Cabinet to the winds if they interfered improperly with his duty. If such a person as I suggest were not prepared to do that, he would, I think, be unfit for his duty.

109. In fact, the true principle is, to only have men Cabinet Ministers who have a proper sense of duty? I think the duty would be very differently discharged by the Cabinet Ministers as a body and by one individual being solely invested with the responsibility.

110. As to the subject of economy, has it never occurred to you that the appointment of Police Magistrates might in fact be actually more economical than the present system? Un doubtedly it would, where it is absolutely required. I have known in distant Benches, from inquiries and from complaints made to me officially, which satisfied me of the truth of it, that parties have come a distance of thirty and forty miles, not only once, but twice or three times, to get their cases decided, and found no Bench. They lose their time, they lose their money, and at the end probably the loss is so great that they do not ask a decision at all. In such cases there is no doubt that it is a positive injustice; it is, in such circumstances, a denial of justice, and a great injury to the suitors, not to have a Police Magistrate appointed.

111. I do not know whether it has occurred to you at all to consider the question of the jurisdiction that is proposed to be conferred on the District Courts by the Bill at present passing through the Legislature? What part of the jurisdiction?

112. The whole nature of the question. Have you looked at the Bill at all? I paid great attention to it while it was passing through the Upper House of Legislature, of which I was President in the last Session of Parliament.

113. Are you of opinion that if the jurisdiction was not increased beyond what it is at present proposed, that it might be safely conferred upon Police Magistrates if they were appointed very carefully? Oh! I think not; it would require a different class of men altogether. They must be entirely legal men to be competent to fulfill the duties of Judges under that Bill.

114. I think you stated that you had a strong objection to introducing the elective principle in the appointment of the magistracy? I have never thought of it sufficiently; but it appears to me highly objectionable.

115. Your impression is against it? I incline against it, certainly.

116. Don't you consider that the present system which has—as every one admits—under any Government been hitherto influenced by political prepossessions, is not virtually a system of selection? I only speak of what it ought to be.

117. Do you not consider the present system is virtually a system of election—supposing one of those busy legal men of whom you spoke—supposing him to have influence at an election, he will undoubtedly influence the Member or Members to whose return he has contributed, and he will in that case virtually have the nomination of a magistrate or two? I can only say I think he ought not; and I think the influence of Members of the legislature ought not to be brought to bear upon the Commission of the Peace. I resisted it myself when I was in office. I have stated it publicly at various times that I have known very bad appointments to be made at the urgent solicitations of Members of the legislature, and they knew it, because I spoke to one particularly on the subject, as to the want of moral fitness for the magistracy of persons recommended; still, for political considerations, although those names were rejected on the revision by the Executive Council, they were afterwards put in by the pressure from without from the same quarter by Sir Charles Fitz Roy. It is not necessary to mention the names of these Members; but political influence is so likely to press upon any Ministry in future time, that I think it should be generally understood that it would be disgraceful to any Ministry to allow them to operate.

118. By the Chairman: Have you heard anything at all of a letter which was addressed by one of the Ministers here to the Members of the Assembly, requesting suggestions from them in reference to new appointments, and the abolition of some of the old ones, which might appear to them objectionable? Do you mean a late letter?

119. Yes? No; I have heard nothing of it.

J.H.Plunkett,
Esq., Q.C.

9 June, 1858.

120. Did you, as a Member of the House, on the inauguration of Responsible Government, receive a circular from Mr. Donaldson in reference to the magistracy? Yes. I considered such a letter highly objectionable, and declined to make any recommendation under it. As a Member of the Lower House I would not make any recommendation amongst my constituents. I thought it better that it should come from any other quarter. I should not like to convert a political friend into an enemy.

121. You think it highly objectionable, then, that the Members of the Legislature should be applied to in such cases? I think so.

122. That political influences and party influences might be brought to bear most prejudicially upon the due administration of justice? I think so. When the representative of any particular district does make a recommendation of that kind, although the recommendation may be really a proper one, still, when it is known that the recommendation comes from a supporter of that particular Member, I do not think it is doing justice even to the person recommended, and it is not calculated to obtain the confidence of the people in the appointment; and, in those points of view, I think recommendations should not come through Members of Parliament at all.

123. What is your opinion of the Benches of Magistrates recommending persons to be put in the Commission of the Peace in the country districts? Collectively?

124. Yes, the full Bench called together to recommend persons to be put into the Commission of the Peace? I think such recommendations would be highly worthy of the attention of the Government, because they must know the wants of the district, and are supposed to know the wishes of the people, and the appointments that would be most to their advantage.

125. And know the person? Yes; it would be a double guarantee that the person had proper qualifications, and would be useful.

126. By Mr. Lee: What is your opinion of a man that has been tried for felony and acquitted being made a magistrate—Do you believe the people would have full confidence in such a party? That would depend upon the circumstances of the case. He might be wholly innocent of the offence he was charged with. Any man may be charged with an offence.

127. Oh! put on his trial, and tried with others who were convicted, and himself liberated? That might occur to any man.

128. In your opinion, so far as insolvency goes, should a man who goes through the Insolvent Court and pays nothing, and afterwards has become in the possession of money sufficient to pay his debts, and does not pay them—should he be put in the Commission of the Peace? I think such a person ought not to be appointed and would say further upon that, I do not think any person ought to be appointed to the Commission of the Peace without having some tangible property, because the only remedy that the suitor has against the magistrate, in case of injury done in his magisterial duty, is by bringing an action to repair any damages; and if the magistrate has no property at all, the law gives a remedy; but it is all useless unless the magistrate be able to pay damages recovered.

129. I mean a man that went into the Insolvent Court, and afterwards became rich. He does not pay his creditors, and if he is put in the Commission of the Peace do you suppose the people would have confidence in that party? It would depend upon circumstances. If he has not got his certificate it is quite obvious that he ought not to be put in the Commission of the Peace as a man who acts honestly, or who comes within the benefit of the Insolvent Act through misfortune, and not through any fraud of his own.

130. I think I understood you to say, that some small towns and districts required Police Magistrates, and others, you thought, did not. You are aware—for I heard you say so—there are many cases in country districts that suitors have to go week after week and cannot get their cases heard, and have to go back again without their being heard. Do you not think it would be very necessary to have a Police Magistrate for these small towns? Decidedly, for the hardship is very considerable—(it can hardly be calculated)—upon the people, who are disappointed in having justice administered to them.

T. A. MURRAY, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Daniel Henry Deniehy, Esq., M. P., examined:—

D.H.Deniehy,
Esq., M.P.

11 June, 1858.

1. By the Chairman: You are a Member of the Legislative Assembly of the Colony? I am.
2. You have, I believe, had considerable opportunities of observing the state of the magistracy in the country districts? I have.
3. You are a solicitor of the Supreme Court? Yes, and have practised in rural Courts of Petty Sessions.
4. Do you think the administration of justice in those Courts satisfactory? By no means satisfactory to the public at large.
5. What does that arise from? It arises from a variety of causes, one is, doubtless, the magisterial illiteracy in matters of law, and the non-understanding of evidence; but principally, I think, from local dissatisfactions, proceeding from the belief of the almost utter irresponsibility, in all practical senses, of magistrates.

6. In what way would dissatisfactions be originated by that cause? It is that suitors believe certain magistrates may be prejudiced against them, or favorable to their opponents.
7. It is then a belief that the personal feeling of the magistrate will bias his decision? Yes.
8. Do you think there is any foundation for that belief? I cannot conscientiously say that I ever knew a magistrate to have given a judgment into which improper motives entered; but I believe the belief to be widely spread that that is an element which enters into many judicial decisions.
9. Right or wrong? Right or wrong, that is the belief abroad.
10. As far as your own experience has gone, do you think that belief rests upon any reasonable grounds, or on mere assumption? I cannot say, as far as my own experience goes, that it rests upon any reasonable grounds—the belief in the moral animus of the magistrate,—but as to mere hearsay, almost every suitor who comes to me from the interior has something to say as to the conduct of the magistrate. That is another matter.
11. Has that been on account of the state of the magistracy, or the administration of justice in those Courts generally, or because the parties have been disappointed litigants? No. With regard to the administration of justice, on the cases as shown by the parties and disclosed by the depositions, there was in nine cases out of ten a vast deal of room for grave dissatisfaction. The decisions appeared extremely arbitrary, and it was hard to conceive on what grounds they had been made.
12. Used these parties to consult you professionally? Professionally.
13. Did you apply for prohibitions in such cases? On some occasions, but generally the suitors were so poor as to make it altogether impossible to go further.
14. What is the cost of an appeal to the Supreme Court? In cases of prohibition it would be a matter of £25 or £30, and it is a general rule; unfortunately—and this is where the hardship particularly operates, that the Judges in nearly all cases decide that the magistrates shall not pay it, but either the party making the appeal, or the party against whom the appeal is made. The Judges holding that it must be a matter of error, or of ignorance, on the part of the magistrate, and that only in the case of unjust proceedings from moral animus can the parties be made to pay. Now, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, unless under most flagrant circumstances, it is next to impossible to prove moral animus. So that the remedy of prohibition is for that reason generally inoperative.
15. Can you offer any suggestion in regard to the reduction of costs in such cases? Seeing that the prohibition has to be sent down from a country solicitor to a Sydney agent, and that there are various steps to be taken, such as a rule calling upon the magistrate to shew cause, and then the hearing of the case before the full Court, I scarcely see, as at present advised, how the costs can be reduced.
16. And yet, as the matter stands at present, the expense of a prohibition precludes the parties from being fairly dealt with? Yes; but I think the new system of District Courts is much cheaper. A very speedy remedy could be had in all matters of complaints against magistrates,—the District Judge, having the power of the Judges of the Supreme Court in banco, could investigate these cases and make his decision.
17. Do you find that any portion of the dissatisfaction so generally felt with the magistrates proceeds from the fact of their being, in the country districts, all engaged in the same pursuit, and that there is a professional bias in consequence of that? I think so.
18. It is, then, in your opinion, a matter of fact that this dissatisfaction, whether correctly or incorrectly founded, does exist? I may also repeat, from a variety of causes which have the general effect—the abstract effect—of creating this dissatisfaction.
19. This, of course, is a great evil? The non-satisfaction of the public with the magistrates, who have a larger judicial power here than, I believe, in any part of the world, is a great evil, whether well or ill founded.
20. Can you offer any suggestion to the Committee as to what you believe would be the best means of guarding against any distrust, by any other mode of making appointments than at present exists? Perhaps the Committee will allow me to say, that as regards the depositions, on the face of many of them the decisions are arbitrary. The sense of the magistrate in the virtually irresponsible nature of his own power is one cause of dissatisfaction. Many of the magistrates are not only ignorant in matters of law, but many—particularly those of recent creation—have exhibited a very low scale of intelligence. So that those to whom I particularly allude would scarcely be safe as arbitrators, and much less would it be so to entrust them with judicial functions.
21. Do you think the appointments have been of a better character since Responsible Government has been instituted? I am inclined to think the Commission has, day by day, become worse in that respect.
22. What would you suggest? I think the great evil to be guarded against is the increase of the Commission by administration after administration simply on political grounds, without reference at all to the qualification of the persons appointed as ministerial or judicial officers. I have myself some, perhaps, extreme views on that subject, which are already known—the election of magistrates on certain conditions by the people, subject to the veto of the Governor General, would be better than the present system; but, if without going that length, any compromise might be made which would submit persons nominated for the Commission to some scrutiny, so as to make them more select than they at present are, and to create them for a term, say three or five years, the sense of the possibility of a non-renewal of their Commission, acting in a variety of ways as a check, I think that to a large extent would answer.
23. What do you think of the appointment being subject to the recommendation of the Judges? I am absolutely averse to the Judges having anything to do with matters not strictly judicial.
24. What do you think of the general appointment of Police Magistrates? The general appointment of Police Magistrates, provided there were some better principle adopted in the selection selection of them than has hitherto obtained, would be a very great benefit indeed. I may further remark, with regard to the question before your last, that the putting the appointment in the hands of the Judges would scarcely remove us a step farther than putting it in the hands of the Executive; for the Judges are, practically, as ignorant as the Executive of the characters of inhabitants of extreme rural localities, and they would have to depend upon individual recommendation, as the Executive have at present, and would then be placed in the peculiarly improper and unfair position for the Judges of the land of nominating unsuitable persons as magistrates.

25. It has been suggested to the Committee that the English plan of having justices for counties should be in part, at all events, adopted here? I think it might with very great propriety be adopted. A justice may be very well fitted for the discharge of the functions in one county, but not for the territory generally.

26. You are aware that, from the exigency of the case in particular instances, men not very eligible have been appointed to the magistracy because better men could not be got? That may have been the case, but I am inclined to think, as a rule, that the appointment of men of inferior qualifications to the magisterial Bench has been the effect of political consideration or social influences, without reference to the fitness for the office, still less on grounds connected with a dearth of suitable persons. I think, in a word, that the great cause of the failure of the magisterial Bench here to give satisfaction to the public, has been that the office has been too much regarded as a social distinction, and that proper consideration has not been given to the important functions to be discharged—more important in the rural districts than even those of the Supreme Judicature of the Colony; as they have the decision of at least two-thirds of the litigation of the territory, as the small suits of the humbler classes must obviously be, and generally of cases of great importance to the litigant's themselves, and under the Vagrant Act they have greater power than the magistrates of Great Britain or of the United States.

27. You are aware that by degrees the Legislature have been increasing the jurisdiction of the magistrates? Yes; and I believe that grave fact one of the greatest evils in connection with the present unsatisfactory state of the magistracy, particularly under Responsible Government, where the Administration of the day may be transient, and where it may call into existence a vast number of magistrates without regard to specific fitness.

28. In fact, while we have been enlarging the jurisdiction of the body, the body has been gradually becoming lower in character? Yes. In fact, as regards the magistrates, I do not think the principle applied with as much force under the old régime as under Responsible Government, shifting as the duration and the character of the Government may be, and depending more upon local influences for its position than even the old Government did.

29. Is it not exceedingly difficult to establish a case against a magistrate? It is. I may say, for all practical purposes it is perfectly impossible to establish a case against a magistrate. You have to shew the moral animus; which, under the ordinary rules of law, by which you are to shew the animus from the act, it is almost impossible to establish; and the superior Courts are always unwilling—for purposes connected with the policy of having justice administered by unpaid magistrates—to interfere at all; lest—as we are altogether dependent upon the services of people who are not paid—people would be unwilling to act.

30. Then, in point of fact, the magistrates may be regarded as perfectly irresponsible? As perfectly irresponsible.

31. Have any cases come under your notice of magistrates having been removed from the Commission of the Peace? I scarcely know of any case of a magistrate having been removed from the Commission of the Peace, except the case of Alderman Thurlow, which was a supersedeas upon grounds of advisability, of attorneys not acting as magistrates.

32. You have known very few cases of removal from the Commission? Very few. I am aware of none where a supersedeas was issued for ministerial impropriety.

33. Then, in point of fact, there is no responsibility in any way? None. None directly to the public, and the mere shade of a responsibility as regards the superior tribunal; and as regards the Executive, it has been asserted in the Assembly, in my presence, it would be an act which scarcely any Government would be called upon to do, as it would destroy the social position and affect the character of the person removed from the Commission.

34. There is a responsibility of even a higher character than of that to the law, in the impressions which ought to guide the conduct of every man—do you think that moral sense affords sufficient protection for people who depend upon the decision of a magistrate? I am inclined to believe that the magistrates have as high a moral sense in the abstract as any others; but in speaking of the moral sense of magistrates, we must remember that magistrates are but human, and that there are a variety of causes at work to prevent their acting quite as they should do. Without any wish on my part to impute to them a desire to commit injustice at any time, I may remark, with regard to the discharge of the judicial functions, so complicated is our law, and so unfortunate the state of things, that if a layman be called upon to administer statute law without some legal knowledge, or a high degree of education, it is impossible to prevent injustice being done—the moral sense notwithstanding of the magistrate.

35. On the other hand, where the rights of individuals are concerned, and the Government is called in any way to act in regard to those rights, it is not right that moral restraint alone should be relied upon? Certainly not, for there is a variety of moral feeling, and what may appear perfectly just to one individual may not be so to another. The moral sense varies as much in individuals as the shades of character.

36. The Judges in the higher Courts are all responsible? The Judges are responsible, but they have also a law to guide them, and their responsibility is judged by that law.

37. Their proceedings are jealously watched by the public? Their proceedings are watched by the public, but there is a standard by which to arrive at the correctness of their proceedings—they administer the law; but even in the equitable Courts, they administer upon abstract abstract equitable principles, but the regulations of which are fixed by authorities as much as in the Law Courts.

38. Their decisions depend upon juries? Yes, they depend upon juries as to the facts.

39. There is also the press in the Police Court, where the magistrate acts as judge and jury too? Yes, as judge of law as well as of fact, which is an innovation of the old Common Law of England, by a statute of Edward the Third.

D.H.Denichey,
Esq., M.P.

11 June, 1858.

40. Then, what recommendation would you make in order to remedy this state of things? I think that any remedy which would provide some direct responsibility in the magistrate, and induce a belief in the popular mind of that responsibility, would go far to elevate and purify the administration of justice. I, of course, as I before remarked, expressed in Parliament extreme views, but even something by no means placing the appointment of the magistrate upon so popular a basis as that, but the subjection of them to more severe principles than the mere gratification of their connection with the Government of the day, would be advisable.

41. With regard to the election of magistrates, of course you are aware that success in elections does not materially depend upon the eligibility of the individual elected, but rather upon the skill of the parties who have the management of the election? No doubt, but if the election were only for three years, subject to the veto of the Governor General, I am inclined to think whatever abuses might be brought about by the first election, they would most assuredly be remedied at the second election. I think suitors would take special care on the second occasion. In carrying into effect any principle of popular election of magistrates, I would hope to see their functions somewhat narrowed, and a more direct supervision of magistrates by District Courts, than now obtains in any Court. I would thus remove the objection to the magisterial decision being only amenable to the superior Courts in case of any alleged impropriety. In the case of a decision given by a remote Bench at Denilquin or it is preposterous to think of an appeal; as the delay must necessarily be very great, irrespective of the expense, and at present the complaint must be made within six months of the decision.

42. You think then that the operation of District Courts would be most beneficial in this respect? Most beneficial.

43. If the Bill, with proper amendments, be passed, that alone will effect great amendment in the administration of the law in these Courts? Very great, particularly if an undivided responsibility be given to the Judge; and I personally am anxious that District Courts should be presided over not by a mere foreman of the Bench, primus inter pares, but by an independent Judge, if the Legislature so will it.

44. Are you aware that any dissatisfaction exists with magistrates in country districts from the belief, or the fact, that they hear cases ex parte? There is a great deal of dissatisfaction on that particular ground.

45. That can scarcely be guarded against, since summonses and warrants are in the first instance issued by magistrates? I do not see well how that can be guarded against.

46. Would you trust the issue of summonses to Clerks of Benches, as that would remove magistrates from the liability to hear cases ex parte? I do think, with the superior persons you now have as Clerks of Benches,—young men belonging to the better classes of society, who are well educated, and directly responsible to the Government as paid functionaries—you might with great propriety trust the hearing of these cases to them, and so remove the necessity for the judicial authority doing anything but adjudicating.

47. The initiation of the case might be left to them? Yes. May I add, that with regard to warrants, where the liberty of the subject is concerned, and which are issued by gentlemen in the Commission of the Peace, there may be some hesitation to entrust Clerks of Petty Sessions with the power of issuing them. That is from an abstract point of view; but I cannot believe that it would work any practical evil.

48. Generally speaking, with regard to warrants, these are only issued where the magistrates attend ministerially? Yes.

49. Generally speaking, they are issued in cases of felony or larceny? In some cases of that sort warrants are very seldom necessary to be issued.

50. It has been suggested to the Committee that a new Commission should be issued every three years; that the Colony should be divided into three districts—for instance, the southern, the western, and the northern; that magistrates should be appointed for those districts severally; that it should be enacted by law that the Commission issued for those districts should be in force for three years only; and that there should be a revision of the Commission every third year:—what do you think of such a course as that? I have no doubt it would act well; but I question still whether it would go to the root of the evil—whether a magistrate, who, without casting the slightest imputation upon his moral or social character, was unfit for the magisterial office would be removed. For I take it, that the great error with regard to the magistrates of the territory has been, as I said before, too much a question of social position, too much a matter of giving a person a certain status without considering the judicial function he would be called upon to discharge. In England, I may remark that it is the social position which gives status to the magistrate—here the Commission of the Peace gives the dignity to the individual.

51. But do you not think that if none but eligible persons were placed in the Commission, considering the importance which really does attach to the office of Justice of the Peace, the fact of a man being a Justice of the Peace would raise his social position? I do think so.

52. You cannot guard against the prestige which will be attached to a Justice of the Peace, if proper care be taken in making the appointment? If proper care be taken in making the appointment, I think the prestige which naturally attaches to the character of Justice of the Peace is of a most beneficial character; but, I believe the error has been in seeking to select the individual for party political or social considerations, without reference to his eligibility.

53. Thus, in fact, the social prestige attached to the magistrates as a body has been destroyed by

D.H. Deniehy, by improper appointments? It has been destroyed by improper appointments, not having the due operation of that prestige in view—I believe in the country districts—without a distinctly marked territorial aristocracy as we are—the two social castes consist of those who are and those who are not in the Commission; and, I believe, it is the ambition of every individual—without regard to a sense of his own qualification—who has made a certain amount of money to reach the favored class. I may remark that the conferring this distinction without any corresponding practical responsibility to any quarter does much to vitiate the popular feeling in this matter: people are accustomed to the fact of seeing persons receiving social distinctions from the Government of the day—of being made judges of their liberty and property to a certain amount—without seeing anything in those individuals deserving the honor of such a trust, and with the private knowledge that they ought to be the last to have it. With regard to the principle of nomination as at present operating, I may state that a serious obstruction in the administration of justice, or at least a want of confidence in the administration of justice, proceeds from the fact of the existence of large family cliques. Influential persons, connected by blood or marriage, form the whole Bench in a country district, and suitors who are not liked, or who suppose they are not liked by that family, have very little confidence in their decisions.

11 June, 1858.

54. What do you think of the appointment of a Commission to visit the different country districts, to observe the mode in which the business is conducted in these Courts? I am afraid there would be a great many difficulties in getting any effective information as to the administration of justice, because the different individuals who attend Petty Sessions day by day may vary in intelligence.

55. The records of the Court will shew? The records might furnish some slight clue, but to obtain satisfactory knowledge there must be a vidæ voce hearing.

56. Do you think police office records now, generally speaking, as far as you have had the opportunity of judging—I do not mean the depositions—bear out the decisions arrived at? I am inclined to think that in five cases out of six, to the eye of a lawyer, or of a layman acquainted with the strict philosophy of evidence, they do not.

57. That is a very undesirable state of things? Very undesirable; it goes far to promote the dissatisfaction which now obtains. I think, for instance, one peculiarity connected with the appointment of magistrates of a lower degree of intelligence that has latterly been exhibited in the nominations is, that magistrates are too prone to decide cases from their local knowledge of the character of the litigant, or upon the sophistry, no matter how flimsy to a well educated much less a professional man, of any attorney who happens to practice before them, rather than from the specific evidence in each case tested by ordinary rules of evidence.

58. All that indicates a very unfortunate state of things? I think in the remote rural districts—whether from a feeling which, for want of a better word, may be called localism, or whether from the low state of intelligence in many persons, who, though connected with good families, and themselves respectable men, are, from the circumstances connected especially with a new country, men of very imperfect education and of no great intelligence—there is positive hardship inflicted upon the lower class of local residents, which it is high time for the Legislature to look to.

59. Has it come under your knowledge at all that litigants in these Courts think the decision depends more upon the personal feeling of the magistrates who are present than to the merits of the case—have you not heard them say, “So and so is my friend”? In eight out of every ten cases—I do not now refer to Goulburn, for there are highly intelligent and suitable men on that Bench—the individual has come to me, as his professional adviser, and said “So and so is on the Bench to day, and I would have a chance,” or else has said, that I, as his advocate, must be particularly guarded, because so and so would be on the Bench, and would be unfavorable to him. I may remark, too, that I think a vast amount of labor is brought about by the incompetence of many magistrates, who send cases for trial to a distance, which, if some degree of intelligence were exercised, would never be sent at all, and the country is put to the expense of bringing the matter before Criminal Judge of Quarter Session, and the impannelling of jurors for the trial of cases which do not occupy more than an hour, or an hour and a-half, and result in acquittal.

60. These prosecutions, in the first instance, are sanctioned by the Attorney General? I think, in the lower courts, by the Crown Prosecutor, who is an admirable officer, but whose duties are so extremely heavy as to make it impossible for him completely to analyse every case transmitted him.

61. Bail is always allowed in these cases? Not always; it is in the discretion of the magistrates to refuse to give bail, without assigning any reason.

62. Has not an alteration been made in the law with reference to cases of misdemeanor, that magistrates cannot refuse bail? In misdemeanor they cannot; in cases of felony they can. They can always refuse bail, if from their knowledge of the character of the party they think it desirable.

63. Such evils as those you have adverted to, as existing in remote districts, could not exist in the town of Goulburn, where there is a large public, a press, and professional men? No; there is there so large a mixture of persons of very high intelligence, that with two or three magistrates there would be always one superior man on the Bench.

64. These remarks apply to the remote districts where the population is scanty? In the remote districts where population is scanty, and where young men connected with pastoral pursuits have been put in the Commission as a compliment to them, and without reference to their competency. I have known parties sent down five or six hundred miles in very trumpery cases, in which there never ought to have been committal at all. I may mention a case which was committed from a town in the southern districts, of a young English peasant and his wife, who had not been in the country above six months: They were committed by two magistrates—two very young men indeed—to take their trial for conspiracy; this in itself showing their intense ignorance, as, by an elementary principle of law, there must be two parties parties to a conspiracy, and, as a man and his wife are one and the same person in the eye of the law, there could be no conspiracy. These people were very young, fresh from an English rural county; they were sent to Goulburn Gaol, exposed to the hardship of a week or ten days' imprisonment, and at the end of that period directions came from the Crown Law Office that there was no case against them, and they must be discharged. They had no money, had to walk fifty or more miles back to the place from whence they had been taken, and were thrown upon the world, as their agreement had been cancelled. It is the practice, after the committal, to send, as soon as suits the convenience of the Bench, the individual to the nearest gaol; the depositions are transmitted to the Attorney General, at whose office they may lie for two or three days before—from the nature of the heavy business he has to attend to, as Crown Law Officer, having private practice in the Courts of Law—it comes under his notice. Some week or so after these papers have reached Sydney, an order is sent up that the individual may be discharged; probably, though not in all cases, as the party may be on bail, the man may be in gaol during the whole of this period.

D.H. Deniehy,
Esq., M.P.

11 June, 1858.

65. Do you think the ends of justice are accomplished in these remote districts, such as the place where the circumstance you have mentioned occurred? This, instead of being remote, is not by any means far from the metropolis; it is a very populous district, and one of the oldest in the territory.

66. Is there a Police Magistrate? There was formerly, who was removed.

67. Any professional men? None. The people very loudly clamour for professional men; but though an old district the population is scattered, and the consequence is, that a professional man would not be sufficiently remunerated.

68. Is the press represented there? There is no press.

69. Do you think the appointment of Police Magistrates generally in such districts would ensure a more equal administration of justice? I think a great point in appointing Police Magistrates would be, first of all, to take care of the character and intelligence of the Police Magistrate; for, unless that were consulted, the Police Magistrate once appointed would be largely under the influence of his brother magistrates, and then, however unintelligent—as these magistrates are appointed from some prior claim upon Government—it would take a great deal to remove him from office, that depriving him of his bread, and to cast some shade of stigma upon his ability to serve the public. I think that hitherto the general course pursued has been to appoint most excellent, and in every sense with regard to character, admirable military and naval men, simply on the ground that it was necessary to provide for these men. I recognize the propriety of providing for these gentlemen, but I think providing for them in this way, where, if not technical knowledge, the requisite of keen intelligence and knowledge of the world have been disregarded, has been injurious to the public.

70. By Mr. Forster: You have said the evils you have described as pervading the administration of justice have been most felt in the remote districts? Yes.

71. Have you resided much in these remote districts? No, I have not; but I have resided in the circuit town of perhaps the most extensive district, and have had an opportunity of judging from the suitors who have come to me from remote districts.

72. You form that conclusion from the results which pass through your hands? As the results of perusal of written evidence, from the feeling of disappointment generally exhibited, and from the want of confidence expressed by suitors of every kind.

73. Was this case, to which you have alluded as a very extraordinary case, one from a very remote district? No; on the contrary, it was not above sixty miles from Sydney, and, as I have already stated, a very old district of the country.

74. I think you stated that you considered the circumstance of making the appointment of magistrates a social distinction, was one great cause of the evil? I think it the cardinal cause—that it lies at the very root of the matter.

75. Has not this motive prevailed equally under all Governments, so far as you are acquainted with them—has it not affected the magistrates under the different Administrations? Under different Administrations, and with regard to the two late administrations it has prevailed in pretty much the same ratio; one Commission has been scarcely a shade, if a shade, better than the other.

76. Does it not then lead to the inference, that it is owing to some general cause? I do not quite understand you.

77. That there is some general cause that no Administration can reach? No, I do not think so. I think it is the nature of all Administrations, without a particle of disrespect to any, to look upon this as a social distinction, and upon the bestowal of it as a favor; and that the feeling of those who are their friends is most consulted, without reference to the judicial and practical part of the business. But I may say, not to be misunderstood, that I do not believe any Administration would knowingly place a man of immoral character in the Commission; still the abstract respectability of the individual may have little to do with his fitness for the office of a magistrate, particularly with the large jurisdiction magistrates have in this territory.

78. If it has prevailed under so many Administrations and different forms of Government, how do you propose the evil shall be remedied? My own proposal is to go direct to the people for the appointment; and this principle has been seen to work even in municipalities.

79. You cannot think of any other way of improving the practice of Government with regard to this matter? The Government must largely depend upon the nomination and recommendation of private individuals; and if there were any way by which the sense of districts could be taken by petition, I have no doubt that to some extent we should arrive at an improvement, because there would then be an expression of popular opinion.

80. Is not the nomination of private individuals made effective by reference to their political opinions? I certainly believe that to be the case; but there may be instances where persons of high social standing are without political influence —

81. That is to say, the influence of people in elections makes their nomination act upon the Government? Yes. I have known instances where individuals have been appointed upon the

D.H. Denichy, Esq., M.P. the Commission, upon no grounds that I could discover except their activity in promoting certain elections.

11 June, 1858.

81. Is not such an effect almost inevitable where the Government depend upon political causes altogether? Inevitable. It is as indissoluble, the one from the other, as cause and effect.

82. In fact, does not the mode of nomination you allude to in some degree amount to a mode of election—is it not to some extent a species of election by the people? By no means; I do not think the one has to do with the other at all. An individual may be favored with the recommendation of a person in political life, without any relevancy at all to the general wishes of any other persons in the community but the individual elector.

83. Have you never heard that this social motive has influenced the election of Members of Parliament, and the election of persons to other offices? No doubt.

84. Even in case of election, would there not be danger that the same persons would seek the office merely for the sake of the social distinction? That danger is inevitable; but I think you would have much less of the operation of this social motive than you have at present. You would then have the individuals elected upon some principle of popular confidence in him, whereas now he is appointed upon arbitrary grounds.

85. If the person himself has popular confidence, is not that something like a double election—I mean if the person who nominates has the confidence of the people? I do not see that it is, because the person, the second person, is irresponsible for the nomination, and he nominates upon very different grounds from what the people do,—the fitness of the individual, more or less, for his office.

86. We seem to arrive now at another and deeper cause of the evil of which you complain—the want of virtual responsibility in the magistrate? Yes, I think so; the two causes are, the appointing of the magistrates upon social grounds rather than upon his fitness for the office, and the practical irresponsibility of the magistrate.

87. Has it ever occurred to you that responsibility cannot be enforced with regard to magistrates? The object is supposed to be, to supply the wants of the country generally, with regard to the administration of justice, and to do this by means of magistrates without pay, and for that reason, and in order to retain a class of individuals who will administer justice without pay, the Legislature are always most anxious to leave them as free as possible, not to trammel them so as to make them unwilling to exercise these functions on these terms, and the superior courts of law recognise that, and are desirous to carry out the wish of the Legislature. Under Sir John Jervis' Act the difficulty of proving cases of impropriety or irregularity against magistrates is almost insuperable.

88. Is the non-payment of magistrates one cause of their irresponsibility? It is theoretically, in point of law, practically, it is at the root of the evil.

89. Is not the only way to remedy that to appoint paid magistrates? Yes; unless you make them amenable to a constituency. The practical way would be to abolish the unpaid Commission, and have paid magistrates.

90. Supposing the appointment of paid magistrates to be determined upon, would it not be possible to provide a salutary check, and at the same time a check which would not go to the effect of making the administration of justice so inefficient as at present? In a case of that kind where there are large Benches of magistrates the Police Magistrate could have no more power.

91. The Police Magistrate, from his constant attendance at the Bench, and from being appointed by the Government with reference to his qualification, would be a person of more authority on the Bench, I do not say directly, but indirectly, than any other? That will depend upon the character of his brother magistrates, their amount of self-confidence and influence. I may remark with reference to this point, it is a well-known fact that, although magistrates are frequently very remiss indeed in their attendance upon the Bench, there are cases where the whole Bench en masse attend. I refer to Licensing Meetings, which the whole body of licensed victuallers look at as an assembly to punish in an indirect way those who are opposed to them, and to help their favorites. On such occasions, where there is a Police Magistrate having the surveillance of public houses, he ought on more than any other occasion to have prior authority; he is simply one in a very large Bench, where he may be out-voted.

92. With reference to a remark of yours as to the ex parte hearings that often take place before a magistrate prior to the issue of a warrant, may there not sometimes be a salutary effect from it, for instance, where the magistrate sees fit to advise the party not to litigate? I think the same function might be performed by the Clerk of the Bench, provided he had the intelligence, which, I believe, Clerks of Petty Sessions now generally have. I may say, with regard to ex parte hearings, I do not believe they are taken in a but for all practical purposes, where there is a fear of the sort, the very suspicion is an evil.

93. By Mr. Egan: Was it not the case before the establishment of Responsible Government that persons were appointed to the Commission from social considerations that principle, irrespective of the fitness of the individual, prevailed before the Responsible Government, but for very different reasons from those which have operated since. I believe a more popular element has been infused since the advent of Responsible Government. Before Responsible Government, gentlemen who arrived here— young men tated for the judicial functions—purely on the ground of their being naval or military men, or the sons of officials, were put into the Commission. Since the advent of Responsible Government, gentlemen have been appointed purely on political grounds, without reference to their fitness.

94. Do you not think the recommendation of a Member of Parliament, who represents a district, who must have some acquaintance with the residents, would be likely to be as impartial as the nomination of a Bench of Magistrates? I would be sorry to entrust the nomination of any magistrate to a Bench of Magistrates. I have known a remark to be made to this effect, "So and so is a very good fellow; he should be put in the Commission;" and there are Members of Parliament who would recommend on similar grounds. I have seen seen a Member of Parliament nominate thirteen or fourteen relatives of his own. The one mode would, I think, be just as dangerous as the other. D.H.Denichey, Esq., M.P.

95. I think you said magistrates have the power of refusing bail? No; I say magistrates have the power of refusing bail in felonies, but not in misdemeanors. 11 June, 1858.

96. Would not magistrates be liable to be punished for demanding excessive bail? I know it would be very hard to do so, and I know, in a case at Hull, where a magistrate refused bail, the Lord Chancellor refused to interfere and punish, although the case was clear as crystal; I believe it is in consequence of that that there is such an indisposition on the part of the superior Courts to interfere—I think the case was at Hull; it will be found in the preface, or in the notes to Sir John Jervis' Act, written by the late Mr. —

97. I think you say, that in towns like Goulburn, or other populous places, such as the City of Sydney, where there is a press, and where there are professional gentlemen residing, no such cases as those to which you have referred arise? Very seldom; but, I believe there are very many cases of cruel hardship in the remote districts, which ought to receive the notice of the Legislature.

98. Do you not think it would increase litigation to a very great extent if power were given to Clerks of Petty Sessions to issue process? I have not distinctly recommended that course, but I think if fair qualifications are looked for in these gentlemen, it would not be likely to have that effect.

99. Do you not think substantial justice is done by the magistrate where he recommends that no further steps be taken? I may be permitted to remark, that the fitness of Clerks of Petty Sessions for the performance of this duty has been acknowledged by a recent Act; and, in many cases, these gentlemen have been promoted to the office of Police Magistrates, as in the case of Mr. Newcombe, at Goulburn, and Mr. Smith, at Carcoar.

100. By Mr. Forster: I do not understand your recommendation to be to take away the power of issuing warrants from magistrates? Certainly not, but merely to give the additional power to the Clerk of Petty Sessions. I believe that, under all the circumstances, from the very great width of the jurisdiction, and the fact of there being no certiorari, in most cases most of the hardships proceed from the exercise of the judicial function being united with the ministerial.

101. By the Chairman: Do you think it is desirable the magistrates should continue to be entrusted with the power of adjudicating in the case of publicans' licenses? Seeing that the licensing is, to a considerable extent, a matter of police, I scarcely know how it could, practically, be taken from under the supervision of the local tribunal, unless indeed to the District Courts or Quarter Sessions, where the application was placed before the sitting magistrate or judge, and the matter was put to assessors.

102. By Mr. Egan: Do you not think, in reference to the question put by the Chairman as to the magistrates granting licenses to publicans, that in some cases the course adopted is arbitrary, and should be under some further revision by the Governor and Executive Council? I am happy to have an opportunity of answering that question. I think the power conferred on the magistrate the most arbitrary, and entails great loss and hardship upon the applicants. If a person of irreproachable character, but who happens to be unpopular, goes to the expense of fitting up his house, and is refused justice, he has really no practical means of redress, as in all matters of appeal from the magistrates to the Quarter Sessions it is merely an appeal from Caesar unto Caesar; it is an appeal from the magistrates sitting at a Licensing Meeting to the magistrates sitting in Quarter Sessions; you do not go from the magistrates' Licensing Meeting to a District Judge, or any other tribunal, who decides upon the special ground, the abstract question, of the fitness of the applicant for the receipt of the license.

103. You think that there is really no appeal whatever? Yes.

104. And you think the state of the law ought to be altered? Yes. There is a nominal appeal to the Quarter Session, but there is, practically, no appeal.

105. What remedy would you suggest for persons who felt aggrieved under such circumstances? A remedy of that kind would be one among the many benefits the District Courts Bill would afford, provided the District Judge is independent, and as little connected with the local magistrates as possible. I believe that to be the view of myself and of other Members of the Legislature.

106. Might there not be an appeal to the Governor and Executive Council? I hardly think you could go to the Governor and Executive Council as to the fitness of candidates.

107. Where a man feels himself to be aggrieved should he not have the power of obtaining redress, by laying the facts before the Executive? I think it should not rest upon the first decision of the magistrates, but should rest upon the judgment pronounced in case of appeal to some such tribunal as the District Court, for I do not see how the Executive Council could decide, except to refer to the record of the Court above.

108. Do you not think evidence should be taken on oath as to the ground of refusal? I think in cases where an applicant was refused by the magistrates without any good grounds being assigned, except the mere will of the magistrates, there should be some inquisition before the District Court.

109. Do you not think at the time of the application the grounds of refusal should be stated on oath—that it should not rest upon the mere whim of the magistrates? As it is, I confess it is most arbitrary and most improper. I have known instances where it has been stated by a magistrate as a reason, that he has received a letter from somebody—a party unknown to the other magistrates—stating that there had been fighting in the house; and although that may not have been the reason for the refusal in that particular instance, equally intangible grounds may exist in other cases. I think, seeing that it involves large private interests, it would be well that some more certain form of evidence as the basis of refusal should be arrived at. In conclusion, I beg to repeat my opinion that the present state of the magistracy is, from the principle of making the office rather a social than a magisterial matter, and from the virtual irresponsibility of magistrates.

John Goodwin, Esq., called in and examined:—

- J. Goodwin, Esq.
11 June, 1858.
1. By the Chairman: You reside at Scone, I believe? Yes.
 2. You have volunteered some information in respect to the state of the magistracy of the Colony? Yes.
 3. Are you yourself in the Commission of the Peace? No; but I may state, for the information of the Committee, that some twenty years ago Mr. E. D. Day, then Police Magistrate, wished me to allow myself to be put in the Commission, but I objected, as I was then a stranger in the Colony, was not certain whether I would remain, and objected to the system of flogging that was then carried on. When, however, it was proposed to appoint a Police Magistrate for Scone during Mr. Parker's Administration, I wrote to that gentleman, stating that I would be willing to act with other gentlemen whom I named, if we were put in the Commission.
 4. You object to the appointment of a Police Magistrate in the District of Scone? Yes.
 5. Do you think the other magistrates would, or did, discharge their duties in such a manner as to give satisfaction to the public at large, and that there was, therefore, no necessity for the appointment of a Police Magistrate? Quite so. Some of the magistrates were very efficient, and others might have been appointed in the district to assist them.
 6. Do you suppose if Police Magistrates were generally appointed in the country districts they would or would not give satisfaction? There is no need of them.
 7. Have you any considerable experience of the requirements of the Colony? My experience extends from Moreton Bay to Sydney.
 8. Do the unpaid magistrates command the confidence of the public? We shall have a better class appointed in future: those who were of liberal sentiments were formerly overlooked.
 9. You think political influence affected the nomination of magistrates to a great extent? Yes, to a very great extent.
 10. Is not political influence likely to affect the nominations as much at the present time as at any other? The political influence which will affect the matter at the present time is political justice; formerly, it was political oppression. Besides, I believe the people will have the power of choosing their own magistrates eventually.
 11. You are in favor of the election of the magistrates by the people? Yes.
 12. Has it occurred to you that success in elections depends more upon the ability of those who conduct them than upon the eligibility of the candidate? Yes; but in the country boroughs of Scotland, where the magistrates are appointed by the people, great trouble is taken to induce proper persons to come forward, and they are put in without any difficulty to themselves at all. We have Courts in Scotland called Procurator Fiscal Courts, and the Procurator Fiscal is in the position of the Clerk at the Courts here; but he can issue summonses, and in some cases, such as petty larcenies, can issue warrants, and can even incarcerate for twenty-four hours; but there is an immediate appeal to the magistrate.
 13. Are not the magistrates appointed by the Crown? The county magistrates are, but they are rarely required to act.

Present:—

MR. FORSTER,
MR. PARKES,
MR. PIDDINGTON,

MR. MARKS,
MR. LEE,
MR. EGAN.

HENRY PARKES, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

Charles Hamilton Walsh, Esq., called in and examined:—

- C. H. Walsh, Esq.
15 June, 1858.
1. By the Chairman: You have resided for some years at Goulburn? Yes, about ten years.
 2. Have you been longer in the Colony? No, not longer in the Colony.
 3. You have been following your profession, as a solicitor, in the town of Goulburn? Yes.
 4. Has your professional practice led you into circumstances where you have had opportunities of observing the conduct of the magistrates for that district? Yes, not only in Goulburn, but in the surrounding districts—in, I may say, the entire southern district.
 5. You say the entire southern district, would you be kind enough to intimate to the Committee what portions of the country you principally mean? Braidwood, Queanbeyan, Cooma, Yass, Binalong, Gundagai, Albury, Wagga Wagga, Deniliquin, and other places.
 6. You are aware this Committee has been appointed to inquire into the state of the magistracy of the Colony? Yes.
 7. Has the result of your experience been to give you the impression that there is a feeling of dissatisfaction amongst the public as to the efficiency of some of the magistrates? I think, generally speaking, there is a want of confidence in the administration of justice by the magistrates.
 8. Did you notice the existence of this feeling when you first resided at Goulburn? Yes; it has always been my impression.
 9. Has that feeling manifested itself recently in a more marked manner than formerly, or at any given period more than at another? No, I do not think it has.
 10. Then, I gather from your answers that there has always been a manifest feeling of want of confidence in some of the magistrates? I should rather say, not so much in some of the magistrates as in the administration of the law by the magistrates generally as a class. Of course, I know particular instances in which there is a want of confidence in individuals.

11. Have you noticed this feeling as existing more in one district than in others? No; I C. H. Walsh, Esq.
12. As much so in Goulburn as in remoter districts? Quite as much.
13. Can you offer any suggestion to this Committee as to any steps that might be taken by Parliament, or by the Executive Government, to produce a better state of things? I think this want of confidence arises, not from any feeling of distrust in the honesty or integrity of the magistracy, but from a want of uniformity in their decisions; and that want of uniformity arises from the very defective legal education of the magistracy. I do not intend to say that magistrates should be regularly educated lawyers; but the magistrates in the interior of this Colony have not had the means that the magistracy in older countries have had of observing the regular administration of the law; and hence they are very arbitrary in their notions and practices in the outlying districts.
14. I presume you will have a personal acquaintance with many gentlemen holding the Commission of the Peace? Yes, I know a large number of them.
15. Has your experience led you to believe that after their appointment they pay much attention to acquiring a knowledge of the law they are called upon to administer? I rather think they give very little attention to it except as it comes under their observation. I have known a few instances of magistrates buying Mr. Plunkett's book, and contenting themselves with that.
16. Returning again to my former question,—could you suggest any means by which this state of things could be improved? It has occurred to me that the administration of justice by the magistracy would be much improved in the particulars to which I have referred by the extension of the District Courts; because the District Courts will carry into all these localities courts in which the law will be administered according to well known rules; and the magistrates by visiting these courts, and observing their modes of procedure, will naturally learn something of the proper methods of conducting business. In that view I am borne out by the Report of the Law Commission in 1849, in which that is given as one reason why District Courts ought to be sent into the interior. And in order that the magistrates might have the full benefit of the opportunity thus afforded, I would be inclined to suggest that the constitution of the Courts of Quarter Sessions should be altered:—that the Judge of the District Court shall be sole Judge in the Court of Quarter Sessions; that magistrates should not be members of the court, but that they should be obliged to discharge the duty of jurors in that court, from which they are exempt now; and then that they might serve on juries. I think the right of peremptory challenge in felonies not capital, ought to be very much modified. The right of peremptory challenge was originally in favorem vite, but since our criminal code has been so much altered and modified, the reason does not exist to the extent which it did; and hence I would be disposed to deprive prisoners of the right of peremptory challenge in every case of felony not capital. I would preserve it in capital cases, but reduce the right of challenge in other cases, at all events, to five or six; and then magistrates would come in for their share of duty as jurors. If you leave the right of challenge at twenty, there being a feeling in the minds of prisoners generally that magistrates will deal more severely with them, or consider the case less carefully, of course they would take care to challenge every magistrate. I know in the Southern District, as soon as a magistrate appears in the box he is invariably challenged by the prisoner.
17. Your opinion as to the influence of District Courts merely affects in some degree the experience which magistrates would acquire, and your latter suggestion is more as to the mode of administration: do you think any change could be effected in the mode of appointment. For instance, it has been suggested that the appointment of magistrates should be taken out of the hands of the Executive Government altogether, and placed in the hands of the Judges of the Supreme Court. What is your opinion of that proposal? I think it would not be advisable to give the appointment to the Judges of the Supreme Court. They have no better means of information than the members of the Executive Government. As they cannot have personal knowledge of gentlemen all through the country, they must make inquiries in the same way as the Executive Government are obliged to do. And, besides, I think it would bring the Judges unnecessarily in contact with a particular class. I should like to see the Judges as far removed from matters not strictly judicial as possible.
18. Has it ever occurred to you that it would be desirable in any way to restrict the power of the Executive in these appointments? I think the responsibility ought to rest on some individual member of the Executive, not on the body generally—I should say the Colonial Secretary. I would prefer the Colonial Secretary to the Attorney General.
19. Would you be kind enough to state your reasons for preferring the Colonial Secretary to the Attorney General? I take it that the Colonial Secretary represents society more generally than the Attorney General does. The Attorney General represents only a section of society; and his office and his habits would give a peculiar bias to his appointments.
20. Has it come to your knowledge that magistrates in many instances have owed their appointments to the influence of Members of Parliament, and have been appointed in consideration of their political connection with those particular Members? I do not know personally any particular instances.
21. It has been suggested by a high legal authority, examined before this Committee, that it would be advisable to divide the Colony into four districts, and have four Commissions of the Peace instead of one; these Commissions to terminate by law every three years, so that the appointment of a new Commission should necessarily arrive at a stated time, and necessarily be made by the Ministry of the day whatever their politics; and it is thought the adoption of this plan would cure some of the defects which, it is alleged, have arisen from political influence, where men have been appointed for other considerations than their fitness for the office, or the necessities of the districts to which they were appointed:—What is your opinion as to such a change as that? I do not think much would be gained by dividing the Colony into three or four jurisdictions. I see no reason why the magistrates authority should not extend extend all over the Colony. The system of limiting the jurisdiction of magistrates to counties in England and Ireland, has led to very great inconvenience, because a magistrate of one county cannot operate in another; and I may say it has given rise to a good deal of legislation to correct that.

15 June, 1858.

C. H. Walsh, Esq.
15 Jan., 1858.

22. You are aware that a motion was made in the Assembly during last session in favor of the election of magistrates? I have heard of that.

23. What is your opinion as to the advisability of having the magistrates of the Colony elected? I think it right in principle, but it would be very difficult to carry it out—inexpedient, in fact, from the state of society.

24. Will you be kind enough to state the reasons, as far as you can collect them at this moment, why you think it inexpedient to elect the magistrates? I think we should be very likely to have persons proposed as candidates who, although they might command a majority of votes, would not command the confidence of society. I do not think you can always take the majority of votes as the best guide to the moral qualifications of a party.

25. I should gather from your evidence that you would scarcely be prepared to propose any alteration in the present mode of appointment? Except by confining the responsibility of the appointments to one member of the Ministry. I see no reason why the Commission should be limited, but I think a revision of it every three years would be very useful, and that non-attendance to the duty should be a sufficient ground for disqualification, or at least, for non-renewal of the Commission in individual cases. I do not mean merely non-attendance at the Police Office, for I know some magistrates who never attend at the Police Office, and yet do a great deal of duty in their particular localities. I think there might be an account kept in each Police Office of the attendance of magistrates, and of the summonses and warrants that each magistrate returns to the Police Office; for in some cases, I know it would be found that some magistrates never do a single magisterial act during years they are in the Commission of the Peace. Generally speaking, the magistrates who do not attend to their duties are the more respectable of the class, and if they were excluded from the Commission, the Commission would cease to be, what it is in many places, a social test.

26. You think it would be unwise to take any action in consequence of the infrequency of attendance on the Bench? The return ought to go beyond attendance on the Bench; there ought to be an inquiry as to what they have done. Now, for instance, I know one magistrate whom I have never seen on the Bench at Goulburn, and yet I know he does a great deal of work as a magistrate.

27. I should gather further from what you have said, that you think that in course of time many of the defects now existing would be corrected? I think so. I think also, that magistrates might be considerably assisted, and induced to attend more regularly, if the practice of their Courts was altered a little. I have always observed that it is very irksome to the magistrates attending at Petty Sessions to sit out an entire case while a possibly tedious clerk may be taking down the depositions. Perhaps it may be some trifling case, which a magistrate hearing the evidence videlicet could dispose of in a very few minutes; but according to the practice now, all this evidence must be written down, and thus there is a considerable waste of time. I think there is no reason why all the evidence should be taken down, except in cases of committal. In the Small Debts Courts the evidence is given videlicet, no depositions being taken, and the decisions are generally acquiesced in; but in a trifling case of assault, or of police nuisance, where the magistrates are only empowered to fine forty shillings, a lot of time is taken up in taking down the depositions. I think the practice might be improved in that particular. And I think, too, that some facility might be given to the magistrates if a Consolidation Act were passed, consolidating the Acts under which they have jurisdiction, instead of their having to hunt over a dozen books for one Act and another as they want them.

28. By Mr. Forster: I think you said you considered the want of legal attainments on the part of the magistrates one reason of the evils complained of? Yes.

29. Do you think another reason may not be found in the virtual want of responsibility—the difficulty of making magistrates responsible for any acts they may commit? I do not know that. Magistrates are responsible, of course, for what they do in their magisterial capacity. You can have an action against them if they do any thing wrong.

30. Does it not amount virtually to irresponsibility on account of the difficulties attending such actions? It does now, in consequence of the difficulties of bringing actions in the Supreme Court; but when we have District Courts at people's doors it will be rather different.

31. Then you think that in that respect, as well as in others, the District Courts will operate beneficially? I do.

32. Have you found that there is a want of confidence as regards the paid magistrates as well as the unpaid? No; generally speaking, there is greater confidence in the decisions of the paid magistrates.

33. Would that not lead to the inference that the extension of paid magistrates throughout the country would remedy the evils complained of? Not unless you had only paid magistrates.

34. Do you not think the two classes could act together, so as to be a check on each other? No, because the paid magistrate would always be borne down by the unpaid.

35. But the practice of acting together has prevailed up to the present time? It has.

36. Have you found that it has been the case that the paid magistrates have been borne down by the unpaid? No, because, generally speaking, where there are paid magistrates the unpaid very seldom attend the Police Office; but I have known numbers of instances in which the paid magistrate has been in a minority of one.

37. Do you recollect whether in the instances to which you refer the paid magistrate was in the right and the others in the wrong? I cannot say.

38. Might it not have happened that the unpaid magistrates were right and the paid magistrate wrong? I cannot specify a case now regarding which I could give an opinion.

39. Then do I understand that you are not favorable to the extension of paid magistrates, unless unless they were the only class of magistrates? I should like to see paid magistrates in this Colony on the same basis as in Ireland—that is to say, itinerating magistrates.

40. Do they act there with or without the co-operation of the unpaid justices? The jurisdiction is concurrent.

O. H. Walsh,
Esq.
15 June, 1858.

41. I thought I understood you that you would wish to see them established here solely, without unpaid magistrates? I think that would be the only way in which any benefit would be derived from increasing the number of paid magistrates.

42. You do not mean to say the two ought not to act together? No; but, to produce the effect I understood you to refer to—to increase the confidence of the people in the administration of justice in the magistrates' courts—I should say that it should be essential that Police Magistrates should act alone.

43. Has it not come to your knowledge that where a Police Magistrate has been in the habit of acting continuously with unpaid magistrates, he has always acquired, from the circumstance of his being continually on the Bench, a greater authority, and his legal opinion has been listened to with greater respect? The unpaid magistrates do defer to the Police Magistrate to some extent in virtue of his office. He takes the chair, and in that way acquires some authority.

44. Would not that effect be general throughout the Colony? I dare say it might; but I think the unpaid magistrates might do the work well enough, if they could be induced to attend to their business.

45. Then you think want of attendance is one of the evils? Want of attendance and want of uniformity in their decisions. So far as a magistrates' court is concerned, when attending professionally I never can tell a client what the result of his case may be. I never attempt to do it, because the rule adopted by one magistrate one day may be overturned by another magistrate the next. Every magistrate has his own notions.

46. Would you not say the appointment of paid magistrates would establish greater uniformity? Yes; if you could get competent men, legally educated.

47. Of course the circumstance of a Police Magistrate being a paid functionary would render him more directly responsible than is the case now with unpaid magistrates? Of course he would be responsible to those who paid him. Besides, a paid magistrate would naturally, as a matter of conscience, devote himself to acquire a knowledge of his business. A greater amount of information would be expected from him than from unpaid magistrates. I think ignorance of his duties would be culpable in a Police Magistrate.

48. Have you any reason to believe that the public in general would have greater confidence in paid than in unpaid magistrates? I can hardly express an opinion on that subject. I think if we had paid magistrates here itinerating, similar to those in Ireland, the people would wait for their coming round to decide their cases.

49. That, in effect, is admitting the affirmative of the question I ask? Perhaps it is.

50. With regard to devolving the responsibility of the appointments of Justices of the Peace on a single member of the Executive Government, you stated your opinion that it would be better to choose the Colonial Secretary than the Attorney General; but supposing a Minister of Justice and Public Instruction to be appointed, who would not necessarily be a legal gentleman, though he might be, would you think the same objection would lie in his case as in the case of the Attorney General? I do not.

51. Do you not think the sole responsibility might very well vest in such an officer? I think so.

52. By Mr. Marks: I think you said there was some distrust in the public mind with respect to the present Commission of the Peace? I do not recollect that I conveyed that idea. Do you mean to the persons holding the Commission of the Peace?

53. I understood you to mean that there was some distrust as to the capabilities of the present body of magistrates in the Commission? I think I said there is a general want of confidence in the administration of justice by the magistrates, arising from a want of uniformity in their decisions.

54. And from want of legal knowledge more than from want of integrity? Yes.

55. What do you think the best mode of remedying the defect? As I stated before, I think the introduction of District Courts will work improvement. Magistrates coming into these District Courts, and serving as jurors, would have opportunities of observing the administration of the law upon recognised principles; and it would have the effect of enlarging their views, and giving them more information with regard to legal matters. It would place the magistracy here pretty much in the same position as the magistrates in England and Ireland. There they attend these Courts, and have opportunities of witnessing the administration of justice; and when they return to Petty Sessions of course they carry out the rules they have seen applied in the higher Courts.

56. Do you think the magistrates in England and Ireland perform their duties more efficiently than in this Colony? Yes.

57. That arises from the circumstance you have stated? And from their being better educated men. I think the magistrates here are quite equal to those at home in intelligence, as far as deciding on a matter of fact; but I think the education of the magistrates here is much lower than in England and Ireland.

58. Do you think there are many eligible persons in the country districts who are not in the Commission of the Peace? So far as I know the Southern District, I think every person who ought to be in the Commission is in it, as far as the country gentlemen are concerned; but in some of the towns there are many very respectable tradesmen—wealthy men, and men of great intelligence—that I think might be very well in the Commission of the Peace. I am more convinced of that, because men of the same stamp in other country towns are in the Commission of the Peace.

59. Do you think there is any great want of further increase to the Benches in the different towns? As far as Goulburn is concerned, there might be a few additions to it; but I do not know that there is any great want.

C. H. Walsh, Esq. 60. No urgent necessity for an increase of numbers? No.

61. You think that as far as the country districts are concerned generally, nearly all the eligible persons are at present in the Commission of the Peace? I think so, so far as I know them. In reference to a question of the Chairman's, as to whether I have known parties put in the Commission of the Peace because they were connected with Members of the Assembly,—I remember a couple of instances in which very active parties at an election, who were not in the Commission before the election, were in it immediately afterwards. At the same time, I should say that they were very proper parties to be in the Commission of the Peace.

15 June, 1858.

62. Do you think there are many improper persons in the Commission of the Peace? That of course is matter of opinion. There are many persons in it whom, if I were appointing magistrates, I would not appoint.

63. Do you think the general efficiency of the different Benches is in any way interfered with in consequence of ineligible persons being in the Commission of the Peace? I am not aware of any appointment to the Commission of the Peace that I would actually pronounce ineligible, although there are parties in it whom, if I were appointing magistrates, I would not appoint.

64. Do you think the presence of these parties on the Benches has the effect of keeping more efficient magistrates away? I am not aware of any case of that kind.

65. You think, on the whole, that in the country districts the best men, and all of them, are in the Commission of the Peace? Yes, so far as the country gentlemen are concerned. There are some cases where the managers of large establishments are men of great intelligence, and command the confidence of the entire district in which they reside, and would therefore be very eligible as magistrates; but they are not in the Commission. There is, however, a difficulty with respect to their admission, because if you open the door once to let in superintendents, there is no saying where it will end.

66. You think the number of magistrates at present sufficient to do the duty, if they would give the ordinary attention to it? Quite sufficient as to the Southern Districts.

67. By Mr. Piddington: I think I heard you say that, as a professional man, you could not give your clients any information with respect to the probable decisions of the magistrates? I could not anticipate what the decision might be.

68. In no cases? I should not say in no cases.

69. But as a general rule? If there be any controversy at all in the matter, I never undertake to give an opinion. I cannot tell beforehand what the decision may be, from the uncertainty that exists, arising from the want of uniformity.

70. Can you give the Committee the grounds on which that want of uniformity arises? I think I have already stated it arises from the defective legal education of the magistrates.

71. Magistrates in this Colony administer justice in a multitude of cases in summary jurisdiction? In a very large number of cases.

72. If there is any defect arising from want of sufficient legal education, is not that defect a prima facie proof of the incompetency for such arduous and responsible duties? Looking at it as a lawyer, I should say very few of the magistrates are competent; but I do not think the magistrates ought to be lawyers; nor do I think it is the intention of the institution that they should be lawyers.

73. My question was not directed to inquire whether you think magistrates should be lawyers, but whether your own statement of the impossibility of anticipating the verdict of unpaid magistrates is not prima facie proof of incompetency for the performance of the duties they are called upon to perform? I do not think it is evidence of absolute incompetency. Of course if you make legal acquirements a test of competency, it is evidence of incompetency; but there are other considerations to be entered into.

74. Are you satisfied, from your observation of the magistrates generally, that as a body they are competent to the performance of the duties they are entrusted with? Yes; and I do not see where you can get any other magistrates. If the magistrates here had the same opportunities of acquiring a knowledge of the law that magistrates have in older countries, I think they would be as competent as we have any right to expect.

75. Speaking of their present qualifications, without reference to any future hopes, do you say the unpaid magistrates are fully competent? Not fully competent; but I think the unpaid magistrates can discharge all the duties of their office, with the exception of strictly legal matters.

76. I think you said, that if paid Police Magistrates were appointed to itinerate, the public would wait for the appearance of these gentlemen, in preference to having their cases decided by the unpaid magistrates? I think they would.

77. Is not that a further proof of the existing want of confidence in the unpaid magistrates as such? Yes; I think I said there was some indication of want of confidence.

78. If Police Magistrates were appointed with the view of improving the administration of justice, on what ground would you desire or approve the continuance of unpaid magistrates? Because I think it would be more a question of expense than anything else. I think if you could put paid magistrates in every district you might dispense with unpaid magistrates; but until you are able to do that you must continue them. You must have some magistrates in every district. I think, with reference to the Southern District, that perhaps three paid magistrates ought to be able to assist the local magistrates to a very great extent, if they were itinerating.

79. You are decidedly of opinion that paid magistrates would be more efficient administrators of justice than the unpaid? Yes.

80. You have also stated that the general appointment of paid magistrates is a question of expense, not of qualification? Yes.

81. Have you observed any difference of late years with respect to the fitness, generally speaking, of appointments to the Commission of the Peace, compared with those made in former former years? When I knew the magistrates of the district first, the magistracy was more confined to a particular class than it is now. C. H. Walsh, Esq.

82. Was that class a more competent class? Not more competent, but it might be regarded socially as more respectable.

15 June, 1858.

83. Your attention has been drawn by the Chairman to the proposition of His Honor the Chief Justice,—that proposition being, that the country should be divided into four districts, for which distinct Commissions should issue at short periods, the magistrates of each division to have jurisdiction only within one district, but their warrants to run throughout the territory—do you think that scheme in itself is open to serious objection? I do not see how it would improve the condition of the magistracy; but I can see no objection to it beyond this, that wherever the lines would be drawn for these divisions inconveniences would arise, unless double Commissions—Commissions for two districts—were issued to the magistrates living on the borders. I know in Ireland it is a very usual practice to issue Commissions for two or more counties to magistrates living immediately on the border.

84. Supposing that proposal of dividing the Commission of the Peace into local divisions was accompanied by one referring the proposed lists periodically to the Judges for their revision—would you see any objection to such a reference? Yes. I should not like to see the Judges interfering with the appointment of the magistrates, or having anything to do with them. I think the further the Judges are kept away from matters unconnected with their duties on the Bench the better for society in a small community like this. The Judges could not revise a list of that kind without making inquiries, and the Minister having the appointment could make inquiries just as well as the Judges.

85. Do you think the appointment of magistrates should depend on political influences, or the results of contested elections? I do not think it should. Of course, at the same time, I know that politics have kept men out of the Commission of the Peace in the old country, and I see no reason why politics may not help some of them into it.

86. Do I gather from you that you express an opinion in favor of politics being taken as a qualification? Not as a matter of qualification; but as a matter of recommendation. If a person be a suitable man to be in the Commission of the Peace, and he serves a friend in a contested election, I see no reason why that friend should not help him into the Commission.

87. Do I understand that you are in favor of the popular election of magistrates? I think it right in principle; but it would be impracticable to carry it out.

88. If it be right in principle, on what ground do you think we should not attempt to carry it out? I think the state of society would prevent it.

89. Then you would not entrust the parliamentary electors of the country with the right of electing magistrates? No.

90. Have you turned your attention to the system pursued in appointing High Sheriffs at home? I am aware of the system.

91. Are not the Judges the persons who recommend persons for the office of High Sheriff? The Judges recommend three gentlemen for the office, and one of these three is selected by the Crown. That is the practice in Ireland, and I believe it is similar in England.

92. Do you think it possible to apply that principle, enlarging of course the number of names, to the appointment of magistrates here? It is possible to apply it, but not with reference to the Supreme Court Judges, because their circuits are so limited; their personal knowledge of the gentry of the districts is confined merely to the circuit districts. In England the Judges of course come into contact with the gentry of every county, and the districts being comparatively limited they can very easily inform themselves as to the character and position of every gentleman in the county. But the Judges of the Supreme Court here can hardly be acquainted with the gentlemen of the different districts, merely because they each of them visit those districts, when going circuit, once in eighteen months. The Judges of the District Courts, of course, would have an opportunity of acquiring information. But, as I said before, I should like to keep the Judges, both of the District Courts and Supreme Court, as far as possible from contact with the people. They cannot be too much removed from it.

93. Do you not think the office of Attorney General is that particular office that would be likely to afford security to the public in respect to devolving the responsibility of these appointments on one member of the Executive, rather than on the entire body? I do not think the public could have more confidence in the appointments because they were made by the Attorney General; on the contrary, I think there would rather be a prejudice against appointments made by the Attorney General.

94. Will you have the kindness to state on what grounds you think there would be such a prejudice? Because I think the general feeling would be, that the Attorney General, from his office and habits, would have a legal bias. I may add, that so long as the Attorney General is a Minister, going in and out with the Ministry, and looking to the condition of the profession here, in this Colony, it would be very unsafe to leave the appointment of magistrates in the hands of the Attorney General.

95. Have you any opinion as to the number of gentlemen holding the Commission of the Peace here—I mean whether the magistrates are not more numerous than the necessities of the country require? So far as the Southern District is concerned I do not think there are too many of them.

William Munnings Arnold, Esq., M. P., examined:—

W. M. Arnold, Esq., M. P. 1. By the Chairman: You are a Member of the Legislative Assembly, and a magistrate of the territory? Yes.

15 June, 1858. 2. You have resided for some years in the district of the Hunter? Yes, for nineteen years.

3. Have you also at any time resided in any other parts of the Colony? Yes; I have been in various parts of the Colony, and resided for two or three years in the district of Mudgee, on the Gold Fields usually, but not permanently.

4. You are aware this Committee has been appointed to inquire into the state of the magistracy? Yes.

5. During your residence in the Colony, have you had many opportunities afforded you of observing the character of the magistrates and the manner in which they discharge their duties on the Bench? I think I have had particular opportunities of doing so. I have paid great attention to the matter ever since I arrived in the Colony.

6. When did you first arrive in the Colony? In 1839.

7. Was the magistracy then of such a character as to command your confidence? My attention was first called to the matter by being accidentally present in a Court House when some proceedings were being taken; and it was in consequence of what I saw then, that I paid more particular attention to the mode in which the magistrates performed their duties.

8. Have you any objection to state what was the circumstance that so attracted your attention, without mentioning any names? The circumstance was this, of a man being tried in the absence of any prosecutor, and in the absence of any evidence, and being convicted.

9. What was he tried for? For insolence to his master.

10. What was the sentence? I believe the sentence was fifty lashes.

11. Passing on over the course of your experience with reference to the magistracy from that time to this, has it, in your opinion, at any time been in a better state? I think it has been gradually improving.

12. Down to the present time? Yes, unquestionably.

13. Do you think it has improved to such an extent as to command pretty generally, at the present time, the confidence of the people of the Colony? I do not think the people have that confidence which they ought to have, and which they have a right to expect to have, in the administration of justice in the Courts of Petty Sessions.

14. Do you think that at the present time there are persons holding the Commission of the Peace who are entirely unfit, by education, natural ability, and social position for discharging the duties of the Bench, so as to administer justice, and command public confidence? I think there are persons in the Commission who are entirely unfit; who do not in any degree command the confidence of the people, and who, certainly, very much detract from the respectability of the magistracy.

15. Are you aware whether this opinion obtains generally among the public? Almost universally.

16. Then, you are of opinion that some steps are necessary to improve the state of the magistracy even now? The character of the magistracy might be improved by revising the Commission; but I do not think that would be sufficient to improve the confidence of the people in the administration of justice in the Courts of Petty Sessions.

17. You have seen one Commission revised within the last few years? Yes.

18. Do you think that revision had the effect of improving the Commission? I saw very little difference in the Commission after the revision and before, except that a great number of names were added. I had hoped that great part of the change would have been in the omission of names improperly included, and in that respect I saw so slight a change that it was not worth mentioning.

19. Do you not think if a revision took place again the same reasons would operate—the disagreeableness of omitting gentlemen's names, and the political consequences to the Minister of the day—so as to produce the same result? No doubt public men—the Ministry more especially—would be likely to be influenced by considerations of that kind; but I have a great doubt in my own mind whether omitting the persons I am now alluding to as unfit for the office would have the effect of operating to their prejudice at any time when they might require popular support. I believe the popular feeling is against these men—I have no doubt about it.

20. Several suggestions, amounting to positive recommendations, have been thrown out for effecting a complete change in the mode of appointment; for instance, it has been suggested that appointments might be made by the Judges; again, that the appointments might still be made by the Executive, subject to the approval of the Judges; and again, that persons might be nominated by the Judges, but finally appointed by the Executive;—what is your opinion as to the Judges of the Supreme Court having anything to do, in either of these modes, with appointments to the Commission of the Peace? I think appointments by the Judges would be more objectionable than any other mode of appointment I could conceive.

21. Will you be kind enough to state the reasons for your opinion? In the first place, the Judges ought to be kept entirely above suspicion; and I am quite sure suspicion would always attach to the appointment of magistrates in some way or other. No Commission could be formed where exception would not be taken to the character of some of the persons appointed; and it would be imputed to the Judges, as it is now imputed to others by whom the appointments are made, that they were made from considerations of friendship or relationship, or perhaps even more improper motives. I also think the magistrates and Judges in some degree occupy a position checking one another, and therefore I do not think the one ought to be the creation of the other.

22. One or more of the present Judges, who have given evidence, are of opinion that they would not have the means of acquiring the requisite information? I think they would not have so good means of obtaining information as even the Ministers would have. But the people themselves seem to me to be the persons who have the best knowledge of the fitness of any any person to occupy the position of a magistrate, and therefore I think they ought to exercise some voice in their appointment, although I still feel a doubt whether it would be desirable that they should absolutely elect them.

W. M. Arnold,
Esq., M.P.

15 June, 1858.

23. It has been proposed by one of the Judges of the Supreme Court that there should be a division of the jurisdiction of the magistrates—that the Colony should be divided into, I believe, four districts, for which four Commissions should be issued, and that these Commissions should terminate by statute at a particular time, so that the duty of re-appointing should fall to the Minister arbitrarily, whoever he might be, who might be in power at the time the Commission expired; and that the warrants issued by the magistrates so appointed should have full force over the whole Colony? I can see no reason for the proposed change, and as it seems to me to be making that complex which is now simple,—and that the only effect,—I think it would be very objectionable. It will be recollected that a similar plan was carried out at one time with regard to the City of Sydney, and found to operate badly; magistrates were appointed for the City of Sydney only, and when warrants were sent down to be executed in Sydney, great inconvenience was experienced from the necessity of having them endorsed; in some cases they were executed, the parties not being aware that they had no power in the City of Sydney. The result was a constant clashing of authority. In England the greatest difficulty is experienced from the same cause, the magistrates of one county having no jurisdiction in another; and although a constable may have it in his power to apprehend a man, before he can go to a magistrate and get the warrant endorsed the man has escaped. Every body knows the difficulty in England of putting a stop to a prize fight from the same cause; the combatants escape from one county to another, and before a fresh warrant can be obtained the fight is half over.

24. I think the object of the division would be to counteract the political influence which is supposed to prevail in the appointment of magistrates in this way—that on the expiration of the different Commissions the duty of re-appointing would fall to the Minister of the day, irrespective of any will of his own in the matter, and that, while his connexions might be in one division of the Colony, the privilege of appointing magistrates might fall to him in another. It is imagined by the author of this proposal, that by some check of this kind we may counteract the political influences that may naturally be supposed to come into play under Responsible Government? I see one objection to the plan, namely, that it would have the effect of limiting the authority of the magistrates, and would also lessen the honor, in some degree. That, I think, would be very objectionable, as the honor of holding the Commission of the Peace is now the only inducement to accept an office which involves a good deal of trouble, if acted upon. I think every care ought to be taken not unnecessarily to limit the honor and dignity of the office.

25. Supposing the appointment be retained absolutely in the hands of the Executive, what would you think of the proposal to concentrate the responsibility in one Minister—say a Minister of Justice, if one should be appointed—or the Colonial Secretary? Practically I think that would have very little effect, because we know that although one Minister may be ostensibly responsible, he would be very much under the influence of the other Ministers, and they, again, would be under the influence of their political supporters.

26. You are aware that a motion was made in the Legislative Assembly in favor of the election of magistrates—what do you think of that proposal? I confess I should feel some hesitation in assenting to it; but, at the same time, I think the people ought to have some voice in the matter. I can see no reason why a system should not be resorted to of electing persons to be eligible as magistrates, the power of nomination by the Executive being confined to those persons who had been determined upon, in their different districts, to be competent; that, again, I think, ought to be guarded by a property qualification.

27. Perhaps it would be as well, at this stage, for you to state in detail any suggestion that you wish to offer for improving the character of the magistracy, and insuring the more satisfactory administration of justice? I have not considered the matter in detail, but I think the principle I have indicated should be adopted in appointing magistrates,—that the Executive and the people among whom the magistrates are intended to act should jointly have the power; but whether the Executive should name a number of gentlemen, and the people elect the required number of magistrates from among those so named, or whether the people should nominate and the Executive appoint, seems to me a matter of very little importance.

28. Do you not think either mode would give rise to a good deal of dissatisfaction—for instance, supposing the people elected the same person to the field of eligibility, as it really would be, and the Executive year after year declined to appoint him, would it not have the effect of marking this person out in an unenviable manner, as having some supposed stigma attached to him, or being in some way objectionable? I think the honor of being elected by the people as an eligible person would be so much greater than the indignity offered by the Executive in refusing to appoint him, that the one would more than counterbalance the other.

29. Still the honor would have a kind of veto put upon it by the Executive Government? The appointments would be made in the same mode as that in which special juries are now chosen: A list of twenty-four is submitted by the Sheriff, from which twelve jurors are chosen by the parties interested. The plan I propose would be of a somewhat similar character.

30. The cases do not appear to me to be analogous—in the case of jurors, special reasons are understood to operate, whereas, in the case of persons selected as eligible and not appointed, some circumstance of disqualification would be imagined to exist? No, I do not think so, because I propose that a double number should be selected by whichever party takes the initiative, and that only half that number should be appointed.

31. What is your opinion as to the expediency of appointing Police Magistrates to the chief centres of population? I have for some time been of opinion that perfect confidence would never be felt in the administration of justice in the Courts of Petty Sessions until there are

W. M. Arnold, paid magistrates; and I think these magistrates should be as much as possible travelling magistrates, occupying much the same position in their smaller sphere as the Chairman of Quarter Sessions does in his larger one.

15 June, 1858.

32. Do you think if persons were appointed in this manner to visit certain places within certain limits, that, by reason of their paying more attention or undivided attention to the study of their duties, the administration of justice in these Courts would be much improved, and in consequence the confidence of the people obtained? Yes. I think also, that the same mode of action ought to be made to apply to chief constables.

33. I should infer from your general answer just now, that you are not of opinion that the appointments to the Bench made under Responsible Government are in any respect inferior to those formerly made? I think they are superior. I think the magistrates appointed now are superior to those appointed under the old state of things; but they are not comparatively superior, because the state of society has improved very much during the last few years; the requirements of the people are much more rigid and exacting; they expect more, and therefore I do not think their expectations are comparatively better, perhaps not even so well fulfilled now, as they were then.

34. Then it is your opinion that although the magistracy has improved during the last twenty years, that improvement has not kept pace with the improvement in the state of society? Exactly so.

35. With regard to any change for the better, should you think that, as the result of the inquiry of this Committee, it will be necessary to recommend any specific legislation on the subject, or that it would be sufficient for the Committee to put their recommendations in a Report for the consideration of the Executive? I think they ought only to report. I think it would be for the Executive to determine the proper mode of carrying out the recommendations of the Committee.

36. I do not think you quite understand my question—I mean, does the case require specific legislation from any source, or whether the recommendations of this Committee might not be supposed to be sufficiently influential to effect the improvement? I presume some legislation would be necessary, because I should like to see a system of itinerating Police Magistrates, who should each take in as many districts as would completely employ them; and the same character be given to the chief constables. At the same time, I think the ordinary duties of the Bench could be very well performed by the unpaid magistrates, who could, if they chose, defer any case of importance to the day when the paid magistrate would be sitting. The people themselves would also have an opportunity of bringing on their cases when the paid magistrate was sitting, and that I think they would do; but still I think emergencies might arise, that would be supplied by the ordinary magistrates. I think it as a matter of great importance that the chief constables should have an itinerating character, and have the complete control of a large scope of country, so that by being able to communicate personally with their subordinates in that way from time to time, they would be much more likely to trace crime, and apprehend offenders who might be escaping. At present they seldom think of travelling out of their own districts.

37. Do you think there is at present a superabundance of magistrates in the Commission of the Peace? I think there are a great number of persons in the Commission who should not be in it, not only on account of their character, but also on account of their wanting those means that would be a guarantee of their responsibility for any acts they may commit in their capacity as magistrates; as well as many who are useless from habitual inattention to their duties.

38. Do you think there are more magistrates than are necessary? I think not, considering the habitual inattention of so many of the magistrates to their duties.

39. By Mr. Lee: What is your opinion respecting Benches of Magistrates recommending persons to the Executive for the appointment? I have a strong objection to that which arises from observing the practical results of those recommendations. It is this, that while gentlemen whom the people have considered eligible have for a series of years been excluded, immediately they have been placed in the Commission, we have found it has been followed by the introduction of all the members of their families—brothers, cousins, and so on; and that in fact the Bench has become a sort of family meeting place. In my own district, just to give you an instance, during some fifteen years that I lived there, there were two Messrs. Park, one of whom was a Member of the Legislature, two Messrs. Cory, one of whom is now warden of the district, who were kept out of the Commission for a great number of years, though the opinion was universal in the district that they were very fit persons, or at least that some of them were; but immediately one Mr. Park was put in the Commission, his introduction was followed by that of his brother; directly one Mr. Cory was put in the Commission, the other was also appointed; so that now the only magistrates are two Messrs. Boydell, two Messrs. Brown, two Messrs. Cory, and two Messrs. Park; and the consequence is, that the Bench is a sort of family party, who determine who they shall include, and who they shall exclude.

40. The magistrates have no power to appoint? No; but their recommendation is always influential.

41. Do you believe the decisions of the Benches are generally just ones? I think the decisions are far more satisfactory now than they were; and I attribute that, in a great degree, to the power of the people to make their proper influence felt, and to the spread of the local Press.

42. You are aware, I should fancy, that magistrates never can please both parties? It would be very difficult to do so, nor do I think it at all necessary that they should please either party. A strict and impartial administration of the law may sometimes please neither party immediately concerned in a particular case, but will be generally appreciated by the people at large.

43. By Mr. Piddington: With reference to your observations upon the proposed division of the Commission into three or four local lists, I think you stated that you objected to such division, on the ground of the inconveniences that would arise from limiting the currency of the warrants? Limiting the jurisdiction, and also diminishing the honor of the office.
44. But if the restrictions upon the authority of the local magistrates, as I may call them for convenience, were confined to the right of adjudication—the warrants having effect throughout the territory—would you have the same objection? I would have the same objection, because I think the magistrates would be more efficient in districts where they were not locally interested or prejudiced; if it were possible to obtain their attendance; and that is the reason I wish to have itinerating magistrates, because they would not be influenced by these local feelings.
45. That objection would apply to the unpaid magistracy as a body? It does, no doubt, and that is why I wish to see paid magistrates appointed to act in the way I mention.
46. You have adverted to two modes of improving the constitution of the magistracy,—one by appointing paid itinerating magistrates, and the other by permitting the parliamentary electors, I suppose, to elect a given number of candidates for appointment by the Executive? Yes, candidates having a property qualification.
47. What should be that qualification? Either a qualification in property, or the suretiship of two responsible persons for the proper execution of the office. The reason why I wish to see magistrates possessed of a property qualification is this, that I think they have enormous power entrusted to them in the execution of the law—almost unlimited power; and if they are not made responsible by liability to a pecuniary penalty, it seems to me they may become a sort of tyrants in their own districts, whose power, though it ought to be limited by law, is in fact not limited at all.
48. Then your proposition that every magistrate should have a property qualification is connected with the necessity of increasing their responsibility to the public? Yes. I also think it derogates altogether from the character of the magistrates that they should be known as men of neither character nor means.
49. How would you secure increased responsibility as between the unpaid magistrates and the public? By means of the property qualification. They would then be responsible at all events in pocket for maladministration.
50. How would that circumstance enable you to reach a magistrate under the present law? You could bring an action against him. I know the difficulties of doing so are very great; but if you could show that he has maliciously used the power entrusted to him to injure any one, you could recover damages; but if he has no means, of course he can use his power in any way he thinks fit, and there is no redress whatever.
51. Is there not great difficulty, almost amounting to impossibility, in proving malice legally? Almost; but the difficulty of obtaining redress amounts quite to impossibility if he has no means. I may state that several cases have occurred in which malice has been proved. In the action brought against Mr. Gaggin a short time ago, considerable damages were recovered; and in a case of my own, I brought an action against a magistrate and recovered damages to the amount of £200, at least I got a verdict for it, but that was the end of my redress. I may also say, as another reason for requiring a property qualification, that I do not understand how any person who has no property can afford to give up his time to the duties of the office, or how it could be expected of him; and if he cannot afford to give up his time, where is the use of appointing him?
52. By the Chairman: Would not that reason apply with as much force to Members of the Assembly, from whom no property qualification is now required? No. There is, I think, a very obvious distinction: Members of the Assembly have no individual unchecked power affecting the liberty or property of another, as magistrates have.
53. I mean simply as to their ability to give up their time? I think it is a consideration for the electors whether they will elect a person who cannot afford to give up his time. If they do so, they must take the consequence of their own act. But in the case of magistrates, the sufferers do not take the consequence of their own act, but of the act of another over whom they have no control whatever.
54. By Mr. Piddington: Do you recommend a property qualification in connection with your proposed scheme of empowering the electors to choose a certain number as eligible candidates for the office of magistrate? Yes; I do not think any person having no property, or unable to give security, ought to be a magistrate, under any circumstances. And I think Police Magistrates ought to be obliged to give the same security as other public officers holding responsible offices; but if the magistrates were elected, I think the property qualification less necessary.
55. Have you considered the details of the proposal you have described to the Committee in reference to the election of quasi nominees to the choice of the Executive—have you given any consideration to the number of parties who should be offered for selection to the Executive? No; I have not considered all the details of the plan. I think if it were found that the principle of electing magistrates answered to the extent I have named, it might then be made more absolute.
56. By the Chairman: Do you not think the mode of selection you propose would have the effect of degrading the right of election,—that the fact of the people electing gentlemen merely to the position of nominees—electing to a virtual nullity—to a position from which they might be removed by the will of the Executive,—would detract from the power and dignity of the electors? I do not think so. But it is not necessary the people should elect the nominees; if it be thought better, the Executive could name certain persons as eligible, and from them the people could finally elect the magistrates.
57. By Mr. Piddington: Do you think that would meet with popular approbation—do you not think the public would object to any exclusive list depriving them of a general power of electing

W. M. Arnold, Esq., M.P. electing whom they chose? I think many would probably wish to go further, and many would not wish to go so far. I have a doubt whether it would be satisfactory to a considerable majority.

15 June, 1858. 58. In any case—whether the Crown should select a certain number of eligible persons to be elected from by the people, or whether the people should elect and the Crown nominate finally—would it not be necessary to take legislative action to bring the scheme into operation? No doubt it would.

Present:—

Mr. MURRAY,
Mr. LEE,

Mr. FORSTER,
Mr. MARKS.

T. A. MURRAY, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

The Hon. Stuart A. Donaldson, Esq., M.P., called in and examined:—

- The Hon. S.A. Donaldson, Esq., M.P.
17 June, 1858.
1. By the Chairman: You are a Member of the Legislative Assembly? Yes, I am.
 2. And were Prime Minister on the inauguration of Responsible Government? Yes; from April, 1857, until September of that year.
 3. During your administration, were any gentlemen placed in the Commission of the Peace? There were very few. If I remember rightly, we were very much pressed with public business, and postponed the general appointment of magistrates until a new Commission should issue. That issue of a new Commission was felt to be a matter of pressing importance, and we had it prominently before us; but in fact very few gentlemen were appointed to the Commission. A new Commission was not issued during the time I was Colonial Secretary. The appointments made were, I think, almost exclusively confined to gentlemen connected with the neighbouring colonies. I may go on to state what steps we took with regard to the new Commission. Although we did not at the time I was Prime Minister issue a new Commission, the desirableness of a revision of the then existing Commission, and the appointment of a number of new magistrates was so forced upon us, that my colleagues and myself agreed to take a step preliminary to the issue of a new Commission, to the following effect: We issued a circular, in the first instance, to every Member of the Legislative Assembly without distinction, stating that it was desirable, as far as possible, to omit from the then existing Commission the names of any gentlemen holding the Commission of the Peace who had done anything derogatory to their position, and who ought from their characters to be excluded; at the same time we expressed a desire that none but gentlemen of the highest character should be appointed to the Commission of the Peace, and requested the co-operation of the Members of the Legislative Assembly, so far as local acquaintance enabled them to give us advice, in the nomination of gentlemen who were considered highly eligible. That circular was answered, I think, by every Member of the House. In some instances, (there were not more, I think, than five,) gentlemen declined to name any one, and declined to express any opinion as to the existing Commission. In almost every instance, with the exception of these five, there were names submitted of gentlemen, generally in the districts where the Members of the Assembly who recommended them resided; and in a great many instances there were suggestions (which were considered privileged) of names of gentlemen in the Commission who ought to be left out of the new Commission. There were also expressions of opinion in more than one quarter of the desirableness rather of taking great care in framing a new Commission, as to the names of these gentlemen who should be appointed, than any extreme elimination of the names of those who already held the office, on the ground, which is very plain and evident to any one—that to appoint gentlemen is one thing, but to strike gentlemen out, unless there is some clear case against them, is quite another matter. The Ministry, of which I was then the head, had taken this matter into serious consideration. We had gone the length of drawing out lists of all the nominations by gentlemen who had favored us with their assistance, both of those who should be appointed and those who should be omitted. The gentleman then acting as Private Secretary to the Colonial Secretary (Captain Scott) was solely intrusted with this task. It was thought to be one of great delicacy, and no information regarding it passed beyond the precincts of my own office (the Colonial Secretary's.) But before any action was taken in this matter—before anything more than this preliminary step towards issuing a new Commission had been done—we resigned our offices.
 4. Did you find it was a matter of difficulty to effect the revision? Very great difficulty indeed. We found in many cases that charges had been brought against gentlemen holding the Commission of the Peace of which, on investigating, no proof could be found; that these charges, although perhaps based upon the truth, were not capable of proof; that in many cases they arose from rumour, and sometimes rumour at second hand; and there were many which, on the face of them, bore some indication of ill-will or personal malice.
 5. And you concluded, that once in the Commission of the Peace it would be very unjust to strike a gentleman out, unless there was a clear case against him? Yes; unless a clear case was proved against him it was hard to strike him out. He was appointed, not by our own act, and having found him there we left him where we found him.
 6. You were also a member of the Parker Administration? I was. I was Minister of Finance and Trade.
 7. Several magistrates were appointed under that Administration? Yes, a new Commission was issued, and the work intended to be undertaken by the Administration of which I was the head, was completed by the Government of Mr. Parker—of which I was Treasurer. I felt

- felt it was not beside my duty to those gentlemen of the Legislative Assembly whom I had addressed as Prime Minister, and it was due also to my colleagues to give them the benefit of the information I had collected by the circulars. Accordingly, I placed all these papers confidentially in the hands of Mr. Parker. I was the more induced to this course on public grounds, because three of the members of the new Cabinet—I mean Mr. Manning, the Attorney General; Mr. Darvall, the Solicitor General, and myself, the Treasurer—had been Members of the former Administration, of which I was Colonial Secretary, and I thought it would be of great use to all parties to give the new Cabinet—consisting of Mr. Parker, Colonial Secretary; Mr. Hay, Minister of Lands and Works; and Mr. Deas Thomson, who became a Member of the Cabinet without office, being nominated by the Governor General Vice-President of the Executive Council—the benefit of our labors to that extent.
8. In that Commission which was issued were many names left out? A great many names were left out; but in no case were names left out without the most careful investigation as to the reason and proof positive of some delinquency or misconduct.
9. Were many new names included? Yes; a great many new names were included.
10. How was the information obtained by the Government as to the fitness of the gentlemen who were appointed? It was drawn to a considerable degree from the replies to the circulars already alluded to. It was also drawn from information open to us all—each of us (myself and late colleagues) knew something of one or more districts, and from personal acquaintance with different gentlemen, and from other sources of information derived from Government officers. I must state that, at the time I was Colonial Secretary, in addition to the circulars sent to the Members of the Legislative Assembly, I also forwarded circulars addressed to the Benches of Magistrates, calling for a return of the members comprising the Bench, and a list of the attendances of the Justices in each police district; together with a memorandum of the death or absence from the Colony of any magistrates belonging to such Bench. I endeavoured to find out what gentlemen omitted to attend at all, and who treated their appointments in the Commission of the Peace as a dead letter. We were partly guided, in addition to other sources of information, by these circulars; but in no case was a person omitted from personal feeling only, and when there was no proof of public delinquency or misconduct.
11. Was the information received from the magistrates in answer to the circulars very valuable in guiding you in your appointments? No, I don't think so.
12. It has been suggested that perhaps the best mode of ascertaining the fitness of the party would be the recommendation of the Bench where he resided? I think some information was got in that way, but we did not invite the magistrates to point out names; we only asked them to give returns of the actual attendances. We did not invite their nomination, so we hardly tested that means of gaining information.
13. Were you guided at all in making the new appointments by the fact that additional magistrates were required in the districts? We were very much guided by that. Where we made the greatest numerical addition, it will be found in every instance that it was owing to the representation that a dearth of magistrates existed in that district. That had a material effect in favoring some districts more than others.
14. Were not many appointments made in Sydney? Yes, a great many.
15. Magistrates were numerous in Sydney? We did not think it precluded the necessity of nominating the number we placed in the new Commission.
16. The great object you regarded was the want of magistrates in certain districts? Yes. There were also other reasons which must have entered into our minds, namely, personal acquaintance, personal acquirements, personal fitness and high standing. There were a great number of gentlemen named of mercantile standing, and personal fitness. I think we added very little to the Sydney Bench, compared with what was done since. Indeed we refused a vast number of applications made directly or indirectly to us.
17. How were these applications made? They were made either personally, or by letter—sometimes in both ways.
18. Did you find that Parliamentary influence was brought to bear on the Government in making the appointments? Parliamentary influence was not brought to bear personally—not much more than in the answers to the circulars addressed to the head of the Government. In reply to the circulars, I cannot doubt that there was a good deal of political feeling introduced.
19. From your own observations, generally speaking, with regard to the Government of the Colony, at all times, of the appointment of magistrates—do you think it is likely that political influences have been brought to bear to any great extent? I think to a certain extent they have. I think, however, it is due to the Government of which I was a member to say, they exercised very little influence in our case, as the list of magistrates appointed will shew, and the list of refusals will prove.
20. Were refusals made? Yes, a great many.
21. Do you think this is an evil in regard to the appointment of the Commission of the Peace which ought to be guarded against? I do.
22. Namely, party and political influences? Yes; I think it is a growing evil.
23. An evil which presses severely on any Government? Yes; and eventually will tend (I don't say to degrade) perhaps to lower the standard of education and position which should entitle persons to be placed in the Commission, owing to the pressure which I think will, as party Governments go on, be made on the Ministers in power.
24. Taking a general view of the thing, the Government of the day may be pressed by political supporters in the House, or out of the House, to make appointments which they know to be objectionable, because if they refuse, perhaps they will be deprived of the support of these persons? I think it is very likely.
25. And the Government thereby is placed in an unpleasant position? The Government is thereby placed in a difficult and unpleasant position.
26. Could you offer any suggestions at all which would guard against difficulties of the kind?

The Hon. S.A.

kind? That is an excessively difficult question to answer. As far as I understand the system at Home, the nomination of magistrates is constitutionally with the Lord Chancellor. It is, however, delegated to the Lord Lieutenant of Counties; and although surrounded by as great a check as you could have to protect undue influences in asking for appointments to the magistracy, even there, from my own knowledge, I can say it is a fact that appointments to the magistracy are made even in England owing to political influences—I mean by those who are returned for the counties and boroughs through the Lord Lieutenants of the Counties—and appointments are thus made in England on political grounds. I think the question in a new country is surrounded with difficulties, unless some new plan is struck out, such as leaving the appointment to the Judges. But I see there a great difficulty, because (although the Judges are as pure as possible, and as I believe the Bench is now, and the fountain of justice is as free from taint as possible), it would be impossible for the Judges not to be appealed to, or be pressed upon by friends or political supporters of one party or another. I am afraid this would cause an influence to be used that would be improper, and, however unjust such a suspicion might be, the public would believe that some appointments were made from political influences, and this would place the Judges in an embarrassing position. That is the only source I could look to for nominations to be made to the magistracy without being open to the objections that are made to appointments to the magistracy by Responsible Governments.

27. The Judges are opposed to anything of the kind? That is an additional reason, then, for not asking them. I thought that it should be absolutely left to the Governor General; but if any one has studied the part he takes in Responsible Government, he will see that it is virtually leaving the appointment with the Ministers. He could not act independently, because he gives every member of the Executive Council a vote with himself. If, however, the Governor General could be charged with the responsibility of nominations to the magistracy, irrespective and entirely unbiased by the advice of his Executive Council, I am disposed to think much good might result. I admit, however, that I see great difficulties in the way of this arrangement.

28. It was suggested by Sir Alfred Stephen that the magistracy should be appointed for the different districts—the southern district, the western district, and the northern district;—that a new Commission for each separate district should issue every three years, thus making a revision of the magistracy every three years for each district, and that no new appointment should be made unless these three years had expired? There is a good deal of practical usefulness in that suggestion; but it is open to the objection that any political nomination is open to,—that the appointments would be made triennially by the party Government which happened to be in power, and thus you would have, at the end of every three years, the same objection to party influences. I see this good in the suggestion,—that you do not expose the Bench to supplemental appointments. I cannot conceal from myself, and I have no hesitation in saying, what I have seen from the nomination of magistrates for the last two years, that we shall have additions made more and more from party influence and pressure even than we have seen yet. I will instance one reason that gives ground for this belief: As party feeling runs higher, and party divisions become more marked, so the rolls of electors will be more narrowly watched by the adherents of each party. The electoral rolls are revised by the Benches of Magistrates. The first evil I anticipate from the nominations by party Governments of magistrates to particular Benches arises in this—that the Bench will be packed when the revision of electoral lists takes place by magistrates of a political party, just as one party in the Assembly preponderates, and that the electoral rolls of the Colony will, consequently, be influenced by the composition of the Benches at the time the revision takes place. If I am right in that apprehension, it will be found that the incoming Government will seek to counterbalance the nominations of their predecessors by the nomination from their own party to the Commission of the Peace; thus the evil will increase as time goes on.

29. The great object in view being the due administration of justice in the minor courts of the Colony, what would be your opinion if the more general appointments of Police Magistrates in the different Police Districts? I think that question would be very much governed by the scale of expenses incurred, as Police Magistrates could hardly be appointed without appointing salaries. I think an objection might be made on the score of expense.

30. That is the only objection? I see no other particular objection but that.

31. But the Government freely provide the necessary sum attending the higher courts of the Colony, and in which it is supposed that persons of higher means are concerned—ought not then the Government also to provide courts in which the poorer classes are concerned? I think that is very reasonable. It must be borne in mind that if the nomination of magistrates which we were speaking of still goes forward, the Police Magistrate is only one among the Bench of Magistrates in each district; while his usefulness may be evident his particular influence is not sufficient to check influences on political ground, caused by the nominations made by party Governments.

32. If proper selections were made, the influence would be sufficient to counteract this tendency to degenerate? Yes; it is the badness of the selection, I apprehend, in this system. I think if Police Magistrates were judiciously appointed, and their districts so apportioned or divided as to enable them to take within their ministerial control the greater part of the Colony, that the appointments to the Bench of unpaid magistrates might almost cease, or be very much diminished. The only excuse urged on us when in the Government, and on other Governments, for the large number of nominations to the Commission of the Peace, was the difficulty of procuring the attendance of a sufficient number of magistrates to administer justice for the people in the inferior courts. That would cease if there were paid magistrates for each district—a certain radius in extent—where these cases could be brought. A great deal of evil would therefore be done away with by the non-necessity of unpaid magistrates. There is another reason in favor of paid Police Magistrates. In small communities people know one another well, and, in spite of their good intentions, prejudices will arise amongst the residents of the different districts respecting unpaid magistrates magistrates. There is an apprehension, however unjustly founded, that favoritism or partiality may be shewn, (I am speaking of the humbler classes who reside within the districts of unpaid magistrates.) It is thought that they have a fellow-feeling more for one another than for those for whom they administer the law. I think that apprehension would be less likely to attach to paid Police Magistrates.

The Hon. S.A.
Donaldson,
Esq., M.P.

17 June, 1858.

33. The magistrates are bound together by a similarity of interests in the country districts? It is believed that generally they are.

34. Whether rightly founded or not, there is in many instances a growing distrust in the minds of the working classes with respect to unpaid magistrates? I don't say it is rightly founded, but I think there is. They cannot give up the idea. If when they first attend they cannot get a Bench to decide what appears to be some trifling matter to the magistrates, but which is of vital importance to the humbler classes, it causes them to have a feeling that the magistrates are not friendly to their interest. I only instance that as showing an additional reason may exist for having stipendiary magistrates instead of unpaid magistrates.

35. It has been suggested to the Committee that the people should elect a number of gentlemen in their districts, from whom the Government might make the selection of persons fitted for the Commission of the Peace—what is your opinion of that? I have a decided objection to elective magistrates. I cannot help thinking that in an election of that sort all the worst objections that can be found to the election of representatives would be increased and enhanced. The local feelings and local prejudices—personal dislike to some and personal influences of others—would exercise a baneful effect upon such elections. I am afraid that, so far from doing good, it would create rancour and party feeling, and there would be a greater amount of distrust, from the prejudices of party feeling, than there is now by the nominations, had as it can be, by Responsible Government. I have a great objection to elective magistrates.

36. You are aware that experience shews that success in any election does not always depend on good qualities, but on the amount of tact shewn by the parties who support him? To a certain extent. I don't say the election of candidates for the Houses of Parliament is on the same ground objectionable as the election of magistrates. It has been proved in this country under Responsible Government, and I have no doubt it is inherent in the Anglo-Saxon mind, to select the best man as representative. I think the duties of representatives are so different from magistrates, which are confined to local objects—I don't apply the same rule to both.

37. Then I gather from what you say, that on the whole the more general appointment of Police Magistrates would prove the best mode of remedying the evils complained of? I think it would remove many of the evils now found to exist.

38. By Mr. Lee: It is your opinion, I believe, that it would be desirable for the Benches to recommend to the Government certain parties residing in the districts to the magistracy? I think that these recommendations would have less and less force and value as time goes on, because the Benches will become more and more partizan as the nominations by party governments go forward. I would, therefore, look on their nominations with less weight and consideration than I would have done some time ago. I think, to ask them to nominate magistrates when a certain political party composed a majority of the Bench, would be to add to the party that preponderated already.

39. Do you not think the Benches have the greatest opportunity of knowing gentlemen that are best fitted to act as magistrates? I think their recommendations ought to be received with respect.

40. Are you of opinion that Police Magistrates should be appointed to the populous districts or to the distant districts? I think they would be very useful to both; but I think in the remoter districts they would be more valuable.

41. Are you aware that, during your government, there were some districts where no magistrates attended, and that people could not get their business done? Yes; that is the system I pointed out as objectionable to the appointment of unpaid magistrates.

42. You think that Police Magistrates would be more valuable? I think Police Magistrates more valuable in remote districts than in those near to Sydney.

43. By Mr. Marks: I think you said the present mode of appointing magistrates was objectionable to some extent? Yes, I do.

44. And you thought the objection might be removed if the appointment were left in the hands of the Judges? Yes. I said that had occurred to me; but I also suggested a grave objection to it. I stated, that appointment to the magistracy is almost inseparable from Responsible Government. I illustrated it by English precedent. I said, as party government became more and more the law of the land, the nominations would partake more of the character of party government, and, if you found a number of magistrates nominated by one party, in the revision of the electoral lists, the incoming party who came into power would feel disposed to nominate a great many more, and so it would go on, and the objection increase. When I said the appointment should be left to the Judges, I pointed out the objections to that course, and the Chairman said the Judges themselves objected to it.

45. You would not place the power entirely in the hands of the Judges? No, I think not. I would not even place it in the hands of the Governor General, because, as I have already said, unless he exercised it quite independently of his Executive Council, it would be inoperative. I see nothing to remedy the evil but a diminution of appointments and a feeling on the part of the Government to determine to resist party applications, which I do not say is impossible, although it is difficult. It is easier to object than to point out and carry into effect the remedy. One way towards finding out a remedy in all these political and social considerations is, finding out the evil—the remedy does sometimes present itself after you have first clearly pointed out the evil.

46. Do you think there are many ineligible persons in the Commission of the Peace? Yes; many very ineligible persons.

47. Do you think there are many eligible gentlemen in the country districts who are not in the

The Hon. S.A. the Commission? Not a great many; there are some who would not accept the honor, and some who would not take the responsibility.
 Donaldson, Esq., M.P.
 48. You think there are very few? I would not say so positively, but certainly throughout the country a large selection has been made already from persons holding the position in life that would entitle them to the appointment.
 17 June, 1858.

49. Do you think under any other mode of appointment better magistrates could be got? It is very difficult to suggest a plan. From my experience of Responsible Government, I know, although there may be an inclination to strike out the names of public delinquents, the obstacles in the way of proof are so great, that we found much difficulty in striking out names. I believe our successors have not issued one single supersedeas, or only one.

50. Do you think if there was a less objectionable plan more eligible persons could be got? Probably, yes; but in the meantime I think a great number will be got to accept office, if the nominations go on; and that the number of ineligible persons will increase.

51. What is the best mode of purifying the Commission? I don't see any way. I don't think any Government would have the moral courage to interfere. The appointments are made according to law, and under the authority of the Government. To nominate is one thing, to expunge is another. I see great difficulties in expurgating the Commission of the Peace now.

52. You think it would be improper to strike a gentlemen out of the Commission of the Peace if there was nothing found against him, except at the time of the appointment? I say it would be unfair to strike a gentleman out, except for some public delinquency, or some impropriety, notorious, capable of proof. I say again, the appointment is made according to law, and it is unjust to deprive him of the post he holds, unless a charge against him is proved. Where an ineligible person is found in the Commission of the Peace, the responsibility rests in his nomination with those who placed him there.

53. By the Chairman: In regard to the objectionable appointment, to which you have alluded, what is it in your mind that constitutes the objection—is it a deficiency in education? I might point out several as objectionable peculiarities.

54. What do you think the qualifications ought to be to fit a gentleman for the office of magistrate? I think in this country I would put education perhaps in the first rank; a fitness by educational training not only to understand, but to administer the law in such a way as to make its administration respectable. Next to that, I should place high moral character—a magistrate constantly sitting in cases where social delinquencies are punished should not be open to the taunt of living immorally himself. Habits of temperance and self-control I also look upon as very essential in a magistrate. Beyond these three leading characteristics, I should say in this country local residence of some duration in the district to which he belongs, and some experience in the Colony generally, are, undoubtedly, of very great value. I don't know anything that tends in a new Colony to cause a disrespect for magistrates, or causes magistrates to be held in contempt more than ignorance, intemperance, violence on the Bench, or a notoriously immoral life. I think in that general way I can answer the question. Wherever I found the absence in a marked degree of any one of the characteristics which I have named, I would not consider a person fit to be put in the Commission of the Peace. On the other hand, if I found any person whose position was humble, but who possessed these qualifications, I should think him as fit for the Commission as the highest gentleman in the country.

55. Then you are of opinion that these qualifications have not been regarded as they ought to have been, either during the present Administration or under preceding Administrations, or under Irresponsible Government? I will not go the length of that, but I think that in some instances they have not been sufficiently regarded.

The Hon. Charles Cowper, Esq., M.P., Principal Secretary, called in and examined:—

The Hon.
 C. Cowper,
 Esq., M.P.

17 June, 1858.

1. By the Chairman: You are the Colonial Secretary? Yes.
 2. What is your opinion of the present state of the magistracy of the Colony? Taking the magistracy as a whole, I think it is efficient for carrying out the objects for which it is designed. Of course in a new country you cannot expect always to be able to obtain for such duties men of equal attainments in all respects as to education and social position, as are available in an older country. It has often appeared to me, that many of the complaints with regard to appointments to the magistracy have been unreasonable. I am quite willing to admit that there are gentlemen in the Commission of the Peace whose habits are exceptionable; still, when the question has been before the Government from time to time, even in issuing new Commissions as to the superseding of these gentlemen, it has been found a very great difficulty to determine whether their defects of character have been such as to demand their exclusion from the Commission, even at the most appropriate time that could be selected for deciding the point.

3. Do you think, generally speaking, that the magistrates command the confidence of the people in the different Police Districts of the Colony? Yes, I do. I think even those gentlemen who perhaps by education and social position would be selected for the magistracy as preferable to many others, are not the gentlemen most willing to give up their time, or the most ready to devote themselves with the same amount of disinterestedness and zeal, to the performance of the duties as others not in some respects so well qualified. I have always felt that if the individual recommended for the Commission of the Peace were competent, by general intelligence and unexceptionable character, it was of comparatively less importance that he should be highly educated, or move in a particular sphere of life. No doubt a certain amount of education is absolutely necessary; but from the very earliest history of the Colony down to the present moment, I believe it will be found that some of our most valuable magistrates—those who were the most zealous in the performance of their duties, and who perhaps perhaps had the confidence of the public more than others—have been persons of not the highest attainments as regards education.

4. Very high attainments are, of course, not necessary; still, a gentleman in the Commission of the Peace ought to know how to read and write. It has been given in evidence that there are cases where the gentleman could not even read the oaths that were administered when sworn in properly? I am not aware of such a case; and I may say, with regard to the statement, that short as is the period during which I have been empowered to recommend appointments for the magistracy, it has satisfied me that the most unfounded rumours are circulated with regard to such appointments. Prejudices, proceeding partly from feelings of jealousy, and partly from other feelings not of a very creditable nature, alone can account for this state of things. I will give one instance of what I mean: When the first appointments were made to the Commission of the Peace by the present Administration, the most extravagant misstatements to the prejudice of parties were made to me. I believed at the time they were unfounded, and in several cases they were traced out and thoroughly disproved; so, on a more recent occasion, similar statements were made which I satisfied myself were absolutely untrue. Persons' names were sometimes mistaken; and individuals bearing the names, or something like the names of other parties, were assumed to be the persons appointed. Such statements as you have alluded to—that parties were not able to write—were made when I myself witnessed the writing of the parties, who I therefore knew could write as well as myself; and the same remark may be made with regard to their alleged previous history in the Colony. Assertions were also made and maintained in reference to particular circumstances with such perseverance that I was led to doubt every authority that I could refer to; but, having traced them out to their very source, I have after all found them to be absolutely false. Much of the ill-feeling which is often excited by appointments to the magistracy may be accounted for by the jealousy of those who consider themselves to have been passed over.

5. Now, so far as your observation has gone, have the appointments to the Commission of the Peace been dependent altogether on the absolute want of magistrates in the locality in which the gentlemen appointed reside? I have generally made that a material ingredient in the consideration of appointments; for instance, in Sydney very great complaints were made as to the non-attendance of magistrates, and it was mainly on that account additions were made. A large number of merchants and other gentlemen who are very eligible on account of their position have been appointed, and remain in the Commission, and their services are occasionally valuable, although they do not regularly attend the Bench duties. Still there have been very serious inconveniences felt at the Police Offices from the want of a regular attendance of magistrates, and not only when I was formerly in the Government, but since I resumed office in the present Administration, application was made to appoint the chief clerk a magistrate, simply to perform ministerial duties, because magistrates could not be induced to perform them. I objected to that course, and in consequence, added to the Commission of the Peace mainly for the convenience of the public.

6. And in regard to the country districts, you have been guided by the same principle—the want of magistrates in the interior? So far as I remember, almost universally.

7. Are you aware that any objections exist to the magistracy, as a body, in the country, from the fact of their having been generally engaged in the same occupations, and from being united together by a certain communion of interests, particularly in cases between masters and servants? I have heard that such a feeling does exist. Personally, I do not consider it has much weight. The mode in which the magistrates of the Colony have generally carried out their duties has disproved the allegation; and I think I may refer to an opinion expressed, on a former occasion, by a late Member of this House, Mr. Nichols, who stated—after great experience in cases which were brought before him—that, in his opinion, the magistrates, as a body, did perform their duties with a very creditable amount of intelligence and with strict impartiality.

8. That was some ten or twelve years ago? Yes. I do not think the magistracy has deteriorated since.

9. It has been reported that it has, and that the appointments made during Sir Charles Fitz Roy's time were far more objectionable than any made before? I do not think that applied so much to the country districts as to those in or near Sydney.

10. Suppose a party in a Police Court in a country district feels himself aggrieved, how can he obtain redress? No doubt he feels the inconvenience of being at a distance from the Supreme Court of Justice; but the cases of appeal, on the ground of injustice, are not numerous.

11. Perhaps you are influenced in your opinion by the fact that as cases are silently passed over there is no grievance to complain of? That did not actuate me in expressing my opinion. I may have been influenced by not hearing of many cases of appeal. The reason I cited Mr. Nichols' opinion was, that that gentleman having been so influential a practitioner of the Supreme Court, and having been almost universally employed in that particular branch of his profession, expressed that opinion so confidently in favor of the magistracy as a whole, and I think he went so far as to state, that in nearly every case where a decision was adverse to the magistracy, it was so upon grounds of a technical nature rather than for reasons affecting the impartial administration of justice.

12. That opinion was expressed during the administration of Sir George Gipps? Yes.

13. The law has been altered very much since? Yes.

14. Those cases that are adjudicated in the Police Courts are of just as much importance to the poor who are interested as those which are decided in the Supreme Court are to the richer portion of the community? Yes, that I freely admit.

15. The sum of £5 may be the same to a poor man as £500 is to a man in a higher station of life. Now, if the State provides for the due administration of the law in regard to the man in the higher position, is not the State bound to provide for the protection of the poor man, even in the small sums he is interested just as much? I do not understand the bearing of the question, unless it applies to the facilities of applying to a higher Court. These facilities, I apprehend, will be very much extended by the erection of the District Courts.

16. Do you think the more general appointments of Police Magistrates in the country districts would be beneficial? I do not. I think the only convenience attending the appointment of Police Magistrates is the assurance the public have that, as they are paid officers, they will be at particular places at stated times to administer justice. I cannot admit that an individual is better qualified to perform a public duty because he receives a salary for it. It has always appeared to me highly desirable that the gentlemen resident in the districts should administer justice and perform the duties of magistrates; and in that respect I should be very glad to see the Institutions of the Colony of the same character as in the Mother Country. If Police Magistrates could be obtained having (as perhaps your question might assume) a knowledge of the law, and be filled by persons of high standing, possibly it might be desirable to appoint such functionaries; but we know, as a matter of fact, that the amount of salaries given to Police Magistrates, if you extend the number, is hardly likely to increase; and it is not sufficient to secure persons better qualified than other gentlemen who are resident in the particular districts. On the contrary, there are no doubt in every district many gentlemen as qualified and quite as willing to administer justice, as the individuals who may be appointed and paid for the performance of those duties. I do not entertain the opinion that there is such a want of confidence in the country magistrates generally as on that account to render the appointment of Police Magistrates necessary. I have myself always held the opinion, that unless there is a total want in the districts of persons competent to be appointed magistrates, or there is an amount of police business sufficient to occupy the whole time of the magistrate, a Police Magistrate ought not to be appointed.

17. Then, of course, you are of opinion that the ordinary magistrates are quite competent to deal with the general business of the Courts? Yes; and that they are the proper persons to do it. I should be sorry to see the unpaid magistracy dispensed with, but if Police Magistrates are to be universally appointed, I see no reason for others.

18. Then it follows that greater care should be exercised in the appointment of magistrates? Yes; I admit that great caution should be exercised in all cases.

19. What is the rule at present—the fitness of individuals, as well as want of magistrates, in districts? Yes, both.

20. Are you not aware that parliamentary or political influences are often brought to bear on appointments of this kind? There is no doubt that applications are made to the Government by Members of both Houses of Parliament; and it has been contended by very many persons of eminent position that there can hardly be a fitter mode of bringing candidates for the magistracy under the consideration of the Executive Government than the nomination by persons who represent the districts, and in this respect the position of Members of Parliament has been considered as analogous to that of Lord Lieutenants or Deputy-Lieutenants in England. The Government should have some knowledge of the party who recommends, as it is impossible that the Government can have intimate personal knowledge of every individual throughout the Colony, and therefore, in acting upon recommendations of those persons who are elected by the people resident in the particular districts, there can hardly seem to be a less objectionable mode of bringing the names of gentlemen to be appointed magistrates before the Government. I am not aware that political considerations have guided the appointments of persons to the magistracy apart from all other considerations; but I am aware that the statement has been made that certain persons holding certain political opinions have been appointed to the Commission of the Peace, while others, not better qualified, and not enjoying more of the confidence of their fellow-subjects, have been passed by. The opinion has also been expressed, that political considerations had their weight in causing such omissions.

21. Have you heard of a case in one particular district (during a late Administration) in which fourteen magistrates were appointed on the recommendation of one gentleman in that district? I have.

22. Do you think the wants of this district were so great as to render the appointment of so many necessary? I am not competent to offer an opinion. I may state, as the result of my own experience, that I have been surprised to find in the districts of the interior such a great want of magistrates, and I have no doubt, from the representations made to me by impartial persons, that this has existed particularly in the more northern districts. I have also been surprised to find in these districts so many persons who, so far as I could form an opinion, were quite competent for the magistracy, and who were quite willing to undertake the duties, but who had never been appointed.

23. You know, as a fact, that fourteen gentlemen were appointed on the recommendation of one Member? That was no doubt admitted in the Assembly. I do not know the extent of country over which they exercised jurisdiction.

24. Are you aware that the gentlemen appointed were nominated by a gentleman a supporter of the Government of the day? I am aware such was the fact, and that one of that gentleman's sons-in-law took his passage to England just as he was appointed, and has never been back to the Colony since.

25. Are you aware that at the same time recommendations that came from other Members opposed to the Government were neglected altogether—in part, if not altogether? I believe that was the fact.

26. Then does it appear to you an unreasonable presumption, that Parliamentary influences ruled the appointments in these cases, and prevented the appointments in other cases? Parliamentary considerations might rule the appointments in some cases, but I am not sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances to say that Parliamentary influences guided the determination to exclude others. There seems to me, so far as I had an opportunity of

The Hon.
G. Cowper,
Esq., M.P.

of judging, to have been an unwillingness on the part of preceding Administrations to augment the magistracy to any great extent. I arrived at this conclusion after I had gone over the list of persons recommended to me when formerly Colonial Secretary, and comparing that list with the appointments which subsequently took place. Having again come back to office, and having received complaints from persons who stated they were led by the previous Administration to believe that they would be included in the Commission, but were not so included, I would only ascribe the exclusion to the unwillingness to which I have alluded. I should be otherwise at a loss to know why they were not appointed, for in one instance the party took no interest in politics, and I cannot imagine that that would be considered as ground for exclusion.

27. You see no objection, I understand you to say, to the recommendations of the Members of the districts? I think the Government ought not to consider themselves bound to accept every recommendation, but I do not see any objection to the Members of both Houses nominating parties who they know are willing to undertake the duties, and who they believe to be competent to perform them, and in addition, certifying that they have the confidence of their fellow colonists.

28. Certifying they have the confidence of their fellow colonists? Yes; expressing an opinion entitled to weight. I do not know any more legitimate source from which the Government could obtain opinions entitled to consideration. It has in former years been very much in practice—I believe I am correct in saying so—to appoint no person to the magistracy who was not recommended by the existing Bench, and even in some cases to refer to the existing Benches, to know whether parties were qualified, or whether their appointments would be acceptable to them. I confess that now we have obtained Responsible Government, the present is, in my opinion, a more legitimate and proper mode of having parties brought under the notice of the Government.

29. Is there not great risk of party influences being brought to bear in appointments to the Commission of the Peace? Party influence will, I apprehend, always have some weight with Government, but the Government ought to have sufficient moral courage to refuse the appointment where parties are known to them to be disqualified, morally or intellectually. The knowledge which Government would possess without some suggestion must be very limited. They must depend to a great extent on the recommendations of Members. The course which I have usually adopted is this:—I receive the recommendation, and it is noted; no promise is made, but the Government are understood to consider the recommendation favorably; and further information is acquired as opportunities arise, either by private communication or through Members of the House generally. The Government have thus opportunities, of which they can avail themselves, of knowing whether or not there are objections to such appointments. The Ministry, representing several constituencies, have also amongst themselves some personal knowledge by which they can advise each other. I should deprecate as much as any one political influence being the only guide in determining appointments.

30. What do you think of the mode of resorting to election? That subject has also been considered by me, and although hereafter, when our Municipal Institutions have been established, and have been working some time, eventually we may be in a position to elect the magistrates—that time has not yet arrived. We have, unquestionably, been very backward in the introduction of Municipal Institutions, but when they have been introduced, and have been worked successfully, we may gradually introduce several changes in matters of Government, and possibly the appointment of magistrates by election. At the present time Aldermen are elected for the Sydney Municipality, and they are occasionally appointed to the magistracy mainly on the ground of being Aldermen, which seems to be rather a step in that direction.

31. What do you think of the people in the different districts electing a certain number, from whom the Government might select in their discretion? This seems at first rather a novelty, and, without consideration, I should not like to commit myself to an opinion in favor of the proposition. It is evident that elections to the Municipalities, so far as they have gone, with reference not only to the City but to the District Council, would not lead you to suppose that many of a higher class would be elected as magistrates than those whom the Government have appointed, as a whole. I think people with great defects of moral character are often very popular with their fellow-citizens.

32. But then, if their immorality were gross and notorious, the Government, under the plan I have just proposed, need not appoint them? Unquestionably; but then the question is, what would you gain by allowing the element of election to be introduced with the power of the Crown to veto.

33. The appointments at all events would be limited to this, which would provide for those chiefly interested the administration of justice in particular districts? The subject is one that I have not sufficiently considered to enable me to express a decided opinion upon it.

34. Sir Alfred Stephen suggested that the magistracy should be appointed for different districts—the Southern District, the Western District, and the Northern District—that a new Commission for each district should issue every three years, thus involving a revision of the magistracy for each district every three years—what do you think of such a plan as that? I am not inclined to view favorably the proposition restricting the jurisdiction of magistrates; because I think the conferring a jurisdiction co-extensive with the Colony is convenient, and I cannot conceive why a gentleman who is qualified to act for one particular district should be disqualified to act for any other. With regard to the occasional re-issue of the Commission of the Peace, the value of this would altogether depend upon the amount of moral courage which the Executive Government might exhibit in issuing the new Commission. No doubt the object desired to be obtained is the relieving the Commission of the Peace, in a legitimate way, of persons whose conduct might have proved them to be unfit for the position to which, under a different supposition, the Government had appointed them; but when the last Commission of the Peace was issued, it was a matter of general surprise

The Hon.
C. Cowper,
Esq., M.P.

17 June, 1858.

surprise and comment that the Government did not avail itself of that opportunity to omit several names from the magistracy, who were however re-appointed.

35. Have you issued any writs of supersedeas since you became Colonial Secretary? With the exception of cases of insolvency, I think only one. In consequence of a complaint made to the Government in the case of Mr. Charles Bayly, of Liverpool, which the Government thought of a serious character, they appointed a Special Commissioner to proceed and investigate the circumstances at the Court House, Liverpool. But the party who made the original complaint did not appear to sustain the charge, and therefore the report of the Commissioner was not such as to justify the Government in taking any further steps with reference to the matter; and although repeated complaints have since been made to me in conversation personally by the magistrates of the district and by other persons, and although I have received intimations that definite charges would be made of the unfitness of this person to hold the office of magistrate, no formal complaint has since been made to the Government which would, in my opinion, justify the adoption of a course which, if the allegations made be well founded, the Government certainly ought to take, and would take.

36. By Mr. Forster: With regard to the appointment of Police Magistrates, you seem unfavorable? I am. I quite admit there are cases where the appointment is necessary, and where, if you get a good man, the appointment may be of advantage; but I would not encourage the magistrates of the districts to seek to evade duties which I think society has a right to expect from them, to a certain extent, and which I think are better performed by them than by any substitute.

37. Do you consider every public servant, whether paid or unpaid, is responsible to the Government, and through them to the public? I do.

38. In what way is the responsibility enforced in unpaid magistrates? I have already stated to the Committee that the Executive Government having once appointed a magistrate, have comparatively little to do with the way in which he performs the duty. I view him as administering the law, and whenever he may act improperly, the legitimate tribunal for punishing him, or determining whether he is right or wrong, is the Supreme Court.

39. Would not the necessity of applying to the Supreme Court in such cases as you have mentioned involve a serious expense to the person who avails himself of that mode? Unquestionably, it must involve some expense.

40. Will not that deter persons from seeking this under that particular channel? It may, in some cases; but I think if it is a serious case, the party if able to meet the expense will not be deterred on that account.

41. Might not this want of responsibility fall most heavily on those cases where men of small means are concerned? No doubt.

42. Is not that admitting the responsibility of which you speak as void for a man of small means? If you get a gentleman to undertake a delicate and difficult duty, I do not think he ought to be too easily subjected to annoyance or very serious expense for the performance of those duties to which he devotes himself, at perhaps great loss, unless gross partiality or corruption were alleged.

43. I think you admitted that in cases of men of small means there were no means of enforcing the responsibility? Except in the Supreme Court. I should deprecate frequent or too ready interference by the Executive Government with the magistrates. I view them as Judges, and as such not amenable exclusively to the Executive Government.

44. Is there no other way of enforcing the responsibility of unpaid magistrates except through the Supreme Court? No doubt there are cases in which the Executive Government might be so satisfied of misconduct as to issue a supersedeas. I apprehend if a magistrate sat in a case in which he was himself concerned, or if there was reason to believe that he sat for the purpose of determining the case partially, or for the benefit of a particular friend, as in the case of supersedeas to which I have referred,—in such a case, on it being proved or admitted, the Government would issue a supersedeas. That is the amount of responsibility to which magistrates are amenable to the Government, but charges of unjust decisions are matters for a Court of Law. These can only be dealt with by the Supreme Court.

45. Have you not in evidence adduced a great number of cases that go to prove that in the magistracy there are a number of persons totally unfit for the office? There are some; I do not think a great number.

46. There are some? Some magistrates are, doubtless, not fitted for the office.

47. Without wishing to cast any blame upon Government, have you not admitted that the continuance of people in the Commission of the Peace is almost inevitable under certain circumstances—there seems no way of removing them? There is a way of removing them, but there is, no doubt, the same difficulty in making the law apply as to other cases where there is any unwillingness to carry the law into effect.

48. Then this is an admission that there is no way of enforcing the responsibility? Your question which commenced this branch of the examination rather applied, as I thought, to the case of a person who believing himself to be the victim of injustice by a magistrate could not get redress.

49. No; I allude to general responsibility for any sort of offence, or any kind of disqualification of office: if these persons continue in the magistracy—if there is no legal or formal mode of removing them, does not that particularly do away with the responsibility so far as these gentlemen are concerned? My opinion is, that the Executive Government have the power, upon a case being proved to them, irrespective of the remedy the party may have in the Supreme Court; but I also think the Executive Government ought to be very careful in dismissing magistrates, and that they ought to require a very strong case to be made out before issuing a supersedeas.

50. But still the responsibility of which you have spoken cannot be enforced in this way? There is, I contend, a double responsibility affecting the magistrates. They are certainly amenable to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and unquestionably in those cases of which which I speak (matters of complaint to the Executive Government) they can also be dealt with by the Executive Government.

51. But, if practically they are not dealt with by the Executive Government, is that responsibility not in abeyance altogether? I do not admit the Government would not act in strong cases; but there are many comparatively trivial cases in which parties consider that they have a right to feel aggrieved, and the Government refer them to their remedy in the Supreme Court.

52. Can any case be stronger than Mr. Bayly's, or more notorious? If Mr. Bayly committed a gross injustice, I apprehend the Supreme Court might bring Mr. Bayly to account; and if any person would substantiate a serious charge against Mr. Bayly, or bring his conduct in a regular manner under the notice of the Executive Government to determine the question, the Executive Government would not be found wanting in doing its duty.

53. I am not casting any blame upon any one. I wish to know the system. Is it not a fact, as regards Mr. Bayly, that although he is totally unfit for the office, in fact there is no mode of enforcing the responsibility against him, because persons cannot be got to complain? There are many other delinquents who escape punishment for want of an accuser.

54. I want to ask one further question—whether you can conceive that it is right that Mr. Bayly should retain the office of magistrate after the facts are known to the Government? I have already said Mr. Bayly's accuser failed to appear and support his charge, and it would be quite possible for a Police Magistrate to commit acts of misconduct as gross as are publicly imputed to Mr. Bayly, and still to remain a recipient of the salary from the public as a Police Magistrate, if no person complained; for there is so great an unwillingness on the part of the public to become accusers, that I can conceive it possible for a popular Police Magistrate to be guilty of very great improprieties and no one be found to bring these improprieties so markedly before the Government as to justify the Government in dismissing him.

55. I suppose you admit it is easier to enforce responsibility in cases of paid servants than unpaid? Yes, as a general rule, I do.

56. That is, in favor of paid Police Magistrates? So far it is.

57. By Mr. Lee: Have you had many complaints from the people about the Bench of Magistrates giving wrong decisions? Not many.

58. You have had some? Yes—that is to say, the parties decided against were dissatisfied with the decision.

59. What is your opinion about the Court of Requests cases tried by the magistrates—do you think the Court of Requests is not more a Court of Equity than a Court of Law? No doubt; but still I think the magistrates are bound to respect the law in all their decisions. I think the extension of the power of dealing with small debts to the magistrates generally has been a great boon to the public.

60. You have not heard many complaints? In that respect I have not heard any complaint.

61. With regard to Police Magistrates, are you aware in distant small towns your magistrates are living some ten or twenty miles from the place where they have to undertake the business of the Petty Sessions—such as Mudgee or Wellington? You have a Police Magistrate at Mudgee.

62. Only recently—well Wellington? I do not consider ten miles in the country too great a distance for magistrates to travel in the performance of their duties. I do not myself think it desirable in country districts to have the Police Office open every day. You only give too great facilities to parties to make complaints before magistrates; and a spirit of litigation is encouraged by the Police Office being open every day in the country districts.

63. Are you aware that in Molong four years ago suitors had to attend for three weeks, because they never could get magistrates together to hear their cases? I was not aware of this.

64. Do you think in small towns like these that the Police Magistrate appointed could attend to the two districts of Molong and Wellington each week? No doubt he might.

65. By allowing him something for his horse? Where there are not gentlemen in the district to be appointed to the Commission of the Peace, of course you must provide for the administration of justice otherwise; and I can understand that a Police Magistrate, if he worked harmoniously with the country magistrates, would be found a convenience; but if the Police Magistrate happened, as was not unfrequently the case in former years, to be unpopular, and even disobliging, not to speak of any graver offence, he is a very undesirable fixture in any district.

66. Does that arise from the other magistrates being jealous of his having more power than they have themselves? I think that feeling has disappeared—no doubt there was that feeling.

The Hon. Edward Deas Thomson, Esq., C.B., M.L.C., examined:—

- The Hon. E. D. Thomson, Esq., C.B., M.L.C.
23 June, 1858.
1. By the Chairman: You were Colonial Secretary in this Colony for many years? I was, for a considerable number of years; upwards of nineteen.
 2. How used the appointment of magistrates to be carried out, or decided upon, by the Government? The general practice was for application to be made to the Governor through his Private Secretary, proposing the names of persons whom it was desired to place in the Commission of the Peace, and the Governor decided whether they should be put in or not, making such inquiries as he thought necessary. In some cases applications were made officially through me as Colonial Secretary, but that was not the recognized mode of applying. In general those who applied in that way were told that it was not the proper course—that the qualification of persons to be placed in the magistracy was not a fit subject for official correspondence, and that if parties desired any one to be placed in the Commission, the proper way was to apply to the Governor direct through his Private Secretary. Application was also occasionally made to the different members of the Government, who, if they were satisfied with the qualifications of the individuals proposed, and the expediency of their appointment having reference to the requirements of the districts in which they resided, recommended them accordingly for the favorable consideration of the Governor. In some cases exception was made to persons who were admitted into the Commission, and it then became the practice, but not formally, as a matter of record in the proceedings of the Executive Council, to mention the names of candidates at some meeting of that body before they were placed in the Commission. It was impossible for the Governor to know the qualifications of individuals in distant parts of the country, and it was thought better, therefore, that their fitness for appointment should be canvassed; so that, if any knowledge was had of the parties, the Governor might be advised accordingly; but that was not the invariable practice.
 3. From whom did the applications generally proceed? Generally speaking, I should say from magistrates of the district, and sometimes from the Court of Petty Sessions, in their collective capacity.
 4. In many instances the Governor, then, without reference to the Executive Council, made the appointment? Yes.
 5. This was the case during the administration of Sir George Gipps? The general practice was the same during the administrations of Sir Richard Bourke, of Sir George Gipps, and of Sir Charles Fitz Roy; but it was only during the latter Governor's administration that it became the practice to canvass the qualifications of individuals for appointment, in the Executive Council.
 6. We have been given to understand that the appointments made during the administrations of Sir Richard Bourke and of Sir George Gipps were, generally speaking, of a better character than those that were made during the administration of Sir Charles Fitz Roy? I am not prepared to say whether that was so. There might have been a greater difficulty in the later appointments, from this circumstance, that the Colony became much more extended, and, in some cases at least, it was a choice between persons who were not thoroughly qualified and no appointment at all; because, as you are aware, there was a great objection in those days to the appointment of stipendiary magistrates. There were constant applications for the appointment of magistrates in the remote districts of the interior; and unless the Government had complied with them, the law could not have been administered at all.
 7. Stipendiary magistrates were generally provided in those old times? In the early days they were—till 1843, when the late Legislative Council struck off a great number of Police Magistrates. In fact, in those early days, as you know, the magistrates had to administer summary jurisdiction in convict cases, and it was thought more desirable, for obvious reasons, that they should be dealt with by paid magistrates than the ordinary magistrates of the Colony. Most of the latter were assignees of convicts, and they could scarcely perform these duties, therefore, with perfect satisfaction to the public or to themselves.
 8. Then the appointments were made, in those days, in consequence of there being an actual want of magistrates in the localities for which the appointments were made? It was so. There were no other means of carrying out the law. I believe that, with the very extensive statutory functions with which the magistrates are now charged, more than nine-tenths of the whole administration of justice in the country devolves upon them. Of course that is a mere opinion.
 9. You think so large a proportion as nine-tenths comes before them? Yes. When you consider the very numerous cases which, under the present state of the law, have to be determined by the magistrates, either in Petty Sessions or in the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, I think I may assume that this estimate is not far from the truth. I will briefly enumerate a few of the most important of them. The first to which I will advert is the licensing of public-houses. It will be admitted that scarcely any more important duty devolves on the magistracy than the proper decision of cases of this nature. It is most essential for the interest of the community that the privilege of holding a license should be granted only to men of thoroughly respectable character. I fear that, hitherto, sufficient care has not always been taken in this respect. Then there is the important duty of preparing and correcting the Jury Lists. It is obviously most necessary for the due and satisfactory satisfactory administration of justice in the superior Courts of the Colony, that men only of proper qualification and character should be placed on these lists. There is another, and very difficult adjudication cast upon them,—that of determining cases of complaint between master and servant. I have always thought that it would be better to have paid magistrates to perform this duty; that it would be more satisfactory to the servant, because most of the magistrates are employers of labor; and it is no disrespect to them to say that they must be subject to the frailty of human nature, and to a certain extent be influenced in favor of their own interests. Another most important function which devolves upon the magistrate is the revision of the Electoral Roll. I have never thought that a very satisfactory mode of effecting the object; and I proposed, in 1851, when the Electoral Bill was before the late Legislative Council, the adoption of the English principle of appointing revising barristers to perform this duty; but from the difficulty of obtaining a sufficient number of properly qualified persons, and the large expense with which it would be attended, the Council in those days refused to entertain the proposition. It has since occurred to me, that if District Courts were established, the Judges of those Courts might be charged with this duty. They will be men of competent legal knowledge and ability, unconnected with the districts, and altogether the most proper parties to perform this most delicate and important function. It sometimes happens, I have been informed, that Members of the Assembly sit as magistrates in these Revision Courts. Now, without any imputation against them, or any intended disrespect, it is scarcely possible that they could perform this duty satisfactorily to themselves or to the body of electors, for there must be party feelings in the case, and especially in local districts, where party feeling generally runs high. It is more desirable, therefore, that some functionary unconnected with the district, and having competent legal knowledge, should be charged with the duty. Then there is another duty which devolves upon the magistrate, that of magisterial inquiry in the nature of inquests where no coroner is appointed. That obviously requires a competent knowledge of the law and practice in this somewhat difficult branch of the administration of justice. The committal of prisoners for trial at Quarter Sessions, the Supreme Court, and Circuit Courts, in cases of felony, misdemeanor, and other matters of that kind, greatly increase the responsible duties of the magistracy. Hitherto there has also been the important duty of adjudicating in civil cases of debt under certain sums; and I perceive in the amended form in which the District Courts Bill has been sent to the Assembly, that it is still intended in those districts where there are no District Courts to retain this jurisdiction of magistrates in cases not exceeding £10. Then there is the summary jurisdiction generally in those infinite number of cases of offences against the statutes, and which it has been the policy of the Legislature, both in England and in this Colony, especially of late years, to multiply to so great an extent. Upon the justices also devolves the important duty of adjudicating in all criminal cases not punishable with death which are within the jurisdiction of the Courts of General Quarter Sessions, as well as in the cases of appeal to those Courts from the decisions of magistrates acting singly or in Courts of Petty Sessions. If all these various calls upon the services of the magistrates be taken into account, I think I have justified the assumption that at least nine-tenths of the whole administration of justice in the Colony now devolves upon them. It will be readily admitted that if this be a correct estimate of the nature, extent, and character of the duties to be performed, it is the more necessary that men only of the highest and most unexceptionable character should be appointed to the magistracy. There has always been a very strong pressure upon the Government to place men in the Commission of the Peace. There are very few objects of distinction in this Colony, excepting seats in either House of the Legislature, and as men naturally wish to rise in the estimation of their friends and of the public, they desire to be placed in the Commission of the Peace. This has created a very great pressure on the Government, which it has been difficult, if not altogether impossible, to resist. There has also been this inconvenience sometimes—men of somewhat inferior qualifications have occasionally been appointed to the magistracy, and this has raised up a host of applicants, who naturally say, “If So-and-so is placed in the Commission, a man of little education and estimation in the community, why should not I.” This increases the difficulty of the Government, and points to the expediency and propriety of maintaining, as far as possible, a high standard of qualification. The same thing has been felt in England in a great degree. I find on reference to some of the authorities, that the institution of the magistracy is one of very old date. In the early days they were the conservators of the peace, the principal of whom was constituted the custos rotulorum, or keeper of the records. They were called “custodes or conservatores pacis.” Those that were so virtute officii still continue, but the latter sort are superseded by the modern justices.” Blackstone, in his Commentaries, says, “The King’s Majesty is, by his office and dignity royal, the principal conservator of the peace within all his dominions; and may give authority to any other to see the peace kept, and to punish such as break it; hence it is usually called the King’s peace.” Then he proceeds to enumerate the superior persons who, virtute officii, are conservators of the peace, including the Lord Chancellor, the Justices of the Court of King’s Bench, and others. He then observes, “Those that were, without any office, simply and merely conservators of the peace, either claimed that power by prescription, or were bound to exercise it by the tenure of their lands, or, lastly, were chosen by the freeholders in full County Court before the Sheriff; the writ for their election directing them to be chosen “de probioribus et potentioribus comitatus sui in custodes pacis.” But when Queen Isabel, the wife of Edward II, had contrived to depose her husband by a forced resignation of the Crown, and had set up his son, Edward III, in his place,—he proceeds to say that the King issued a writ “commanding each sheriff that the peace be kept throughout his bailiwick, on pain and peril of disinheretance and loss of life and limb; and, in a few weeks after the date of these writs it was ordained in Parliament that, for the better maintaining and keeping of the peace in every county, good men and lawful, which were no maintainers of evil or barrators in the country, should be assigned to keep the peace; and in this manner,

"manner, and upon this occasion, was the election of the conservators of the peace taken from the people and given to the King; this assignment being construed to be by the King's Commission; but still they were only called conservators, wardens, or keepers of the peace, till the statute 34 Edward III c. 1 gave them the power of trying felonies; and then they acquired the more honorable appellation of justices."

10. By Mr. Piddington: Then, formerly the conservators of the peace were more in the nature of strictly executive officers rather than of persons empowered to adjudicate? Certainly, they were more as executive officers of police than as justices of the peace having also judicial functions to perform. Blackstone further states,—“These justices are appointed by the King's Special Commission, under the Great Seal, the form of which was settled by all the Judges, A.D., 1590. This appoints them all, jointly and separately, to keep the peace, and any two or more of them to inquire into and determine felonies and other misdemeanors, in which number some particular justices, or one of them, are directed to be always included, and no business to be done without their presence; the words of the Commission running thus—‘quorum aliquem vestrum, A. B. C. D. &c., unum esse volumus,’—whence the persons so named are usually called justices of the quorum.” But he goes on to say, it is now usual to include them all in the quorum, that they may be allowed to act. Then, “Touching the number and qualifications of these justices, it was ordained by statute 18 Edward III sec. 2 c. 2, that two or three of the best reputation in each county shall be assigned to be keepers of the peace; but these being found rather too few for that purpose, it was provided by statute 34 Edward III c. 1, that one lord and three or four of the most worthy men in the county, with some learned in the law, shall be made justices in every county; but afterwards the number of justices, through the ambition of private persons, became so large that it was thought necessary by statute 12 Ric. II c. 10, and 14 Ric. II c. 11, to restrain them at first to six, and afterwards to eight only. But this rule is now disregarded, and the cause seems to be, that the growing number of statute laws committed from time to time to the charge of justices of the peace have occasioned also (and very reasonably) their increase to a large number; and as to these qualifications, the statutes just cited direct them to be of the best reputation, and most worthy men in the county; and the statute 13 Ric. II c. 7, orders them to be of the most sufficient knights, esquires, and gentlemen of the law; also, by statute 2 Hen. V st. 1 c. 4, and st. c. 2 c. 1, they must be resident in their several counties. And because, contrary to these statutes, men of small substance had crept into the Commission, whose poverty had made them both covetous and contemptible, it was enacted by statute 18 Hen. VI c. 11, that no justice should be put in Commission if he had not lands to the value of £20 per annum. And the rate of money being greatly altered since that time, it is now enacted by statute 5 Geo. II, c. 18, that every justice, except as is therein excepted, shall have £100 per annum clear of all deductions.” Then, he says, “As the office of these justices is conferred by the King, so it subsists only during his pleasure, and is determinable, first by the demise of the Crown, that is in six months after. But if the same justice is put in Commission by the successor, he shall not be obliged to sue out a new dedimus, or to swear to his qualifications afresh: nor by reason of any new Commission to take the oaths more than once in the same reign. Secondly, by express writ under the Great Seal, discharging any particular person from being any longer justice. Thirdly, by superseding the Commission by Writ of Supersedeas, which suspends the power of all the justices, but does not totally destroy it; seeing it may be recovered again by another Writ, called a procedendo. Fourthly, by a new Commission, which virtually, though silently, discharges all the former justices that are not included therein—for two Commissions cannot subsist at once. Fifthly, by accession of the office of Sheriff or Coroner.” Then there is a passage to which I would particularly call the attention of the Committee. Perhaps I trespass too much, but it may be convenient to give reference to some of these authorities which are received everywhere with so much respect:—“The power, office, and duty of a Justice of the Peace depend on his Commission, and on the several statutes which have created objects of his jurisdiction. His Commission first empowers him singly to conserve the peace, and thereby gives him all the power of the ancient conservators at the Common Law, in suppressing riots and affrays, in taking securities for the peace, and in apprehending and committing other inferior criminals. It also empowers any two or more to hear, and determine, all felonies and other offences; which is the ground of their jurisdiction at sessions. And as to the powers given to one, two, or more justices by the several statutes, which from time to time have heaped upon them such an infinite variety of business, that few care to undertake, and fewer understand, the office; they are such, and of so great importance to the public, that the country is greatly obliged to any worthy magistrate that, without sinister views of his own, will engage in this troublesome service, and therefore, if a well-meaning justice makes an undesigned slip in his practice, great lenity and indulgence are shewn to him in the courts of law; and there are many statutes made to protect him in the upright discharge of his office, which, among other privileges, prohibit such justices from being sued for any oversights, without notice beforehand, and stop all suits begun on tender made of sufficient amends. But, on the other hand, any malicious or tyrannical abuse of their office is usually severely punished; and all persons who recover a verdict against a justice for any wilful or malicious injury are entitled to double costs.” With respect to the practice of later periods, I now quote from a celebrated speech of Lord Brougham and Vaux on Law Reform, delivered on the 7th February, 1828. He says, “I cannot help thinking it worth inquiry, whether some amendment might not be made in our justices of peace system. The first doubt which strikes me is, if it be fit that they should be appointed, as they are, merely by the Lords Lieutenant of Counties, without the interference of the Crown's responsible Ministers. It is true that the Lord Chancellor issues the Commission; but it is the Lord Lieutenant who designates the persons to be comprehended in it. Such a thing is hardly ever known as any interference with respect to those individuals on the part

" of the Lord Chancellor. He looks to the Lord Lieutenant, or rather to the Custos Rotulorum, which the Lord Lieutenant most frequently is (indeed everywhere but in counties palatine), for the names of proper persons. The Lord Lieutenant, therefore, as Custos Rotulorum, absolutely appoints all the justices of the peace in his county at his sole will and pleasure. Now I cannot understand what quality is peculiar to a keeper of the records that fits him above all other men to say who shall be the judges of the districts whose records he keeps. I think it would be about as convenient and natural to let the Master of the Rolls appoint the judges of the land (indeed more so, for he is a lawyer,) or to give the appointment to the Keeper of the State Papers. The Custos Rotulorum may issue a new Commission too, and leave out names. I have done it; but I have also known it prevented by the Great Seal: indeed it was laid down as a rule by the late Lord Chancellor Eldon, from which no consideration, his lordship was used to say, should induce him to depart, that however unfit a magistrate might be for his office, either from private misconduct or party feeling, he would never strike him off the list until he had been convicted of some offence by the verdict of a Court of Record. Upon this principle he always acted." Then, in a note he says, "The course since 1828, and especially since 1832, has been for the Great Seal to exercise a much more active interference in appointing magistrates; and the Lord Lieutenant (or rather Custos Rotulorum) no longer is the person alone consulted. This is now the case with Durham also, where the Bishop is no longer Custos, that office being now held by the Lord Lieutenant." He proceeds to show the great importance of appointing proper men to the Commission, from the very extensive powers now granted to them by statute. He says, "I have shuddered to see the way in which these extensive powers are sometimes exercised by a jurisdiction not responsible for its acts. It is said that the magistracy ought not to be responsible, because it is not paid; but we ought not to forget that as gold itself may be bought too dear, so may economy; money may be saved at too high a price. Mark the difference of responsibility between the Quarter Sessions and one of the superior Courts of the Kingdom. In the King's Bench the name of the Judge who pronounces the judgment is known, and the venerable magistrate stands before the country in his own proper person, always placed at the bar of public opinion. Here it is Lord Tenterden, it is Mr. Justice Bailey, by their names; in the other case it is merely the Quarter Sessions, which, as Dean Swift says, is nobody's name. The individual magistrates composing it are not thought of; their names are not even published. It is a fluctuating body. If the same individuals always sat in the Court there might be some approach to responsibility. At present there is none; and where there is no responsibility injustice will occasionally be committed, as long as men are men. It would be some correction of the evil if the number of magistrates was fixed; if their names were always known in connexion with their acts; and if they were more easily removable on proof of their misconduct. Then comes the question, is it after all gratuitous service? We are told 'we cannot visit the magistrates severely, or even watch them very strictly, because they volunteer their duty and receive no remuneration for their trouble.' But although they have no money for it, they may have money's worth. Cheap justice is a very good thing, but costly justice is much better than cheap injustice. If I saw clearly the means by which the magistrates could be paid, and by which therefore a more correct discharge of the magisterial duties might be ensured, I would certainly prefer paying them in money to allowing them to receive money's worth by jobs, and other violations of their duty." Then he recites a number of incidents as to the over-zeal of some magistrates, some of whom are clerical magistrates, and then makes these closing remarks:—"Some of these details may be ludicrous, but the general subject is a most serious and a most important one, because these facts shew the manner in which justice is administered to the people, out of sight of the public, and out of reach of the higher Courts of law. It is through the magistracy, more than through any other agency, except indeed that of the tax-gatherer, that the people are brought directly into contact with the Government of the country; and this is the measure of justice with which, when they approach it, they are treated, by functionaries irresponsible for their proceedings. A Justice of the Peace—whether in his own parlour or on the Bench—whether employed in summary convictions, or in enforcing what is called, after a very worthy friend of mine, 'Mr. Nicholson Calvert's Act'—is never an ostensible individual, responsible in his own proper person to public opinion; hardly ever, unless he chooses by some indiscretion to make himself so, amenable to a higher and purer judicature. The Judges of the land, chosen from the professors of the law, after the labors of a life previously devoted to the acquirement of knowledge calculated to fit them for their office, and clothed with attributes of supreme power over petty magistrates, are responsible for every word and act, and are subject to every species of revision and control. They were selected with the most anxious caution for every qualification of high character, and of profound knowledge; and yet they are incapable of pronouncing a single decision from which an appeal will not lie to some other tribunal immediately above them; while from the decision of the country justices—taken from the community at large, or recommended by habits least calculated to make them just—subject to no personal responsibility, because beyond or below the superintendence of public opinion—and irremovable, unless by a verdict for some indictable offence; from their decision there is no appeal; from their decision, although they have to deal with some of the most important interests in the country, there is no appeal unless their misdeeds shall have been set forth in a case submitted by their own free will, with their expression, to their Court of King's Bench." I think the Committee will be satisfied from the opinion of that very high authority, how important it is that only properly qualified men should be placed in the Commission of the Peace; that the highest interests of society are involved in the right discharge of this duty by the Government.

11. By the Chairman: Are you aware whether stipendiary magistrates are commonly appointed throughout England? I think they have been more numerous of late, but they exist exist in large numbers in Ireland. There are stipendiary magistrates almost every where there.

12. The practice of making such appointments has grown up since the period when Lord Brougham delivered this speech? I think so; a considerable time after. You will perceive he points to the desirability of appointing paid magistrates, if he saw his way clear to do so; but no doubt the enormous expense, and the difficulty of appointing properly qualified persons, would render it a matter of almost impossibility, particularly in this Colony. The stipend which is given to a paid magistrate can scarcely be supposed to command a man of very high qualifications, especially of legal attainments.

13. What is the salary usually given? About £400.

14. You are aware that in different towns throughout this Colony there are other officers, generally speaking, for some particular purpose connected with the Government? Only Clerks of Petty Sessions and Clerks of the Peace. There are Commissioners of Crown Lands, who have been hitherto employed; but I believe there has been some alteration in that respect.

15. Take the case of Goulburn,—there are there a Police Magistrate, a Commissioner of Crown Lands, a Clerk of Petty Sessions, and a Visiting Justice for the Gaol? But in general the duty of Visiting Justice is performed by the Police Magistrate; Goulburn is an exception, from an accidental circumstance: There was no Police Magistrate at Goulburn when the gentleman received the appointment of Visiting Magistrate for the Gaol, but I believe that no salary is now attached to the office.

16. Might not these offices be united? No doubt.

17. And thus a larger salary be provided for the person holding the office of Police Magistrate? Yes. I think you would command men of higher qualifications, if the stipend were higher, for men of ability and legal attainments must be paid well.

18. If the Commissioner of Crown Lands also acted as Police Magistrate in remote districts, he might of course itinerate? Formerly, we generally chose, when we could, men who were acquainted with surveying, and I think a Commissioner of Crown Lands ought to be a man who has some technical knowledge of surveying, so as to perform his duty properly. He should be able to point out allotments on the ground, and prepare maps and tracings for the information of the public, and I think there might be a difficulty in getting men qualified to perform both duties—I do not say an insuperable difficulty.

19. Are you acquainted with the working of the Assistant Barrister's Court in Ireland? I am not, but from all I have heard of these Courts they give great satisfaction.

20. This is the plan adopted, I believe, in the issuing of summonses: it is very simple:—The form is printed, and any party who has a grievance specifies his complaint in the blank part left for the purpose; he then signs his own name, and serves it on the party. The party served with the summons is bound to appear at the sitting of the Court the case is referred to, and the case is then proceeded with; and all the trouble we now experience in instituting proceedings is avoided? May any one issue a summons in his own case?

21. Any man may issue a summons in his own case? I should think that was a dangerous principle, and might bring many people to Court uselessly.

22. Then the party would be liable to pay the costs if the case went against him. Now, in many instances in the country districts, persons are obliged to go many miles to a Bench for a summons, and many cases are not prosecuted, unless felony, from the difficulty of obtaining justice? Yes, no doubt.

23. Another part of the working of the system is this, that the Judge who is assisted by the Barrister travels with only one attendant, the Registrar goes from town to town and holds his Court, has a jury impanelled and decides in civil and also criminal cases. The machinery is extremely simple, and the law is thus administered with great satisfaction to the people—do you think any such system as that would be suitable to our circumstances here? It is a subject which I have never considered sufficiently to enable me to express an opinion upon it, but I am rather doubtful whether it would operate properly. Besides, that would not provide for a great number of the cases of summary jurisdiction now submitted to the magistrates.

24. Under such an arrangement, I take it the summary jurisdiction might be very much curtailed—summary jurisdiction is a form in direct violation of common law; we have from expediency been increasing the power of the magistrate, but it appears that while the jurisdiction has thus been enlarged, the competency of parties to administer the law, generally speaking, has diminished. There was a suggestion made here some time ago by the Judges, to the effect that the Supreme Court should take cognizance of all the cases that are now tried at Quarter Session, and even the more important cases that are decided by magistrates in Petty Sessions. You remember the Report made some years ago—Mr. Lowe took a part in it? I have some recollection of it, but the circumstances of the Colony have changed since that. The establishment of Circuit Courts, and the proposed establishment of District Courts, will render such a system undesirable. I thought myself in the passage of the Bill through the House a great mistake had been made in retaining Courts of Quarter Sessions. I consider it would have been a much simpler and better plan to have transferred the whole of the criminal jurisdiction of Quarter Sessions to the District Courts, and then a competent legal Judge would have tried these cases. You will now have to institute a double set of courts—a set of District Courts and a set of Courts of Quarter Sessions—with a double set of officers. I think it is a great mistake. I listened with great attention to all the arguments against the transfer of the criminal jurisdiction to the District Courts, and certainly I did not hear one that persuaded me.

25. The lawyers are not favorable to a change that would necessarily decrease their business? No doubt; but I never heard them assign one reason satisfactory to my humble judgment why the criminal jurisdiction now vested in the General Quarter Sessions should not be transferred to the District Courts.

26. If we were to extend the jurisdiction of District Courts in the manner you contemplate,
I

I take it there would then be no occasion for the general appointment of Police Magistrates? I think there would be, for there are still most important functions to be performed under summary jurisdiction. I do not think you could extend all cases of jurisdiction to District Courts, as you would have to multiply the number of Judges infinitely, almost to the number of Police Magistrates. There is an enormous amount of business done, if you consider the number of Courts of Petty Sessions throughout the territory, and the number of days they meet.

The Hon. E.
D. Thomson,
Esq., C.B.,
M.L.C.

23 June, 1868.

27. Can you say what is the number of Petty Sessions Courts? I cannot; but there would be no difficulty in getting a return.

28. At what salary do you think proper men could be found to take the office of Police Magistrate? I really have considerable difficulty in saying what would induce properly qualified persons to accept the office. In fact I have always considered public officers—I do not mean those holding the highest appointments, but all having salaries under £700 or £800 a-year—the worst paid men in the community, and that much more was to be obtained in private than in public employ.

29. You think in an enterprising community like this there is more profitable occupation for men of energy and ability? I think so, under £700 or £800 a-year; but I do not think, in the present state of the revenue the country could afford such salaries as these.

30. Still it is the duty of the Government to provide for the administration of justice in these courts in which you say nine-tenths of the business of the country is transacted? Yes.

31. The business of the country is very great, and the expense ought not to prevent the making of proper provision for the protection of litigants? Certainly not; it is a most important matter. We know that in very distant parts of the country the magistrates reside at very great distances from the courts, and it is extremely difficult to get them to attend. Parties go again and again to the courts, and, finding no quorum, are unable to get their cases adjudicated upon, and they are abandoned. Thus crimes against property and person go unpunished, and the law is not vindicated.

32. You have expressed yourself very clearly as to its being objectionable to leave the revision of the electoral lists to the magistrates? It appeared to me as more desirable and more satisfactory to the public to have the lists revised in the way I have suggested.

33. The present system causes the magistrates to be mixed up in political matters? Yes; and as long as men are men we must expect them to have a bias in favor of those persons with whom they agree in political opinions. If too scrupulous to yield to that bias, they will be driven into the opposite extreme, and do injustice to persons of their own party, from the fear of being unduly influenced in their favor. They must, therefore, be placed in a false position.

34. Do you think it likely no evil would result from electoral influences being brought to bear upon the appointment of gentlemen on the Bench? I think it must. Under the present Constitution Act the magistrate must be appointed by the Governor, upon the advice of the Executive Council, and this brings great pressure upon the Ministers from their adherents. I do not speak of the present Ministers only, but of any Ministers under the existing Constitution.

35. A parliamentary supporter of the Ministry may wish to have his friend put in the Commission—the Minister may think the party unsuitable, and refuse, and the applicant may then feel aggrieved and withdraw his support, and thus an amount of pressure may be brought upon the Government of the day, difficult to resist? Almost impossible.

36. Can you offer any suggestions as to how this could be guarded against? Since I was first summoned to appear before this Committee I have given my best attention to the subject, and several modes have suggested themselves to me. The best, I think, is to place the appointment in the hands of the Governor alone, independently of the Ministers for the time being. He is above all political influence, and, I think, would be able to perform this duty to the public with greater satisfaction than any one else. I do not think this would be setting aside the principle of Responsible Government; it would merely relieve the Ministers of the day from that political pressure which I think they ought not to be exposed to, and which, I am sure, nine out of ten desire to be relieved from. It has been proposed to assign this duty to the Judges of the Supreme Court; but it scarcely appears to me that they would have at their command the necessary information to enable them to perform it satisfactorily. We see that in England this duty nominally devolves upon the Lord Chancellor, but, in reality, upon the Lords Lieutenant of Counties, who nominate, and who are themselves, I believe, ordinarily put in motion by the Deputy Lieutenants. The means of knowing the character of individuals is, I think, much greater in England, owing to the settled habits of the people, than it is in a country such as this, where the population, to a certain extent, is migratory. Men are born, educated, brought up, and remain the whole of their lives in particular districts, and their characters are well known to the whole of the public; here it cannot be so, for men are arriving every day whose characters are wholly unknown. They may be, of course, highly respected and really respectable, but they cannot be so well known as in an old country such as England. Therefore, I do not think the Judges of the Supreme Court could perform the duty very satisfactorily either to themselves or to the public.

37. You are, then, in favor of leaving it to the Governor alone? Yes, as before the establishment of Responsible Government. That would require an alteration of the law, but it would not deprive the Governor of the advantage of conferring with his Responsible Ministers; they would be, naturally, the parties to whom he would have recourse for information; but it would relieve the Ministers themselves from that political pressure to which I have adverted.

38. Lord Brougham adverts, in the speech to which you have referred, to the power the magistrates have in licensing public houses? Yes.

39. Do you think it desirable that an alteration in the law should take place here in that respect?

The Hon. E.
D. Thomson,
Esq., C.B.,
M.L.C.

23 June, 1868.

respect? I scarcely think it can be done; it must be left to the magistrates. The point is to appoint no man to the magistracy who is not qualified by property, by character, and by education to perform the duties; that is the best guarantee to the public. I do not think the duty could be transferred, unless to paid officers, who would be responsible to the Government for the time being.

40. That is, to persons holding other offices? I mean to the Police Magistrates, if it be thought desirable that one, at least, of the licensing Justices should be a paid officer of the Government, in order to ensure greater care in the selection of the individuals entitled to this privilege. I think it is a very important question, for I believe one-half the crime of the country is concocted over the rum bottle, in the public-house, sometimes, I fear, with the connivance of the publican. I am well aware, of course, that there are a great many respectable publicans to whom such injurious imputations in no way apply.

41. The regulation of these public-houses you consider as forming a very important part of the police arrangements of the Colony? I do; a most important part.

42. Might not the difficulty be got rid of by abolishing this licensing system altogether? I do not see how you could do that without creating much greater evils. It would not prevent drunkenness, but would, I fear, merely act as a premium on every species of debauchery and crime, and the establishment of drinking shops throughout the country, where men of dissolute habits and character would congregate together for the concoction of crime.

43. Let the trade be free—the evil is so bad it can scarcely be worse? I believe as far as the practice goes it is almost free. Every man of good character is entitled to receive a license; there is no absolute discretion on the part of the magistrate to refuse a license; he is not to judge whether one public-house, or two, or three, are required for a district. If there is the proper accommodation as required by law, and the occupant is a man of respectable character, and applies for a license, it is scarcely within the discretion of the justice to refuse him; so that it virtually becomes what I conceive to be free trade.

44. It has been held in the courts here that the justices have the discretion. However, what I referred to is the trade being absolutely free. Parties now pay licenses and have the exclusive right of selling spirits in small quantities in these houses, hence there is about these houses a congregation of disorderly persons? It is so; but that I conceive to arise from granting licenses to improper persons; still I think there would be greater evil if it were thrown entirely open. These people are under police regulations; their houses can be entered by the police at any time and searched; they are obliged to enter into recognizances to prevent gambling and absolute drunkenness, although we know that in many cases they do not prevent it.

45. With regard to the practical working of the licensing public houses, do you consider that, as a matter of police restraint, the present system is successful or not? Only partially, I think.

46. To what do you attribute the failure? To the want of due caution on the part of magistrates in granting licenses.

47. Then you think that might be guarded against by the appointment only of proper persons? Yes, I think so, or at least to a great extent.

48. Then, under any system that may be adopted, objectionable persons would get into the Commission of the Peace? It ought not to be so.

49. It would be very difficult to guard against it? It will be difficult under any circumstances, but I think not impossible.

50. Looking over the last twenty years, at any time, I presume you must be aware that objectionable persons have got into the Commission? They have, as it has appeared, because they have misconducted themselves afterwards; but there was no knowledge at the time they were appointed that they were unfit persons. A great many persons were put into the Commission whom I did not know even by name—whom I could not know—but when I did know that any unsuitable persons were proposed, I was not backward in giving my strong opinion that they should not be placed in the Commission.

51. Have you known many instances of the issue of Writs of Supersedeas? Not a great number; but there have been cases. Although the general practice is, as it is stated to be in the speech of Lord Brougham, from which I have read, I recollect some years ago that there was a correspondence on the subject with the Secretary of State—I think Lord Glenelg was Secretary of State at the time. There were some complaints on the issue of a new Commission of the Peace that certain persons had been omitted, and reference was made to the Secretary of State by the Governor of the time, and a rule was laid down in conformity with what was stated to be the practice in similar cases in England. It was this:—When a new Commission issued, it was the privilege of Government to omit the name of any person without assigning a cause. If a man, for instance, had been negligent in the performance of his duties, if he had systematically absented himself from the Bench, or if he had proved himself, from his general habits, not desirable to be retained in the Commission, or if he were a person whose education even was not satisfactory, he was omitted from the new Commission, and had no right to complain, or ask the reason. It was within the proper discretion of the Government to do that; but if a supersedeas was issued specially removing a Justice from the existing Commission, then he had a right to know the cause, for there was an imputation against his character, arising from such a proceeding. Therefore, it was the practice of the Government never to remove any one from the Commission by a supersedeas unless there were some proper assignable cause to justify so extreme a measure. I may observe, that in cases of resignation and insolvency it has been usual to issue writs of supersedeas as a matter of course.

52. The writ of supersedeas does not actually remove a magistrate from the Commission of the Peace, it merely suspends the power of acting for the time? It is virtually a removal; no doubt what you have stated is the technical interpretation.

53. In your experience, how many of these writs do you think have been issued? It is hard to say, as my experience extends over a period of nineteen years.

The Hon. E.
D. Thomson,
Esq., C.B.,
M.L.C.

23 June, 1858.

54. A dozen? I think a great many more.

55. What steps were taken by the Government in order to obtain the necessary information which would justify such a proceeding as that? Generally, there was an investigation before the Executive Council, and the party was called upon for an explanation. In some cases the facts that were disclosed were such as to render any such proceeding unnecessary; they were sufficient in themselves to shew that the party was not properly in the Commission. In such a case as that you will find alluded to by Lord Brougham, in the matter contemplated by Lord Eldon, the Governor issues a supersedeas.

56. That is a conviction in a Court of Law? Yes.

57. Do you know if the Governor has, during the period of your holding the office of Colonial Secretary, issued a writ upon such grounds? I think so; but I cannot quite recall to my recollection particular instances. I think there are cases of that kind, but it does not occur to me at the present moment what these particular cases were. I have an impression upon my mind that such cases have occurred a great many years ago.

58. It appears to be but reasonable that a man who has himself been convicted in a Police Court should himself be held as an unfit person to sit upon the Bench? Most assuredly; I should have no hesitation, if the duty devolved upon me, to recommend the immediate removal of such a person from the Commission.

59. It is objectionable that a man should appear at the Bar one day as an offender and the next day on the Bench to adjudicate in offences—is it not calculated to bring the administration of justice into contempt? Yes it is, and to destroy the whole prestige which should attach to the office of magistrate, and in fact to produce a bad moral effect on the community generally.

60. Has it come under your knowledge, from police reports, that such cases have occurred? I have heard of such a case certainly; but I am not aware whether there was any conviction. I have heard of a justice who has committed himself by appearing in a state of drunkenness in public.

61. And of his having been fined? I am not sure; but there have been complaints by their brother magistrates against them, and I think in some of these cases they were absolutely removed by supersedeas.

62. Then your recommendation is, that the appointment should rest solely with the Governor General? Yes; and, as I stated before, that would not supersede his application to the Minister of the day, if he thought it necessary.

63. What do you think of some such regulation as that which is involved in the second clause of the Bill, to limit the appointment and continuance in office of unpaid Justices of the Peace—"At the expiration of six months after the accession to office of each succeeding Governor or Governor General, the Commission of every Justice of the Peace in force at the time of such accession shall cease and determine"? I think that would be desirable, for it would compel by law a periodical revision of the Commission. I know it is a very invidious task, and no Ministry proceeds to it without great reluctance.

64. It was recommended by Sir Alfred Stephen that the appointment should be made for different divisions of the Colony—for the southern, western, and northern—and that the Commission should be for three years, so as to ensure a periodical revision? That is another mode to effect the same object. I think myself, and have thought for many years, that it would be desirable to confine the jurisdiction of magistrates to particular districts, either to counties or to police districts. If confined to counties or police districts, the number for each might be limited. As has been shewn, there is an ancient Parliamentary precedent for such a limitation.

65. No inconvenience would arise, because warrants could be backed, as in England? Yes. If necessary a short law could be passed, making a warrant issued in any county or district operative throughout the Colony without endorsement. I believe that some cases have occurred almost of an indecent character, where magistrates have come in, in numbers, from an adjoining district to overwhelm the majority of a local Bench, in order to carry measures against their views.

66. Have you known such cases? I have heard of such cases; I will scarcely go so far as to say I have known of them.

67. You cannot see, that any such is likely to arise from such an arrangement as that to which I have adverted? I think the paid magistrate should be a magistrate of the territory, because, in the performance of his executive duties, he may be required to proceed beyond the limits of the district for which he is specially appointed; but the private magistrates should be confined to local jurisdiction, either to the great divisions of the country proposed by the learned Chief Justice, or to the police districts or counties. Perhaps, in the first instance, as a trial, it may be expedient to act on the recommendation of the Chief Justice; it would then be necessary to divide the Colony into four districts—the southern, the western, the northern, and the Moreton Bay districts. The great object is to restrain the jurisdiction of the magistrate within his own district. My chief objection to the adoption of such large divisions is the impracticability in such cases of limiting the number of justices, unless indeed a maximum number were fixed for each Court of Petty Sessions, according to the extent of the district and the business to be performed.

68. From your evidence, it seems that you are strongly of opinion it is necessary something should be done, in order to guard against the improper appointment of magistrates? I think it is desirable that the influences which must be brought to bear under present circumstances should be restrained in some way or other—that the Minister of the day should be protected from the importunity to which he is subjected, by constant applications from his political supporters for the appointment of themselves and friends to the magistracy. No such influences existed in former days. There was no motive such as now exists.

69. These suggestions might enable us to devise some scheme that would act well for the purpose? I think something ought to be done to limit the number of justices. The great evil is the excessive number. Every man now thinks he has a right, as an object of distinction, to be placed in the Commission of the Peace, and as long as that is the case the Government will have applications from persons little qualified to perform the duty.

The Hon. E. D. Thomson, Esq., C.B., M.L.C.

23 June, 1858.

70. You also think that were it not for the expense involved it would be highly desirable to have Police Magistrates? Yes, associated with the magistrates of the district, because you would then be always able to command the attendance of a magistrate, and if he could secure the attendance of another, no cases need be adjourned for want of a proper quorum to adjudicate. I think that would induce a great number of persons to bring forward cases for prosecution that are now altogether neglected, owing to the difficulty of obtaining a quorum of magistrates competent to adjudicate, and the tendency of that of course is to bring the law into contempt.

71. By Mr. Piddington: You have adverted to the duties of magistrates with respect to licensing public-houses—I would like to ask whether you are of opinion if the trade were thrown open so that it should be optional to any trader to sell spirits, provided they were not consumed on the premises, that would lessen or increase drunkenness? I believe it would increase drunkenness if people could purchase liquor in small quantities without any restraint whatever. I am afraid it would very much tend to increase it if it were allowed to be retailed in every petty shop and store throughout the Colony. I consider that any regulation prohibiting the consumption of spirits on the premises would be entirely futile, especially as the police would have no right of entry such as they now possess in respect of licensed public-houses.

72. Do you endorse the general animadversion of Lord Brougham upon the unfitness of unpaid magistrates for the general duties they are appointed to perform? In a general way I do.

73. You think those observations of Lord Brougham upon the incompetency of unpaid magistrates as a class in England might be applied to unpaid magistrates in New South Wales? Yes, I think so. Although entertaining a great respect for the general body of the magistrates in this Colony, and a high appreciation of the gratuitous services they render to the community, yet as we can scarcely hope to get men of higher qualification as to character, education, and standing here than we have in England, and if they be obnoxious to these objections, magistrates here—I may say with no disrespect to them—are equally open to the same objections.

74. I think you are of opinion that the appointment of paid Police Magistrates would be one mode of providing for the better administration of justice than the system now existing? The more certain administration of justice; but I think they ought to be associated with private magistrates, more especially in cases where more than one magistrate is required.

75. Have you any means of forming a judgment with respect to the confidence reposed in unpaid magistrates of the country by the public at large? I have not; but I have no reason to believe there is any want of confidence in them generally. There may be in some districts, from party motives, but I think, generally speaking, they meet with the confidence and respect of the public.

76. Are you of opinion that the paid Police Magistrates of the country are viewed in precisely the same light by the public with respect to their decisions? In cases between masters and servants I think they are not.

77. Do you think the public confide in their decisions in that class of cases more thoroughly than in those of the unpaid magistrates? I have an impression to that effect, because they are not interested in the same degree. The local magistrates who are not paid are almost all employers of labor to a very great extent, and there must be a sort of feeling, of course, rather in favor of the master than of the servant; at least there is such an idea abroad. The same feeling does not, I believe, exist with reference to a paid magistrate.

78. A great number of the cases decided by magistrates are cases between masters and servants? There are a very great number in this country, and they are a most important class of cases.

79. With respect to the attendance of magistrates at Petty Sessions, are you of opinion that some register of the attendance might be kept? I think that a good suggestion. If a magistrate systematically neglected to attend the Courts of Petty Sessions of his district, I think he would have no reasonable ground of complaint if, de facto, his name were omitted in the next Commission of the Peace.

80. If a man did not attend his duty at Petty Sessions for a certain number of times—would it not be desirable that ipso facto he should cease to be of the Commission? I think so, subject to the qualification I have mentioned. No magistrate has a right to take the title of justice merely as an honorary distinction, without performing the duties required by the public.

81. With reference to the proposal that the Governor should appoint the magistrates, I think you state that you made that proposal upon the ground that you view the Governor as a non-political functionary? Yes; that he is removed from the political influences to which the Minister of the day is exposed.

82. If he has the appointment of the magistrates will not that in itself entangle him to a certain extent in political matters? I think it ought not, for it will be his duty to select from persons of all parties with reference to the requirements of the public, and the qualifications of the individual.

83. You accompanied the expression of your opinion with a statement that the Governor would naturally refer to his advisers? That he would not be debarred from doing so, and they would naturally be the parties he would consult when necessary.

84. What means would the Governor have here of becoming acquainted with the fitness or character of parties desiring to be placed in the Commission? By consultation, in the manner suggested, with his responsible advisers, and by correspondence, through his private secretary, with individuals upon whose opinion and judgment he could rely. That has been the practice hitherto.

85. By Mr. Parkes: Many magistrates, I believe, were appointed formerly without their names being intimated to the Executive Council? Yes, it was so; a very considerable number.

86. By Mr. Piddington: With reference to the future—if the right of appointing were vested in the Governor, as a personal prerogative, would he be fully competent from the information he would receive to make good appointments? I think he would, for, unless he were satisfied of the due qualification of the parties he would not put them in the Commission. He might have a great number of persons proposed to him for the Commission, but it does not follow that he would place them in it without the necessary information to satisfy himself that they were properly qualified.

87. You are strongly of opinion that such a power would not naturally involve the Governor in political duties? I think not necessarily; for he ought to make the appointments from all parties, according to their qualifications and the requirements of the public. I think one great objection to the present system has been the excessive number of persons placed in the Commission of the Peace; and, consequently, the tendency to appoint persons of inferior qualifications.

88. Do you not think, if the Commission of the Peace were divided into four districts, as proposed by the Chief Justice, the Judges might be expected to revise the Commission when divided? I scarcely think they could.

89. I do not of course mean that the Judges should be expected to go minutely into the qualification of persons nominated, but merely they should have the general power of revision? I do not think they could perform the duty properly unless they did go minutely into the qualifications of the individuals.

Present:—

MR. MURRAY,

MR. EGAN,

MR. MARKS.

T. A. MURRAY, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Captain Samuel Moore, J. P., called in and examined:—

1. By the Chairman: You are a magistrate of the territory? I am.
2. And have been so for many years? Yes; since 1836, shortly after I arrived in the Colony—that is, including the period I was in the service.
3. You arrived in the Colony as a military man? Yes.
4. And you were placed in the Commission of the Peace whilst still a military man? Yes.
5. You have had ample opportunities, during that length of time, of observing the general state of the magistracy of the Colony? I have.
6. Can you favor the Committee with your general opinion as to its present position, so far as you have had opportunity of judging? My answer to that question, of course, could only apply to the district in which I have resided. I have been resident in Liverpool for the last eighteen years, and it is only within the last few years I have had occasion to find fault with certain gentlemen who are now in the Commission of the Peace. On public grounds, I have felt it my duty, as a magistrate, to report to the head of the Executive what, in my opinion, I considered to be sufficient to have them removed. I allude to Dr. Robertson and Mr. Charles Luke Bayly, both of whom I reported for acts that, in my opinion, they ought to have been removed for.
7. When did you make that report? Three or four years ago.
8. Before the introduction of the new system of Government? Yes.
9. What was the result of your representation at that time? I received a reply to my communication from the Honorable Mr. Deas Thomson, stating that the subject of my reports would be immediately submitted to the Governor General; and from that period until the present moment I have never heard anything more about it.
10. Had you any occasion to make any further complaints of either of these gentlemen? I have made several complaints with reference to Mr. Bayly, which also ended in nothing. There was a case of assault heard before the Liverpool Bench, in which Mr. Bayly was principally concerned. I was the presiding magistrate, and his conduct on that occasion was so remarkably gross that the Bench fined him £5, and further bound him over to keep the peace for six months. A report of this case got into the Empire newspaper, and excited the attention of the Executive. A letter was addressed to the Bench on the matter, and in consequence of their report a Commission was appointed to inquire into the matter, over which Mr. Forbes was sent up from Sydney to preside. On another occasion I was told by the Revd. Mr. Priddle that a relative of his on going to a public-house at Liverpool, passing through a room, saw Mr. Bayly on his knees tossing for half-crowns with an individual of the lowest class.
11. This is not a fact coming under your own knowledge? No.
12. Was it given in evidence? When Mr. Priddle was asked to make the statement, he declined to do so.
13. Did you write a letter to the Colonial Secretary representing that circumstance? Yes.
14. Was an inquiry instituted? Yes. I was also informed, that when engaged in gambling at Mudgee, Mr. Bayly had passed off blank pieces of paper as bank-notes when he was a loser, and on the discovery being made he was forcibly ejected from the room.
15. All these things you represented? Yes.
16. On the authority of your informant? Yes, the Revd. Mr. Priddle, our incumbent.

Capt. Samuel
Moore, J.P.

On

- Capt. Samuel Moore, J.P.
29 June, 1858.
- On the same occasion I was told by Mr. Priddle of a circumstance that had occurred to himself. Mr. Bayly came into his house in a state of intoxication, took a chair, and sat down by his side, and to Mr. Priddle's surprise, threw his arm round his neck. Mr. Priddle disengaged his person from him, and asked him what he wanted. The reply of Mr. Bayly was,—“I have come to you, Mr. Priddle, as my spiritual adviser; I have called on you for the good of my soul.” Mr. Priddle told him that at that moment he was particularly engaged, as there were seventy or eighty persons waiting for him in the school-room, where a lecture was to be delivered; but that if he would defer it until the following morning, he would be happy to hear anything he had to state. Mr. Bayly replied to this—“There is no time better than the present moment; it must be done now.” Mr. Priddle's answer was—“I cannot delay seventy or eighty persons to accommodate you, Mr. Bayly, in your present state.” Mr. Bayly replied—“Is it not better for you to save one soul than to preach to seventy or eighty persons.” Mr. Priddle still declined; and Mr. Bayly then said—“Then all I have to tell you, Mr. Priddle, is, that your doctrine is all a lie throughout.” A couple of days after this Mr. Priddle detailed this conversation to me, and he said it was his intention to make a special report of the circumstance to Mr. Cowper, who was then Colonial Secretary. He did not do so; but I considered Mr. Bayly's conduct to be so remarkably offensive, that I made a report of it, and the result was that a Commission was sent up to inquire into the matter, but Mr. Priddle would not attend. The reason he gave for declining to do so was that Mr. Bayly had come to him, and that he had stated he had forgiven him, and under those circumstances he did not think it would be correct to give evidence against him. Although I sent for him, and gave him the Attorney General's letter to read, he would not attend.
17. All these circumstances that you have stated were represented to the Government? Yes.
 18. And Mr. Forbes, I think you said, was sent to inquire into them? Yes.
 19. What were the circumstances of the case in which Mr. Bayly was fined £5? The assault arose out of that Commission of inquiry. There was a young man at Liverpool, the son of a butcher, named Pearce, who gave evidence against Mr. Bayly in regard to the gambling transaction. He was present, and saw the gambling going on. This circumstance rankled, I believe, in Mr. Bayly's mind, and he took occasion one day when this young man Pearce was in a public house to speak to him on the matter, and he ultimately spat in his face three or four times. That constituted the assault.
 20. He was brought before the Bench for that assault, and fined? Yes.
 21. Did it come out in evidence on that occasion that he was sober, or at all intoxicated? The landlord of the “Terminus Hotel” distinctly stated that he was in a state of intoxication.
 22. Were you called upon for copies of the depositions by the Government? Yes, by the Attorney General.
 23. Were they furnished? Yes.
 24. The evidence taken established the facts you have stated? Yes.
 25. Mr. Bayly is still in the Commission of the Peace? Yes.
 26. Does he often attend the Bench? I have seen him there every court day—once a fortnight.
 27. Has the general feeling of the people of the district, as regards the administration of justice, been at all affected by his remaining in the Commission of the Peace? My opinion is that they have not confidence in Mr. Bayly. I never sit on the Bench with him, nor do some other magistrates; in consequence of which the public are sometimes put to great inconvenience, where it is necessary that two magistrates should preside, and the Court is frequently broken up for that reason.
 28. What other magistrates of the district decline to sit with him? Mr. Rowe, Mr. Lane, and Dr. Watson, besides myself.
 29. Are there any who do sit with him? Yes, Dr. Robertson and Mr. Throsby.
 30. Is much business done by the Bench? Occasionally.
 31. What magistrates generally sit? The attendance on Court days is confined to very few. Mr. Bayly comes; sometimes Mr. Rowe, and sometimes Mr. Lane.
 32. By Mr. Egan: With reference to the reports you made of the gentlemen you have named, did the Government from your statement institute any inquiry? Not from my individual statement. When inquiry was instituted an official letter was signed by Mr. Rowe, Mr. Lane, and myself.
 33. Can you inform the Committee what was the result of that inquiry? The result was that the Attorney General stated that he did not see sufficient reason for removing Mr. Bayly, as it was only secondary evidence, in consequence of Mr. Priddle not appearing.
 34. You say great inconvenience arises in consequence of the non-attendance of magistrates who will not sit with Mr. Bayly? Yes. If there are three magistrates on the Bench, two besides Mr. Bayly, then they do not object, because they can decide the case without referring to Mr. Bayly.
 35. Supposing Mr. Bayly and the other objectionable magistrate were there, would you or the other gentlemen who made the complaint object to sit with them? The only magistrate I object to sit with is Mr. Bayly.
 36. Were there two reports forwarded to Mr. Bayly—one in reference to the public-house gambling, and the second in reference to the case in which he was brought before the Court? The case in which he was brought before the Court, and fined, was not represented; but the Attorney General wrote to the Bench for a copy of the depositions, and the result of that was that the inquiry was instituted.
 37. And since that inquiry no steps have been taken to remove Mr. Bayly? None whatever. With regard to Mr. Bayly, I am aware the public have not confidence in him, because in any case which is considered to be of importance I am very frequently sent to by the parties to request my attendance.

George Taylor Rowe, Esq., J.P., called in and examined:—

1. By the Chairman: You are a magistrate of the territory? Yes.
2. And act on the Bench at Liverpool? I do.
3. Some circumstances with regard to the Liverpool Bench have been brought under the notice of the Committee. Perhaps you would be good enough to relate all you know of its present state? The first instance that came under my notice was on my return from Melbourne in October last, when I was informed that Mr. Bayly had grossly insulted the Reverend Mr. Priddle, and in consequence of that report I called on Mr. Priddle to ascertain if it really was the case. Mr. Priddle told me that Mr. Bayly had called upon him one evening, being at the time in a state of intoxication, and told him that he had called upon him as he was anxious to get a little spiritual advice. Mr. Priddle's reply was, that he should be most happy to afford Mr. Bayly an hour or two's conversation at some other time, but that that evening he was very much engaged, and did not think Mr. Bayly was in a fit state. During this time Mr. Bayly took a chair and sat close to Mr. Priddle, and at last fell forward with his arms about him. Mr. Priddle begged of him to leave his house and call again on the following day, as he had a meeting at the school-room, where a great number of persons were waiting, and he was then ten minutes behind his time. Mr. Bayly was so far gone then that he fell from his chair into Mr. Priddle's lap. Mr. Priddle assisted him on to his chair, and said he really must leave the house, for he could not be delayed any longer. Mr. Bayly then said—"Is not the soul of one person of more consequence to you than preaching to sixty or seventy? if not, what you preach on Sundays and what you say now are lies." Mr. Priddle then took him by the shoulders and put him out of the house. In consequence of that occurrence, I was one of three magistrates who joined in making a report to the Government, upon which a court of inquiry was held at Liverpool.
4. Mr. Priddle, we are informed, declined to give evidence? Yes. On the same day that he was informed that the Commission of inquiry was instituted, Mr. Priddle told me, in the course of conversation, that he would not attend, because Mr. Bayly and his family had been to him, and he had promised reformation in his character, and therefore he thought it was his duty as a clergyman to look over the matter, and he had forgiven him. In consequence of what Mr. Priddle said, a special summons was not sent to him; but a few days afterwards Mr. Priddle said he had heard that since he had been to him Mr. Bayly had committed himself very grossly, and if he had been sent for he would have given his evidence; and moreover, he said he had come to Sydney on purpose to substantiate what was said by myself and Captain Moore, but he had received a reply stating that the case could not be taken up again as the inquiry was finished.
5. Do you know anything about the circumstances of the case in which Mr. Bayly was fined £5? No, I was not present. I only heard of the transaction. The landlord of the hotel where the assault occurred informed me that he was very much annoyed with Mr. Bayly on another occasion, when a party of gentlemen were at tea. Mr. Bayly intruded himself upon them, and his conduct was so bad that many of them left the room and went into an adjoining one, where he followed them, although the landlord kept putting him back; his reply to the remonstrances of the landlord was, that he would not be stopped by him; he was a magistrate of the territory, and would go into any room he thought proper.
6. By Mr. Egan: Mr. Bayly was not appointed to the Commission of the Peace since the advent of Responsible Government? No; previously.
7. You are one of the magistrates who object to sit with Mr. Bayly, on account of his conduct to Mr. Priddle? Yes; and besides that, I have seen Mr. Bayly in a state of intoxication, and mixing up with very low company about Liverpool. In fact it is a very common occurrence.

MR. LEE,

MR. FORSTER,

W. R. PIDDINGTON, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

The Rev. Charles D. F. Priddle, called in and examined:—

1. By the Chairman: I believe, Mr. Priddle, that you are incumbent of the parish of Liverpool? I am.
2. Have you had any opportunities of becoming acquainted with the state of the magistracy? Yes, many.
3. Have you any knowledge of the state of the magistracy in your particular district? Yes.
4. Can you favor the Committee with any information in reference to the magistracy of the district that comes more particularly within your knowledge? There are certain individuals whom I think totally unfit for the position of magistrates.
5. Would you have any objection to state the grounds upon which you are of opinion that the individuals you allude to are unfit for the position of magistrates? Drunkenness.
6. It would be desirable to mention the individuals whom you think are unfitted upon that ground, and any instance that may have arisen, which you can recollect? With reference to one, I certainly can mention an instance.
7. Will you have the goodness to do so? Mr. Charles Bayly.
8. Mr. Charles Bayly? Yes.
9. On what particular occasion did you observe that gentleman in a state of drunkenness? On his coming twice to my house—that is to say, on one occasion he came to my house when

The Rev. C. D. F. Priddle. I was at home, and on the second occasion I happened to be absent; but he went into the room where my wife was sitting.

21 July, 1858. 10. With reference to the time when he visited your house when you were at home, can you give the particulars of the visit, the observations he made, or the general tenor of his remarks, and the particular state he was in? Yes. I saw that he was in an unfit state to speak to any one, and as I had an engagement I told him I should be glad to see him the next day, if he particularly wished to wait upon me. He then rose from his chair, and said, "I believe you to be a liar!"—on which I bowed him out; afterwards he apologized for his conduct.

11. On another day? On another day; and, of course, as a Christian man I was bound to forgive him; but his conduct since then has been so thoroughly disgraceful that I feel bound to mention these circumstances, which, in my opinion, disqualify him for a magistrate's commission.

12. Since the time you have alluded to have you seen Mr. Bayly in such a state of inebriety as to disqualify him for the position of a magistrate, in your opinion? I cannot call to my recollection any particular occasion on which I have seen him intoxicated; he has avoided me, and I have avoided him.

13. Since the period you have referred to, you have had no opportunity of noticing him? No. I know, from a Police Court case, that he was intoxicated on a certain day; that came out before the public.

14. You have no knowledge of that case yourself? No.

15. By Mr. Lee: I believe Mr. Andrews, the publican, has a particular knowledge of Mr. Bayly—do you think it would be advisable to have Mr. Andrews summoned before this Committee? I think it would be. I am only anxious, as a clergyman of a parish, to see the magistracy purified, and I think he could throw a little light upon Mr. Bayly's character.

16. By Mr. Forster: How is it that no public complaint has been made against Mr. Bayly—these facts you have stated are notorious? Yes.

17. He is known to be so? Yes; he is quite a by-word.

18. Can you give any good reason why no public complaint has been made? An investigation was held last year, in September or October.

19. By whom was it held? By Mr. Forbes. There was a Commission appointed to take evidence, but I was not sent for, and I did not volunteer to go. I did not think it my duty. If I had been sent for I should have gone, and perhaps mentioned much more than I have done now.

20. What was the impression—was it supposed that it inquired sufficiently into the case—what was the general public impression? I have refrained from canvassing the conduct of Mr. Bayly, or of any of the magistrates, with the parishioners.

21. But as a clergyman have you not felt it your duty to represent to the Government such notorious facts? I have done so.

22. And what has been the result? I went to the Premier, but he said the commission had concluded its business, and that it could not be reopened.

23. Are you aware whether other complaints have been made by other individuals? Yes; I believe the senior magistrate, Captain Moore, has represented his conduct; also one of the other magistrates.

24. Does Mr. Bayly sit upon the Bench now? I believe he does, occasionally.

25. And when he sits there the others leave? The others leave.

26. Has that occurred within your knowledge, and often? Certainly on three occasions; I cannot mention the dates.

27. Can you tell the Committee whether on the occasions of Mr. Bayly going to the Bench he was not sober? I could not say that; but his habits are so notorious that the others decline sitting with him.

28. You say it is a year ago since the Commission was held by Mr. Forbes? I think it was last September or October. It was prior to the case in which Mr. Bayly was summoned for an assault upon a young man named Pearce.

29. Then, has there been no inquiry into his conduct since? No.

30. I think in this matter of Pearce, you are alluding to a case which appeared very prominently in the newspapers? Yes.

31. In the Empire for one? Yes.

32. Since that there has been no inquiry? No.

33. Have any complaints been made since that against him? I believe so.

34. By the Chairman: How many magistrates usually attend upon the Bench at Liverpool? That is a question I could not answer. I know that the senior magistrate, Captain Moore, has had to send all over the town to get a second magistrate to adjudicate with him, and he has not been able; but the messenger has not gone for Mr. Bayly, knowing that Captain Moore would not sit with him.

35. Then, in consequence of the objection made by Captain Moore to sit on the Bench with Mr. Bayly, the public interest suffers? No doubt, very materially.

TUESDAY,

TUESDAY, 2 NOVEMBER, 1858.

Present:—

MR. MURRAY, | MR. PIDDINGTON,
MR. FORSTER.

T. A. MURRAY, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

William Elyard, Esq., called in and examined:—

1. By the Chairman: You are Under Secretary, are you not? Yes.
2. The Committee wish to obtain information from you as to the number of gentlemen placed in the Commission of the Peace during the several administrations we have had since the commencement of responsible Government; specifying the names of those appointed during each administration? I understood that to be the object which the Committee had in view, and I have in consequence prepared a list, showing the number and the names of the gentlemen appointed during each of the different administrations—that is, Mr. Donaldson's, Mr. Cowper's first Ministry, Mr. Parker's, and the present Government of Mr. Cowper. At the end there is a short abstract showing the number during each administration, as well as the total number. (Witness handed in the same. Vide Appendices A B. C. D. and E.)
3. Could you inform the Committee how many writs of supersedeas have been issued since the commencement of Responsible Government? There appear to have been twenty.
4. During the different administrations? Yes.
5. Can you distinguish those of one administration from those of another? Yes: there were eight during Mr. Parker's, and there have been twelve during Mr. Cowper's.
6. By Mr. Piddington: Present Government? Yes.
7. By the Chairman: Have you the names? Yes; they are specified in this list. These were not all removals from the Commission: when gentlemen resign, writs of supersedeas are issued, in order that their names may be struck off the list of magistrates.
8. None during Mr. Donaldson's administration? No.
9. Can you distinguish the resignations from the others? Yes. During Mr. Parker's Government one gentleman declined to serve, and a writ of supersedeas was issued; the other writs were in consequence of resignations.
10. They were the whole during Mr. Parker's administration? Yes; there were seven writs on resignations, and one in consequence of a gentleman having declined to serve. During Mr. Cowper's administration nine writs have been issued for gentlemen who have resigned, and three for others removed for various reasons.
11. Who were the three that were removed? One was Mr. Bowman.
12. Of Mudgee? Mudgee, or the Hunter River. Another was Mr. Fisher, in consequence of his insolvency; and the other Mr. Bayly—the writ in his case has just issued.
13. Perhaps you would supplement your evidence by giving a list of the gentlemen who have been actually superseded—removed in consequence of complaints against them? The accompanying list, shew the writs of supersedeas issued. (Witness handed in the me. Vide Appendices F. and G.)

W. Elyard,
Esq.

SEPARATE APPENDIX.

A.

Wingecarribbee, Berrima,
6 June, 1858.

Sir,

I have the honor to address you, as the Chairman of the Committee appointed for inquiring into the state of the Magistracy of this Colony, under the conviction, that any observations or suggestions likely to conduce to the efficiency of that body would be acceptable.

From an experience of many years as a magistrate of the Colony I have no hesitation in saying that nothing would so much tend to ensure an impartial administration of justice as the separation of the executive from the judicial functions of magistrates.

At present, as you are aware, magistrates hunt out bad characters and then try, and perhaps condemn them; in other cases the complainant makes his case good to a neighbouring magistrate, who, after issuing his summons or warrant, attends court to see his friend righted, with all the points of the case, on one side at least, at his fingers ends, and his mind made up long before he takes his seat on the Bench as to what is to be done to the offending party—at what a disadvantage the defendant will plead his cause under such circumstances is plain enough to be seen. This may appear an exaggerated case; but I can safely say it is not so, and indeed it is scarcely possible for a magistrate, under the present state of the law, to avoid, to a certain extent, being prejudiced, one way or the other; because, as all cases must be initiated by a magistrate he must hear one man's story before he grants his summons, and very often, unwittingly, makes the complainant's case his own. It is a common occurrence for magistrates to make a point of attending Court to adjudicate in cases initiated before themselves, when to ensure justice the contrary practice ought to prevail. The evils attending such a system do not require illustrating further; they must be sufficiently apparent to all. To remove them, as far as possible, I would propose that Clerks of Benches should be empowered to initiate all summons cases, and where the Crown prosecutes, even to grant warrants. There would be no more danger in granting such powers to these gentlemen than there is in granting them to ignorant justices; particularly if they received such a scale of remuneration as would ensure the acceptance of this office by men of good position, which could easily be managed without entailing any additional expense on the country, by giving them paid salaries of, say £300 per annum, and causing all fees, except those received by them as Commissioners of the Supreme Court, to be paid into the Treasury. This would be about equivalent to what they now receive in small and varying sums, as may be seen by a return lately made to Parliament; but I would in no case allow Clerks of Benches to act as agents for the Curator of Intestate Estates. This comparatively large fixed salary, with perhaps the title of Secretary instead of Clerk, would, I think, secure efficient men, and as they would always be at the Police Offices the public would not, as now, have to ride, in country districts, from house to house, long distances, to obtain a summons.

This alteration in the law would at once raise the position of magistrates immensely, and tend, more than anything I know of, to secure a due administration of justice; it would also, to a very great extent, do away with the necessity of, and relieve the country from the expense of Police Magistrates, who are, I think, in every way objectionable, for reasons which are not necessary to be particularized in this place.

The next proposition which I have to make is, to take the control of the country police entirely out of the hands of the magistrates, although I think that complaints should still be made to, and punishments inflicted by them in their judicial capacity.

To sum up, my idea is that magistrates should be as strictly judicial officers as the Judges themselves, and relieved from all executive duties whatever. Until this is done I do not believe the country will enjoy an impartial administration of justice, at least in the country districts.

I have not hastily arrived at these conclusions, but have for some time given the matter considerable attention, with a view to devise some remedy for the evils which now so glaringly exist, and should be glad to give you any information or assistance in my power.

I have, &c.,

H. M. OXLEY.

The Honorable the Chairman of Committee for inquiring into the State of the Magistracy of the Colony.

B.

B.

Mulla Villa, Wollombi,
22 May, 1858.

Sir,

As it appears from the newspaper report that you have undertaken the arduous and very necessary duty of a revision of the Magistracy of the Colony, I do myself the honor of addressing you on the subject.

Assuming that education and station ought to be tests of the qualification of Justices of the Peace, I think it will be admitted that since the time Sir Charles Fitz Roy assumed the reins of Government a large number of persons have been placed in the Commission who had no such qualifications; and hence the continual complaints of the manner in which justice is administered throughout the rural districts, and the enormous expense entailed on the community by persons being sent for trial against whom there was no legal evidence, independent of the injustice to individuals charged with the commission of the offence.

In order to meet this portion of the case, I would respectfully suggest that returns be called for, during the last three or five years, of all committals, and by what magistrates, and from what district, and in what manner the case was disposed of, either at Assizes or Sessions. If cases have been sent for trial, and that the Attorney General has not thought proper, from want of evidence, to prosecute, I think it would be such evidence as would warrant a supersedeas in an unpaid J. P., and good ground for the dismissal of a paid magistrate; and, if the newspaper reports are to be admitted as authority, there are very many such cases.

My opinion is, that magistrates should alone be appointed on the recommendation of the Judges of the Supreme Court. Those gentlemen are sufficiently acquainted with justices attending the various Assizes, that they could get accurate information of the status of those persons who might be recommended for the Commission. I am confirmed in this opinion by an observation made to me by His Honor the Chief Justice, that several gentlemen had presented themselves before him to take the prescribed oaths who could not read them accurately. Could such persons have received an education that would qualify them to read, with advantage, an Act of Parliament or of Council?

I think the time has arrived when property should form a portion of the qualification; and one reason is, that if a magistrate should commit a party without proper legal evidence, that he should be accountable in a court of law. Now, several cases have come under my own observation where parties were committed for trial against whom there was not a shadow of evidence. Doubtless a court of law would have given heavy damages, but the J. P.'s were little better than paupers.

The Government having intimated their wishes that M. P.'s should recommend for the Commission, has, in my humble judgment, been attended with evil consequences with respect to votes at elections. I will instance two cases to my knowledge, and could name others:—One party was promised by a candidate that his name would be placed in the Commission—he was unquestionably respectable; and another, who had been a constable, a poundkeeper, and a publican, had a similar promise made—and both names appeared in the Commission. My opinion is, that no person who had ever held a publican's license should be placed in the Commission. Drunkenness is the curse of the Colony; and could it be expected that any person who had kept such a house would see that vice in all its deformity, or use the means which the law has placed in his power to strenuously resist its progress?

I was applied to as P. M. to recommend a party to be appointed a J. P., which I declined. Having been informed that a petition was going the rounds, praying for the appointment of a justice, I felt it my duty to bring it under the notice of His Excellency Sir Geo. Gipps; and that noble-minded gentleman replied, that no person who had ever held a publican's license would be placed in the Commission. I think no higher authority could be given on the subject.

In a conversation with one of the first gentlemen in the Colony, some years ago, he observed, "There was a time when to be a magistrate was an honor, but from the class of persons Sir C. Fitz Roy had placed in the Commission, it had ceased to be so, and that gentlemen would not now attend the Bench to meet persons they never met elsewhere." I have had conversations with several magistrates at the Midland Circuit Court also, and all agree that many appointments that have been made are "too bad."

If any queries are issued by your Committee, and that you think proper to have one sent to me, I shall have much pleasure in forwarding replies; or, if otherwise I can give you any further information, it is entirely at your disposal.

I offer no apology for this trespass, being both, as we believe, employed in what appears advantageous to the community.

I have, &c.,

DAVID DUNLOP, J. P.

C.

Shoalhaven, 24 June, 1858

Sir,

Having for some years felt and taken a deep interest in the state of the Magistracy and their administration of justice, and feeling the same interest still, I request leave to trouble you, as Chairman of the Committee now inquiring into the subject, with a few remarks. I shall be as concise as possible, leaving myself a wide margin for explanation, should you require it.

The

The selection of magistrates is without any system sufficient to guarantee to the public either that competent or even fit and proper persons shall be appointed.

Education, social position, moral worth, integrity, experience, are not considered necessary qualifications—nor any one of them—for the office. This humiliating fact was most painfully illustrated by the late Government, in some of their Wollongong and Kiama appointments: the dignity of those Benches has been lowered, the intelligence of the district has been insulted, and the administration of justice brought into contempt.

The power to make magistrates is merely an instrument in the hands of Government to gratify the vanity of relatives, and the friends of their parliamentary supporters, without any reference to their fitness or characters, and utterly regardless of the public interest in the administration of justice.

And yet I do not blame Government, but I most certainly do those who recommend persons knowing them not to possess even one qualification for the office. The system is altogether wrong, and therefore the state of the magistracy is decidedly most unsatisfactory, and consequently the administration of justice is equally so.

Although in this district gentlemen have the Commission whose social position may entitle them to it, yet the administration of justice is most unsatisfactory and perilous to liberty and life: witness the late case of Terence M'Mahon, committed for rape without even a shade of a shadow of evidence against him; although, as a matter of course, the Attorney General declined to prosecute, this man and his wife, after years of struggling, have been literally ruined, his very bed sold, and everything.

There is the utmost confidence, and justly, in Dr. Mackenzie, Mr. Thomson, and Dr. Aldcorn, but the two latter are absent, and bench arrangements made without the concurrence of the former are so inconvenient to him that the administration of justice remains with the three juniors, who too frequently bow to Mr. Alfred Klyard, whose decisions, as in M'Mahon's case, cause great dissatisfaction and discontent.

There are other circumstances which render the state of the magistracy here most unsatisfactory.

The Clerk of the Bench is brother-in-law of one of the magistrates, and appears to presume upon that relationship—or his presumption is natural to him—to interfere, unbidden and unquestioned, in the cases before the court, often stepping behind magistrates to whisper to his brother-in-law, for or against either the plaintiff or defendant, and, being so related, the other magistrates do not prevent it; this gives great offence, and has occasioned angry and unseemly altercation—otherwise he is a very efficient officer, and would be valuable elsewhere, where he would learn to know and keep his proper place, &c.

I would now suggest a remedy.

1. The appointment of magistrates should not depend upon political influence. Police jurisdiction is the first link of the law's chain—it is the alpha of the law, as the hangman is the omega.

2. A new Commission should be issued—the old one revised by the Judges; all recommendations should be made to the Judges, and if approved of, recommended by the Chief Justice to the Governor General, without the advice of the Privy Council.

3. The criminal jurisdiction and offences should be entirely separated from the civil: the Crown or nominee magistrates to settle the former, and the district councillors, who should be ex officio magistrates, the latter—each assisted by a jury of 2 or 4.

The pleading of attorneys in country courts does not facilitate the administration of justice, but often the contrary; they are frequently employed, not because they are required, but merely to heap costs. This would be remedied by each person, win or lose, being obliged to pay his own law costs.

I have, &c.,

GEORGE UNDERWOOD ALLEY.

Terence A. Murray, Esq., M.P.

Supreme Court,
5 July, 1858.

Sir,

I am desirous of correcting, or at least of considerably qualifying, the evidence given by me before the Committee of which you are Chairman, respecting the succession of the Attorney General for the time being to the office of Chief Justice. I cannot call to mind the particular question which led to my statement; but it was to the effect, that "as a general rule" such was the course of succession. Further consideration and inquiry lead me to doubt the accuracy of that statement. The list of exceptional instances enclosed, (if in fact exceptions,) tends at least to shew that the rule—if as stated,—is as often, or nearly as often, departed from as adhered to.

I am, &c.,

ALFRED STEPHEN.

T. A. Murray, Esq., M.P.

If not irregular, the appending of this to the Report will oblige me.

[Enclosure

[Enclosure to the foregoing.]

1. When the Lord Chancellor's place became vacant in the times of Lords King, Cowper, Talbot, Hardwicke, Eldon, Lyndhurst, and Cottenham, they (and not the Attorneys General of the respective days) obtained the place of Lord Chancellor.
2. Puisne Judge Bathurst was made Lord Chancellor, and not the Attorney General of his day.
3. Plomer (Vice-Chancellor) became Master of the Rolls, and not the Attorney General of the time.
4. Pepys, Solicitor General, was made Master of the Rolls in '34; though Campbell, the Attorney General (it is said) demanded the post.
5. When the office of Lords Justices was created, Vice-Chancellors Knight, Bruce, and Turner were appointed, and not the Attorney and Solicitor Generals.
6. When Lord Cottenham resigned, Sir Thomas Wilde was appointed Lord Chancellor, and not Jervis, the Attorney General.
7. Lord Mansfield retired from the office of Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, and was succeeded by Kenyon, Master of the Rolls.
8. When Lord Ellenborough retired from the office of Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, he was succeeded by Puisne Judge Abbott, not by the Attorney General.
9. When Lord Denman retired from the Chiefship of the Queen's Bench, Lord Campbell obtained the place, and not Cockburn, the Attorney General.
10. Chief Justices of the Common Pleas Gibbes, Mansfield, and Dallas, were respectively succeeded by Puisne Judges Mansfield, Dallas, and Best. Chief Justice Best was succeeded by Tindal, the Solicitor General, and not by Scarlet, the Attorney General. Willes and Wilmot were both Puisne Judges before they became respectively Chief Justices. Powis was a Puisne Judge before he became a Chief Justice of the K. B.; so were Lord Raymond, Sir W. Lee, and others.
11. Chief Barons Macdonald, Thompson, Richards, and Alexander, were respectively succeeded by Puisne Baron Thompson, Puisne Baron Dallas, Alexander (Master in Chancery), and Lord Lyndhurst; and not by the Attorney Generals of the day.
12. Sir Vicary Gibbs, Attorney General, although the first lawyer at the English bar, was a Puisne Judge before he became a Chief Justice; and Garrow, almost the ablest advocate that ever practised in Westminster Hall, was in effect compelled to take the place of a Puisne Baron, though Attorney General. Sir William Horne, after being Attorney General, accepted the post of Master in Chancery.

PEARCE v. BAYLY.

S. MOORE, Esq., J.P., to THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Police Office, Liverpool,
8 December, 1857.

SIR,

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 7th instant, requesting that a copy of the proceedings of the case of assault of "Pearce v. Bayly" should be transmitted to your office.

I herewith transmit a copy of the case.

I have, &c.,
SAM. MOORE.

THE HONORABLE
THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Sydney.

A. No. 1.

Complaint on 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, for an Assault and Battery.

NEW SOUTH WALES,
LIVERPOOL,
TO WIT.

BE IT REMEMBERED, that on the twentieth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, at Liverpool, in the Colony of New South Wales, Thomas Pearce, of the said Town of Liverpool, personally cometh before me, Kinnear Robertson, Esquire, one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace in and for the said Colony, and upon his oath complaineth to and informeth me that Charles Luke Bayly, Esquire, of the said Town of Liverpool, Justice of the Peace, did on the twentieth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, at Liverpool, in the Colony aforesaid, unlawfully assault and beat the said Thomas Pearce, by spitting in his face, contrary to the Statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen; and thereupon the said Thomas Pearce prays that I, the said Justice, will proceed in the premises according to law.

THOS. PEARCE.

Sworn before me, at the Police Office, in the Town of Liverpool, this 20th day of November, A.D. 1857,
KINNENAR ROBERTSON, J. P.

[Summons granted for 23rd November, 1857.]

Liverpool, 23 November, 1857.

Present:—

SAMUEL MOORE, Esq., J.P. | KINNENAR ROBERTSON, Esq., J.P.
WILLIAM HANNIBAL LANE, Esq., J.P.

Charles Luke Bayly, Esq., J.P., is called on to answer the charge of an assault committed by him on the person of Mr. Thomas Pearce. A medical certificate having been produced, stating his inability, from indisposition, to attend this day, the case is postponed until Friday, 4th December, 1857.

SAML. MOORE, J.P.
W. H. LANE, J.P.
KINNENAR ROBERTSON, J.P.

CERTIFICATE.

I hereby certify that I have this day visited Charles Bayly, Esq., professionally, and find him so much indisposed from a severe attack of diarrhoea as to be unable to leave the house or transact any business whatever.

Charles Luke Bayly charged with assaulting and beating one Thomas Pearce, on the 20th day of November last.—Pleads guilty.

Thomas Pearce, of Liverpool, in the Colony of New South Wales, butcher, being duly sworn, on oath states:—

I have heard the information now read in Court; it is true; Mr. Bayly was in a state of intoxication at the time; when I left the place he followed me and spit in my face again; when I went to leave the place altogether, Mr. Bayly shut the door and would not let me out, until Mr. Andrews ordered him to leave the place.

By Mr. Bayly: I state you were intoxicated; I know you were because of your manner, because you could not walk straight; this occurred at the bar of Andrews' Hotel; when you left the bar I saw you walking round Mr. Andrews' sitting-room; you followed me into the bar; you were standing in the street at Andrews' gate, going into the parlour.

By the Bench: I was perfectly sober at the time; Mr. Bayly staggered when he walked across the room; this took place about half-past two o'clock in the afternoon.

John Andrews, in the Colony of New South Wales, publican, being duly sworn, on oath states:—

By the Bench: I recollect the 20th of last month; Mr. Thomas Pearce was at my house in the afternoon somewhere about 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon; I saw Mr. Bayly spit in Mr. Thomas Pearce's face several times without any provocation being given by Mr. Thomas Pearce; this occurred in the tap room; not any other persons present; Mr. Pearce got over the railing which divides the tap room from the parlour and Mr. Bayly followed him into the private room attached to the bar, and attempted or did close the door in fact to prevent Mr. Pearce going out; I was in the room; Mr. Pearce took a poker up to defend himself; I before insisted that the door should be opened; I then opened the door; I saw Mr. Bayly again spit in Mr. Pearce's face; Mr. Pearce afterwards went out; Mr. Bayly was not quite sober, he had a little drink; the plaintiff first entered the bar followed shortly afterwards by the defendant; I did not supply the defendant with any drink during the time that Mr. Pearce was there; I do not recollect Mr. Bayly calling for a glass of brandy; I have not the recollection of serving it.

By Mr. Bayly: I do not recollect serving him with any thing at all; by your manner I considered you to be slightly intoxicated.

(Mr. Forster.)

CHARLES L. BAYLY, Esq., J.P.

Liverpool, 1 October, 1857.

SIR,

We have the honor to request your attention to the following facts which, on public grounds, have induced us to make this report, and to decline co-operating with Mr. Charles Luke Bayly as magistrates.

The first instance in which he deviated from that line of conduct which ought to distinguish the bearing of a magistrate and a gentleman, was in gambling in a public house, in Liverpool, in tossing for half-crowns; he was seen in the act by a gentleman, who related the circumstance to the Revd Mr. Priddle, our Incumbent.

The second case arose out of a gambling transaction at Mudgee, where, having lost money, Mr. Bayly tendered blank paper as notes, and on discovery he was forcibly ejected from the room in which the transaction took place, and recently, since his return to Liverpool, he went to the residence of the Revd. Mr. Priddle in a state of intoxication and insulted him in the grossest manner, by calling him a "liar."

These circumstances have induced us, as well as Mr. Rowe (at present in Melbourne,) not to attend the Bench during the period Mr. Bayly is a resident in this district; and we do conceive, as the above recited facts are known to the community, it would tend to weaken confidence in the integrity of the members who compose the magistracy of this district should they co-operate with him in their public capacity.

We leave this with confidence in your hands, and should you deem it necessary to have the matter investigated, we are prepared to adduce our authorities for the facts we have brought under your notice.

We have, &c.

SIR,

I beg to enclose, for your perusal, a copy of a communication addressed by Messrs. Moore and Lane, two Justices of the Peace in the Liverpool District, to the Colonial Secretary, and by him forwarded to me. Before taking any steps in reference to the complaint made against you in that letter, I shall be glad to receive any statement which you may deem it necessary to make upon the subject.

SIR,

In transmitting to you herewith a copy of a communication from Messrs. Moore and Lane, Justices of the Peace, preferring charges of gambling and drunkenness against Mr. Charles L. Bayly, J.P., with the latter gentleman's answer thereto, I am directed by the Attorney General to request that you will have the goodness to proceed to Liverpool

Liverpool at an early opportunity to investigate the matter, and examine the parties, and such witnesses as they may call, giving reasonable notice to Mr. Bayly and his accusers of the day fixed for the inquiry; and I am also desired to request you to furnish your report thereon as early as possible at this office. The Government will pay your travelling expenses. It may be proper to mention, also, that the evidence will, of course, not be upon oath.

SIR,

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, requesting me to inquire into and report upon certain charges preferred by Messrs. Moore and Lane, Justices of the Peace, of Liverpool, against Mr. Charles L. Bayly, J.P., of the same place; and in attention thereto, I beg to state that I yesterday forwarded a copy of your communication in a letter to Messrs. Moore and Lane, Justices of the Peace, and also to Mr. C. L. Bayly, apprising those gentlemen that I should be at the Court House, Liverpool, on Friday next, and requesting them to meet me there at 11½ a.m., with such witnesses as they wished to have examined. As soon as I have held this inquiry I will, without delay, forward my report to you.

I have, &c.,

THE HONORABLE
THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

D. FORBES, J.P.

Moore Bank,
16 November, 1857.

SIR,

I have the honor to address you in reference to the investigation which took place at Liverpool on Friday, 13th instant.

Mr. Bayly in his defence brought forward Messrs. Taylor, Beresford, and Russell, to prove that he was sober on the evening he had the interview with the Rev. Mr. Priddle, and on which occasion the Rev. gentleman stated he (Mr. B.) was intoxicated, and had applied the word "liar" to him: in the minutes taken by Mr. Forbes they positively assert that Mr. Bayly was sober.

Yesterday, in the vestry, after Divine Service, I had an interview with Mr. Priddle, and detailed to him what had been stated by the three individuals above named, when he most emphatically said that Mr. Bayly was drunk on the occasion referred to, and added, that Mr. B. waited on him the following morning to apologise for his conduct on the previous evening,—this was said in the presence of one of the churchwardens, Mr. Pearce.

My motive in putting you in possession of this feature in the case is to prove that Mr. Lane and myself had grounds for our report, and also that Mr. Priddle adheres to the statement he made to Mr. Rowe and myself.

I have, &c.,

THE HONORABLE
THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Sydney.

SAM. MOORE.

Attorney General's Office,
Sydney, 23 November, 1857.

SIR,

In acknowledging the receipt of your communication of the 16th instant, and adverting to the previous correspondence relative to certain charges preferred against Mr. C. L. Bayly, J.P., I am directed to inform you and Mr. Lane, that Mr. Forbes' report and the evidence taken on the inquiry have been received, and the Attorney General desires me to say he does not see sufficient ground either to make any recommendation to the Governor General or to direct a further inquiry. I am also desired to state that, in the opinion of the Attorney General, it is very much to be regretted that the Rev. Mr. Priddle did not attend in support of the complaint which the Rev. gentleman made to yourself and to Mr. Rowe. A clearly proved charge of intoxication under the circumstances alleged against Mr. Bayly would, the Attorney General considers, justify his removal from the Commission of the Peace; but, notwithstanding the disinclination of his brother magistrates to sit on the Bench with him, the Attorney General does not consider that he would be warranted in recommending such removal in the present instance.

I have, &c.,

Parsonage,

*Parsonage, Liverpool,
24 November, 1857.*

SIR,

I have just been informed that an investigation held at Liverpool, before the Police Magistrate of Sydney, on the conduct of Mr. C. L. Bayly, has terminated in his acquittal of charges of drunkenness and gambling, that had been made with a view to his removal from the magistracy.

I am sorry to be aware of the truth of the former of these charges, but in the relation in which I stand as clergyman of the parish towards him and his family, I felt that I ought not to put myself forward as a witness, and as he had promised amendment, and his family entreated me not to appear at the investigation, I felt that unless officially called upon I ought not to volunteer my evidence. I very much regret to find that the course I adopted has greatly distressed some of the most respectable of my parishioners, and I am deeply grieved to add, that instead of the reformation Mr. Bayly promised, he has shamefully offended since the termination of the inquiry, and I hear has been summoned to the Liverpool Bench to answer a charge of common assault. Under these circumstances, I feel that my silence may be injuriously misunderstood, and that I am not entitled to rely upon his promises of amendment.

I am now compelled to bring charges against Mr. Bayly of drunkenness, of insulting language, and of conduct unbecoming a magistrate. On two occasions he came to the Parsonage in a state of filthy intoxication, and on one called me a "liar," and accused me of general hypocrisy in the discharge of my duty as a clergyman.

I have, &c.

CHAS. F. D. PRIDDLE.

THE HONORABLE
CHARLES COWPER, Esq.

*Attorney General's Office,
Sydney, 27 November, 1857.*

SIR,

In acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 25th instant, and its enclosure, addressed to the Honorable Charles Cowper, and subsequently forwarded under B.C. to this office, respecting Mr. C. L. Bayly's conduct, I am now directed to state that previously to the receipt of your communication, &c, referred to above, the Attorney General desired me to write to Captain Moore, intimating that he had determined not to take any further steps in reference to the charges preferred against Mr. Bayly, of which the enclosed is a copy, and therefore I am again instructed to say that the Attorney General regrets he cannot now direct further inquiry.

I have, &c.

THE REV. CHAS. F. D. PRIDDLE,
Parsonage, Liverpool.

W. E. PLUNKETT,
Secretary to Law Department.

Police Office, Sydney, 14 November, 1857.

SIR,

Referring to your letter of the 7th instant, transmitting a communication from Messrs. Moore and Lane, Justices of the Peace, preferring certain charges against Mr. C. L. Bayly, J.P., and requesting me to investigate the same, I have now the honor to forward herewith enclosed the depositions taken by me yesterday at Liverpool in the investigation referred to, and to report thereon as follows.

2. The charges are, first, that on Monday evening, the 15th of September last, Mr. Bayly went to the private residence of the Rev. Mr. Priddle in a state of intoxication, and insulted that gentleman, by calling him a liar; secondly, that about thirteen months ago Mr. Bayly was seen betting in a public-house, in Liverpool, half-crowns and shillings, with persons who were tossing halfpence; and, thirdly, that about eighteen months ago, Mr. Bayly tried to put off some pieces of newspaper as bank notes in a gambling transaction in a public-house at Mudgee.

3. In support of the first charge, Messrs. Moore and Rowe, Justices of the Peace, have narrated from recollection the substance of statements made to each of them by the Rev. Mr. Priddle, on two occasions—Mr. Priddle declining to appear, because he had forgiven Mr. Bayly, and considered what had passed an insult only to himself. The second charge is supported on the sole testimony of a butcher named Pierce, who states that he was one of the parties engaged in tossing on the occasions referred to; and the third charge is preferred in consequence of a statement made to Mr. Rowe by a Mr. Hassal, of Mudgee.

4. In answer to the first charge, Mr. Bayly has produced three respectable witnesses—Mr. Beresford, postmaster; Mr. Taylor, teacher of the Denominational School; and Mr. Russell, a clerk in a store at Collingwood, all of whom are well acquainted with Mr. Bayly, saw and conversed with him on business a few minutes after he left Mr. Priddle on the evening in question, and most positively deny that Mr. Bayly was in the slightest degree under the influence of liquor on that evening. Mr. Bayly denies the truth of the other charges, and has called no witnesses in respect of them.

5. In my opinion, none of the charges are proved, nor is there at present any evidence to justify the accusations brought against Mr. Bayly by Messrs. Moore and Lane. There is, however, this difficulty surrounding the case, which I think it right to mention, that these justices, and several others, believing in the truth of the reports against Mr. Bayly's character, have refused to meet that gentleman on the Bench.

I have, &c.,

THE HONORABLE
THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Sydney.

DAVID FORBES, J.P.,
Police Magistrate.

Court House, Liverpool, 13 November, 1857.

David Forbes, J.P., attended to inquire into certain charges preferred by Messrs. Moore and Lane, J.P.'s, against Mr. Bayly, J.P.,—the above parties present.

Captain Moore states:—Having called on the Rev. Mr. Priddle at the parsonage, either while the last Liverpool races were going on or immediately after—that is about two months ago—after some conversation Mr. Priddle said to me, "Mr. Bayly came to my house last night in a state of intoxication, and after a few words of conversation he threw his arms round my neck, and said 'Mr. Priddle, I have come to you for the purpose of speaking on various serious matters; I am a great sinner, and I want you to save my soul.'" Mr. Priddle replied, "You have come at a very inconvenient hour, as there are now about seventy or eighty persons waiting for me in the Sunday School room, and if you will come to-morrow morning, any time after ten o'clock, I shall be happy to see you;" and he either said, we will talk the matter over, or words to that effect; I cannot recollect the precise words. Mr. Bayly yet urged Mr. Priddle to hear what he had to say, and he again combated it, saying that he had persons waiting, and it was past the hour he should be with them. Mr. Bayly then said to this: "What does it matter if there were a million of persons waiting; is it not of more moment that you should save one soul, and disappear from his neck, and Mr. Bayly then put his hand on Mr. Priddle's thigh, which he, Mr. Priddle, remarked, he considered very indelicate. Mr. Priddle then told Mr. Bayly that he could not remain longer, that he must attend to his appointment. Mr. Bayly became annoyed, and said in a passion, to Mr. Priddle, "I have hitherto, Sir, attended with satisfaction to your doctrine, but I now find, Sir, that you are a liar." A copy of the charges I transmitted to the Colonial Secretary I read to Mr. Priddle at his house; subsequent to this, Mr. Priddle told me that he had an interview with Mr. Bayly, and that the latter had requested him not to make any report of the circumstance and of the transaction I now related, as it would injure his character, and might be the means of his being deprived of the Commission of the Peace. Mr. Priddle told me that he did say to Mr. Bayly that he forgave him; at the same time he said, "I told Mr. Bayly that the transaction was in the hands of a party who would make a report of it to the Government;" and he also added, "my opinion is, Mr. Bayly, that you are not fit to be a magistrate." On last Wednesday, after I had received the communication informing me that the inquiry would take place here to-day, I sent for Mr. Priddle and gave him your letter, telling him he would be required here to-day, as a witness. After perusing the letters he returned them to me, saying that he would not attend; I asked him his reasons; he said, because he had forgiven Mr. Bayly.

Examined by Mr. Bayly's Counsel:—The above statement was made to me by Mr. Priddle either while the races were going on or immediately after; I cannot say how long it was after that Mr. Priddle had the second conversation with Mr. Bayly, when Mr. Priddle told me he had forgiven Mr. Bayly; my impression is, my report had gone in; Mr. Priddle volunteered the whole of these statements; Mr. Priddle first said did you hear what took place in my house last night? I said no; this conversation took place in Mr. Priddle's drawing-room; I was alone with Mr. Priddle; Mr. Priddle himself introduced the conversation about Mr. Bayly; I have a good memory; I did not make any memorandum; what I have now stated is in substance and meaning the same I got from Mr. Priddle, but I will not say that they are the precise words used.

SAM. MOORE.

Mr. George Taylor Rowe, J.P., states:—Since Mr. Bayly's return from Mudjee and since my return from Melbourne, I saw Mr. Priddle at his own house, and he told me that Mr. Bayly came there to his (Mr. Priddle's) house one evening when he had a parochial meeting, and wished to see him; he went to the parlour and sat down with him; he (Mr. Bayly) said he was very anxious to have a conversation with Mr. Priddle; that he knew he had a great deal to answer for, and he was anxious for Mr. Priddle's advice, and that he put both his arms round his neck, and Mr. Priddle said he moved back and released his arms from him, and then Mr. Bayly fell with his head in his lap, and he saw by that that Mr. Bayly was laboring under the influence of liquor; and he recommended Mr. Bayly to call on some other occasion, that he had a meeting that evening at which there were fifty persons waiting to receive a lecture from him, and that he was then half-an-hour behind his time; Mr. Bayly then said, "Let them wait—is it not as well for you to try and save the soul of one sinner as to lecture to sixty?" And Mr. Priddle then said, "I cannot talk longer with you now, but if you will call again at another time I shall be most happy to have two or three

"three hours conversation with you." Mr. Bayly said then,—“What you say now and what you preach on a Sunday are only lies, and you are a liar,” or words to that effect. I asked him about this; I said first to Mr. Priddle, there has been some disturbance with Mr. Bayly, and then he told me what I have related; prior to my hearing this, and before Captain Moore made the official communication, I told Captain Moore that I would not sit on the Bench with Mr. Bayly; this was said in reply to Captain Moore saying to me Mr. Bayly is about returning to the district,—do you intend to sit on the Bench with him? I came to this determination because I heard that Mr. Bayly, while he was out of the district, had been concerned in a gambling transaction, which I thought was very discreditable to him (if true) as a magistrate and a gentleman; I was on the Bench on Wednesday last; I recollect Captain Moore telling Mr. Priddle, on handing him the official documents which he had received, that his (Mr. Priddle's) presence would be required here to-day; Mr. Priddle replied that he considered Mr. Bayly's conduct an insult to himself, and that he having apologized, he had forgiven him; Mr. Priddle said he would not attend; Captain Moore said, you gave me the information first and I shall therefore repeat everything you have said.

Cross-examined:—Mr. Priddle did not say the communication was made in confidence; he did not use the term confidence. I said on the Bench I should repeat what he had stated to me, and he said, “Oh! of course, you may please yourself about that.” When I said there was a disturbance with Mr. Bayly, I meant that I had heard from one or two parties that Mr. Bayly had called Mr. Priddle a liar. The word “lie” was most distinctly used by Mr. Priddle, and also the word “liar.” I am quite certain of that; and Mr. Priddle said he did not know how he stood in the room, he was so hurt. I think what I have stated is as near as possible what Mr. Priddle related to me,—I think almost word for word. The words “lie” and “liar” were most certainly used. Of course I now shall decline to sit with Mr. Bayly on the Bench.

GEO. T. ROWE.

Mr. W. Hannibal Lane, J.P., states:—On account of hearing the several transactions in which Mr. Bayly has been engaged, namely, the gambling transaction and tossing in a public-house in Liverpool, I decline to sit with him as a magistrate. I know nothing of my own knowledge but what I have heard from Captain Moore and Mr. Rowe. I heard also that one of the navvies on the train said he had only to give Mr. Bayly a nobbler and he would decide the case for him. Captain Moore is my author for this also. This may be twelve months ago.

W. H. LANE.

Mr. Thomas Pierce, of Liverpool, butcher, states:—I know there was a public-house here called the Royal Oak, kept by a man named Hawthorn; I have seen gambling there; I have gambled there; I have seen Mr. Bayly there, gambling; it might be thirteen or fourteen months ago; the house has been shut up twelve months; I saw people tossing half-pence for money, and Mr. Bayly betting; I cannot say to what amount it might be—shillings or half-crowns—but it was not very heavy; I have seen a young man named Melville there when Mr. Bayly was there tossing, but I do not recollect seeing Melville gamble; I have seen Mr. Bayly there betting, two or three times.

Cross-examined:—It is not the first time I have seen a magistrate bet. I don't recollect if there were any races coming on about that time. Mr. Bayly I have seen myself tossing half-pence there one time; I have seen him put down money and take it up. I cannot say how long that was ago—it was not eighteen months ago. After that the transactions were only betting. I did not inform Captain Moore at all of these transactions. I told a gentleman who, I believe, told Captain Moore, and, in consequence, I got notice to be here to-day.

THOS. PEARCE.

Mr. George Taylor Rowe, J.P., states:—About six or seven months ago, Mr. Hassall, of the Macquarie, told me that he, Mr. Hassall, was present in a room at Mudgee where a disturbance took place, where Mr. Bayly received blows for passing pieces of newspaper in lieu of pound notes, during the evening, when gambling was taking place. He did not say how long ago. I did not ask him—it was a mere conversation. I have heard since that Mr. Rossiter, of West Maitland, kept the public-house at Mudgee where this occurred, and was present on the occasion.

GEO. T. ROWE.

DEFENCE.

Mr. Bayly declines making any statement further than what he has already stated in his letter to the Attorney General.*

* See letter attached, p. 7.

Mr. James Thomas Taylor, teacher of Church of England School, of Liverpool, states:—I know the Rev. Mr. Priddle and also Mr. Bayly. I recollect a parochial meeting on a Monday, about the time of the last Liverpool races. It was, I believe, the day before the races. I met Mr. Bayly near the church gate; it was near eight o'clock, and before the meeting ought to have commenced. At the time I saw Mr. Bayly I spoke to Mr. Bayly on that that occasion; I bid him good night, and asked him how he did. He had just returned from Mudgee. Mr. Bayly spoke to me; he said, I believe, he had had some angry words with Mr. Priddle; he spoke to me chiefly about a situation I was about being appointed to at Mudgee. I have known Mr. Bayly for some years. When I spoke to Mr. Bayly on that occasion he was sober; he appeared excited. I attributed that to the long journey he had taken. I would detect anything different in his manner, and if he were intoxicated.

J. T. TAYLOR.

Frederick Russell, in the employ of Mr. Mochatta, of Collingwood, states:—I know Mr. Bayly, and Mr. Taylor, the last witness. I accompanied Mr. Taylor to the parochial meeting held by Mr. Priddle on Monday, about the time of the races. I was present at a conversation they had on that occasion. Mr. Bayly was sober. I have known Mr. Bayly upwards of twelve months. Mr. Bayly and Mr. Taylor were talking together about a quarter of an hour. I was not there the whole time. I am quite certain Mr. Bayly was sober; I should have noticed if he had not been sober. It was immediately before the meeting.

FREDERIC RUSSELL.

Mr. Henry Bury Beresford states:—I know Mr. Bayly. The Liverpool races were held about the 16th, 17th, and 18th of September last. I recollect Monday preceding the first day of the races. I saw Mr. Bayly between 8 and 9 o'clock on that evening, at the Post Office; he was sober; he transacted some business with me. I have known Mr. Bayly about two years. I have often transacted business with him. I can positively say that Mr. Bayly was not drunk on the occasion which I have referred to, but he was nervous and excited, and he is of an excitable disposition.

H. B. BERESFORD.

Liverpool, 8 October, 1857.

SIR,

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, enclosing a communication, addressed by Messrs. Moore and Lane, two Justices of the Peace in the Liverpool District, to the Colonial Secretary, and by him forwarded to you.

Please to accept my thanks for your courteous request to hear my statement before taking any proceedings in reference to their complaint. Before I make any statement, I most respectfully wish to draw your attention to the well-known fact of Captain Moore's animosity towards me, and also the judicial affair in the Supreme Court, about twelve months since.

To the first accusation of my having deviated from the conduct of a gentleman and a magistrate, in gambling in a public-house for half-crowns, I positively deny it—not only as to that particular coin, but with any other kind of money. Of course, I cannot deny any statement that Mr. Priddle may have had made to him.

To the second charge of gambling at Mudgee, I admit that circumstances did occur that might give rise to such a report; but I totally deny the accusation, and am ready to prove that I was the victim in that nefarious transaction. Permit me again to draw your attention to the animus shewn by Messrs. Moore and Lane in making this charge after a lapse of three years. Nevertheless, I have no wish to shrink from it, as my conduct was that of a gentleman, although, as a magistrate, I fully recognise my indiscretion.

The third accusation, viz., that I called the Rev. Mr. Priddle "a liar," I utterly deny. That I visited that gentleman on my return from Mudgee, and that some warm expressions were used by me in reply to some uncalled-for observations by the Reverend gentleman, I do not deny; but by no implication can they be interpreted into my calling him a liar. I therefore most indignantly repudiate the charge. I also deny that I was intoxicated, although I admit I laboured under excited feelings, caused by circumstances not necessary to allude to now; and finally, in regard to the moral effect that my officiating as a magistrate might have on the community, I beg to refer with some pride and satisfaction, to the testimonial presented to me by 153 inhabitants of this district, on my quitting it for Mudgee, on the 16th of October last. Feeling perfectly convinced that I shall receive justice at your hands, I await the proceeding with a calm conscience, knowing that these base and infamous calumnies emanate from the inveterate malignancy of my old enemy, Captain Samuel Moore, my brother magistrate.

Legislative Assembly.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

EDMUND B. UHR, Esq. J.P.

(COMPLAINING OF THE CONDUCT OF A. E. HALLORAN, ESQ., J.P.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 27 July, 1858.

To the Honorable the Members of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, in Parliament assembled.

The humble Petition of E. B. Uhr, Esq., J.P.,

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH :—

That your Petitioner has been a Magistrate of the Territory for the period of thirteen years.

That during this period your Petitioner has constantly attended the Courts of Petty Sessions at Ipswich, Moreton Bay, and Maryborough, Wide Bay. That at the latter place your Petitioner has been actively engaged for about nine years in Magisterial duties upon the local Bench, during four years of which he was compelled to act constantly (without remuneration) as Police Magistrate, as far as his authority went.

That your Petitioner, without previous knowledge or solicitation on his part, was recommended to the Government for the office in question by a Petition signed by the greater number of residents in the Town and District.

That on the 28th December, 1857, your Petitioner whilst sitting on the Bench at Maryborough, and in the performance of his duty as a Magistrate, was grossly insulted by A. E. Halloran, Esq., Commissioner of Crown Lands for the District of Wide Bay and Burnett.

That the circumstances to which your Petitioner refers were as follows :—

Namely—Your Petitioner being alone with Mr. Halloran upon the Bench, and having put a necessary question to a witness, Mr. Halloran said it had nothing to do with the case, and on your Petitioner insisting that the question should be answered, Mr. Halloran said, "Ah! I heard the matter had already been decided out of Court." Your Petitioner then asked whether Mr. Halloran intended the allusion to apply to him (your Petitioner)—Mr. Halloran replied that he was not bound to say.

When the hearing of the case had been concluded, Mr. Halloran pronounced his opinion that the defendant should be fined only twenty shillings. Your Petitioner then again inquired whether Mr. Halloran intended the allusion previously made by him with regard to the case having been prejudged to apply to your Petitioner; Mr. Halloran again replied that he was not bound to say. But upon Petitioner pressing the question, Mr. Halloran then said, "I heard before leaving home, from a servant of mine, that you had told Constable Doran that Constable Harewood should be dismissed."

Your Petitioner then replied in the following terms,—“Mr. Halloran, when I come into a Court of Justice it is for the purpose of doing my duty conscientiously, and to the best of my ability. Allow me now to tell you, sir, that you have received your information

"tion from a most polluted source. I will not sit in judgment with you in this case, neither will I sit with you in your magisterial capacity again."

That your Petitioner addressed a formal complaint to the Executive Government against Mr. Halloran, on the subject of the insult above specified, which complaint your Petitioner has been since informed was referred to Mr. Halloran for explanation.

That Mr. Halloran's explanation has been forwarded to your Petitioner: that the said explanation amounts to a mere evasion of the charge, couched in language which, in fact, is rather an aggravation of the original insult.

That, nevertheless, the said explanation has been taken as conclusive by the Government, which has declined either to express any disapproval of Mr. Halloran's conduct, or to institute any further inquiry.

That, in consequence of the above circumstances, two resident Magistrates of the district in question, namely, W. H. Walsh, Esq., and P. D. Anderson, Esq., have declined to sit on the Bench with Mr. Halloran, and the latter has signified his intention of resigning the Commission of the Peace.

That your Petitioner submits that the interests of justice require that the utmost decorum of language and behaviour, and respect for each others feelings and position, should be maintained by Magistrates upon the Bench, and in their mutual intercourse, but particularly by paid officers of the Government; whereas, if such language as was used by Mr. Halloran on the occasion referred to, be passed over without notice, it is obvious that no respectable or independent man would consent to be associated upon the Bench with Government officers.

That your Petitioner having been refused redress by the Executive Government, appeals to your Honorable House, and prays that your Honorable House will recommend such steps to be taken as the justice of the case requires.

And your Petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

No. 1.

THE BENCH OF MAGISTRATES, MUDGEE, to THE COLONIAL SECRETARY.

Mudgee, 2 March, 1858.

SIR,

We do ourselves the honor to bring under the notice of the Government the conduct of Doctor Richard Harris, J.P., one of the Magistrates attending this Bench.

The circumstances attending this case have already been laid before the Honorable the Attorney General for his advice, and we deem it advisable to transmit the whole of the documents for the consideration of the Government, together with the Honorable the Attorney General's opinion, without further comment of our own.

We have, &c.,

THE HONORABLE
THE COLONIAL SECRETARY-

INFORMATION (General Purposes.)

New South Wales, }
Mudgee—to wit. }

Be it remembered, that on this seventeenth day of December, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, in the town of Mudgee, in the Colony of New South Wales, George Inder, of Guntawang, stockman, appears personally before me, the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's Justices duly assigned to keep the peace of Our Lady the Queen in and for the district of Mudgee and Territory of New South Wales, and on oath informs me, that on the seventeenth day of December, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, instant, he saw in the possession of Richard Harris, of Oakfield, in the County of Phillip and Colony of New South Wales, a bay horse, branded W.C. on the near shoulder and GI on the off shoulder, and that the said horse is the property of him, the said George Inder, and was stolen from him within the last twelve months, at Mudgee aforesaid, contrary to the Act of the Governor and Legislative Council of the said Colony in such case made and provided: Whereupon the said George Inder prays that I, the said Justice, will proceed in the premises according to law.

GEORGE INDER.

Sworn at the Police Office of Mudgee, } in the said Colony, on the day first } above written, before me—

ARCHD. BELL COX, J. P.

Mudgee, }
New South Wales, }

RICHARD HARRIS, Esq., J.P., appears on summons to answer the complaint of George Inder, for having in his possession a bay horse, branded WC near shoulder, and GI off shoulder; the said horse being the property of said George Inder.

George Inder, being duly sworn, states:—About the 17th instant I was at Mr. Harris'; I saw a bay horse belonging to me there, branded WC near shoulder and GI off shoulder, bald face, and near hind foot white; I demanded the horse from Dr. Harris; I lost the horse from Mr. Wallace's yard about two or three months ago; I purchased the horse from Frederick Turvey—the receipt I now produce; I never disposed of the horse in any way.

Cross-examined:—I swear the horse was stolen from Mr. Wallace's yard; Caplin claimed him as his property, and demanded him from me; I did not demand from Caplin any money for bringing the horse in, or for the use of the paddock; I was not present when he he took the horse away; I did not see the horse put into a box at Wallace's; I swear I did not go in and demand the halter from off the horse; the horse was taken away without my knowledge; I was summoned the same day for having the horse in my possession, being a stolen one; I was summoned before I took any steps against Caplin; the following morning I went to Captain Browne; I was brought before the Court on the summons; I knew the horse to have been the property of Caplin; I cannot swear if Caplin ever sold the horse; Caplin never gave me an order to deliver up the horse to Turvey; the horse was running at Guntawang; I never received an order from Caplin not to give up the horse; I gave £8 for the chance of the horse to Turvey; I value him at £40.

Frederick Turvey, being duly sworn, states:—I sold a bay colt with a bald face to George Inder; it is two years next May; he was rising four years old, and branded WC near shoulder, and GI off shoulder; I offered Inder £5 to get the horse in; he said it was too wet; I purchased the horse from Caplin, giving him a mare and a set of trace harness; the mare was branded FT on the off shoulder, and either a C or G on the near shoulder; the colt was running at Guntawang when I bought him, and Caplin was to pay for getting him in; I afterwards heard he was in the yard at Guntawang; Caplin told me to go for him; he gave me an order to receive the colt, and also one pound to pay to Inder; I paid the one pound, but I do not know what I did with the order; I was living at Caplin's at the time; I had the colt in my possession about eight days before he got away; Caplin lost the mare before I received the colt.

Cross-examined:—Caplin did not pay me for breaking the colt in; there had been some money transactions between us; I owed Caplin £5, and gave him security; there was no person present when the receipt was drawn out; the security I gave him was the receipt for the colt; when a hut I was building for Caplin was finished, I repaid him the £5 I borrowed from him; I consider the mare and harness worth £30.

Thomas Gilmore, being duly sworn, states:—I was in Frederick Turvey's employment about two years ago; we were living in Caplin's house; Turvey had a bay colt in his possession, which he got after I left; I believe he exchanged with Caplin, giving a mare for him; I afterwards saw Caplin looking for the mare; I know nothing about the exchange of the horses, but I never heard Caplin say it was his property; Caplin offered me £1 to look for the mare.

Cross-examined:—I was not with Turvey when he broke in the colt; Turvey was working the mare two or three days; Turvey owned the mare at the time; I was not with Turvey when he was breaking in the colt; Turvey might have exchanged the mare for the colt previous to drawing in slabs without my knowledge, but he had not delivered up the mare after we drew in the slabs, and after I had left Turvey; Caplin offered me a pound to look after the mare, which was lost; he said he could not find her.

John Joseph Mills, being duly sworn, states:—I was present about two months ago when Inder put up some horses at Wallace's Inn, Mudgee; I remember Caplin stopping the sale of a horse branded W C—the horse in dispute; Caplin spoke to the auctioneer to stop the sale of the horse—he claimed it as his property; Inder was present, and asked who was to pay for the grass and the driving in of the horse; I advised Caplin to pay him for driving in the horse; he borrowed a sovereign from Mr. Heley, which I saw him tender to Inder; Inder refused it then, as I believe; Mr. Bell advised him not to take it; I asked Caplin if he was perfectly sure the horse was his—he said it was, he bred him, and he had never parted with him; I asked him, when he got the horse, if he would sell him—that I would give him £22 for him, when the dispute was ended; just before sun-down Caplin, Mr. Hayes, and Richards, came to me and asked if I would help them down with the horse; when Caplin claimed the horse Inder stated that it was his property, and on Caplin saying he would have him, Inder said, "Mind you do not take my halter with him"; Caplin took the horse out of Wallace's stable, and delivered him up to me, when I paid him for it; I did not notice Inder at the stable, but he was in the verandah when the horse was passing by; he might have seen him.

Cross-examined:—When Caplin first claimed the horse Inder stated that he had bought the chance of the horse; I heard Inder say to Caplin, who was to pay him for the trouble of getting in, and bringing the horse into Mudgee; I bought the horse for Dr. Harris; I think at the time he was worth about £22 or £23; I heard he had been handled; when I bought the horse for £22 I considered that it was about his value, considering the risk run in roping him.

Evan Richards, being duly sworn, states:—I recollect being at Wallace's Inn in October last; I also recollect Caplin stopping the sale of a horse branded WC; I was present at a conversation of Caplin and Inder; Caplin claimed the horse, and I heard Inder say who was to pay for the driving and the grass of the horse; it was after Caplin claimed the horse; the horse followed a mare I purchased into the stable; she was driven by Hayes and Fitzsimmons; Inder was in the yard; he told me to ride the mare, and the horse would follow; he saw us bringing the horse into the stable; when we were taking the horse away, Inder was present at the corner of the verandah; he saw the horse going away; he warned Caplin, in the yard, not to take horse away, after he saw Mr. Bell; he did not make any objection when the horse was going away; I think Inder said he had purchased the chance of the horse; he produced a receipt at the time; I was present when Caplin took the horse away; there was no person present to give Caplin possession; I think Hayes led the horse.

Thomas Hayes, being duly sworn, states:—I was present at Wallace's yard when a horse was offered for sale, branded WC—Caplin's brand; Caplin stopped the sale; George Inder was going to sell the horse; Caplin claimed the horse as his property, and told Mr. Cox not to sell him; Inder said who was to pay him for bringing the horse into Mudgee; Caplin borrowed a pound from Mr. Heley, and was going to pay him, when Mr. Bell drove up; Inder then said he would see him again; I took the horse out of the yard; Inder was in the stable yard, and told me not to take the halter away; he told me two or three times not to take his halter; Inder was in the stable, or at the door with the horse; Harry, the groom, took the halter and gave it to Inder; Inder saw the horse going to Mills'; when Caplin claimed the horse he stopped the sale of it; if he had been mine I would have required £40 for him; when Caplin stopped the sale, Inder said he had bought the chance of him for £10; when Mr. Caplin had the horse taken to the stable he followed a mare, and I assisted to drive him; Inder was not there at the time, but he came to the stable afterwards; all that Inder wanted was the halter, and so much for driving; he warned Caplin in the yard two or three times not to take him away; he did not put any obstacle in the way to our taking the horse after he had claimed the halter, and asked for compensation for driving.

William Caplin, being duly sworn, states:—I know the horse in dispute—he was bred by me; I never sold the horse to Frederick Turvey, nor did I exchange him for another; I once had a mare of Turvey's in my possession; I had her in security for £10 I lent him; Turvey wanted me to exchange the colt for the mare; I refused; I gave authority to Turvey to get the colt from George Inder to break in the horse for me; after the horse was lost from Mudgee I sent a letter to Inder by Swords, the blacksmith, the purport of which was not to deliver the horse except to my order.

Cross-examined:—I sold the horse to John Mills for £23, for Dr. Harris; it is a little better than two months ago; I do not recollect the exact date.

By the Bench:—I sent £1 to Inder by Turvey when he brought the horse from Guntawang; I never offered Gillmore £1 to get the mare for me when lost.

Cross-examined:—Turvey once wanted to get the horse from my husband in exchange for a mare, but my husband refused; my husband had the mare from Turvey in security for £5; Gillmore has been in our house, but I do not know if my husband saw him there.

Frederick Turvey, being duly sworn, deposeth:—About the month of October, 1855, I purchased from William Caplin, of Mudgee, a bay colt; I paid for the same a mare and trace harness; the colt was running at Guntawang; I received a receipt from Caplin, and an order to get the colt; the colt was given up to me, and I had him in my possession for one one week, and then turned him out again; I was afterwards indebted to Caplin in the sum of five pounds, which he advanced to me as I was putting up a building for him, and, as security for the five pounds, I allowed him to retain possession of the receipt he originally gave me for the colt; I have completed my work with him, and the debt of five pounds is discharged; Caplin now refuses to return my receipt to me, and has sent word to the groom at Guntawang to refuse to let me have the colt; I have, therefore, suffered great loss by Caplin illegally detaining the receipt, and pray that he may be summoned to answer the charge.

FREDERICK TURVEY is charged with obtaining money under false pretences.

George Inder, being duly sworn, states:—I am stockman in the employ of Mr. Rouse of Guntawang; about five years ago I branded a colt for William Caplin—a bay colt, bald face, one hind foot white; I branded him WC near shoulder; the colt was afterwards running at the Warralle; last May twelve months defendant gave me £1 for getting the horse in; after getting the horse in defendant and his wife took him away; three or four months afterwards defendant lost the horse out of Mudgee, and I purchased the chance of him, thinking he would come back on the run if he was not stolen; I gave eight pounds for the chance, and produce the receipt before the Court; about two months ago I got the horse in and brought him into Mudgee—it was the same horse I bought from Frederick Turvey; when I brought the horse into Mudgee for sale he was claimed by William Caplin when put up for sale; Mr. Rouse offered me £35 for him in Mudgee; Caplin went and took the horse out of the yard; I did not see Caplin take the horse out of the yard, but he told me that he had sold him to Dr. Harris for £20; when I bought the horse from defendant he told me that he had swapped a mare for the horse with Caplin.

By Defendant's Attorney:—When I gave the horse up to defendant, in 1856, I did so upon his stating that he had an order from Caplin to receive him; Mr. Rouse was present; I knew defendant and Caplin; they were not strangers to me; I saw Caplin afterwards, and told him the defendant had the colt.

By the Bench:—At the same time to my knowledge the defendant had the colt in Mudgee, breaking him in; Caplin knew well defendant had it.

By Defendant's Attorney:—It was the same colt that I purchased that defendant was breaking in at Mudgee when I saw Caplin.

William Caplin, being duly sworn, states:—I reside in Mudgee; I remember a bay horse being put up for sale at Mudgee about two months ago; George Inder put the horse up; bay horse, branded WC near shoulder, on the off shoulder GI, white down the face, and there might be a little white on the legs; I claimed the horse from George Inder for myself; I bred the horse at Guntawang at Mr. Rouse's; I never sold the horse to any person; I never exchanged the horse with any one; I sent the defendant to Guntawang for the horse; he was to break him in for me, but no bargain was made as to what I was to pay him; it is the same horse that defendant was to break in for me that I afterwards claimed from George Inder; I have since sold the horse to John Mills; Dr. Harris has got the horse now, I believe.

By Defendant's Attorney:—About two years ago defendant was putting up a hut for me; I gave defendant £1 to give to Inder to get the horse, and to bring him into Mudgee; the horse has not been in my possession since; I recollect defendant having a mare branded FT on one shoulder, and another brand on the other shoulder; I never offered any reward to any person to bring the mare into Mudgee; I never offered £1 to any one about her; I never offered it to Thomas Gillmore; I have been in this Court before on account of the FT mare Mr. Broadribb has been examining me on; it was about the receipt for that mare; defendant brought me before the Court; it was after defendant brought the horse from Guntawang; I never had any conversation with Mr. Gillmore about defendant giving me an old mare for a young colt; the horse I took out of Wallace's yard is rising seven years old.

By the Bench:—I sent a message to George Inder at Guntawang not to let any person have the colt unless I came for it myself; the colt had been branded, but was not broken in to harness.

By the Court:—No receipt ever passed between defendant and myself; defendant, I believe, stated he had a receipt, but there never was any; I never purchased any harness from defendant, but when he went away from my place he left behind an old trace harness, which was no good; the harness is now at my place, and it has never been used since defendant left it; I did not give defendant anything for bringing the horse from Guntawang, but I was to pay him for breaking him in; and afterwards, if I did not require the horse, I was to let defendant have the use of him for three months.

Thomas Gillmore, being duly sworn, states:—I reside in Mudgee; I know defendant; about two years ago I was on the Barwin with him, and came with him into Mudgee; I know William Caplin; I recollect a bay mare defendant brought in with him from the Barwin—she was branded F T off shoulder, and a single G or C on near shoulder; I saw Caplin with the mare, but I never heard him say he got the mare; he was looking after the mare in the bush; he afterwards told me the mare was lost, and he would give me a pound to go and get her; I have seen defendant with a bay colt; he told me he got it from Guntawang; he said he had given Caplin the mare he brought from the Barwin for the colt.

By Prosecutor's Attorney:—I saw Caplin looking after the mare several times; he told me he was looking after her; it is about two years ago since defendant told me that Caplin had exchanged the colt for the mare; it was the time the colt was being broken in, and in defendant's possession.

By the Bench:—It was just after this time I left defendant's service, and have not been in it since.

By the Bench:—When the colt was lost he was hobbled out and had a halter on him.

BE it remembered, that on the 26th day of October, A.D., 1857, George Inder, of Guntawang, came personally before me, William Browne, Esq., Police Magistrate for the District of Mudgee, and upon oath states,—that on the 30th day of May, 1856, Frederick Turvey obtained the sum of eight pounds from me under false pretences; the said Frederick Turvey having falsely represented to me that he had a bay colt running at Guntawang, branded WC near shoulder, and which he sold to me for the sum mentioned, and which said horse has since been claimed by William Caplin.

Deponent prays a warrant may be issued for his apprehension.

BE it remembered, that on this eighth day of October, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, in the town of Mudgee, in the Colony of New South Wales, William Caplin, of Mudgee, appears personally before me, the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's Justices duly assigned to keep the peace of Our Lady the Queen in and for the town of Mudgee and Territory of New South Wales, and on oath informs me that on the seventh day of October, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, I observed in Mr. Wallace's yard, town of Mudgee, a bay horse, branded with my brand on the near shoulder, W.C., which horse was running at Guntawang, and was my property; the said said horse was offered for sale by George Inder, and claimed by him, and was also branded with George Inder's brand—G.I. off shoulder—contrary to the Act of the Governor and Legislative Council of the said Colony, in such case made provided: Whereupon the said William Caplin prays that I, the said Justice, will proceed in the premises according to law.

GEORGE INDER is charged in having had in his possession a horse, the property of William Caplin, of Mudgee.

William Caplin, being duly sworn, states:—I recollect the 7th instant; I was in Mr. Wallace's yard; I saw a horse in possession of defendant—a bay horse, branded with my brand on the near shoulder, WC; the said horse was also branded GI off shoulder; I claimed the horse, when defendant demanded payment from me for bringing the horse from Guntawang; I offered him payment; he did not take it; he gave no reason; he did not refuse to give me the horse; he gave him up to me and demanded the halter; I then sold the horse; I swear positively the horse was my property; it is more than twelve months since I lost the horse; the brand GI, to the best of my belief, is fresh, not more than three months old.

Letter from the Bench of Magistrates, Mudgee, to the Attorney General.

Police Office, Mudgee,
16 January, 1858.

Sir,

We have the honor to enclose depositions taken in the case "Inder versus Richard Harris, J. P.," on which a difference of opinion exists on the Bench.

We have to request you will be pleased to advise us of the proper way to proceed in the matter.

We wish to draw your attention to the fact that Richard Harris, J. P., has been one of the Magistrates adjudicating twice in this case; that he purchased this horse, and one week after the purchase sat on the Bench with the P. M., and awarded the horse to be the property of William Caplin, from whom he had previously bought him.

The reason the P. M. was not on the Bench was, that he was subpoenaed by Richard Harris, J. P., as a witness, and afterwards not called. The circumstance of the receipt differing twenty days as to date of actual transaction, and the amount also differing £1 as sworn by Caplin, leads us to believe a great deal of false swearing has taken place in the matter; and we should be glad to have your opinion, in order to carry out the ends of justice.

The Attorney General,
Sydney.

Sydney, 25 February, 1858.

Gentlemen,

In acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 16th ultimo, covering depositions of the case named in the margin, as well as other papers relating to the same matter, now returned, I am directed to state that it appears to the Attorney General that the case against Dr. Harris ought to be dismissed. There is nothing to shew that he stole the horse, or received it knowing it to have been stolen, or had it in his possession under circumstances which he has not been able to account for to the satisfaction of the Justices. But, although the Attorney General is of this opinion, he at the same time thinks that if Dr. Harris purchased the horse, either by himself or an agent, from Caplin on the 7th October, and afterwards sat and adjudicated upon a charge brought by Caplin against Inder, respecting the same horse, and then joined in directing the horse to be delivered to Caplin, his conduct has been highly irregular and improper. It is, in the opinion of the Attorney General, in part of the duty of a Justice of the Peace to decide finally upon the question of ownership in such a case as the present, and the direction to give the horse to Caplin was entirely extra-judicial, and of no binding effect. It is open to Inder, notwithstanding such direction, to sue Dr. Harris or any one else who may have the horse, and if he can shew his title he will of course recover. If, however, the Justices had the power to decide the question of ownership, Dr. Harris' conduct in acting in his own case (if he did so act) is, the Attorney General considers, quite inexcusable; and, should it be formally brought before the Government, and substantiated, it will, he thinks, be the duty of the Executive to take further proceedings in the matter.

Oakfield, Mudjee,

SIR,

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a communication from your Office, bearing date 25th ultimo, referring to a complaint made by the Bench of Magistrates "that I had purchased a horse from one Caplin, and afterwards adjudicated upon a charge brought by Caplin against one Inder respecting the said horse, and joined in directing the horse to be delivered to Caplin."

In reply, I beg leave to state that you have been greatly misled in supposing that the complaint in question originated, or even conveyed the sentiments of the majority of the Magistrates of this District. Inquiry will show that it has emanated from two only—Messrs. Browne and A. Cox.

I never purchased a horse from Caplin, as the receipt which I received with the horse in question from John J. Mills, from whom I did purchase the horse, will shew, and which receipt I produced to the Bench, who still retain it.

On the morning on which the case referred to was heard, I had had a serious difference with Captain Browne, late P.M., and when the case was called on he proceeded to adjudicate on the case, without the slightest reference to me. He did not even ask my opinion on the case, but delivered his own decision. After his having done so, I merely asked who was to have the horse, stating that he was then in my possession. Captain Browne said, "Of course the horse is Caplin's."

Without consideration I signed the depositions along with others, and for this inadvertency, malicious persons are endeavoring to degrade me, by having me struck out of the Commission of the Peace.

I have been kept in perfect ignorance of the nature of the complaint made against me, having heard nothing of it but what the letter from your office conveys. I have applied for copies at the Police Office, and been refused. The letters in question do not appear on the records of the Court. Of the four Magistrates who sat on the case, two of them have never seen it or joined in censuring me, and if the third has signed it, it has been after repeated refusals.

The determination to prevent "that fellow from sitting again on the Bench, and that no means shall be left untried to deprive him of his Commission," has been openly discussed by Messrs. Browne and A. Cox.

If the Magistrates of the district are called upon to express their individual opinion of my conduct as a Magistrate or a gentleman since I came to reside in this neighbourhood, I entertain no fear of the result.

R. HARRIS, ESQ., to THE COLONIAL SECRETARY.

Oakfield, Mudjee,
2 April, 1858.

SIR,

I beg leave to forward, for your information, the following narrative, which could not be well combined with my reply to your communication of the 25th ultimo.

On the morning on which the inquiry was made about Caplin's horse, while sitting on the Bench a Mr. Thomas came into the Court, having his face and hands much cut and disfigured, and applied to me for a summons for Captain Browne, who had not only assaulted him himself but had set a fierce mastiff dog on him, who had torn him in the way he appeared.

On taking his information, it appeared that the assault was committed in a public house that morning, between one and two o'clock. Captain Browne was, of course, very indignant at the idea of being summoned before his own Court, and after having placed every every obstacle in my way he could, at last he stood up in the Court and declared he would not allow me to issue the summons, or have the time of the Court taken up with such matters. (There was at the time no other business before the Court)

He declared before witness that "that fellow should not again sit on the Bench, and "that he would find means to strike me out of the Commission."

From this time his persecution of me commenced, and having found a willing assistant in Mr. Archd. Cox, my inadvertancy in signing those depositions was fixed on as the first point of attack.

A warrant had been issued by him against one Turvey, for stealing this horse and selling him to Inder. When Turvey was arrested, Caplin, who ought to have been the prosecutor, was excluded from the Court, and after all the evidence was taken he was called in and examined as a witness, without having any opportunity afforded him of even hearing what had been sworn to by Turvey's witnesses; and as he did not contradict what he never heard, Turvey was discharged, and the former decision reversed.

Captain Browne then issued a summons to me for having this horse of Inder's illegally in my possession. When the case was called, the majority of the Bench declined to hear it, and on Captain Browne still persisting they left the Court. He and Mr. A. Cox then proceeded with the case, and, although I remonstrated at the unseemliness of Captain Browne rescinding his former decision, he still persisted, until one of his friends remonstrated with him; he then postponed the case. For daring to address the Bench he told one of his friends he could scarcely refrain from committing me to the lock-up. When again called there were four Magistrates sitting—Messrs. R. Lowe, Dr. Macdonald, M. Betts, and A. Cox. The last was more like a prosecuting council than a Judge. Everything that his ingenuity could twist to my disadvantage he did fully; and when he could not find facts he supplied insinuations. Messrs. Lowe and Macdonald wished to dismiss the case, Turvey having failed to produce a particle of evidence that he ever was legally possessed of the horse, and that Inder knew that the horse was Caplin's when he bought it from Turvey.

Messrs. Betts and Cox wished for the Attorney General's opinion on the subject.

The depositions lay on the table for three weeks, Mr. Lowe refusing to sign or be made a catspaw of in such squabbles; Mr. Betts and Dr. Macdonald were never asked to sign, and never saw the accompanying letter. When Mr. A. Cox returned to Mudgee he was determined the matter should not drop, and I believe induced Mr. Lowe to sign it.

Messrs. Betts and Macdonald both declared to me that they had no intention of censuring my conduct in the matter; Mr. R. Lowe I have had no opportunity of speaking to.

I have been kindly asked by some of my brother Magistrates—who deeply sympathize with me—to write to them, asking their opinions of my conduct as a Magistrate and a gentleman since I came into this district; but, trusting to a conscience void of offence, it is not my intention to trouble them, except my enemies should seem to prevail.

MEMO.

In consequence of certain observations made in the Legislative Assembly on the 22nd of October, the Colonial Secretary requested Mr. Justice Therry to furnish to the Government his Notes upon the trial of Inder v. Harris, in reply to which request the Judge addressed the following letter to him:—

Supreme Court,28 October, 1858.

Sir,

The magisterial part borne by Dr. Harris respecting a disputed claim to a horse by Inder v. Caplin, came before me, but incidentally in the action of Inder v. Harris. All that was requisite for Inder to prove at the trial before me was, that the horse was his property, and that it was in the possession of Harris, who refused to give him up.

These points were established to the satisfaction of the jury, and Inder obtained a verdict. The circumstances that transpired referable to the points of your inquiry are these:—The horse was sold by Caplin, one of the claimants to the horse, on or about the 7th of October, at Mudgee, to John Mills for £22. Caplin deposed that at the time he sold the horse to Mills he sold it to him as Dr. Harris' agent, and that Mills told him on the day of the sale he had bought the horse for Harris. Mills confirmed this statement, and stated that he (Mills) paid for the horse, that he delivered the horse to Harris, and Harris repaid him. These statements tended to establish a purchase by the agency of Mills per Harris from Caplin, in whose favor in a week afterwards, the 14th of October, Dr. Harris along with the Police Magistrate, adjudicated in a disputed claim between Caplin v. Inder.

"The Court award the horse to be the property of Wm. Caplin."

"ROBERT HARRIS, J.P."

"WM. BROWN, J.P."

At this time the horse was in Harris' possession, and if Mills was bona fide his agent, Harris was virtually the owner of the horse from the 7th instant, the date of the sale to Mills by Caplin.

Among the papers sent from your office I observe one (Harris' letter of the 2nd April, 1858, which was not however used in evidence at the trial,) in which Dr. Harris states he signed this paper inadvertently, and that he stated at the time of the adjudication the horse was then in his possession; and, moreover, he states subsequently that he was not aware at the time of the sale to Mills it was a purchase solely on his account. It is due further to Dr. Harris to state, that his counsel (Holroyd) placed him as a witness in the box to be examined by the plaintiff's counsel, Mr. Dalley, but no questions were put to him by either counsel. For the interests of his client it was, no doubt, immaterial to Mr. Dalley whether the conduct of the Magistrates had been meritorious or otherwise.

It is worthy of remark, however, that as no questions were put to him I had no means of knowing whether he was ready to deny or admit the agency of Mills, or to state the circumstances under which he became possessed of the horse, and the precise time he got possession of him. Perhaps the most unfavorable fact in the case, or at least one principally requiring satisfactory explanation, is the receipt dated the 27th of October, and for this reason:—The sale to Mills, as the agent of Harris, was on the 7th, and Harris admits that at the time of the adjudication—on the 14th of October—the horse was in his possession. If it was not then his by purchase, the question suggests itself how did the horse happen then to be in his possession at all? If the receipt was prepared with the view of showing that the sale to Mills by Caplin did not take place until the 27th of October, it would, no doubt, have the effect of showing that Mills only became owner of the horse by purchase at that date, and that Harris purchased subsequently from him; but if this were the real transaction, there was no reason or necessity why Dr. Harris should excuse himself for having inadvertently signed the depositions, and adjudicated on the 14th instant, for then then he had no property in the horse, yet it was in his possession. Without further inquiry, however, the circumstances, in my opinion, do not appear with sufficient fulness and clearness to justify so strong a measure as the removal of Dr. Harris from the Commission of the Peace. I venture to suggest some questions, the answers to which by Mills and Dr. Harris would more satisfactorily reveal the true character of the case than it has been hitherto disclosed, either in the proceedings before the Magistrates, or at the trial at Bathurst.

Questions suggested to be put to Mills.

1. In what manner or words did Harris authorize you to buy the horse from Caplin?
2. On what day did you give possession of the horse to Harris, and was payment made by him to you on the day you gave him possession? And, further, was payment by yourself to Caplin made on the 27th of October, as the receipt for the horse purports, or previously?
3. In what way did Harris come to know that Caplin had a horse to sell in Mudgee on the 7th of October?—and what passed between you and him on that day, or on any previous or subsequent days respecting the horse?
4. Did Harris, in directing you to purchase the horse, reserve a price—that is, if the horse did not go beyond a certain price you were to buy it for him; and if so, what was the reserved price?

I further venture to suggest, that the Police Magistrate, Captain Browne, should be asked if at the time of the adjudication Dr. Harris apprized him that he (Dr. Harris) had the horse in his possession?

Questions to be proposed to Dr. Harris.

1. Had you any, and, if any, what communication with Mills, as to the purchase of Caplin's horse, on or about the 7th of October, 1857?
2. Did you authorize him, directly or indirectly, to purchase him for you?
3. On what day and date did you get possession of the horse, and pay for him?
4. If the horse was in your possession, as it is admitted by your letter of the 2nd of April, 1858, to have been, on the day of the adjudication—the 14th October—how did it so happen to be in your possession if the horse was not then yours?

As Dr. Harris was not examined at the trial, I think it reasonable he should be afforded an opportunity of making any further exculpatory or explanatory statement he may think proper respecting the adjudication, the possession of the horse, and the receipt of the 27th of October.

SIR,

In a case of a disputed claim to a horse between William Caplin and George Inder, which was heard before the Mudgee Court on the 14th October, 1857, Dr. Harris, a Magistrate of the Territory, and the then Police Magistrate, Mr. Brown, adjudicated, and it has since been made a charge against Dr. Harris that the horse was at that time his own property, having been purchased for him at Mudgee, by John Mills, for £22, on or about the 7th of the same month. It has been stated by Dr. Harris that the horse was in his possession at the time of the adjudication, and that he was not aware at the time of the sale to Mills it was a purchase solely on his account. The receipt given by Caplin to Mills also bears date the 27th October.

This case has already, as you are aware, formed the subject of inquiry, but the attention of the Government having been again drawn to the course taken by Dr. Harris on the occasion referred to, it is the wish of the Colonial Secretary—as you are acquainted in some degree with the case, and are in no respect connected with the parties—that you should assist the Government in arriving at a satisfactory decision in the matter. I am, therefore, desired to request that you will obtain the attendance of Mills before you, in order to put to him the questions contained in the enclosed paper; and that in returning this document with the answers of Mills, you will favor Mr. Cowper with your opinion of the transaction. The point on which clear information is most required is: did Dr. Harris, through the agency of Mills, purchase the horse on or about the 7th October, and on the 14th award it to Caplin, from whom it was so bought, there being a disputed claim to the horse between Caplin and Inder.

Questions to be put to John Joseph Mills.

1st. In what manner or words did Harris authorize you to buy the horse from Caplin?

2nd. On what day did you give possession of the horse to Harris, and was payment made by him to you on the day you gave him possession; and, further, was payment by yourself to Caplin made on the 27th of October, as the receipt for the horse purports, or previously?

3rd. In what way did Harris come to know that Caplin had a horse to sell in Mudgee on the 7th of October, and what passed between you and him on that day, or on any previous or subsequent days, respecting the horse?

4th. Did Harris, in directing you to purchase the horse, reserve a price; that is, if the horse did not go beyond a certain price you were to buy it for him; and, if so, what was the reserved price?

NEW SOUTH WALES.

MR. C. W. BUCKNELL.

(PRAYING INQUIRY AND REDRESS.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 1 October, 1858.

To the Honorable the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales.

The Petition of Charles Wentworth Bucknell, of Mungyer, in the Gwydir District, grazier,—

HUMBLY SHEWETH,—

That your Petitioner was one of the earliest settlers in the Gwydir District, where he has been a licensed occupant of Crown Lands for the last fifteen years.

That on the sixth day of October, 1857, two persons, whom recent circumstances have discovered to be Police Detectives, presented themselves at your Petitioner's station, as men seeking employment, and that your Petitioner hired them at an agreed rate of wages for general work on his stations.

That these Police Detectives, named respectively Edward Lloyd Lewis and John Abergail, remained in your Petitioner's employment about ten weeks, say from the 6th October to the 15th December, 1857, about which latter date they were paid their wages, and discharged.

That on the morning of the 18th June, 1858, after an interval of six months from the discharge of said Detectives as hired servants, your Petitioner and his brother, Francis Newenham Bucknell, being then at the station of Mungyer, were arrested on a warrant issued by Mr. David Forbes, Police Magistrate of this City, at the instance of Mr. Arthur Hunter Palmer, the general superintendent for Mr. Henry Dangar, and were taken by said Detective Lewis and two Policemen, in handcuffs, a distance of seventy-five miles to the Lock-up at Wee Waa, and there confined.

That, on the 22nd June, 1858, your Petitioner with his brother aforesaid, were brought before the Police Magistrate, then sitting at Wee Waa, to answer a charge preferred by the said A. H. Palmer, and supported by said Detective Lewis, for stealing, on the 16th October, 1857, a bullock, alleged to be branded HD conjoined, and alleged to be the property of the said Henry Dangar.

That the case, after a second hearing on the 25th June, was adjourned for a further hearing to the 20th July, 1858, when it was brought before a Bench of Magistrates, consisting of the Police Magistrate, Mr. Andrew Doyle, and Mr. Thomas Dangar,—the last named Magistrate being a nephew of the gentleman whose bullock was alleged to be stolen.

That during the course of the last mentioned hearing of the case, the Police Magistrate, Mr. A. C. S. Rose, conducted himself in a grossly partial, unfair, and inequitable manner, permitting himself to be influenced by the language and personal demeanour of the prosecutor—the said A. H. Palmer—then present, to the injury of your said Petitioner and his brother, and in such wise as to interfere with the due course of justice; and, in particular, that the said A. C. S. Rose, acting as Clerk of the Bench as well as Police Magistrate, refused refused to take down, although urgently requested by your Petitioner, (who was without legal assistance), certain material evidence elicited from Detective Lewis, which bore on your Petitioner's defence; and further, that your Petitioner, under pressure of such unfair proceedings, handed protests, in writing, to the said A. C. S. Rose on two several occasions, which protests your Petitioner believes to be in the office of the Honorable the Attorney General.

That your Petitioner and his brother, after a most unfair hearing, were committed by the Magistrates aforesaid to take their trial on a charge of felony, at the Maitland Assizes, on the 13th instant.

That your Petitioner and his brother were tried before Mr. Justice Dickinson on the 16th instant; that at the close of the case for the Crown, without being called upon for their defence, His Honor directed an acquittal, on the ground that there was no evidence of ownership in the said Henry Dangar; and that your Petitioner and his brother were acquitted accordingly.

That your Petitioner humbly represents to your Honorable House, that he has been put to an expense of one thousand pounds (involving the necessity of collecting and bringing down no less than fourteen witnesses, many of them from a distance of three hundred miles and upwards,) to prove—not the innocence of your Petitioner and his brother, for their defence was not called for—but to prove that the Crown had no case, as decided by His Honor the Judge on the point of law;—which decision on the point of law, altogether irrespective of evidence on the facts, your Petitioner humbly represents to your Honorable House, it was incumbent on Her Majesty's Attorney General, acting as the Grand Jury of the Colony, to have arrived at, at such time, and in such wise, as would have saved your Petitioner and his brother the expense and disgrace of a criminal trial, and the country the expense of an untenable Crown prosecution.

That your Petitioner humbly represents to your Honorable House that the sending of Police Detectives to your Petitioner's station—the false assumption by these Detectives of the character of working men in search of employment—the employment in the capacity of hired servants which said Detectives by such false pretences obtained—the subsequent appearance of these Detectives against your Petitioner and brother as their accusers on a charge of felony eight months after the alleged commission of the crime,—all these concurrent circumstances indicate either the presumption of a special conspiracy against your Petitioner and brother, or the existence of a system of paid police espionage of a demoralizing and dangerous character, intolerable in a British community, and which upon public grounds your Petitioner humbly represents calls for immediate inquiry.

Wherefore your Petitioner humbly solicits your Honorable House for inquiry into the facts and allegations in this Petition contained, and for such redress therein as your Honorable House in its wisdom may deem to be just and reasonable.

And your Petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE CASE OF MESSRS. BUCKNELL.

A. C. S. ROSE, ESQ., J. P. to THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Police Office, Wee Waa,
23 July, 1858.

SIR,

C. W. Bucknell,
and
F. N. Bucknell.
Cattle Stealing.

I do myself the honor to apprise you that I have transmitted, in a separate registered packet, the depositions taken in the case noted in the margin, together with the recognizances of bail, and the witnesses' recognizances; also, a portion of a cheque book and a memorandum book, which were produced in defence by the accused, and were impounded by the Bench, that they might be preserved in their integrity for production at the trial.

Enclosing Medical Certificate

I enclose herewith a medical certificate of the illness of a material witness for the prosecution—John Abigail, a detective constable—who was prevented by this cause from giving his evidence before the Magistrates here.

I have written to the Inspector General, requesting him to bind over this man to appear at the trial.

It is impossible for me to make any further remarks on this case at the present moment, but it will be necessary for me to communicate with you again by the next post, which leaves this place on the 28th instant.

I have, &c.,

THE HONORABLE

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Sydney.

Charles Wentworth Bucknell and Francis Newnham Bucknell—Cattle Stealing.

John Worthington Lloyd, being duly sworn, saith:—I was present at the examination of the witness Edward Lloyd Lewis, in the case of the Messrs. Bucknell, on the 20th of July last, and I am sure he stated that it was not until after his return from Gulligal that he was received into the confidence of the Messrs. Bucknell, and that it was at this time that the HD beast was killed.

Adrian Wentworth Bucknell, being duly sworn, saith:—I was present at the examination of the witness Lewis, in the case of the Messrs. Bucknell, on the 20th July last, and I am sure he stated that he and his mate were absent from Mungyer for eight or ten days immediately after their arrival, as I understood. He stated that he was afterwards sent to Gulligal, and it was after his return that he was admitted into the confidence of the Messrs. Bucknell, and allowed to enter their yard while they were killing, and was considered a "right-un." It was then he said that the beast was killed which he described as branded HD, and states to have been killed on or about the 16th day of October, 1857.

THE information and complaint of Arthur Hunter Palmer, of New England, in the Colony of New South Wales, taken this 29th day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, at Sydney aforesaid, in the Colony aforesaid, before the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace, who upon his oath saith, that from information which he has received, and verily believes to be true, on the 16th day of October, A. D. 1857, at Munguire, in the Colony aforesaid, a bullock, branded HD on the near rump, the property of Henry Dangar, was feloniously stolen, taken, and carried away, and that he, the said Arthur Hunter Palmer, hath just cause to suspect, and doth suspect and verily believe, that Charles William Bucknell and Frank Bucknell, of Munguire, in the Colony aforesaid, did then and there feloniously steal, take, and carry away the same; and thereupon he, this informant, prays that I, the said Justice, may issue my warrant to apprehend the said Charles William and Frank Bucknell, in order that they may be dealt with according to law, and that justice may be done in the premises.

Regina v. Charles Wentworth Bucknell and Francis Newnham Bucknell.

Charles Hopper, Chief Constable of Wee Waa, being duly sworn, saith:—On the 18th of June I apprehended the prisoners at Mungyer, on warrant issued by the Police Magistrate of Sydney, in which they are charged with cattle stealing.

ALFRED C. S. ROSE, P. M.

Edward Lloyd Lewis, Detective Constable of Sydney, being duly sworn, saith:—On or about the 16th day of October last year, I saw the prisoner Frank Bucknell drive in some cattle, amongst which was one bullock branded HD on the near rump—the bullock was a full grown one, and the brand was from six to eight inches long; the same day, in the evening, I saw Charles Bucknell shoot the bullock; the hide was taken off, and Frank Bucknell and one of his gins dragged it away towards his hut; I saw him then cut the brand out, and a piece of the hide near the neck, but whether this had a brand on it I cannot say; he then threw both these parts into the fire; when this was done I was not aware that the HD above-mentioned was Mr. Henry Dangar's brand; I ascertained that it was some six weeks after this, when I went to Bunna Bunna; Frank Bucknell stated that it was one of Mr. Lang's bullocks which his brother Charles had purchased; I know Mr. Lang's brands, and I can swear he never had such a brand as HD amongst them; the man who was with me at the time when this beast was killed is now sick in Sydney hospital; his name is John Abigail; he is a detective constable; he saw the whole transaction; there were also two lads at the yard.

EDWARD LLOYD LEWIS,

ALFRED C. S. ROSE, J. P.

By the Bench: There was a number of blacks around the yard, and we considered that if we attempted to get the brand we should have been killed; I went to Mungyer in September last, together with Abigail, another detective constable; we were there about a month; I do not remember any instance of another man's cattle being killed by the prisoners at Mungyer except the one aforementioned; we were never allowed near the yard excepting when most of the people were away; the prisoners were in the habit of taking numbers of calves away from their mothers, which calves were then branded by them, although the cows were the property of other people; I have seen the prisoner Charles Bucknell repeatedly brand calves belonging to Mr. Robert Fitzgerald, to Mr. Pearse, to Mr. David Ryan, to Mr. Bagot, to Mr. Henry Dangar, and to Mr. Lance.

Henry Wyndham Palmer, being duly sworn, saith:—I am Superintendent of Bunna Bunna Station, the property of Mr. Henry Dangar; the distinguishing brand on the cattle is HD; no one at Bunna Bunna but myself has any right to sell any of these cattle; I never at any time sold any with this brand to the Messrs. Bucknell, of Mungyer; I think it unlikely that any of their cattle bear this brand, or I should have seen or heard of it.

Regina v. Charles Wentworth Bucknell and Francis Newnham Bucknell.

Michael Geale, being duly sworn, saith:—I am now driving a bullock team for a man named Playford; to the best of my remembrance I was at Mungyer in the month of October last; I was in the service of the Messrs. Bucknell; I know the man now present, we called him "Ned" at Mungyer; I very well remember that he was in the yard with us at Mungyer one evening when we were killing a bullock; it must have been some time about the middle of October; Ned pulled at the rope of the gallows together with me; some one let the rope go, and the beast came down; I did not notice at all what brands were on the bullock; I have been in the killing yard at Mungyer half-a-dozen times when the Messrs. Bucknell have been killing; I did not always notice the brands, but I did so twice or thrice, and the beasts they killed were in these instances branded with their own brands; I never saw a bullock branded HD killed in the yard at Mungyer; that is Henry Dangar's brand; it is placed on the near or off rump of his cattle, but on which I do not know; I don't know of any other HD brand about Mungyer; I don't know what became of the hide of the beast above mentioned after it was killed; I never saw any brand cut out of a hide; the hides were always, as far as I know, taken away and salted; the beast killed on this particular evening, when the gallows rope slipped, was a good sized bullock; the color, I believe, was red, but I did not notice the brand.

Before Andrew Doyle, Esq., J. P., A. C. S. Rose, Esq., P. M., and T. G. Dangar, Esq., J. P.

Charles Wentworth Bucknell and Francis Newnham Bucknell—Cattle Stealing.

Arthur Hunter Palmer, being duly sworn, saith:—I am sole manager of the stations of Mr. Henry Dangar in various parts of the Colony. The distinguishing brand of Mr. Henry Dangar's cattle is HD on the near rump; some few are branded HD on the off rump, and some on the neck; I never sold any cattle with any one of these brands to the Messrs. Bucknell of Mungyer, and to the best of my knowledge and belief no one attached to any of Mr. Dangar's stations ever sold any of them to these persons; I should most likely have received some account of the transaction if there had been such a one; I have been managing for Mr. Henry Dangar for eighteen years; for the last two years and a half I have been sole manager; I do not know the accused, excepting by repute; I am aware that last year two detective constables were sent up to their station at Mungyer by the Inspector General of Police, at the instigation of Mr. Robert Fitzgerald and Mr. David Ryan; I believe the reports of the Messrs. Bucknell having been in the habit of stealing cattle to be well founded; we have never sold any HD cattle to Mr. Gideon Lang; I am not aware that there is any other HD brand in this part of the country; I am aware of only one instance of any of the HD cattle being bought out of a pound, and that was by Mr. George Loder; I never heard of any person having cattle who purchased others with another persons brand and who did not put his own brand on them, except when the whole brand was sold; I have heard that a man on the Castlereagh River has claimed cattle branded HD.

A. C. S. ROSE, J. P.

By the prisoner Charles Wentworth Bucknell:—I have heard of many persons who bear the name of cattle stealers; I cannot positively on my oath say whether the Messrs. Bucknell did or did not purchase any HD cattle at the Hanging Rock or Rocky River; but I believe they did not, for I can account for every beast sent to the latter place; I never sent any to, or sold any at the former place; the party who purchased the HD cattle at the the Rocky River is named George Western; he is a storekeeper and butcher, and purchases cattle to kill; I have the weights and descriptions of all the cattle sold to him; I know that there are HD bullocks in teams now on the roads of the Colony; I have repeatedly sold cattle for the Maitland and Sydney markets; it may be possible that some of these cattle have become poor on the purchaser's hands, and that he has sold them again; cattle of Mr. Dangar's have been sent down by you and sold, and most improperly, for I never gave you authority to sell any HD cattle, and I do not believe any one else authorised to do so gave it; I have received from you partial payment for some cattle sold by you down the country.

Henry Wyndham Palmer, Superintendent of Bunna Bunna Station, being duly sworn, saith:—I have twice received remittances of money from the Messrs. Bucknell, of Mungyer, for HD cattle sold by them down the country; the first time, I believe, was in March, 1857, and the second was about the beginning of October, 1857; in the first instance five head were taken down at my request; Mr. Arthur Palmer, then general manager of Mr. Henry Dangar's stations, directed me, about the middle of October, 1857, not to allow the Bucknells to send any more HD cattle down to market; I never had an opportunity of speaking to the Bucknells since that, but I wrote to them a prohibition against taking down the HD cattle; the cattle, it was stated by them, had been sent down and sold; nothing was ever said to me about any beast branded HD having been kept by them for their own use on the station. In October, 1857, I received partial payment for nineteen head of HD cattle taken down by the Bucknells; had they retained any HD beast for their own use I should most certainly have remonstrated with them; they would clearly have had no right to do anything of the kind without my authority. I know of only two bullocks branded HD, the property of Mr. Henry Dangar, having been sold to bullock-drivers on this river; I do not know where these bullocks are now; it is two years since I saw them last.

By the Bench:—I have twice received reports of the accused having killed the HD cattle feloniously; I had reason to believe these reports; they were brought to me by black-fellows; these men know well the brands on Mr. Dangar's cattle; I have often heard it stated in various places that the accused are cattle-stealers, but I could never get sufficient evidence against them on which to take legal proceedings.

Edward Lloyd Lewis, detective constable, being duly sworn, saith:—I can positively swear that the bullock branded HD, killed at Mungyer by the accused, on or about the 16th day of October, 1857, was not a working bullock; the accused never allow a stranger to go to their stockyard when they are killing any beast; a person named Brown, who purchased one of their stations, was not allowed in the yard when they were killing; Charles Bucknell said he would not let him, and he also said in my presence that he would allow no bloody stranger in his yard when he was killing; the accused allowed me in the killing-yard first about the middle of October; I was in it twice before that; the accused killed twice a-week, and on one occasion three times; there were about thirty persons on the station, including blacks; on the two occasions when I was there before the HD bullock was killed by the accused, two beasts were slaughtered, branded with a Jim Crow hat and WB on the near rump, as far as I can remember; the mark on the neck of the HD beast, if there was any, must have been very indistinct or I should have noticed it; at any rate Frank Bucknell cut it out and threw it into the fire; neither Abigail, the other detective constable, nor I could have obtained possession of the brands thus cut out, or of the hide from which they were cut, if we had wished; I received no wages from the Bucknells, but I had my rations and tobacco, and they gave me a pair of boots just before I left; they shewed confidence in me when I had been there some time.

(fifty-three pounds and six shillings,) for HD cattle, sent down to market and sold by them. These cattle, of course, were taken down by the Bucknells for sale. I should most certainly have considered it a felony had they retained one of these cattle, and killed it, even had they afterwards offered payment for it. STATEMENT OF THE ACCUSED.

New South Wales, }
Wee Waa; to wit. }

Francis Newnham Bucknell stands charged before the undersigned, three of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace, in and for the Colony aforesaid, this twentieth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, for that he, the said Francis Newnham Bucknell, on or about the 16th day of October, A.D., 1857, at Mungyer, in the said Colony, did feloniously steal, take, and carry away a bullock branded HD on the near rump, the property of Henry Dangar; and the said charge being read to the said Francis Newnham Bucknell, and the witnesses for the prosecution, Arthur Hunter Palmer, Henry Wyndham Palmer, George Hopper, Michael Geale, and Edward Lloyd Lewis, being severally examined in his presence, the said Francis Newnham Bucknell is now addressed by us as follows:—"Having heard the evidence, do you wish to say anything in answer to the 'charge? You are not obliged to say anything unless you desire to do so; but whatever 'you say will be taken down in writing, and may be given in evidence against you upon 'your trial.' Whereupon the said Francis Newnham Bucknell saith as follows:—On the 15th or 16th of October last year, I brought some cattle from the water-course, among which was a bullock branded HE on the the near rump and 74 on the near shoulder; the cattle branded HE with 74 belonged to a person named Egar, who is now in New Zealand; these cattle were branded altogether at Mungyer, about seven or eight years since; they had other brands on them, with the exception of a few calves running with their mothers; there there were about thirty altogether at that time; my brother purchased the entire brand about two years and a quarter since; there are five or six left now; Charles Martin and George White, and I think Michael Geale, were in the yard when we killed this beast; I believe that Ned and his mate Jack were somewhere about the yard.

Charles Wentworth Bucknell and Francis Newnham Bucknell—Cattle stealing.

George Waller, being duly sworn, saith:—I am now engaged in stock-keeping for the Messrs. Bucknell; I have been with them, off and on, for the last three years; I do not remember any beast having been killed at Mungyer about the middle of October last year; I left Mungyer about the 29th of September, and did not return until the 23rd of October; I was however at Mungyer on the evening of the 9th of October, and I stayed there the next day; the man Ned, now present, was at Mungyer when I was there, on the 9th of October, as well as a man they called Jack; I heard shortly after these men arrived that they were detectives; one beast is generally slaughtered at Mungyer about every ten or twelve days; sometimes two small ones are killed in a week; there are about fifteen persons, whites and blacks, on the station; about two years since Charles Bucknell purchased the HE brand of cattle from a person named Eggar; some of these cattle have been killed at Mungyer, for station purposes; as I said before, I returned to Mungyer on the 23rd of October last year; on the 24th of that month I assisted Frank Bucknell to make a rope out of a hide that was branded HE on the near rump; there might have been another brand on the beast, but I did not notice it; the color of the beast was a strawberry roan; the hide was pegged out on the floor of Frank Bucknell's hut when I returned to Mungyer, on the 23rd of October,

By Francis Newnham Bucknell:—Hippi, an aboriginal, went with me to the Big River in September last year, and returned to Mungyer with me on the 9th of October; he left with me again on the 11th of October, and stayed away until the 23rd of the month; there are only two young blackfellows on the station at Mungyer, one called Hippi, the other Billy; no one could mistake the one for the other.

By Arthur Hunter Palmer, witness for the prosecution:—

George White being duly sworn, saith:—The Messrs. Bucknell have told me that they purchased the HE brand of cattle; the person who sold them also told me the same; I have taken several of these cattle to market, how many I do not know; on the 23rd of October last I took three or four head of HD cattle down to Sydney; I sold them there; the HD is Mr. Henry Dangar's brand; these cattle were taken down by me as Mr. Henry Dangar's property; they were sent to market by the Messrs. Bucknell; I was authorised to take these cattle by Mr. Henry Palmer, of Bunna Bunna; the cattle realized six pounds and five shillings a head; I paid the proceeds of the sale into Messrs. Bucknell's Bank in Sydney.

By the Bench :

Edward Lloyd Lewis, detective constable, being duly sworn, saith:—The bullock killed by the prisoners on or about the 16th day of October last year was of a roan color; I am sure that the blackfellow who brought in this beast with Frank Bucknell was no other than Hippi; it was about the end of September when I arrived at Mungyer; I am quite confident it was before October; Abigail and I each had a double barrelled pistol with us; I swear that White who has given evidence in this case, was not on the Mungyer station—I mean not near the homestead, nor at the yard whilst the beast abovementioned was being killed, nor that evening at all; I can swear that Waller, who has given evidence in the case, was not present on this occasion; I remember that White came up for fat cattle to Mungyer whilst I was there; I believe he only came once during my stay, and he then stayed only a few days; I am sure that the hide of the HD bullock was not made into a rope; I saw a small piece of it a short time after the bullock was killed, but the ragged parts were cut off.

The prisoners are committed to take their trial at the Circuit Court to be holden at Maitland on Monday, the 13th day of September next.—Both prisoners are admitted to Bail.

I certify that John Abigail is suffering from a severe and dangerous form of stricture, which at present is highly irritable. I am decidedly of opinion that a journey of any distance would be attended with much risk to his life, if undertaken at the present time.

John Abigail, in custody on a charge of having committed wilful and corrupt perjury, in the case of Regina v. Charles Wentworth Bucknell, and Francis Newnham Bucknell, for cattle stealing, tried at the Maitland Circuit Court, on the 16th day of September, 1858, before His Honor John Nodes Dickinson, Esq.

Charles Wentworth Bucknell, being sworn, states:—The information now read is true.

Examined for the prosecution by Mr. O'Meagher:—The defendant now present is the person of whom I complain; I was in Court on yesterday, and appeared in my recognizance at the suit of the Queen, to take my trial on a charge of stealing and receiving a bullock alleged to have been the property of Henry Dangar; I was put on my trial before His Honor Judge Dickinson and a jury duly sworn to try the case; I saw the prisoner there; I saw him duly sworn; he swore that a bullock branded HD was killed on or about the 16th October at my station in the Gwydir District; he said it was a roan bullock, branded on the near rump, brand conjoined, and a mark on the near neck; he swore that I killed it; he said yesterday it was the brand of Henry Dangar. That statement of my having stolen and killed a bullock having the brand of Henry Dangar was false; the statement that I shot the bullock on or about the day named, or at any other time, bearing that brand, is also false; there was a bullock killed about that time, the 15th or 16th October; he was a kind of roan strawberry, branded HE on the near rump, and 74 conjoined on the near neck. My brother Frank Newnham Bucknell was present at the time; also, George White and Michael Gale; there were many others about the killing yard at the time; no other bullock was killed on my premises on the 15th or 16th October, but the one referred to branded HE; prisoner was on the station at the time, but I don't think he was present at the killing; the prisoner,
"Ned"

"Ned Lewis," was about the station, I cannot say he was in the yard at the time; no other bullock could have been killed on the premises at that time without my knowledge; the bullock I killed on the occasion referred to, branded HE, was Henry Eager's, of whom I bought a lot; it was at the time my bona fide property; the prisoner swore to the statements which I now swear were false, wilfully, falsely, and corruptly; the prisoner was examined as a witness for the Crown yesterday, at my trial.

By the Bench:—I have been proprietor of the Mungyer station since 1844 or 5; it is assessed at 960 head of cattle; I have several other stations adjoining it; one, besides Mungyer, is my own, on lease from the Government; I should say that on the whole of these stations there are now 6 or 7,000 head of cattle, more than 4,000 of which, I should say, are mine; I do not know that a conviction for felony would entail the loss of these stations; I do not keep a register of cattle killed on my station for consumption; I used to do so; I do not know that such is the practice on other stations or not; I do state in my information that the prisoner is a constable; he did not represent himself as a constable at my station, but he yesterday, on the trial, represented himself as a detective constable; I was not called upon for my defence; I believe the case was dismissed on its merits; by saying the case was, I believe, dismissed on its merits, I mean for want of proof; I think the case was dismissed for two causes—first, that there was no proof the animal was killed at all, and, secondly, that the ownership of the beast alleged to have been killed could not be shown. There were 15 or 20 persons about my place on the day the bullock was killed, some belonging to my own, and some from other stations; there were some black gins of the station present, my brother Frank, Michael Gale, Mrs. Burke, hutkeeper on the station, Mr. Whitehead, and, I think, Charles Martyn, were present on the station at the time I shot the HE bullock; George White, my brother Frank, and Michael Gale were present at the time; there may have been more about—I don't remember; prisoner may have been assisting—I don't recollect; he was in my employment at the time; I swore in my information that the prisoner was a constable, which conclusion I arrived at in consequence of his being represented at the trial yesterday as a detective constable; I don't know whether the prisoner and his mate were present, and assisted to haul up the bullock at the dressing; prisoner came to me about the 6th October; I went to the Bunmi on the 9th or 10th November; he came there to me some time in December; I can't say how long he was in my employ.

By Mr. O'Meagher:—I heard prisoner say he was a detective constable; that was the reason why I styled him a constable in my information.

Cross-examined by the prisoner:—I think you were in the oak scrub on the 16th October; I do not know exactly where you were; I do not remember the bullock falling, through carelessness, when being let down; I can't be positive Charles Martyn was in the yard the time the bullock was killed; it was a good sized bullock; I don't remember Ned Lewis being in the stockyard, nor my calling you a lot of "shapes" for letting the bullock down; I did so on another occasion; I can't say you ground the knives for killing; I remember a bullock slipping from the gallows on the 3rd or 4th November; you and Lewis were, I think, present then.

C. W. BUCKNELL.

Sworn before us, the 17th day of September, 1858.

EDW. D. DAY, J. P.

JOHN BORTHWICK, J. P.

Frank Newnham Bucknell sworn, states:—I am a brother of the last witness; I reside generally at Mungyer; I appeared before Judge Dickinson yesterday at Maitland Circuit Court to answer a charge of felony—cattle stealing; it was for stealing a bullock branded HD, the property, as alleged, of Henry Dangar; I was placed on my trial for that offence yesterday before Judge Dickinson, and a jury; I saw the prisoner then; Charles Wentworth Bucknell was also placed on his trial for the same offence; the prisoner appeared as a witness on that trial for the prosecution; I saw him duly sworn to give evidence; he was afterwards examined by the Attorney General; I heard him swear that Charles Wentworth Bucknell killed a bullock on or about the 15th or 16th of October last the property of Henry Dangar, as he stated; I also heard him swear that I stole the bullock; he swore to all those facts falsely, and, I believe, maliciously; I swear that his evidence in this respect was false and untrue; about the time mentioned a bullock was killed at the Mungyer stockyard; it did not bear the HD brand of Henry Dangar; it bore the brand of HE (conjoined) on near rump, 74 (conjoined) on the neck or shoulder; it was a kind of a roan strawberry; HE, to the best of my belief, represented Henry Eager, who I know had some cattle on my brother's run; I know Eager personally; the HE bullock was shot, I think, by my brother; I was in the yard at the time; a good many parties were present assisting in the dressing of the beast; there were George White, Charles Martyn, myself, and I am not sure whether my brother Charles staid in the yard or not; a man named Ford was either in the yard or about; some blacks were also about; I think Gale was in the yard; I can't say whether prisoner was in or about the yard; he and his mate were on the station somewhere; I am quite positive that the beast in question had not Henry Dangar's brand of HD on it; I never saw my brother, or any one in his behalf, slaughter one of Henry Dangar's brand.

By the Bench:—I have been on the Mungyer station seven or eight years; we have a good many brands; I and my brother were acquitted; four witnesses, I think, were examined for the prosecution, none for the defence; from what I heard the Judge say, I concluded that we were acquitted, because no ownership was proved; I can't say I heard the charge of which we were acquitted was to be brought against us before we were apprehended, in last June, which, I think, was about seven or eight months after the 16th October; there might have have been a register of cattle slaughtered kept at the Mungyer station; I can't say whether there was or not; we slaughter for the use of the station, about a beast a fortnight on an average; it may be rather more; I remember prisoner's arrival at and departure from the station; I cannot say how many beasts were killed while he was there; there were more than one besides the HE bullock killed; I believe there were some after and before; I don't know anything about the bullock killed last before the HE bullock; I don't know whether it was black, red, or brown; I don't know whether I was on the station; while prisoner was on the station I remember a bullock being killed besides the HE one; it was killed after it; my brother Charles was on the station; it was after the HE; it was a fat red bullock, branded WB on the neck or rump, the neck I believe, on the near side, also a Jim Crow hat on the ribs, same side; this beast was killed on the 3rd, 4th, or 5th November; the next bullock killed after this was somewhere at the end of November; he was red or a yellow beast, CB on near rump and square hat on the near ribs, these are the only marks which were on him; the HE bullock was a kind of a roan strawberry, 74 on the neck or shoulder, and the HE on near rump; my brother was not on the station when the 2nd after the HE bullock was killed. In reference to what I said before, I wish to explain, that I am not sure whether any beasts were killed between the time of the prisoner's arrival and the killing of the HE bullock, if there was I was not on the station, I believe.

FRANK N. BUCKNELL.

Sworn before us, the 17th September, 1858.

EDW. D. DAY, J. P.
JOHN BORTHWICK, J. P.

Charles Wentworth Bucknell recalled:—I first heard that the charge of which I have been acquitted was to be brought against me when I was apprehended at Mungyer, in June; I am quite positive the HE bullock was killed on the 15th or 16th of October; he was a roan strawberry bullock, HE and 74 conjoined, as before described; we used to kill for the supply of the station sometimes one beast a week, sometimes one a fortnight, and sometimes one a month; besides the HE bullock, a red WB and Jim Crow bullock was killed on the 4th November; on the 26th October a small heifer was killed; a white heifer was killed after, before I left for Bummi; there might have been a calf killed first after prisoner's arrival; from the time I went to Bummi to the prisoner's arrival my brother was away about six days; he was present when the bullock was killed on the 4th November; a white heifer was killed a day or two before I started for the Bummi; it was branded CB; it was a cock horn bullock which was killed on the 4th November; I was at the station nine or ten days before the men arrived; a beast was killed the second day after I got home; I can't describe it.

By Mr. O'Meagher:—My brother being absent previous to the 16th October brings to my memory the time the beast was killed; my brother was then out collecting cattle; he brought in some, and the HE bullock was one of the mob he brought in, and it was the first bullock killed after the prisoner's arrival at my station; it was killed the day following after being brought in.

L. C.—1

THE COLONIAL SECRETARY to THE HONORABLE SIR W. W. BURTON.

*Colonial Secretary's Office,
Sydney, 12th October, 1857.*

SIR,

The management of the Convict Establishment on Cockatoo Island has for a considerable time been the occasion of much anxiety and frequent embarrassment to the Government.

Some of the difficulties which surround the question have doubtless arisen from the endeavour to combine the two objects of making the island a penal establishment, and at the same time of employing the convicts on executing a great public work.

Had the officers employed on the island cordially co-operated with the Government in endeavouring to accomplish these combined objects, it is believed that they need not have been considered antagonistic; but, unfortunately, from want of a judicious exercise of the powers respectively confided to them, the course adopted by these gentlemen has not unfrequently tended to impede rather than to promote the carrying out the instructions of the Government. Instead of devoting their time and attention to the duties immediately devolving upon them, the public service has been obstructed by their complaints and charges against each other, and the Government is continually appealed to upon points which ought never to have arisen.

The Legislature has, upon more than one occasion, made the conduct of the establishment the subject of investigation, and Boards of Inquiry have been repeatedly appointed by the Executive Government, with a view of obtaining suggestions for remedying a state of things, which, notwithstanding, continues apparently without improvement, so far as a judgment can be formed upon the matter.

In addition to this, public attention has of late been drawn in a marked manner to the establishment; and it would appear to be an imperative duty upon the Government to ascertain, by a thoroughly searching inquiry, whether the system pursued there is so inefficient as is alleged, and whether the officers in charge do or do not faithfully perform their duties.

This inquiry, it is desirable, should also be of the most comprehensive character, in order that the Government may be fully informed upon the subject previous to the adoption by them of those measures which, in the opinion of the Board, will be necessary for correcting any irregularities which may exist in the island, as well as for expediting the completion of the Dry Dock, without interfering with the proper coercion and discipline of the convicts.

From the interest which you took in the question of secondary punishments when you formerly occupied the official position of Judge of the Supreme Court in this Colony, the Government is desirous of availing itself of your services on the present occasion, and I have now the honor to request that you will consent to preside over the investigation which it is proposed shall take place. Should you accede to this application, I beg to state that Captain Ward, R.E., and E. C. Merewether, Esq., Clerk of the Executive Council, will be associated with you as your colleagues in the Board. While the Government in no way desires to limit the scope of the inquiry, it is suggested that the chief points to which your attention should be directed, are, whether the conduct of the officers and servants upon the island has or has not been such as to merit the displeasure of the Government; whether the management of the establishment generally by the Superintendent is in accordance with the regulations laid down for his guidance; whether the penal discipline of the island is maintained and impartially carried out; and whether the regulations, generally, are sufficient for the objects contemplated. If they are not, then what modification of them can be suggested.

If the labors of the Board can, in your opinion, be facilitated by a reference to any documents in my office, or to the Reports of previous Boards of Inquiry, they shall be placed before you; and I shall be happy to co-operate with you in any other manner in which the important inquiry entrusted to you may be furthered.

I have, &c.,

CHARLES COWPER.

INQUIRY INTO THE MANAGEMENT OF COCKATOO ISLAND.

REPORT.

THE BOARD OF INQUIRY into the Management of Cockatoo Island, to THE HONORABLE
THE PRINCIPAL SECRETARY, reporting the result of their investigation.

SIR,

In compliance with the desire expressed in your letter to our President, dated the 12th October, 1857, we at once undertook and entered upon the inquiry committed to us respecting the management of the Convict Establishment at Cockatoo Island.

We visited the island upon two occasions, and personally inspected the works in progress,—the mess-room, wards, cook-room, dormitories, and cells, and also the gardens. We inspected the convicts in their gangs, inquired into their complaints, examined the office-books, and several witnesses, and we have devoted much time and attention to the subject.

For, long as will doubtless appear the time between the dates of your letter and of this, no delay has been allowed which, with a due sense of the importance of the inquiry committed to us, could have been avoided; but such very serious accusations have been brought before us by several persons, impugning the management of the penal discipline of the convicts by the present Superintendent, and involving so many points for our consideration, that we could not deem any but the most searching investigation of every such accusation would be satisfactory to the Government.

We have accordingly received the statements of every person who has appeared in support of the charges brought against the Superintendent, and where those charges have not rested on the personal knowledge of the party bringing them forward, we have examined; and that very critically, as will be apparent to you on reference to the minutes of evidence taken, every person who has been named to us as capable, upon fair and established principles, of sustaining the charges.

This course has necessarily involved frequent adjournments of our Board, in order to give parties the opportunity of attending.

The important interests also of the Superintendent, his character and position, demanded that our proceedings should be conducted with a due regard to his convenience, and especially that sufficient time should be allowed to him to prepare his answer to such of the matters brought before us as in our opinion required explanation or answer.

In all the proceedings the Superintendent was, on his application, assisted by his legal adviser, and it is satisfactory to us to feel assured, as we do, that whilst every facility has been afforded by us to parties accusing him to prove their allegations, the utmost latitude has been given to the Superintendent and his legal adviser in conducting and preparing his defence.

The management of an establishment like that at Cockatoo Island, where the two objects of penal discipline and the execution of a great public work are combined and carried out by two independent departments, entertaining opposite views of their relative duties, and each inclined to arrogate superiority, might, we think, at the inception have produced the inconveniences to the public service which have been so frequently brought to the notice of the Government, and have occasioned so much public concern. We concur, however, in your opinion, that such a state of things ought not to have been, and further that their continuance ought not to have been so long permitted to be, as they have been, a continual source of annoyance and complaint.

We are decidedly of opinion that no collision of views ought to be entertained by the heads of the respective departments, and that there is not, and really ought not to be, any incompatibility in combining the two objects of penal discipline and employment of the convicts on the public works under an independent department.

The Superintendent of Convicts may perfectly discharge his duties in all that concerns the safe keeping, discipline, and good order of the convicts; and the Civil Engineer is responsible for their labor being properly applied when duly assigned over to him and his overseers, and we see no reason, except such as arises from unrestrained infirmity of temper, or arbitrary assumption of undue authority or interference, on either part, which should cause them to clash in the conduct of their separate duties.

Such, notwithstanding the papers laid before us by your command, sufficiently shew to have taken place, and to have given rise to the frequent intervention of Government.

In so far as these matters are concerned, we are happy in being able to state that this very reprehensible state of things, by which doubtless the progress of the dock and other works has been materially impeded, no longer exists.

Captain Mann, whose zeal and assiduity we think to be worthy of every commendation, and who has unquestionably had serious difficulties to contend with, after enumerating various causes of complaint which formerly existed, and especially of "men having been taken off the works at a critical period," of which he complained to the Government, and which was investigated and reported upon by a Board, adds, "nothing has occurred of a like character since that report."

Several persons have presented themselves before the Board, avowing themselves to be the authors of various letters and papers referring to the management of the island, published in the Empire newspaper, on several dates between the 26th September and the 7th of October, in the last year. The chief of these were Mr. Parkes, the proprietor of the Empire; Mr. Thomas, who was the Resident Engineer on Cockatoo Island, under Captain Mann, for nearly four years, and the Reverend John Pendrill, who was one of the Chaplains from July, 1856, to the end of March, 1857; Mr. Richard Thompson, formerly Reporter to the Sydney Morning Herald, also attended the Board as the author of a letter which appeared in the Empire newspaper of the 6th October; and Mr. Christopher Murray, as a witness to several of the facts stated by the before mentioned persons, himself also the writer of a letter in the Empire newspaper of the 7th October.

Mr. Parkes stated, that he admitted the several letters above-mentioned into the Empire newspaper on the dates mentioned, and also others before and subsequently, "on ascertaining who were the writers, and, in the greater number of instances, on having first a personal interview with them;" and, with the permission of those writers, Mr. Parkes communicated their names to the Board, as Charles Robertson, senior, Bleak Cottage, opposite Cockatoo Island, the Reverend John Pendrill, Mr. J. H. Thomas, Mr. Richard Thompson, and Mr. Christopher Murray, who was formerly one of the boat's crew, or a constable on Cockatoo Island.

Mr. Parkes also stated, that "numerous applications or representations had reached him throughout a series of years, both as Editor of a public journal and as a Member of the old Legislative Council and a Member of the Legislative Assembly," and he produced three letters as instances of such communications, the two first from a person who had been formerly a convict on the island, and having been Sub-Editor to the Sydney Morning Herald, was slightly known to him, now holding a ticket-of-leave at Bathurst, the other from a person of the same class, who was not personally known to him, holding a ticket-of-leave at Drayton, Darling Downs.

Mr. Parkes having been called upon to afford evidence "concerning the facts particularly referred to in the leading article of the Empire of the 3rd October," stated, in general terms, that, according to his view, "the island is under very improper management; that the Superintendent, who has the general management of the island, does not possess the qualities that are absolutely requisite in the conduct of a great penal establishment exclusively for the punishment and reformation of criminals;" but he produced no fact within his own personal knowledge, excepting one, which he detailed to the Board, in support of the statements he had placed before the public.

It was as follows, in Mr. Parkes' words:—"I will state how I first became acquainted with Mr. Ormsby. Some years ago, I should think twelve years ago—it may perhaps be more—I held a subordinate situation in the Custom House, and was entrusted with the charge

"charge of a ship, in the capacity I then filled. On that occasion I saw Mr. Ormsby for the first time. He came to visit the captain of the ship; he dined there, and remained, as far as my recollection serves me, till near midnight; and I had an opportunity of seeing that he was indulging in wine or spirits, or both, nearly the whole of the time. Towards midnight, or between the hours of eleven and twelve, a police boat, manned by four hands, came to take Mr. Ormsby home. As I have already stated, I then filled a very subordinate situation; but the thought that came into my mind was, that if I were the Governor Mr. Ormsby should not be Superintendent of that island five minutes longer. From that time to this I have never had any personal acquaintance with Mr. Ormsby, but I have been in a position to hear much concerning him, and have had opportunities of observing his conduct; for I habituate myself to observing the conduct of everybody who occupies a public position; and what I have seen of Mr. Ormsby, leads me to the impression that he is one of the most completely unfit men to fill the situation that could be found."

In justification of an article in the Empire of the 3rd October, of which Mr. Parkes avowed himself the writer, and in which there is this sentence,—“If illiteracy, the most confined views on social questions, a self-indulgent disposition, ungovernable passions, and violent language, were qualities desirable in the superintendence of a penal establishment, then Mr. Ormsby would be the very model of a gaoler.” Mr. Parkes stated that “in the month of July, or early in August last, the present dispenser of Cockatoo Island, Mr. J. F. Peers, called upon him, and asked his advice how he should act with reference to Mr. Ormsby’s conduct towards him, on a particular day, a little previous, on which occasion Mr. Ormsby called him a ‘damned liar, a damned scoundrel, and a damned pimp;’” and Mr. Parkes handed in the original letter of Dr. West, of Mr. John Duff, and of Mr. Ormsby; Vide Appendix D. the two former to prove the fact of the use of improper language towards Peers, the last as shewing Mr. Ormsby’s illiteracy.

As to other facts in the leading article above referred to, Mr. Parkes furnished the Board with the names of several persons, his informants, whom he desired should be examined. Those whose attendance could be obtained have been critically and carefully examined; and we will now inform you of the several conclusions to which these examinations have led.

The first charge inquired into was that of an alleged desecration of the Lord’s Day on Sunday, the 20th of September last. It purported to have been made by the father of a family, and was in the following terms:—“On Sunday last myself and family were at afternoon prayers, when at a distance of nearly a quarter of a mile we were disturbed by a frightful yelling, and hallooing. On going outside my impression was that Cockatoo Island was in a state of mutiny; but this suspicion was removed on there being no further noise. On calm evenings I hear most distinctly singing and choruses until a late hour, certainly late for such a place.

“I am disposed to think that such breaches of discipline occur only in the absence of the Head Gaoler, for it is my impression did he permit such occurrences to take place on the island during his presence, that he is anything but a proper person to have charge of a place intended for reformation.”

Mr. Parkes gave the name of the person who furnished him with that piece of information as “Charles Robertson, Senr., Bleak Cottage, opposite Cockatoo Island.” We have not obtained the evidence of this person, Mr. Parkes “not having been able to communicate with him,” and our endeavour to find him having failed, the answer to our inquiry being that “no such person or address is known;” but we have examined every person capable of giving us information on the subject, and the result of our inquiry is, that there has been singing on the Lord’s Day, though not during hours appropriated to Divine Worship, as well as on other days during leisure hours, but it has not been shewn to have been of so disorderly a character as to amount to a desecration of the sacred day.

We refer on this point to the evidence of the Revd. Mr. Pendrill, the Revd. Mr. Kenyon, the Revd. Mr. Agnew, Mr. Peers, and Mr. Easton.

Mr. Thomas, indeed, who resided on the island nearly four years in the capacity of a Civil Engineer, although he says he was not on the island on the particular Sunday alluded to, speaks to “great noise in the camp, hallooing, and so forth, in fact almost every Sunday, similar to that referred to in this charge, during the whole four years he was on the island, generally in the afternoon or evening when they were all mustered, and in the wards as well.”

No. 31.

In his second examination, on the part of Mr. Ormsby, he says that "he did not complain of those noises."

Mr. Ormsby's explanation of the particular instance alluded to is contained in his letter to the Visiting Magistrate, 8th October, 1857, as follows,—“The disturbance herein mentioned arose as follows,—One old man in the yard seized a belt from another, who was swinging it about, and run away with it; he was chased by the party from whom he took the belt, and the rest of the prisoners laughed to see two old men running one after the other. There was no frightful yelling or hallooing, as stated; the noise did not continue one minute.” With respect to the singing and choruses—at eight o'clock the men are all in bed, and from that hour they are not allowed to make the least noise.”

In that explanation Mr. Ormsby is fully borne out by Mr. Peers, the dispenser.

The next charge inquired into was one brought by the Revd. Mr. Pendrill, one of Mr. Parkes' informants, who avowed himself as the writer of a letter in the Empire newspaper, dated 2nd October, signed “Witness,”—namely, as to “the police having often applied for the regulations of Government, but not having been able to obtain them, though as frequently promised;” and “as to Gleadall, a constable on the establishment, having been dismissed on a charge of drunkenness, although four or five persons swore that he was not drunk, and the general impression amongst the police at the time that he was really discharged because he had ventured to insist on seeing the regulations, and that the drunkenness alleged was merely a pretext for punishing for a reasonable request not punishable in law.”

It is established by the evidence, without a doubt, that the Inspector and other officers of the police have applied for and have been refused a copy of the regulations, and that, we think, upon very improper grounds. Gleadall was one who applied and was so refused.

Inspector Dunning,
Nos. 5, 104, 147-159,
337 to the end.

Mr. C. Murray.

C pt. M'Levie, No. 71.

Inspector Dunning states the same fact, as well as Christopher Murray; and we are concerned to find not only the Superintendent but the then Visiting Magistrate also, according to this evidence, evading the very proper request; and that the latter said in answer,—“Your duty is to obey orders,” or “the regulations are, you are to obey all lawful orders,” or “you have an Inspector or Sergeant to go to;” thus passing by the superior orders of the Government comprised in the regulations, and venturing to substitute for them such orders as the police should from time to time receive from the Superintendent.

Regulations of 1855.
Regulations of 1850.

The fact is, that a change had been made in the instructions in placing the police under the Visiting Magistrate, instead of, as before, under the Superintendent; and the refusal to furnish a copy of the regulations to the Inspector of Police, when such were demanded, we consider to have been very detrimental to the public service and highly censurable.

The police were, by those regulations, in a great degree rendered independent of the island authorities, and they were required to perform duties which have been wholly neglected, it is not too much to say in consequence of the withholding from them the regulations. We refer particularly to the duties of preventing persons from landing without the proper permission, of searching boats landing at the island, and the prevention of spirits and other articles being landed from the boats without the requisite authority.

So, as to the drilling, discipline, and frequent inspection of the Police Force, which was deemed by the Government to be essential to their effectiveness; the former seems to have been put an end to by the Superintendent taking it into his own hands, and discouraging it for the future.

Finally, on this point the police have not done their duty in many respects; and, we should say they have been led into that neglect—first, by not having the regulations to refer to as occasion should occur; and, secondly, by being employed in the boat on private purposes in a manner never contemplated by the Government, and so rendering a relaxation or neglect of their proper duties a necessary consequence.

Whether Gleadall was dismissed in reality as a troublesome person, who had insisted upon prosecuting persons for disorderly conduct, whom the Superintendent did not desire should be prosecuted, and had demanded a copy of the regulations which the Superintendent chose to withhold, or for drunkenness, involves other and more grave considerations; since, in the former case, the Reverend Mr. Kenyon must have conspired with Mr. Ormsby to bring bring a false charge, and thereby to impose upon Mr. North, and the latter must have been imposed on to give a false judgment, a conclusion to which we could not come but upon clear and unexceptionable evidence, and certainly not upon the vague suspicion of Inspector Dunning, who, because he sees Mr. Ormsby and Mr. Kenyon talking together, suspects that Mr. Ormsby is urging Mr. Kenyon to prosecute. We have perused the depositions taken before Mr. North, and have no doubt whatever of the truth of the charge against Gleadall, and, consequently, of the propriety of his dismissal.

It was next insinuated, rather than directly alleged, that prisoners have been arbitrarily and improperly sentenced to the cells for "insolence" (an undefined offence) to the Superintendent or Overseers, and that the prisoners are treated in a manner to provoke insolence. Mr. Thomas,
Nos. 53, 59.

It is sufficient to say, as to this charge, that no complaint was made to us by the convicts when, upon two occasions, we visited Cockatoo Island, and invited the expression of their complaints, if any existed; that, although there were a few other causes of dissatisfaction amongst them, no person on the establishment was charged with arbitrary, or overbearing, or unjust, or insolent behaviour, towards them; and no complaint was made of any one having been unjustly sentenced to the cells.

Neither was evidence brought before us of any such instance.

We quote the evidence of Mr. Brown, the Deputy Superintendent, on the subject. He says—"I have known prisoners to be confined to the cells till the Visiting Magistrate came, for insolence to the Superintendent, myself, and others. The Visiting Magistrate came once a-week, and inquired into the cases. I have known, on one or two occasions, a man confined for five days before the Visiting Magistrate saw him, and decided his case. This occurred in more than one instance. When men have been so confined, they have been reported next morning to the Visiting Magistrate. I have known of no instance of overbearing conduct by the Superintendent or officers to the prisoners, and all insolence to the officers has been unprovoked."

An instance was indeed alleged by Mr. Pendrill to have occurred in the case of a Chinaman, named Tan, and we inquired minutely into the circumstances of it. "Tan was stated to have been desirous of making some complaint to the Visiting Magistrate, and requested that the interpreter might be sent to the island. Each week he was promised that he should come, but weeks passed away, and he came not. At last the poor man lost all patience, and, in the fullness of his disappointment, he threw down his tools, exclaiming, 'Interpreter no come—me no work.'"

Mr. Ormsby's explanation of this case is, that "he was sent to the cells for refusing to work; he desired to make a complaint, and an interpreter was sent for. He made his complaint to the Visiting Magistrate, who investigated it on the 22nd April, 1857. His complaint was that he was convicted of an offence he was not guilty of, and that his former master, Mr. Sandeman, owed him money. He had asked for an interpreter several times before one was obtained, and before he was confined in the cells."

Mr. Thomas' evidence shows how greatly the facts of this man's case have been perverted. "The man was at work in a gang, and had been so at work until the middle of the day, when he threw down his pick, saying something in Chinese," which Mr. Thomas could not understand, and walked away. Mr. Thomas positively denies that he said the words in English, "No interpreter come—me no work."

Mr. Thomas,
Nos. 60-76.

Mr. Brown's evidence is quite conclusive. He says—"I remember Tan refusing to work on three occasions; once because a man at the hand-cart would not pull; on another occasion when other Chinamen were leaving the island, with whom he wished to go. He asked for an interpreter. I took him to the Superintendent, who satisfied him that he should see the interpreter, and he went to work. On the third occasion he declined to work, because he was not allowed to go away with four other Chinamen who had been sent on the island with him."

We are of opinion that there is no reason for imputing his confinement to the cells as "on questionable grounds."

Next, Mr. Pendrill charges, that "when prisoners are consigned to the cells, the Superintendent refuses to allow them to attend Divine Service on the Sabbath," and in his evidence he states an instance in which they were so refused.

This refusal does not appear to have been the unauthorised act of Mr. Ormsby; but we think the restriction an unnecessary one, and that men in the cells ought to be permitted to attend Divine Service, under arrangements which might easily be made for their security and non-intercourse with the other prisoners.

It was next stated that "the prisoners complain that their letters are read aloud in the office, and made a matter of jest, and that the contents of their letters to their friends are thus made known to their fellow prisoners."

Mr. Ormsby's answer on this point is unsatisfactory.

Mr. Thomas,
Nos. 79-90.

We have no doubt of the truth of that complaint, and Mr. Thomas states an instance of very reprehensible behaviour of the Superintendent respecting a letter of a convict which was read aloud in the office, and a laugh raised by its contents.

A very grave accusation is next brought by Mr. Pendrill, upon a statement apparently made to himself "by one of the prisoners, that a case of 'mortal sin' had been committed in one of the wards; that if he brought it under the notice of the authorities he would be condemned to the cells; that a case had previously occurred, and the offender had not been punished, though the facts were known to the administration."

We have inquired very strictly into this matter, and find that no portion of the statement is borne out by the evidence. We are of opinion—first, that there existed no ground whatever for the pretended apprehension of the supposed informant of Mr. Pendrill; secondly, that no case of the nature stated was ever known to the administration in which the offender was not brought before the Visiting Magistrate and punished; and, lastly, that there is no ground or pretence whatever for imputing to the Superintendent or Visiting Magistrate any remissness, negligence, or indifference, on so disgraceful a subject; on the contrary, the evidence, particularly that of Mr. Brown, the Deputy Superintendent, warrants us in saying that Mr. Ormsby has been particularly vigilant and careful in separating suspected persons, in placing young persons especially out of reach of contamination in separate dormitories, and we have found especial reason, after a very searching inquiry, to commend his conduct in this respect.

Mr. Pendrill's statement rests upon what he was told by a prisoner, whose name he did not give to the Board, although he handed in a list of other persons whom he desired should be called in support of other of his statements.

Mr. Thomas was examined on this point, and he states that he had heard from people on the island of such a charge having been made with reference to two men who absconded and concealed themselves—that they did so for the purpose of committing an unnatural offence.

We have thus a clue to the case alluded to, and the real facts appear in the evidence of Peers, the dispenser. It was that of two persons named Clarke and Roberts, the former aged about 27, the latter about 17; they absented themselves for about twenty-four hours, as was supposed for the purpose of making their escape. When taken, Roberts was so ill, from exposure to wet and cold, that it was necessary to take him into the hospital, where he remained "for a month or two at least." His condition was such that he could not be punished, and for that reason the other prisoner was exempted also.

Mr. Peers, No. 16.

Peers says, in answer to a question, "Do you know of any reason for supposing that they concealed themselves for the purpose of committing a nameless offence? No, indeed I do not."

Mr. Easton,
Nos. 211-214.

Easton speaks of the case by rumour only.

Mr. Brown, Assistant Superintendent, says,—“I remember the circumstance of two men concealing themselves on the island, but there was no charge preferred against them, except that of hiding to effect an escape; no other charge was hinted against them by any one at that time.” Mr. Brown's evidence is so conclusive upon the general charge brought against the Superintendent of gross neglect, almost amounting to connivance in offences of this nature, that we request your particular attention to it.

He says,—“I remember one circumstance of suspicion of an unnatural offence. Unlocking the wards one morning, it was reported to me that one man had gone into another's berth. The case was reported to the Superintendent, and by him to the Visiting Magistrate, and the charge dismissed, as without foundation.”

“It was never reported to me during my stay on the island of such an offence having been committed in the wards, or elsewhere.”

“There

" There was a case of suspicion of unnatural offence occurred about a year ago, arising from a man approaching another in one of the wards and laying his hand upon him; the man who approached the other was knocked down by him. The case was reported to me, and by me to the Superintendent, and by him to the Visiting Magistrate, who dealt with it, and punished the man by imprisonment in the cells. That man has ever since been made to sleep in a separate cell.

" This is the only case I recollect of any suspicion of an unnatural offence. The separate dormitories seen by the Board on their visit are used for young lads and feeble old men. There are four persons now using them, the Chinaman Tan, one old man, and two young men under twenty years of age.

" I have never known a man punished for reporting another for an unnatural offence, and I have never known a case of unnatural offence occurring, and it is therefore not true that such a case has occurred, and the man not punished."

Next, Mr. Pendrill charged, that " A certain party was accused of appropriating the rations of the prisoners; that the facts could not be denied; and the defence was that the prisoners were consenting to the appropriation. That to obtain this consent the votes of the prisoners were canvassed. They were told that it was 'a Government question,' and I understood that they were, by way of retaliation for their opposition, placed in the cells on the first opportunity." It was not without much hesitation, and once refusing to answer the question of the Board, that Mr. Pendrill at length stated that the person alluded to as "a certain party" was the Superintendent.

The case had been stated to him by a prisoner, not named, under confinement, and in irons, as a ringleader; on one occasion, when a number of prisoners had refused to work, "I was (he said) put in unjustly, because the Superintendent has a down upon me." On subsequent inquiry this prisoner was released as not having been concerned in the transaction. He was Mr. Pendrill's authority.

Several points are involved in this accusation. First, whether the Superintendent did upon any occasion appropriate rations of the prisoners to his own use.

Secondly, whether the prisoners were canvassed on the subject, and their consent taken to its appropriation.

Thirdly, whether any prisoner was punished by way of retaliation for his opposition to that course.

There are two circumstances stated in the evidence which have given rise to this part of the charge.

First, that the refuse homminy left after the men's meals has been applied to the feeding the poultry of the Superintendent, and other free persons on the island; and, secondly, that a piece of good meat was found among the refuse.

The application of the refuse homminy to such purposes was brought to the notice of the Visiting Magistrate then, H. H. Browne, Esq., so long since as 1849, who directed, by a written order, that the refuse homminy should be thrown away, and this gentleman says, that the usual way of doing this was, throwing it into the water at the back of the kitchen on the north side.

It appears to have been accordingly so disposed of for about two years, when the very proper order of the Magistrate came to be disregarded, and the homminy was again distributed amongst the free persons, as before.

Mr. Ormsby remarks in his answer, that the poultry, "if driven up to the place where it was thrown away, might have taken it," meaning, that is, without infringing the order of Mr. Browne; but we apprehend not, for it was thrown into the water, and if the fowls could have got at it, there would not have been any necessity for what certainly took place—an abandonment of the order—and the re-distribution of the homminy, with the consent, or at the request of the prisoners.

In February, 1857, however, this appropriation caused discontent amongst the prisoners, who complained that the homminy was badly boiled by the cooks, in order that it might be rejected and given to the Superintendent's fowls. Mr. North, the Visiting Magistrate, inquired into the matter, and found the homminy bad, but stated that he had no reason to suspect it had been wilfully spoiled. Mr. North ordered it to be thrown into the sea, to avoid suspicion for the future.

Mr. Ormsby's statement, vide Appendix E.

Mr. North's evidence.

There

There were two other instances alleged of wrongful dealing with the rations. First, a piece of good beef cooked was found in the refuse basket, and brought to notice by a prisoner attached to the kitchen. How it came there could not be ascertained. Our own opinion, formed on the evidence on that fact of the case, is, that it was designedly put there by some person, in order to form the foundation for the charge subsequently made, and most likely was placed there by the person who pointed it out, or by some other with his knowledge.

It is not shewn in any way that Mr. Ormsby was connected with the transaction.

The other instance was, the underdone ration of a Chinaman being also found in the refuse basket.

The account given by Mr. Brown of all these transactions is doubtless correct, and we refer you to it as such accordingly. He says, "the sweepings up after prisoners' meals of the homminy and meat used to be distributed among free officers for their fowls."

See also Mr. Peers,
Nos. 41-55.

Mr. North.

"Henry East once charged the Superintendent with having appropriated prisoners' rations; his charge was that a piece of good meat was put amongst the sweepings for the Superintendent's use. It was brought by the Superintendent before the Visiting Magistrate, and as he could not substantiate the charge, he was punished by imprisonment to cells. Up to this time (i. e. February, 1857,) the prisoners gave their consent to the sweepings being distributed among free officers, and had helped to collect them."

"I am not aware of any canvassing for votes having occurred as to whether the refuse should be so applied. I know Captain Browne was Visiting Magistrate in 1849, and he ordered the sweepings to be thrown away, and that order was acted upon for about two years. The order was never relaxed by any Magistrate. The infringement of it occurred from the spontaneous wish of the prisoners, communicated to the Superintendent, that the refuse should not be wasted. It then began, by the Superintendent's order, to be distributed among the free officers, till about nine months ago, when the charge before stated about the piece of meat was made, since then the refuse has been thrown into deep water, and is the practice now. The piece of meat found among the refuse, before referred to, was good meat, about two pounds weight, cooked."

"On another occasion the meat of some Chinaman was underdone, and taken by him to the overseer of the cook house, who changed it for his own. The overseer kept this meat till the morning, when, it having turned bad, he flung it into the refuse."

"The prisoners when they sent to the Superintendent that they wished the refuse to be distributed were unanimous, as far as I am aware."

Upon this charge, then, we find that the Superintendent did, of his own authority and with the consent of the prisoners, without bringing the circumstance to the notice of the Visiting Magistrate, set aside and disregard the very proper order of Mr. Browne, and did permit a re-distribution of the refuse to take place, during the whole period about 1851 and 1857.

The abuse and the suspicion attaching to such a course, one also by which he himself profited, as well as others, should have led to an opposite conduct in the Superintendent, and to a strict adherence to an order which he was bound to carry into effect.

We think his setting aside that order was highly censurable, and that his doing so upon the wish or consent of the prisoners, formed not the least exceptionable part of the proceeding.

There is no evidence to connect him with that consent as inviting or canvassing for it. Such may, doubtless, have been the representation of some of the prisoners, and there may have been pretences set up of the kind with Mr. Ormsby's knowledge, but it must have been very acceptable to him, or he would not have taken upon himself so readily to act upon it.

As to the last point in the charge, we find no evidence that any prisoner was ever punished by way of retaliation for refusing to vote for the appropriation. Mr. Thomas negatives the supposition of there having been any dissent among the prisoners on the question.

It was next alleged that "the whole administration of the island is partial and unjust; that some, the administration unduly favor, on others it has a perpetual, down,"— that

that "great criminals are released by undue influence, whilst lesser criminals wanting this "pay the full amount of their sentences." And the case of a prisoner known as "Old Fox," (who was sentenced to fifteen years for murder, but obtained his release before he had suffered one-fifth of his sentence,) was referred to as an instance of this.

Mr. Brown, Assistant Superintendent, says, upon this point,—“I have no reason to believe that Mr. Ormsby's administration has been partial or unjust, or that he has any "favorites, or has a 'down' upon any one.”

“The several subordinate situations upon the penal establishment are vested in the "Superintendent. I have never known favor shown in the exercise of that power.”

With respect to this particular case of "Old Fox"—he was discharged by order of the Governor General, on the recommendation of the Classification Board, and Mr. Ormsby produced to us the letter of the Colonial Secretary, communicating the decision of No. 56-61. the Government.

The next charge made by Mr. Pendrill is two-fold, namely: First, that "the Parliament provides a boat for the use of the officers of the establishment, or rather, of the "sum placed on the estimates for the police at Cockatoo, the pay of four men is set apart "for a boat's crew. They appear on the estimates as policemen, but really are boatmen, "as they do no police duty. The Superintendent claims the exclusive control of this boat "and crew, and endeavors, by making the use of it as uncomfortable and impracticable as possible to others, to secure, as far as possible, the monopoly of it for himself and family—it is "used by him for picnics, pleasure parties, and other non-official purposes, not only by day but "by night. In order to do this and secure the good-will of the crew, they are permitted indulgences not allowed to the other police, and the use of the boat is denied to those entitled to "use it, to the prejudice of the public service." Secondly, that "the Chaplains have been "obliged, frequently, to find their way across the bush on foot, and then be ferried over in "the guard-boat to the island, because the use of the boat was withheld. On one occasion "the Chaplains of the Church of Rome and of the Church of England were sent off from "the island in the company of a convict in irons, in an old guard-boat scarcely large "enough to hold them, with a stiff breeze blowing, while the proper boat was sent on a pleasure "party, consisting of the Superintendent's family or friends."

It is perfectly true that the Superintendent does claim the control over the boat and the crew, imputed in the first part of this charge, and has largely used the boat for his own private purposes, for picnics, for pleasure parties, for fishing excursions, and other non-official purposes, not only by day but by night.

It is perfectly true, also, that the Chaplains of the Churches of Rome and of England have been put to the inconvenience complained of in the second part of the charge, and that, in one instance, the proper boat, in which they should have been taken from the island to the main, was then at the island, but was refused to them, and shortly after despatched on a picnic excursion.

Mr. Ormsby's answer to these charges must be left to the consideration of the Executive Government, who will best decide whether he was warranted by their authority in the use he has made of the boat.

Mr. Thomas, who was for four years on the island, attached to the department of the Civil Engineer, says,—“The officers of the Engineer's Department could never have the use "of it; I have been down to the boat and wanted to go to Sydney, and have been refused by "the coxswain.” Mr. Thomas,
No. 124.

“I have applied to the Superintendent, and he has told me that the boat belonged to "his department, and he would not allow any one else to use it.” No. 125.

“This has occurred since these new regulations have been in force. I have been "refused half a dozen times since these regulations have been in force.” Nos. 126, 127, 128.

“Not on the plea that it was required for the public service—it has been going to "to town with no one in it but the crew. Upon one particular occasion Mr. Kenyon, the "Roman Catholic Chaplain, was going to town; I went down to the wharf, and was going "into the boat when they refused to go off with the boat and to take me to town. They "said I had no right to the boat.” See also the evidence of the Rev. Mr.
Kenyon on this point, Nos. 34-38.

“This occurrence was subsequent to the promulgation of the rules.”

Mr.

- No. 130. Mr. Thomas says he has "seen the boat used for parties of pleasure many times; he has "seen it go away with stores up Lane Cove, on one occasion up to Five Dock, and on 131. "others to various parts of the harbour." He says—"I should say from twenty to thirty times 132. "I have seen the boat come back from pleasuring. On those occasions Mr. Ormsby or "some of his family were in the boat."
- 134, 135, 136. "I have known it to be away till ten o'clock at night; and it has gone away at nine "or ten in the morning on parties of pleasure"—"frequently."
136. "I have even known it later than twelve—as late as one o'clock; and I have even 137. "known it to be away all night, and to come home early in the morning with him."
138. "On those occasions, when it has returned so very late at night, or early in the "morning, it has been employed in these parties of pleasure or picnics."
139. "When Mr. Ormsby was one of the company."
- "And this has occurred so often as twenty or thirty times while I was there. I will "take one occasion when he went away up Lane Cove; when Mr. Pendrill, the clergyman, "came down to the boat, the Inspector, Mr. Dunning, told him that the boat was being "repaired. I know that for a fact, for I was on the wharf, and Mr. Dunning told me he "had to tell Mr. Pendrill that story."
140. "I did not hear him tell him, but Mr. Dunning told me that he had to tell him that "as an excuse. Mr. Pendrill said to me 'this boat is being repaired,' and I said 'no, I have "seen it go up Lane Cove.'"
- Nos. 140, 156-158. We beg to refer further to the evidence of this witness on this point, as in the margin, for other instances of similar employment of the boat.
- The use of the boat for private purposes, as for picnics, parties of pleasure, going to Inspector Dunning, Sydney to the theatre, and to evening parties, is also spoken to by Dunning—see his evidence. Nos. 161-202, 168. He says farther—"On several occasions when the boat has had no other duty to do, when "there has been no officer coming to the island, advantage has been taken of the day to send "the boat's crew to cut wood, or to fish."
- Nos. 169 to 171, 172, 173. There was a net bought by subscription of Mr. Ormsby and others, the free persons on the island, amongst whom were the police, and the boat was used to go fishing with this net, manned with the crew and other parties belonging to the police, "at first twice a week, "afterwards once a week"—the fish were divided on one occasion according to the shares in 175. the net; afterwards the boat's crew that went fishing took their shares, and the remainder 177. the Superintendent got—"ultimately the net was sold."
- 178-186. "Two or three times the boat went to cut wood whilst I have been on the island;" "the boat's crew went in the boat for that purpose." "The wood was for poles and trellis "work for the vines in Mr. Ormsby's garden."
206. The visitors' boat has been absent all night. "On several occasions Mr. Ormsby has 208. "gone to balls, both at Balmain and Sydney, and the boat has been all night away and 209. "returned in the morning. That has not been a frequent occurrence."
- 210, 211, 212, 215, 216, 219. He says "he has known the visitors' boat carry away fowls from the island, and "baskets of cabbages brought to the boat by the Superintendent's convict servants; they "were put into the boat with instructions to the coxswain what to do with them."
- Christopher Murray's evidence as to the employment of the boat for private purposes is to the same effect. He says—"Two Government boats have gone on a fishing excursion on the "same day, one conveying the net, the other the party, consisting of Mr. Ormsby and Mr. "Davis, XIth Regiment." He has seen two boats go on two occasions, and frequently one.
- The persons who worked the boats were constables. On Easter Monday, 1856 he was in Chowder Bay with a pleasure party in young Mr. Ormsby's boat; the ladies and the Superintendent were in the visitors' boat; they were away all day.
- He has known the boat to be used in taking poultry to town; he has seen two baskets full, they were taken to Cummins' the poulterer; he has assisted in taking them, and brought back beef, corn, porter for Mr. Ormsby. He says he has known the small boat sent for the clergyman when the other was idle, and has known it to be sent for billet-wood for free men when the ration has run short.

John

John Smith, coxswain of the boat, says he has been coxswain of the visitors' boat three years. The boat has been in one instance to the Heads, once to Garden Island, once to Chowder Bay, and four times up Lane Cove. The party consisting of Mr. Ormsby and family, and visitors. On such occasions the boat has gone away at 1 or 2 P.M., returning at 6 or 7 P.M., and once as late as 9 P.M. During two seasons about eight or nine times fishing with the seine in the guard-boat. Once Mr. Ormsby, his daughters, and family, and some Military Officers went in a boat brought by the Officers. "Three of the police and I drew the seine; the fish were divided among the proprietors of the net."

He has carried in fowls to Dr. O'Brien, a turkey to Dr. West, and several of Mr. Ormsby's friends, from Mr. Ormsby; and has taken poultry to sell to Mr. Cummins about four times, and received not exceeding fifteen shillings at any one time.

This person also speaks to the same effect, as to the boat going on picnics when required by the Chaplain, and he sent in the small boat, and to the frequent employment of the boat in taking Mr. Ormsby's friends to the island, and him and his family to parties at Government House, and the Theatre, as late as 12 at night; to having been away from the island all night, keeping the boat at Sydney; the boatmen then having leave to go to their families, as also from the afternoons of Sundays till Monday mornings.

In fact there can be no doubt as to the free use made by Mr. Ormsby of the island boat for his own purposes, and, as in the case of Mr. Pendrill, before referred to, when it was required for the public service.

We have endeavoured to trace the history of the boat service of the island.

During the time Mr. Browne was Visiting Magistrate there was but one boat on the island, namely, the guard-boat. Mr. Browne, Nos. 10.14.

The duty of taking the prisoners and overseers to and fro was managed by the Royal Engineer's boat; next, when the Engineer's Department was placed under Captain Mann, the Water Police boat was substituted as the means of communication, and must, of course, have been under the orders of the Water Police or Visiting Magistrate.

When the Superintendent wished to visit Sydney he informed the Magistrate, and requested to have the boat sent for him; it was sufficiently large to take himself and family, and he was allowed to use it. No. 66.

He was not allowed to have the boat for his private business: he applied for permission to leave the island, and the Visiting Magistrate sent the boat to bring him to Sydney and to take him back. 67, 68.

There was no boat attached to the island. The boat which Mr. Browne sent, and in which the Superintendent was taken to and fro, "was to all intents and purposes a Water Police boat." It used to go armed with carbines and cutlasses, and everything in the same way as a boat employed by the police. 69.

The boat was sent for him when he asked leave, even if he went on private business, but was not at his disposal all the time. Mr. Ormsby complained very much; he thought it a great hardship to be so completely shut up upon an island of that kind without a boat at his control whenever he thought proper. 74.

Mr. Browne says, "he never asked to take the boat for pleasure parties or picnics; and I am sure I never authorised it." 75, 76.

Mr. Browne expressed himself very decidedly of opinion against the propriety of a boat being attached to the island as a visitors' boat, on account of the danger of the police who manned the boat, being the medium of communication with the friends of prisoners at Sydney. Mr. Ormsby and the officers complained of the hardship, but Mr. Browne considered it essential to the public service.

Captain M'Lerie, who succeeded Mr. Browne as Visiting Magistrate in June, 1851, and held the office till October, 1856, says,—“On the days on which he had leave he was allowed the use of one of the boats—one of the guard-boats—to Sydney and back.” Capt. M'Lerie, No. 32.

“There were then,” says Captain M'Lerie, “the guard-boat and the visitors' boat, which remained at the island; the latter required extensive repair, and I applied to the Government for a new boat, which was given. The old one was then repaired and returned as a supernumerary boat, in case of an accident to either of the others.”

(It

(It is remarkable that this boat continues serviceable to this day, and is the one in which Mr. Pendrill was sent, as complained of by him.)

No. 36. In Mr. Browne's time the visitors' boat was part of the police establishment, and he had two additional men allowed him for the purpose of the boat.

37, 38. "When I took charge that arrangement was radically changed: four men were placed in the boat as a crew, and thenceforward that boat was called 'the visitors' boat;' the other boat was called 'the old boat,' and the third 'the guard-boat.'"

136, 137, 138. Captain M'Lerie says he remembers the circumstance of Mr. Ormsby asking leave for the boats to go a-fishing. On more than one occasion "Mr. Ormsby said the policemen had, in their leisure hours, made a net, and he asked me would I have any objection to their fishing in the bay in one of the spare boats. I gave him that permission, when the police were not on duty, more than once." Again—"There was no rule with regard to the visitors' boat, but it was perfectly understood that when the boat was not required for the purpose for which it was granted, it was at the service of Mr. Ormsby."

149. When he asked for the boat on a certain day, it was left at his disposal for the whole of that day, "provided it did not interfere with any public duty"

151. "There was no regulation." "The boat could not be under my control, for I never saw it except when I visited the island." "I left it under his control. I could not have the control when I was in Sydney."

160, 162, 163. "I recognised Mr. Ormsby using the boat when it was not required for the public service."

166. "Without my leave Mr. Ormsby could only use the boat on days when he was authorised by the Governor General to leave the island."

167. "I do not believe Mr. Ormsby left upon any other days than those on which he obtained leave."

168. "It was in my time he went to Chowder Bay."

169. "That was by my permission."

170. "He asked whether, instead of coming to Sydney, he might go to Chowder Bay."

171. "I presume I had the power to give permission."

Mr. North, who succeeded Captain M'Lerie as Visiting Magistrate in 1856, says, Nos. 37, 38, 39, 40, 41. when he took charge the boat was used by Mr. Ormsby on his own authority, without asking permission to use it. He once asked permission to go on a picnic. "I never knew him to use the island boat for the purpose of picnics."

Mr. Elyard, the Under Secretary to Government, kindly attended the Board, but was unable to throw any additional light upon the subject. But upon consideration of the evidence of the three gentlemen who have successively filled the office of Visiting Magistrate, we think that the boat which was during all Mr. Browne's time, that is up to June, 1851, under the Visiting Magistrate's control, as belonging to the Water Police, came afterwards, on Captain M'Lerie's appointment, to be attached to the island; and, being manned by policemen, and the police force being under the Superintendent's order, the control of the boat would seem naturally to have fallen upon him; but still only for the public service.

The circumstance of his occasionally asking permission of Captain M'Lerie and Mr. North for the use of the boat on private purposes, shewed that he did not then claim such a right whenever it was not absolutely required for the public service.

We can recognise no such right without the authority of Government, and are accordingly of opinion that the use of the boat in the manner it has been shewn to us to have been used, was unauthorised, contrary to the general rules of the service, which forbid the use of public property for private purposes, and highly injurious to the service; for in consequence of the liberty taken by Mr. Ormsby, indulgences must have been granted to the policemen who manned the boat, and whose labor was greatly increased by the use made of it, to reconcile them to it. And we observe one mode of indulgence to have been the very frequent opportunities and liberty given to the boat's crew to spend a considerable part of their time in Sydney, and we cannot shut our eyes to the facilities thus afforded them of communicating between prisoners and their friends.

We

We regret that one of our number, Captain Ward, does not concur in these conclusions; his views upon the matter are expressed in a separate memorandum, which is appended to this letter, and it will be for the Government to decide to which view the most weight should be attached.

In every point of view, however, we concur in condemning the practice, whether authorised by the proper authority or not.

But we believe it to have been wholly without that authority.

Partly allied to this subject of the boat service is the complaint of the Rev. Mr. Pendrill of the course of treatment he experienced on his ministerial visits to the island.

He and the other Reverend Chaplain, Mr. Kenyon, were sent in the small or supernumerary boat, (the history of which has been before given) in blowing and unfavourable weather, with also a convict in irons, while the visitors' boat had, after Mr. Pendrill's arrival at the island, been sent away on a picnic excursion; and a falsehood was imposed on Mr. Pendrill, by Dunning and the coxswain, to account for the small boat being used in this service, viz, that the other boat was being painted, or under repair.

These facts are stated unquestionably by Mr. Pendrill and Mr. Thomas, and sufficiently admitted by Dunning.

But this was not a solitary instance of discourtesy and disrespect shewn to Mr. Pendrill in this particular; several other instances are stated in his evidence, to which we refer in the margin. Nos. 64-72, 93.

We think also that the Rev. Mr. Pendrill was not treated with the respect due to his sacred office—a remark which applies in part to both the Reverend Chaplains, but chiefly and personally to Mr. Pendrill.

It appears that at one time Mr. Pendrill, in common, doubtless, with the Rev. Mr. Kenyon, was on his visits to the island received as a guest by the Superintendent, and obtained the use of a suitable room in his quarters for retirement and preparing himself for Divine Service, a courtesy which was put an end to, as Mr. Ormsby states, when "he became 10, 11.
"troublesome by interfering with the prisoners, extra his duty as Chaplain, upon which "subject Mr. Ormsby spoke to him, and with reference to what he had heard as to his "being the medium of communication between them and their friends without his knowledge
"or authority, that he turned round offensively on him, and from that time he ceased to be "an acquaintance of his, and commenced the line of conduct he has since been adopting
"towards him."

Being thus dislodged from the Superintendent's residence, and from a courtesy which ought, in our opinion, neither to be imposed upon the Superintendent to show, nor the Chaplain to be dependent upon, Mr. Pendrill resorted to the surgeon's dispensary, for the purpose of robing, &c. Mr. Pendrill—to use his own words—was "turned out of the "dispensary," and informed, through the schoolmaster—who sent a message to him, that "he wished to see him in the school-room—" that he was to put on his surplice there, and to "go down from there to the place where the service was held."

Mr. Pendrill, considering the distance inconvenient, "ordered the gown to be taken "down to the Assistant Superintendent's office, about which there was considerable
"hesitation," but at length it was done, and, with that officer's permission, Mr. Pendrill continued to robe himself there during his connexion with the island.

The circumstances which led to the rupture between Mr. Pendrill and the Superintendent are related by Mr. Pendrill.

There was a prisoner on the island who had formerly been a parishioner of Mr. Pendrill, and under his ministry, and he became an object of interest, as one who felt deeply his sad and fallen condition, and wept for the state to which his crime had reduced his wife and family, and besought Mr. Pendrill to visit them.

Mr. Pendrill promised to do so, and he kept his word; he went as a Christian Minister to comfort the unoffending wife of a prisoner.

There was, however, a policeman there before him, who took notes of what passed; and when he next visited the island, he says, "Mr. Ormsby came up to me and said—'I "have a charge against you, for carrying messages from prisoners to their families.' He Rev. Mr. Pendrill, added, that Captain McLerie had been informed by a detective that I had carried a message from Cockerell to his family."

The charge was unfounded.

The surveillance thus exercised over a Minister of the Gospel in the exercise of his duties we think was both unnecessary and improper. The discretion of a gentleman in that position might, and ought to have been, relied upon, that nothing would be said or done in any such intercourse contrary to the discipline of the convict establishment. In fact, however, no charge was made against Mr. Pendrill that his communication was of that nature.

The arrangements for the performance of the Chaplain's duties were, however, defective and unbecoming in every respect; and this remark applies to both the reverend gentlemen who attended the island as Ministers of Religion.

Not only was a suitable room altogether wanting for retirement, which several hours stay upon the island rendered imperatively necessary, but neither was there one proper for the purpose in which either of the reverend gentlemen could see and converse confidentially with prisoners desiring spiritual comfort and admonition.

No. 17.

The use of the school-room was indeed allotted to the Revd. Mr. Pendrill after much annoyance and delay and refusal, but it was not a room fit for the purpose; there were men smoking in the next room, and there was no accommodation.

Mr. Pendrill says,—“I applied for that room in consequence of having been turned out of the dispensary by Dr. West. I had been in the habit of using it as a vestry on Sunday, but one Sunday Dr. West sent his assistant to request me to leave it, as he said he wished to see his patients there. I left, but had no place to go to; I went out and sat on the wall.”

17, 27.

There is other evidence of Mr. Pendrill, relating more particularly these circumstances, and shewing the treatment and privation he experienced, and the complete unfitness of the school-room, to which we especially direct your attention. Enough has perhaps been stated specifically to shew that Mr. Pendrill was treated most unbecomingly, and that he had great reason to complain.

Mr. Thomas, who was employed on the island as Civil Engineer for nearly four years, one of Mr. Parkes' informants, and who admitted himself to be the writer of a letter in the Empire newspaper of 5th October, signed “Another Witness,” attended before the Board, and, in addition to the points on which his evidence has been already stated, instanced an infringement of the 5th regulation by the Superintendent: namely, “nor shall any person whatever who may have daily business in Sydney be permitted to sleep on the island, and it is absolutely necessary that the intercourse between the island and the main should be as much restricted as possible.” That two sons of Mr. Ormsby were resident on the island who have daily business in Sydney.

This statement is quite true, and moreover that the young men are allowed to keep their boats on the island; and one irregularity has certainly arisen from their living in it, namely, that one of them, a lad of about fourteen years at the time, was, without the knowledge of his father, instructed in sparring by one of the convicts five years ago.

The residence of these young men with their father was authorized by the late Governor General Sir Charles Fitz Roy, before the present regulations came in force, and again by His Excellency the present Governor General, on the Superintendent's application, through the Visiting Magistrate, Captain McLerie, after the regulations in December, 1855; and no irregularity on their part, or any abuse of the privilege beyond the instance just mentioned, has been shewn to have arisen from their residence with their father.

Mr. Thomas,
Nos. 105, 106.

Next, a charge was made by Mr. Thomas against the Superintendent, in the following terms: He was asked, “Did you ever know any act committed by Mr. Ormsby that was unjust or discreditable to the establishment?” He answered, “Yes, there was one case where I could not say that he took the cedar, but we missed a large plank of cedar out of the timber yard; I informed Mr. Ormsby that it had been taken from the Engineer's stores, and he said, ‘Well, I will make inquiries and see who has taken it;’ he came out of the gate about a quarter of an hour afterwards and said he had heard one of my own foremen (Mr. Cahill) had got it in his quarters. I went to Mr. Cahill's quarters and told him

"him I had heard such a report. He denied that it was true, and I then looked about the premises and found that there was nothing there. I went to Mr. Ormsby and told him Mr. Cahill had not got it: He said, 'Never mind, wait a little longer, we will try and find out who has taken it.' Some time after that it was brought down from his house, by the gardener, to Mr. Cahill."

"Mr. Ormsby must have known it was in his place."

107.

"I spoke to Mr. Ormsby about it on the day it was missed during dinner time, between one and two o'clock."

113, 114.

"He was on the island on that day."

115.

William Augustus Cahill, foreman of works under Captain Mann, being asked about this circumstance, stated that there was "a man named Spenser employed in the Engineer's department, but who was allowed by Mr. Thomas, for Mr. Ormsby, a day or two at a time."

Mr. Cahill,
Nos. 26-33.

"He was the man suspected of taking the plank"

34.

"He was at that time working for Mr. Ormsby."

36.

"The planks were in the yard when the men were turned out to dinner; they were placed in such a way that one could not be taken without being missed. Directly I came from dinner I missed two planks from the heap. I looked round the yard and could not see them, but I observed foot marks on the wall that led to Mr Ormsby's place—to the garden. I reported to Mr. Thomas. Whether he reported it to Captain Mann I cannot say, but he spoke of it to Mr. Ormsby when he came home."

37.

"He was at Sydney on that day."

38.

"He returned some time in the evening, and, I believe, the following day Mr. Ormsby made a search for the cedar through his yard, and returned it."

39.

This is the whole case upon which Mr. Thomas sought to fix a charge upon Mr. Ormsby of at least conniving at the taking of a cedar plank from the Engineer's stores.

The evidence wholly fails in affecting Mr. Ormsby as conniving at the theft; but the matter does not appear to have been followed up by inquiry, as it ought to have been, in order that the real offender might be discovered and punished. In this, we think, there was a remissness on the part of Mr. Ormsby.

Another charge by Mr. Ormsby against the Superintendent is, that on a certain occasion he used most foul and abusive expressions towards Mr. Peers, the dispenser.

Mr. Peers himself, as well as Mr. West, states what these expressions were, and Mr. Ormsby states the occasion on which they were used.

See Mr. Peers,
Nos. 22, 40.
Mr. West, 4,
and Mr. Ormsby's
answer.

Peers had reported something to Mr. West as having been said of him by Mr. Ormsby, concerning the performance of his duty as Visiting Surgeon, which the latter said was untrue, and on Mr. West complaining to Mr. Ormsby that he had so spoken of him to his subordinate, instead of making any complaint he might have to himself, Mr. Ormsby became exceedingly angry with Peers, and did make use of the improper expressions imputed to him.

These cannot be justified; but, considering the provocation which Mr. Ormsby considered himself to have received, are partly excusable.

We come now to an important charge brought against Mr. Ormsby, namely, that sparring matches having taken place on the island with the knowledge or connivance of the Superintendent and other officers of the island, and that he and his two sons, subordinate officers and strangers, have been present at them.

There were two men skilled in the art of boxing, prisoners on the island at the same time—Perry and Sinclair; the former a very powerful and remarkable man, by trade a carpenter, the other a barber, as stated by Mr. Ormsby. These two would obviously at times, when released from work, be incited by each other and by their fellow prisoners to exhibit their skill in a short stand-up, and thus far, it is admitted by Mr. Ormsby, might have occurred; but he denies that any regular match ever did occur, or could occur, without his knowledge, and that of every subordinate officer on the establishment.

We are of that opinion on the latter point. None such could occur without its being known to the Superintendent and every officer on the settlement. But we find upon the evidence that sparring matches, really deserving of that name, did occur upon several occasions, and upon the Lord's Day, and that several officers of the establishment, and the officers officers of the Military guard, and strangers did witness them; that a pair of gloves, obtained in some surreptitious manner, was found amongst them by Mr. Brown, the Assistant Superintendent, and on another occasion a substitute for gloves, made of an old flannel jacket.

Easton, Nos. 10,
46, 72, 106, 146, 161.

Capt. Mann.
Easton, Nos.
189, 209.

We find further that Perry, a shipwright, who was a powerful athletic man, and ought to have been kept on the works, was taken off the works by the Superintendent and placed over the cells, a duty which does not require a man of that description; for the cells are so constructed, being excavations out of the solid rock, as to make the duty of an overseer a very easy one; and that Sinclair was put to do duty as a barber; that on one occasion Perry was relieved at the cells, and brought down to exhibit his powers in the prison yard, another man being substituted for him in the meanwhile at the cells, which must have been the act of some one having authority to relieve him, as a subordinate officer at least. When we find that the Superintendent, knowing he had these two characters on the island, adopted no means of keeping them apart, but rather, by placing them in the easiest berths, gave in effect, though not in intention, facilities to them of following their pastime, and amusing the spectators, prisoners, and others; when, moreover, we find that a sparring match did take place at the quarters of the Military Officer, between Perry and a visitor of that officer, Captain Macdonald; that on that occasion the Superintendent was applied to, and gave permission for Perry to go to the officer's quarters, as Captain Macdonald wished to see him—for we think it perfectly incredible that the Superintendent could be quite ignorant of what he was wanted for—when, in addition to all this, one of his own sons learned the art of boxing from one of the men, we cannot acquit the Superintendent, and indeed any officer on the establishment, of either the most culpable remissness or indifference, amounting to incapacity for such a charge, or of knowledge of, and connivance to some extent in this malpractice.

We acquit, however, the Superintendent and his sons of ever having been present on any of these occasions.

The evidence which has brought us to these conclusions will be found as stated in the margin.

Mr. Thomas,
Nos. 166-169.

Another charge made by Mr. Thomas was, that he had known the Superintendent to take a man into the hospital, named Spencer, who had been reported to the doctor as fit for work, and that he was employed at Mr. Ormsby's.

Mr. Peers,
Nos. 69-75,
186-193.

It was not in Mr. Ormsby's province to take a man into the hospital, and Peers, the dispenser, denies the fact altogether. That Spencer was employed by Mr. Ormsby on his private business, on several occasions, with Mr. Thomas' permission, is proved, but not to any great extent. Cahill, under whom the man was employed in the workshop, states, once or twice in a week or fortnight for a day or two at a time, and Mr. Ormsby, in his answer to the charge, states the amount of the man's labor to have been very small.

Mr. Cahill,
Nos. 29-34,
52-59.

Still the employment was contrary to the regulations, and should neither have been permitted by Mr. Thomas nor asked for by Mr. Ormsby.

But we fear that a more serious infraction of the regulations has taken place in the employment of convict labor upon the garden known as the Superintendent's garden, which is of large extent, probably about three or four acres, sub-divided by numerous walls, built roughly of rubble stone without mortar, and frequently requiring repair.

These repairs are performed by convict laborers, on a requisition by Mr. Ormsby to the Civil Engineer.

The walls are repaired as Government work.

But we think it could never have been contemplated that gardens so extensive should be kept up by convict labor, especially when it is remarked that one gardener only is allowed by the regulations to the Superintendent. The cultivation of so large an extent of garden must, in our opinion, have occupied a large number of men at times.

Mr. Ormsby states that 30,000 or 40,000 cabbage plants are grown there yearly, and that all persons on the island, free and convict, together with his own family, are occasionally supplied from it.

But there is a prisoners' garden, expressly for their supply; and we do not approve of the mixing together public and private property.

Mr. Ormsby is allowed a garden, and one gardener for his private use,—a privilege which ought not to have been encroached upon, as the evidence throughout shews that it has been to a large extent.

We

We are of opinion that it has led to much irregularity and abuse.

The Superintendent is next charged—"That he refused to give any assistance when applied to upon the occasion of fifty prisoners leaving the works, (in spite of the endeavors of the overseers to prevent them), and going to the office of the Resident Engineer, and threatening that officer with his life, and that these men received no punishment for their conduct."

And again—"That the prisoners on one occasion refused to go to their work, and that no steps were taken to enforce the orders given them."

Next—two instances of insubordination on the part of the prisoners, and apathy or unconcern on the part of the Superintendent, are related by Mr. Thomas himself, who was the Resident Engineer mentioned:—"I was present when the prisoners left the works, and I went and complained to the Superintendent. I was at my office at the time, which is next to Mr. Ormsby's. I went into him, saying that these men had left the works, and come up to me in a threatening way, and I asked him to give me some assistance in sending them away. This he refused, and said he could not do anything with them, and could not send them down. The men remained there for some time, in a very threatening manner; they came up to my office, and commenced abusing me. He said he would have nothing at all to do with it, and refused to give me any assistance. After remaining some time, they walked away to the works."

Mr. Thomas,
Nos. 173-181.

The other instance Mr. Thomas brought forward upon hearsay.

Upon the first case Mr. Thomas referred us to Easton, as his witness of the transaction. His account is—"It has generally been the rule, since I have been on the island, which is eight or nine years, that there used to be five men to draw the hand-cart up that hill, always; and I believe Mr. Thomas gave orders for four men to draw it up, and they were third-class men—not able-bodied men."

One individual, a partially insane person, went towards Mr. Thomas; he was taken before the Visiting Magistrate, and "Mr. Thomas declined to come forward."

Upon the other instance Mr. Thomas referred us to Mr. Broderick, who was attached to the Engineer's Department, and had particular charge of the mechanical branch. He relates the circumstance—"It was on a Saturday, when the "Claremont" was discharging machinery at the island; the Captain asked whether the men could not be employed in the afternoon in discharging, as he wished to get away."

Mr. Broderick,
Nos. 10-38.

Saturday afternoon has been a customary holiday to the men, and Mr. Broderick gave instructions to the foreman to acquaint the Superintendent that the men would be required to work after dinner that day.

The Superintendent appears to have sanctioned the requisition, for the men were seen descending the hill towards the works, when, all at once, one of the gangs turned back, and the others followed their example. Mr. Broderick says—"I met Mr. Ormsby on the hill, and asked him what the meaning of that was—he said they had refused to work, 'what can I do in the matter?' He said he would take the names down of those who refused to work, and all he could do was, as I understood, to bring them before the Visiting Magistrate." The men did not go to the work.

The desiring them to do so was an infringement of their usual privilege of a respite from work on Saturday afternoon, and was for the purpose of accommodating the Captain of the "Claremont."

The case was brought before the Visiting Magistrate, who dealt with it, and sentenced several of the prisoners to the cells.

But Mr. Broderick and Mr. Thomas appear to have thought that the men ought to have been "forced to go to the work," and that the Superintendent should have called out the Military guard.

We think that the Superintendent should have first well considered the propriety of the order before he gave it, and having done so, he should have insisted on its being obeyed, as it probably would have been if he had shewn the requisite determination.

For this refusal about twenty-five persons were confined to the cells several days, and amongst them one mentioned by Mr. Pendrill as "having been first confined on the charge and then released."

Another charge was brought by Mr. Thomas against the Superintendent,—that he has borrowed money from the prisoners.

No surmise or suspicion of such a transaction was mentioned to us by any one person examined but Mr. Thomas, and by him only on "hearsay." Mr. Brown repels the suspicion in the strongest manner—"I never heard it stated or suggested on the island in my life that the Superintendent had borrowed money of the prisoners."

Mr. Thompson—formerly reporter to the Sydney Morning Herald, another of Mr. Parkes' informants, and writer of a letter in the Empire of the 6th October, signed "A Third Witness," in which he put himself forward as "personally cognizant for some years past of the disgraceful state of the island, and of the apathy and neglect which have rendered all reports of the infamous proceedings there mere farces"—admitted that he was only on the island twice; once when Sir Charles Fitz Roy laid the first stone of the dock, and again for three days on a visit to Mr. Thomas. He stated as the only fact which fell under his own observation a trifling dispute about the key of the bathing house, and the insolence of a prisoner who was sent for the key, and some uncivil expressions used by Mr. Ormsby of Mr. Thomas, and that "the general demeanour of the prisoners towards Mr. Thomas was disrespectful."

He stated that his only means of knowledge were those three days visit to the island—that he knew of none of the facts for which he vouched, as having been "personally cognizant for some years," and his only authority was information communicated by others.

Yet this person took upon himself to assure Mr. Parkes and the public, "that the statements set forth in the form of queries in the letter subscribed 'Another Witness' (Mr. Thomas), are not only true but that they do not include one tithe of the enormities which have for years past rendered Cockatoo Island a worse hell, if that be possible, than Norfolk Island."

He was asked, "How many of the statements of 'Another Witness' can you support of your own knowledge?" he answered, "None; I only knew them from Mr. Thomas' and Mr. Duff's statements," and when stating "I was perfectly cognizant for years, I had no other knowledge but that acquired from three days residence on the island, and communicated by others."

Respecting another categorical statement by him in the newspaper of a person having been brutally murdered on the island, being asked his authority for that, he said,—“Both Mr. Thomas and Mr. Duff told me that very suspicious circumstances attended the cases, and that the man who was supposed to have thrown him down was discharged from the island, and that was the authority on which I made the statement.”

We will not trouble you farther with a comparison of this unworthy person's public statements with his authority when examined upon them; but we desire your reference to the whole of his evidence, as shewing the mode in which charges such as these can be got up, and persons found to vouch for them.

Mr. Christopher Murray, formerly a constable on the establishment, one of Mr. Parkes' informants, and writer of a letter in the Empire of the 7th October, signed "A Fourth Witness," attended the Board, and was examined upon all the matters under inquiry; but he made no new charge, excepting an unfounded one of the mal-appropriation of a small portion of his pay, which had been stopped for a breach of duty, and applied to the Police Fund, under the order of the Visiting Magistrate. His evidence will be found referred to under the several heads of inquiry, and is important upon several of them.

We come now to those material points in our inquiry to which you direct our especial attention—

1. "Whether the conduct of the officers and servants upon the island has or has not been such as to merit the displeasure of the Government."
2. "Whether the management of the establishment generally by the Superintendent is in accordance with the regulations laid down for his guidance."
3. "Whether the penal discipline of the island is maintained and impartially carried out;" and

4. "Whether the regulations generally are sufficient for the objects contemplated—If they are not, then what modification of them can be suggested?"

Upon the first point we do not think ourselves called upon on the evidence to bring particularly to your notice the conduct of any officer or servant on the establishment in the discharge of his duties, except that of the Superintendent, of the Visiting Surgeon, of the Assistant Superintendent, and of the Dispenser. No irregularity or impropriety of conduct has been imputed to any other.

Several instances have been already noticed by us in which we think the conduct of the Superintendent to have been more or less reprehensible; we need not allude again to these.

One of the charges brought before us has concerned the conduct of other officers of the establishment than the Superintendent, viz., that of the Visiting Surgeon and Dispenser, relative to the treatment of two prisoners who died in the hospital—Daniel Dunsmore and William Murphy.

Dunsmore was a young man about twenty-one years of age. He complained to the Dispenser, Mr. Peers, who, being resident on the island, has the general charge of the hospital, on the 25th March, 1856. His case and the treatment of it are stated by Peers—"His disease was consumption, or disease of the lungs, rather pleurisy. He was not admitted into the hospital in the first instance, but exempted from work and put into the exempt list. At first his symptoms were merely an inflammatory cough, for which I treated him—I gave him lobelia and æther. About nine in the morning fully examined him, not considering his case worthy of more attention at that time, and sent him to the exempt ground. He came three times a day to take his medicine—he came again next day. I gave him cough mixture, camphorated opium, ipecacuanha, and ammoniacum. On the 27th the same treatment was continued, but he was taken into the hospital during the day."

Mr. Peers,
Nos. 78-105.

"He was sent back the exempt ground—think Dr. West must have seen him, for I see digitalis is added."

"On the third day he went again to the exempt ground, and on the fourth day he was admitted into the hospital, viz., the 28th. On that day the Visiting Surgeon saw him; he continued in the hospital on the 29th, 30th, and 31st under treatment, and on the 1st of April he died."

The exempt ground is a platform of the rock on the south and south-west side of the island. We think the sending a man laboring under such symptoms as Dunsmore's at the end of the month of March to such an exposed situation as the exempt ground for three days was an act of most cruel and culpable negligence. He ought, clearly, under such symptoms to have been taken at the very first into the hospital, or put in to some warm sheltered place, instead of being exposed at any season of the year, but especially at the fall of the year, to changeable winds and weather.

The blame for that is chargeable against Mr. Peers, who has ceased to be the dispenser.

We think, however, he should have been seen earlier by Dr. West, whose regular visits to the island are twice a week. On this occasion he was sent for at eleven o'clock at night, on the 28th of March, the day on which Dunsmore was admitted into the hospital, and then saw the patient for the first time.

A post mortem examination was made by Peers, the dispenser, which Mr. West did not attend; a neglect on his part which we think should be noticed, and no inquest was held on the body.

The other case charged as one neglected by the medical department was that of a man named William Murphy. He was an old man, about eighty years of age, admitted into the hospital at half-past ten on the night of the 3rd December, and died at two P.M. on the 7th December.

Mr. Peers,
Nos. 108-122.
Mr. West, No. 38-48; and see the whole of the evidence of Messrs. West and Peers on this point,
4th November.

"His disease was spasmodic asthma."

There was no post mortem examination, and no inquest was held on the body.

There seems to us no ground for imputing neglect in this case.

In both cases, however, it has been stated that the hospital books have been falsified, and entries made after death, to give an untrue account of the treatment.

We

We have critically examined both Mr. West and Peers, and their books, and are satisfied that there is no ground for this part of the charge. We think, however, that considerable looseness has existed in this department.

First, in drawing full rations for every person in the hospital, whatever be the diet ordered for each.

Secondly, in there being no sufficient check to the expenditure of medicines and medical stores.

Thirdly, as to the books which should be kept in the hospital but are not, viz., a prescription book and a diet book.

Fourthly, in not attaching a ticket to the head of the bed of each patient, stating the diet ordered, and so affording the prisoner the satisfaction of observing if he receives the diet prescribed.

A charge, not indeed affecting any officer of the establishment, was brought by Mr. Thomas, which we have thought it right to inquire into.—“How was it that an inquest held on the body of a prisoner killed in the dock was adjourned but never sat again; and does the death of this man remain to this day a mystery on that account?”

Mr. Thompson, who gives Mr. Thomas and Mr. Duff as his sole authority, says, broadly, that “very suspicious circumstances attended the case; that the man was brutally murdered by a fellow convict in sight of other convicts; that the then coroner, Mr. J. Ryan Brenan, opened the inquest and adjourned it, yet did not resume it; that the body of the murdered man was buried without further inquiry.”

If Mr. Brenan failed in his duty in not resuming the inquest, he must answer for that.

We are clearly of opinion that no murder was committed by any one, and that the unfortunate man fell into the dock, and was killed accidentally.

But the three cases of death on the island which have been mentioned, in two of which no inquest was attempted to be held, in the other not carried out to a verdict, suggest to us that in future the rule of the English law ought to be imperatively observed, whereby it is required that an inquest should be held upon the body, in every case of death in gaol; indeed it has been provided for by the 8th Regulation, in cases of sudden or accidental death. We think that notice of every death of a prisoner ought to be given to the Visiting Magistrate, and an inquest held.

With respect to the general management of the Superintendent, we are unable to state either that it has been, or is now, in accordance with what a proper state of discipline would demand, or what the regulations require.

We separate these two points because the regulations do not contain any instructions as to the discipline to be pursued and enforced: it consequently comes to be such as is in accordance with the Superintendent's own ideas of convict discipline, or such as the Visiting Magistrate for the time being has recommended. At one time, under Mr. Browne's superintendence as Visiting Magistrate, it was apparently more strict, many liberties and recreations having been since allowed which that Magistrate would have forbidden; such as noisy amusements at any time, singing or loud talking in the wards, and the obtaining of extra clothing not contemplated by the regulations.

On these heads we think it absolutely necessary that the Government should prescribe authoritatively the system of discipline which it will have pursued. That followed by the present Superintendent, except during the time Mr. Browne was Visiting Magistrate, appears to us to have been, and still to be, most objectionable. It, nevertheless, has had the approval of both Captain M'Lerie and Mr. North; and we would seriously draw your attention to the evidence of both these gentlemen, as shewing the views entertained by them with respect to their duties.

As to punishment, it is of the mildest sort, and consists merely of labor on the public works during the ordinary laboring hours, and a system of taskwork which admits of a willing and industrious man earning many indulgencies in diet, &c.

The convicts are altogether exempted from labor during unfavorable weather, and when employed on works requiring extra clothing, provided with such clothing; and during the hours

Capt. M'Lerie,
Nos. 28, 29.
Mr. Browne,
Nos. 54-62.

hours cessation from labor, they are confined in the prison yard, and at night in close wards. This imprisonment and labor are all the punishment a convict undergoes, save for offences against good order and discipline on the island, then only is inflicted close confinement in the cells, and an extension of the term of service necessary to entitle the prisoner to a ticket-of-leave.

We are far, however, from thinking slightly of even this extent of punishment; it is all perhaps that the general opinion and feeling of the age would allow, and being one of entire seclusion, except to the society of offenders of all classes and degrees of depravity; separation from all ties of domestic life and affection; the loss of liberty for the period of sentence, and the being subject during it to a species of government which the mind is apt to consider arbitrary, despotic, and tyrannical, must operate upon a person possessed of any sensibility.

It is a state of things which encourages and gives birth to suspicions where no ground exists for them, and these frequently of the most revolting and odious nature. Partiality, favoritism, and persecution are generally charged against superiors, and they are largely charged against the Superintendent of Cockatoo Island.

The mode of government is open to such abuses, and these are difficult of proof, although carrying conviction to those who witness such proceedings, as for instance were pursued by the Superintendent in Gleadall's case, and in Perry's and in Sinclair's. Minds like theirs could not perceive any cause for the removal of Perry and Sinclair from laborious occupation to the lightest, and even to situations of trust; nor, as in Fox's case, the remission of the greater portion of his sentence altogether, without attributing these indulgencies to favoritism; nor could they in the belief that Gleadall was on several occasions obnoxious to the Superintendent attribute his dismissal to any other cause.

Vide Dunning's evidence on this point.

The regulations of Government made for the guidance of the Superintendent have in several important and material points come to be wholly disregarded—points on the observance of which the discipline and order of a penal establishment, we are of opinion, mainly depend.

Inspector Dunning, Nos. 222-297.

We pass over several instances of infringement of the regulations by the Superintendent of minor importance, which will occur to you at almost every page on reading the evidence, and will bring to your notice only those which are of more grave and prominent character.

And, first, we think the removal of Perry, the boxer, from the works to the cells was contrary to the 12th regulation. Secondly, there have been frequent infringements by the Superintendent of the 20th regulation, in the employment of Spencer, although for no long periods, and in the employment of more than the "one gardener" allowed to the Superintendent by the Regulations, on the cultivation and manuring of the garden, which goes by the name of the Superintendent's, and in building and rebuilding the walls when fallen. Thirdly, the second general regulation,—“That no person (except those duly authorized) shall land on the island without an order from the Colonial Secretary or Visiting Magistrate, and always in the presence of the Superintendent or his Assistant,” has been in the latter part wholly disregarded. Again, the 4th General Regulation,—“That all boats (except certain therein specified) going to or coming from the island, will be liable to be stopped and examined by the Water Police.” Fourthly, the regulation for the Assistant Superintendent, overseers, and other subordinate officers of the penal establishment, have come to be disregarded in the most extraordinary manner, and in the widest sense utterly subversive of the first principles of a penal establishment. “They are to bring nothing on the island without the knowledge and consent of the Superintendent”—and “no overseer or other subordinate officer will on any pretence be permitted to bring spirituous liquors on the island.” So the regulation for the police, No. 23.—“No spirits will be allowed on the island, except under the written authority of the Visiting Magistrate, Superintendent, or Civil Engineer.”

Mr. Easton, Nos. 61-77, 89-125, 126-157, 217-236, 244-262.

In consequence of the breach of the General Regulations, No. 2, and no arrangement being made by the Superintendent for carrying it out, according to its spirit, if inconvenient or impossible for himself or his deputy to attend the landing of boats, such as instructing the Inspector of Police, or some other officer to perform it, this most necessary duty has been wholly unprovided for, and the evidence on this point leads to the conclusion that the utmost irregularity has prevailed.

Mr. Easton, Nos.
154-176, 177-184,
305-307.

Parcels and letters have been landed from boats, carried up to the quarters of the free officers by convict servants, under no supervision whatever; and thus articles of indulgence have been obtained by the prisoners in a surreptitious manner—extra articles of clothing, newspapers, and on one occasion boxing gloves.

And, in consequence of this breach of the regulation for subordinate officers, and of the Police Regulation No. 23, wine, spirits, and beer have been landed at the island for subordinate officers of every class, without inquiry, search, or check of any sort.

So gross a violation of this essential regulation has surprised us greatly; but the evidence of it is too clear to be doubted, and shews that, in fact, there is no effective superintendence upon the most important matters to be cared for in a penal settlement.

Inspector Dunning, Nos. 222-297, 312-319.

We refer you particularly on all these points to the evidence of Mr. Dunning, the Inspector of Police.

The evidence of Mr. Brown, the Assistant Superintendent, is to the same effect. He says—"I did not attend, nor did the Superintendent, at the landing of boats, except when the indulgence boat brought things for the prisoners, paid for out of their task money; these things were taken by me and examined before issued. The Superintendent's or free officers' things used to be taken direct by the servants of these persons to their quarters, unexamined by the police or me. I have seen a keg of wine brought to the island, and spirits, to the extent of a bottle at the time, without the knowledge or consent of the Superintendent. It is not the practice to ask the Superintendent's leave."

"I never examined any bundles or parcels brought to the island, or the person of any one visiting the island."

"The free overseers and subordinate officers did bring spirits on the island."

"I can positively state that the regulations regarding subordinate officers bringing spirits to the island have not been carried out."

"I have always had access to the regulations, and am familiar with them."

Smith, coxswain of the visitors' boat, says—"I have brought beer in kegs for many people on the island, also, wine and spirits, in cases, for Mr. Ormsby, but not for any one else. The other boatmen are in the habit of bringing parcels, and they might have contained spirits, but never to my knowledge; the bundles were not examined at the wharf."

"Beer and wine and spirits were brought to the island in Chandler's (or the shop) boat, for the free people."

Mr. Browne, Nos. 22-24, 27, 28, 29.

Mr. Browne says, that when he was Visiting Magistrate (which was before the present regulation of Government,) he was never applied to for permission to land spirits, and he considered that the Superintendent was responsible for the landing of any spirits. Mr. Browne was referred to the regulation as to the prohibition to free officers to bring spirits on the island; there was such a rule as that in existence during his time; he was never applied to relax it, and never did. One or two cases of drunkenness occurred amongst the prisoners, where spirits had been brought to the island surreptitiously, and a constable on duty was dismissed.

63, 64.

Capt. M'Lerie, Nos. 42, 43.

Captain M'Lerie gives an extraordinary reason for the old rule concerning spirits having been abandoned, and that by the authority of a Board, in which we think him altogether in error, except indeed, unfortunately, as to the fact of the violation of the rule. He says—"There were orders against bringing spirits to the island, but I found after the number of civil officers increased, and people connected with the Engineer's department, that it was a restriction they would not assent to. There was a Board appointed, and the rule was modified," "of which Board two of the gentlemen now present were members."

On this point Captain M'Lerie is clearly mistaken. There was no such modification of the rule by any Board of which the two gentlemen alluded to (Captain Ward and Mr. Merewether) were members, nor, we believe, by any legitimate authority whatever.

It is possible Captain M'Lerie has misconceived the purport of the regulation of Government in 1855 as justifying such a departure from first principles; but it is the infraction of the rule of 1855 which we consider to be so highly reprehensible, and the total abandonment of which is wholly unjustifiable and inexcusable. That rule did not altogether prohibit the use of spirits, &c., to the free persons employed on the island, but placed placed them under the reasonable check and restraint of "the permission of the Visiting Magistrate, Superintendent, or Chief Engineer, being necessary;"—a most reasonable and necessary regulation, for the breach of which we can see no excuse whatever.

Mr. Ormsby did complain of the disorderly conduct of the new comers to the island in 1853, particularly of their drunkenness, and Captain M'Lerie states that he received a good many communications to the same effect.

Captain M'Lerie says "he never had any application from a subordinate officer for leave to bring spirits to the island;" he thinks he recollects on one occasion some report having been brought to him of "a bottle of wine having been found in the possession of the police." He says,—“Mr. Ormsby informed me of it, and said the man was unwell, and I told the Inspector not to take notice of it, as it might be looked upon as medicine.”

We hardly know how to look upon this incident. It might seem to imply that extreme care was taken by the Superintendent to report to the Visiting Magistrate "a single bottle of wine," which had been brought to the island by a policeman who was unwell; but when we observe the wholesale and unrestricted importation which has existed, we scarcely like to express what we really think of it, viz., that it was a piece of pretence. Captain M'Lerie adds,—“There were no complaints that spirits were brought to the island, but I was No. 49. “convinced that spirits were brought, as on one or two occasions I had to punish prisoners “for being drunk.”

Another incident of the same nature occurred in Mr. North's time. Under examination before the Board he stated, "this morning a written application was made to me for Mr. North, 23 to 30. "permission to take a bottle of porter to the island." That was the first instance of an application being made to him. Captain M'Lerie states, "in justice to the authorities, Capt. M'Lerie, Nos. 50-61. "the officers of the island, we found on one occasion spirits in a 'plant,' as it is "called. After the prisoners are recalled to their barracks the sentries are withdrawn "from the shores of the island, which are thus left unprotected, and boats can land. "Spirits may then be planted among the rocks in positions with which, by preconcerted "signals, the prisoners may be made acquainted."

"The only limit (to bringing spirits to the island) being the want of means on the "part of the prisoners to purchase them."

Mr. North's evidence on this subject is equally unsatisfactory. It shows the unchecked and unrestricted importation of spirits, &c. to the island. He knew the rule as Mr. North, Nos. 23-30. to the importation of spirits; was never applied to for permission to land any except on the occasion above referred to, when he gave permission to land a single bottle of porter.

The 17th General Regulation has also been neglected, and we think very much to the injury of the service. It states that "the general duty of the Superintendent as connected with the prisoners whilst employed on the works, is to insure, by his own supervision, the vigilance of his officers, and the safe custody and discipline of his prisoners."

It is stated in the evidence that he wholly neglected this very important duty.

If it had been performed, it is hard to conceive how many irregularities could have taken place without his knowledge and interposition which are stated in the evidence to have occurred; for example, the disobedience of the prisoners on two occasions mentioned by Mr. Thomas—boats landing, and parcels, &c., to a large amount carried up to different officers' quarters by convict servants without search or inquiry. Indeed we cannot imagine so deplorable a state of things to exist in any penal establishment if the Superintendent did, according to the spirit of the 17th regulation, "give his own personal supervision," and apply his own vigilance to every transaction which might lead to a breach of the penal discipline and good order.

Such being the state of discipline, and such the nature and extent of the punishment of offenders under the system pursued, there is still one subject to which we must invite your attention, our own having been forcibly drawn to it.

It is this,—the total want of any system or means whatever for the reformation of the criminals.

It is true that two reverend gentlemen, one of each of the principal religious communions, are attached to the island, and we are not so unmindful of their zeal in the great cause of religion as to doubt that they would do all in their power in their several callings; but but we cannot designate the formal services of religion which take place on the Lord's Day merely, and the casual visit of a clergyman on one other day in the week, as really effective means for the reformation of the criminals. We are of opinion that the reverend chaplains should, for their good offices to be effectual, be permanently attached to the establishment of the island, and that their ministrations should be daily and constantly applied to the great end of bringing sinners to repentance, and confirming the more decent or the wavering.

They should be received, and looked upon, and treated with the respect due to their sacred calling. They should have suitable lodgings convenient to themselves, and for receiving persons seeking spiritual comfort through their means.

No such accommodation exists at present, but might surely be provided by means of those convicts whose eternal interests they are sent to serve.

There are, as described by all the reverend gentlemen, many penitents of each communion, of whom, if they could be separated from the more depraved, they would have reasonable hope.

There is, however, no such separation as should depend upon conduct.

We are of opinion that such a division should be made, and that without delay; even under present circumstances thus much might at least be accomplished; and farther, we think that the Reverend Chaplains should have a principal voice in the selection of persons, to be kept separately—we mean at work and in the wards, and as much as possible on all other occasions.

There is a small room imperfectly adapted for the purposes of a school for the children of the free persons on the island. A larger school should be provided for the use of adult convicts, under the charge of the Chaplains, and means and opportunity should be afforded to better disposed prisoners to avail themselves of the instruction so to be imparted.

In our view of this matter, the appointment of a schoolmaster is indispensable.

Lastly, the whole system pursued upon the island requires organization. At present the convicts are employed as laborers merely. Those who have any acquaintance with handicraft trades are, on account of their superior usefulness, of course employed in their line, but there is no instruction for the uninitiated—all are mere laborers; such as they were when they went to the island, such they leave it. No one systematically receives there the instruction which should fit him on his return to the society from which his crimes have banished him a better man, or better fitted for getting an honest livelihood. He returns a worse man in every respect than he went.

Such a total want of means of useful instruction we consider to be a radical error in the system.

Trades of all useful kinds should be systematically taught, and only the otherwise useless person should be altogether a mere laborer.

We do not mean that any prisoners should be altogether exempt from labor. This must, we fear, unhappily continue, for the sake of what is considered necessary to constitute the notion of punishment, that the well-disposed, for example, might be encouraged by being allowed to learn a trade as a reward for good conduct, and a certain time of exemption from labor should be allowed to those who are employed in learning trades.

We are, of course, aware that the quantum of labor would be thus reduced, but the benefit must hereafter accrue to the whole community.

Subject to these remarks, we are ourselves of opinion that the employment of convicts on public works in the neighbourhood of Sydney, such as those now in progress on Cockatoo Island, is the best mode which could be devised for the punishment of criminals, for making them useful to the community which they have injured by their offences, and for their own reformation.

And we are further of opinion that any such public works may be perfectly and efficiently conducted by engineers and free overseers, by means of convict labor, without any difficulty whatever.

We think the regulations for the engineer department have at length become effectual for preventing any collision of authority; but there are wanting vast changes in the whole arrangements of the convict department to render it effective.

The

The preceding remarks will have shewn in what respects, nevertheless, we will briefly submit to you our views as to what these changes should be.

These would, in our opinion, be the appointment of a more suitable person as Commandant or Superintendent than the present gentleman.

We are by no means desirous of detracting from Mr. Ormsby the credit which is undoubtedly due to him of preserving any kind of authority and decency amongst a band of criminals so depraved as those who unhappily become the subjects of penal discipline.

Mr. Ormsby has, of course, had many difficult circumstances to contend with; and although we are not, as the general tenor of our letter will shew, at all satisfied with the results of his administration, yet we must do him the justice to observe that no authoritative system of discipline or government has been prescribed to him,—he has been left to follow his own somewhat mild and lax, but arbitrary, ideas of prison discipline.

We can find no sufficient excuse for the frequent disregard, in the particular instances we have pointed out, of those regulations which have been given to him, or for the improper use which he has made of the Government boat, of the policemen, and of the labors of the convicts.

The Commandant or Superintendent of a penal establishment such as that on Cockatoo Island, so near to the temptations of Sydney, and on which both free skilled laborers, as well as a large body of convicts are employed, should be a person long accustomed to strict discipline, a man of honor, and of high principles.

The emoluments of such a gentleman should be more commensurate with the charge confided to him than those of Mr. Ormsby have ever been.

The particulars also of what may be termed perquisites of office, such as convict servants, the use and extent of a garden, should be again so strictly defined as not to admit of any doubt. The regulations in force would certainly, in our view, appear to be sufficiently explicit; but they have been evaded.

It should not be allowed to be possible for the officer in charge to quote as his authority on any point verbal instructions, however given. His written instructions should be his only guidance, never varied, but in writing.

Secondly,—the Medical Officer in charge of the island should be resident, and fitting quarters should be provided for him.

Arrangements for the hospital should also be made, corresponding to those in use in Her Majesty's Hospitals, as to the various books and accounts kept, the drawing of diet, and other particulars; for the faithful carrying out of all which the Medical Officer should be responsible.

We disapprove entirely of the present establishment of a Resident Dispenser, and a Visiting Surgeon; instead of the former, we think a responsible Resident Surgeon is necessary.

As to inspection by an officer unconnected with the establishment, if that be deemed essential, we are clearly of opinion that it ought to be entrusted only to a responsible officer, under the general title of Inspector General of Prisons.

The employment as Visiting Justices of magistrates performing other and sufficiently onerous duties, without pay or emolument of any kind, has, in our opinion, been found in this case—and will probably be found in every case in which it shall be tried—a failure.

Thirdly,—the Chaplains should also be resident on the island, and suitable quarters should be provided for them.

To these reverend gentlemen should be committed, not only the spiritual charge, which they have by virtue of their office, and which should be daily exercised for the benefit of their people, but also the superintendence of schools, conducted by free and competent teachers, for the secular instruction of adult prisoners.

These points we think particularly necessary to be attended to in an establishment professing to have for its object the reformation as well as the punishment of the criminals.

If our suggestions on this head be approved of, it will be for the Government, the officer in charge, and the reverend gentlemen themselves, to devise and carry out a reformatory system to its proper extent, in the teaching of useful manual trades to the uninstructed but better disposed part of the criminals, so adapted as to make neither their punishment nor their instruction a sole object, but prudently, carefully, and with moderation to combine both.

There only remains to be submitted to you a minor change which we think should be made, as to the person supplying the prisoners with indulgencies paid for out of their task work earnings.

The person who has this privilege also supplies the Superintendent and subordinate officers of the establishment with necessaries.

The prisoners objected, on one of our visits to the island, to this arrangement, and we think this objection well founded. A distinct purveyor for the prisoners of their own selection ought to be permitted.

In the appendices will be found the whole of the evidence taken by us in the inquiry,
 Mr. Ormsby's explanation, and various letters which passed between the Board and parties concerning it. The latter are not referred to in our Report, as not affording evidence upon any of the points investigated, and are only thus preserved in case hereafter any occasion should arise for their production.

We have the honor to be,

Sir,

Your very obedient servants,

EDWARD C. MEREWETHER.

I dissent from the opinion which the Report contains of Mr. Ormsby's conduct in regard to the use of the Government boats at Cockatoo, for the following reasons:—

Captain McLerie was Visiting Magistrate of Cockatoo from 1851 to 1856. It was during this period that the extensive use of the public boats for private purposes was introduced, and it appears to me, from the evidence of Captain McLerie, to have been so with his sanction.

Nos. 149 to 152.

Captain McLerie states, that on the days on which Mr. Ormsby had the permission of the Government to leave the island he was allowed the visitors' boat, which for that day was considered at his disposal, if not required for the public service.

31 to 41.

136 to 138.

149 to 152,

and 160.

Dunning's evidence, 170.

It has not been shewn or alleged that Mr. Ormsby ever quitted the island without leave. Captain McLerie has stated that he has granted leave for the boat to be taken fishing, with a net stated to have been purchased by the police, in their leisure hours.
 Leave was granted to the police to fish in one of the spare boats in the bay, provided the police were not on duty. This has been granted more than once by Captain McLerie.

Capt. McLerie,
 165, 166.

Captain McLerie also recognized Mr. Ormsby using the boat when not required for the public service, without leave from him.

Though the boat's crew were called police, it does not appear that they ever were required to do duty as police; and I believe further inquiry would show that they were entered as policemen, though in reality boatmen, to bring them under the provisions of the Police Act, as to discipline. I do not then consider that the crew, when taken on picnics, were necessarily taken from duty.

For these reasons, I consider Mr. Ormsby cannot be censured for the use he made of the boats, except on the occasion of his sending Mr. Pendrill to Sydney in an inferior boat—the visitors' boat having been taken for a picnic, under the knowledge of it being required for the public service.

At the same time, I do not approve of such a license being granted for the use of public property; it is liable to be abused, and is unnecessary. It remains, however, with Captain McLerie to justify the license he gave, and to satisfy the Government that he did not exceed his instructions.

APPENDIX A.

Bathurst,
Wednesday Evening.

God in Heaven bless you, my dear Sir, for the exposure you have made of the iniquities of Cockatoo, of which I have complained over and over again to Dr. Woolley and others. But it was one of the many misfortunes of my miserable position that this should be regarded as the mere offspring of the impatience natural to me, placed in such a position. "Witness" strictures are not in the least degree overdrawn; and whoever he may be—I think I can guess who the writer is—I should be thankful, in the belief that I am only doing my plain duty, if you will tell him that I shall be happy to corroborate and enter into the details of all the complaints he has made. I should, of course, be glad that the publication of my name were unnecessary; but even this sacrifice I hold as nought in the contemplation of the good which might, and I believe will, accrue from your publication of Mr. Ormsby's abominable dealings. Mr. Pendrill will tell you how earnestly I sought to improve the condition of my fellow prisoners while at that miserable place, and how all my efforts were thwarted and undermined. Pardon my writing to you in this familiar strain, but I have waited so long for this consummation that my joy has, perhaps, got the better of my discretion. I saw the Chief Justice last week here, and mentioned this very subject to him; but he gave me no encouragement to enter into details. Mr. Dalley will tell you also that, if it is possible to do so, I am doing my best to retrieve my former good character here, in the face of most heavy discouragement. If I can support you in anywise in this crusade against tyranny, and I may say every conceivable iniquity, be assured I shall only be too happy. My sense of revenge, if it ever existed, has subsided, and I only regard those who I know are subjected to such an infernal influence.

APPENDIX B.

(Private.)

Bathurst Free Press Office,
Friday Night.

Dear Sir,

I wrote so hurriedly the other day that I fear I was quite unintelligible; but at all events you must have understood my motive to express my gratitude for the energetic manner in which you have taken up the abuses at Cockatoo. I see a letter in Wednesday's Empire, signed "Still another Witness," which I believe to have been written by Mr. Taylor, the Clerk of the Bench there, or rather for him by a man named Hibbert, whose real name is Arnold, a prisoner and overseer in the hospital, who has been employed in a similar manner before, against Mr. Thomas the late Resident Engineer. It is well that you should know that this same Mr. Taylor is the individual who works the puppets on the Cockatoo stage; he forges the bolts which the Superintendent discharges; he is the M. Rodin to Mr. Ormsby's Aarigny; and a more crafty, unprincipled man, I believe, never existed.

The present Visiting Magistrate, Mr. North, can, if he will, bear testimony to the scandalous manner in which the Superintendent treated me and Beer; he accused me of exciting a mutiny, without the slightest shadow of a pretext for the accusation. I insisted upon its full investigation, and I have good reason to know that Mr. North saw through the whole thing. It was done to prevent my leaving the island at the expiration of my imprisonment, as there is a bye-law which prevents any prisoner who has received a sentence from the Visiting Magistrate from leaving the island for six months; thus in effect adding to the judicial sentence. This has been continually carried out in the instance of prisoners obnoxious to the Superintendent; he always has ready engines of perjury to support his wishes. Mr. Broderick, the overseer of the engine-house, can prove this. I would give much to be able to see you in proprid personâ; it is so difficult to convey all one wishes in a letter, and one so hurried as this. If I could afford it, I would come down to Sydney, where I much wish to be, on account of my own business.

There is also another point to which I very much wish to direct your attention. In the early part of 1856—I think in the month of March—a young man, named Daniel Dunmore, was attacked with pleuritis, and complained to the dispenser, asking to be taken into the hospital. The dispenser, however, a very ignorant man, most unfitted for his situation in every point of view, refused him admittance, and sent him to the exempt ground—a damp bank—where he was exposed to rain, and his disease was doubtless much aggravated by this treatment. He became so much worse the next day that he was literally carried from his ward to the hospital, and in three days died. He was a young man of one or two and twenty, the very picture of robust health; and the suddenness of his death, combined with the knowledge of his previous sufferings, all unheeded as they were, naturally produced a most powerful sensation among the other men, and, after a good deal of consultation and dispute as to what was the most preferable way of setting about it, they went in a body to Mr.

* 17—I

Brown,

Brown, and demanded a satisfactory explanation of the cause of his death. Their conduct was most violent, for they were much excited, and they threatened to drag the dispenser out of the dispensary by the hair of his head. I, however, interfered, shewed that by such violence they would defeat their own ends, and Mr. Brown suggested that a deputation should be sent up to Mr. Ormsby to request an investigation. They at once asked me to form one, and five others were chosen. We saw Mr. Ormsby, and after his usual system of deceit and treachery, he pretended to sympathise with the men, and granted them paper to make a statement to Captain M'Lerie, and every facility. I drew up the statement in the most temperate manner possible, and enumerated many other cases of cruelty at the hands of the dispenser, who is universally detested. To this document were appended the names of 163 men, all of whom had some grievance, real or imaginary, against the dispenser. After a delay of a fortnight, on a muster Sunday, Captain M'Lerie sent for the men who had signed the statement on behalf of the others—said that Dr. West had certified that the young man had been subject to pleuritis for some time previously—that he had refused medicine, and that an inspection of the hospital register would substantiate his statement. The first excuse should have entitled him, one would imagine, to more than ordinary care; the second was notoriously untrue, for he had refused his rations for three days previous to his admission to the hospital, and his groans at night disturbed his neighbours. Captain M'Lerie attacked me furiously as “a ringleader,”—threatened to send us all to the cells for 28 days, and said he was only prevented from doing so by the cautious manner in which I had worded the statement,—that he would do so on any future occasion, if he ever found two or three men conspiring together against the authorities, without a trial! The whole thing was treated as a plot to annoy the Government, and so it was hushed up. I have not the slightest doubt that both Captain M'Lerie and Dr. West connived at this—they must have done so. I have reported this to the clergy from time to time. An old man, named Murphy, also died from neglect not very long ago. The register in the hospital was altered to suit the story trumped up to meet the emergency, and a different treatment of Dunmore inserted. Beer, who has seen it, told me it was quite as improper as the one they were said to have adopted in the first instance. I cannot tell you how I have been persecuted while there in consequence of my connection with the Herald; Mr. Ormsby was so fearful of my exposure of all these things. With regard to the death of Hourigan, who was said to have been murdered, I believe in my heart that it was the result of a pure accident. He was a very quiet inoffensive man, and on the best possible terms with the man who is said to have struck him. This man (Smith) happened to have made himself obnoxious to the Irish party, who were all-powerful there, and they, being backed to their heart's content by Mr. Ormsby, wreaked their vengeance upon him by making this accusation. I think none of the better disposed men believed it at all. The clergy can tell you how very hard I worked to get up a school there, at the request of the men themselves, and how I was thwarted by Mr. Ormsby's representations to the Chaplain. I made, together with Beer, a formal complaint against Mr. O. to Mr. Pendrill, but he had not discovered as much as he knows now of the place. Father Kenyon, too, of the Sacred Heart, is well aware of what I had to endure there. I have the very worst opinion of the Superintendent in a moral point of view; I have heard him utter the most frightful blasphemy, seen him stamping and jumping with rage outside the door of his office, positively foaming at the mouth; I know, too, that he has concocted, or connived at the concoction of, false accusations against prisoners placed in “billets” where they were likely to see too much of the depons les cartes, and could not be made to act subserviently to their ends.

* * * * *

I trust that if any investigation does take place every encouragement will be given to the prisoners to come forward and say what they know. The mental imbecility to which the Superintendent would reduce all who come under his authority, and the consequent intimidation which he can exercise, prevent many from ever speaking the truth; but they would do so if security from further tyranny were assured them. Mr. Ormsby, has many most clever aides-de-camp, especially the man Hibbert, whom I have already mentioned, and they do not hesitate to employ any artifice or perjury to support him in any difficulty.

I must apologise to you for the length of this note, but I think you will yourself find an excuse for it. I have always so longed to find some means of communicating with you when I was upon the island, but I was so narrowly watched, and every one was a spy upon me, for some reason or other,—for I believe the Engineer's department looked upon me as “a chiel among them taking notes,” as much as the other party did. Mr. Ormsby made me promise, when I first went there, and before I knew anything of the place, that I would never write anything to be sent off the island which had not been previously seen by him. Of course this was done in anticipation of what might be. The present Chaplain, Mr. Agnew, knows a good deal which, I should think, he could have no possible objection to divulge. I have communicated much to him, and Mr. O. tried hard to prevent my having any intercourse with him.

APPENDIX C.

COCKATOO ISLAND AND ITS DISCIPLINE.

To the Editor of the Empire.

Sir,

The mail which arrived to day placed me in possession of several of your impressions, containing a number of letters and editorial articles on the disgraceful state of our Penal Establishment at Cockatoo Island. So far from the facts of these letters being exaggerated, I can assure your readers that I can bear my humble testimony to their truthfulness, even to the minutest particular. If it is possible for man to realise "a hell upon earth" we have only to visit Cockatoo between the hours of six and eight in the evening, and there we have it in all its hideous deformity. It is no exaggeration, Sir, to say that it is a hot-bed of vice—a nursery of crime, a den of the blackest infamy, where crimes that would rise the blush of burning shame upon a demon's cheek are nightly perpetrated,—and yet the guilty heartless wretches who are the perpetrators of these diabolical crimes—crimes that brought such a fearful retribution on Sodom and Gomorrah—have been frequently chosen to rule and domineer over their fellow prisoners. Even the ruffian Synnet, who attempted to assault Mr. Mann, and called him "a grey headed old —," who has been to Norfolk Island, and to all the penal establishments in the Colony, and was even charged with committing a nameless offence, was selected to fill the office of "camp constable," the highest official position it is possible for a prisoner to occupy on the island; and his predecessor was perhaps about as cold blooded a monster as ever trod the surface of God's green earth, and his successor but little better.

As to discipline, Sir, there is not such a commodity to be found on the island, except it be in the military quarters. The prisoners are all huddled together like so many wild beasts. The youth of eighteen, young and inexperienced in the ways of the world, being linked with one whose hairs are grey with vice and villainy, and the clattering of whose manacles proclaims him a murderer, or a felon of the deepest dye. The sad results of this constant association with the most hardened offenders are often but too apparent. Touch pitch and defilement necessarily follows. Crime, like the hydra-headed cholera, is contagious, as many a young man who has had to suffer punishment at Cockatoo will bear me testimony. Immediately he lands on the island, no matter how high and respectable a position he might previously have occupied, he is compelled to co-mingle with villains of every shade and dye. At night he is compelled to listen to the disgusting recital of their deeds of darkness—to their fearful oaths—their awful imprecations—their threats of vengeance,—and sleep is banished from his sorrowful eyes by the wild chorus of vulgar, ribald, and licentious songs. He has no kind instructor to give him a word of advice; his clergyman he sees and hears but for an hour on a Sabbath-day, and he is left to dwell in an atmosphere which religion never pierces, and which is thoroughly impregnated with every species of degradation and depravity. And this, Sir, is our Reformatory Institution!—this the establishment to which we send our criminals, in order to satisfy the law's demands, and to make them wiser and better men. Surely inquiry into such an abominable state of things becomes an imperative necessity.

There is one circumstance, Sir, which occurred in June, 1856, which appears to have escaped the notice of your correspondents, and which I bring under your notice, in order to show the gross carelessness which pervades every branch of the Penal Department of Cockatoo. A young man, in the month and year above alluded to, went to the Resident Dispenser, and complained of a severe pain in his side; he was told by the worthy disciple of Esculapius that he was scheming, and that if he came again he would put him in the cells. On the following day he applied again, complaining still of an increasing pain in his side, and received from the kind (?) Christian (?) dispenser a dose of strong Epsom salts, and told to proceed to his work. His fellow-prisoners were moved to compassion at his unfortunate position—disrobed themselves of their grey jackets, and made him a bed upon which to rest his weary limbs. The next day he was received into the hospital, and in two days subsequently was a corpse! Exasperated to observe a young man cut off, at the age of twenty-one, through gross negligence and cruelty, the prisoners made a complaint to the Superintendent, and requested an investigation. The facts of the case were placed on paper, and laid before the Visiting Magistrate, who declined to interfere, and even gently rebuked Mr. Ormsby for being so foolish as to allow the prisoners to make a charge against a free officer! The young man died from inflammation of the lungs; and there can be no doubt that, had he received proper medical treatment in the first instance, he would have been alive to this day. Facts, Sir, are stubborn things. Magna est veritas, et prevalebit. It cannot be denied that Cockatoo Island is in a most deplorable condition; and it becomes the duty of our present Government to see that the wishes of the public are complied with, by a searching and rigid investigation into the truthfulness of the statements which have recently gone forth to the world, bearing the strong impress of truth and veracity.

I enclose you my address, and remain, &c.

APPENDIX D.

278, Pitt-street,
22 July, 1857.

Dear Sir,

I was truly grieved at the turn matters took yesterday morning, and you must have remarked that I never made an observation nor spoke to either after the violent language I heard used; but when you recollect that Mr. Ormsby is my personal friend, I am sure you will feel, on reflection, the very unpleasant position you would put me in if I were to advise you against him. If you asked me if I would state what took place, if necessary, my answer would be, certainly, honestly and impartially, if he were my brother. If you do not know how to act yourself in this matter, it cannot be possible but you have a friend capable to whom you should make a full statement and be guided by him. You must have perceived I did not bid Mr. Ormsby good-bye, neither did I wish you to accompany me to the boat, so that neither party should suppose I acted with the slightest partiality, and, should I ever be called on to express my opinion, you may rely I shall do so with the same spirit.

Believe me, &c.,
GEO. WEST.

Saturday Morning.

(Reply.)

Let Mr. Peers prove before Dr. West when and where I made use of the expressions he accuses me of, relative to Dr. West's non-attendance on Friday week, for Monday morning last is the only time I spoke to him since Sunday week. If he can prove such a thing, I will willingly retract, but certainly not otherwise.

CHAS. ORMSBY.

Fitz Roy Dry Dock,
29 July, 1857.

Dr. Peers,

In accordance with your request, I beg to state that I was present during the time Mr. Ormsby was swearing at and abusing you on the morning of Tuesday, the 21st July, and am willing at any time to state what I heard.

Yours truly,
JOHN DUFF.

July 24, 1857.

Sir,

In submitting to you the following remarks, I sincerely trust you will give them your best consideration, which I feel assured, in your cooler moments, you will.

I sincerely regret the turn matters took on Tuesday last; what I said and did I considered to be my duty, and further, I believe you intended that Dr. West should know of what you said.

It is not impossible but I may be mistaken, but such was my impression. I assure you most solemnly that I never tried to injure you as the private and personal friend of Dr. West; on the contrary, I have often spoken to the Doctor of your kindness to me, to which Dr. West can attest.

I feel that I cannot submit to the fearful language used by you to me on last Tuesday, in the presence of my superior officer and the hearing of a number of convicts.

Whatever my present position may be in this island, I have always held that of a gentleman, and, therefore, I trust and hope you will see the propriety of retracting your assertions.

I am willing to make all allowances for your age, position, and, I must add, infirmity of temper. I would not wish you to do anything derogatory to your position on this island, or your character as a gentleman.

As to relative position being any impediment to your making any acknowledgment, I feel you would add to the dignity of a gentleman by recalling the offensive language used, for, were a noble to insult a day laborer who gets his bread by the sweat of his brow, and he knew that laborer could not resent the insult by meeting him like a gentleman, I have no hesitation in saying that that nobleman would sooner amply apologise than the feelings of the laborer should be outraged.

In conclusion, let me assure you that I never tried to injure you in any way whatever since this affair took place; I have refrained to mention it to any one except Dr. West, who declined to act in the matter, as you were his personal friend.

I fervently hope you will consult your better feelings, which, I feel sure, will prompt you to do that which is correct and just. Let me remind you that you are the father of a family; you have sons; those sons have sisters—pray, let me ask you what your feelings would be if one of your sons was called what you called me, and which I am ashamed to repeat; you would feel as I do, that violence had been done to the feelings of yourself and family, which nothing could remove but an ample apology.

J. F. PEERS.

The language used to me was, that I was "a damned liar, a damned scoundrel, and a villain, and a damned pimp."

J. F. P.

APPENDIX

APPENDIX E.

Mr. Samuel North examined, 20th October:—

I visit the island once a week, and hold Court. During the time I have been Visiting Mr. S. North.
Magistrate the convicts have behaved well. I have no suggestions to offer respecting their 20 Oct., 1857.
general treatment. Do not consider any regulation respecting myself requires alteration, nor respecting any other department on the island. I have always found that the discipline of the island has been carried out for the good of the service, and that the Superintendent has carried out the regulations and instructions faithfully. Eight months since, heard a complaint against the Superintendent to the effect that the cooks made the homminy bad, in order that it might be rejected and given to the Superintendent's fowls. I inquired into the matter, found the homminy bad, but had no reason to suspect that the homminy had been wilfully spoiled. I recommended a course to remove suspicion for the future; there was one complaint since, but it proved without foundation. My recommendation was to throw unconsumed homminy into the sea. I do not believe there is a pig on the island; there are fowls and goats, but, I believe, in accordance with the regulations. During the Superintendent's absence from the island the Assistant Superintendent (Mr. Brown) takes charge. The prisoners' daily rations are received by a delegate chosen by themselves; the delegate was formerly appointed by Mr. Ormsby, but, for the satisfaction of the prisoners, they were allowed to choose their own.

Mr. Ormsby examined:—

I have been Superintendent 16 years, and 44 years in the service; nearly 2 on Norfolk Island as Assistant Superintendent of Convicts and Visiting Magistrate; am exactly 60 years of age. I find the regulations for my guidance sufficient, and requiring no alteration. Mr. Ormsby.
I carry them out faithfully. There are no pigs on the island; there are goats, but not, so far 20 Oct., 1857.
as I am aware, beyond the prescribed number. Send requisition for provisions every morning to the contractor, Mr. Johnson. I draw the provisions for the convicts. The officers generally make arrangements with the contractor. I inspect prisoners' rations every morning; if bad, the provisions are condemned by a Board, and returned. There is a school on the island to educate free children; about 26 attend; they are taught by a convict; application to Government for a free schoolmaster was formerly made, but refused. One Roman Catholic and one Protestant clergyman attend twice a week. If a prisoner requires special attendance of a clergyman he is sent for. Divine Service is performed on Sundays by each, once. I sometimes attend, my Assistant Superintendent always. The sacrament has been administered some three or four times in the last sixteen years—the last time was about eight months since. There are three boats, viz., guard-boat, the visitors' boat, and a spare boat belonging to the island. The visitors' boat is for taking officers to and fro. The boats are never sent purposely for any other purpose, but visitors occasionally take the opportunity to come in the boats. The officers of the Civil Engineer Department can, on application to me, obtain a passage in these boats, on the same footing as my own officers. The usual way of transit to the main is by Waterview. My two sons have boats. They are employed daily in Sydney, and live with me. My sons are allowed to reside here and have boats, by verbal permission of the late Governor General, communicated by the Visiting Magistrate, Capt. McLerie. They never bring private visitors without authority to the island. My own private visitors get the permission of the Visiting Magistrate, and come in the visitors' boat. The officers of my department get leave from me to leave the island; the officers of other departments get leave from their respective heads. My sons generally return from Sydney by 6 p.m., but my younger son has been permitted to land as late as 11 at night. My daughters have sometimes accompanied my sons to the play, and have returned as late as 12 o'clock at night. Their boat is moored off at the proper buoy, in charge of the police. Letters written by the prisoners to friends off the island are read by my clerk, initialled and sealed by him.

Capt. Mann examined:—

I have had charge of the Engineer's Department on the island during eight years, Capt. Mann. especially the Dry Dock. The work of the dock has been done by prison labor, with a slight 20 Oct., 1857.
exception. The men are handed to me, or my overseers, every morning, and are distributed. I have at times doubted if all the available men have been handed over to me—that is, mechanics have been retained for servants, &c., and laborers sent in their place on the works. Eighteen months or so ago Perry, the black, was kept back; a shipwright was taken off the works and employed in the cells. I did not make any official remonstrance in the matter. I am instructed in Colonial Secretary's letter of 24th March, 49, and 12th May, 52, to perform all the mechanical works on the island. I have reason to suppose that such have been performed without my authority. On the 29th October, 1856, a prisoner was kept from work for the purpose of repairing slings for hauling up the Government boats; also, on the 27th of the same month, a requisition was made to Mr. Thomas for a man to build a chimney to a forge, and was granted. I have no other specific complaint to make against the Superintendent of having prevented my carrying out my duties, but I do not consider I have generally received cordial assistance from him. For instance, men having been taken off the works at a critical period, of which I complained to the Government, and which was investigated and reported upon by a Board. Nothing has occurred of a like character since that report. I am not impeded in any part of my duties by the Government Regulations.

23 OCTOBER, 1857.

Mr. John Taylor called in and examined :—

Mr. J. Taylor. I am Clerk to Superintendent and Clerk of Petty Sessions. I have been ten years here, and have charge of books and office, and have to keep records of Visiting Magistrate and Superintendent—under whose orders I am. The daily requisition for rations for convicts is drawn out by me, and signed by the Superintendent, and then given to the contractor. I do not draw the rations for the free officers; they are drawn by themselves. Some families draw all bread, some meat and bread. I draw my rations of meat twice a week, and my bread daily. Some officers compound with the contractor to secure meat instead of bread, and vice versa. The contract valuations. The tea and sugar of the free officers are supplied monthly to the Superintendent, who distributes them. The convicts are allowed sugar and salt, issued, the former twice a week, the latter once. These rations are weighed over to the delegates. We draw full diet for the whole of the men on the island, including those in hospital. The delegate issues the full diets to the overseer of the hospital without consideration of the diet which may be ordered for the patients. There is sometimes a surplus of homminy, chiefly in summer, which is invariably thrown into the sea. All reports of complaints are made to the Superintendent, who acts on them personally. On any boat approaching the island, a report is made to the Superintendent; the boat is received by the Superintendent, or his Assistant, who, for this purpose is the Inspector of Police. A report is made daily of all boats and persons arriving and departing by the Inspector. Report for 22nd annexed.

If complaints are made of any provisions, a Board is appointed by the Superintendent to investigate, in accordance with the provisions of the contract for supplies.

The man who supplies the indulgencies to the convicts, which they purchase out of their task money, is a Mr. Chandler,—attends the island every morning. Twice a week the prisoners come to the office, and the articles they require are taken down on the list, paid for at the time at Chandler's prices, communicated to the convicts by me. The following morning the list is given to Chandler, with the money, and the day after the goods are supplied. The indulgencies consist in tea, sugar, coffee and tobacco. Mr. Chandler supplies also free persons on the island including Mr. Ormsby, the Assistant Superintendent, and all free officers, more or less. Mr. Chandler supplies to them the same articles at the price paid by the prisoners.

A shop list, as laid before the Board, is a specific list of articles required by each man, and of the sums paid by each; an abstract is furnished to the shopkeeper; the sum is paid here and the receipt taken. (A receipt was shewn to the Board.)

Complaints have been made, but not lately; all such are immediately communicated to the Visiting Magistrate, and his decision taken and recorded.

All payments of public claims against the department are made by the Visiting Magistrate, by cheques drawn on sum placed to his credit at the Joint Stock Bank, and the account kept on the usual Government form. A task-work return is made by me monthly; the task-work clerk shewing the total amount of credit due to each man,—this is called the Task-work Register.

By the Board: Is there any check that the proper number of rations is issued to the prisoners daily, and no more? Yes. The check is that a list is supplied monthly to the Colonial Secretary showing the number of convicts rationed daily on the island; the contractor's claim is made out by himself from the requisitions, and is checked in the Superintendent's office before payment by the Visiting Magistrate; and the Government is able to check the quantity demanded in the requisitions from the returns we make to the Colonial Secretary.

Mr. Ormsby called in and examined :—

Mr. Ormsby. I remember the circumstance (stated in N.B.'s letter of 22nd September in Empire of 26th) of a disturbance on the island on Sunday; it occurred in the afternoon, in the prisoners' yard, not during Divine Service. The circumstance was as stated in my letter to Visiting Magistrate forwarding my replies to this and other charges in the Empire.

With reference to the discharge of the prisoner "Old Fox,"—he was discharged on the recommendation of the Classification Board, by direction of His Excellency the Governor General. I produce the letter communicating the decision of the Government. With respect to the prisoners Clarke and Roberts, they concealed themselves for the purpose of escape. I brought the case before the Visiting Magistrate, who discharged them; no reason for their discharge was recorded. Whenever a case of unnatural crime has been brought before me, I have reported it to the Visiting Magistrate; and whenever I have a doubt or suspicion of such a crime being contemplated, I have taken the precaution of immediately separating the parties. With respect to the Chinaman,—there was one sent to the cells for refusing to work; he had a desire to make a complaint, and at his desire an interpreter was sent for and came; he made his complaint to the Visiting Magistrate, who investigated it on 22nd April, 1857; his name was Tan, the man seen in the cells by the Board on the 20th instant. The nature of the complaint was that he was convicted of an offence of which he was not guilty, and that his former master, Mr. Sandeman, owed him money. He had asked for an interpreter several times before one was obtained, and before he was confined in the cells. An interpreter was obtained as soon as possible.

With respect to the sparring alleged to have taken place on the island—there was a man named Perry, overseer of the cells, a tall, athletic man, a boxer; he served two sentences here. I never witnessed a sparring match between him and another person. I never visited the yard, nor did either of my sons, to my knowledge, during a sparring match. I never knew of a sparring match going on. I have heard a few days after the occurrence that one has taken place between Captain Macdonald and Perry during the time Mr. Naper, of the the 11th, was officer of the guard. Captain Macdonald and some of his friends came to the island on a visit to Mr. Naper, by an order of the Brigade Major. At Mr. Naper's request I allowed Perry to go to the officers' quarters, on the ground that Captain Macdonald wished to see him. I was informed a few days after that he and Captain Macdonald had sparred together. I did not know that Perry was required for the purpose of sparring, or I should not have allowed him to go. Neither of my sons were present at the match. Sinclair, another boxer, was prisoner on the island with Perry. I was not present at any match between them, or my sons, to my knowledge. I don't remember hearing of a match between them in public or private on the island. Perry was a very remarkable man. Five years ago my younger son, I believe, received some lessons from Perry without my knowledge or consent. Neither Perry nor Sinclair was ever employed as cooks. Sinclair was by trade a barber. Sinclair was discharged from the island about five years ago—Perry for the second time two months since.

Mr. Ormsby.
23 Oct., 1857.

I am aware it has been said that a cedar plank was found near my quarters. Three decayed boards of little or no value were so found, which I believe had been taken from the stores by some one, I don't know by whom, or how they came there. I had nothing to do with it. I thought at the time they were put there for the purpose of annoying me. I reported the circumstance to the Visiting Magistrate, in a letter dated 21st August, 1856, of which I hand in a copy.

With reference to the charge that I had refused to give the visitors' boat to the Chaplain to proceed to Sydney, on the ground of its being repaired, I do not recollect the circumstance. I have gone in the visitors' boat with my family on a picnic. I do not know of any regulation forbidding me to use the boat so. I am in the habit of using it one day in the week for my private purposes, that is, taking myself and family to Sydney in the morning, and returning to dinner at three o'clock, keeping the boat during the time. I have not used the boat for picnics more than three times for the last sixteen years. I have not used the visitors' boat for my own more than one day in seven. I consider the visitors' boat under my orders in the absence of the Visiting Magistrate, and I am responsible for the use of it.

Mr. North re-examined:—

The visitors' boat is under my orders when I require it, at other times it is under the Superintendent's orders, for public purposes. I know of no authority for the boat being used for picnics or for any private purpose. I am aware that the Superintendent has used it to go with his family to Sydney once a week. I found that custom existing when I took charge as Visiting Magistrate, and I have not interfered with it, supposing that it had the sanction of authority.

Mr. North.
23 Oct., 1857.

Mr. James Henry Thomas was called in and examined as follows:—

1. By the Chairman: You are, I believe, a Civil Engineer? Yes.
2. And were lately employed upon the works on Cockatoo Island? Yes, as Resident Engineer.
3. Under Mr. Mann? Yes.
4. How long have you been employed in that capacity? Nearly four years.
5. Of what class of persons did your workmen consist? They were all prisoners; we employed no free labor, with the exception of two or three men who came out from England as mechanics, to put up the caisson.
6. The overseers—what were they? They were all free men.
7. But not belonging to your establishment? Yes.
8. You had quarters on the island, had you not? Yes.
9. Had you any family with you? My wife.
10. There have been a series of papers laid before us, published in the Empire newspaper, letters and articles relating to the state of Cockatoo Island,—are you aware of the circumstances referred to in them? Yes, I am aware of many of them.
11. Will you be good enough to look at this paper, the Empire of the 26th September. (The Chairman handed the paper to the witness.) You will there find a letter signed "N. B."? Yes.
12. Do you observe that this letter signed "N. B." is dated September 22nd? Yes.
13. Were you upon the island on the Sunday previous to that date? No, I was not there.
14. You had left the island at that time? Yes.
15. Then I presume you cannot speak upon any facts stated in that letter? No, not to this particular fact, but I have often during my residence on the island heard the same thing on Sunday.
16. What have you heard? A great noise in the camp, hallooing, and so forth; in fact almost every Sunday.
17. Were you in the habit of spending Sunday on the island? Occasionally.
18. And you have heard disturbances and noises upon that day similar to those described in this letter? Yes, the whole four years I have been upon the island.
19. At what time of the day? Generally in the afternoon; in the morning they were generally pretty quiet, on account of the clergymen coming down.
20. At what time in the afternoon have you heard this? In the afternoon or evening, when they were all mustered, and when they were in the wards as well, there was generally singing going on.
21. Was that on the Lord's Day more than on any other? I do not say that it was more on the Lord's Day, but every evening when they were in the wards they were singing.

Mr. J. H. Thomas.
23 Oct., 1857.

- Mr. J. H. Thomas.
- 23 Oct., 1857.
22. You are aware, I suppose, what time the Roman Catholic Clergymen spent on the island? He used to come sometimes in the morning; I forget whether it was before or after the Protestant Clergyman.
23. Did you attend either service? No; only three officers attended.
24. Do you know the time of attendance of the Protestant Clergyman? He came in the morning, but I cannot say the time.
25. You cannot say whether these noises were during the time these gentlemen were on the island? They generally came in the morning, and very seldom these noises were in the morning.
26. Are you quite sure you are correct about that—did they both come at the same time, or did they come at different times? They did not come together, because the boat used to go in with one, and upon its return bring the other.
27. Look at this paper, the Empire of the 2nd October, and you will there see a letter signed "Witness"? (The Chairman handed the paper to the witness.) Yes.
28. Can you speak to the facts contained in that letter? I have read the letter, and I believe everything stated in that letter is perfectly correct.
29. Are you the author of this letter? No; of neither of the letters you have shewn.
30. Did you see it before it was printed? No.
31. Do you know the author of it? No; I know the author of the first, but not of the second.
32. Respecting the rules and regulations—are you acquainted with the rules and regulations of the island? No; I do not know that there are any connected with the penal department; I have never seen any beyond the general regulations of the island; I have a copy of them, but they are not very explicit.
33. Were there any regulations affecting your establishment? All the regulations I had came from Captain Mann.
34. Will you be so good as to look at these regulations, and you will see some referring to the Civil Engineer—were you acquainted with these on the island? (The Chairman handed to the witness the General Code of Regulations, approved by the Executive Council, 10th September, 1855.) These are the regulations I have seen.
35. You are acquainted with them? Yes, we have a copy of them in the office.
36. Do you know of any breach of the first of these regulations in your own person? No breach of it from the time these regulations were made.
37. You know the regulations—is any one of them in itself such as to have been an impediment to you in the performance of your duties as Civil Engineer? No, I do not know that any of them were, without looking through them.
38. I suppose you have made yourself acquainted with these regulations before? No, I do not think so.
39. Has the operation of any rule been such as to impede you in the execution of your duty as Civil Engineer? No.
40. By Captain Ward: Have these regulations, as far as concerns yourself, been administered oppressively? With the exception of that one allowing people to land upon the island, I do not know of any. Mr. Ormsby allowed his own friends to land upon the island, to see his own family, without the order of the Visiting Magistrate, but he would not allow mine.
41. In allowing his own friends to land on the island, has he acted in conformity with these regulations? Yes.
42. By the Chairman: Of your own knowledge—and I must ask you particularly as to that—of your own knowledge, do you know of any infringement of these regulations? Yes; an infringement of the regulation, that no person having daily business in Sydney should be allowed to reside on the island.
43. What is that instance? Two sons of Mr. Ormsby, who are resident on the island, have daily business in Sydney.
44. Is there any other point you can mention? No, I think that is the only one.
45. Do you know of any irregularity to which that circumstance gives rise, of your own knowledge? No, I cannot say that I do.
46. Do you know, of your own knowledge, of any person having applied to the Superintendent for the regulations, who has not been able to obtain them? I have often heard the police —
47. That is why I guard myself; I say, do you know of your own knowledge? No, I do not.
48. Was there a policeman named Gleadall discharged on the charge of drunkenness? Yes.
49. You know that as a fact? Yes.
50. That was in your time? Yes, in my time.
51. Was he discharged from the police? He was.
52. Do you know anything, of your own knowledge, with reference to the charge—whether he was drunk or not? Not of my own knowledge; I was in no way connected with the police and could not know.
53. But you said just now that you knew the facts stated in the letter to be true, and I am anxious to have them categorically stated—by whom was he discharged? By the Visiting Magistrate, but upon the advice of Mr. Ormsby.
54. Upon the complaint of Mr. Ormsby, I presume, you mean—his complaint or advice—do you know, of your own knowledge, whether that man had asked for the regulations? Not of my own knowledge.
55. Do you know anything of the circumstances of an assault being committed on the police on the North Shore? Not of my own knowledge, but from hearsay.
56. Did you ever know any person to be punished, directly or indirectly, for demanding to see the regulations? No, not of my own knowledge. I have heard it complained of.
57. Did any prisoner ever complain to you that he had been punished for violating rules he had not the means of knowing? No.

58. Did you ever know, of your own knowledge, of any one being sentenced to the cells for insolence to the Superintendent or overseers? Yes; I recollect one case where a prisoner came up and wanted to see the Governor, I think it was during the time the Governor was on the island, and Mr. Ormsby refused to allow him; he was very insolent to Mr. Ormsby, and was sent to the cells by him. I know that of my own knowledge, for I was present; but I have heard of many other cases.
59. You were present and saw that the man was insolent? I was present on that occasion.
60. Do you know anything of a particular Chinaman being committed to the cells for throwing down his tools and saying he would not work? Yes; I recollect one case of that kind.
61. Were you present? Yes.
62. Did you see him throw down the tools, and hear him say he would not work? Yes; I saw him throw down his tools.
63. Did he speak in English? No.
64. Did you hear what he said? No.
65. Were you near enough? Yes; he said something in Chinese.
66. Not in English? No.
67. He threw down his tools and walked away? Yes.
68. What had he been working at? I know he had a pick in his hand.
69. Had you seen him for any length of time working with a pick? Yes, just before. I do not know whether that is the case referred to there.
70. Had he been working any time that you saw him? He had been some time—several times.
71. I mean on this day—I am only inquiring about this day? It was somewhere about the middle of the day.
72. Had he other men at work with him? Yes; there was a gang with him.
73. He threw down his pick and walked away, saying something in Chinese, which you did not understand? Yes.
74. Did you hear him say, "Interpreter no come, I no work"? No, I did not hear him.
75. You were so near as to hear him speak in Chinese? Yes.
76. But not in English? Not in English.
77. Did you ever know of any prisoner in a cell desiring to attend Divine Service on the Lord's Day? No.
78. Were you ever present when the Superintendent inspected letters sent by the prisoners or received by them? I have been present.
79. Will you tell us on what occasion, and what transpired—what was the mode of doing it? I could not say the date; but I remember one day being there when the Superintendent inspected a letter of a prisoner. There was something he wished to refer to in one of the letters, and he called Mr. Taylor to hand him over that particular letter, and he then read it out to me.
80. Mr. Ormsby read it? Mr. Ormsby.
81. Who else was in the office? Mr. Taylor; I do not think any one else.
82. Did any prisoner ever complain to you of the mode in which his letter was read? No.
83. Was there anything indecent or unbecoming in the mode in which Mr. Ormsby read this letter? He laughed over it: it was something about a sister.
84. With whom did he laugh? With me and Mr. Taylor: there was some queer expression made use of in the letter.
85. Was the convict present himself? No.
86. Was any other prisoner? I would not be certain whether one of the prisoner clerks was there, but he has been there two or three times when letters have been read over.
87. Did you observe any indecency in the mode of reading the letter? No further than he would read the funny passages and say, "This is a queer thing to say."
88. He made that remark aloud? Yes.
89. Was the prisoner present on either of those occasions? No.
90. And the remarks he has made have raised a laugh? Yes, they have raised a laugh.
91. Did you ever hear any one charged with committing an unnatural crime which was not inquired into? Yes.
92. How did you know it? I knew it from hearsay; as to the charge itself, I could not of course possibly know.
93. Did any of the prisoners tell you that such a charge was made? I have heard from people on the island with reference to the two men that concealed themselves that they did so for the purpose of committing an unnatural offence.
94. Was it the report of the island that the two men you allude to—that is the two men who absconded and concealed themselves on the island—did conceal themselves for the purpose of committing an unnatural offence? Yes; and I believe Mr. Ormsby told Mr. Duff—
95. That is going too far—were you present when Mr. Ormsby told Mr. Duff anything? No.
96. And you never inquired into the real facts of that case? No.
97. Are you aware whether the Visiting Magistrate did? No.
98. Was it his duty to do so? I believe it is.
99. Do you know of any person on the island having been accused of appropriating the provisions of the prisoners? No, but I have heard it; I know Mr. Ormsby was accused of appropriating the rations of the prisoners.
100. Do you know under what circumstances or to what extent? No; I think it was seven pounds of beef one morning that was taken up to his place.
101. Do you know the circumstances? No; no further than that it was taken to his place and appropriated by him.

- Mr. J. H. Thomas. 102. Do you know that he did take that? No; I only know by hearsay.
103. You say you are not the writer of the letter signed "Witness," and do not know who is? No, but I know who "N. B." is.
- 23 Oct., 1887. 104. But you do not know "Witness?" Not "Witness."
105. Did you ever know any act committed by Mr. Ormsby that was unjust or discreditable to the establishment? Yes.
106. Tell me what it was? There was one case, where I could not say that he took the cedar, but we missed a large plank of cedar out of the lumber yard; I informed Mr. Ormsby that it had been taken from the engineering stores, and he said, "Well, I will make inquiries and see who has taken it." He came out of the gate about a quarter of an hour afterwards, and said he heard one of my own foremen (Mr. Cahil) had got it in his quarters. I went down to Mr. Cahil's quarters, and told him I had heard such a report; he denied that it was true, and I then looked about the premises and found there was nothing there. I went to Mr. Ormsby, and told him Mr. Cahil had not got it. He said "Never mind, wait a little longer, we will try and find out who has taken it." Some time after that it was brought down from his house by the gardener to Mr. Cahil.
107. By Captain Ward: Which do you think the discreditable part of the transaction on the part of Ormsby? Mr. Ormsby must have known it was in his place.
108. How must he have known? A large cedar plank could hardly be taken without his knowledge.
109. You consider that Mr. Ormsby knew—you only believe that he knew? I believe he knew.
110. By the Chairman: You say you spoke to Mr. Ormsby about it yourself? Yes.
111. And that then he told you what he supposed about it? Yes.
112. Had the plank been lost on the day you spoke to Mr. Ormsby about it, or previously? On that day.
113. The day it was missed? Yes; it was during dinner time it was missed—between one and two o'clock.
114. Was Mr. Ormsby on the island on the day on which it was missed—be particular about that? Yes.
115. You are quite sure of that? I feel sure of it that he was on the island.
116. You are sure that he was not off the island on that day, and that he did not come back the next? Yes.
117. By Mr. Merewether: Was it a plank of any value—was it a two-inch or a one-inch plank? I think it was a two-inch plank, and twelve or fourteen feet long.
118. Was it sound? It was sound.
119. Useful timber? Useful timber.
120. By Captain Ward: For what purpose do you think Mr. Ormsby would have appropriated it had he taken it? To the making of furniture; I know he has done a great deal in that way.
121. Can you say that from your own knowledge? I have never been in his place, so that I cannot say from my own knowledge, but I have seen it go up from the wharf—legs of chairs and tables that have been turned in Sydney.
122. Not from Government timber? I could not say from Government timber.
123. By Mr. Merewether: What did you purpose using the cedar plank for? We had it in stock to use it for patterns and a variety of things.
124. By the Chairman: Respecting the use of the boat for the officers of the establishment—have you any complaint to make with respect to the mode in which that boat was used? The officers of the engineering department could never have the use of it. I have been down to the boat, and wanted to go to Sydney, and have been refused by the coxswain.
125. Did you ever apply to the Superintendent? I have applied to the Superintendent, and he has told me that the boat belonged to his department, and he would not let any one else use it.
126. By Captain Ward: Have you been refused since these regulations have been in force? Yes.
127. Can you specify any particular instances when you have been refused? I could not specify the dates, but I could say for certain I have been refused half a dozen times since these regulations have been in force.
128. Upon the plea that the boat has been required for the public service? No; it has been going to town with no one in but the crew. Upon one particular occasion Mr. Kenyon, the Roman Catholic Clergyman, was going to town. I went down to the wharf and was going into the boat, when they refused to go off with the boat and to take me to town. They said I had no right in the boat.
129. By Mr. Merewether: Was this occurrence subsequent to the promulgation of the rules? Yes.
130. By the Chairman: Have you ever known the boat to be used for parties of pleasure? Yes, many times. I have seen it go away with stores up Lane Cove; on one occasion I saw it go up to Five Dock, and I have seen it go away to various parts of the harbour.
131. How often have you seen that? While I was on the island I should say from twenty to thirty times I have seen the boat come back from pleasuring.
132. On these occasions was Mr. Ormsby in the boat? Yes, or some of his family.
133. You have seen that twenty or thirty times? Yes.
134. Can you say what length of time the boat has been absent? I have known it to be away till ten o'clock at night, and it has gone away at nine or ten o'clock in the morning.
135. Upon these parties of pleasure? Yes.
136. Have you known it to be away at ten o'clock at night frequently, when it has been employed in these pleasure parties? Yes; I have known it even later than twelve, as late as one o'clock, and I have even known it to be away all night, and to come home early in the morning with him.

Mr. J. H.
Thomas.

23 Oct., 1857.

137. On these occasions when it has returned so very late at night, or early in the morning, has it been employed in these parties of pleasure or picnics? Yes.
138. When Mr. Ormsby was one of the company? Yes.
139. And this has occurred so often as twenty or thirty times while you were there? Yes. I will take one occasion, when he went away up Lane Cove. When Mr. Penderill, the clergyman, came down to the boat, the Inspector, Mr. Dunning, told him that the boat was being repaired. I know that for a fact, for I was on the wharf, and Mr. Dunning told me he had to tell Mr. Penderill that story.
140. By Mr. Merewether: Did you hear him tell him? No; but Mr. Dunning told me that he had to tell him that as an excuse. Mr. Penderill said to me—"This boat is being repaired," and I said, "No, I have seen it go up Lane Cove."
141. By Captain Ward: Did Mr. Penderill apply to Mr. Ormsby for the boat? I do not know.
142. You do not know whether he applied to Mr. Ormsby or to the Inspector for the boat? No.
143. Do you know whether Mr. Ormsby instructed him to say that the boat was being repaired? No.
144. Then you do not know whether it was by the authority of Mr. Ormsby that the Inspector so informed the clergyman? No.
145. It might have been stated on the Inspector's own responsibility? Yes.
146. By the Chairman: You know the fact of Mr. Pendrill not being able to go to town with the boat, and that at the time the boat was away on a picnic excursion? Yes.
147. By Mr. Merewether: Who were the persons in the boat? Miss Ormsby was one.
148. Was Mr. Ormsby in the boat? I cannot say, but I know some of the family had gone away in the boat.
149. By Captain Ward: Can you name the date? No.
150. Can you state whether, on that occasion, Mr. Ormsby had leave of the Visiting Magistrate to leave the island? No.
151. You say they went on a picnic—how do you know that—did they take provisions with them? Yes.
152. You are sure they did not go to Sydney? No; they went up Lane Cove.
153. By Mr. Merewether: In which direction is Five Dock from the island, to the east or the west? To the east, between the dock and Balmain side.
154. You are quite certain that on the occasion you have referred to they were going to Five Dock and not to Sydney? On that occasion the officer, Mr. Davis, was in the boat; they went up Five Dock at that time; they were going fishing.
155. Is that in the opposite direction to Sydney? Yes, just the reverse.
156. Can you see the entrance to Lane Cove from the island, so as to be quite assured that the boat did not go to Sydney on those occasions to which you have referred? Yes; Lane Cove is just opposite.
157. By the Chairman: Do you, of your own knowledge, know whether the boat's crew have any indulgence not allowed to the other officers of the police? I have never seen them do duty as policeman, and I should have seen them on the island if they had been so employed.
158. Did you ever know the circumstance of any convict in irons going in the boat which conveyed the chaplain from the island? Yes, it was upon the occasion when the boat went up Lane Cove.
159. What boat was that he went into? One of the smaller boats, employed to cross to Balmain.
160. On the occasion when Mr. Pendrill went in a boat with a convict in irons the proper boat was absent upon a picnic up Lane Cove? Yes.
161. In the Empire of the 5th October, there is a letter signed "Another Witness"—will you look at that. (The Chairman handed the paper to the witness.) Do you know the facts stated in that letter? I know some of them by hearsay.
162. Are you the writer of that letter? I am the writer.
163. Were you present upon one occasion when the Superintendent made use of expressions to the dispenser of the island unfit to be repeated? I have only seen the correspondence.
164. Do you know the fact of your own knowledge? I was not present, but I have seen Dr. West's letter, in which he states it.
165. Do you know a prisoner on the island named Perry? Yes.
166. Have you ever seen him? Yes.
167. Have you ever seen him spar? No.
168. Were you present at any time when this prisoner was sparring? No.
169. As to the fourth question in this letter—have you told us what you know of that proceeding with respect to the cedar plank? Yes.
170. Did you ever know the Superintendent to take a man into the hospital who had been reported by the doctor as fit for work? Yes.
171. Who was that man? Spencer was the man.
172. What was he? A carpenter.
173. You know that he took a carpenter named Spencer into the hospital after he had been reported by the doctor fit to work? Yes.
174. What has become of that man? He has left the island.
175. Was he employed in any way? Yes, up at Mr. Ormsby's.
176. Are you aware of that of your own knowledge? No, I am not; but I have heard him say so.
177. Do you remember the circumstance of a number of prisoners leaving the works? Yes.
178. You know that of your own knowledge? Yes; I was present upon one occasion when a number of prisoners left the works.
179. Did you complain, or were you present when any complaint was lodged with the Superintendent about that? Yes; I went in and complained to the Superintendent.

- Mr. J. H. Thomas.
23 Oct., 1857.
180. What was the result of that? I was up at the time at my office, which was then next to Mr. Ormsby's. I went in to him, saying that these men had left the works, and had come up to me in a threatening way, and I asked him to give me some assistance in sending them away. This he refused, and said he could not do anything with them, and could not send them down. The men remained there for some time, in a very threatening manner.
181. When the men left the works what did they do? They came up to my office, which was next Mr. Ormsby's, and commenced abusing me at the gate.
182. And you went and complained to Mr. Ormsby? Yes.
183. And asked for some assistance in sending them away? Yes.
184. What did he say or do? He said he would have nothing at all to do with it, and refused to give me any assistance.
185. What became of the matter? After remaining some time, they walked away on to the works.
186. By Captain Ward: Was this a matter that the former Board inquired into—was it connected with the men working in the water? No.
187. This particular circumstance was not inquired into by the former Board? I believe not.
188. By the Chairman: Do you know, of your own knowledge, the fact of the prisoners refusing in a body to go to work? I was not present on that occasion, but I know it from hearsay.
189. The eighth paragraph in your letter you have already referred to—you say the chaplain went away in a small boat, with a convict in irons, while the proper boat was away at a picnic? Yes.
190. You have told us of this boat having been employed for parties of pleasure—do you know how frequently it was employed on any private business of the Superintendent? From hearing the policeman say so; of course I could not know it of my own knowledge, unless I had been constantly in the boat.
191. In reference to paragraph 11 of this letter—do you know whether the Superintendent has upon any occasion borrowed money from any of the prisoners? I have been told so.
192. Have any of the prisoners told you that they have lent money to the Superintendent? No.
193. Do you know any instance whatever of any person having been singled out as an object of persecution, for having made complaints? Yes.
194. Tell me the parties? John Henry was one of the prisoners singled out.
195. Tell us what the circumstances connected with him were? He was a man who worked very well for us, and I tried to obtain for him an overseer's place, and succeeded; but Mr. Ormsby objected, and said he would not have this man for an overseer, although the reports from all the foremen were most favorable to the man's conduct on the works. Upon several occasions, on the smallest pretext, he was put into the cells.
196. Have you ever known any prisoner to be treated with injustice by Mr. Ormsby? Yes, I believe that was a piece of injustice in that case.
197. Do you know any of the prisoners who have been the objects of particular favor? Yes, I know two prisoners, now at present in his office, who are in particular favor.
198. Who are they? Keogh is one.
199. Who is the other? I am not certain of his name.
200. What is the particular favor shewn to them? They are allowed to walk about the works and look about just the same as free men; I have complained to Mr. Ormsby about it. These men would come and stand with their hands on their sides and look about the works the same as free men.
201. You think these men are treated with undue favor? Yes.
202. Do you know any reason for that? The clerks holding the same rank in the Engineer's office are not allowed out on Sunday; these men are. They walk about the island, sit by the flag-staff, and go where they please; in fact the free overseers are in dread of these men. I have complained to Mr. Ormsby many times about these men.
203. You regarded them with suspicion—as spies? Yes.
204. You mention Mr. Mannion as an instance of a person who complained, and was singled out as an object of persecution—was he on the island during your time? It was before my time.
205. You also mention Mr. Ainslie? Mr. Ainslie was there during my time.
206. Do you know any instance of persecution to which he was exposed? He was not allowed to go off the island on several occasions, I have heard. Mr. McLerie would not let him leave.
207. Mr. Collier? Mr. Collier was dismissed on account of having said that something was under consideration; he said he was dismissed for having appeared to be on the side of the Civil Engineer.
208. By Captain Ward: Are you certain, as a matter of fact, that that was the reason of his being dismissed? I only know from his own statement, and from the general belief of the people on the island; I have not seen the correspondence.
209. By Mr. Merewether: Whose department was he in—was he in the penal department? He was partly in one and partly in the other. The Engineer's department paid him for what he did for that, and the penal department for what he did for that; but he was considered to belong more to the penal than to the other department.
210. Was it from the fact of his being employed there as a penal officer that you got his services? Yes. He was put down on our abstract as well as upon the other.
211. By the Chairman: Were you on the works at the time an inquest was held on the body of a prisoner who was killed in the dock? Yes.
212. Do you know, of your own knowledge, the circumstances under which that man met with his death? Not of my own knowledge.
213. Did you see him after his death? Yes.

214. In what manner did he die—what was the cause of his death? I have heard many people on the island say (it was a common thing) that he was knocked into the dock.
215. Is there anything else you would desire to add upon the subject of the present inquiry—any fact that you know of your own knowledge? The only fact is the impeding of the works whenever they were wanted to be got on with.
216. In what way has Mr. Ormsby ever impeded the progress of the work? By preventing our keeping the men out of an evening.
217. After hours? Yes.
218. By Captain Ward: That question was inquired into by the Board which sat before? Yes.
219. And the papers are before the present Board? Yes.
220. By the Chairman: Is that what you allude to? Yes.
221. Are you aware that that was rectified afterwards? I never kept them out afterwards.
222. Is there anything else you would wish to add? Only that I have always been met with every kind of annoyance. I have been stopped when I have been going away from the island. An armed police boat was sent after me on one occasion, and attempts have been made to prevent my leaving the island; and upon some occasions I have been entirely prevented.
223. By whom? By the police; and they have told me they have been acting under Mr. Ormsby's orders.
224. By Captain Ward: Did you ever appeal to Mr. Ormsby on those occasions? Yes.
225. What answers did he give you? He gave me no redress, but said he had a right to do so.
226. Did you report it to the Government? Yes—at least I reported it to Captain Mann.
227. Did he take any steps in the matter? No. On one occasion they attempted to stop Captain Mann, when he was going to leave the island.
228. Was not that before the Board sat, and these regulations were framed? Yes.
229. That was more than two years ago? Yes.
230. Can you give the names of some of the officers who can bear testimony to the statements you have made? Yes,—Inspector Dunning, with reference to the regulations concerning the boats; Mr. Peers, the dispenser, with reference to No. 2. With reference to No. 3, I have heard it from so many of the overseers, that I can hardly specify them; I will name Mr. Easton to support that, and also Mr. Brown. With reference to No. 4, about the cedar, Mr. Cabil.
231. By the Chairman: About the charge of the seven pounds of beef sent up to the Superintendent's quarters, who can support that? I would ask Mr. Peers.
232. He could not have seen that from the hospital? No, but he is so much connected with the department that he would be able to state. With reference to No. 6, Mr. Easton, Mr. Cabil, and Mr. Kelleher. With reference to No. 7, about the prisoners refusing to go out to work, Mr. Broderick. No. 8, with reference to the Chaplain being unable to obtain the police boat, Mr. Dunning. No. 9, all the police could speak to that. Captain Mann will support No. 10; and No. 11 Mr. Peers; he told me about Mr. Ormsby borrowing money of the prisoners. With reference to the postscript, the Coroner.
233. By the Chairman: You are appointed to some new situation under the Government, are you not? I am an applicant for employment.
234. By Mr. Merewether: When you commenced your evidence, you spoke of the frequent desecration of the Sabbath? Yes.
235. How were you aware of that—did you live on the island? Yes.
236. How long did you live there? Four years.
237. You spoke of this occurring frequently; at what period of the day did it occur? Generally towards evening.
238. Was it before the clergymen left, or after? After the Protestant Clergyman left; I could not say to an hour or two.
239. You have spoken of breaches of the regulations, or instructions,—was there any other besides that you have mentioned. There is one, by implication, in one of your charges, with reference to the carpenter named Spencer; was he ever taken by the Superintendent to work at his own quarters? Yes.
240. Is that the only instance? That is the only instance that I can speak positively to as being reported at the time. I know of several times that this has been the case, but this one case was reported, and a great deal of fuss was made about it. That is the reason I take that case.
241. You are not aware, of your own knowledge, that Mr. Ormsby is in the habit of employing the men in his private service? No; I have no access to his premises.
242. Was there ever a constable of the name of Murray on the island? Yes.
243. Is he there still? No.
244. When, and why did he leave? I only know from what he tells me himself; I do not know of my own knowledge—of course I cannot.
245. He was dismissed? He was.
246. By whom? I do not know who has the power; I believe the Visiting Magistrate.
247. You have stated that the boat has been absent from the island the whole night? Yes.
248. Was Mr. Ormsby in the boat on that occasion? Yes, at least I know he came back in it in the morning. The police could speak to that.
249. Is that the only occasion on which he has been absent with the boat the whole night? No; I have seen him come back in the morning early.
250. Has he been absent without leave? That I cannot say.
251. You cannot specify the occasions on which he has been absent? No; but I do not say these things have been common. I would wish to examine Mr. Duff in support of No. 2, and Dr. West.

Mr. J. H. Thomas.

23 Oct., 1857

TUESDAY, 27 OCTOBER, 1857.

Present:—

SIR W. W. BURTON, KNT., IN THE CHAIR.

E. C. MEREWETHER, Esq.

CAPT. E. W. WARD.

Mr. G. West,
M.D.

Mr. George West, M. D., was called in and examined, as follows:—

27 Oct., 1857.

1. By the Chairman: I believe you have medical charge of the prisoners on Cockatoo Island? I have.
2. How long have you had that charge? I think it was in March, 1853, I got the appointment.
3. What is the medical establishment of the island; what does it consist of? Myself and dispenser, and we are allowed what is called an hospital overseer—one of the convicts.
4. What else? We are allowed an hospital servant, a man who cleans and looks after the wards.
5. If there were any pressure, I presume you would be allowed more assistance? I have never had any occasion to require it; but on one occasion, before I went there, there was a great outbreak of influenza. Dr. O'Brien, the then Visiting Surgeon, applied to the Government, and got a medical man, who was a permanent resident on the island, for the occasion.
6. Will you be kind enough to tell us the general state of health of the convicts since you have had medical charge of the island? It has been very good; we have had no serious outbreak since I have been there. We have had a good deal of chronic disease, but that has arisen chiefly from their previous bad habits.
7. And, perhaps, from exposure to wet and cold? I do not think that has had so much influence; no doubt, a great many are subject to rheumatism, which has been caused by lying out in the bush.
8. What number of people are there in the hospital now? Very few; I think only one or two serious cases.
9. You do not know the number? I do not know the exact number.
10. When did you visit the island last? I have not visited the island on my last two days, because the boat was then occupied by the Board.
11. We supposed when we were on the island the number to about eight? It is about that.
12. Of all diseases—are there any seriously ill? There is one, or there may be two cases, where I look upon the diseases as likely to prove fatal. One man, Holcroft, has serious disease of the heart.
13. Are there other cases of disease of the heart? There are two or three cases, but not so serious as that, still they are not able to go to severe work.
14. How often do you visit the island? Twice a week, and oftener if necessary.
15. During other times the sick are under the charge of the dispenser? Yes.
16. Is he a regularly educated medical man? I never saw his qualification, but he has explained to me that he has been in the Royal Navy. He has two medals, one a gold and the other a silver medal. One was given to him by the Belgian Government for services rendered by him in the case of a vessel that was cast away at sea, with cholera on board. The doctor was dead and he volunteered his services on board the vessel. I asked him for his diploma, and he said it was up the country with some books and instruments which are in pledge. He is now leaving me, and is going to take charge of some district in the country.
17. Is he capable of prescribing for the people during your absence? Perfectly.
18. Have you seen his prescriptions? If a patient has been to him between my visits I question him as to what he has been doing.
19. By Captain Ward: Does he write down in a book what he gives? When I prescribe I do not know what he does.
20. By the Chairman: Have you seen what his prescriptions have been and have you approved of them? He has told me what he has given, and I have never had reason to find fault with him.
21. Are your prescriptions written in a book? When I make any alteration he writes from my dictation.
22. Do you not think that a medical journal, or treatment book, is necessary for the guidance of any one who may come after you? I do not think so; if a man has any case the particulars of which he wishes to publish he may do so.
23. But should not the particulars of every case be recorded? I was sixteen years connected with the gaol at Longford as Visiting Surgeon, and they did not require it there; I had my own book, but that was my private property.
24. If there were any serious cases you would enter them in your book? Yes.
25. I suppose you keep such a book as that in the case of private patients? Where I have anything important or unusual.
26. We wish to ask you about the rations,—we have been told they are drawn for a certain number of men including the servants on the establishment and the patients in the hospital? Yes.
27. I believe frequently many of the men are under low diet? Yes.
28. What becomes of the rations of those who are under low diet? I cannot tell you.
29. Have you never inquired? No; I never conceived that I had any right to interfere with that.
30. Who orders the low diet? I make the change when the diet is altered.
31. Who makes the requisition for the supply? There is a list sent up every day of the number of patients in the hospital, and also of those who are exempt from work; they are sent up on the same sheet and distinguished as "hospital" and "exempt;" and then if any extra comfort is needed for any of them there must be a written requisition signed by me.

32. Otherwise the regular diet of the establishment is drawn by the dispenser? It is sent in by the usual routine. Mr. G. West,
M.D.
27 Oct., 1857.
33. By Mr. Merewether: The issue of the diet is left to the discretion of the dispenser; unless it is otherwise specially ordered by you the men draw their full allowance—a certain allowance of meat and bread? When they go into the hospital they are allowed the full ration, and when I see them, which I do when I visit them on my next visiting day, unless in important cases, when I go down at night, I immediately give orders as to diet, but I do not think the dispenser alters it.
34. Do the people get it? Yes, certainly.
35. Whether adapted to their complaints or not? If it is a very important case I am sent for at once, and I then give directions as to the diet at once; that is if it be a very serious case.
36. By Captain Ward: Then I understand you to say that the men always get full diet unless otherwise ordered by you? We have three diets,—the full diet, the middle diet, and the spare or low diet.
37. Do they always get full diet unless otherwise ordered by you? Yes.
38. When you give orders do you give them in writing? No; whatever I desire to have done I sign; it is written by the dispenser.
39. Have the men the means of seeing that they get the diet you order them? I constantly ask them—sometimes they ask for milk, and if I think it necessary I order it.
40. Have they any means of ascertaining whether they get the diet you order them? I do not know; I generally order it at their bedside.
41. You do not prescribe in the hospital book? No.
42. By Mr. Merewether: There are three scales of diet? Yes.
43. And the discretion of giving out these scales of diet rests with you? Yes; what I mean is, that I have the power of giving them what I think they need; I can also give them medical comforts, as brandy, wine, and eggs sometimes, but I must sign a requisition to the Superintendent, shewing that such and such is required.
44. By the Chairman: Do you receive a salary for your attendance? Yes.
45. What is it? It was originally five shillings a day, but then there is the gold increase.
46. How often do you visit the island? Twice a week, or oftener, if necessary.
47. Upon your requisition is a boat provided for your going to and fro? I do not make a requisition; it was arranged from the commencement that I should have a boat; formerly the Water Police boat took me down. When there was a new boat attached to the island, Capt. McLerie, the Visiting Magistrate, asked me on what days I would go; he said he would take Mondays and Thursdays, and I said I would visit on Tuesdays and Fridays, and these days have remained mine ever since.
48. Have you ever had any difficulty in procuring a boat in the performance of your official duties? No; I have never had any difficulty, unless the same thing has occurred as has occurred recently, when the Governor has required to visit the island; when you went to the island in the same way the boat was required by you.
49. You have never suffered any hinderance from the Superintendent of the island? The Superintendent has done everything to aid my comfort in that way.
50. Have any complaints been made to you by the people in the hospital of ill treatment? Never.
51. Have you ever observed anything like ill treatment of any of them? Never. I think the Superintendent is rather too anxious to interfere about them—for instance, the other day, a man wanted to get into the hospital; he was known to me as a malingering, and the dispenser refused to take him in; he shewed his leg, which was very much swollen; this had been caused by a ligature bound round the leg where there had been an old wound. The Superintendent was very angry about it, and sent an order that he should be instantly taken into the hospital. When I went I did not like to say anything to the old man about it, as it had been done out of kindness, but I ordered the man to be put under malingering treatment, to keep him to low diet for a few days, and then when he had had enough of it to let him out. When I went there again I spoke to the Superintendent about it, and told him he was wrong; he said he was very sorry, but that as I was not there, he was very anxious about the man.
52. You are aware that certain complaints have been made to the Government respecting the management of Cockatoo Island, and that we have been appointed a Committee to inquire into these complaints? Yes.
53. Do you desire to give evidence upon any points? I have no complaints to make.
54. Have you any information to give? I should like to say one thing with reference to what has appeared in the papers. One of the gentleman who has written a good deal in the Empire on the subject—the late clergyman—is a man who, from my own knowledge, is not trustworthy; it is a hard expression to use, but he wrote to the Government concerning me what was utterly untrue.
55. What was it? It is very simple. Every second Sunday in the month the Visiting Magistrate and the Surgeon, during Capt. McLerie's reign, visited and inspected the prisoners, and we had an arrangement that we would wait ten minutes for each other. Upon this particular Sunday morning I called upon Captain McLerie, and he said he was not coming, I therefore went without him, but I took young Mr. Davison, who is now my son-in-law, with me. When I left the boat and went up to the camp, the men were paraded for inspection. The Deputy Superintendent, Mr. Brown, asked me if I were going to inspect the men. I said I did not think I would, as it was a thing that had never occurred before. He said, "Well, they are all ready." "Yes," I replied, "I see they are, but I would rather not interfere." I then went into the hospital and found this gentleman, Mr. Pendrill, there. The men were then dismissed for parade, and sent in for his duty, for prayers. After he went away I went round the hospital and did my business, and then I took my son-in-law, Mr.

- Mr. G. West, M.D.
27 Oct., 1857.
- Mr. Davison, with me. I showed him the dormitories, I showed him the cells, I showed him the dock and other things. I then went up to Mr. Ormsby's, and got a message that the clergyman wished to go off in the boat with me, and I said that I would wait half an hour, as my professional engagements would prevent me staying longer. When I went down to the boat there was no appearance of the clergyman there, though the Roman Catholic clergyman was. I took out my watch, and said, "I do not think I can wait longer, as it will take us so long to get to Sydney, where I have an engagement." I did not conceive besides, as the Protestant clergyman did not come out with me, that he had any claim upon me. I therefore proceeded to Sydney without him. Upon this he wrote to the Government complaining of me. He said I had stopped the inspection of the men, that I had brought two gentlemen with me, and that, in place of going up to perform my business, I had been shewing these gentlemen the curiosities, or whatever I may call them, of the island. Now I did not bring two gentlemen with me, one of the parties with me was the dispenser. I did not inspect the men. I did not take Davison round to see the island till I had attended to my business.
56. Still you, in fact, took Mr. Davison? Yes, but that was after the clergyman went in to prayers.
57. Then the falsehood consisted in saying that you inspected more than you did, and that you had two persons with you instead of one? Yes; the Visiting Magistrate contradicted it all, without referring it to me.
58. Let me in candour, and for the sake of the character of the gentleman, put this question to you; was it not the fact that you showed Mr. Davison the place? Not till he went to his duty.
59. You did not inspect the men? I did not inspect the men.
60. Might not that be a mistake on the part of the clergyman, without being a wilful untruth? I thought if it had been a mistake he should have come to me and apologised.
61. There might be an error in what he did, but would you say a man was untruthful because he made a mistake? I cannot conceive how he could have made a mistake, for the hospital was just open, and he was sitting there.
62. By Mr. Merewether: Have you any thing to do with the physical classification of the prisoners when they come on the island—do you say, "That man shall go into such a gang"? Yes.
63. By Captain Ward: Is the state of the man's health taken into consideration by you when he is brought to the island? The first thing that is done when a man is brought to the island is, that he is taken before the dispenser, who inspects him; if he is in perfect health he is sent to work; if it is a case requiring further inspection, the man is reserved till he is brought before me.
64. By Mr. Merewether: You indicate the physical capabilities of the men? Yes, but they are very hard to manage; for instance, if they want to get off hard work they say they have a pain in their hip, or in some other place; there are a good many who mangle.
65. By Captain Ward: How are the medicines for the island obtained? In a very uncomfortable way; but it will be altered now. Formerly, my requisition went to the Medical Adviser to the Government, who reported upon it, and sent it forward to the Government; then it was sent to the Colonial Storekeeper, and in two or three months we got it.
66. Are the accounts for the medicines paid by the Visiting Magistrate? No; the medicines are sent from the Colonial Storekeeper's. The bill of the contractor, who is generally Mr. Morgan, the druggist, is sent to the Colonial Storekeeper, who forwards it to the island, and my dispenser has to check off every item, and to see that it is correct; when he says it is correct I sign it, and it is then returned.
67. Who pays the account? The Government.
68. By the Visiting Magistrate? I suspect the Colonial Storekeeper does; he gets the requisition, and advertises for contracts.
69. How often do you send in your requisition? It is supposed to be sent in only once a-year; sometimes they are very stringent, and curtail it, and I have to send in an additional requisition; sometimes they give it, sometimes they do not.
70. I understood you to say that you have no control over the dispenser if he chooses to alter the diet in your absence—that you have no means of ascertaining it? I have no means of ascertaining it.
71. He might give low diet when high diet was supposed by you to be given? He could do it, but I do not see what object he could have in doing so, or how it could be of any advantage to him.
72. By the Chairman: Have you no check upon the expenditure of the medicines? We are not allowed more than a certain sum for medicines, and we must keep within that.
73. The medicines are allowed very much like the diet, are they not—you do not know whether they are properly expended, whether they are thrown away or given away? No, I do not know.
74. By Captain Ward: Can you say what the annual expenditure for medicines amounts to? About £80.
75. Are all the free people on the island entitled to use the medicines? I do not think they are entitled; but we give them.
76. What, to Mr. Ormsby's family? No.
77. How does he get medical assistance? He sends to me when he wants me.
78. As a private practitioner? It is in that way I go; I would not take money from him.
79. He has no claim upon you? No.
80. Has he upon the medicines on the island? It was ruled in Ireland, when I had charge of the Longford Gaol, that it was merely a matter of courtesy—that the governor had no claim upon the services of the medical man. I had some misunderstanding with the governor, and and in consequence the matter was referred to the Inspectors of Prisons in Ireland, and they wrote to say that, under the Act, he had no power to compel me to attend him.

81. Does Mr. Ormsby get the use of the medicines? I do not know; he may have done, once or twice—any small thing.

82. Or any of his family? He has very seldom required any thing.

83. Or any any of the free servants? They all do.

84. Are they entitled to it? I think they are; they were always entitled to it in Ireland.

85. By Mr. Merewether: If a record were kept of the prescriptions, would you not then be able to check the consumption? I think not; for instance, in making an infusion, the dispenser might burn it, and then it would have to be thrown away. Medicine, above all things, is one you cannot make a second use of.

86. By Captain Ward: What is your general opinion of Mr. Ormsby's government of the island? I must say I do not think any one could be more anxious to carry out the government of the island efficiently. He may err in judgment, but he is anxious to see the duties properly carried out.

87. Did you ever hear of Mr. Ormsby's life having been threatened, as stated in Mr. Pendrill's letter? I think Mr. Ormsby told me of some man going to attack him, and that he took up a ruler and knocked him down.

88. Has there been during your time an inquest upon a man who died there? There have been many, but I have not been at them.

89. By Mr. Merewether: Was there an inquest upon a Chinaman who was said to have been murdered, or knocked down from a wall on the works? I recollect I saw the man.

90. Were you called in? I was not called in.

91. By Captain Ward: Did you hear recently that a prisoner threatened the life of the Visiting Magistrate? I know they are a most diabolical set; one of them attacked the dispenser; but I never received offence from any man on the island. They are always civil and obedient, and I am generally very sharp with them. I do not give way to them.

The Reverend Philip Agnew was called in and examined, as follows:—

1. By the Chairman: You are a clergyman of the Church of England? Yes.
2. And are at present chaplain of Cockatoo Island? Yes.
3. How long have you been in charge of Cockatoo Island? I think about five months.
4. Have you any other charge? Yes; I am chaplain of Darlinghurst Gaol, and also to the Immigration Barracks.
5. Have you been long engaged in such duties? Yes; I was some ten years ago chaplain of Darlinghurst Gaol, and chaplain of immigrants. I have had a good deal to do with men of that class and description.
6. How often do you visit the island? Twice, and sometimes three times a week.
7. Always on the Lord's Day? Yes, always.
8. And if there be any urgency are you sent for? I have never been sent for particularly; but I always hold myself ready to go if I am.
9. Where do you perform Divine Service on the island? In the usual place; I believe it is used as a dining room; it is where the men mess.
10. Is that convenient for the purpose? Yes, very, considering the other accommodation there.
11. Do you go through the whole of the service? Yes, I go through the whole of the afternoon service.
12. Do you preach a sermon? Yes, every Lord's Day.
13. What is the conduct of the men during divine service? They are very peaceable and very respectful, but there is one peculiarity I have remarked about them. In the gaol at Darlinghurst the men stand or sit according to the portion of the service read, but at Cockatoo that is not so well observed; they generally sit.
14. Throughout the whole service? Yes.
15. Have you ever explained their duty to them in that respect? I have hinted it to them, but I have never made it a particular point to insist upon it.
16. Do you not think you should, in the case of people of that class, instruct them as to the proper attitude of devotion? It struck me as arising from this cause,—that at Darlinghurst the Principal Gaoler, when well, is always present, and the people follow his example as to rising and sitting. This is not the case at Cockatoo.
17. Does the Superintendent of the island attend your service? No, never.
18. And never has during your time? No. I think it would be as well if he did.
19. Do the civil officers of the establishment? Yes, several of them; three or four of them.
20. Does the Assistant Superintendent, Mr. Brown? No, Mr. Brown does not attend.
21. Do the overseers attend? Two of them pretty regularly.
22. Only two out the whole number of overseers? Yes; there is a person also who acts, I think, as clerk of the establishment.
23. Mr. Taylor? No.
24. Is there a man who officiates as schoolmaster? Yes.
25. Are the overseers free men or convicts? Free men.
26. Then on the part of the overseers it is a matter of choice whether they will attend or not? It is so.
27. Then there is no superintendence but of these men during Divine Service? No.
28. Are you aware whether Mr. Ormsby is a Protestant or not? He is.
29. And the other overseers of whom you have spoken, are they Protestants? They are Protestants.
30. Is Mr. Brown a Protestant? He does not attend, and I have never inquired.

31. What number of Bibles and Prayer Books have you on the island? There is a Prayer Book for each person. They are plentifully supplied with respect to Prayer Books, but they want a couple of dozen Bibles.
32. How many Bibles are there? About fifty.
33. Are there any other religious books? A few, but not sufficient.
34. Under whose care are they kept during the days you are not there? They are kept in an apartment under the charge of one of the overseers, who has a list of them.
35. Do you occasionally look into that department? Every week.
36. Are the books kept in respectable order? Yes.
37. Are they much dilapidated? Many are almost worn out, others are stained.
38. Have you lately made any requisition to the Government for any books? No.
39. Do you think it desirable that such a requisition should be made? I think it is.
40. Then why have you not made it—Do any of the men send for you to have private conferences on religious matters? Yes; but more particularly with reference to other circumstances connected with them.
41. Do they confidentially disclose the state of their minds to you? Yes.
42. Are there any upon the island whose minds are impressed with their state? Yes, several.
43. There are several there under the influence of conscience? Yes, there are, whom I believe to be honest, good moral men.
44. Men that are convicts, but whose minds are not utterly depraved? Yes, there are men whom I could point out.
45. Is there any difference of classification made with respect to these men? I believe not. I expect their conduct recommends them to some little post.
46. Otherwise they are kept in the wards with the others at night, and are worked with others by day? Yes.
47. What number of men are there of whom, as regards their state of mind and conscience, you have a hopeful opinion? I think I could point out twenty, or more.
48. Out of the Protestants on the island? Protestants—men brought immediately under my notice.
49. With whom you have communicated upon religious subjects, and of whose state of mind you are aware? Yes.
50. Have you ever recommended any separate employment for these people, or any subdivision? No.
51. There is no ward set apart for them? No.
52. Do you not think it would be desirable to separate them from the rest of the prisoners, in order that their religious progress might be more certain? Yes.
53. But you have never recommended such a course? Not at Cockatoo.
54. Do you think it impossible to effect it? Under present arrangements; it would involve such considerable alterations and further accommodation.
55. With respect to their personal accommodation, you have never made such a representation to the Government or to the Superintendent? Not to the Government. I generally speak to the Superintendent when I find men of that character, and recommend them to his notice.
56. Do you not think it desirable that it should be represented to the Government that there are men in a hopeful state of mind, and that it would be a great benefit to them to be separated from the other prisoners? I shall be very pleased to do it.
57. By Captain Ward: Do you ever take steps to lay it officially before the Superintendent? No; because I know there are no means at present of separating them; and I have always found that any recommendation for our department has utterly failed.
58. By the Chairman: It is, no doubt, a very delicate business, but might there not be a process by which those who are well disposed might be distinguished from the others—if you were Superintendent of the island would you think such a thing impossible? I would at once recommend a system of classification.
59. By Captain Ward: Did you ever recommend to the Superintendent those men whom you considered worthy of consideration? Not exactly. I have mentioned his name, and said such a one is a good man.
60. Has your recommendation been acted upon? I have found Mr. Ormsby willing to do so, so far as circumstances would allow.
61. By the Chairman: Is there a school on the island? Only for the children of the free people.
62. What number of children attend that school? I scarcely know the number.
63. You do not examine that school? No; because there are Roman Catholics among them.
64. Do you think the means of education for those children who are residing with their parents on the island sufficient? Yes. I have examined several of the children, and I think the course of education is very respectable.
65. What books have they for the purpose? I believe they are very good.
66. Are they in want of books? I believe not.
67. Do you think the education of the young people on that island should be a special object of attention on the part of the minister? It ought to be a special duty.
68. Do you ever report to the Government on the state of education of the children? No.
69. Perhaps you will think it advisable to do so? If I knew the circumstances of the people.
70. Do you not think that the state of the children on the island, although they are not immediately under the charge of the Government, situated as they are among a horde of convicts, must be a matter of grave attention and of christian observation? Yes.
71. Do you not think it desirable to represent their state to the Government? Yes.
72. Perhaps you will do so? Yes.
73. The schoolmaster is a convict I believe? No, I think he is a free person.

74. You are in error there—you had better inquire whether he is or not? I never considered myself as having authority to interfere.
75. But you were put in charge of a place where there were twenty-eight children, who, from their position, were peculiarly entitled to Christian sympathy and regard, and it is upon that ground I put the question to you.
76. By Mr. Merewether: You look upon the convicts as the special objects of your care? Yes.
77. By the Chairman: With respect to the convicts, there is nothing for their moral or spiritual improvement but your ministerial services? No.
78. There is no education for them if they are desirous of it? No; I have often asked them if they were desirous of forming a class and of receiving instruction, but they have said there is no time allowed.
79. Do you think, if there were time allowed, they would gladly avail themselves of it? Yes; I have inquired into that matter.
80. Up to the present time there has been none? Not while I have been there.
81. I will now leave those subjects and ask you whether you have had any hinderance from the Superintendent or the officers of the island in performing your duties? No.
82. Have you ever had to complain of not being able to perform your duties, in consequence of any of the arrangements at all? No, except from my own arrangements. For instance, I have to visit ships on Sunday sometimes; and on one occasion, through my own arrangements, I was prevented visiting the island.
83. Are you always able to visit the island for the purposes of your duty? Yes, with the exceptions I have mentioned.
84. Are you ever disappointed with respect to the boat? No.
85. Or by any other circumstance when you are going officially to perform your duties? No.
86. Is there any want of courtesy to yourself in the performance of your duty? No.
87. By Captain Ward: How often is the Sacrament administered on the island? It has not been since I have been there.
88. There is no regulation about it? No.
89. To whom is it left to name the day for the administration of the Sacrament? It would be to the Visiting Clergyman, at the request I should think, of the prisoners themselves.
90. Have you never urged Mr. Ormsby to have a Sunday set apart for that purpose? No.
91. He has never suggested it to you? No.
92. By the Chairman: Does any member of his family attend your service? No.
93. Neither male or female? No.
94. By Captain Ward: Have the men confined in the cells the use of bibles? Yes.
95. When they require it, or is it left with them as a matter of course? I think it is generally left there. Anything the men require in confinement they would have from the library.
96. Any religious book? Yes.
97. Are there any other books for the use of the men? Yes, a few.
98. If they asked for them would they be allowed? Yes.
99. Books of amusement? Yes, moral books.
100. By the Chairman: Did you ever know a man to have a bible in his cell? I visit the men in the cells generally on Sunday, and I generally see a bible with them.
101. By Captain Ward: Any suggestions coming from you would receive the attention of the Superintendent? Yes.
102. You feel confident of that? Yes.
103. You have given one part of your evidence in opposition to the statement of the Superintendent—are you quite sure the Assistant Superintendent never attends Divine Service? I cannot say who he is.
104. Mr. Brown? The person who works in the office?
105. No, that is Mr. Taylor? I was referring to him; Mr. Brown does attend always.
106. By the Chairman: When you said the Assistant Superintendent does not attend Divine Service, you were alluding to Mr. Taylor, the clerk in the office? Yes; Mr. Brown attends regularly; I have never known him absent, excepting when he has been sick.
107. By Mr. Merewether: How long do you stay on the island when you go on Sunday? An hour and a-half, and sometimes two hours.
108. Not more? No.
109. During the time you are on the island is it orderly? Yes, very.
110. There is no disturbance among the prisoners? No.
111. By Captain Ward: On a certain occasion, the 20th September, did you hear any noise—I allude to the case mentioned in the papers? I remember the day. I never saw anything of it.
112. Were you there in the afternoon? If it were Sunday, yes.
113. It is stated by Mr. Ormsby that it was about two o'clock—would you have been there at that time? Yes.
114. Did you hear any noise? No.
115. By Mr. Merewether: At what time do you go there? At one; the service generally occupies an hour.
116. The prisoners who are in the cells do not attend the service—do you visit them in their cells? They are not always in the cells; I think I see every one who is in the cells.
117. By Captain Ward: When you go to the island on service, do you generally go with the Chaplain of the Church of Rome and return with him? Never.
118. That is from your special choice? The service performed by me is at another part of the day; it would not be convenient for me to go at the same time, on account of my other duties.
119. Do you return with him? No.

120. Then the boat goes to and fro twice on Sunday? Yes.
121. By the Chairman: With respect to the prisoners in the cells, they do not attend Divine Service? No.
122. Has any prisoner in the cells asked you to obtain permission for him to attend Divine Service on the Lord's Day? No.
123. You have never been asked to obtain permission? No.
124. By Captain Ward: Would you not be prepared to request it? I think it would be a proper thing for them to leave their cells and to attend Divine Service, and to be taken back again, without communicating with the rest.
125. Is it possible to take them from their cells to Divine Service, and to convey them back without their communicating with the other prisoners? It is; when the general congregation were assembled, seats might be left near the door to which they might be taken, and they might then be removed before the rest.
126. Then they might attend Divine Service on the silent system as it were? Yes.
127. By the Chairman: You never make any requisition? No.
128. You may think it desirable to do so? I will now it has been mentioned; but I scarcely thought it proper to interfere with any arrangement I found existing.
129. But as Chaplain, the only comforter many of these people have, do you not think you should make your services as acceptable and beneficial as you can? Yes.

The Revd.
P. Kenyon.
27 Oct., 1857.

The Reverend Patrick Kenyon was called in and examined, as follows:—

1. By the Chairman: Are you upon the Establishment of Cockatoo Island as Chaplain? I have been, until within about the last three weeks.
2. How long were you in that capacity? Since last May twelve months.
3. Are there many people of your church in the establishment? Yes, there were about 150.
4. About one half the entire number, in fact? I do not know, in fact, the entire number of prisoners on the island.
5. How often did you attend the island in the performance of your duty? Twice every week regularly, and very frequently three times.
6. Were you ever specially sent for by any prisoner? No, I was never specially sent for, except in the case of sickness or death.
7. Then you have been sent for? Yes, I was on one occasion, to attend an old man who was sick, and who died subsequently.
8. Are you always prepared to go if you are sent for by any who require your attendance? Yes.
9. What are your duties on the Lord's Day? My duties on Sunday are to celebrate Mass and to preach.
10. To conduct the whole service of your church? Yes; to give catechetical instruction and moral instruction, and to celebrate Mass.
11. Do you give catechetical instruction before the service? No; at the close of the service I generally gave an exhortation, which was partly a moral exhortation and partly catechetical instruction, as the occasion called for.
12. You celebrate Mass every Lord's Day? Yes.
13. Are any of your people so far advanced as to partake of the Eucharist? Yes; I had nearly every Sunday, on the average, four or five.
14. Who habitually received the Eucharist? No, they were not always the same; I had, on the whole, about thirty persons who frequently partook of the Holy Sacrament.
15. I think you never receive any to that rite without previous confession? Never.
16. Are you much and confidentially spoken to by the men on the state of their minds and consciences? I have frequently exhorted them to more frequent application to myself; but I had about thirty or forty who visited me every month or three weeks, on the Saturday. This was the general number; but the individuals were constantly changing, as they were gradually drafted away and others supplied their places.
17. What was the conduct of the men of your church, generally, during Divine Service? I never had occasion to find fault with them except once, and then some persons were rather sleepy.
18. Do any of the officers of the establishment attend your service? Yes.
19. And partake of the Eucharist? Sometimes.
20. These men, into the state of whose minds you particularly inquire, how do they seem to be affected—I mean are these men whose progress towards repentance you think to be hopeful? I think generally, from my acquaintance with the Catholics, that any of these men who make an effort to be good, with God's help, generally succeed; they please me very much.
21. Do you take any means to separate them from other persons? There is no mode available.
22. At present? At present.
23. Can you conceive of no mode to be available? I can conceive of no mode under the present circumstances of the island; the number of wards is so limited that there can be no classification.
24. Taking the Protestants and Catholics together who are well disposed, might they not occupy an entire ward—might they not be numerous enough to occupy an entire ward? Perhaps they would, if you could segregate them sufficiently.
25. Have you never proposed any such thing to the Superintendent, or to the proper authorities? No.
26. Are the arrangements for the performance of your duty satisfactory, as far as they can be? As far as they can be.

The Rev.
P. Kenyon.

27 Oct., 1857.

27. Is there anything you wish to have altered in that respect? The want of cleanliness in the room where we celebrate Mass; but I think it is as clean as it can be kept under the circumstances.
28. It is used as a dining-room upon the very day on which you perform Divine Service, and is occupied by three hundred men for that purpose? Yes, and it has been cleaned up after breakfast, and sanded over just before.
29. And then, I suppose, can only be partially done? Not as well as I could wish.
30. Have you represented that to the Superintendent? I represented it at the beginning, as far as I can recollect.
31. Is there any hinderance to you in the performance of your duty—are you ever at a loss, for instance, to obtain a passage in a boat to and from the island? Never that I recollect.
32. You know of no impediment in the way of your performing your duties? None that I recollect.
33. Is there anything in the regulations or in the conduct of the officers of the island that throws any impediment in the way of the performance of your duties? Not in the performance of my duties.
34. Not in your personal accommodation? I was constrained once to take a long walk across the bush, as it is called—across Balmain.
35. How did that arise? Returning to Sydney in the boat regularly appointed for me, one of the officers sought a passage in it, and it was stated that he had no right to come in this boat; they said they had no right to let him unless he applied for permission; he refused to get out of the boat or to leave the boat, if the boat were to go to Sydney with me—he said if the boat were to go to Sydney he would accompany me.
36. Who was that gentleman? He was in the engineering department there.
37. Was it Mr. Thomas? Yes, that is the name. I had to leave the boat in consequence, to get into the guard-boat, and to come across to Balmain.
38. While he came on to Sydney? No; he came in the guard-boat, to which he had no right.
39. Do you ever visit the school upon the island? Very rarely.
40. Are there not some children there whose parents belong to your church? Yes, there are.
41. Do you supply them with books for their instruction? No; I applied to the parents to have them come to the celebration of the Mass, and they objected; their objections were very futile, I considered, and I had nothing to do with the children afterwards.
42. You are on the island during a great part of the Lord's Day, are you not? No; about two hours.
43. What is the conduct of the people on that day, orderly or disorderly? As far as I observed them on that day, as well as on any other, it was always orderly.
44. You never saw anything to complain of in that respect? No.
45. Is there any point in connection with the management and conduct of the convicts upon the island you would wish to submit to the consideration of the Board? Except that great and most difficult one of classification.
46. You think that is a subject which requires consideration and attention? Yes, and very serious attention, because of its importance and the very great difficulty of carrying it out.
47. Do you visit the men in their cells when they are put into solitary confinement? Only once have I visited one of them.
48. Perhaps none of your people have been there? I believe there have been members of the Catholic Church there, but only on one occasion did I go there when a man wished to see me. When I have been there I have found men in the cells, but they are there only for a short time.
49. You have never been applied to by any of them to be permitted to come out to Mass? There was one man who asked to be allowed, but I did not think he was very upright in his seeking; he merely sought to get away for the indulgence.
50. You did not apply for him? No; for otherwise he behaved very badly; he treated the wardsmen badly.
51. By Captain Ward: Are there books kept on the island for the prisoners' reading? Yes.
52. Have you any voice in their selection? I have the entire choice of the books for the Catholics, the Visiting Magistrate having a veto which he does not require to exercise. He said that such books as treat on controversy should not be allowed, therefore I guarded against such books.
53. Are these books allowed to the prisoners who are confined in the cells? I give them in charge to one of the officers who keeps them.
54. Are the prisoners in the cells allowed the use of them? I am not aware.
55. Have any recommendations coming from you in your capacity of Chaplain been generally attended to by the Superintendent? I think generally, as far as he could.
56. He has generally co-operated with you to carry out your views? Yes; but I have seldom applied to him; I have had anything I needed.
57. Does the Superintendent ever attend Divine Service? No; he is not a person of my profession.
58. What officers attend with you? Mr. Easton.
59. He is an overseer in the Civil Engineer's Department? Yes.
60. Does any officer of the Penal Department attend, to preserve order? I believe there is not a Catholic officer or free overseer. The free overseers are generally outside in the yard, and are immediately in care of the prisoners.
61. Then you consider their attendance inside unnecessary, if it is against their consciences? I think there is sufficient done to ensure order and regularity by their remaining outside.
62. But they do, as a rule, remain outside? Yes.
63. Does Mr. Ormsby remain there? Not Mr. Ormsby, but two of the free overseers. Two of them are very attentive in seeing that the dining hall is cleared up, and in preserving order and regularity.

64. What are their names? Mr. Ferris is one.

65. Is Mr. Brown, the Deputy Superintendent, one? Yes; he is attentive, but not so remarkable as one other man, who has a brother in the police force there.

THURSDAY, 29 OCTOBER, 1857.

Present:—

SIR W. W. BURTON, KNT., IN THE CHAIR.

E. C. MEREWETHER, Esq.

CAPTAIN E. W. WARD.

Mr. Henry Parkes was called in and examined, as follows:—

- Mr. H. Parkes. 1. By the Chairman: You are the proprietor of the Empire? I am the proprietor.
- 29 Oct., 1857. 2. Our attention has been called to a leading article in your paper, and to letters published on the 26th of September, and on the 2nd, 5th, and 6th October, relative to the management of Cockatoo Island; have you anything you can state to us upon those facts and circumstances of your own knowledge? There are letters in the Empire newspaper on the 26th September, and on the 2nd, 5th, and 6th of October, and on other days, both previous and subsequent to those dates, on the management of Cockatoo Island. The whole of those letters were admitted by me on ascertaining who were the writers, and in the greater number of instances on having first a personal interview with them. I have the permission of the writers, with one exception, where I have not been able to communicate with the party, to give their names to this Board. The exception where I have not had that permission is in the case of the letter, inserted on the 26th September, by "N.B.," but I feel so assured that the writer in that case would not wish to withhold his name, that I venture to give his name at once. I have written to him but have received no reply. The writer gives his private address to me as "Charles Robertson, senior, Bleak Cottage, opposite Cockatoo Island." On that letter reaching my office, it called to my mind various other applications that had been made to me throughout a number of years, both as editor of a public journal, as a Member of the old Legislative Council, and as a Member of the Legislative Assembly, and on that account I paid more attention to it than I otherwise should have done. The writers of the letters, in addition to the one just named, are the Rev. John Pendrill, Mr. J. H. Thomas, Mr. Richard Thompson, a reporter of the Sydney Morning Herald, and Mr. Christopher Murray, who was formerly either one of the boat's crew or a constable on Cockatoo Island, and who resides in Princes-street, opposite the Wesleyan Chapel. I may say here that several of these letters were softened in expression by me, prior to publication—the manuscript would shew the charges were in stronger terms than they appear in the publication. In addition to these letters, I have had letters and applications from various other persons; some of them from persons who have been confined on Cockatoo Island as prisoners. In these cases I have neither published the letters nor communicated with the parties; but I have some of those letters here, which I think I might hand in to you as evidence, to be taken for what they are worth.
3. Are they known writers? Yes. As soon as the first publications on this subject reached Bathurst I got this letter from a Mr. Merewether, who was formerly, I believe sub-editor of the Sydney Morning Herald, who was slightly known to me in consequence of the necessary connection between the two newspaper offices, and who was confined on that island for some time, but whom I have never seen since his connection with the Herald ceased. (The Witness read the letter. Vide Appendix A.) I have not, since the receipt of that letter, communicated with Mr. Merewether upon the subject, but I have received a second letter from him. (The Witness read the letter. Vide Appendix B.) Besides the letter from Mr. Merewether, I have received a letter intended for publication in the Empire, anonymously, from William Henry Groom, storekeeper, of Drayton, Darling Downs, which I declined to publish, simply because I had not the means of judging for myself who Mr. Groom was, but which also contains specific instances of mismanagement, cruelty, and manslaughter. He charges the dispenser with causing the death of a man.
4. By Captain Ward: Is that the present dispenser? Yes.
5. Are you aware whether this man, Groom, was also a prisoner? I know nothing more of him than I have stated. (The letter was read to the Board. Vide Appendix C.) In the first letter addressed to me from your Board, I am asked to afford evidence concerning the facts particularly referred to in the leading article of the Empire of the 3rd October. These facts, as it appears to me, are—that the island is under very improper management; that the Superintendent, who has the general management of the island, does not possess the qualities that are absolutely requisite in the conduct of a great penal establishment—an establishment exclusively for the punishment and reformation of criminals. It will be necessary, I think, for me to say, that throughout my life I have paid considerable attention to the question of criminal management; that as a Member of the Legislature I lost no opportunity of doing all I could to promote the general improvement of the prisons of the Colony, and that, for some years past, I have lost no opportunity of visiting those prisons. Hence the publication of these letters, the writing of this article, and their publication, are merely parts, as I might say, of a life-long conduct, so far as I am concerned. Now, coming to this particular establishment, which I regard as of immense importance to the Colony, because I cannot conceive of any greater mischief that can accrue to the Colony than that of a number of hardened offenders—the most hardened the Colony produces—being sent here, and

and no proper attention being paid to the tempering of the system of punishment, with even-handed justice on the one hand, and no proper attention being paid to their gradual reformation on the other. And, moreover, that they should there get that worst of all impressions, that the persons placed in charge of them are as liable to unpractices as themselves. I can conceive of no impression so dangerous to get abroad as this, and none so likely to lead to consequences fatal to good order, and to the general and proper stability of society. It is hence I attach so very much importance to this matter. Now, coming to this establishment, I will state how I first became acquainted with Mr. Ormsby. Some years, I should think twelve years ago—it may perhaps be more—I held a subordinate situation in the Custom House, and was entrusted with the charge of a ship in the capacity I then filled. On that occasion I saw Mr. Ormsby for the first time. He came to visit the captain of the ship; he dined there, and remained, as far as my recollection serves me, till near midnight; and I had an opportunity of seeing that he was indulging in wine, or spirits, or both, nearly the whole of the time. Towards midnight, or between the hours of eleven and twelve, a police boat, manned by four hands, came to take Mr. Ormsby home. As I have already stated, I then filled a very subordinate situation, but the thought that came into my mind was that if I were the Governor Mr. Ormsby should not be Superintendent of that island five minutes longer. From that time to this I have never had any personal acquaintance with Mr. Ormsby but I have been in a position to hear much concerning him—have had opportunities of observing his conduct. I habituate myself to observing the conduct of every body who occupies a public position, and what I have seen of Mr. Ormsby leads me to the impression that he is one of the most completely unfit men to fill the situation that could be found. I wish to guard myself from being understood to mean more than my words properly convey. I do not say that Mr. Ormsby may not be a very upright man, a very excellent man, but he entirely lacks the qualities which are now generally acknowledged by all men who pay attention to the question of prison management as absolutely requisite for such an important situation as that. I avow myself the writer of this article in the Empire of the 3rd October. In that article there is this sentence,—“If illiteracy, the most confined views on social questions, a self-indulgent disposition, ungovernable passions and violent language were qualities desirable in the superintendence of a penal establishment, then Mr. Ormsby would be the very model of a public gaoler.” The article then goes on to state, in a very imperfect manner, what kind of man should be a governor of a gaol:—“But the interests of society demand a very different class of qualities. The man selected for such an office should be one of calm temperament and inflexible mind, with the severest notions of honor and justice, capable of much self-denial, and utterly incapable of any kind of favoritism or low manoeuvre; and one, moreover, possessing a good knowledge of the world and a sound discrimination in judging of character.” The article then states, with a desire not to be understood as denouncing Mr. Ormsby as absolutely bad, that he might make a very respectable tradesman and be extremely useful as one, seeking to carry out the meaning I have already tried to convey, that all the writer meant was that he was unfit for that particular situation. Now, my opinion was formed mainly by the opportunity I had had of judging of the Superintendent of Cockatoo Island, as already stated. There was also this circumstance, that in the month of July, or early in August last, the present Dispenser of Cockatoo Island, Mr. J. F. Peers, called upon me and asked my advice as to how he should act with reference to Mr. Ormsby's conduct towards him on a particular day, a little previous, on which occasion Mr. Ormsby called him “damned liar,” a “damned scoundrel,” “a villain,” and a “damned pimp.” Here is the original letters of Dr. West, the medical visitor, acknowledging that violent language did take place on the day alluded to. Here is the original letter of Mr. John Duff, the Clerk of Works, stating that he heard this disgraceful language and is ready to come forward and prove it. Here is the original letter of Mr. Ormsby, which is sufficient to shew that he is a man of extreme illiteracy, utterly unfit for this situation. (The witness handed in the original letters and copies above referred to. Vide Appendix.) In another part of this article there are these words,—“Hitherto it is alleged that any person in a subordinate position who has dared to breathe a murmur of complaint has been singled out as the object of a petty and unsleeping persecution, which, sooner or later, has cleared the scene of his presence, if it has not involved him in some fabricated disgrace. This species of tyranny has been systematised, it is said, by the employment of the basest of the prisoners as spies, who have been encouraged by the usual indulgences allowed for good conduct.” This has been stated on the authority of the gentlemen whose names I have already handed in to the Commission, namely, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Pendrill, Mr. Richard Thompson, and Mr. Christopher Murray. As to other facts within my knowledge, and my means of obtaining which I am not prepared to state, I believe that on Easter Monday, in 1856, Mr. Ormsby entertained a large company of friends at a picnic at Chowder Bay; that on that occasion seven constables belonging to the establishment at Cockatoo Island were employed as boatmen to convey his friends, and to perform other menial offices in connexion with the entertainment. The names of these constables were John Smith, Daniel Beattie, John Waltam, Richard Musgrove, Samuel D. Johnson, Richard Sadlier, and Christopher Murray, who, I presume, if they can be called before this Commission, will give evidence to that effect. I have reason to believe, as another evidence of the entire want of discipline on Cockatoo Island, that some time, not very far back, Mr. Taylor, who is son-in-law to the Superintendent, and fills some subordinate situation in the establishment on Cockatoo, obtained a convict named Sullivan as his house servant; whether the regulations of the island allow that or not I do not pretend to say; that Sullivan went to the house of a Mr. Horsford on the island, and represented to him that Mrs. Taylor was ill and wanted a bottle of gin; that the gin was thereupon supplied, and that Sullivan, the convict so employed, was found afterwards dead drunk with the bottle lying beside him. He was found so by one of the overseers, Mr. Byron. I do not of course pretend to know whether the subordinates on the island are allowed convicts to be distributed among them as servants.

Mr. H. Parkes, 6. By the Chairman: The regulations allow certain servants to the officers? I was not aware of that. I have reason to believe that the boat has been away on frequent occasions to picnics at Lane Cove, a considerable distance from the island; that it has on other occasions taken Mr. Ormsby and his friends to Homebush races, by going up the Parramatta River to a bay called Homebush Bay, and that the policemen whose names have already been given will be able to give evidence to that effect. I am assured, on information upon which I am inclined to rely, but the particulars of which I cannot communicate to the Board, that Mr. Ormsby keeps a very extensive establishment as to the production of choice vegetables, and poultry in great numbers; that the Visiting Magistrate and the Visiting medical man, the only checks there are upon the conduct of Mr. Ormsby in his isolated position, have repeatedly received presents of poultry, vegetables, and so on, from Mr. Ormsby on their visits,—to which I think the Board will, if it should find the fact as stated, attach a grave importance, considering that Mr. Ormsby is so isolated, as much so indeed as though he were a thousand miles off in the Pacific, and that the only regular checks upon his management are the visits of the Magistrate and of the medical man. I believe John Smith, a German, who is coxswain in the boat of the establishment, will satisfy this Commission that he has repeatedly conveyed presents of turkeys to Captain M'Leerie, to Dr. West, and to other gentlemen who occupy these very important positions as checks upon the management of the island. I have reason to believe that Mr. Byron, the penal overseer, Mr. Easton, overseer of the Engineer's department, Mr. Broderick, engineer, Mr. Cahil, foreman of works, Mr. Kelleher, foreman of works, Mr. Fitzgerald, foreman of works, will all give evidence of the very great difficulty they have experienced from want of discipline among the convicts employed under them, and that their complaints of this want of discipline, and consequent difficulty in the progress of their works, have been generally disregarded, to the injury of the public service, and to their great dissatisfaction. There is a person on the island of the name of Scott, a constable, who, I have reason to think, will give the Commission valuable evidence. I do not know that I have any thing else to add, unless there be any other question you have to ask respecting this publication. There is one thing I omitted to state with reference to my advice being asked in the case of the dispute between Mr. Peers and Mr. Ormsby. When the correspondence I have handed in was laid before me—and I should like Mr. Peers to be examined on that point—I advised him, unless he was prepared to risk all the consequences of bringing his case before the Colonial Secretary, which he did not appear to be prepared to do, to take back the correspondence, to put up with the indignity he had met with, and to go on discharging his duty so that no one could possibly call him to account, and to set all other parties at defiance by the exemplary course of his conduct.

FRIDAY, 30 OCTOBER, 1857.

Present:—

SIR W. W. BURTON, KNT., IN THE CHAIR.

E. C. MEREWETHER, ESQ., | CAPTAIN E. W. WARD.

The following letter from Mr. H. Parkes was received and read:—

"Sydney, August 30, 1857.

"Gentlemen,

"With reference to what I understood from the Board yesterday,—that Mr. Ormsby, though permitted to be present with his solicitor during the examination of the witnesses named in my evidence, will yet not know who those witnesses are till they enter the room, I beg to point out that it will be impossible to carry out this intention on part of the Board if my evidence is read to Mr. Ormsby before their examination. I do not suppose that Mr. Ormsby would seek, by any indirect means, to tamper with these witnesses in consequence of the knowledge so obtained, but it must be recollected that such things have been done, and that in this case the persons are his subordinates in office, and are placed in circumstances that offer peculiar facilities for the operation of improper influences.

"Standing, as I do, before your Commission in the capacity of a censor, I cannot, on mature reflection, admit the justice of being excluded from the examination while Mr. Ormsby is allowed not only to be present, with legal assistance, but to exercise the privilege of cross-examination. Any inquiry into the management of the penal establishment at Cockatoo Island will be unconsciously diverted from its great ends—the vindication of public justice and the promotion of the public welfare—if the personal character of any of the officers in charge be made the first object of concern. I respectfully submit that the character of those officials who have acted wisely and uprightly, and with an enlightened sense of their duties and responsibilities, must necessarily rise in the light of a thorough investigation, and are perfectly safe in the result without any special means of protection.

"I have, &c.,

"HENRY PARKES."

"The Hon. Sir W. W. Burton, Knt.

"E. W. Ward, Esq.

"Edwd. C. Merewether, Esq."

The Board resolved, "That there was nothing in the evidence given by Mr. Parkes which made it requisite to recall Mr. Parkes to be cross-examined by Mr. Ormsby, as there was no specific charge within that gentleman's own knowledge contained in his evidence, and that, therefore, his request should be complied with—that it should not be read."

The

The Reverend John Pendrill was called in and examined, as follows:—

1. By the Chairman: Are you a clergyman of the Church of England in the Establishment of New South Wales? I was.
2. And at this time? I am not.
3. How are you now employed? I am helping Mr. Savigny in the conduct of his school.
4. Were you Chaplain of Cockatoo Island? I was.
5. For what period of time? From July, 1856, to the end of March in the present year.
6. Will you be kind enough to look at the Empire newspaper of the 26th of September last; you will there find a letter signed "N. B."? (The Witness referred to a newspaper.) Yes.
7. Have you seen that letter before? Yes.
8. Do you know the writer of that letter? No.
9. Do you, of your own knowledge, know anything of the circumstances there stated? No, I do not.
10. During the time you were Chaplain of the establishment were the arrangements made for the conducting of your duties such as to be satisfactory to you? Not altogether.
11. Will you tell us in what respect they were otherwise.—I mean now particularly with reference to the actual performance of your duty in your ministrations in conducting Divine Service? On one occasion I was turned out of the dispensary, and on another occasion I had a message brought to me from the schoolmaster—I believe he is also called the taskmaster—saying he wished to see me in the schoolroom. I went up to him, and he gave me a letter without any address, but which appeared to be a letter addressed to Mr. Ormsby, by the Colonial Secretary. I said I could not receive that letter as it was not addressed to me. He said he had been instructed to shew me that letter, and to require me to put on my surplice there, and to go down from there to the place where the service was held. I said I should not do anything of the kind, that it was too far to walk from the top of the hill to the yard, and I ordered the gown to be taken down to the Assistant Superintendent's Office. There was considerable hesitation, and at length I went down and said that if the surplice was not brought down I should be compelled to go through the service without it. I believe that was done with the intention of affront.
12. When did this occur? On the 15th February, it appears from my note.
13. Was Mr. Ormsby present at any part of that discussion? No.
14. Then the message was given to you by the schoolmaster—what is his name? I do not know.
15. One of the prisoners on the island? No; one of the free officers—the taskmaster I think he is called. There was a case previous to that which I may as well mention. There was a prisoner on the island of the name of Cockerill. Shortly after his arrival I saw him in the yard. The last time I had seen him previous to this was at the baptizing of his child at Christ Church, of which place I was Curate. I went up and spoke to the man, and said, "I am very sorry to see you here; you are now in a very different position from that in which I saw you last." The man was very much affected, and tears came into his eyes. He talked of the circumstances of his case, and said what caused him the most grief was the position he had brought his wife and family into, and that he did not know but that all his things would be sold, and his wife be turned into the street. I said I feared that might be the case, but that I would see his wife. I went to his wife, but it was a perfectly voluntary act; having known the people before I felt justified in doing so, and even had I not known them, I did not suppose that my being Chaplain of Cockatoo Island should prevent my doing a christian act. I saw a man, when I went into the room, who I learned was in the police, and he asked me who I was. I told him I was the Chaplain at Cockatoo Island, and stated plainly that I had seen her husband, who was greatly distressed about her. The man offered me a chair, took out a piece of paper and wrote down all that was said. Shortly after, when I went to Cockatoo, Mr. Ormsby came up to me, and said, "I have a charge against you for carrying messages from prisoners to their family." He then added that Captain M'Lerie had been informed, by a detective, that I had carried a message from Cockerill to his family. I was much astonished and annoyed, and said the charge was unfounded. I was going to write to Captain M'Lerie, to ask him whether I was to be subject to the reports of the Detective Police because I was Chaplain of Cockatoo Island.
16. By Captain Ward: It was made a charge against you? That I was carrying messages from the prisoners to their friends, which was unfounded.
17. What was the result? There it ends.
18. By the Chairman: We are upon the subject of the arrangement for the performance of your duties, more particularly with reference to the arrangements for the performance of Divine Service, and of giving spiritual instruction? There was very little opportunity for that, except on the Saturdays. I requested the use of a room where I might see the prisoners.
19. Was that always granted? I had one afterwards. I had the use of the school-room, but it was not a room for my own use.
20. Upon those occasions, when you have had to confer with the prisoners? There were men smoking in the adjoining room, and there was no accommodation. I applied for that room, in consequence of having been turned out of the dispensary by Dr. West. I had been in the habit of using it as a vestry on Sunday; but one Sunday Dr. West sent his assistant to request me to leave it, as he said he wished to see his patients there; I left, but had no place to go to; I went out and sat on the wall.
21. Was there any place when you went over to the island which you could use as a place of retirement, or as a vestry? None, but the dispensary.
22. You used that by a kind of permission? I was shewn to it when I went there at first, but I was turned out of it afterwards. I applied for a room, and it was refused me.
23. To whom did you apply? To Mr. North. I had a correspondence about it.
24. You applied for a room to be assigned to you? Yes.

- The Rev.
J. Pendrill.
- 30 Oct., 1847.
25. Was it granted? I was granted the use of the school-room, of which I had the use before.
26. What means of retirement had you? Mr. Brown's office, the Assistant Superintendent's.
27. With his permission? Yes.
28. For the purposes of robing and retirement? There was not much retirement there; the place was not above eight feet square. On Saturdays I had the use of the school-room to see the prisoners, but it was not what might be called private, for there was a room adjoining where the convicts attached to the office went, and sat and smoked, and there was only a slight partition between the two, so that prisoners who came to me might fear they would be overheard.
29. The convicts, I suppose, were, many of them, in the habit of requiring your advice and instruction? I gave notice to Mr. Brown to receive the names of any convicts who wished to see me from time to time; but very few applied to me, and it was considered not a recommendation to a man if he desired to see the Chaplain very often.
30. Were you in fact consulted by some of them upon their spiritual state? Yes, I was. I proposed last Easter to administer the Sacrament; at least one of the prisoners requested that I would.
31. Was the Sacrament administered? I left before the time.
32. You were in charge from July to the end of March? Yes.
33. During that time, was it usual for the Superintendent to attend Divine Service? Never.
34. Did any of the family of the Superintendent attend? No.
35. Did the free overseers of the establishment? Mr. Brown attended regularly.
36. How did the men conduct themselves during their attendance? Some of them used to attend; some of them lay with their heads on their hands half asleep.
37. They all attended, did they not? No, a great many did not attend that should have attended; it seemed to be optional, I understood.
38. By Captain Ward: Are you aware whether any who ought to have attended did not attend—do you know of your own knowledge? I have known the schoolmaster not to attend from time to time.
39. But the convicts? He was a convict; there was a second schoolmaster; I refer to him.
40. Was there any one else? Not to my knowledge.
41. By the Chairman: How long used you to remain on the island when you visited it? I used to go after dinner on Saturday; the men dined at two, and I got to the island about half-past two or three o'clock, and left at four, when the men had their supper or tea.
42. Then you went again on the Lord's Day? Yes, on the Sunday.
43. And were there for how long? At one time, when I first went there, I had a service for the free officers, and I used to have a few of the free children in a class, and generally left for Sydney between two and three o'clock.
44. How long were you there on the Lord's Day? At this time I had two services.
45. Two services every Lord's Day? I had at first, but latterly I was obliged to have only one.
46. But you had in fact at one time two services? Yes, and then the free officers did not attend; then the military volunteered to have a service, but they did not come to the service then.
47. Did the military attend any of your services? I used to have a service in their own apartment. I had previously a service over the cells, which any free officer so disposed used to attend.
48. In what manner was the Lord's Day observed during the time you were there, so far as you had an opportunity of noticing? The men were ranging about the yard, or sleeping about the yard; during the time I was there I was employed in my duty.
49. Was there any desecration of the Lord's Day shewn in your presence while you were on the island? I never had an opportunity of observing the conduct of the men, except when they were engaged in the service.
50. You may say whether it appeared to you that the Lord's Day was properly observed on the island during the time you were there—did you observe any desecration of it? No.
51. Were you assisted by the Superintendent and officers of the establishment in your work among the prisoners? No.
52. Were you thwarted? It is difficult to say that I was positively thwarted, but in my opinion very little encouragement was given to the Chaplain.
53. By Captain Ward: Did you ever demand assistance and have it refused? I had so much unpleasantness that I could not ask it.
54. Then you never did ask it? No. I once asked for slates for the prisoners, and my request was refused.
55. By the Chairman: Did you ever hear indecent yelling and hallooing on the Lord's Day, when you were there on that day? Not when I was there.
56. I put into your hands a newspaper, the Empire of the 2nd October; will you be good enough to look at a letter in that signed "Witness"? (The witness referred to the paper.)
57. Do you know the writer of that letter? Yes.
58. Who is it? Myself.
59. With respect to the disturbances on the island on the Lord's Day mentioned in this letter, you say—"It is a fact to which the attention of the Government has frequently been called"—do you know of your own knowledge of the attention of the Government having been called to such facts? I have called the attention of the Government to the general fact.
60. With reference to the disturbances on the island? Not to the disturbances on the island, but to the general state of the island.
61. Have you any copy of your communications to the Government upon that subject? I produce the draft of a letter, dated 19th February last, addressed by me to the Colonial Secretary. (The letter was read. Vide Appendix A.)

62. It appears from this letter that there must have been a prior communication? Yes, The Rev. J. Pendrill. there was one in November. On the 13th November last I wrote a letter to the Colonial Secretary, to which I received no answer. On the 17th December I wrote to the Governor.
63. Did you receive an answer to that? Yes, dated the 24th December. (The letter was read. Vide Appendix B. 30 Oct., 1857.)
64. Was the letter of the 19th of February in reply to that? Not exactly in reply—in continuation of the same subject.
65. Were you furnished with a boat for the performance of your duties at that time? No; only very irregularly.
66. Was there any impediment thrown in your way? In the first instance I did not know how far I was entitled to use the boat, and I got no answer to my letter to the Colonial Secretary requesting information. I then wrote to His Excellency the Governor General, calling attention to the fact, and received the reply that the boat should be placed at my disposal when I required it; that was not carried out, and that was the cause of my letter.
67. Was there any special occasion when you were refused the boat when you required it—how did you make known that you required it? On several occasions I was refused a boat; indeed it was so frequently the case that myself and the Priest of the Church of Rome made a coalition, in order that we might secure a boat between us, and I agreed, at much inconvenience, to go with him to the island at eight o'clock in the morning, to visit the hospital, and attend a small class I had formed; that he should have his service first, and then I should have mine, and that we should return together at twelve o'clock. In accordance with that arrangement, on the 9th of November I went to the King-street wharf, and found no boat; I hired a boat, went across to Balmain, and then walked across the mainland opposite Cookatoo. I then hailed the guard-boat, and was conveyed across to the island. On my arrival I saw Mr. Ormsby, who made no apology for what had occurred. I then requested that the boat might remain at the island until I was ready to return, but it did not; it went away without me to fetch the Visiting Magistrate. When I came down I found the boat gone, and the Inspector of Police stated that he had told Dr. West to wait for me. I took the boat across again and walked through the bush. No apology was offered for this, and I complained to the Colonial Secretary. Then there were several times, on week days, when I have been on the island, and the boat has left for Sydney without the compliment being paid me of asking me whether I would proceed in it. On one Sunday particularly, after declining the use of the boat to take me back to Sydney, with the view of saving the men the trouble of a second trip, as they complained of being so much engaged on the Sunday, the boat was sent to Sydney with some one else, and it was not intimated to me that the boat was going. In a letter to the Colonial Secretary, dated the 10th of September, I complained of the inefficiency of the service, and of the impertinence I was subject to from the coxswain of the boat. The boat was sent to me in a disorderly manner. I know what Government service is, for I have seen something of it in various parts of the world, and I know what ought to be done; and I saw that that was not done with respect to me in this boat. I complained to the Inspector of Police, and asked him whether the boat belonged to him. He said, "Well, Sir, it does belong to me, and it does not belong to me." I perfectly understood what he meant. The boat, as I said to him, to be sent to me in a way as if they thought "anything would do for the parson;" and I was positively assured that that was the language the boat's crew used when they used to come for the parson. I frequently used to walk across, because the men complained to me that owing to the heavy nature of their services on Sunday they had no time to themselves; and I expected in return for that, that when I did want the boat I should have it.
68. Was there any particular occasion on which the boat was refused to you, that you were aware of its having been employed in other service? Yes; on the 7th February I was sent to Sydney with the Chaplain of the Church of Rome, and the convict Garbut in irons. I protested to the Sergeant of Police against being sent in a boat with a convict in irons; I said I had no objection to the man Garbut, but I considered that it was a personal insult, and as such I resisted it. At this time the proper visiting boat was sent away on a picnic, a party of pleasure, a fishing party, or something of the kind—at all events it was sent away on a private excursion.
69. Did you see that yourself? I can prove it.
70. That the proper boat was at that time away? It was at the island when I arrived, and it left after I arrived. I was put into another boat with this convict in irons. The boat was very small, and it was blowing very fresh at the time. The convict was placed in the bow of the boat; but as the water broke over the bow, and the man had on the ordinary convict canvas clothing, I said, "That man cannot sit there—he will get wet through;" and as he was going to Maitland to give evidence in a case of horse-stealing, he would have had to wear them all night. The sergeant said he had orders to keep him in the bow, but that if I directed it he might come aft. I told him to do so, and accordingly he came and sat to leeward opposite me. This brought the boat very much down by the stern, and the man pulling the stroke oar said he had not room to pull.
71. You went in the boat? Yes; I had no alternative.
72. Have you any other case to mention? I think it is as well to stick to one or two cases that I can specifically prove. I wish to state specific facts, and to prove them. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Board unnecessarily.
73. Have you any other complaints to make with respect to the boat? If you think that is not sufficient.
74. Do not appeal to us, but state what you think necessary? I name that as a specific instance.
75. Is that then the usual course of proceeding? It is a sample of the usual course.
76. By Mr. Merewether: When you required to leave the island, what was the usual course?

The Rev.
J. Pendrill.
30 Oct., 1857.

I do not know; I applied to the Colonial Secretary for information upon that point, and had no information given me.

77. If no intimation were given by you, how could they know that the boat would be required? That was the fixed day; that was after the specific arrangement that I should have the boat on Saturday. It was a definite arrangement, that on that day I was entitled to have the boat. That I can prove; I gave my order on one occasion to Mr. Ormsby, respecting the boat, and that order was not attended to.

78. By Captain Ward: How do you mean that you gave your order to Mr. Ormsby? I told him I required the boat on Saturday.

79. Are you entitled to the boat on any particular day? Yes, certainly.

80. How do you prove that title? I presume that is the title. (The Witness handed in two letters. Vide Appendices C. and D.)

81. Mr. North places the boat at your disposal on Saturdays and Sundays? Yes.

82. When you applied for the boat on those occasions whom did you ask? The boat was always sent; that was the understanding.

83. It came as a matter of course? It was understood as a permanent order, that the boat was to be there when I wanted it.

84. When you wanted it? I always wanted it.

85. Were you there on any occasions on Saturday or Sunday after this date, the 29th of January, when the boat was not there? On that particular occasion I refer to, the 7th of February.

86. The boat should have been for you at what wharf? At Cockatoo Island, on the occasion I have referred to.

87. By the Chairman: You do not complain of not having been taken to the island on that occasion, but of not having been brought back in the boat? There was a case of not having been brought back, but that was after this.

88. By Captain Ward: The letter goes to this, that the boat should attend at King-street wharf, for the purpose of conveying you to the island; does that imply that the boat should be at your disposal for the whole of the day? Certainly, until I returned.

89. On Saturday and Sunday, for the whole time the boat was at your disposal? Yes.

90. That was your interpretation of the letter? Yes.

91. By the Chairman: Have you anything more to say as to the accommodation of the boat? After that, I gave the following notice to the Inspector, Mr. Dunning. (The Witness read the same as follows):—

“ February 21st, 1857.

“ Sir,

“ As the Superintendent on Sunday last refused to allow me the use of the boat provided by Government for the officers of the establishment, I have referred the matter to the Colonial Secretary; meantime I am not prepared to accept any inferior boat which the Superintendent may of his own caprice think fit to substitute.

“ When it is distinctly understood that the visiting boat is not provided by the vote of Parliament as a pleasure boat for the Superintendent and his friends, but for the public service, I shall avail myself of it; until this is settled, you need send no boat to fetch me from Sydney.

“ I find that the boat's crew are rated as police on the Parliamentary Estimates, and the boat service therefore belong to your department. It is my intention, if necessary, to have the subject brought before Parliament, and I trust you will, in this case, be prepared to show that you are in no way answerable for the mismanagement which prevails in this branch of your department.”

“ I have, &c.,

“ JOHN PENDRILL.

“ The Inspector of Police.”

That notice I gave to Mr. Dunning to shew to the Superintendent, and told him to keep it for reference. He afterwards told me that the Superintendent had taken it from him.

92. On the 7th of February, was the visiting boat being painted or not? No.

93. By Captain Ward: By whom were you informed that it was being painted? By one of the boat's crew.

94. Not by Mr. Ormsby? No.

95. You say in your letter—“ On Sunday last, November 15, the small boat having been sent for me to Sydney, I refused to return in it, and desired the coxswain to have the proper boat ready after service, but Mr. Ormsby positively refused to let me have it, and I, in consequence, returned to Sydney, through the bush”—did the circumstances occur as there stated? Yes.

96. How do you know the fact that Mr. Ormsby refused to let you have it? Because I sent a man and waited till he brought back an answer.

97. By the Chairman: Referring to this letter, I would ask you are you aware that there are printed rules and regulations? I have never seen any—none were ever shewn to me.

98. Do you yourself know a policeman of the name of Gleadall? Yes.

99. Do you know the fact of his being discharged from the force? Yes.

100. Do you know the charge upon which he was discharged? For being “disgustingly intoxicated but not drunk,” that I believe was the precise wording of the charge.

101. Do you know any of the facts of that charge yourself? I believe the man was dismissed, and that he was sworn to be perfectly sober.

102. Do you know that he was drunk? No; he never was drunk, as far as it was stated to me.

103. Do you know, of your own knowledge, whether he was drunk or sober? I was assured ———

104. I ask you, do you know, of your own knowledge, whether the man was drunk or sober? I know, of my own knowledge, that the man was sworn by the Inspector of Police to be sober. The Rev. J. Pendrill.
105. Did you hear the Inspector of Police sworn? No. 30 Oct., 1867.
106. Then, of your own knowledge, you do not know the fact? I do know so far as this, that it was a statement made to me upon which I could rely—I was not a witness.
107. You could not swear to the fact? I could swear that it was told me as a fact.
108. Did you ever know an instance of a person being punished in any way for demanding to see the regulations—of your own knowledge? Well, I was told that man was punished for that.
109. That fact is stated upon your own knowledge? I do not think it is stated upon my own knowledge; it is mentioned among the other matters for inquiry.
110. You say, "A demand to see the regulations, though an unpunishable offence, is a matter to be punished indirectly as soon as an opportunity offers,"—of your own knowledge do you know that? It was stated to me by one of the police that Gleadall was punished on that ground.
111. "The prisoners likewise complain that they are punished for violating rules and regulations without having the means of knowing what those regulations are"—Do you know that of your own knowledge? That statement has been made to me by the prisoners.
112. Do you know of any Chinaman having been confined to a cell? It was my custom when I went to the island to inquire what prisoners were in the cells, and on a certain day I was told there was one man there. I inquired who he was, and the reply was that he was a Chinaman. I then asked what he was there for and was told that this man—
113. This is not a case that comes within your own knowledge? No, of course, I had no means of communicating with the man; the man could not speak English.
114. We must not have hearsay evidence? I am prepared to call evidence in support of what I state.
115. Who is the person? If I give the name of the party will he be guaranteed the protection of the Court? (The Chairman stated that would be a matter for the future consideration of the Board.)
116. You say, "When prisoners are consigned to the cells the Superintendent refuses to allow them to attend Divine Service on the Sabbath?" Yes.
117. Have you ever applied for any to be allowed to attend? Yes.
118. Will you mention any instance? At the time the "Claremont" was discharging, when there was some disturbance on the island, there were sixteen men in the cells; of these, I think, seven were members of the Church of England; on Sunday morning, when I went on the island, I sent a written requisition to the Superintendent to ask if the men could attend the service, and if not why not. The answer sent me was that the request was a very unusual one, but that he would ask the Colonial Secretary on the following day. When I went over the next Sunday the men were still in irons, and I was told they could not attend, for it would be breaking the period of their confinement.
119. In the sixth matter referred to in your letter you mention a case of "mortal sin"—do you know anything of that except by hearsay? It was a statement made by a prisoner that a case had occurred, which he could bring evidence to prove, and he said that he did not venture to mention it because if he did he should be confined to the cells. He said a case had occurred previously where the person who had perpetrated the offence had not been punished, but the man upon whom it was perpetrated was punished. He said if I could give him protection he would mention the case.
120. You say, in the seventh, "A certain party was accused, some time since, of appropriating the rations of the prisoners"—who is that party? I will tell the story as it was told to me.
121. To whom do you allude as "a certain party?" I should like to know what protection is guaranteed to the parties?
122. I want to know the party to whom you allude? I will state that when you have settled the question of protection.
123. Then you decline to answer the question? Yes. (After some hesitation.) Well, I alluded to the Superintendent. I am prepared now to state the case.
124. What was the case? At the time of the disturbances connected with the "Claremont" there was a prisoner put in irons as being a party to that transaction, and I saw him; he was not kept there for the same term as the other men, as he himself stated he was put in unjustly, and he was released. When I saw him, I said, "I am surprised you should get yourself into fresh trouble, seeing your time for going out has nearly arrived." His answer was, "I was put in unjustly; I was put in because the Superintendent has a down upon me." I said, "what do you mean?" (Mr. Dillon objected to the witness repeating conversations affecting the Superintendent when Mr. Ormsby was not present.)
125. Do you know any of the facts stated in that article of your own knowledge, or merely from hearsay from the prisoners? Of course I know them only by hearsay.
126. By Captain Ward: Do you know whether the prisoner was confined by authority or without? The man was confined, but he was released upon evidence being given that he was not one of the parties; he was found not to be guilty of the offence for which he was confined.
127. The case came before the Visiting Magistrate, and the Visiting Magistrate adjudicated upon it? Yes. The man was accused of being a ringleader of the mutiny, as it was called, upon the island, which took place with regard to the "Claremont."
128. You say the whole case went before the Visiting Magistrate? Whether he was the ringleader or not.
129. Was that the only case that went before the Visiting Magistrate? Yes.
130. Are you sure of that? No.

- The Rev. J. Pendrill.
30 Oct., 1857.
131. You do not know that the whole case was not considered by the Visiting Magistrate and adjudicated upon? I have reason to believe it was.
132. You do not know that? No further than that I was told, and I do not suppose the person told me an untruth.
133. Then the statement is simply hearsay? It is a statement made to me as Chaplain of the island.
134. By the Chairman: Have you anything else to state upon the matters contained in that letter—I have pointed your attention to all that is specific, will you add anything as a matter of fact, of your own knowledge? Of course there are many things which may be considered as matters of knowledge, as they are derived from ordinary means of information, but I cannot swear to things that took place when I was not on the island. All I say is, that they are cases that should be inquired into. I am prepared to call evidence in support of them, if I have the opportunity. It is to be ascertained from the examination of those witnesses whether I have stated the truth or not. I may add that our salaries were usually paid at the beginning of the month; and, after I had left the island, I met Mr. Taylor, and said, "I would go to the island and receive my last month's salary, and that I wished to see 'some persons on the island.'" I received a notice from the Superintendent that I could not be allowed to land without an order from the Visiting Magistrate; I regarded this as an insult, because I knew the clergy had landed on the island without an order. Mr. Stephen and Mr. King when they went to perform my duty took no order, and at Darlinghurst no order is considered necessary for the admission of a clergyman. I understood an order was given to the police not to allow me to land.
135. You wished to go to the island to receive your salary, and you were told you could not land without an order? Yes. There is another fact I would wish to state. A prisoner requested me to get him a German Dictionary, and he informed me he would pay for it out of his earnings. I inquired whether the man had earnings, or whether it was possible for him to have the sum properly in his keeping; I was told it was; and I bought the dictionary, but when I went again to the island the man was in one of the cells, and I left the dictionary in the assistant Superintendent's office, which I used as my room. I have been told that the book has been taken out of that office, and that it has been endeavoured to concoct a charge against me of selling books to the prisoners.
136. Was the charge ever brought against you? No; but the book was taken out of the office.
137. How do you know that it was endeavoured to concoct a charge against you? I am informed that the book was taken possession of and carried up to the Superintendent's office.
138. What further was done? Nothing further was done; I only mention it as one of those things intended to damage my character.
139. All that was done was that the book was taken possession of? Yes; the book was taken possession of and never returned to me, but I understood that use had never been made of it.
140. By Captain Ward: I want to ask you about the case of Cockerell—you say you went to see his wife at the man's instance? Not at the man's instance; I volunteered to see her.
141. When you went to the island again you communicated to him? No, the man was in the cells, and I did not speak to him for a month or more; he always seemed to avoid me.
142. You say a charge was brought against you by Mr. Ormsby—in what manner was it brought? He said, "I have got a charge against you from Captain McLerie of carrying 'messages from the prisoners to their friends.'"
143. That is to say, he verbally charged you with this? Yes.
144. Was the matter carried any further? No, it then and there rested. I was going to carry it forward, but I was told that not having any written evidence it was not well to do so.
145. On your explanation Mr. Ormsby let the matter drop? Yes; nothing more was said about it.
146. By the Chairman: You state in a portion of your letter in the Empire of October the 2nd, that "the prisoners complain that their letters are read aloud in the office and made a 'matter of joke, and that the contents of their letters to their friends are thus made known 'to their fellow prisoners'—do you know any facts in support of that charge? Yes. One of the prisoners, named Beer, called on me one day, and said he wished to make a communication to a gentleman in Sydney, who was a friend of his family, and he wanted me to take it. I said, 'If you have any communication to make, you write and send it through the 'Superintendent.'" He said, "No; it is of a kind that I cannot send through him." I replied, "If it is a communication not proper to be sent through him, it cannot be proper for 'me to take it.'" He said, "Well, Sir, I will tell you what it is. My family are Swiss, and I 'have had a letter from my father, who is a very old man; he wishes me to assure him that 'I am innocent of the charge, and says if I will do so he will be perfectly satisfied. I wish 'to assure him of that, and to state what are my feelings.'" I said, "Write the letter." He replied, "I cannot; it will have to be passed, with the other letters, through the hands 'of the Superintendent.'" I told him that it would be like letters opened in the Dead Letter Office—a perfect secret, confined to the Superintendent. He said—"I some time 'since wrote a letter to my sister, and although I have not been what I ought to have been, 'I have been religiously brought up, and in my letter I quoted some psalms which had been 'a consolation to me in my imprisonment. The Superintendent met me shortly after, 'and said, 'What have you got to do with writing psalms?'—naming the psalms—and 'stating that the letter had been read in the office, and ridiculed by other prisoners as 'canting humbug.'"
147. By Captain Ward: Do you know, as a matter of fact, that this letter was read in the office? I cannot know that, but I know that a letter had been written by that man to his sister.
148. You do not know, of your own knowledge, that any letter was read in the office? No further than I knew from the information of others.

149. Could you name any person who would give evidence upon that—any free man? I beg to say that it has been stated that the writers of those letters have been conspirators, and actuated by evil feelings towards Mr. Ormsby. Now, I beg to say that I am no conspirator, and that I have no personal feeling whatever in the matter I can declare on my honor. (The witness then wrote the following as the list of persons he desired to call in support of his statement):—

The Rev.
J. Pendrill.

(The 30 Oct., 1857.)

"Mr. Dunning, Inspector of Police, respecting Gleadall's case, also respecting the use of the visiting boat when I was sent to Sydney with convict.

"Mr. Thomas, late Resident Engineer, can affirm that he has heard letters read aloud in the office.

"Mr. Brown, Assistant Superintendent, can give information respecting the Chinaman who was confined unjustly for refusing to work when the interpreter did not come.

"Dr. Beer stated about his letter being read, and his being reproved for quoting psalms.

"Merewether made the statement respecting rations; that is, as far as his being unjustly confined for 'voting against the Government' on the question of appropriation.

"Assistant Superintendent may be asked what assistance I had in my duties.

"Inspector of Police, respecting the irregularity of the boat service."

150. Cross-examined by Mr. Dillon: Is there any one single instance within your personal knowledge of misconduct on Mr. Ormsby's part to justify a complaint of any kind by you? Yes, certainly. I should not have made a complaint unless I had thought so.

151. What instance is there which you intended, by the evidence given by you to-day, to shew as being within your own personal knowledge? I shall go into nothing that has already been gone into before the Board.

152. If you will allow me I will repeat the question, which you do not appear to understand, and, with the permission of the Board, I will require an express answer from you—What portion of your evidence to-day do you intend to put forward as that on which you rely for any fact, within your personal knowledge, of fair ground of complaint against Mr. Ormsby? The refusal of the boat on the 7th February.

153. And is that all? Oh no! I complained of the manner in which I was treated when I was required to go to the school to robe. I believe that was done as an express mark of disrespect. There was a case on the 15th of November. Another refusal of the boat on the 9th of November, when the boat left the island without taking me.

154. With the leave of the Commissioners, I will put my question to you again, which at present you either do not understand, or, have not given a correct answer to, or, I have not known how to put properly. Give a plain answer to this question.—Is there any instance, except that on the 7th of February, in which you had personal knowledge of any impropriety on the part of Mr. Ormsby, which you intend to convey as matter of complaint in your evidence before the Commissioners to-day—any instance of your personal knowledge? Yes. I once made an entry in the Visitors' Book, respecting the removal of a tract—one of the tracts sent over by the Bishop of Sydney. That complaint was cut out of the Visitors' Book and the names were written over again, upon another page.

155. Was that done by Mr. Ormsby? It was cut out and re-written.

156. My question is a plain one—can you tell the Commissioners, or inform me of one single fact, one single incident that you can state as the cause of complaint for anything wrong done by Mr. Ormsby, in your evidence now given? I can state that the complaint I entered in the Visitors' Book was cut out of it.

157. By Captain Ward: In that particular case, was that done with Mr. Ormsby's knowledge? I presume names are not cut out of the Visitors' Book without his knowledge.

158. Was it done with Mr. Ormsby's knowledge, that is what I understand Mr. Dillon to mean? If Mr. Dillon wants to go into any other thing, I am perfectly willing to do so.

159. By the Chairman: You complain that a page was cut out of the Visitors' Book, by whom, and by whose orders you do know? No; you can refer to the Visitors' Book.

160. By Mr. Dillon: Do you recollect, with regard to what you say was cut out of the Visitors' Book, whether the substance of it was not calculated to lead to some controversy between you and the Roman Catholic Clergyman? That is not the question at issue.

161. By Captain Ward: You can answer that? I do not know that it was.

162. By the Chairman: What was the remark made? It was simply to the effect that he had stepped out of his own department when he had taken the tract out of the hospital.

163. A tract you had put there? No; my predecessor.

164. That was the remark in the book? Yes; and I requested him to attend to his own affairs; that was cut out of the book.

165. By whom you do not know? No.

166. By Mr. Dillon: Are you the writer of a letter published in the Empire of the 5th of October, signed "Another Witness?" No.

167. Do you know who is? No. I did not know the writer of any letter at the time; I have heard since.

168. Do you know the writer of the letter in the Empire of the 6th October, signed "A Third Witness?" No; all I know I confess to.

169. You spoke of the case of Cockerell? Yes.

170. Were you not aware that it was contrary to the regulations for messages to be taken to the prisoners' friends? No; I never heard of any regulations on the island.

171. Did you not know that it is against the regulations to carry messages from Cockatoo? No, I do not, and I carried no message from Cockatoo.

172. Did Mr. Ormsby ever personally refuse you a boat? I personally requested him that the boat might remain for me on the 9th of October, and it was not attended to.

173. By Captain Ward: What was his reply? That it should; it did not, and no apology was made.

The Rev.

APPENDIX A.

Sydney, 19 February, 1857.

To the Honorable the Colonial Secretary,
Sir,

30 Oct., 1857.

By a communication from you of 24th December (No. 56-9186,) enclosing a letter from the Visiting Magistrate of Cockatoo Island, on the subject of the visiting boat, and other matters connected therewith, I was led to hope that I should receive from the Superintendent of that establishment, in his future arrangements of the boat service, that courtesy and respect which I feel assured (as your letter indeed states) it is the desire of the Government should be shown to Ministers of Religion by the officers of the establishments which they visit. I am sorry to be obliged to complain that the intimation to this effect, given to the Superintendent of Cockatoo Island, has been as yet without result. Notwithstanding the disavowal of intentional discourtesy, expressed by him, through Mr. North's report, he persists in refusing to me the boat specially provided for the use of the establishment. As this refusal involves a prominent principle of Mr. Ormsby's administrations, namely a constant disposition to make his arbitrary will and pleasure the only recognised law on Cockatoo Island, I am not prepared to pass it over without remark.

The subject of complaint may seem a small matter, but it is just one of those small matters which illustrate the petty and overbearing spirit in which the Superintendent discharges his duties on Cockatoo; and by the abuse of the unlimited authority, which he has either received in trust or else usurped, creates a feeling of general dissatisfaction throughout the whole island.

In a penal establishment, where the law vindicates its claim by inflicting its severest penalty, the general administration, even in its minutest details, ought to be conducted in most entire submission to law on the part of its officers, or, in other words, on fixed and definite principles. Even prisoners have certain rights, and when these rights, small though they be, are respected, when no petty and extra-judicial inflictions are added to their just judicial sentence, it is felt that justice reigns supreme, and the criminal feels that whatever he suffers he suffers justly.

But if an administrator, whose office it is to exact from others the penalties of violated law, himself continually violates the principle of law in little things, because his position enables him to do it with impunity, he degrades justice, and leads the criminal to complain that her ways are not equal,—general dissatisfaction will be the result, and this dissatisfaction will not be the less deep and sincere because a pressure is applied to prevent complaint and redress.

It is for reasons of this kind that the present administration at Cockatoo is obnoxious to every one on the island, whether bond or free, except the special objects of a capricious favoritism.

I am, therefore, induced to enter a protest against the Superintendent's proceedings in respect to myself, as this merely forms part of an arbitrary and vexatious system, which presses severely on many whose dependent position on his absolute sway prevents their offering any complaint.

I conceive that I am entitled to require, not merely such conveyance to and from Cockatoo Island as the Superintendent in his caprice may think fit to offer, but such proper and suitable conveyance as the Government arrangements enable him to provide. I believe that the Chaplain at Cockatoo formerly received an allowance for boat hire. It was thought desirable to withdraw this allowance, and in lieu of it a suitable and well appointed boat was appointed for the general use of the officers of the establishment.

At present, about £400 (beside rations) of the sum voted by Parliament on account of the Police Estimates of Cockatoo Island are set apart for the maintenance of this boat and crew. The crew are indeed rated as police, but they do no police duty; their only duties are the boat service. In thus furnishing the means for providing an effective crew and good boat, it is obviously the intention of Parliament that the officers of Cockatoo Island should be served in this respect in such a manner as becomes a well ordered Government establishment. A good boat is provided that there may be no excuse for a negligent and slovenly performance of the service.

I consider that the Superintendent is in no way justified in contravening this arrangement of his mere caprice; he is not justified in substituting an inferior boat; still less is he justified for so doing, that the proper one may be reserved for the special service of himself and friends in their parties of pleasure or visits to Sydney, to the hindrance and detriment of the public service.

On February 7th, I was informed that the visiting boat was being painted, and that the coxswain was at work on her, and that for this reason he would not accompany the boat sent for me to Sydney. I was on that day sent back to Sydney in the small boat without the full crew; the Chaplain of the Church of Rome returned in same boat, and there were sent with us a convict, in double irons, and the sergeant of police; it blew a stormy breeze, and the boat was so deep in the water that one of the crew complained that he could not work his oars. Mr. Ormsby had given orders that the said convict should be placed in the bow of the boat, but as the sea was so rough that it sent the spray over the boat, and he had no provision against the wet beyond his prison dress, we did not feel justified in permitting the Superintendent's most inconsiderate order to be obeyed.

The crowded state of the boat and the roughness of the wind and tide made the passage most uncomfortable.

The proper boat (said to be painting) was, in fact, sent up to Lane Cove, or some other place, with a party of pleasure from the Superintendent's a short time before we left the island.

On Sunday last, November 15th, the small boat having been sent for me to Sydney, I refused to return in it, and desired the coxswain to have the proper boat ready after service, but Mr. Ormsby positively refused to let me have it, and I, in consequence, returned to Sydney through the bush.

Whether the boat was again required for a party of pleasure, or whether the refusal was purely a matter of caprice and intentional discourtesy, I cannot pretend to say.

I must, moreover, remark, that the small boat is so short, and lies so low in the water, that it is much heavier to pull than the proper boat, and the use of it unnecessarily imposes on the crew double labor, and, from the same causes, when the weather is rough, as is frequently the case, it dips so much into the sea as to inflict on crew and passengers an uncomfortable amount of salt water.

I consider that the Superintendent is guilty of a gross dereliction of his duty when he thus abuses his control of the boat service, not only by hindering its efficiency, but by raising up obstacles in the way of those who are entitled to it. This system is, doubtless, much to his own personal advantage and convenience. By making the use of the boat as uncomfortable and as disagreeable in every way as possible, he prevents others from using it, and thus secures a more exclusive command of boat and crew than ever for himself and friends; yet, at the same time, it must be admitted that the system is little creditable to the establishment in which it exists with impunity.

This, however, is but one small item of that general system of arbitrary misrule and abuse of power which prevails at the establishment at Cockatoo Island.

I am persuaded that the Government is not aware of the extent to which this power is made to bear oppressively, and, I fear, unjustly in the lesser details of internal administration; nor indeed can the Government be aware until a full inquiry into these matters be instituted; and, by inquiry, I do not mean an inquiry with closed doors, conducted by the Superintendent, with power to conceal facts, suppress evidence, and intimidate subordinates fearful of losing their situations, but an open and impartial inquiry, with a single desire to ascertain the truth and place the establishment on such a footing that none may have cause to complain of its unjust, impartial, and capricious administration.

I have, &c.,

JOHN PENDRILL,
Church of England Chaplain of Cockatoo.

APPENDIX B.

Colonial Secretary's Office,
Sydney, 21st December, 1856.

The Rev.
J. Pendrill.

30 Oct., 1857.

Reverend Sir,

With reference to my letter of the 23d instant, I am now directed to transmit to you the copy of a Report, received from the Visiting Magistrate of Cockatoo Island, on the subject of your representation of inattention and want of courtesy from the Superintendent of that Establishment, and to express the hope of the Colonial Secretary that the arrangement which you will observe Mr. North is prepared to make, for providing you with a boat to visit the island, will prevent any further cause of complaint.

The Reverend John Pendrill,
Sydney.

I have, &c.,
W. ELYARD.

APPENDIX C.

Colonial Secretary's Office,
Sydney, 23rd December, 1856.

Reverend Sir,

I am directed to inform you that your letter of the 18th instant has been referred to the Visiting Magistrate of Cockatoo Island (Mr. North) for the purpose of inquiring into and reporting on the arrangements for furnishing a boat for the use of the clergyman visiting that establishment. 2. I am desired to add that, in consequence of your former letter, a reference was made through the Visiting Magistrate to the Superintendent, who stated that he always felt pleasure in meeting, as far as possible, the wishes of official visitors; and it did not appear that any disrespect was intended. A communication to this effect was intended to have been written to you at an earlier date, accompanied by a statement of the days and hours at which boats from the island are available for such visitors; but the Visiting Magistrate has again been referred to, and a further letter will be addressed to you on the receipt of his report. It is, of course, the desire of the Government that every respect should be shown to Ministers of Religion by the officers of the establishments they visit; and this has been already intimated to the Superintendent of Cockatoo Island.

The Reverend John Pendrill.

I have, &c.,
W. ELYARD.

APPENDIX D.

Office of the Visiting Magistrate of Cockatoo Island,
29th January, 1857.

Sir,

In compliance with your letter of the 24th instant, a boat will attend at the King-street Wharf, for the purpose of conveying you to Cockatoo Island, every Saturday and Sunday, at 2 o'clock, p.m.; but I could have wished you had named any other day instead of Saturday, as the boatmen have always had that day allowed them for cleaning themselves and boats. I have no doubt that every respect will be paid to you in the performance of your duties, and I trust you will not find me unwilling to enforce it whenever any instance is brought under my notice.

As I am not aware to what your last paragraph alludes, it is impossible for me to reply to it.

I have, &c.,
S. NORTH,
W. P. M.

George West, M. D., was called in and further examined, as follows:—

1. By the Chairman: Do you remember a man named Daniel Dunmore having been a patient in the hospital in March, 1856? I could not recollect it unless I could refer to the books. G. West, M.D.
30 Oct., 1857.
2. A young man who died of pleuritis? I think I begin to recollect something about it.
3. A communication has been made to us to this effect:—"A young man named Daniel Dunmore was attacked with pleuritis, and complained to the dispenser, asking to be taken into the hospital; the dispenser refused him admittance and sent him to the exempt ground—a damp bank—where he was exposed to rain, and his disease was doubtless much aggravated by this treatment. He became so much worse the next day that he was literally carried from his ward to the hospital, and in three days died"? I have some recollection of it, but not so particularly that I could give the evidence respecting it I could wish; I have this recollection, that the dispenser told me he got a great deal better of it, and, at his own request, left the hospital.
4. You could not, at this moment, give the particulars? No.
5. By Captain Ward: Who was the dispenser at that time? The same person. I have a perfect recollection that he told me he was a great deal better for the treatment he had had, and that he had left at his own request.
6. Do you remember the case of an old man named Murphy—the statement we have received is that "an old man named Murphy also died from neglect not very long ago. The register in the hospital was altered to suit the story trumped up to meet the emergency, and a different treatment of Dunmore inserted"? This is the first time I ever heard of this.

Mr. James H. Thomas was again called in, and further examined, as follows:—

[The evidence given by Mr. Thomas on the 23rd instant was read.]

1. Cross-examined by Mr. Dillon: You spoke awhile ago of your having made a complaint of some prisoners threatening you? Yes.
2. And I believe you, on that occasion, returned them to the penal department? I do not recollect.
3. They refused to work after hours? No; that was not the case.
4. Do you recollect the Visiting Magistrate requiring you to bring this case before him? No; that is not the case; that has been settled before.

* 17—R.

Mr. J. H.
The as.

30 Oct., 1857.

Mr. J. H.
Thomas.

30 Oct., 1857.

5. You spoke awhile ago of Spencer working for Mr. Ormsby—do you not know, is it not within your own personal knowledge, that what he did was by order of the Resident Engineer—in fact by your own orders and directions? No.
6. You state that? I state that.
7. By Captain Ward: Are you aware what Spencer did upon that occasion? No; I never could be aware what Spencer did, as I had not access to Mr. Ormsby's premises.
8. How long ago was that? There were several occasions.
9. Was that case of Spencer brought before the Government? There have been one or two cases; I do not know whether that is the particular case.
10. By Mr. Dillon: How long have you been on the island? Nearly four years. I have stated that.
11. You speak, to your own knowledge, of Mr. Ormsby or of his family having used this boat twenty or thirty times during that? Yes, more.
12. Are you aware that he has an authority to use that boat one day in the week? I have no knowledge. I do not know what the orders are. I know nothing of that; I have no means of knowing. I only state that he has used it; whether he has orders I have not the means of knowing.
13. You spoke of Mr. Ormsby having allowed his friends to land on the island without an order, is that within your personal knowledge? I only know from two gentlemen who have told me so—Mr. Spain and Mr. Macdonald; they told me that they were allowed to land without an order when they went to see Mr. Ormsby.
14. You do not know, as a fact, that they had no order? No, because Mr. Ormsby might say he had an order. When they came to see me they were not allowed to land, for I was on the wharf at the time.
15. By Captain Ward: How long was this ago when Mr. Spain and Mr. Macdonald came to the island? About six or eight months ago; but Mr. Dunning will be able to say.
16. By Mr. Dillon: Then, in point of fact, you do not know whether Mr. Ormsby had an order. Is it not a common occurrence for Mr. Ormsby to have authority for persons to land before they come to the island—do you not know that? No; how is it possible for me to know?
17. You profess to know one way, and, as you know what has been the case with respect to yourself, you may know something in the other direction? I have never seen the orders.
18. Have you not had orders for your friends to land before they have come to the island? Yes.
19. Then the same thing may have happened in Mr. Ormsby's case? Yes, that may be. I am only giving you the names of persons who have told me it was not so.
20. Are you and Mr. Ormsby on good terms? No; we never have been from the day I landed.
21. In your evidence you state that it is in your power to give evidence to his prejudice. On this occasion you profess to do so from a sense of duty to the public? I have no interest in the matter; I am out of it now.
22. Then you come forward from a sense of public duty, and not from any personal ill-feeling? From a sense of public duty. I give the names of persons, and in my letter I state certain matters as things to be inquired into.
23. You are guided altogether by a sense of public duty, without any personal ill-feeling? There has never been any private quarrel between us; our disagreements have been over matters of public duty. There has never been any chance of personal quarrel.
24. Did you ever on any occasion send a very offensive message by any police officer on the island? I do not see that that has anything to do with this. What does that refer to in the evidence?—I decline to answer that.
25. Do you ever recollect sending any message by one or more of the policemen on any occasion, to this effect, or in these words—really the words are so offensive that I do not like to repeat them to this Board, and wish to be quite certain as to the precise words—that “the police would kiss Mr. Ormsby's arse,” but that Mr. Ormsby might “kiss your arse, and they might tell him so”? No.
26. Do you swear that? I swear it; I swear that was not the expression.
27. Or to that effect? That is another thing.
28. What was it you said? I said Mr. Ormsby might kiss my backside, in reference to some impertinent allusion made to me in reference to Mr. Ormsby. If that may be allowed I will bring other things to shew that the same thing has been expressed with reference to me. I can instance a number of cases where I have met with insult and annoyance. I will go into them if you wish, but I should like my legal adviser to be present.
[The Chairman said the presence of Mr. Thomas' legal adviser was not necessary, as he did not stand in the position of one accused.]
29. Did you ever, in the presence of the prisoners on the island, or to any of the prisoners, use an expression to this effect, on one or repeated occasions, “Damn Mr. Ormsby”? No, never to a prisoner.
30. Or within the hearing of a prisoner on the island? No—at least I will not swear that I may not have said it within the hearing—I never said it to a prisoner. But I do not see that I am here to answer these questions.
31. You speak of noises on the island on the Sabbath-day—did you ever make a complaint on that subject? It was not my duty.
32. Did you, or did you not? No, I did not.
33. Are you aware whether any of these singings you speak of did or did not proceed from the military guard? Yes, I am quite sure of it; I am quite positive of it, as I have been walking round the prison and could distinguish.
34. What I ask plainly is this—will you undertake to say that on none of these occasions, when you heard these noises you speak of, they proceeded from the military guard, from the men in their barracks? Yes, I will.

35. You speak of a cedar plank having been taken, and you say also very positively that Mr. Ormsby was on the island on that day? I did not speak so very positively.
36. Now will you undertake to say whether he was or was not present? To the best of my belief he was.
37. You will not be certain? I would not take an oath that he was.
38. Was it a cedar plank or two boards? A cedar plank.
39. Do you recollect whether there was not an inquiry by the Visiting Magistrate as to the fact that it was put there, or as to the supposition that it was put there in Mr. Ormsby's absence—do you remember an inquiry upon that point? That might have been, but I never knew of it.
40. Do you know Mr. Cahil? Yes.
41. Do you think him a person worthy of belief—that his evidence is worthy of belief? Yes, I think so; I have no reason to doubt him.
42. With respect to the opening and reading letters, it was only on a single occasion you were present at an occurrence of that kind? No; I was there on two or three occasions.
43. Has the result been the same on all those occasions—that is, that Mr. Ormsby has ridiculed them? Yes, that I am ready to swear to.
44. Do you recollect the passages in the letters? No, but the substance; they were made matter of ridicule.
45. You do not state, as a matter of certainty, who was in the office besides Mr. Ormsby and the clerk? No, there might have been the two prisoner clerks there; I was standing in such a way that it was impossible to tell.
46. It was in reference to what was written in the letters that Mr. Ormsby smiled? Yes.
47. You never knew, of your own knowledge, of his keeping back any letters, or of his invading the privilege of the prisoners to write to whom they pleased? Not of my own knowledge, but I have heard of cases.
48. I suppose you are aware that no letters should go from the island without being examined by Mr. Ormsby? I do not know that is the regulation; I have heard that it is.
49. By Captain Ward: Is it not down in the regulations? I do not know.
50. By the Chairman: Have you anything you would desire to add to the statement you have already given? At the time I was examined I imagined that it would be to state generally as to the state of the island. For the first two years that I was upon the island I kept two diaries, in which a number of entries were made; and if I were allowed to go to the island and refer to the books in the Engineer's Department, I could refer to dates on which I was subject to the system of annoyance and opposition which prevailed.
51. By Captain Ward: Do you mean previous to the former inquiry? Yes, and I think cases have occurred since.
52. All these have been brought under the notice of your superior officer, Captain Mann? Yes, in every case.
53. And Mr. Mann has dealt with them? No.
54. They have been under his supervision? Yes; when I had reported to him I had done my duty.

Mr. J. H.
Thomas.

WEDNESDAY, 4 NOVEMBER, 1857.

Present:—

SIR W. W. BURTON, KNT., IN THE CHAIR.

E. C. MEREWETHER, Esq, | CAPT. E. W. WARD.

Mr. Ormsby.

Mr. Dillon, Solicitor for Mr. Ormsby.

[A letter was read from Mr. Dillon.—Vide Appendix. The Board deliberated, and resolved that the requests contained in the letter could not be complied with.]

The Chairman to Mr. Dillon: We have had a letter handed to us by you, containing several requests. First,—that you should have a list of the charges against Mr. Ormsby. With respect to that I must tell you, by desire of the Board, that you are already in possession of as much as they, as these charges, whatever they may be that affect him, are in the different papers that have been published. With reference to the second,—that the Board will allow Mr. Taylor to be present to assist you in the arrangement of your papers,—they can do no such thing. Thinking that in the course of this inquiry into the general management of the island the evidence of some witnesses might affect Mr. Ormsby, it was considered just to him to allow him to be present, and, in consequence of his apparent infirmity, you were admitted to assist him, but the Board can yield no further.

Mr. Joseph Francis Peers, was called in and examined as follows:—

1. By the Chairman: You are the dispenser upon Cockatoo Island? I am.
2. How long have you been there? Nearly two years.
3. Are you a regularly educated medical practitioner? Yes.
4. Have you been a surgeon in the Navy? I have been an assistant surgeon, not full surgeon.
5. During the time you have been on the island you have, of course, made yourself acquainted with the state of penal discipline there? Yes, to a certain extent.
6. Do you remember the case of two prisoners who concealed themselves for a time upon the island? I do.

Mr. J. F. Peers.

4 Nov., 1857.

- Mr. J.F. Peers. 7. How long were they absent from their duty? I think not more than twenty-four hours, as near as I can recollect; I am not certain on that point.
- 4 Nov., 1857. 8. Was either of them brought to the hospital after being recovered? Yes—the boy Roberts.
9. What age was this boy as you call him? He was a lad, I should think between sixteen and seventeen—quite a boy.
10. Was he long in the hospital? Off and on for some time.
11. How many weeks or days? Exactly, I could not answer; but about a month or two at least, I should think.
12. Did you ever see the other prisoner who absconded with him? Yes.
13. Do you know his name? Clarke.
14. What aged person was he? A young man, I should think about twenty-seven or twenty-eight, as far as I could judge from his appearance.
15. Have you seen this paper, the Empire of October 5th, in which there is a letter signed "Another Witness?" Yes.
16. Will you look at No. 1,—you observe that it is stated that two prisoners concealed themselves for forty-eight hours on the island, as it was supposed, for the purpose of committing a nameless offence; do you know of any reason for supposing that they concealed themselves for that purpose? No, indeed I do not.
17. Were you present at any inquiry upon the case of those two persons? No.
18. One was a boy of tender years, sixteen or seventeen? He might have been more, but he could have been but very little more.
19. Can you give the Board any information respecting that case? No.
20. What punishment was inflicted? I do not know.
21. Whether there was any or not you do not know? I do not.
22. With respect to the Superintendent, I would ask you, "Did the Superintendent upon a recent occasion call the dispenser, in the presence of the Visiting Surgeon, the clerk to the dry dock, and several prisoners, a name unfit to repeat, and make use of other foul expressions to him, for having reported something to the superior officer." I presume you are the person alluded to as "the dispenser"? I suppose so.
23. Has there been any correspondence between you, Mr. West, and Mr. Ormsby on that subject? There was some correspondence.
24. Was there any occasion upon which such a name was used to you, and what was it? There were some words between me and Mr. Ormsby. I cannot give a direct answer, as I am not asked what it was.
25. Was there an occasion on which a name was applied to you "unfit to repeat"? Yes.
26. State what that was, and who were present? If you will ask me any question about it, I will answer it.
27. My question was a very full one; did the Superintendent upon a recent occasion, call you in the presence of the Visiting Surgeon, the clerk to the dry dock, and several prisoners, a name unfit to repeat? Yes.
28. What was that name? Do you wish me to go into that.
29. I ask you a simple question—what name did he call you? He called me a pimp.
30. What other foul words did he use? He said I was a damned liar, and in fact the three successive words were, that I was a damned liar, a vagabond, and a scoundrel.
31. Where was that—at your dispensary, or in his office? Close to his office.
32. In the street, or rather in the open space by his office? Yes.
33. Who was present on that occasion? Dr. West.
34. Was Mr. Duff present? I believe Mr. Duff was present.
35. Any other persons? There are always persons round there—prisoners.
36. Do you know the cause of your having such epithets applied to you? I had never given any cause.
37. Did Mr. Ormsby say there was any cause? Yes, there was a misunderstanding between Mr. Ormsby and myself, as regards Dr. West. The day previous for Dr. West's visit he did not come, and Mr. Ormsby expected him, I believe. Mr. Ormsby told me that he was disappointed that the doctor did not come, and I fully understood from Mr. Ormsby, from his manner, and I still believe, that he wished me to inform Dr. West that he was annoyed that he had not come. I, fully understanding Mr. Ormsby to that effect, told Dr. West. Dr. West was very vexed about it, and went to Mr. Ormsby and said, "What you have to say I wish you would say to myself, and not to my dispenser?" Mr. Ormsby asked what I had said, and I replied that I had told Mr. West what he had said to me about his not coming, as I believed he intended me to do. Mr. Ormsby got in a passion, and applied this language.
38. He applied these epithets to you? Yes.
39. Look at that correspondence (handing witness Appendix B to Mr. Parkes' evidence) and see if that is the correspondence which passed between you and Mr. Ormsby with reference to that matter? That is correct.
40. Do you wish to add anything upon that particular point? No.
41. This is the Empire of the 2nd October (handing the paper to the witness)—"A certain party was accused some time since of appropriating the rations of the prisoners." Who is the party alluded to in that letter—do you know? No I cannot say that I do.
42. Do you know the circumstance there alluded to? There was a circumstance occurred some time ago about the rations.
43. Can you tell us with particularity what the circumstance was? I can tell you as far as this, that some rations were supposed to be taken to the Superintendent's; but I was present at some investigation which appeared to fall to the ground; it was some refuse rations.
44. That is a little too incoherent to be taken down. When did this circumstance occur—tell us only what you know yourself? If it is to speak positive, I cannot.

45. Were you ever made aware of such a circumstance—did you ever know a charge to be made against Mr. Ormsby of having appropriated a part of the rations of the prisoners? There was such a charge, but I cannot tell the date. Mr. J.F. Peers.
4 Nov., 1857.
46. Who made the charge? A number of the prisoners.
47. What was the charge? Of appropriating the rations of the prisoners.
48. To what amount? I do not know.
49. Was there an inquiry made? Yes.
50. By whom? By the Visiting Magistrate.
51. Were you present? I think I must have been—I am not sure.
52. What was the result? The result I believe was, so far as I saw, that it was satisfactorily explained there was no appropriation.
53. What did the Visiting Magistrate do with the case? He cautioned the men against taking matters of this kind into their hands without being properly prepared to go on with the charge, and to substantiate any charge they might bring.
54. What did he do with the charge itself? I think it was dismissed.
55. By Captain Ward: You are quite sure it was examined into before the Visiting Magistrate? Yes.
56. By the Chairman: Will you look at the Empire of the 26th September, to a letter signed "N. B.," and tell the Board if you know the writer of that? (The witness referred to the paper.) I have seen this letter before.
57. Who is the writer of it? I do not know.
58. Are you the writer? No.
59. Did you see it before it was published? No.
60. Do you know the writer? No.
61. Do you know the circumstance referred to? After seeing this I knew to what it alluded. One Sunday afternoon there were two old fellows in the yard playing, or skylarking, as we say at sea, and there was some fun or other, and there was a general roar of laughter—that was all.
62. Was that of long continuance? Not very long—not longer than a minute or two.
63. You reside upon the island? Yes.
64. Are you generally there upon the Lord's Day? Sometimes, except in the morning.
65. What was the observance of the Lord's Day; was it generally decently and properly observed? Yes.
66. Were you ever disturbed by frightful yelling and hallooing? I never was.
67. At a late hour at night did you hear singing and choruses? I was never disturbed; I have heard the men singing little ditties in the ward, but nothing to call indecent noise or confusion.
68. Then, whoever wrote the letter signed "N. B.," the facts stated are not true? Inasmuch as I have stated they are true—I heard this laughing.
69. And that was all? That was all.
70. Have you ever known upon any occasion a man to be taken into the hospital who has been reported by the doctor to be fit for work? No.
71. That is with reference to the fifth charge in the letter of the 5th October? No.
72. Do you remember a carpenter named Spencer being taken from the hospital for any purpose? No, I do not remember his being taken from the hospital for any purpose whatever.
73. Do you remember a carpenter of the name of Spencer being taken from the hospital by the Superintendent to work at his own quarters? I had a man in the hospital of the name of Spencer, and the only thing I know about that is, that as I was coming back to the hospital—he was a patient in the hospital at the time—I found him just coming in. He had been out, but where he had been I could not say.
74. Did he say where he had been? Yes.
75. What did he say? He told me he had been up to the office.
76. Merely up to the office? Merely; that is all.
77. Will you now tell us what you know of the case of the young man Daniel Dunmore? Yes.
78. Did he die in the hospital? Yes.
79. What was his disease? Consumption, or disease of the lungs rather—pleurisy.
80. Was he admitted into the hospital in the first instance? No, he was exempted from work at first; he was put into the exempt list.
81. What were the symptoms of his disease? At first it was merely an inflammatory cough. At this time there were a great many men sick with influenza, and there were, therefore, a great number of cases of the same kind.
82. What you do with him? I treated him for inflammatory cough.
83. How did you treat him? He had the usual treatment; I have it here—I could not say extempore.
84. Have you the treatment here? Yes.
85. Let me see it? (The witness produced the day book.) This is my certificate that he is exempted by the authorities on the island.
86. Where does he appear in the book? (The witness referred to the book, and pointed out the several entries relating to Dunmore.) "Daniel Dunmore presented himself at the hospital "on the 25th of March, for a pain in the chest." We gave him lobelia and æther.
87. At what time in the day was that? About nine in the morning.
88. Was his breathing oppressed? Yes; he had the general symptoms of influenza at that time.
89. You felt his pulse? Yes; I fully examined him.
90. And exempted him from duty, not considering his case worthy of more attention at the time? Yes.
91. And sent him to the exempt ground? And sent him to the exempt ground.

- Mr. J.F. Peers. 92. What kind of weather was it at that time? Something like it is now—sometimes hot and sometimes cold.
- 4 Nov., 1837. 93. When did you see him again? He came three times a-day to take his medicine.
94. When did he come again? The next day. I gave him cough mixture—camphorated opium, ipecacuanha, and ammoniacum.
95. This is your own prescription (referring to the book)? Yes.
96. When did the Visiting Surgeon see him? I cannot say.
97. The next time you saw him laboring under the same symptoms, and gave him the same treatment as before; on the 27th he came again? Yes.
98. Then he was not in the hospital? Yes; I took him in to watch the case. I took him in during the day, but discharged him at night.
99. You gave him cough mixture on the 27th? Yes, and I sent him back from the hospital to the exempt ground. Then I think Dr. West must have seen him, for I see “digitalis” is added.
100. By Captain Ward: Where are the prescriptions taken from that I see tacked on here (referring to certain slips of paper pinned to the pages of the book)? They are taken from another book.
101. By whom are they written? By myself.
102. By the Chairman: On the third day he went again to the exempt ground? Yes.
103. And on the fourth day? He was admitted into the hospital. Now his name ceases in this book. His treatment ceases in the day-book, and is entered in the hospital-book. (The witness produced the hospital book.)
104. He was taken into the hospital on the 28th? Yes. That is Dr. West's prescription.
105. On that day you say the Visiting Surgeon saw him? I suppose so; I believe this prescription is Dr. West's.
106. Where does he appear again? On the 29th he is still under treatment, and a blister is added.
107. On the 30th he is still in the hospital? Yes: ammonia acetate—that prescription is Dr. West's.
108. On the 31st? He was still under treatment.
109. On the 1st April? He died on the 1st.
110. At what time of the day? I must refer to my private journal for that. (The witness referred to his journal.) I bring this forward voluntarily; it is my own journal.
111. This is only from the time of his coming into the hospital? Yes.
112. I think you told us that the prescription on the 28th was Dr. West's? I am not positive. I have not the visiting book here.
113. By Captain Ward: I see in this book that you mark down Thomas Edgar to see Dr. West, but there is no such mark against Dunmore's name at all. What record is there that he saw Dr. West? For instance—sometimes a man comes to me and says he has symptoms of a certain disease, and that he should like to see Dr. West when he comes, and I put down his name; that is the cause of that man's name being written down in that book.
114. By the Chairman: When did Dr. West certainly see him? He saw him several times, but I could not positively say.
115. You say he came into the hospital on the 28th of March, and died on the 1st of April; how often did Dr. West see him from the 28th of March to the 1st of April? I should think two or three times at the very least, even if he attended him only on his ordinary visiting days.
116. He gave a new prescription for him? Yes.
117. By Captain Ward: I suppose Dr. West will be able to tell us himself? Yes.
118. By the Chairman: Was a post mortem examination made? Yes.
119. Who conducted that examination? Myself.
120. Alone? Yes.
121. Was any inquest held upon him? No.
122. When was he buried? I think on the same day, or the day after.
123. By whose order was he buried? By the Visiting Magistrate's.
124. I observe that this book (the private journal) has been sealed up in the previous pages—is there any entry in the former part of this book sealed up concerning Daniel Dunmore? None whatever.
125. And there is none in any other part? None whatever, only in this particular part.
126. I must now ask you for that extract from your private journal to annex to the proceedings? Certainly. I have brought that book to refute the charges as they affect me. (Vide Appendix.)
127. I must now ask you respecting the case of William Murphy (The witness produced the hospital book.) William Murphy was an old man? Yes, he was of great age, I believe above eighty.
128. When was he admitted to the hospital? At half past ten on the night of the 3rd of December.
129. What was his complaint? Asthma.
130. How long did he continue in the hospital? I think a very short time. (The witness referred to the book.) He died at 2 P.M. on the 7th December.
131. Was he seen by the Visiting Surgeon? Yes.
132. You think this man was of the age of eighty? He was very old, so much so that I would not allow him to go down the steps.
133. What kind of asthma did he labor under—spasmodic asthma? Yes.
134. And he was treated both by you and Dr. West? Yes.
135. When was this treatment inserted (referring to an entry in the book)? First by myself, and then apparently Dr. West must have seen him, for there was not room to insert it, and it is crowded in.

136. When was this entry made by Dr. West? On the very day upon which it is dated. Mr. J. M. Peers.
137. That you are sure of? Yes, I will pledge you my word. 4 Nov., 1857.
138. By Dr. West? By both.
139. Was there any post mortem examination of that man? No, because we knew exactly what he died of.
140. He died of spasmodic asthma, and was a very old man? Yes.
141. Was there any Coroner's inquest held upon him? No.
142. Had you any other death on the island during your time? None.
143. Was there the death of a man who fell or who was thrown into the dock? That was not in my time.
144. You do not know of any other death in the hospital during your time? Yes, from chronic diseases.
145. How many deaths occurred in the hospital during your time? Five, in the two years I have been there.
146. Have there been any Coroner's inquests held upon them? No, because all the diseases could be accounted for.
147. Whose handwriting is this (referring to the entry of Dunmore's death)? That is my handwriting; it is all my own, and was done on the same day.
148. There appears to have been a dash in the line originally, afterwards written over? It is very likely that in the morning, when I make up my books, I made those dashes across the line, and that the man died in a later part of the day, and I then wrote over the dashes.
149. With respect to Dunmore's case, was the entry which appears under the date of the 28th entered on that day? Upon that very day.
150. You are positive? Yes.
151. It has not been entered since? No.
152. And also that on the 29 Enplush: myttæ,—was that entered on the same day, and not since? Yes, certainly not since.
153. This ammonia acetate, was that entered on the same day? Yes.
154. Were all these entries of the treatment of Dunmore entered at the time? Yes, at the time they are headed, and not since. I speak most positively and distinctly. Here is proof, you see so many entries made afterwards.
155. But the treatment of Hugh Duggins, which follows, is in a large hand, this is written in a small hand? Yes; but the case of Dunmore is a difficult case, and there is more writing to be got into the space.
156. By Mr. Merewether: There is a difference in the writing and in the ink? I might write one way to-day and another to-morrow.
157. I do not doubt your word, but there have evidently been alterations,—there are some words in brackets, and there is a difference in the ink? There has never been any alteration, I pledge you my honor.
158. By the Chairman: I wish to ask you some questions upon another point: will you look at the 11th paragraph in the letter of "Another Witness"—do you know of any such circumstance having occurred as is there mentioned? No.
159. Have you any reason to believe that any such circumstance ever did occur? No.
160. By Captain Ward: That is with regard to borrowing money of the prisoners? Yes. If I could not speak positively I would not answer at all.
161. I wish to understand your position on the island relatively to Mr. Ormsby; that is to say, is Mr. Ormsby answerable for your conduct on the island? No more than as regards the police regulations.
162. Are you subject to his control, and if so, in what way? Merely in this way: he sees that I do my duty, and I cannot leave the island without his permission.
163. Do you receive any orders from him with respect to the prisoners? None whatever.
164. Then, as far as your treatment of the prisoners is concerned, Mr. Ormsby is not responsible? No.
165. If you treated a prisoner in a manner different from that which his case required, would it be his duty to bring the case to the notice of the Government? Exactly.
166. What would he do, would he report it to the Visiting Magistrate or to the Government? In the first instance to the Visiting Surgeon.
167. You were asked just now whether Spencer was ever taken out of the hospital for any purpose; I would now ask you whether he was ever taken into the hospital when he was reported to be fit for work? No; Dr. West took him into the hospital in every case himself. Dr. West took him in, I never did.
168. I want to ask you with reference to a specific charge, whether Spencer was ever taken into the hospital when the doctor reported him fit for work? Not to my knowledge.
169. Can you speak positively to that? Yes.
170. You stated to the Board verbally, when they were upon the island, but it has not been taken down in your evidence, that it was left to you to give what diet you chose to the prisoners, notwithstanding what might be issued to them by the contractors; for instance, if full diet were issued for them you might give them only spoon diet? Yes.
171. Did you make any record of the diet given? No; except I may have done so in my private journal, for my own benefit at a future day.
172. With respect to the meat that may be left, what do you do with that? Some are upon low diet and others require nourishing diet; we therefore take what may be left of the rations of the one, put the meat into a boiler, and make beef tea for the rest, so that one man has to assist the others.
173. Has the residue ever been sent away? No.
174. Never to Mr. Ormsby's quarters, or anywhere else? Never, that I am aware of.
175. Would you have allowed such a thing to have been done? Decidedly not.
176. How many prisoners are in the hospital, on the average, throughout the year? There is an average of seven daily. 177.

Mr. J. F. Peers.

4 Nov., 1857.

177. How many of these are generally upon spoon diet? When we receive a man into the hospital we generally put him upon spoon diet, excepting the cases of convalescents, and we feed them up to keep up their strength.
178. How long do you generally keep them upon low diet? Until the fever abates, or whatever their symptoms may be.
179. Take the cases of Dunmore and Murphy? One case being hopeless, we gave him whatever we had.
180. Do you not think it would be better, both for your own satisfaction and the satisfaction of the Government, to record what diet was given? Yes.
181. And also for the satisfaction of the prisoners, in order that they might know they had all that was allowed them? Yes, I think it would be better to keep such a book.
182. To keep such a record as is kept by you in your private journal? Yes.
183. There is a treatment book kept on the island? Yes.
184. But that treatment book does not include the diet? No.
185. By the Chairman: Still the diet is part of the treatment? Yes.
186. But the treatment book does not include the diet? No. Certainly no man would give meat to a man labouring under fever.
187. By Mr. Merewether: With respect to the first charge—that contained in the letter signed "N. B."—you say you reside on the island, and that you sometimes hear singing in the dormitories? In the wards, not in the dormitories.
188. What do you mean by the wards? The dormitories are the single sleeping places, the wards are the general sleeping places.
189. Did that occur frequently? No.
190. At what hour of the evening? Never after the lights were put out.
191. At what time were the lights put out? At eight o'clock.
192. And you never heard singing after that? Never after that.
193. Was it at any time loud enough to be heard on the south shore? I could not say.
194. To the best of your opinion? I have heard it at my own house; I do not think it could be heard much further.
195. How far is your house? It is very close.
196. How far is the south shore? About a quarter of a mile.
197. Could it be heard at that distance? They would have to sing loud.
198. Was it loud enough to be heard at that distance? I never heard it.
199. Are you on the island every Sunday evening? Generally. Yes, decidedly; I am never absent in the evening.
200. By whose permission do you leave the island? By Mr. Ormsby's.
201. And only by Mr. Ormsby's? Only by Mr. Ormsby's.
202. You do not get the permission of Dr. West? No; still, if I neglected my duty, I should be reported to him.
203. However, you are on the island every Sunday evening? Yes; I do not think I have been absent above one or two Sunday evenings.
204. If there had been these disturbances on the island you would have had opportunities of hearing them? Yes.
205. With regard to the fifth charge, about Spencer, has the Superintendent, upon any occasion, told the dispenser to take any man—I do not now refer to Spencer, but any other man—into the hospital, whom Dr. West has pronounced fit for work? Quite the reverse. I have been most anxious to send the men to their work as soon as possible, and to keep them at work.
206. I want a plain answer to my question — ? Never.
207. With regard to Spencer, I do not quite understand the answer you gave to a question at an earlier part of your examination: you said that one day as you were coming to the hospital you found him returning to it—at what time was this? About one o'clock.
208. When did you see him last in the hospital previous to that? In the morning at eight o'clock.
209. He was then a patient? Yes.
210. Then he might have been absent from the hospital from eight to one o'clock without your knowledge? I scarcely think it possible, because I should have heard of it if he had been.
211. Do you think he was long enough absent from the hospital to have been employed at work, as it has been stated, at the Superintendent's quarters? I think not.
212. He might have been absent from eight to one, but you do not think he was? No; in fact I can almost speak positively that he was not.
213. By the Chairman: Did you ever know any sparring on the island between any two of the prisoners? No; I never saw any such thing take place.
214. Did you know of anything of the kind? I have heard of such things, but I cannot speak positively. I have never seen it.
215. Did you know a man named Perry? Yes.
216. Are you aware that he was a pugilist? Yes.
217. Did you know another man named Sinclair? That was before my time.
218. Then you never saw any sparring between Perry and Sinclair? No.
219. Or knew that it was going on? No; because, the day that was reported to have taken place, I took advantage of the holiday and was absent from the island.
220. Cross examined by Mr. Dillon: With reference to the language on the part of Mr. Ormsby towards you, I believe it originated in a misapprehension, on his part, as to a complaint made by you to Dr. West? I believe there were, perhaps, misunderstandings, or mistakes, on both sides.
221. It grew out, I believe, of the anxiety of Mr. Ormsby to see that the duty of the Visiting Surgeon should be properly discharged? It had all that appearance, I must say.

222. And it did not at all grow out of any negligence of duty on the part of Mr. Ormsby, Mr. J.F. Peers, but the contrary—the language that took place? I do not clearly understand.
223. Mr. Ormsby seemed to understand that there had been some neglect on the part of ^{Mr. J.F. Peers} 4 Nov., 1857. Dr. West? No, I can not admit anything of the kind.
224. By Captain Ward: What was the misapprehension of Mr. Ormsby, as far as you understood? It was inasmuch as this,—Dr. West did not visit the island according to the expectation of Mr. Ormsby; he appeared to be annoyed, and made some remarks which I fully believed he intended me to repeat to Dr. West. I did so. Dr. West was annoyed to think that Mr. Ormsby should mention anything of the kind to me, I being his subordinate, without going to him, and went to Mr. Ormsby. He said, “I wish, Mr. Ormsby, if you have anything to say respecting the performance of my duties, you will say it to me and not to my dispenser.”
225. Mr. Dillon: It grew out of Dr. West having imagined that Mr. Ormsby had found fault with him for his non-attendance? Yes.
226. And the thing passed away from your mind, and from that of Dr. West afterwards, when there was an explanation among you all? There was no explanation.
227. There was a conversation between you, Dr. West, and Mr. Ormsby? I am not aware.
228. By the Chairman: Did Mr. Ormsby apologise to you afterwards? No, never.
229. Will you tell me whether Mr. Ormsby was in the habit of using such words as those you specifically declare were used by him on this occasion? I never heard him use such words before or since.
230. By Captain Ward: I would ask you with respect to the general management of the island—into which the Board is appointed to inquire—whether you have reason to suppose that the duties have been misconducted? I will tell you the exact impression made upon my mind. I have been some years in Her Majesty's Navy, where I have been used to strict discipline; and I believe the only fault to be in the matter of discipline—the men have too much their own way. I allude to the prisoners. They are kindly treated in every way, and are well looked after; but I believe they are not—to my simple idea, it is my mere individual remark—that they are not kept so strict as they ought to be as regards leading them to reformation or well-doing. The men behave themselves, certainly so far as I see, very well.
231. What I want to know is, whether you consider that Mr. Ormsby, on the whole, discharges his duty faithfully as a public officer? I have never seen anything to the contrary.
232. What is your opinion? I believe Mr. Ormsby does his duty, as far as I am able to judge of the duty of a Superintendent; but I never was at such a place before.
233. As to the regulations, are you acquainted with them? I applied for them, and read them on a particular point as regards myself.
234. You could not say, then, from your own knowledge, whether Mr. Ormsby carried them them out? No; I merely read these regulations as regards that particular point.
235. You say you have been two years engaged in the discharge of your present duty—is there any modification of your instructions which you think might be beneficially adopted? No, I am not aware of any. I think the hospital could not be in a better state than it is in at present.
236. By the Chairman: You would recommend that a diary, similar to that kept by you for your private information, should be kept as a public record? Yes; there might be a column added to the present book, in which the diet might be inserted.

George West, M. D., again called in and further examined:—

1. By the Chairman: Were you present upon an occasion when Mr. Ormsby spoke to Mr. G. West, M.D. Peers, the hospital dispenser, about some message he had delivered to you? Yes.
2. Without going into particulars, the fact was that the dispenser reported something to ^{Mr. G. West, M.D.} 4 Nov., 1857. you? He did.
3. Was Mr. Ormsby made aware of that by yourself? I asked Mr. Peers would he allow me to mention what he had said to Mr. Ormsby. He said he would rather not, as it might make things uncomfortable for him on the island. I said I would rather hear no messages that were conveyed to him unless I were allowed to bring the matter forward, and I insisted upon doing so. I did so. Mr. Ormsby denied the thing, and there were angry words.
4. What words did Mr. Ormsby use towards Mr. Peers? He told him he was a damned liar, that he had never said such a thing. Mr. Peers said, upon his honor, but, before he said any more, Mr. Ormsby said, “Upon your honor, Sir, you have no honor, you are a ‘great blackguard’”; and I think he said he was a pimp and a mischief-maker on the island, carrying stories backward and forward. I went away, as I did not wish to hear any more of the quarrel. Mr. Peers followed me shortly after, and wanted to accompany me, but I said, “Go to your quarters, Sir, I do not wish you to accompany me.” I did not wish to hear any more of it.
5. With reference to the case of the man Dunmore, who died in the hospital—here is the hospital book; will you be kind enough to refer to it and see when you first became acquainted with the case? (The witness referred to the book) I think the first day I saw him was the day on which he entered the hospital. I was then sent for, late at night, to see him; I think at eleven o'clock at night.
6. That was on the 28th of March? Yes. I think I ought to mention that there was a round-robin got up among the convicts and sent to the Visiting Magistrate; that an investigation was held on this case; that the persons who came forward were severely reprimanded by the Magistrate, who said he was inclined to commit them all to the cells, and that, if they brought such a charge again, he would punish them, as there was no foundation for the charge.

G. West, M.D.

4 Nov., 1857.

7. What was the charge? Principally against the dispenser for the treatment of this man, but of course it was against the medical establishment altogether.
8. Under what was Dunmore laboring when you first saw him? Inflammation of the lungs, as was proved afterwards by the post mortem examination.
9. Were you made aware that he had been complaining for three days before that? I was made aware, by the dispenser, that he was exempt, and that, at his own request, as he was so much better, he was allowed to go out, and then he had a relapse.
10. We are told that he came to the hospital on the 25th, complaining of a pain in the chest, that the next day it was increased and accompanied by a cough—do you think the exempt ground a proper place for persons laboring under these symptoms? The report I got was that there were no bad symptoms, no violent symptoms; the first bad symptoms would appear to have been on this day; he was taken into the hospital late at night.
11. He had been labouring under certain symptoms for three days, and was kept on the exempt ground, with the men who are exempt from work,—are you aware where they are kept? They are kept on a bank on one side of the island.
12. In what situation, what aspect has it—is it exposed? It is immediately as you come out of the gate from the camp.
13. Is it on the north, south, east, or west side of the island? I am stranger here to the cardinal points. It is on the side looking towards Balmain.
14. You cannot say whether it is on the east, west, north, or south? I cannot indeed.
15. Do you remember what sort of weather it was at that time? I have not the most distant recollection. I think it was fine. I think going over I remember remarking what a beautiful night it was.
16. The month of March is usually cold and sometimes rainy? I quite recollect now; it was a delightful night.
17. That is on the night of the 28th, when you were sent for, but supposing he had been for three days previous to that on the exempt ground, under some kind of treatment, was that a proper place for him,—or was the mode of treatment proper? It is hard to answer that question. I did not see the man, and he might have had some insidious symptoms which might have escaped the notice of the dispenser. He thought it a common case of cough or cold.
18. Cough or cold could hardly be considered as properly treated by requiring the patient to stand about the exempt ground? There are some chronic cases that we hardly know how to deal with.
19. He was a young man, and his was not a chronic case? No.
20. You prescribed for him? Yes.
21. Is your prescription there (referring to the book)? Yes.
22. Was it entered at the time? Not at the time; it was late at night when I went there. I dictated it to the dispenser, who wrote it down on a piece of paper folded like a book, and entered it afterwards.
23. When did you first see it entered? That I cannot tell you.
24. Did you ever see it before this day? Yes, I did; we had an investigation about this matter before, and I saw it entered then.
25. Was it entered before the man's death or after? Before.
26. That you are positive of? I could not say positively, but that is my belief.
27. You have already said it was not entered at the time, but was it entered subsequently either the following morning or the day after? I think the dispenser would be the proper person to examine upon that point.
28. We have examined him? He can say when he entered it.
29. By Captain Ward: Will you describe what is the usual practice? It is to have the books made up every evening.
30. By the Chairman: Look at the next entry where his name appears. (The witness referred to the book.) Is that your prescription? I could not tell.
31. The next—is that yours? I dare say it was; I could not tell.
32. Now look to the 1st of April, the day on which he died? (The witness referred to the dispenser's private journal.) I prescribed again on the 29th, and again on the 31st.
33. How often did you see him before he died? I think only on those days when I prescribed.
34. Did you see him on the day of his death? No.
35. Did you see him after his death? No; his death was reported to me.
36. You did not attend the post mortem examination? No; I never do unless it is something important.
37. Was there no inquest held? No.
38. I now wish to ask you about a man named Murphy,—do you remember that person being in the hospital? Yes, I do now. I did not the other day.
39. When did first you see him? He was brought before me for classification when he was not ill at all. I was told that he was the man who built the light house. He was a very old man, and unfit for work. I was told he was 79. It was one of those cases reserved for classification, and I exempted him without medicine.
40. You did not prescribe for him? No, not at that time.
41. What was he laboring under? Hernia and great debility.
42. Was he suffering from asthma? At this time he did not appear to be laboring under it—I am speaking of his first coming on the island.
43. When he first came under your notice in the hospital, what was he suffering from? It was not asthma, though it was entered by the dispenser as asthma. There are cards over the beds on which are written the names of the diseases.
44. Had he the disease called asthma? I think he had bronchitis; he had great difficulty in breathing, and the dispenser called it asthma.
45. It might have been old age, in fact? I think it was bronchitis attacking an old man;

he

- he was exempt a good many days, and going about without medicine before getting seriously ill; when he became so ill I went to see him. G. West, M.D.
46. In what state did you find him? I found him very low; it was a very rapid case. 4 Nov., 1857.
47. How soon after you saw him did he die? (The Witness referred to the private journal.) It is marked bronchitis here; he died on the 7th.
48. He is marked asthma here (referring to the hospital book) and I think æther was given? Æthereal mixture of lobelia. That is not my prescription, but the prescription of the dispenser. Here is my prescription, half-past ten, the 3rd of December.
49. With reference to the case of Dunmore,—I find that on the 25th he complained to the dispenser; on the 26th he was treated; on the 27th he was treated, and on the 28th, as he was much worse, he was taken into the hospital, and you were sent for—did you approve of his being kept out of the hospital for three days? The statement made to me was, that he was going on very well, that indeed he was so much better that he had been allowed to go out on his own request.
50. That was what you were informed on the 28th, when you were called for? That was the statement made to me.
51. He was then in an alarming state? He was taken seriously ill.
52. By Captain Ward: From that statement you thought Mr. Peers was justified? Yes, and I did not question it at all.
53. He did not appear to you to have been acting rashly? No.
54. You did not think he had done wrong in allowing Dunmore to go out? They are only allowed out in the warm part of the day; they are on a sunny bank. I made a suggestion with respect to that which, I believe, has been followed out,—that when it was a cold day, or the sun was not on that part of the island, they should be removed to some other place.
55. About the practice of prescribing—as I understand your prescriptions are copied into that book—where do you prescribe? I dictate the prescription to the dispenser; he has a small book, or a piece of paper folded like a book; he takes this round when he accompanies me, and writes in it what I prescribe; he then copies from that into the hospital or treatment book.
56. Then we can, by an examination of that book, ascertain which are your prescriptions? I cannot say. I am quite satisfied this is my prescription. I recollect the thing very well now. If you look at the treatment I think you will see it has been very accurate.
57. By Mr. Merewether: What portion of this entry (the 4th December) belongs to you, and what to Mr. Peers;—hot fomentation, mustard poultice, æther, and so on? The entry is all in Mr. Peers' handwriting.
58. Cross-examined by Mr. Dillon: This conversation that has been alluded to—this violent language—I believe grew out of your having understood the dispenser to say that Mr. Ormsby had said something about you that Mr. Ormsby denied? Yes; if you wish me to mention what it was, I will do so. I was not well on the visiting day previous, and I did not go there. When I went to the island Mr. Peers asked me why I was not there, and said Mr. Ormsby had made some observations about my not being there, and “whatever he said, “I think he intended me to convey to you.” I said—“I am very much annoyed that Mr. Ormsby should have made any remark to you about it; if he feels that I am neglecting “my duty, he should speak to me about it, or else report me to the proper authorities.” I asked him to allow me to speak to Mr. Ormsby about it; he said he would rather not, as it would make the island very uncomfortable. I said that when things came to my knowledge in that way I considered I was at liberty to make use of them. I was going away, when Mr. Ormsby came up to me, and said—“Where are you going, Doctor?” I said—“I feel very much annoyed that you should make any complaint or observation to a subordinate officer, and that you should not come to myself.” He asked what it was all about, and when I told him he got very angry, and the words I have repeated followed.
59. By Mr. Merewether: The dispenser is under your orders, is he not? Yes.
60. What did he mean by saying “it would make the island uncomfortable”? I suppose he meant that Mr. Ormsby might object to his leaving the island.
61. By Mr. Dillon: The dispenser, I think, stated in his examination that he had never heard such language as that you have referred to from Mr. Ormsby before or since. I believe you have not been in the habit of hearing him use such language? No, I never did. I was sorry, for I thought he had lost his temper. It struck me he was a little too hasty in losing his temper; but he felt annoyed at this being reported to me.
62. What did it grow out of—did it not arise out of excess of zeal? It arose from excess of temper.
63. Was Mr. Taylor present on that occasion? I do not think any one was present, except my son.
64. Did Mr. Ormsby say that any conversation he had had with Mr. Peers was in the presence of Mr. Taylor? I think he said that whatever had been said was in the presence of other persons, and he could prove what he had said from them.

Daniel Dunmore's case. Copy from the Private Journal of Mr. J. F. Peers.

DANIEL DUNMORE, aged 21, “Mary Anne,” admitted March 28th, 1856.

DISEASE, WITH DETAILED SYMPTOMS.

Pleuritis.

March 28th.—This man was admitted complaining of great heat, thirst, and restlessness. During the last night a violent acute pain on one side, so much so that he was unable to lie on it; difficult breathing; flushed countenance; expectoration bloody; tongue coated; pulse strong.

March 29th.—No improvement; slight diarrhoea.

March 30th.—Febrile symptoms abated; great dyspnoea; tongue much coated.

March

March 31st.—To-day there was a marked improvement, less difficulty in breathing, pulse quieter, tongue cleaning, and appeared in better spirits. At eight o'clock p.m., on my visit, this alteration for the better had ceased; great dyspnoea, and accession of febrile symptoms: ordered the calomel, ant., and opium every four hours. Twelve o'clock sent for—symptoms still aggravated; delirium, with quick pulse, and great difficulty of respiration; ordered him to be watched. At six o'clock this morning suddenly raising himself, and asking for a drink, he laid down, passed a considerable quantity of mucous, and expired so quietly it was difficult to say when breath ceased.

William Murphy's case. Copy from the Private Journal of Mr. J. F. Peers.

WILLIAM MURPHY, aged 79, "Canada," admitted December 3rd, 1856.

DISEASE, WITH DETAILED SYMPTOMS.

Bronchitis.

Dec. 3rd.—This man who has been perpetually exempt since his arrival on the island, and who is very much debilitated and suffering from scrotal hernia, applied to me at 10 o'clock p.m. for the first time; he complained of chills and oppression of the chest, with quickened and laborious respiration. I at once admitted him to hospital, applied mustard plasters, and cupped him; and, considering his advanced age, and debilitated frame, that there was considerable danger, sent for Dr. West.

Dec. 4th.—Dr. West attended; approved the treatment pursued and prescribed.

Dec. 5th.—Symptoms aggravated; pulse higher; cough, expectoration, and febrile symptoms increased.

Dec. 6th.—No improvement. Dr. W. ordered treatment to be continued.

Dec. 7th.—Breathing with the greatest difficulty; copious tracheal rattle; all the symptoms of acute suffocative catarrh developed. Death ended his sufferings at 2 p.m.

POST MORTEM APPEARANCES.

The bronchial tubes preternaturally red and inflamed; the submucous cellular tissue and mucous membrane itself appearing injected with red fluid. The inflammation shewing most towards the termination of the trachea and commencement of the bronchi; the posterior part of the lungs infiltrated, and the lungs generally congested.

J. F. PEERS.

Mr. Thomas Easton was called in and examined, as follows:—

- Mr. T. Easton. 1. By the Chairman: What office do you hold on Cockatoo? I am Foreman of Works.
4 Nov., 1857. 2. Under Captain Mann? Yes.
3. How long have you been on the island? Eight years and four months.
4. You have lived on the island the whole of that time? Yes.
5. With your family? Yes.
6. Are you subject in any manner to the Superintendent of the island? In none at present.
7. He has no control or authority over you? No.
8. Then you are under no apprehension with respect to any evidence you may give here? I am not aware of any.
9. It is only my duty to tell you, that if you should be—or if any person coming to give evidence should require to be so told—you have no need to be afraid to give evidence before this Board; because, if we discover that any consequences should follow disagreeable to any witness, we should recommend the officer causing it to be removed from his office? I am obliged to you, but you will get nothing from me but the truth, in any way.
10. Do you remember the circumstance of a sparring match on the island, between Perry and some other person? I saw it; I do not recollect the date.
11. Where did it take place? Inside, in the camp.
12. When was that—how long ago? I dare say over two years ago.
13. Who else was present? There were a great number of people; a few of the free officers were present at that date, but I do not remember seeing any one else.
14. Were any of the prisoners there? Yes.
15. These two men, the sparrers, were prisoners, were they not? Yes.
16. It was in the prison yard, in fact? Yes.

17.

17. Were they stripped to the waist for sparring, or not? They were in that position. I will not exactly say that it was a prize fight, or anything of that; they might have had their Guernseys on. Mr. T. Easton.
4 Nov., 1857.
18. They were not stripped to the waist, then? No; they were not in what we term boxing style.
19. They had their Guernsey frocks on? Yes.
20. How long were they sparring? I should say about half an hour.
21. It was a regular match? Pretty well; they both seemed pretty well sized.
22. Was the Superintendent himself present? I did not see him on that occasion.
23. Were any of his sons? If I were sworn, I could not say that they were on that date.
24. Were you present at any other boxing match? If it were named I might recollect.
25. You have told us of one occasion? I shall tell you the plump and plain truth. I have been there on many occasions to see them spar.
26. In the same place? Yes, in the same place.
27. When the prisoners were present, and their free officers? Yes.
28. On any of these occasions was Mr. Ormsby present? I never saw him in my life.
29. Or his sons, or either of them? I cannot bear in mind that I saw Mr. Ormsby's sons or himself particularly present ever. I never saw Mr. Ormsby there in my life, at any such employment or exercise.
30. How frequently have these exhibitions taken place on the island, do you suppose? Well, Sir, they have taken place many times; I could not exactly tell you the number.
31. For whose amusement were they got up? That I cannot say, by whose authority or whose amusement it was for.
32. Were any of the overseers or officers of the penal establishment present? Yes.
33. At what time of day have these transactions taken place? In general in the afternoon.
34. Upon what days—the ordinary days of the week or the Lord's Day? Some afternoons on the Sabbath-day.
35. And on other days—ordinary days? Providing they were holidays—the Queen's Birthday, or something of this.
36. By Captain Ward: They took place after working hours? I cannot say.
37. Were they not ever kept away from their work for the purpose of sparring? Not to my knowledge.
38. On these occasions they were sparring in their leisure hours? Yes; I do not mean to say in their working hours.
39. By the Chairman: From the officers of the establishment and the free overseers being present, was it not pretty well known on the island when a sparring match was going on? Well, your Honor, I should think not.
40. No one on the island could be off knowing it? Occasionally.
41. How often do you suppose these things have taken place? They must have been four or five times.
42. By Captain Ward: Have you ever seen Mr. Brown? Yes.
43. He has been present at these sparring matches? Yes.
44. Have you seen Mr. Dunning, the Inspector of Police, present? Yes, he has been there also.
45. Do you know that as a fact? I am not aware of speaking to Mr. Dunning, that I could positively swear.
46. Have you seen Mr. Taylor, the clerk, present? No, I never saw him there. I cannot say, but he might have been there.
47. By the Chairman: Do you know anything about cedar plank having been taken from the stores of the Engineer's Department? No, only from what I have heard.
48. You know nothing but what you have heard? That is all.
49. Do you remember the circumstance of its being found? I heard tell of its being found.
50. You only heard tell; you were not present? I was not.
51. Do you remember the circumstance of a number of the prisoners leaving the works? I remember once particularly—there were seventeen of my own gang.
52. Did you report it to the Superintendent or his Assistant, Mr. Brown? Yes.
53. What was the cause of their leaving the works? Mr. Thomas—on the day I am going to mention it was near bell ringing, and my men had been quarrying above, for generally I was foreman over the gang that was quarrying the stone—Mr. Thomas, as clerk of the works, or acting engineer, requested that the men should go down to the dock for to work; and these men that I made mention of requested they should have shoes or trowsers.
54. By Captain Ward: Was that the working in the water question? Yes.
55. Which was inquired into by a former Board? Yes.
56. It was inquired into by myself and Captain Mayne? Yes; I believe it was.
57. The men objected to go into the water without proper shoes or boots? Yes.
58. By the Chairman: Was there any other occasion? Yes; but the men did not exactly belong to me.
59. You remember the circumstance? Yes.
60. Do you yourself know that that was reported to the Superintendent? Yes.
61. What was done in that case? As well as I recollect, the prisoners were brought before the Visiting Magistrate.
62. Do you remember any of them going to the office of the Resident Engineer, and using threatening language to him? Yes, I do.
63. By Captain Ward: Can you describe what took place on the occasion of the men going to threaten Mr. Thomas? If it was mentioned in any time, I may recollect it.
64. Do you recollect it now? Not the date.
65. It was the time the men refused to work, and went up to Mr. Thomas' office in a riotous manner; can you recollect that? Not unless it was respecting the hand-cart.

- Mr. T. Easton. 66. Will you describe that occurrence? It has generally been the rule since I have been on the island, which is eight or nine years close up, that there used to be five men to draw the hand-cart up that hill always, and I believe Mr. Thomas gave orders for four men to draw it up, and they were third-class men—not able-bodied men. To one individual, I believe, he gave the order to do it, but I was out of the way, at the top of the blocks, and he did not put me in possession of the rule. The men said they would not draw the hand-cart up the hill without five men, and the person who received the order went up to the office with the men. I was reported myself for that.
67. By whom? By Mr. Thomas to Captain Mann.
68. By Mr. Merewether: It would have been your business to have carried out the order if you had received it? Yes.
69. By Captain Ward: Do I understand you, then, to say, that you think the men had reasonable cause of complaint in being required to draw the hand-cart up the hill with only four men? Yes.
70. By the Chairman: And, in fact, instead of their going up in a body, they were taken up to the office? I was not present on that occasion at first, but when I heard of it I went up to the office and saw Mr. Thomas and another foreman of works, and the men were standing opposite the gate, ranked up two deep. I did not see any man go up to strike or assault Mr. Thomas.
71. Was there any unbecoming behaviour on the part of the men towards Mr. Thomas, or any threatening language used? Not while I stood there. None but this man, who was something rather insane, I believe, and he walked towards Mr. Thomas, but never attempted to strike. I believe he was taken before the Visiting Magistrate for the same, but I am not certain. I believe Mr. Thomas declined to come forward upon that.
72. By Mr. Merewether: You say there were men sparring on the island on one particular occasion—who were these men? There was one of the name of Perry.
73. Who was the other? The other was named Sinclair.
74. Where were they sparring? In the camp yard.
75. Give us some better description; what do you mean by the camp yard? Inside the iron gates.
76. Where the prisoners are lodged? Yes.
77. Was Mr. Ormsby on the island at the time? That I cannot say.
78. On what days of the week did these exhibitions occur—you say they occurred five or six times? As I should suppose, in the generality on holidays, or perhaps it may be on Sunday afternoon.
79. Should Mr. Ormsby have been on the island at these times; under ordinary circumstances would he have been on the island? I would be very sorry to state except what I could swear to.
80. If he had been on the island could this sparring have gone on without his knowledge? I believe it could.
81. Was it accompanied by any noise? No, I could not say it was. In the general run, there is great silence when such a thing is going on.
82. Did you see any strangers, persons not employed on the island, present on these occasions? I could not say.
83. Do you mean to say that you could not have noticed if there had been any strangers present; I do not want you to say that there were any present, I merely want a straightforward answer? So I would give it if it was a thing I knew; if you will name any name I will tell you.
84. I do not want the name; I ask you if there were any strangers present? I do not know whether Mr. Thomas was present, he might have been.
85. Do you call him a stranger; by stranger I mean any person not connected with, or employed on, the island? I did not belong to the establishment.
86. That is not an answer to my question. I ask you whether you saw any strangers present at these sparring matches, persons unconnected with the island—that is a plain question? It is a plain question. I cannot say I did, that I did not know any person that I saw there.
87. By the Chairman: Did you ever see any person there not belonging to the island—did you ever see any visitor of any kind, any person unconnected with the island? I would not tell a falsehood, but for me to know whether there were visitors or strangers I should know the date, and I do not know the date.
88. Did you, or did you not, see any person unconnected with the island present at any of these sparring matches? There might be plenty of them for me.
89. Did you ever see any one? I cannot say.
90. By Captain Ward: Do you know as a fact that any strangers were present? If I was sworn I could not say.
91. By Mr. Merewether: Will you say yes or no? I mean to say there might have been.
92. By the Chairman: Cannot you form a judgment upon the matter, whether you did ever see any strangers there, or persons unconnected with the island? If it was not a customary thing for strangers to be there I would know, but it is customary for persons to be there every Sunday.
93. By Mr. Merewether: Do you think there have been any persons unconnected with the island present on these occasions? If I had seen them I should tell you in a minute; I am not aware, but I say they might have been.
94. Were there so many people in the camp that you could not see who were there? I am not upon that intention when I go to look at two men sparring.
95. Was the camp so full, I ask you, that you could not see who were there? If I understand, it was pretty crowded with the men at there.
96. Then this occurred when the men were all mustered in the camp? On these occasions.

97. I cannot help expressing my opinion that you are decidedly trying to evade my question? Mr. T. Easton.
I beg your pardon.
98. You have been nine years on the island, and are, I suppose, perfectly acquainted with the rules and regulations? No, not with regard to the rules; I never saw them.
99. By the Chairman: With reference to the persons resident on the island, if you have been there eight or nine years you must know them all—you are simply asked whether there were any persons present who did not reside on the island? There were the soldier officers.
100. By Mr. Merewether: Was the soldier officer in command present? Yes, and other officers that were on a visit there.
101. You have been beating about the bush, I believe; these were strangers on the island? I have seen them.
102. By the Chairman: You have seen military officers there? Yes, besides the officer on guard; but I never considered them as strangers, for they were there themselves every other fortnight.
103. By Mr. Merewether: You are pretty certain that the Assistant Superintendent was present at these exhibitions—Mr. Brown? I never saw him.
104. You stated just now that you had seen him? Yes, and so was his assistant.
105. You never saw Mr. Ormsby there? No.
106. You have been a long time on the island—nearly nine years? Yes.
107. What is your opinion as to the general discipline during that time—I confine myself principally to the last two years—what is your opinion of the management during that period? That it is very leaning.
108. What do you mean by "leaning"? I mean something leaning rather to the prisoners.
109. Am I to understand that if there are regulations they are mildly carried out? I am not aware of any regulations.
110. But if there are any regulations they are mildly carried out? I mean to say they have been mildly carried out.
111. That is the only interpretation you put upon the word? Yes.
112. You say you are not aware of any regulations, and therefore cannot say how they are carried out? No.
113. From your own observation, do you consider that any one prisoner is favored more than another? I believe so.
114. How can they be favored? In many instances.
115. How? They can commit themselves in some way, and then in two or three days after they will be appointed to some place.
116. You mean that after the commission of some offence they may be appointed to some post on the island? Yes.
117. By Captain Ward: Can you state any particular case where that has occurred? Yes, I think I can in one instance. I will shew you how there was laxity of discipline. I had an occasion to find fault with one man in particular; I reported that man three times for disrespect in every way that he could treat me, and that man held the office as constable of the Superintendent's office. He treated me with contempt and disrespect in every way. I had to caution him twice about taking the hand-cart off the work, and he said he would do it as often as he liked from a sub-overseer. Another time I took a man to the office, and told this same man to go to the Superintendent; he wanted to know what charge I had to prefer. I said, "I cannot tell you anything of the sort; you are a prisoner as well as the man I am bringing." He said "I do not care a damn whether you do or not." That man I reported, and he continued in his situation afterwards.
118. By Mr. Merewether: Did you prefer any charge against him? Yes.
119. To whom did you report him? To Mr. Ormsby twice, and after a lapse of fourteen or fifteen days he was brought to Court.
120. Was the offence dealt with by the Visiting Magistrate? Yes.
121. Was the man discharged? Yes; by Mr. Ormsby giving him a recommendation as a creditable man.
122. What was Perry on the island? I believe he was a carpenter by trade, but he was once over the cells, and once over the cook-house.
123. What was Sinclair? He was barber in the camp.
124. Were there any instances, besides the one you have mentioned, where you think favoritism was shewn? No further than men who have been punished have been put in office very shortly after.
125. They have been placed in offices on the island very shortly after they have been punished? Yes.
126. Can you name any other instance—you are speaking generally now? Well, I really believe myself there were many instances.
127. You cannot name them? Not at present.
128. You say you reside on the island? Yes.
129. Are you there all day and every day? Yes.
130. Are you there on Sundays? In general.
131. On Sunday evenings? On Sunday evenings in general.
132. Is the island quiet and orderly on Sunday evenings? Well, it is quiet.
133. Do you ever hear any noise of singing? Yes, after hours.
134. Where? In the camp.
135. Loud singing? No, not loud singing; in a mild regular manner.
136. What do you call a mild regular manner of singing—were they singing Psalms? Well, there is no disorder or shouting if a man be singing a song.
137. Do you call that regular, singing songs in the yard on a Sunday evening? Yes.
138. Is that a frequent occurrence? Yes, generally, on working days; but I have heard them on Sunday.

- Mr. T. Easton. 139. Is it usual for the prisoners to sing in their dormitories? Yes.
140. Does it ever cause you annoyance? No; if I went out of my house I —
- 4 Nov., 1837. 141. You do not mind the prisoners singing? No.
142. It does occur frequently on Sunday as well as on week day evenings? Yes.
143. Is Mr. Ormsby on the island on Sunday evenings? In general; in fact he is seldom off the island on Sunday evenings.
144. Cross-examined by Mr. Dillon: I believe that after the lights are put out there is nothing of that kind allowed? No.
145. I think you were going to say something as to your being able to hear the noise of singing when you would come out of your place—could you hear it if you did not come out? I could not hear it inside my house; but if I went out I could hear it quite plain.
146. You stated, in a previous part of your evidence about these sparring matches, that you have seen them four or five times? Yes.
147. And not more? I could not say for myself being present more than that.
148. Were they accompanied by any violence or noise that would cause apprehension or disturbance to the business of the island? I said before that it is in silence all such things as that is done.
149. There was no disturbance, no noise? No; for their own diversion they keep silent.
150. Was there anything unusual in such an amusement as that being practised by the men in after hours—was there anything unusual, offensive, or riotous—there was nothing you would have found fault with as a breach of discipline—if the men had been under your orders would you have found fault with this sparring, as calculated to produce disorder? If your Honor wishes me to answer the question I shall. I have not been in the power to see whether I should or not.
151. Do you recollect the officers of the guard being present at one of these occasions you speak of? They have been there more than once, I believe, to my eyesight.
152. Was that in the officers' quarters? No; I have never been in the officers' quarters.
153. What did occur in that way was in the prisoners' after hours? Not exactly in the working hours, by no means.
154. By Captain Ward: Did these sparring matches take place with boxing gloves or with fists? Always with boxing gloves.
155. By the Chairman: Always with gloves? Yes.
156. Who provided the gloves? I believe the men themselves subscribed and purchased the gloves—they were brought by some means to the island.
157. What means had they of getting them? Your Honor I am not particularly aware; I believe they could be purchased and brought to the island.
158. By Mr. Merewether: Whom do you mean by "the men"? I mean the prisoners.
159. By Mr. Dillon: Did you ever hear of Mr. Ormsby having these gloves seized? Yes.
160. By the Chairman: This is a very important point which has been raised respecting the boxing gloves—you say you think the prisoners may have had means of getting them there? Yes.
161. Had the prisoners the means of getting anything else they liked? Well, I could not exactly swear, but there are many things, against the regulations, got for the prisoners.
162. What have they got? Clothes, neck-ties, and braces.
163. They can get these things easily? Yes.
164. Indulgencies? Yes.
165. You say contrary to the regulations—do you mean contrary to the written regulations, or to your own idea of what prison regulations should be? I never saw the regulations.
166. You mean contrary to your own idea of prison discipline? Yes.
167. What sort of things? Comforters, handkerchiefs, braces, and parcels of different descriptions, and, as far as I know of discipline, for the last six and twenty years I never saw it permitted.
168. Can the prisoners get paper, pens, and ink? Yes; the Superintendent himself issued them.
169. Can they get these things otherwise? Yes.
170. Can they get letters from their friends, paper, pens, and ink? Yes.
171. Do they ever get the indulgence of a newspaper? I believe I have seen them frequently reading a newspaper.
172. Have you seen the prisoners in the presence of overseers and persons of that description reading newspapers? Yes, I have.
173. Commonly? I have seen it several times.
174. Have they any indulgencies in the way of food? I believe that is allowed.
175. Tea and sugar they are allowed to buy out of the money they earn from their task work; I am asking you with respect to indulgencies they obtain on the island out of the regular way—in some clandestine way? It might be the case, but I am not in possession of it.
176. You say they get braces and newspapers, that must be clandestinely? I do not know whether they are in the habit of getting them, or who may be the purchaser.
177. By Mr. Dillon: As to the things you say the prisoners get, do you not know that when any of their friends go there they take parcels with them, of whatever they think right, and give them to Mr. Ormsby to be delivered to the prisoners, if he thinks right? But I am well aware the purchasers are not the friends or relatives.
178. I suppose Mr. Ormsby will not allow them to have newspapers? No; I have known him to seize them.
179. How do you suppose they can get these indulgencies without the Superintendent's knowledge? I am not aware whether they come from the boat that brings the stores, or what boat brings them. There is a prisoner receives the things from the boat every morning, and brings them to the office—that is, anything they pay their money for into the office is purchased.

Mr. T. Easton.

4 Nov., 1857.

180. That is for tea and sugar? Yes, and for these braces.
181. Then they are brought by the Superintendent's permission? Yes.
182. By the Chairman: Newspapers, articles of dress, and such things? Yes.
183. Did you ever see the boxing gloves—were they brought in that mode do you suppose? I have seen them once or twice when they have been handed over to these two men.
184. Who handed them over? Some other prisoners.
185. I think you said the discipline was lenient towards the prisoners—do you mean by that that it was mild? Well, with respect to that, what I mean is that it is not strict discipline.
186. I understand you to mean that is what we should call loose discipline? In some degree.
187. I think you said there was favoritism as regards discipline—that some men were favored and others were not? Well, I believe so still.
188. Do you know any instance of favoritism toward any particular person? I know some men have been taken to the office to be punished, and in three or four days they have got some employment.
189. Were these men, Perry and Sinclair, stout men, men capable of hard work? Yes, more so than any other men on the island.
190. Did you ever know either one of them to be at work on the island? Yes, for a short period.
191. Take Perry—when was he at hard work? The last time he was on the island I believe he was at hard work.
192. When he was there the first time was he at work? For a short period.
193. What work was he employed upon? He was some time over the cells.
194. That is not hard work? He was employed at carpentering.
195. How long was he there? Many months—a long time.
196. Where was he taken to from that? I think he went over the cells.
197. As overseer of the cells? Yes.
198. How often has he been upon the island? Three times to my knowledge.
199. Sinclair—what was he there? He was barber at the camp.
200. Was he a strong or a weak man? A strong man, an able-bodied man.
201. Capable of hard work? Yes.
202. Was the situation of barber reckoned an easy and indulgent post? Yes, it was easier, but he had nothing the better pay for it.
203. But he was excused from hard work? Yes.
204. These two men, in fact, were not usually employed upon hard work? No.
205. Was it at the time he was overseer of the cells that these sparring matches took place? Once or twice they did.
206. Then he must have been taken from his duty at the cells to have been present at these sparring matches? I cannot say for that.
207. Do you know whether some one relieved him for that time? I know it was a general thing for some one to relieve him if he was wanted for sparring.
208. Have you known that? I have; on one occasion I saw a man go in his place when he went to sparring.
209. Who sent the man in his place? I think it must have been, in my opinion, one of the free overseers in the department; there is no other man got any control.
210. Did you ever hear such a thing said as that there was reason to fear if any prisoner reported any circumstance he would be liable to the displeasure of the authorities? I heard it said, but it is a thing I cannot prove.
211. Did you ever hear of an unnatural offence being committed on the island? I have heard it.
212. Were any means taken to bring the parties to justice? I never knew either of the parties to be brought to justice myself; I am not in possession of it.
213. Did you ever know any reason for the parties not being brought to justice? I cannot say.
214. Was there any reason for any to fear bringing it forward? I heard it rumoured as such, but that is all. I did not belong to the department.
215. You say the discipline toward the prisoners was what you call "leaning," and by that word you mean something loose or lax. With regard to the conduct of the free people on the island—more particularly to the conduct of the Superintendent—was that to be denominated loose or lenient, or was it strict? I cannot say with respect to the free officers under the Superintendent, for I believe they have no control. If a man be brought before the Superintendent, it depends upon him whether he shall be discharged or not.
216. It is left to his discretion to bring the matter forward or not? It may be.
217. Were you ever in the Superintendent's garden? Yes.
218. What is its extent? I dare say it is about from three to four acres, if not more.
219. Are there walls and considerable buildings in it that must have taken considerable time in their erection? There are a few buildings inside.
220. Have you ever seen any part of it cultivated? Yes.
221. What number of persons have you seen employed in that garden? I suppose I have seen two and three at a time.
222. Is that an usual thing or has it been only an accidental occurrence? No; it has been continued, to my knowledge, for some time.
223. Do you think there have been more than three at any time employed? Yes, as many as six sometimes.
224. Have you known more than six to be employed there occasionally? I will put your Honor in a right position: If a man came to the island in the evening late he would not go down to the Engineer's Department at once, but he would be sent to work in the garden, and then the next day he would go into the gang.

- Mr. T. Easton. 225. By "the garden" do you mean the Superintendent's garden or the public garden? I did not know it was a public garden; I thought one was Mr Ormsby's garden as well as the other.
- 4 Nov., 1857. 226. I am speaking of the garden round Mr. Ormsby's house—how many men do you suppose it would have taken, and what period of time, to build the walls in Mr. Ormsby's garden? I would say it has taken, within the last three years, over a hundred men.
227. To build all these walls? To keep up the breaches in different parts of the walls: In wet weather parts of the walls would fall, and then we had to send up six or eight men to mend the breaches in the walls.
228. In the walls in Mr. Ormsby's garden? Yes; I believe that is Mr. Ormsby's garden.
229. In the cultivation of the garden attached to Mr. Ormsby's house, and which runs down the side of the hill, how many do you suppose were employed? In the general way, the men are removed from the prisoners' garden to Mr. Ormsby's, and if there is any work to be performed in the prisoners' garden they go back to it again. That is only occasionally.
230. You are aware that Mr. Ormsby's private garden is a very extensive one, and has a great many walls in it? There are a great many divisions.
231. Which it must have taken a large number of men to erect? Yes.
232. Have you known any of them to be erected in your time? Not to my knowledge; only when they have fallen they have been built up again.
233. To whom has Mr. Ormsby reported that they have fallen? A requisition has been sent to the Engineer's Department.
234. How many men have been sent up to repair the walls? According to the nature of the breaches. I have known ten or twelve men to be sent. I have sent ten or twelve men myself. Within the last three years that has happened six or seven times, for three or four days. In heavy weather they fall down.
235. They are built without mortar, and fall down in rainy weather? Yes.
236. During this time the men are taken off the works? Yes; by a requisition of the Superintendent.
237. Do you think the allowance for the prisoners is larger than they consume—the quantity of hominy, for instance? It was some time ago. They have not consumed what was prepared. I have seen buckets and barrows full taken out.
238. What has become of that? I have seen it in a heap, partly at Mr. Ormsby's gate, and more of it divided among the free officers.
239. Does that take place now—has it occurred within the last six months? No, nor within the last nine or ten months.
240. Do you know as to the assistance afforded to the Engineer's Department by Mr. Ormsby whether there has been reason to complain of the assistance afforded to your department by the Superintendent? Well, I shall tell you that directly. In the first instance, if I took a man with a charge to Mr. Ormsby, he decided whether he would take the man before the Court or whether he would reprimand him.
241. Did that interfere with your duties? Sometimes it did, in some cases. In many cases it interfered with me; I found I need not take the man again.
242. Do you mean that it was of no use for you to take a man before Mr. Ormsby? Yes; I was of that feeling.
243. By Mr. Merewether: Whatever a man did it was of no use to take him up? Yes; in some cases they were actually sent away to the works by Mr. Ormsby, and not brought before the Magistrate.
244. By the Chairman: Let me understand you perfectly with reference to the requisitions for the repairs of the walls—were these made to the Engineer's Department by Mr. Ormsby? Yes.
245. Were these the walls of his private garden? Yes. Sometimes he would not ask for the men, but would take from four to six men out of a gang without making an application for them.
246. At other times he would make a requisition for men to repair the walls, which walls were in his own garden and for his own private use? I cannot say that it was his own private garden, for there were very few officers of the island but got the benefit of it. They all get some vegetables occasionally.
247. By whose gift? I believe it is an understood thing with the Government.
248. Who supplies them? The gardener, or, at least, a prisoner we call the gardener.
249. At Mr. Ormsby's desire? Yes.
250. And upon his authority? Upon his authority.
251. And at his will? Yes.
252. Not a regular allowance by order of the Government? No, I cannot say that it is a regular allowance. I know the garden was once called the public garden.
253. You are aware that there is a prisoners' garden? Yes; but every man, by the regulations, is supposed to have a share in the other garden, and is allowed to walk in it as well as Mr. Ormsby.
254. By Captain Ward: I see in the regulations that—"All requisitions and applications which, either directly or indirectly, lead to the expenditure of public money on account of the penal establishment are to be countersigned by the Visiting Magistrate."—Are these requisitions sent by Mr. Ormsby to the Engineer signed by the Visiting Magistrate? I never saw them so signed.
255. On what authority then does the Civil Engineer send up the men? On Mr. Ormsby's application.
256. He is not authorised to do so without the signature of the Visiting Magistrate? I never saw that.
257. If the Resident Engineer or Captain Mann sent the prisoners up without the signature of the Visiting Magistrate he acted against orders? I am prepared to say I never saw this signature.
- 258.

258. When these men are sent and employed in building these walls, is their time taken down as though they were employed on the public works? If the men are employed on the convict department we do not return them at all.
259. How are these men paid? By the Superintendent of the island—a penny a day.
260. Out of the public money? Out of his own contingency I suppose.
261. Do you know how they are paid? I do know that we do not pay them.
262. You are quite sure that you strike them off your list? Yes.
263. By the Chairman: Are you sure they get their task money from the Superintendent—that they get their penny a day? No.
264. By Mr. Merewether: You stated a short time ago that, in addition to the prison luxuries which are allowed, other things were brought to the island for the prisoners? I named the other things.
265. And that they were handed over to the convict who received the general luxuries? Yes.
266. What became of them—where did they go to? They were taken to Mr. Ormsby's stores, or to his office, I believe.
267. By Captain Ward: You say you believe, do you know that? I have seen them there.
268. By Mr. Merewether: You have seen them taken to the Superintendent's office? Yes.
269. I ask you this question, to carry out Sir William Burton's last point of examination, and I want you to be quite sure of it;—do you consider that you have had all the convicts available for the works handed over to you in the morning? That I could not say, by no means. There is a lot of men fall out every morning, and they are examined by the doctor or dispenser, and, of course, I do not know about the number that fall out, whether they are sent to the exempt ground, or what is done with them—of course, what I get upon the works I number.
270. Are you one of the persons who receive all the prisoners in the morning? Yes.
271. Are you the next man under Mr. Thomas? No, I am the second.
272. You receive your own men? Yes, for gangs.
273. Are they the same number of men each morning? Sometimes there are more, sometimes there are less; this morning there may be a hundred men, to-morrow there may be ninety-six or ninety-seven.
274. Do you know any reason for the difference—are you told why the men are kept back? No.
275. Therefore you cannot say whether you have all the men who are available or not? No, I cannot, by no means.
276. You have nothing to do with the workshops? No, unless occasionally.
277. Who is the Foreman of Works? Mr. Cahil.
278. By Mr. Dillon: The walls you have spoken of as having been repaired have been built a great many years, I believe? Yes, a great many years.
279. Is it not the fact that the prisoners and free people get from that garden the use of the vegetables just the same as they do from the other, or prisoners' garden? Yes, the prisoners and free overseers.
280. What men have been sent to the garden from the Engineer's Department have been sent on Mr. Ormsby's requisition? Yes, on his signature.
281. Can you state to me any case of the favoritism you have alluded to? I said just now —
282. Can you state one single instance? I could state many if I had kept a memorandum.
283. Tell me the name of any one person? I will tell you—Keogh; after reporting him three times to the Superintendent —
284. You got no redress? No. He was taken before the Visiting Magistrate; Mr. Ormsby gave him a recommendation, and the man was dismissed.
285. Mr. Ormsby gave him a character? Yes.
286. And because Mr. Ormsby gave the man a good character the Visiting Magistrate dismissed him? Very likely it was for that.
287. Have you a doubt that it was for that? I know he was a useful man.
288. Just answer the question, if you please.—Have you any doubt that it was because Mr. Ormsby thought it his duty to give that man a good character that the Visiting Magistrate dismissed the case? I do not know what his motives might be.
289. Can you name any other instance of favoritism? Yes.
290. What is the name of the party? There was a man of the name of Paddy Murray; he was in the workshop, and I took him up on a charge of abusing the overseer; he was sent back again, and the result was, when he came back one of them drew a knife and stabbed the other.
291. How long ago was this? Three or four years ago.
292. Was there any inquiry about that at the time? No, I do not think so; for I took the man before Mr. Ormsby for abusing his overseer, and he was dismissed, and the result was that he stabbed him.
293. What was the other man's name? He was a sub-overseer.
294. What was his name? I cannot say. He was a real good character, for he was hanged since, if I do not mistake.
295. What reason did Mr. Ormsby assign for not punishing this man? That I cannot say.
296. He assigned no reason that you can give? No.
297. You brought this man up on a formal complaint to Mr. Ormsby? Yes.
298. What did he do? He cautioned him.
299. Did he refuse to punish him? He did not punish him.
300. What was the complaint you made against this man? I complained of Murray for abusing the sub-overseer and using threatening language, and when he returned Murray stabbed the sub-overseer.

Mr. T. Easton.
4 Nov., 1857.

- Mr. T. Easton. 301. Were you ever dismissed from the service by Colonel Barney? No.
 302. Were you ever under his orders? Yes.
 Nov., 1857. 303. Were you dismissed by him? No, never.
 304. Was there any complaint made of you to Colonel Barney on any occasion? None; never in my life; I believe Colonel Barney can certify to that.
 305. By the Chairman: You have spoken about indulgencies being obtained by the prisoners, and brought in some mode or other to the island; I presume you mean by some of the boats that come to the island? I must think nothing else.
 306. In what mode do these indulgencies reach the island—how do they come, and in what boats? There are so many come to and go from the island, back and forward, that I am not prepared to answer; whether it is by the men that bring the rations to the island, or whether it is by the police boat or the visitors' boat, I cannot answer.
 307. Did you ever see anything come in the visitors' boat? Not to my knowledge.
 308. Or in young Mr. Ormsby's boat? No; I do not remember anything coming to the island.
 309. You have spoken of indulgencies coming to the island; now, do you know of anything going from the island, in the way of presents, or anything of that kind? Well, I have seen some things leaving the island; I cannot exactly say what—poultry, vegetables, and many things.
 310. In what boat or boats? In the police boat.
 311. In what other boat? I think in Chandler's boat, the man that supplies us with every thing of that sort.
 312. Were these things sent to Chandler? They were given over to Chandler to be taken to Sydney; but what I have seen was in the police boat—vegetables.
 313. You have said poultry—what kind of poultry? All kinds of poultry. There have been young poultry, ducks, and different things from time to time taken in that police boat.
 314. In what quantity? I should say half a dozen, eight, ten, or twelve there might be, altogether.
 315. For instance, of turkeys? No. I have seen some of them going over, but not such a number of them. There might be one or two of them.
 316. There may have been six, eight, ten, or twelve chickens sent over at a time? Yes.
 317. Or ducks? Yes.
 318. Sent over to Sydney? I do not know where they went.
 319. Vegetables? Yes.
 320. In the police boat—how often have you seen that? If I must speak certainly, I have only seen it twice.
 321. Within what period? Within the last twelve months.
 322. Who sent them? I am not aware; the prisoner always brought them down to the boat.
 323. What prisoner—was it the prisoner employed in the office of the Superintendent? Yes, this man Keogh.
 324. How was he employed at this time? He was employed by the Superintendent.
 325. Keogh brought these things down to the boat, and they went away? Yes.
 326. Do you know to whom they went? No.
 327. Has there been any transmission of that kind lately? Not of late days.
 328. Within the last three or four months? No; I should say not within the last ten or twelve months.
 329. Has Chandler taken away any poultry, or things of the kind you have described? I am not always there when the boat comes in, and I cannot say.
 330. At what time does his boat come in? At eight, nine, or ten o'clock.
 331. At what time does it go away? About half an hour after.
 332. What things has he taken away? I cannot state.
 333. Have you ever seen him take any thing away? I cannot prove that I did.
 334. Can you say that you did? No; but I have seen him bring many things.
 335. What quantity and kind of vegetables have you seen taken away; have you seen any great quantity? I cannot say exactly; as much as a large basket would contain.
 336. By Mr. Dillon: You have said you have seen this twice within twelve months? Yes, I think so; if I said more I think I would be something right.
 337. The things you have seen landed have been taken possession of by the Inspector of Police, and by him have been sent up to the office—do I understand you to say so? The Inspector is not always there.
 338. Or the serjeant? Yes.
 339. Have you not seen these things taken possession of by one or other of them, and by them sent up to the Superintendent? Yes; the police, of course, were present, but I was speaking of the man who took them up.
 340. Have you sent poultry off the island? Yes.
 341. By the Chairman: To whom have you sent them? I have made presents of them whatever I have sent.
 342. Poultry brought up by yourself? Yes.
 343. By Mr. Meredith: Whatever you have sent you have made presents of; do you mean to say that others who have sent them have not done the same? I am not prepared to say.

APPENDIX.

To the Honorable the Commissioners of the Cockatoo Island Inquiry.

Sydney, 4th November, 1857.

Honorable Sirs,

I respectfully acquaint you that I find it impossible to do justice to Mr. Ormsby without my thus trespassing on your forbearance.

2. I solicit then, gentlemen, that you will be pleased to give me a written memorandum of the charges which, acting for Mr. Ormsby, I am to meet.

3. And I ask your leave to inquire whether the various things hitherto disposed of by previous inquiries are now to be reopened, or may I conclude that Mr. Ormsby need not enter on these transactions which have been examined into and dealt with by the Government or its officers previously to the present inquiry.

4. I earnestly solicit you will allow Mr. Taylor, the Assistant Superintendent, to assist me before your Board in referring to details and answers to the evidences as being given, which, if the charges were classified, could have been easily done, but which it now embarrasses and incapacitates me from doing my duty, by the excitement and hurry of these references, and disarrangement of my papers, which attends my own personal efforts to refer to the points in question from amongst the mass of written matter (given as my instructions) at one and the same instant of time that I am endeavouring to take notes of the evidence as well as to watch the deportment of the witnesses.

I have, &c.,

JOHN DILLON.

THURSDAY, 5 NOVEMBER, 1857.

Present:—

SIR W. W. BURTON, KNT., IN THE CHAIR.

E. C. MEREWETHER, Esq.

CAPT. E. W. WARD.

Mr. Ormsby,
Mr. Dillon.

Mr. William Augustine Cabil, was called in and examined, as follows:—

1. By the Chairman: Do you hold an office upon Cockatoo Island? Yes.
2. What is it? Senior Foreman of Works.
3. Under Captain Mann? Yes.
4. How long have you been on the island? Six years, less about two months—I shall be six years, if I live until the 29th of December, on it.
5. Did you know any prisoner named Perry on the island? Yes.
6. A pugilist? Yes, I believe so.
7. Did you know another of the name of Sinclair? Yes.
8. Also of the same profession? Yes.
9. Were they in any of the working gangs under you? Yes; one working at the forge, under my direction—that was Sinclair; he was in the blacksmiths' shop.
10. How long was he at work there? I cannot exactly say; I believe nearly twelve months.
11. What became of him then? I am not certain whether he went to a ticket-of-leave, or whether he got into the convict department.
12. Perry—was he ever employed under you? Yes, up to the last time that he was upon the island; but this has been his second time on the island.
13. Was he under you all the first time? Yes, I think he was.
14. The last time, what was he? He was under my direction, working as a sort of rough carpenter.
15. Was he removed from that employment at all? Not on the last occasion.
16. On the first occasion? My memory is not very correct about that; but I know this, that he was in the convict department.
17. You mean by that that he was employed in some other way upon the island? Yes; not in the Engineer's Department.
18. Are you aware of there having been any sparring matches on the island between these two men? I have heard of such things, but I have never seen them; I never attended the camp once the business of the day was done.
19. You were never present at any such match? Never.
20. Did you know at the time that a match of the kind was going on in the camp? Not of my own knowledge; I heard of it.
21. Did you hear of it at the time the sparring match was going on in the camp? I heard there was a match there.
22. More than one? I cannot say that I heard there was more than one—I cannot say positively.
23. I now wish to ask you respecting a cedar plank said to have been taken from the stores of the Engineer's Department—do you know anything of that circumstance? Yes, perfectly well.
24. Will you state what those circumstances were? On one of those days when the men were at dinner—about one or two o'clock—
25. How long ago? I think I should refer to some memorandum to find it. (The witness referred to a memorandum book) At all events, not very long before Spencer left the island—I do not know that I have got the date exactly—but that the occurrence did take place is quite certain. I cannot say that Spencer was the man who took it, but it was he I suspected.
26. There was a man on the island named Spencer? Yes.

* 17—Y

27.

Mr. W. A.
Cabil.

5 Nov., 1857.

Mr. W. A.
Oahil.

5 Nov., 1857.

27. What was he? A carpenter.
28. How was he employed? He was generally employed for the Engineer's Department, but upon certain occasions Mr. Thomas allowed him to Mr. Ormsby.
29. Were those occasions frequent? They were.
30. For how long a period? Perhaps for a day or two at a time.
31. You mentioned his name just now in connection with a cedar plank? He was the man suspected of taking it.
32. Was he at that time working for Mr. Ormsby? He was.
33. How did you miss it—you say it was between one and two o'clock? The planks were in the yard when the men were turned out to dinner. They were all placed in such a way that one could not be taken without being missed. Directly I came from dinner I missed two planks from the heap; I looked round the yard, and could not see them, but I observed foot-marks over the wall that led to Mr. Ormsby's place.
34. To what part? To the garden. I reported it to Mr. Thomas; whether he reported it immediately to Captain Mann I could not say; but he spoke of it to Mr. Ormsby when he came home.
35. Was Mr. Ormsby on the island at the time? No; he was at Sydney on that day.
36. When did Mr. Ormsby return? Some time in the evening, and, I believe, the following day Mr. Ormsby made a search for the cedar through his yard, and returned it.
37. That is the circumstance of the cedar to which reference has been made? Yes.
38. Have you anything else to say in connection with that? No, I have nothing to say in connection with it.
39. By Captain Ward: You said just now that Mr. Thomas often allowed Spencer to work for Mr. Ormsby? Yes.
40. Can you tell us the description of work for which he was allowed? For carpenter's and and joiner's work—anything he could do for Mr. Ormsby.
41. Do you consider that it was for Mr. Ormsby's private work? I believe so; I cannot positively say.
42. Do you know what work he did—do you know whether it was Mr. Ormsby's private work or not? I believe it was some work for Mr. Ormsby's residence.
43. You do not know that? No.
44. The house belongs to Government does it not? Yes.
45. You do not know whether it was private work, or the repair of the house? I cannot say whether he was employed on furniture or on the repair of the house.
46. Was Spencer obtained by requisition? No.
47. Was it by a requisition made to the Engineer's Department? Not in the official way that requisitions are made.
48. Was it as a matter of favor or of duty he was granted? As a matter of favor, I consider, when it does not come through a requisition.
49. Did it rest upon Mr. Thomas to refuse or to grant it, as he chose? Certainly. I do not know that Mr. Thomas had the power to grant it.
50. Mr. Thomas was not bound to send a man to Mr. Ormsby upon his order? No.
51. Then it was left to Mr. Thomas' discretion? Yes, I believe it was left to Mr. Thomas' option, and I believe he exceeded his power, for I do not think he had the right to grant it.
52. When this man was so lent, do you know how he was paid for? I do not think at the time he was charged on the books; he was struck off the public works, to the best of my recollection. That can be proved, however, for I have the greater portion of the dates. (The witness referred to his memorandum book:— "Spencer at work for the Superintendent, "Saturday, May 10. Tuesday, May 20, per order of the Resident Engineer.")
53. Was he struck off the public works as far as his pay was concerned? I think to the best of my recollection he was.
54. Do you think, as a general rule, he was struck off the works? Yes.
55. Do you know how he was paid, or whether he was paid at all? During that time not to my knowledge.
56. From any other public funds? I am not aware.
57. By the Chairman: Are you acquainted with the Superintendent's quarters—his house—you know the form of his house, and the accommodation? I know the exterior, I am not very well acquainted with the interior.
58. The garden? I have been through the garden.
59. It is extensive, is it not? Yes.
60. And must have cost a great deal of labor in making it? No doubt it has.
61. In what manner has that garden been cultivated? By prison labor, of course.
62. You are aware that a gardener is allowed to Mr. Ormsby for the cultivation of the garden? Yes.
63. A gardener? Yes.
64. Is one gardener sufficient for the cultivation of that garden, or have more been employed? I cannot speak very correctly upon that, but I believe one gardener is scarcely sufficient to do what is requisite.
65. Are there not many walls in the garden? There are a great many—at least the extent is very considerable; they are very thick, and are built of loose rubble stone.
66. Would they have taken great labor to accomplish? Yes.
67. And many men? Yes.
68. Did you ever see any of them built? I have seen breaches in them—breaches that have been caused by bad weather.
69. What has been the consequence? Perhaps twenty men at a time have been taken to repair them.
70. How was that done? By requisitions to our department.

71. I am speaking of Mr. Ormsby's private garden? I think they are all Mr. Ormsby's private garden. Mr. W. A. Cahil.
72. I speak of the one which is unequivocally so—the one round his house—what use is made of the vegetables out of that garden? Some of them are distributed among the free people, such as cabbages. 5 Nov., 1857.
73. Is it his custom to distribute them every day, or so long as they are in season? Generally they get a sufficiency of them.
74. Are any of them given to the prisoners? I believe the prisoners are accustomed to get vegetables.
75. Was there a great quantity of poultry kept? Yes, I believe a large quantity.
76. What became of them? I cannot say; they have disappeared.
77. Up to what period were there a large quantity kept? Some months since; to the time there was an order made to throw the waste homminy into the water.
78. Since that a number have disappeared? Yes.
79. Had that any connection with the disappearance of the homminy? I do not know whether it had anything to do with the disappearance of the homminy, but it has had with the disappearance of the fowls.
80. There have been less kept since that time? Yes.
81. Perhaps you are aware that by the regulations the Superintendent may keep four milch goats and thirty head of poultry, and each free officer two milch goats and twenty head of poultry? I think I have heard something to that effect; but if a free officer feeds his poultry himself, is there any objection to his keeping any quantity?
82. By Captain Ward: Did Mr. Ormsby exceed the number allowed by the regulations? I should be rather inclined to think he has had something more than thirty.
83. What became of this poultry when it was diminished? I cannot tell you.
84. You know nothing about it? Certainly not. They have been sent to Sydney or disposed of. I could not tell you how Mr. Ormsby disposed of his own property.
85. You may know? I have no knowledge.
86. With reference to the repair of the walls of the garden—when a requisition is sent to Mr. Thomas, is it generally understood that he is justified in acceding to this requisition? It was customary for Mr. Thomas' authority to be limited. Any weighty matter requiring serious consideration Mr. Thomas is not to act upon till Mr. Mann has seen it.
87. Would Mr. Mann grant such a requisition? He has, frequently.
88. Then, if Mr. Ormsby's garden wall had fallen down from rain, when a requisition was sent to Mr. Thomas he would have been justified in refusing to grant it? Captain Mann has given his consent to do so.
89. Often? Yes.
90. In that case how are the men paid? From the Engineer's Department.
91. You still kept him on check? Yes; the time they are at work is marked down as being expended on the convict department.
92. Then who pays? Captain Mann.
93. As belonging to the works on Cockatoo? Yes.
94. You are quite sure of that? Yes.
95. You are quite sure the Visiting Magistrate does not pay for it on account of the penal establishment? I never heard of it.
96. You are the foreman of works on Captain Mann's department—have you seen some of these men charged in his pay list? I have no doubt they were.
97. By Mr. Merewether: Do you return them as employed by you? No; they are not immediately under my control, but under the control of another foreman, and he returns the time. They are paid, but the time is marked against the convict department.
98. By Captain Ward: Were they paid on account of the Dry Dock or of the penal establishment? I cannot correctly answer to that.
99. By the Chairman: Is there not a prisoners' garden? Yes.
100. Are they not taken off in numbers of twenty or thirty for the garden? Never; unless for the purpose of repairing breaches in the wall.
101. Have you ever known any men to be taken off for the cultivation of the garden? I believe there have been a few men, but, if I recollect rightly, there have been requisitions sent down on those occasions for men to assist in manuring the garden.
102. By Captain Ward: In those cases how are the men paid? In the same manner as I have before stated.
103. They are kept on your check list? No; when these men are given up to Mr. Ormsby he pays these men himself.
104. They are paid in the same way as the men taken off to repair Mr. Ormsby's house are paid, that is, they are not paid by the Engineer's Department? They are not paid by the Engineer's Department.
105. By the Chairman: Did you not say just now that both gardens were Mr. Ormsby's? I meant those gardens round his own place—there are four or five enclosed by one wall. There is a garden down by the military barracks; that is called the prisoners' garden. I think there is also a garden for the military.
106. By Captain Ward: Are the prisoners allowed to work in this garden? There are none else to work.
107. Are they taken off in the same way as the men for Mr. Ormsby's garden? I have seen but one man or two there.
108. Has Mr. Ormsby ever allowed any prisoner to be taken off the work to be employed in the military officers' garden? I cannot say.
109. Has Captain Mann ever allowed the men to go off the work to that garden? I do not recollect that they were ever applied for.

- Mr. W. A. Cahil.
5 Nov., 1857.
110. How is the military officers' garden cultivated? I believe by the military themselves.
111. Does Captain Mann allow the men to go off the works to manure that garden? Not that I am aware.
112. How is that other garden manured? Sometimes Mr. Ormsby's men come down to assist.
113. Then the men taken off the works for Mr. Ormsby's garden sometimes go down to the other garden to assist in manuring it? These are the men attached to Mr. Ormsby's own place.
114. His own servant? As they may be called—his servants, I suppose they are; they are chiefly about his place. They are sometimes brought down to the prisoners' garden to assist.
115. Are they servants allowed by the regulations, so far as you know them? I believe they are; they are men who have not been for a long time on the works. They are attached to his place.
116. Then, when Mr. Ormsby has obtained prisoners from off the works to manure the garden, have they been exclusively applied to the garden round his house, or have they been applied to the prisoners' garden also? I believe exclusively to the gardens round his house; they may have been removed to the prisoners' garden sometimes.
117. They have been applied to the special cultivation of his own vegetables? Yes, to his own vegetables, and those of the free people.
118. By the Chairman: You have spoken of manuring—where does it come from; what manure is there upon the island? At one time the damaged grain that remained in the siloes was used.
119. Has that been disposed of? All that was saleable has been disposed of.
120. And the rest? A great portion still remains in the siloes.
121. Is it still applied for manure? I cannot say whether it has been lately; I know it was at one time.
122. Are there any cattle or pigs on the island? Nothing, unless goats.
123. Then there is nothing to form manure—is manure brought to the island? The cess-pools are the only supply.
124. The men's privies, in fact? Yes.
125. By Mr. Meriwether: With regard to the man Spencer—was he often allowed to be off the works. You are specially in charge of the shop, and this man was specially under you? Yes.
126. How often—twice a week, once a week, once a fortnight? It might not happen twice a week, but once a fortnight, or three weeks, or perhaps sometimes in a month.
127. Did he go out as he stood, or did he take tools with him? He took tools.
128. What class of tools? Carpenter's.
129. What kind? Perhaps saws, chisels, hammers—any tools necessary for the work he had to do.
130. Did he ever indicate what sort of work he was going about? No.
131. He was at liberty to take what tools he pleased, and you had no means of knowing what work he was going about;—had he any requisition; did the requisition say that he was to take up tools suitable for making chairs, or for mending or making doors? I am speaking of his going on Mr. Ormsby's order without a requisition.
132. You were told by Mr. Thomas to let him go and take what tools he pleased? Yes.
133. Had you reason to suppose that he was going to be employed on Mr. Ormsby's business, or on public business;—was there anything that led you to suppose he was going to be employed on private work—did he take beading planes, chisels, mortice-chisels? I cannot call correctly to mind; but I believe he had been fitting up cupboards or presses in Mr. Ormsby's house for a portion of the time.
134. Do you know whether he was in the habit of making chairs? I do not.
135. Or other articles of furniture? I heard so; but I do not know it of my own knowledge.
136. Did he take tools fitted for such work? He could do it with the tools he took.
137. You were responsible for the tools he took, were you not? Yes.
138. You had some idea then of the tools he took? They were of different kinds.
139. Were they tools suited for mending doors, or were they such tools as beading planes, morticing-chisels? Yes—they would do for general work.
140. Generally useful tools? Yes.
141. A beading plane would not be wanted for mending a door? They were tools used for general work.
142. Were there other mechanics besides Spencer taken off the works? I believe there were, sometimes.
143. To what purpose were they put—have you any idea? I have.
144. What were they? Plasterers.
145. Were they frequently taken off? I cannot say they were.
146. What class of people were they principally? Plasterers and masons.
147. Not carpenters? Plasterers and masons as well as carpenters. Spencer is the man who was principally employed about Mr. Ormsby's house.
148. Had the frequency with which these men were taken away the effect of impeding the works you had charge of? Well, they did not promote its expedition, that is certain. Spencer has been employed both with and without a requisition.
149. What time were they absent when they were taken away—a day, or half a day? Frequently a day; sometimes two days.
150. Do you know the state of repair of Mr. Ormsby's house—is it in such a bad state as to require a man to be there once or twice a week? I know the roof has been in a bad state of repair, and that it has been re-shingled.

151. Were the tools required for re-shingling? No; he was never employed for work of that kind. It was for inside work he was required.
152. If the house required such constant repair, it must be in a very bad state? I do not know that it did; I cannot say what the work was.
153. I may assume that he was not engaged in repairing the house? I do not know how he was employed.
154. The reason I press you upon the point is, that I believe you are aware how he was employed? On my honor and word I do not. I have been a great stranger to Mr. Ormsby's house I assure you.
155. By the Chairman: I hope you are not afraid to tell? Not I. I have nothing to fear from any one. I defy either Mr. Ormsby or Captain Mann to bring a charge against me that would injure me.
156. By Mr. Merewether: You said just now that you had seen fowls leaving the island? No, I did not say that I had seen them leaving the island, but that I had missed them from the island. I said that I had seen great quantities there some time ago, and that they had disappeared; I learned that they went to Sydney by the boat.
157. You did not see them? I never saw them.
158. Do you reside on the island? Yes.
159. May I ask the position of your residence? Almost at the rear of Mr. Ormsby's premises, looking up the Parramatta River; about the most remote part from the police station.
160. You confine yourself to your own business without seeing what is going on on the island? I confine myself to my own business.
161. I judge from your replies that you take no notice of what is going on, except as concerns your particular business? I take no notice of what is going on, and seldom interfere with anything but my own business.
162. Cross-examined by Mr. Dillon: Was not Spencer allowed to go out to any other officer who might require him, in the same way as to Mr. Ormsby? That depended upon whether Mr. Thomas would let him go or not.
163. Has he not, in point of fact, been allowed to go to other free officers besides Mr. Ormsby? If he has it must have been a very unfrequent occurrence, for I have heard nothing of it.
164. You do not recollect the fact? I do not recollect it.
165. Are not all requisitions sent to Captain Mann, and not to Mr. Thomas? They are directed to the Civil Engineer.
166. Do you happen to recollect whether Spencer repaired the paling about Mr. Ormsby's premises, and also put up the pigeon-boxes. I have no recollection of his repairing the pigeon-boxes. I believe he was employed to repair some paling.
167. What sort of boards were those you spoke of awhile ago—were they good boards, or worthless—what do you suppose might have been their value? They were boards about ten feet long and twelve inches wide—what we call cedar boards; there were two of them.
168. What do suppose might be the value of them? The value of cedar at the time, I suppose, would be about sixpence a-foot; or ten shillings for the two boards.
169. Were they sound boards? Yes, they were.

Mr. W. A.
Cahill.

5 Nov., 1857.

Mr. Henry Broderick was called in and examined, as follows:—

1. By the Chairman: You are in the Engineer's Department on Cockatoo Island? Yes.
2. What post do you hold? I am foreman of mechanical engineers up to the present moment.
3. For what period of time have you filled that office? Four years.
4. You have particular charge of the mechanical department? Yes.
5. And of the prisoners working in that branch? Yes.
6. Were the prisoners assigned to you for that purpose kept constantly at work, or were they occasionally moved for other purposes? They were occasionally moved, but very seldom.
7. Tell us for what purpose, and by what authority? Whenever they were required on other parts of the work an application was made to me for their assistance for the time being. Whenever they were required for the penal department a requisition used to be sent to the Engineer's office, and an inquiry was made of me whether they could be spared for the time being.
8. That is when they were required to be employed on another branch of the public works? Yes, on the penal establishment.
9. Do you know of any of these mechanics having been taken off for private purposes? I am not aware.
10. I hold in my hand a paper of the 5th of October, in which there is a letter with reference to Cockatoo Island. I refer you particularly to paragraph 7, and ask you if you know of the circumstance to which that relates—namely, the men in a body leaving the works? (The witness referred to the letter.) Yes, I remember one occasion particularly; it was at the time the "Claremont" was discharging machinery at the island. It was on Saturday afternoon, and the captain had spoken to me before dinner, and wished to know whether the men could not be employed on Saturday afternoon in discharging, as he wished to get away? I said I would make arrangements for that purpose. Accordingly I gave instructions to the foreman to acquaint the Superintendent that the men would be required to work after dinner that day. I should have before said that it is customary for the men to leave their work at an earlier hour on Saturday, and that only a portion of the men, a certain number of the gangs were required for this work. I was walking up and down with the captain on the wharf waiting for the men to come, when I saw a number of them coming down the hill apparently to come to work as usual. The last gang that was near the camp all at once appeared to turn back, and there was a sudden stoppage among all the men of the other gangs. Those that were upon the works, seeing the others moving towards the camp, also turned round and walked up the hill. I said to the captain, "I wonder what this means; I will go and speak to Mr. Ormsby upon the matter." I met Mr. Ormsby on the hill, and asked him what the meaning of that was. He said they had refused to work—"What can I do in the matter?" He said he would take the names down of those who refused to work, and all he could do, as I understood, was to bring them before the Visiting Magistrate.

11. Did the men actually go to work that day? They did not.

12. Then they were not sent to their work at all; they escaped that time? Yes.

13. Do you know what steps were taken against them? I heard the names of the ring-leaders were taken down.

14. They were not on that occasion obliged to go to work? No; no further steps were taken on that day.

15. That was Saturday afternoon, when there was ordinarily a respite from labor? Yes; they usually leave off at two o'clock on Saturday.

16. So that sending them to work at that time was so far an infringement of their usual custom, and what they might consider their right? Yes.

17. For the purpose of accommodating the captain of the "Claremont"? Yes; it was to assist him in getting away.

18. It was for his convenience, and not for the benefit of the public service? It was more for his convenience.

19. I presume it did not signify to the department whether the vessel were discharged on Saturday or on Monday? No.

20. By Captain Ward: Did Mr. Ormsby report the circumstance to the Visiting Magistrate? I am not aware personally.

21. By Mr. Merewether: You were not called upon to appear against them? Yes, in one case I was called upon.

22. In connexion with this given instance? Yes. There was a party pointed out to me by Mr. Ormsby upon the hill, and he said he believed he was inducing the men not to go to work. I was called upon on that occasion to give evidence.

23. He was brought before the Police Magistrate, and you were summoned to appear against him? Yes.

24. By Captain Ward: And the Visiting Magistrate dealt with the case? Yes.

25. Do you think Mr. Ormsby on this Saturday afternoon did all he was justified in doing so far as expediting the public service was concerned? I think, perhaps, more might have been done upon that occasion. I do not suppose Mr. Ormsby was aware at the time whether it would be an advantage to the public service or not; but I think some other steps might have been taken to have forced the men.

26. What steps would you have taken if you had been in Mr. Ormsby's place? I think I should have called out the military guard, and then have appealed to the men to know how many of them would volunteer to go to work. I heard some of the men say afterwards that, if they had been asked, a good many of them would have volunteered to have worked at the vessel, but that they were called out, and compelled as it were to go to work without being asked, and they did not like it, as it infringed upon the time they considered as their own.

27. Suppose the men had refused when the guard had been turned out, what could you have done—suppose they had refused in a body? In the first place, I believe only a small number refused; the men nearest the camp turned back and then the rest followed.

28. Assuming that the men still refused after the guard had been turned out, what power would Mr. Ormsby have had of making them work? I do not think he would have had any power.

29. Did Mr. Ormsby when they did refuse try to induce them to go to work? Mr. Ormsby on that occasion, after they had removed further up the hill, sang out to one of the men—I do not know the party's name—"Will you not go to work—to-morrow is St. Patrick's Day; you shall have no holiday if you don't go to work." He said that to one or two of the men individually, I think.

30. You think he made all reasonable endeavours to get the men to work? There were one or two of the men he called out to, to ask them to go to work.

31. By Mr. Merewether: Did he order them to do so? No.

32. You did not hear him order them to go to work? No.

33. Were you present when the men mustered? No, I was not; I was upon the work.

34. He might have ordered them without your hearing it? Yes; the greater portion of the men were going up the hill before I got there.

35. By Captain Ward: Would they have been paid for the work if they had done any? Yes.

36. How much? I could not say exactly, but they might have been returned for one or two quarter days.

37. What would that have brought in money? A penny.

38. And what in remission of sentence? Nothing. It was said by the prisoners afterwards, that if volunteers had been called for there would have been plenty.

39. By Mr. Merewether: You are aware that it is an order to your department that every facility shall be afforded for carrying out the works in progress? Yes.

40. And it is an order to the convict department to facilitate the operations? Yes.

41. And you are at liberty to employ the men after the usual hours? Yes.

42. And you do so frequently? Yes.

43. It was in pursuance of that understanding and order that you wished to employ the men on this occasion? Yes.

44. You have been a long time on the island—what is your opinion of the general discipline observed among the prisoners? Generally speaking, I think it is pretty good; although as I have not been residing on the island until very lately, I have not perhaps been made acquainted with so many things as others.

45. By the Chairman: What has been the general conduct of the prisoners when employed under you upon the Government works? I have generally found the men willing to work, and, generally speaking, they obey orders. Now and then some of them may be a little troublesome.

46. By Mr. Merewether: In this particular case the men did pretty much as they liked—do you know of any similar case, when it has not been their pleasure to work? I have heard of a case, but I do not know it of my own knowledge.

47. Your general impression is that the discipline of the island is pretty good, and that the men were under control? Yes.

48. By the Chairman: Were you ever at a sparring match on the island? Never.

49. You never saw such a thing? No.

50. Did Mr Ormsby appear to conduct the business of the island by himself or through any other person? Generally by himself.

51. He interfered with matters himself, and gave his own orders personally? Yes.

52. By Captain Ward: You think he did his best for the public service generally? Yes, as far as my observation went.

53. By the Chairman: Have you any reason to impute partiality or favoritism in the treatment of the prisoners to him? As to that I could only speak from hearsay.

54. By Mr. Dillon: Have you experienced any difficulty at any time from Mr. Ormsby in receiving whatever assistance you required in the discharge of your duties—has Mr. Ormsby assisted you in every way in his power? I never met with any obstruction from Mr. Ormsby in the discharge of my duties.

55. By Mr. Merewether: Has he co-operated with you? I can scarcely comprehend the question.

56. Has he worked with you for the public good? We have been so separate I could hardly say. If I required anything from Mr. Ormsby to be done I generally sent up a requisition, and he has sent down a reply, but it has always been favorable.

57. And if he did not comply there was a satisfactory reason assigned? Yes.

58. By Mr. Dillon: One of the Commissioners asked you awhile ago with reference to these men being sent down by Mr. Ormsby's orders. I think you stated that in the first instance you sent up a request to him that the men might be sent down in the afternoon? I sent up a foreman of works to say that the men would be required after hours.

59. One of the Commissioners asked you would you have thought it a prudent thing for Mr. Ormsby to have brought a body of military out to compel these men to work after they had refused? I think he ought, as Superintendent, to have power to compel the prisoners to work if they refused.

60. What I mean to ask you is, whether, if you had been in the Superintendent's place, you would have brought a body of military among the prisoners to compel them to work after refusing? I do not profess to understand much of prison discipline, or the management of prisoners; it would depend upon circumstances.

Mr. John Kelleher was called in, and examined, as follows:—

1. By the Chairman: Were you employed by Mr. Mann in the construction of the public works on Cockatoo Island? Yes.

2. In what capacity? As Foreman of Works at the dry dock.

3. Do you know anything of the circumstances of a number of prisoners leaving the works contrary to the orders of the overseers, and going to the office of the Resident Engineer in a body? Yes; I recollect the circumstance.

4. What was that circumstance? Some of these men refused to go down to work in the mud and water, and others refused to remain out to work. They were told to remain, and they went away up to the camp.

5. What resulted from that? The men that went up to the camp belonged to me, and I followed them up and took their names down, as I had an order from the Resident Engineer to take their names down, and not to bring them to work again until further orders. I told the Superintendent not to send them out till further orders, but the following morning they were brought down, and I took them back again.

6. By Captain Ward: Was not that matter inquired into by a former Board—by myself and Captain Mayne? Yes.

7. The Board inquired into this matter and reported upon it? Yes.

8. By the Chairman: Is there anything else you have to tell us in furtherance of our inquiry into the management of the island—Have you anything to complain of as to want of assistance rendered by Mr. Ormsby? There appeared to be a misunderstanding. I was generally the medium of communication between the Resident Engineer and Mr. Ormsby on those occasions when the men were required to be kept out. Mr. Ormsby was of opinion that the communication should not come through me, but in writing from the Engineer's Office, and he always complained when I took a message, and thought he had no right to act upon it; the Engineer thought otherwise.

9. The Resident Engineer sent requisitions through you personally? Yes, verbally.

10. Instead of through the office, in writing, and Mr. Ormsby objected to this? Yes; I recollect on one occasion I took a message, and Mr. Ormsby went himself and removed a man who had been kept out, from the engine-house—at least he sent one of the overseers to remove him.

11. For what purpose was he employed? He was pumping out the dock.

12. After hours? Yes.
 13. By Captain Ward: Was not that circumstance inquired into by a former Board? Yes.
 14. Was it not reported upon by the Board? Yes; I believe it was.
 15. By the Chairman: I ask you if you have ever been obstructed by Mr. Ormsby in your work? Not except in that manner.
 16. In fact, these circumstances you relate were rather misunderstandings between Mr. Ormsby and Mr. Thomas personally than obstructions of the department? The works were obstructed by them, and they frequently caused a great deal of delay.
 17. They arose from the circumstance that Mr. Thomas would send requisitions informally, and that Mr. Ormsby would not attend to what was informal? Yes, if it were informal.
 18. That was the supposition? Yes.
 19. Were you ever at a sparring match on the island? No.
 20. Have you heard of such occurrences? I have heard of them, but have never been present.
 21. By Mr. Merewether: You have been a soldier, have you not? Yes.
 22. As to the general discipline of the convicts on the island—do you think that is such as they should be subject to? No; if I were in charge of them I would not allow it.
 23. Was not the discipline lax? Yes, by allowing it.
 24. By the Chairman: Allowing what? Allowing these sparring matches.
 25. Was the general discipline of the island good or lax? If I knew what the regulations were I could answer that question better.
 26. Have you ever been upon any penal establishment before? Yes. I was in the East Indies, at Trichinopoly. I was in charge of the penal establishment there.
 27. Did it ever appear to you that the penal discipline of Cockatoo Island was proper? I was always of opinion that that the prisoners were dealt with too leniently—that the discipline was not severe enough.
 28. Do you think that any blame was attachable to the Superintendent, or that there was a want of proper instructions? I cannot say.
 29. Did it appear to arise from want of energy, or from what other circumstance? I could not say what it arose from.
 30. Did Mr. Ormsby seem to want anything of firmness or decision? No.
 31. Did you ever see an instance where he gave an order and did not insist upon having it obeyed? I think he would enforce an order if he gave it.
 32. He was not a man who would yield—you never saw any wavering or yielding in any way? No.
 33. By Captain Ward: Did you ever see the regulations for the government of the island? I saw them when I first went upon the island; I glanced at them for five minutes.
 34. Are not the regulations in the Engineer's office? There is a copy in each office I believe; I inquired for them, but I never saw them.
 35. Whom did you ask for them? Mr. Thomas.
 36. Did Mr. Thomas refuse to let you see them? He said Captain Mann had them under his control.
 37. By Mr. Merewether: With regard to the discipline of the island, you say it appeared to be lenient; can you instance any case where the discipline appeared to be lax or favorable to the prisoners? I thought sometimes when a man was brought up the punishment did not seem severe enough.
 38. When brought up for what? For neglect of work.
 39. To what do you attribute that—to a general leaning towards the prisoners, or to favor to any particular prisoner? To a general leaning towards the prisoners.
 40. In your opinion there has been an undue leniency towards the prisoners—can you give any particular instance? One instance occurred to myself, where the prisoners made a report against myself; the matter was investigated and the report proved to be false. The matter was investigated by the Bench, and the parties who made the charge escaped altogether.
 41. By Captain Ward: Mr. Ormsby was not connected with that? It was proved to be false. I was accused of bringing the wife of a prisoner to the island.
 42. That matter was brought before the Magistrate? Yes.
 43. It was not dealt with by Mr. Ormsby? These men escaped without punishment. That is the principal thing I have to complain of. The charge was proved to be false; but I never could find out to this day who the men were that made it.
 44. Cross-examined by Mr. Dillon: Are you, or are you not, aware that Mr. Ormsby is constantly present during the transaction of business on the island—are you not aware that he gets up between five and six o'clock every day, and attends to the business of the island? I know he is a very early riser; and when I have had business at the office in the morning I have found him there; or, if I have sent up to the house he has come down.
 45. Have you ever found the slightest degree of delay in affording you assistance in the discharge of your duty? Whenever I have taken up a man to him, he has supported me; and if a charge has been supported against a man, he has dealt with the case.
 46. Has he ever been any impediment to you in the discharge of your duty? The only thing I complain of is respecting these men who brought a charge against me.
 47. You have had experience in another penal establishment—as the result of your experience, which do you consider more for the interest of the public, as well as of the Government, a violent or comparatively gentle way of dealing with the prisoners? It depends very much upon the character of the individual brought forward.
 48. In a convict establishment like that, do you think it desirable to resort to brute force or violence on every occasion? It is necessary sometimes when you have some characters brought forward.

FRIDAY, 6 NOVEMBER, 1857.

Present:—

SIR W. W. BURTON, KNT., IN THE CHAIR.

E. C. MEREWETHER, Esq., | CAPTAIN E. W. WARD.

Mr. Ormsby.

Mr. Dillon.

Mr. Henry Fitzgerald was called in and examined, as follows:—

Mr. H.
Fitzgerald.

6 Nov., 1857.

1. By the Chairman: I believe you are Foreman of Works at Cockatoo Island? Yes.
2. How long have you been employed there? Since the 2nd of February, 1854.
3. In that capacity? Yes.
4. Have you experienced any difficulty from want of discipline among the convicts employed under you—have you had any difficulty in carrying on the public service? Yes; on some occasions it would be found necessary to take the prisoners up to the office to get them punished for insubordination.
5. To whom did you complain on those occasions? To the Superintendent.
6. Have these complaints been disregarded, or have they been inquired into? On some occasions, where the matters complained of were trivial, they would be discharged; in other cases, where they were weighty, the prisoners were confined in the cells for the Visiting Magistrate to inquire into the charge.
7. Have you ever had occasion to complain of Mr. Ormsby for his mode of treatment when you have so complained? No, not generally; on the two last occasions I did not get the satisfaction I anticipated.
8. What were those cases? One man was detained in the penal department without my permission, and I gave notice of it.
9. Who was that man? Young; he was a stonemason; he was sent for, and on coming out of the gate in the morning he turned to me, in the presence of my brother officers, and said, "I am much obliged to you, Mr. Fitzgerald; it may come to my turn yet to do you a good office." I took it ironically, and the man partly acknowledged it to be. I took him to Mr. Ormsby, and he said he would send him to the cells and leave him there for the decision of the Visiting Magistrate. The Visiting Magistrate came on the following Wednesday, and, I believe, he was at the cells from that time until the attendance of the Visiting Magistrate, when he was discharged.
10. With that decision you were dissatisfied? Yes.
11. Mr. Ormsby did his duty in bringing the case before the Magistrate? Yes, and he would have sent him to the cells if I had insisted upon it.
12. What was the other case? One of longer date, in consequence of one of the men charging me with making false entries in the book in favor of the prisoners that were exempt. I had about a score of men working at a difficult employment, and I was directed by Mr. Thomas to give them extra encouragement, to the amount of four-pence a day. These men were exempt, and their fellow prisoners did not get so much as those who were exempt, and they complained. I brought that before the Visiting Magistrate, and at length got a hearing, but the case was dismissed.
13. That was not owing to Mr. Ormsby? No.
14. Then, if your complaints did not meet with the decision you thought they deserved, it is owing to the Visiting Magistrate, and not to the Superintendent? Yes, it was the Visiting Magistrate I felt displeased with.
15. Have you any complaint to make of the Superintendent's conduct towards you or the men under you? None whatever. I have personal complaints, as concerns myself and my own department, if I am allowed the protection of the Board to make them public.
16. Most undoubtedly; and we can tell you, that if any person who gives evidence is visited with any displeasure on account of any evidence he may give here, the Board have determined that that person shall be dismissed? In one case—and it would be just to mention that—it was at the instance of Mr. Ormsby, or of the Visiting Magistrate. I had been employed as Sergeant of Police on the island, and during that time I think neither Mr. Ormsby nor any other person had complained of my conduct, when an opportunity occurred of appointing an Inspector; and being the senior officer, I considered I was entitled to the office. When I did not get it I was dissatisfied, and would not remain on the island.
17. Your complaint on that point is, that Mr. Ormsby or Mr. McLerie did not give you a certificate? Mr. Ormsby said Mr. McLerie was the gentleman to whom I should apply.
18. Have you any other personal matter to complain of? No. I left the police on the 31st of January, and on the 2nd of the following month was employed on the island, under Captain Mann, as soon as he found no person had any claim upon me, at seven shillings a day, with the increase. It was with the view of getting the increase I joined that department. I do not know whether I am acting right to go into details; for on one occasion I was going to petition the Legislative Council for the increase of pay. I went with the intention of giving it to Mr. Cowper, when I thought whether I was going to do what was proper, and he told me I had better show it to the head of my department. I went to Captain Mann, and he told me to rest satisfied, and that when my time came round I should not be overlooked.
19. Did your petition contain any complaint against the management of Cockatoo? No.
20. How long were you in the police? From January, 1851, to 1854.
21. During that time you had your eyes sharply about the island, I suppose? During that time I had.

Mr. H.
Fitzgerald.

6 Nov., 1857.

22. Do you recollect sparring matches taking place in the camp, between the convicts? I have heard of them, but I never saw them.
23. You never had the curiosity to go to them? No; I was never in there on such days.
24. In what manner is the police boat used? It is since I left the force that the visitors' boat has been got up.
25. The visitors' boat—did you ever see that used in a manner that was improper, not on the public service? When I was first on the police, the police did duty as sentry, and one boat was continually kept on police duty.
26. Have you known that boat to be employed on any other than the public service? There was another boat that was continually sent to Sydney.
27. By Mr. Merewether: You were merely an ordinary constable? At the commencement.
28. Were the new regulations then in force—was there a visitors' boat while you were in the constabulary? I do not think it bore the name of visitors' boat. The Water Police boat brought the surgeon and the other gentlemen to the island. I was never in the present boat.

Mr. Charles Dunning was called in and examined, as follows:—

Mr. C.
Dunning.

6 Nov., 1857.

1. By the Chairman: You are Inspector of Police at Cockatoo Island? Yes.
2. How long have been on the island? Five years.
3. In what capacity? At first as an ordinary constable, at present as Inspector of Police.
4. Were you promoted from constable to inspector at once? Yes; I never was sergeant.
5. It may, perhaps, be necessary to say that you need be under no apprehension with reference to the evidence you may give here. We expect you will tell us the truth, and if one resents your doing so, the Board will take care to protect you. Do you remember a man of the name of Gleadall being discharged from the force? Yes.
6. When was that? I remember his being discharged, but I do not exactly remember the month.
7. About how long ago was it? About six or eight months.
8. Do you know what he was discharged for? A charge was brought against him for being drunk on duty in the boat.
9. Did you see him at the time of the charge being laid? Yes.
10. Was he drunk or not? He was sober.
11. Who made the charge of drunkenness against him? The Rev. Mr. Kenyon, the Catholic Clergyman.
12. To whom? To me in the first instance, and I reported it to the Superintendent, Mr. Ormsby.
13. What was done with that case—who heard it? It was taken before the Magistrate.
14. Was he put in the cells? No; he was taken before the Magistrate. I did not withdraw him from his duty; he was suspended.
15. On that charge was he dismissed? Yes.
16. Did you give evidence that he was not drunk? I did.
17. Who stated that he was drunk? I did not hear the priest's evidence, but I heard the evidence of the Superintendent, and of two other constables who were in the boat.
18. What evidence did the Superintendent give? That he was sober.
19. And you gave evidence that he was sober? Yes.
20. You and two other constables? Yes.
21. You now state, advisedly, that he was sober? Yes. I read a portion of Mr. Kenyon's letter, and he said he was "disgustingly intoxicated, though not drunk."
22. In your opinion, was he at all intoxicated or drunk? He appeared as if he had been drinking, but was quite sober for duty.
23. Do you make a distinction between being quite sober and quite sober for duty—was he entirely sober or not? If a man is fit for duty I consider him sober.
24. He was not drunk? No.
25. By Captain Ward: Was he fit for duty? Yes; but the priest required him to withdraw from the boat.
26. By the Chairman: He was dismissed? Yes.
27. Was there any reason for his being dismissed; do you think he was treated unjustly? I could not say that.
28. Did you not think it unjust for him to be dismissed for drunkenness when you swore he was not drunk? I think it was a curious thing.
29. Can you find any reason why he was unjustly treated? During the time he was in the force he asked for the regulations.
30. Whom did he ask? Myself, and I applied for them.
31. To whom? To the Superintendent.
32. Did you get them? No.
33. Have you any copy of the regulations? I have of the old regulations.
34. Not of the new? Not of the new.
35. When did you apply to Mr. Ormsby for a copy of the regulations? On three different occasions.
36. And he never furnished you with them? No, not with the new.
37. Gleadall had asked you to be allowed to look at the regulations; you had applied to Mr. Ormsby for them, and they had not been given? They were not given.
38. Are you the head of the police on the island? I am considered so to be, but, according to the regulations I have at present to go by, I have merely the charge of the police under the Superintendent's control.
39. The dismissal of Gleadall from the police was Mr. North's act? Yes.

Mr. C.
Dunning.
Nov., 1857.

40. The Superintendent gave evidence for the man? Yes, in his favor.
41. Do you attribute his dismissal to Mr. Ormsby? It was suspected among the force.
42. Do you yourself consider or believe that Mr. Ormsby was the cause of his dismissal seeing that he gave evidence in favor of the man? I know that Mr. Ormsby personally disliked the man.
43. You heard him give evidence in his favor before the Magistrate? Yes, on that occasion.
44. You know Mr. Ormsby disliked the man—why do you suppose that he obtained his dismissal? From my own observation. I have seen the Superintendent with the Catholic Clergyman; they have been talking together, and I have suspected they were talking about the matter, and that he might have influenced the priest to bring the charge against the man.
45. You did not hear what he said to the priest, but you thought Mr. Ormsby disliked the man, and you suspected that he influenced the priest to bring forward this charge? Yes.
46. Suspicion is part of the police character, but unfounded suspicion should not be the part of any man's—is the only ground you have for suspicion what you have stated? Yes.
47. You saw Mr. Ormsby speak to Mr. Kenyon, and you suspected that he was inducing Mr. Kenyon to bring this charge? Yes.
48. And yet, when the charge was made, Mr. Ormsby gave his evidence in favor of Gleadall? Yes.
49. That is the whole of the case? Yes.
50. Have you any reason to suppose that Mr. Ormsby had any objection to produce the regulations when you repeatedly required him to do so? Have you the new regulations here?
51. Yes? Then, if you compare the second paragraph of the new with the second paragraph of the old regulations, you may see the reason. You will see that Mr. Ormsby has no control over the police under the new regulations. (Captain Ward read the regulations.)
52. Have these regulations which have now been read been seen by you before? Yes; I read them once at the Superintendent's office.
53. Was it upon some application made by you that you did see them? Yes.
54. Were you in fact acquainted with the regulations? Yes.
55. You knew the tenor of them? Yes.
56. You knew from the tenor of them that you were under the orders of the Visiting Magistrate? Yes.
57. Then in what respect were you ignorant of these regulations? I wished to produce them to the police.
58. In fact you had not a copy? Yes. I never had a copy; I never have had a copy given me to this day.
59. Have you applied for a copy? Yes.
60. When did you see the regulations? It was immediately after the inquiry in 1855.
61. By Captain Ward: These regulations say you are under the orders of the Visiting Magistrate—was not he the proper person to apply to for a copy of the regulations? I did apply to the Visiting Magistrate afterwards.
62. And you applied to Mr. Ormsby as well? Yes, on three different occasions, and I afterwards applied to the Visiting Magistrate.
63. What did he say? He said the regulations were that I was to attend to the instructions of the proper authority.
64. Did he give you the proper authority? No.
65. Did he give you his reason for declining? No.
66. Did Mr. Ormsby give you a reason for declining to furnish you with the regulations? Yes; he always said he would give them when they had been revised, but that they required revision.
67. They had been revised by the Board, had they not? Yes; but he said they required further revision; as they are at present they are quite obsolete.
68. Both the Visiting Magistrate and Mr. Ormsby declined to give you the regulations when you applied for them? That was the answer given to me—that I was to obey the proper authority.
69. By Mr. Merewether: But he did not tell you who the proper authority was? No.
70. He made no further comment? No further comment.
71. When did Mr. Ormsby shew you the regulations—was it after you had applied three times? No, in the first instance, when the regulations came out he shewed me.
72. So that you were aware from the first that the police were under your orders? Yes; and for that very reason the police wanted the new regulations. I also think my duties are laid down in the island regulations as well as the others, and the island regulations were never in the possession of the police.
73. By the Chairman: Did you ever know any man to be punished, directly or indirectly, for having asked to see the regulations? I do not know any case at present, except it may be Gleadall's.
74. If that were the case? If that were the case.
75. By Mr. Merewether: Did Mr. Ormsby refuse or decline to let you see the regulations? He refused to give them to me; he did not decline to let me see them.
76. He refused to give you a copy? Yes.
77. What would have been the result if he had given you a copy? I should think the result would have been that I should have had charge of the men myself. I would have taken upon myself the charge of the men.
78. And not having the regulations you did not take charge of them? Yes.
79. You still treated them as under Mr. Ormsby's orders? Yes.
80. Even after the regulations were promulgated? Yes; on account of not having the new regulations I acted under the old, and always considered myself under Mr. Ormsby's orders.

Mr. C.
Donning.

6 Nov., 1857.

81. Had anything else occurred to create any dislike to Gleadall besides this asking for the regulations? A circumstance occurred at the North Shore on the Anniversary Day, 26th January, 1856. The Clerk of Petty Sessions and the dispenser of the island were there upon the spree; they had been drinking, and two of my men were assaulted; the consequence was that they were brought to Court at Parramatta.
82. State the circumstances? Mr. Ormsby made a great objection to the matter being brought forward at all.
83. By the Chairman: How do you know that? Because I was present when the men went to get leave to take a summons out.
84. Who were the men assaulted by? By the dispenser.
85. Who was with him? Mr. Taylor, the Clerk of Petty Sessions.
86. Mr. Taylor and the dispenser were together on the North Shore? Yes; they were fighting, and the police interfered.
87. How did the police get there? They took them over in the guard-boat, and they went over afterwards to fetch them back.
88. When they went back they found them fighting? They did not find them fighting, but they heard screams.
89. Will you state the circumstances more particularly? I was on leave myself that day.
90. How did you hear of the case? I heard of it from the general talk of the island.
91. You did not know it yourself? No; I was on leave that day.
92. However, there was a disturbance between the dispenser and Mr. Taylor, which was subsequently investigated at Parramatta? Yes.
93. You say Mr. Ormsby objected to the men bringing it forward? Yes; he made many objections and would not give the men leave to go for some time.
94. Had that anything to do with the men asking for a copy of the regulations? I do not think it bore upon that.
95. If the police were under your orders, or the Visiting Magistrate's, was it necessary for them to go to Mr. Ormsby for leave? I cannot give a man leave without Mr. Ormsby's permission; he signs their leave.
96. Not under these new regulations? I have never had them.
97. Supposing you had had them, could you have given the men leave without referring to Mr. Ormsby? I do not think I could from the general regulations, for no person could leave the penal department without his authority.
98. Mr. Ormsby did decline to give them leave? He did.
99. But eventually did they go? Yes; Mr. North gave them leave.
100. Was Gleadall one of the men that made the complaint? Yes. They prosecuted Mr. Peers.
101. And Mr. Taylor? No. One of the constables took a summons out against Mr. Peers for striking Mr. Taylor, but the case did not come on—Mr. Taylor would not enter into it.
102. Then there was no summons against Mr. Taylor? I do not think there was.
103. Why should the taking of this course by Gleadall cause Mr. Ormsby to dislike him—there is no apparent connection between the two circumstances? Because Mr. Taylor was connected with the affair.
104. Is Mr. Taylor anything more to Mr. Ormsby than any one else? He is his son-in-law.
105. Has anything else occurred to create dislike to Gleadall on the part of Mr. Ormsby, which you could assign as a reason why Mr. Ormsby should desire to get rid of him? I believe the same man made a complaint about his clothing; I am not certain of that, however.
106. Do you remember the occasion when Mr. Pendrill, the clergyman, wanted to leave the island, and there was no boat for his transit—the visitors' boat was absent? The visitors' boat was absent.
107. By Captain Ward: He wanted to leave the island, and applied to you for a boat; did you on that occasion tell him that the boat was under repair? I never remember telling him that—Do you mean on the 7th of July?
108. By the Chairman: I mean on the day he went in a small boat with a prisoner in it? I could not tell him so, for when he arrived the boat was on the other side of the wharf, close to him, and did not leave the island until after he had landed.
109. Did you see him leave the island? Yes; he went with a convict and a sergeant of police.
110. That was in the small boat? Yes.
111. Where was the other boat? Away picnicing.
112. You are quite sure that she was away at that time? Yes.
113. Did Mr. Pendrill apply to you about getting across? No.
114. Did you deliver any message to him—did you tell him the boat was being painted? No; I could not have told him that.
115. You did not tell him so? No.
116. Was that boat frequently away on picnics? Eight or nine times.
117. Eight or nine times, within what period? I should say within a period of three years.
118. By Captain Ward: Could it have been away any more without your knowledge? I do not think it could; I make a distinction between pleasure parties and picnics.
119. What is that distinction? I do not include going to see races or going fishing.
120. By the Chairman: For his private use, how often has Mr. Ormsby used the boat within the last three years? That is independently of going to Sydney?
121. Independently of the public service—including his going to Sydney for private purposes? I could not tell when he went for private and when for public purposes.
122. How many times then was it engaged in pleasure parties to other places than Sydney? I could not give the exact number.
123. As nearly as you can? I should say fifteen times in the three years.
124. That was exclusive of Sydney? I could not tell you where it went.

Mr. C.
Dunning.
Nov., 1857.

125. Do you remember its going up the river to the races at Homebush? Yes.
126. Who went in it? A very large party—the boat was quite full.
127. Was Mr. Ormsby and his family in it? Yes.
128. Has it ever been employed in carrying the Superintendent's family to Sydney without the Superintendent, and therefore not on duty? I think it has, on several occasions.
129. Has it ever been out late at night? Yes, at all hours.
130. On duty, on picnics, or pleasure parties? In all ways.
131. By whose order is it so employed? I never give any order myself.
132. Who has done so on these occasions? The order was given by the Superintendent to the coxswain of the boat.
133. That is to say, whenever the boat was so employed the order was given by the Superintendent to the coxswain of the boat? The coxswain goes up to the Superintendent every morning and gets his orders from him.
134. You do not get the orders from the Superintendent? No; I give no directions to the boat's crew at all.
135. By Captain Ward: Can you give any information to the Board respecting a picnic that took place at Chowder Bay in Christmas 1856? I could not speak as to the particular day.
136. Was it a holiday? I could not say that the boat went to Chowder Bay, except from what the boatmen said; I never accompanied the boat on any picnic; all I know of the picnics or pleasure parties is from hearsay.
137. Do you understand from the new regulations that the boat is under you and not under Mr. Ormsby? The regulations do not speak to that I think.
138. Is it under the Visiting Magistrate or under Mr. Ormsby? I do not remember anything about the visiting boat; it is entirely in charge of the coxswain.
139. You do not know whether there was an understanding between the Government and Mr. Ormsby as to the use of that boat? I do not.
140. By Mr. Merewether: Do you remember the 7th February last? I have spoken of that already.
141. On that occasion was the Chaplain of the Church of England put into a boat with a convict in irons? Yes.
142. In what boat did he come to the island? He came to the island in a small boat, and left in a small boat. At the time he arrived on the island the large boat was lying alongside the wharf, ready for the picnic. Mr. Pendrill arrived about three o'clock, and the other boat started about a quarter of an hour afterwards.
143. Do you remember whether it was blowing fresh on that day? It was.
144. Cross-examined by Mr. Dillon: You speak of the boat having been out at night on some occasions—do you happen to know where Mr. Ormsby was upon those occasions? I was on the island, and could not know whether Mr. Ormsby was in Sydney or not.
145. You spoke awhile ago of many things that you had received on hearsay—did you not hear on these occasions when he has been out at night he has been to Government House? I might have heard so.
146. You heard it just as you heard other reports? Just the same.
147. Are you not aware, or are you aware, that Mr. Ormsby himself requires leave from the Colonial Secretary or the Visiting Magistrate on those occasions? I am aware.
148. Now, when you applied to Mr. Ormsby about these regulations, did you say he allowed you to see them, but did not give you a copy? On one occasion he allowed me to see them.
149. On one occasion he allowed you to see them, and on another you asked him for a copy? Yes.
150. Did he refer you to Mr. North? Mr. North was not the Visiting Magistrate at the time.
151. Was Captain M'Lerie? Captain M'Lerie.
152. Did ever the Visiting Magistrate refuse you a copy of the regulations, whether Captain M'Lerie or Mr. North? Captain M'Lerie said to me that the regulations were, that the men were to pay respect to the proper authorities.
153. Was it not the invariable rule on the island that whatever report you had to make was to be made to the Superintendent, to be reported by him to the Visiting Magistrate? Yes, according to the regulations.
154. That was the course—complaints were to be made to the Superintendent, and by him to be made to the Visiting Magistrate? No. Mr. North said we were to have a copy of the regulations, and instead of the new regulations I had sent down to me a copy of the old regulations, dated 1850. (The witness produced the copy.)
155. By Captain Ward: When you applied for a copy of the regulations, you had sent down to you a copy of the old? Yes.
156. From whom did you receive them? I received them from a prisoner.
157. By Mr. Merewether: Did he say whom he brought them from? He brought them to me, and said there were the regulations. He was the office messenger, and I received all orders through him.
158. By the Chairman: Were these regulations in their present state when they were brought to you? Yes.
159. That is to say, they had these pencil alterations? Yes. The rules I had were those in force previous to the inquiry of 1851; instead of the new regulations I had these dated 1850, when there were only four constables on the island.
160. By Mr. Merewether: When did you get that copy? In March last.
161. By the Chairman: Do you know of any sparring match having taken place on the island? No; my business never takes me to the camp, except at evening, when I plant the sentries; sometimes the sergeant plants the sentries.
162. About the visitors' boat—that boat is manned by policemen, and all the policemen are under your orders? Subject to the control of the Superintendent, and I act under him.

Mr. C.
Dunning.
6 Nov., 1837.

163. Those who pull the boat are under the Superintendent for that purpose? Yes, I suppose so.
164. Are they employed upon the Superintendent's private business more than upon the public business? Not more.
165. Are they equally—are they employed as much in the one as in the other—in these picnics, pleasure parties, and in taking Mr. Ormsby's family to Sydney and elsewhere? No, they do more duty than they do for Mr. Ormsby privately.
166. Do you think three days out of seven they are employed on his private business? The Superintendent goes in the boat to Sydney himself once a week—sometimes he does not go so often as once a week.
167. How many days in the week do his family or friends use the boat? Sometimes some of his family go in with Dr. West or with the Visiting Magistrate.
168. Taking advantage of one of the officers going in? Yes; instead of his own day.
169. How many days are you able to say the Superintendent has employed them for his sole private purpose—you say one day in the week he goes to Sydney? Yes; sometimes he does not go to Sydney; and, on several occasions, when the boat has had no other duty to do—when there has been no officer coming to the island—advantage has been taken of the day to send the boat's crew to cut wood or to fish.
170. What party has gone fishing? The boat's crew and other parties belonging to the police.
171. Fishing for themselves? Fishing with a net. There was a net we all had subscribed to; the police had fourteen shares in it.
172. All the free persons on the island? We had a share each, and the Superintendent had two shares.
173. How often did the boat's crew go fishing with the net? In the beginning they used to go twice a-week.
174. In the end how often did they go? Once a-week; the men got disgusted with it.
175. Why? I do not exactly know; they disliked fishing.
176. How were the fish divided—were they divided according to the shares in the net? On one occasion, but not afterwards; the boat's crew that went fishing took their share, and the remainder the Superintendent got.
177. In the beginning the boat's crew went fishing twice a-week, that afterwards fell off to once a-week? Yes; and ultimately the net was sold.
178. When was it sold? Some time since—about nine months ago.
179. How often did the boat's crew go to cut wood? Two or three times.
180. Two or three times, within what period? To my knowledge, while I have been on the island.
181. Who went in the boat for that purpose? The boat's crew.
182. What became of the wood? It was used for propping up the grape vines in the vineyard.
183. It was not used for burning, but for making trellis-work for the vines? Yes.
184. For whose vines? Mr. Ormsby's.
185. In Mr. Ormsby's garden? Yes.
186. Then this boat was employed? Not the large boat, the small boat.
187. The boat was used then for picnics, pleasure parties, and cutting poles for the vineyard? Yes, in cutting poles.
188. Was it employed in any other mode not for the public service? It may have gone to the theatre.
189. Have you known it go to the theatre? Yes.
190. Who was in the boat on those occasions? The Superintendent.
191. Who else? Perhaps part of his family.
192. At what time did the boat go? In the evening, and came back at twelve at night.
193. Has it been later than twelve at night? Not much later.
194. How frequently has that occurred? Not very often.
195. How often? Once or twice a year.
196. Did the boat ever go to take the family to evening parties in Sydney? Upon occasions. When the family go to evening parties Mr. Ormsby's sons generally pull their own boat. The boat may have gone on several occasions.
197. The sons of Mr. Ormsby have a boat? They have two boats.
198. And they pull their own boats? Yes. On many occasions they have brought people from Sydney in them; but it is possible that, on some of these occasions, they may have had the visitors' boat.
199. At what time did these young gentlemen come back? At eleven or twelve o'clock.
200. Later or earlier? It would depend upon where they went.
201. Were they frequently out late? Not frequently.
202. But they were out occasionally as late as eleven? Yes, eleven or twelve.
203. None of them were out later than that? They might have been as late as half-past twelve or a quarter to one.
204. Then these boats the young gentlemen used as they liked? They were employed in Sydney, and they went to and from the island in their own boats.
205. When the boat came back to the island where was it kept? It was left at the buoy, in the charge of the police. All the boats were in our charge.
206. These boats were always pulled by the young gentlemen? There may have been a solitary instance of a policeman going on leave, pulling.
207. By Mr. Merewether: Has the visitors' boat ever been absent all night? It has been.
208. Who was in it when it was absent—who took it away and who came back in it? On several occasions Mr. Ormsby has gone to balls, both at Balmain and Sydney, and the boat has been all night away.

Mr. C.
Dunning.

6 Nov., 1857.

209. And has returned in the morning? Yes.
210. Has that been a frequent occurrence? Not a frequent occurrence.
211. By Captain Ward: Do you know whether on those occasions Mr. Ormsby obtained from the Visiting Magistrate leave to go? I never could tell.
212. By Mr. Merewether: Have you ever seen the visitors' boat carry away fowls from the island? I have.
213. Anything else? I have seen it take away baskets with cabbages.
214. Were they Government property? I could not tell that.
215. Were they in any quantity? I should say a large-sized basket full.
216. Of vegetables? Yes.
217. Were there any quantity of fowls—one couple—two—three? Sometimes more.
218. Do you know whose property they were? I understood them to be the Superintendent's; they were brought to the boat by his servants—his prisoner servants.
219. Do you know what became of them? No.
220. You know they have been taken off the island? These things are put into the boat, with instructions to the coxswain what to do with them.
221. What is the coxswain's name? Smith.
222. All boats land at the public wharf, do not they, where you are stationed? Yes.
223. Is it your business to attend and see what is landed? Yes, it is.
224. Does any one attend from the Superintendent's department? No one, unless when the provisions come for the prisoners, and the free overseers come down for their newspapers.
225. Is there anything to prevent clothing, articles of luxury, or spirits being brought to the prisoners—are you authorised to stop anything? No; you will see, from the regulations, that it is for the Superintendent or his assistant to do that.
226. Are they ever there when the boats arrive at the island? Occasionally.
227. Not as a rule? As a rule they are when prisoners arrive there.
228. On other occasions provisions may be landed; do they or do they not see what is landed? Anything landed the prisoner servants take up, no matter what it is—books, parcels, liquor, or what.
229. Where do they take them? To the free overseers' quarters.
230. Suppose they are not going to the free overseers' quarters but to the camp, is there anything to prevent a prisoner when he comes down to the boat from saying that he comes from a free overseer, and taking what he obtains to the camp? Not to my knowledge.
231. You are not aware of any regulation which makes it incumbent upon the Superintendent, or his assistant, to be present at the wharf when the boats land? I think you will see in the police regulations that we are to prevent spirits being landed.
232. Suppose the man who came down to the wharf said he came from any of the free overseers, would you be authorised to stop spirits said to be intended for them? When I was first appointed I reported to the Superintendent that spirits were landed; he did not stop it, and I did not interfere after. I could not say whether spirits were landed or not without I broke the bottles.
233. By the Chairman: Did you ever search the boats when they came ashore? Never for spirits.
234. Did you ever search for anything? No.
235. By Mr. Merewether: Anything is allowed to be landed? I am supposed to prevent spirits being landed.
236. Practically you do not—why do you not? I receive every thing that lands on the island, I and the sergeant.
237. Are you authorised to stop anything? I am not.
238. Then your receiving is a mere matter of form? It is a mere matter of form.
239. Are you aware of any regulations by which any one else is allowed to stop spirits brought to the island? Yes; the Superintendent and his assistant are supposed to search all parcels and bundles.
240. Do they, as far as your observation goes? I do not know any instance of it.
241. So, I am to understand that anything may be landed on the island without any check to prevent it—spirits, tobacco, clothes, or anything else may be landed? Yes. All parcels are carried up to the Superintendent's office; anything directed to the prisoners passes through my hands.
242. And a prisoner takes these things to the office, or you suppose he does? I am instructed to deliver everything to this prisoner.
243. Suppose this prisoner did not choose to take up anything to the Superintendent's or Assistant Superintendent's office, but wished to drop it on the way, is there not the lime-kiln, and are there not other places where he could conceal anything? Yes.
244. None of your men go up with him? No.
245. By Captain Ward: Are you aware of any spirits having been smuggled into the enclosure at all? No, I never heard of it.
246. You do not know that spirits have ever got among the prisoners under the existing regulations? I have heard it rumoured.
247. What was the rumour? That Mr. Ferris, one of the overseers there, was in the habit of selling spirits to the prisoners.
248. Was the charge ever made to Mr. Ferris? Not to my knowledge; I am quite ignorant of anything that occurs on the island.
249. When boats approach the island are they not noticed from the signal station? Yes, and reported to the Superintendent.
250. He is aware of the arrival of every boat? Yes.
251. That gives him the opportunity of sending down a man to see what is landed? Yes.
252. Does he, as a rule, do so? There is no person sent down but the prisoner-messenger.

Mr. C.
Dunning.

6 Nov., 1857.

253. What do you consider to be your duty when the prisoner comes down as a boat is unloading—do you give every thing to the prisoner? Yes.
254. Do you allow any one else to take the things from the boat? No.
255. You insist upon the prisoner taking all these things to the office? Yes; he comes down for these things.
256. By the Chairman: You do not see him deliver them? No.
257. By Mr. Merewether: Are the free overseers allowed to take from the boat anything directed to them? They have got their own servants.
258. Who come down and receive these things? Yes.
259. Has not Mr. Ormsby two messengers, who come down and receive these articles? No; one messenger and one flagstaff man.
260. Both convicts? Yes.
261. By Captain Ward: Do you think the present practice with respect to the landing of the boats sufficient to prevent spirits getting among the prisoners? That depends upon the interior management of the prisoners.
262. What further improvements would you suggest in your office as Inspector, with regard to the landing of goods from the boats at the island? I should say that all things, such as liquor, should be marched up together, in charge of a constable, who should see that every thing was delivered by the prisoners.
263. You consider that it would be your duty to ascertain whether there was any liquor in the boats, and, if so, to send it up in charge of a constable to the Superintendent's office? Yes, to the different parties.
264. You think that would prevent the spirits falling into the hands of the prisoners? Yes.
265. That would throw the responsibility on you? Yes. There is nothing to prevent the prisoners getting spirits under the present system.
266. By Mr. Merewether: Supposing Mr. Ormsby, or his assistant, were down at the wharf when the boats arrived, would that prevent it? No; I have seen things landed under Mr. Ormsby's own eye, and he has said nothing.
267. He has seen it and said nothing? He has seen it.
268. If the Superintendents were there, and did their duty, would not that prevent spirits and other articles being landed surreptitiously? Yes, if the orders were carried out. I remember, on one occasion, when I was first made Inspector, there were some mechanics came to work on the island, and they brought spirits with them.
269. Why did you not carry out your orders with respect to the landing of spirits? The first week I was Inspector I saw spirits come on to the island, and I reported it to the Superintendent.
270. In writing? No, verbally.
271. Was any answer received by you in writing? No; he said it was of no consequence—there was no harm in it.
272. Who brought the spirits on that occasion? It was wine, I think; it was one of my own men.
273. To whom did he take it? It was for his own use; he took it to his own room.
274. You reported that to the Superintendent? I reported it to the Superintendent, and he said, as it was wine it did not matter.
275. By the Chairman: Do you recollect any other instance—any instance of spirits being brought to the island? I did on one occasion.
276. By Mr. Merewether: Who brought them in that case? Mr. Cabil.
277. By the Chairman: What was the answer to you on that occasion? I forget the exact answer that was made.
278. No further notice was taken? No.
279. You are aware that spirits are landed freely? Yes, without obstruction; it comes in barrels or packages.
280. By Mr. Merewether: In barrels? In kegs—in two gallon or one gallon kegs.
281. Does that occur frequently? Not frequently.
282. By the Chairman: You say it is not usual for the Superintendent or Deputy Superintendent to be at the landing place when boats land? No.
283. They do not perform that duty? The Superintendent is never there for that express purpose.
284. Nor the Deputy Superintendent? The Deputy Superintendent is there once or twice a-week to receive indulgencies and rations for the prisoners.
285. On other occasions who is present? I, or my sergeant attend.
286. Not the Superintendent or Deputy Superintendent? No.
287. I understand from your evidence that you never search any of the boats? No, I never do.
288. Whatever is landed is carried up from the boats, either up to the Superintendent's office by the convict messenger—? That is with regard to letters and messages.
289. Or to the free persons' quarters by their convict servants? Yes.
290. Without examination by you, or by anybody in your presence, and unaccompanied by any free constable? Yes.
291. So that in fact there is no supervision or control as to anything landed? No.
292. Spirits, wine, or beer may be largely landed without check or control? Without check or control.
293. Have you seen any person drunk upon the island? I have seen people in liquor after coming from town, but never doing duty on the island.
294. Never whilst on duty? No; only when they have just come from town.
295. Persons ordinarily residing on the island, who had just returned from town? Yes, but on the island I never saw an instance of it.
296. As to the employment of the boat—by one of these regulations I observe that all boats, excepting

Mr. C.
Dunning.

- excepting those containing the official visitors, Mr. Ormsby and his family, and so on, either going to or coming from the island, are liable to be stopped and examined by the Water Police boat—is that regulation carried out? I never heard of that regulation.
297. Are these boats ever stopped and examined by the Water Police? No; I was not aware of that regulation.
298. If you had been aware of that regulation, what should you have done? Acted up to it; if I had had the control of these things I would have acted up to the regulations.
299. According to the regulations, no person without permission of the Governor General is to be allowed to remain on the island after ten o'clock at night? I have known people to remain on the island with the magistrate's permission—any immediate relation, such as a brother or sister of those they go to see.
300. With whose permission? The Visiting Magistrate's.
301. There is a regulation that no pigs are to be kept on the island, and that but thirty head of poultry and four milch goats are to be kept by the Superintendent, and two goats and twenty head of poultry by the free overseers—has that regulation been attended to? I have seen more than that.
302. Who has kept more than that? Without exception I think every one keeps more, those who can afford it; there may be a few constables who do not.
303. Does any improper consequence follow from their keeping more; has any use been made of the prisoners' rations for feeding them? At one time the fowls were fed upon the homminy; that I understood.
304. Whose fowls? Every body's fowls.
305. Do you mean the spare homminy—the refuse after the people had done their meals? I do not know how it was obtained; I never lived there; but I have seen it pass to the free people's quarters.
306. Where from? From the direction of the camp. I was never inside to see it.
307. Did you see it at all the overseers', or only at one or two? More particularly at the Superintendent's quarters.
308. Are you aware that the spare homminy, the surplus, is now thrown into the sea? I am aware that it is the order, but I have never seen it thrown in.
309. Do you believe it is thrown in? I never took any interest in it.
310. You are aware that the Visiting Magistrate ordered it? I have heard so.
311. Has there been any diminution of the stock on the island since that? I have heard the men say that the goats and fowls have died.
312. You have told us that they have been taken off the island? There has been a diminution in both ways—both from selling them off and from their dying.
313. Have you ever known any letter to pass from or to any prisoner without being read by the Superintendent? I cannot answer that question.
314. Are any letters passed clandestinely? The letters are taken to or from the boat in my presence. They are given to the prisoner-messenger, and he takes them, or is supposed to take them, to the Superintendent.
315. All letters? Yes; I send them up to the office by him.
316. You have no security beyond the fidelity of the person employed for the proper delivery of the letters? No.
317. No check upon him at all? No; it is the special business of the messenger who comes down for the letters.
318. By Mr. Merewether: You do not give him any scrip to shew that he has received fifty, forty, or any other number of letters from you? No.
319. You receive them and hand them over to him? Not at all times; sometimes he gets them direct from the boatman. He is supposed to take them to the office.
320. You do not know what becomes of them? No further than that.
321. By the Chairman: Does the Superintendent personally superintend the works going on upon the island? No, not to my knowledge.
322. I refer to the regulation referring to the general duties of the Superintendent, contained in the 17th regulation? I have noticed him on many occasions go round the works, but not as a daily practice.
323. Have you ever known any prisoners performing any work upon their own account, or for private parties on the island, or for the private advantage of any resident on the island, excepting as servants—have any prisoners, other than as servants, been employed by any person on the island for his private purpose? I have from time to time seen a carpenter at work, but whether he has been employed upon requisition or not I cannot say.
324. What was the name of the man you saw employed? Spencer.
325. Employed in what way? At cabinet work.
326. Where? At the Superintendent's; he was making boxes and trifling things.
327. How frequently, or for what length of time have you seen him thus employed? I have generally seen him accidentally when I have gone up to the place. I have never gone there purposely to see him.
328. Was that frequently the case? At one period it was frequent.
329. Running over what period of time was that frequent? Perhaps a space of two or three months, or a month. I could not state exactly.
330. He was frequently employed within a period of two or three months? Occasionally.
331. Do you know that prisoners have been employed by Mr. Ormsby as gardeners? I have gone into the garden and seen a prisoner there.
332. How many have you seen in the Superintendent's own garden? I have seen one man, not more; but I am not in the garden every day.
333. How often does the Visiting Justice come to the island? Once a-week.
334. No more than once a-week? No.

Mr. C.
Dunning.

6 Nov., 1857.

335. Does he hold a Court upon every occasion? I believe he does; I am not up every time he comes, indeed I am up very seldom unless I have a case of my own.
336. Does he ever muster the prisoners? He comes specially once a month to muster the prisoners.
337. Does he muster them oftener than that? I do not think he does. I am quite ignorant of all these things connected with the penal department.
338. I see by the regulations, that it is your duty to have the constables properly drilled to the use of the carbine—do you attend to that? Not lately.
339. Why have you not done that lately? On one occasion when I was drilling the men they reported me to the Superintendent for it, and he came down and drilled them himself. He said they were sufficiently drilled, and I have not taken the trouble to drill them since.
340. How long is that since? I dare say six months.
341. Do you not consider it to be your duty to drill the men? Yes, it is according to my orders; but as the Superintendent said they were sufficiently drilled I did not attend to it any more.
342. Did he tell you not to drill them any more? No.
343. Have you arms for them all? Yes.
344. Do you inspect them regularly? No, I do not.
345. Do you inspect them to see that they are clean? Yes.
346. How often? Every time they turn out for sentry.
347. Their ammunition—is that kept under your orders? I see that it is kept correctly.
348. You see before they go on sentry that their arms and ammunition are in order? I do not inspect their arms closely, but I see that they are in order.
349. Do you always attend at the wharf when the boat arrives? I or the sergeant.
350. Do you attend with an armed guard? No; the guard boat is armed.
351. Are you aware that you are to attend with a guard of six men, armed, when a boat comes to the island? That is not done now; I have a sentry at the wharf.
352. Military or police? There are four men, armed, on duty to receive the boat.
353. Did you ever know an instance of a person landing on the island without an order from the Colonial Secretary, the Brigade Major, or the Visiting Magistrate? Yes.
354. Are you aware that no person has a legal right to land without permission either from the Colonial Secretary, the Brigade Major, or the Visiting Magistrate? Yes.
355. Have you known any infringement of that regulation? Yes; gentlemen come to the island and send their cards up to the Superintendent, and the Superintendent gives us instructions to allow them to land.
356. What gentlemen do you refer to? There was one—Commander Lethbridge, R. N.
357. Any body else? There may have been others, but I do not recollect their names. I know there have been one or two instances.
358. Not often? Not very often.
359. By Mr. Merewether: Should all persons desiring to land produce an order to you? Yes; they cannot land without they produce an order, unless we have it already on the file.
360. You must have an order for the landing of persons upon the island, either previous to their arrival, through the Superintendent, or produced by themselves? Yes.
361. You must inspect an order in some way or other? Yes, according to the regulations.
362. That rule is frequently departed from? Not frequently; on one or two occasions it has been.
363. You specify one particular instance, and the same thing had occurred before, but you cannot recollect the names of the parties? Yes.
364. By the Chairman: Are you aware that, by the regulations, none of the free officers are permitted to leave the island, but with the Superintendent's permission? Yes.
365. Is there any infringement of the rules? I am responsible for that, and I am very careful to have it observed. There may be occasions when the Superintendent is absent, and the Assistant Superintendent sends an order.
366. Are you aware that by the regulations no convict is allowed to approach the wharf within a distance of fifty yards, the servants of the free officers excepted? That is not carried out, and it cannot be carried out, from the nature of the works in progress.
367. By Captain Ward: Except in charge of an overseer? I never see a prisoner in charge of an overseer. Only the cart gangs who move about from place to place are in charge of convict overseers.
368. By the Chairman: You have not a copy of the new police regulations? No, I have only the copy I have produced.
369. Have you told the truth upon all those matters which have been inquired into? To the best of my knowledge, I have.
370. With respect to the transaction of taking Mr. Pendrill to town in the small boat, did you tell me the truth when I asked you the question about the painting of the visitors' boat? Yes, to the best of my knowledge. It was impossible for me to tell him that it was being painted, for when he landed the visitors' boat lay on the other side of the wharf, within two or three yards.
371. The boat was away upon a picnic on that day? Yes; it left about a quarter of an hour after he landed.
372. It was not there to take him away? No.
373. Was any suggestion made to you from any body on the island as to what evidence you should give upon that point of the boat? Yes.
374. Tell the Board by whom the suggestion was made, and what was the nature of it? After you had left the island, on your last visit, the Superintendent called me aside and requested me to go up to the Clerk of Petty Sessions and to concoct some story—
375. What were his words? Those were his words to concoct some story, so as to clear him of this case of picnic.

376. Were those the words he used? Yes, that was his meaning, or the effect of his words.
377. Can you not give his words more correctly? He said he wished me to go up to Mr. Taylor to concoct a story, in order to clear him of this picnic case.
378. What did you say to this? I promised that I would.
379. Did you go to Mr. Taylor? No, not on that occasion. I did on another occasion; that was upon a different subject.
380. Upon what subject was that? It was connected with the regulations of the island.
381. Tell us what it was? He wanted me to go over the papers printed in the Empire—the minister's letter.
382. Did he say with what object? The object of making the thing as light as possible.
383. What did he say upon the subject? He said he would wish me to go up to Mr. Taylor, and go with him over the letters published by the minister, Mr. Pendrill.
384. What did he say besides—did he give you any reason for wishing you to do this? To get up a statement to refute what was in the minister's letter.
385. Did he tell you that? Yes.
386. Did you go up to Mr. Taylor? I did, subsequently.
387. Did you read over that letter with Mr. Taylor? Mr. Taylor went over several points.
388. What paper was it he produced? The Empire of the 22nd October.
389. Did Mr. Taylor produce that paper? (handing a copy of the Empire of the 22nd October.) It was a copy of that.
390. What passed between you and Mr. Taylor on that occasion? He wanted to know what Mr. Pendrill said to me with regard to the coxswain—he wanted to know whether it was true or not what Mr. Pendrill said, whether he complained of the coxswain, and whether I gave him that answer. I said I did.
391. The answer about the boat being painted? No; he said he complained to me of the rudeness of the coxswain, and that I said I was subject to the same treatment myself.
392. Did Mr. Taylor ask you anything about the boat that went to the picnic? No, I do not think he did; I think he left that out, and I did not point out that matter to him.
393. Did he ask you, or propose to you, that you should give any evidence that was not true, or that should mislead us in our inquiry? No; though he was talking to me as though he was trying to impress upon my mind that I should speak the truth, still he was telling me how I should act.
394. What did he want you to state? To impress upon the Board that it was he refused them, or advised the Superintendent to refuse them, and he would take the blame.
395. Was it the Superintendent in fact that refused them? Yes.
396. Did he say anything else to you? There was one remark he made while I was there about our clothing; he said we were well off, that we were not police at all, and that our clothing came to such an amount of money, about £5 each. There were fifteen men, and five times that would be £75. It did not strike me at the time, but I thought afterwards that there was £180 down on the estimate voted by the Legislative Assembly for our clothing; had I thought of it at the time, I should have asked how much of it was really expended on our clothing.
397. By Mr. Mercwether: You said just now that Mr. Taylor made some remark about your being well off—what was the drift of that remark? He was always casting that up; he said I had rations and clothing, and was better off than he.
398. By Captain Ward: With respect to the concoction of a story—did he propose to you to say anything that was untrue? He did not want me to make an untrue statement, but to state it so that Mr. Ormsby should not be blamed for it.
399. What was the concoction he wished you to adopt? He told me that he did not remember that there was a constable in the boat that day, and wanted me to state there was none.
400. Are you quite sure there was? Yes; I can shew there was.
401. What answer did you give him? I think the answer I gave him was that I would do so; nothing further happened.
402. What made you promise to tell this story? I was afraid to give any other answer.
403. Why were you afraid—what would have been the consequence if you had told the truth? I should have been subject to annoyance, at least I imagine so.
404. Had you been subjected to annoyance before for telling the truth? Not for telling the truth, but I had been subject to annoyance from time to time.
405. What for? Doing my duty.
406. Had you ever been subject to annoyance before for speaking the truth? No.
407. Then you took upon yourself the responsibility of telling a lie because you feared you might be subject to annoyance? I promised, but I never intended to do so.
408. You said so through fear, but never intended to do what you said? Yes.

Mr. C.
Dunning.

TUESDAY, 10 NOVEMBER, 1857.

Received a letter from Mr. Dillon—annexed.

Resolved, That the Chairman communicate to Mr. Dillon that he has already been informed of the course the Board intend to pursue, and that the Board do not see any reason to alter their decision.

A letter was also received from Mr. Pendrill, read, and answered by the Board.

Christopher Murray, examined :—

C. MURRAY.
10 Nov., 1857.

I was constable in the visiting boat of Cockatoo Island (not coxswain.) I know nothing of facts stated in letter of Empire, signed "N.B." I have been two years and a half on the island. Visitors are in the habit of going to and from the island all Sunday. The guard-boat is largely employed on this day for this service. I have no knowledge of writer in Empire of 2nd October. I wrote a letter in Empire of 7th October, signed "Fourth Witness." To my knowledge the police of the island were not in possession of regulations, (I left the island eleven weeks ago.) They were applied for, but not given. Application was made to Captain M'Lerie, in my presence, by the Inspector, Dunning. Captain M'Lerie said the regulations were, they were to obey all lawful orders, but gave no copy. The regulations were again applied for by Constable Scott, to Mr. North; he stepped out of the ranks and stated his wish for instructions for his guidance in the absence of the inspector and sergeant. Mr. North said he had an inspector and sergeant to go by; this was about eight months ago. I know nothing of Gleadall having applied for the regulations; he was dismissed on a charge of being disgustingly intoxicated—but not drunk. The charge was made by Father Kenyon, who reported it to the inspector, in whose presence and the sergeant's he was examined. I was present at the time. I consider the man was under the influence of liquor, but not drunk. The man was afterwards dismissed. I have known Constable Pierce to be taken out of the guard-boat on various occasions, and sent to Balmain for legs of mutton, and on private messages, for Mr. Ormsby. The last time was not longer than nine months ago. I have seen the guard-boat at various times sent on private business, fishing, &c. I have been in the boat on such occasions. The fish on such occasions were taken to Mr. Ormsby's house. A fishing net was purchased by general subscription. The constables, Mr. Brown, Mr. Taylor, and free overseers, had shares. On those occasions a smaller boat did the guard-boat's duty. Two Government boats have gone on a fishing excursion on the same day, one conveying the net, the other the party, consisting of Mr. Ormsby, Mr. Davis, XIth Regiment. I have on two occasions seen the two boats go, frequently one boat. The persons who worked the boats on these occasions were constables. I have known the larger boat used for pleasure and picnics. On Easter Monday, 1856, I was in Chowder Bay, with a pleasure party, in young Mr. Ormsby's boat; the ladies and the Superintendent were in the visitors' boat. We were away all day. I have known the boat to be used for conveying poultry to town. I have seen two basketsful go. They were taken to Cummins', the poulterer. I assisted in taking them there on one occasion, and sometimes part of the way there. I have brought back beef, bees, corn, porter for Mr. Ormsby; when landed at Cockatoo these have been conveyed, by convict servants, to Mr. Ormsby's house. I have known the small boat, when unfit for the purpose, sent for the clergyman, when the other was idle. The small boat has been sent for billet-wood for the free men, when the ration supply has run short. I had the ill-will of Mr. Ormsby myself. I left the island in consequence of being dismissed. I said something about Mr. Ormsby before two men, who reported it. Mr. Ormsby reported me, and the Visiting Magistrate dismissed me. I had been suspended before, on the complaint of the coxswain, who told me to scrape the oars, and I told him he might do it himself. Another time I was detained in Sydney, waiting for Mr. Ormsby's beef. I was reported by the boat's crew for being drunk, and suspended again. I was suspended three times before I was dismissed. On the two first occasions I was not brought before the Magistrate, but my pay was stopped, which I considered unfair. On the last occasion, I was brought before and dismissed by the Magistrate. I can find no motive for Mr. Ormsby having treated me unfairly. I was very kind to Mr. Ormsby, and transacted his business without complaint. My money was stopped for three days on one, and two days on another occasion. I believe Saddler and Carey, constables, have also been suspended by Mr. Ormsby. When I was called for by Mr. North and dismissed, I made no complaint of my pay having been stopped.

Cross-examined by Mr. Dillon: There was no fishing parties from the island for twelve months before I left the island, and no picnic party for about nine months. I had conversation yesterday with the dispenser of the island, who had been examined before this Board. Mr. Pendrill, about a fortnight ago, asked me how I came to leave the island; I said through the ill-will of Mr. Ormsby. I have gone into Mr. Parkes on different occasions since the publication of my letter, to know when I should be required before the Board. I have asked Inspector Dunning how the inquiry was going, and if I should be examined—he has told me I should be. I know other free people on the island keeping poultry, but I cannot say if they sent any to Sydney. On one occasion the Bishop of Sydney went to the island in the boat which I have called the dirty boat. I consider my dismissal from the island to have been unjust, as the witnesses disagreed. On the third occasion of my pay being stopped, when my case was brought before the Visiting Magistrate, I do not know if he told me that it went to the Police Reward Fund. I do not recollect having asked him.

THURSDAY,

THURSDAY, 12 NOVEMBER, 1857.

Mr. Jeremiah Brown, Assistant Superintendent of Cockatoo Island, examined:—

I have been on the island ten years, first as overseer and now as Assistant Superintendent, under Mr. Ormsby. My duty is to open wards and count out men every morning. I afterwards fall them into gangs, call out the sick, and send the gangs to labor. I afterwards dispose of the sick according to the dispenser's directions. I attend at meals and take complaints. In the absence of the Superintendent, the general charge devolves on me. I have known the Superintendent to be absent twice a week on his own business, not oftener. I remember the circumstance of two men concealing themselves on the island, but there was no charge preferred against them, except that of hiding to effect an escape; no other charge was hinted against them by any one at that time. I remember Perry and Sinclair—boxers. The men are in the habit on holidays of amusing themselves in the yard boxing a little, jumping a little, and so forth; but no regular set-to has taken place to my knowledge. On one occasion I discovered some gloves had been made by the men out of a leather apron; I reported this, and, by Ormsby's orders, I seized them and burnt them. The military officers might have seen something of this kind from outside the railings, but I never knew them to attend for the purpose of seeing a sparring match. I remember on a Saturday the prisoners refusing to go to work; their names were taken down, and a report sent to the Visiting Magistrate, who heard the case on his next visit, and about twenty-five of the men were confined—I presume there was a record of it made at the time. On another occasion the men were dissatisfied with Mr. Thomas, respecting the number he put to draw a cart. I was present when the case was brought before Mr. North. Mr. Thomas charged the sub-overseer (a prisoner) with employing one extra man at the cart. The man pleaded that he was ordered to do so by the free overseer; this plea was substantiated by one of Mr. Thomas' free overseers, on which Mr. North dismissed the charge. These were the only two instances I know of men having refused to work. The Church of England Chaplain once asked me where he was to see men who wished to speak to him; I showed him the school-room, by Mr. Ormsby's order. I always attended Divine Service, and Mr. Ormsby sometimes, more frequently while Dr. Steele, Mr. Donkin, and Mr. Syngc were Chaplains, than latterly. My duty was to keep order during service. Mr. Pendrill was in the habit of going to my room in the yard to change his dress; he never complained of that accommodation, and he never asked for any assistance regarding his duties; if he had done so, I would have rendered him every assistance. Mr. Pendrill never made a formal complaint to me respecting the boat service. I, the police, some free officers, and the Superintendent took shares in a fishing net; the fish caught were distributed among shareholders. I have known the Superintendent to go fishing once, and to picnics four or five times, during the time I have been on the island. I never knew the boat to be sent from the island solely for the private business of Mr. Ormsby; but when going for other purposes it was also employed on private business. I did not attend, nor the Superintendent, at the landing of boats, except when the indulgence boat brought things for the prisoners, paid for out of their task money; these things were taken by me and examined before issued. The Superintendent's or free officers' things used to be taken direct by the servants of those persons to their quarters, unexamined by the police or me. I have seen a keg of wine brought to the island, and spirits to the extent of a bottle at a time, without the knowledge or consent of the Superintendent—it is not the practice to ask the Superintendent's leave. I never examined any bundles or parcels brought to the island, or the persons of any one visiting the island. The free overseers and subordinate officers did bring spirits on the island. I can positively state that the regulations regarding subordinate officers bringing spirits to the island have not been carried out. I have always had access to the regulations of the island, and am familiar with them. I muster the prisoners eight times a day—to and from meals and work and to bed—according to regulations. I never heard it stated or suggested on the island in my life that the Superintendent borrowed money of the prisoners. I remember the Chinaman Tan refusing to work on three occasions, once because a man at the hand-cart would not pull, on another occasion when other Chinamen were leaving the island with whom he wished to go. He asked for an interpreter. I took him to the Superintendent, who satisfied him that he should see the interpreter, and he went to work. On the third occasion he declined to work because he was not allowed to go away with four other Chinamen who had been sent on the island with him. I have known prisoners to be confined to the cells, till the Visiting Magistrate came, for insolence to the Superintendent, myself, and others; the Visiting Magistrate came once a week and inquired into case. I have known on one or two occasions a man confined five days before the Visiting Magistrate saw him and decided his case. This occurred in more than one instance. When men have been so confined, they have been reported next morning to the Visiting Magistrate. I have known of no instance of overbearing conduct by the Superintendent or officers to the prisoners, and all insolence to the officers has been unprovoked. I remember one circumstance of suspicion of an unnatural offence. Unlocking the wards one morning it was reported to me that one man had gone into another's berth; the case was reported to the Superintendent, and by him to the Visiting Magistrate, and the charge dismissed, as without foundation. It was never reported to me during my stay on the island of such an offence having been committed in the wards or elsewhere. There was a case of suspicion of unnatural offence occurred about a year ago, arising from a man approaching another in one of the wards, and laying his hand upon him; the man who approached the other was knocked down; the case was reported to me, and by me to the Superintendent, and by him to the Visiting Magistrate, who dealt with it, and punished the man by confinement in the cells; that man has ever since been made to sleep in a separate cell. This is the only case I recollect of any suspicion of an unnatural offence. The separate dormitories seen by the Board on their visit are used for young lads and feeble old men; there are four persons

Mr. J. Brown. persons now using them; the Chinaman Tan, one old man, and two young men under twenty years. I have never known a man punished for reporting another for an unnatural offence; and I have never known a case of unnatural offence occurring, and it is therefore not true that such a case has occurred, and the man not punished.

The sweepings up after prisoners' meals of the homminy and meat used to be distributed among the free officers for their fowls.

Henry East once charged the Superintendent with having appropriated prisoners' rations; his charge was, that a piece of good meat was put among sweepings for the Superintendent's use. It was brought by the Superintendent before the Visiting Magistrate, and, as he could not substantiate the charge, he was punished by confinement to cells. Up to this time the prisoners gave their consent to the sweepings being distributed among the free officers, and had helped to collect them. I am not aware of any canvassing for votes having occurred as to whether refuse should be so applied. I know Captain Browne was Visiting Magistrate in 1849, and he ordered sweepings to be thrown away, and that order was acted on for about two years. The order was never relaxed by any magistrate; the infringement of it occurred from a spontaneous wish of the prisoners, communicated to the Superintendent, that the refuse should not be wasted; it then began, by the Superintendent's order, to be distributed among the free officers' servants, in equal proportions, till about nine months ago, when the charge before stated about the piece of meat was made; since then the refuse has been thrown into deep water, and that is the practice now. The piece of meat found among the refuse before referred to was good meat, about 2 lbs. weight, cooked. On another occasion the meat of some Chinaman was under-done, and taken by him to the overseer of the cook-house, who exchanged it for his own; the overseer kept this meat till the morning, when, it having turned bad, he flung it into the refuse. The prisoners, when they sent to the Superintendent that they wished the refuse to be distributed, were unanimous, as far as I am aware. I have no reason to believe that Mr. Ormsby's administration has been partial or unjust, or that he has been any favorites, or has a "down" on any one. The several appointments to subordinate situations among the penal establishment are vested in the Superintendent. I have never known favor shewn in the exercise of that power. I do not believe there ever was a case of a man having been confined to the cells by the Superintendent and released without the knowledge of the Visiting Magistrate. The Superintendent's garden is sometimes manured by men obtained upon requisition to the Civil Engineer, and the vegetables are distributed among the free people, and also the prisoners when the latter's garden is low. I do not consider it my duty in the absence of Mr. Ormsby to examine boats coming to and leaving the island. I am not aware that either myself or the Superintendent is required to accompany visitors when on the island. Visitors to prisoners see them in the presence of the police; other visitors are accompanied round the island. I have known strangers, by the permission of the Visiting Magistrate, sleep on the island. Boats communicate between the island and the main three or four times a day, always, however, by leave of the Superintendent—on Sunday, sometimes. A journal is kept of passing of boats to and from the island daily, and preserved in the office. I have never received any instructions as to what is to be considered discipline on the island.

Cross-examined by Mr. Dillon: I have acted under the orders of Mr. Price (lately murdered at Melbourne) at Norfolk Island for twelve months. Since I left Norfolk Island I have been at Cockatoo, to which place I was appointed on the recommendation of Mr. E. D. Thomson. I am competent to give an opinion on prison discipline. I have seen nothing in Mr. Ormsby's system of managing convicts which I can find fault with. I do not know of any man more fitted to carry out the mild system of prison discipline established here by the Government—I mean the system in which flogging is abolished. I have never known Mr. Ormsby wanting in firmness; he has always insisted on having his orders carried out. I do not believe Mr. Ormsby capable of carrying out anything unjust, tyrannical, or unkind. He could not be so without it being known. Mr. Pendrill was in the habit of taking refreshment at my own quarters. He had been in the habit of breakfasting and dining with Mr. Ormsby at first; that ceased, and he then took his refreshments with me. I have seen Mr. Ormsby receive the Sacrament. I never saw in any penal settlement the sabbath kept with more propriety, and I have been on a good many.

John Smith, Coxswain of Boat, examined:—

J. Smith.
13 Nov., 1857.

Has been three years coxswain of visitors' boat. Our duty is to go in for Magistrate, Priest, Parson, Visiting Magistrate, and others. The boat has been on picnics: twice to the Heads, once on Garden Island, once to Chowder Bay, and four times up Lane Cove—the party consisting of Mr. Ormsby, and family, and visitors. On such occasions boat away at one or two o'clock p.m., returning at six or seven p.m., and once as late as nine o'clock p.m. During two seasons we have been about eight, nine, or twelve times fishing—the seine was carried in the guard-boat. Once Mr. Ormsby, and his daughters and family, and some military officers went in a boat brought by officers. Three of the police and myself were employed to draw the seine; the fish was divided among proprietors of net. I receive orders direct from Mr. Ormsby. I have carried in fowls to Dr. O'Brien and several of Mr. Ormsby's friends, from Mr. Ormsby. I have taken poultry for sale to Mr. Cummins. I have sold poultry about four times, and received not exceeding 15s. at any one time. I have bought corn and taken it to Mr. Ormsby. No one else has had poultry to sell for Mr. Ormsby but myself. I have taken a present of a turkey to Dr. West, not to any one else. On one occasion I took a party to the island consisting of Colonel Bloomfield and other officers to Mr.

Mr. Ormsby, and brought them back about ten o'clock p.m. I have taken Mr. Ormsby and family to parties at Government House, and to theatre, returning as late as twelve o'clock, or one a.m. I have been away from the island all night, keeping the boat in Sydney. On one or two occasions, when Mr. Ormsby has been at a Government House ball, the boatmen were then allowed to go to their wives who reside in Sydney. They also get leave from Sunday afternoon to Monday morning to visit their wives in Sydney. I never was out all night with the boat on a picnic excursion. When we went to the Heads we started at ten o'clock a.m. and returned at nine o'clock p.m. I remember the occasion of Mr. Pendrill leaving the island in a small boat. I did not tell him the visitors' boat was painting. I was not coxswain then. The visitors' boat was at the buoy, and went a picnic that afternoon—I think it had gone before Mr. Pendrill left the island. The regular weekly duty of the boat is, on Tuesday, to go for Dr. West, Visiting Surgeon; Wednesday, the Visiting Magistrate; Thursday, the Superintendent has the use of the boat; Friday, Visiting Surgeon again; Saturday and Sunday, the Clergymen; Monday is a blank day, and is usually devoted to clean the boat. I have occasionally taken Mr. Ormsby and Mr. Taylor into Sydney on Monday. The visitors' boat is not employed in taking people to the mainland—the guard-boat does that. I have brought in presents of vegetables to Mr. McLerie and Mr. North. I have brought beer in kegs for many people on the island; also wine and spirits in cases for Mr. Ormsby, but not for any one else. The other boatmen are in the habit of bringing parcels, and they might have contained spirits, but never to my knowledge—the bundles were not examined at the wharf. I sold one turkey once for 7s. 6d. I never go to the mainland, nor does the visitors' boat. Bear, and wine, and spirits were brought to the island in Chandler's (or the shop) boat for the free people. That boat brought other supplies. I have seen the Inspector on the wharf when the boat was coming in, and also a sentry, but the boat was never searched. Johnson's boat brings the contract provisions. In addition to the special duties I have detailed, the boat is frequently employed on other duties, for instance, for clergyman or doctor at night. Mr. Ormsby does not always use the boat on Thursday; he has stayed three weeks at a time on the island. Mr. Taylor often goes on official business to Sydney. I have taken vegetables to Mr. Ormsby's son, and left them at Chandler's. I have been the longest in the visitors' boat of any boatmen employed here.

TUESDAY, 17 NOVEMBER, 1857.

Mr. Richard Thompson, formerly Reporter to the Sydney Morning Herald, called in and examined:—

I visited the island of Cockatoo on the occasion of Sir C Fitzroy laying the first stone of the Dock; I was then entertained by Mr. Ormsby. I wrote one letter to the Empire; that in the paper of the 6th October, signed "Third Witness," was written by me. I was on the island subsequently to the above period, for three days; I was there by leave; I left on the third day. Mr. Thomas advised me while there to bathe, and having sent for the key of the bathing house to Mr. Ormsby, he sent it by a prisoner to me; I afterwards declined to bathe, and Mr. Thomas asking the prisoner for the key was refused and abused, and told to go and be damned. I reported this to Mr. Ormsby, who said that Mr. Thomas threatened to kick the mau, which I said was false. Mr. Ormsby added—"that fellow Thomas is always making a piece of work on the island; I have told you his character long ago; when you go to Sydney I shall be much obliged if you report it to Captain McLerie."

Mr. R.
Thompson.
17 Nov., 1857.

I took no further steps in the matter, and do not know what became of it. On another occasion he spoke again to me disrespectfully and offensively of Mr. Thomas; I also, during the three days I stayed on the island, noticed the insolent demeanor of the prisoners towards Mr. Thomas, who said he had reported it again and again, but received no redress.

By the President: Have you anything further to add in support of the facts stated in your letter, and are the facts which you have now stated those which induced you to write—"personally cognizant, as I have been for some years past, of the disgraceful state of the penal island, and of the apathy and neglect which have rendered all reports of the infamous proceedings there mere farces"? Yes, these are the facts which induced me to write that passage; but I would add, since I commenced writing articles for Colonial and Foreign Journals on the subject of the Dry Dock, Mr. Ormsby's manner towards me has changed. Once he met me in the street and said—"What in the name of God are you writing such nonsense about the Dock for? It will never be finished so long as these two impostors, Captain Mann and Thomas, are on it."

By the President: In your letter you write—"I, whilst assuring you that the statements set forth in the form of queries in the letter subscribed 'Another Witness,' which appears in this morning's Empire, are not only true, but that they do not include one tithe of the enormities which have, for years past, rendered Cockatoo Island a worse hell (if that be possible) than Norfolk Island ever was."—How many of the statements of "Another Witness" can you support of your own knowledge? None; I only knew them from Mr. Thomas and Mr. Duff's statements; and when stating "I was personally cognizant for years," I had no other knowledge but that acquired from three days' residence on the island, and that communicated by others.

By the President: You ask in your letter—"Was it not known to every officer and convict on the prison side of Cockatoo Island, that the man whose death and the mysterious circumstances attending it are alluded to in the letter of 'Another Witness,' was brutally murdered by a fellow convict in sight of other convicts; that the then Coroner, Mr. J. Ryan Brenan, opened the inquest and adjourned it, yet did not resume it; that the body of the murdered man was buried without further inquiry; and that the alleged murderer

Mr. R.
Thompson.
17 Nov., 1857.

"and the witnesses of the murder have since, by the expiration of their respective sentences, been discharged from the island, and are now at large."—Were you on the island at the time the circumstance occurred? I was not, nor did I see the evidence, nor the Coroner's notes.

By the President: On what authority did you make that statement? I was aware that the inquest was not resumed, and no verdict returned. Both Mr. Thomas and Mr. Duff told me that very suspicious circumstances attended the case, and that the man who was supposed to have thrown him down was discharged from the island, and that was the authority on which I made that statement.

By the President: In your letter you write—"On the occasion of the sparring match in the prison yard, alluded to by 'Another Witness,' between two pugilists, each under sentence for felony (Perry the black, and Patrick Sinclair,) were there not, in addition to Mr. Ormsby and his sons, a party of sporting men from Sydney, who visited this penal island just as they would a public Fives Court, or a prize ring?"—Do you know such a state of things, of your own knowledge, to have taken place? No. My statement respecting the sparring match is made from information received from Perry, the black. Some few days ago he told me Mr. Ormsby had never been present at any sparring match; that there had been sparring matches on the island; and that these had been witnessed by the officers of the guard and other gentlemen. Mr. Thomas was my authority for the remainder of that statement.

By the President: Further on in your letter you write—"Has not the son of the Superintendent of Cockatoo Island, who so brutally assaulted Mr. Parkes, on Saturday last—who holds a Government appointment in Sydney, but who sleeps at his father's quarters at Cockatoo Island—has he not, I say, for a long time past, been receiving lessons in pugilism from the abovenamed convict pugilists, both under sentence for heavy crimes; yet Perry being employed as cook, Sinclair as under-cook, so as to afford them time to give their pugilistic lessons?"—Do you know these to be facts? No; I have been misinformed. Perry told me it was not that, but another son who had taken lessons from him; my informant had been Mr. Thomas. It was only the day before yesterday Perry set me to right as to the facts. I had made the statements entirely on Mr. Thomas' and Mr. Duff's authority.

Captain H. H. Browne, called in and examined:—

Capt. H. H.
Browne.
17 Nov., 1857.

I was Visiting Magistrate of Cockatoo from 1848 to June, 1851. The general discipline of the island during that period was, on the whole, good. When I first took charge the means for coercing the prisoners were very bad—the means of reformation also; a large number were crowded together in three dormitories; the overseers lived in temporary huts, on the island; no officer was in charge of the military guard; the number of overseers was insufficient, and some had been prisoners; no lights were kept in the wards. On taking charge the Government, at my request, appointed an officer of the guard, granted some overseers, authorised erection of quarters for the overseers, also lighting the wards, and made arrangements for perfect supervision of wards. I introduced muster and washing days. The berths were subsequently divided, on the recommendation of Mr. E. Deas Thomson. I found rules in operation, some of which were revised during my term of office. I do not recollect any rules laid down for silence being kept in wards—but singing in wards I should have stopped had it been brought to my notice; my impression is, the men after being locked up were allowed to work or read till 8 p.m., and then to be silent.

[Mr. Palmer, short-hand writer, here entered and took evidence.]

1. What recreation was allowed during their leisure hours, after they were turned into the camp? There were no leisure hours, excepting Sundays and Saturday evenings.
2. And meal times? During these hours there was no recreation that I am aware of; during their leisure hours they were expected to wash and mend their clothes.
3. On Sundays? On Sundays they were expected to read, and to conduct themselves in an orderly and quiet manner. The Chaplain visited them once on Sunday, and there were overseers and constables—men who had some idea of religion—who used to read to the men. I always visited the island one Sunday in every month, and mustered every person on the island.
4. Will you tell me in what manner the Superintendent himself obtained leave of absence? By communicating with me, and asking leave; I generally referred his application to the Government, for approval or refusal.
5. How often was that leave of absence obtained? I think he sent in a return once a month, stating the days on which he wished to obtain leave of absence.
6. What number of days would he generally apply for in a month? I think he took very little leave during my time; sometimes he did not obtain leave more than two or three times in a month.
7. Was the specific object of his asking for leave ever stated? I think he has stated on one or two occasions that he wanted to absent himself on Sunday evening, in order to go to Church. I think, to the best of my recollection, that was stated on some occasions.
8. Were there any applications made by him for leave of absence to go on pleasure parties or picnics? I think not; but I never interfered with his object; I simply referred the matter to the Government.
9. The applications for leave were sent to you, and forwarded by you to the Government for their sanction? Yes, it was sanctioned by Government.
10. What boats were on the island at that time? The guard-boat was the only boat I allowed on the island. I think the Superintendent had a small private boat when I first took charge, but I pointed out to him that it was irregular, and he immediately got rid of it.

Capt. H. H.
Brown.

17 Nov., 1857.

11. During your time there was only one boat on the island, which was the guard-boat? Only one; I will not say the whole of the time, for I think when I first took charge of the island the duty of taking the prisoners and the overseers to and fro was managed by the Engineer's boat. The island was formerly under the charge of the principal engineer officer, and when Captain Morley took charge of the department, some correspondence took place between him and the Government respecting the carrying on of the Dry Dock, and Captain Morley decided upon having nothing more to do with it; and it was then placed under the charge of Captain Mann. In consequence of this, all the other changes took place, which brought the Water Police boat into operation as the means of communication with the island. I think for some few months after I took charge of the island it used to be visited by a boat manned by prisoners, or, at all events, part free and part prisoners. That was not under my control, but under the control of the Royal Engineers.
12. By Mr. Merewether: Was there any rule at the time you took charge forbidding any other boats being kept at the island? I am not sure whether there was any rule, but I considered it to be irregular.
13. By the Chairman: If you ordered Mr. Ormsby to get rid of this boat, there must have been some order prohibiting it, I presume? In looking through the book I have here (the letter book produced by the witness) I see that in some correspondence I had with the Colonial Secretary I point out the necessity that there should be no other boat.
14. You believe that during your time no other boat was allowed on the island than the guard-boat? Yes, and the Water Police boat, which I used to employ for communicating with the island, either to take prisoners there or to bring them thence; or to take the Superintendent to or from the island.
15. At present, we are informed, there are three boats—the guard-boat and two others, attached to the island—that is since your time? That is since my time; there was only one boat then, the guard-boat, which was locked up in the shed when not employed.
16. Are you aware whether any young gentlemen, members of Mr. Ormsby's family, lived upon the island at that time? Yes, but they were quite boys at that time; they used to come to Sydney and go back again.
17. Do you know whether there was any leave given for that? No; I think, in his original instructions, the Superintendent had permission to allow members of his family to go on shore. If I remember rightly, his youngest boy was at school, and the second was in some Government office. I think he was almost the only one that came backwards and forwards to the island. The eldest son was a locker in the Customs, was married, and lived in Sydney.
18. By Mr. Merewether: Are you aware that by the regulations no one having daily business in Sydney is permitted to reside on the island? I must say that I did not myself interfere with this boy coming backward and forward. He used to come to the North Shore from the Balmain side of the island in the guard-boat.
19. By the Chairman: You saw no harm in that? I did not. I would not have prevented the Superintendent sending his son to school.
20. With respect to spirits—did you ever give permission to any one to take spirits upon the island, or wine, or beer? In the regulations that were issued to the police, if I remember rightly—
21. Do not say if you remember rightly—you must remember rightly or not at all? It is not easy to go so far back, particularly as I have had no opportunity of refreshing my memory upon these matters (The witness referred to his minute book.) I think there is a rule here respecting spirits. On the 12th February, 1850, in my letter to the Colonial Secretary on the subject of some regulations that were submitted for my report by the Board of Examination which had sat upon the island some short time previous, I see this memorandum, which applies, I think, to spirits as well as to everything else brought to the island:—"Civil officers not to be searched by the guard when the Superintendent or his assistant is present." I say, "I submit the following proposition,—that the civil officers of the island and their families should not be searched by the guard when allowed to land or to leave the island if the Superintendent or his assistant are present at the time." I think that would naturally imply that they were liable to be searched if the police had any suspicion.
22. Did you ever give any permission for spirits to be brought to the island—was any application ever made to you for such permission? I never interfered—Do you mean by any civil officer?
23. Yes? I never had any application made to me. I considered that the Superintendent was responsible for the landing of any spirits.
24. Was any complaint ever made to you of spirits being improperly brought to the island? No, I never had a complaint of the kind made.
25. By Captain Ward: You think the Superintendent generally tried to carry out the regulations with respect to spirits being brought to the island? I never had reason to doubt it; I considered that it was a matter for the exercise of his discretion, and that he should not prevent the families of the civil officers having what was necessary for their comfort, but certainly not what might lead to breaches of discipline.
26. By Mr. Merewether: Will you read the latter part of the regulation referring to the prohibition to free officers to bring spirits upon the island. (The witness read the regulation.) Was such a rule as that in existence during your time? Yes.
27. By the Chairman: Were you ever applied to to relax that rule? No.
28. Did you ever relax it? Never.
29. Was the circumstance ever brought to your knowledge that the engineers, or any person in their employment, were bringing spirits in undue quantities to the island? No. When I was Visiting Magistrate there were very few engineer officers there; that was at a later date.

- Capt. H. H. Brown.
17 Nov., 1857.
30. Was any circumstance ever brought to your knowledge with reference to the refuse rations—the homminy? I gave instructions during the time I was Visiting Magistrate that all the refuse homminy should be destroyed.
31. In what manner? It was usually thrown away into the water on the north side of the island at the back of the kitchen. I did this, because I conceived that it might open the door to charges being brought of frauds committed on the prisoners, if the homminy were not destroyed.
32. Was there any complaint of such a thing having occurred? No; but sometimes there is a great difficulty in boiling homminy; sometimes it will be so bad that the prisoners cannot eat it, and therefore, to prevent the slightest chance of any prisoner being able to say that it was boiled badly for the purpose of being handed over to the free officers to feed pigs and poultry, I directed, that if it were bad, it was to be thrown away; thus, if it were bad, and the prisoners lost their breakfasts, nobody else would gain any benefit by it.
33. At what time did you give that order? Somewhere about 1850—about the time I directed the pigs to be removed from the island. Formerly, pigs were kept on the island, and poultry in large quantities, and about 1850 I directed all the pigs to be removed, and the number of poultry to be kept by each officer to be limited; the Superintendent was included in this order.
34. Was that order obeyed, do you think, during the time you were Visiting Magistrate? I have no reason to suppose it was not.
35. Were any complaints made during that time by the prisoners that their rations were wrongly appropriated? I never had an actual complaint that the rations were wrongly appropriated; but it appeared to me to be a proper precaution to prevent the possibility of such a thing, and, I think, it met the views of the Superintendent.
36. Under whose orders were the police during your time? I generally appointed them, but they were under the Superintendent's orders; there were only about five or six during my time; seven, I think, was the utmost number.
37. During your time were there any deaths among the prisoners on the island? A great number from various causes.
38. Were inquests always held upon those persons who died? No, only in those cases where they met with violent deaths.
39. You are aware that the English rule of law is that an inquest shall be held on every prisoner who dies in prison? Yes, but I understood that that applied only to gaols, and that was not applicable to other penal establishments.
40. Was it during your time that a man died from falling, or being thrown, into the dock? No, I think not.
41. You were a member of the classification Board, I believe? I am still a member.
42. What is the course pursued with reference to a prisoner when he goes to the island—of what does the classification consist? In the first place, there is a perfect record obtained of the previous career of the prisoner.
43. How do you classify the prisoners—according to their crimes, or according to their characters? The classification proceeds according to a rule approved by the Executive Council, the 19th December, 1848.
44. Upon prisoners going to the island they are classified under those rules? Yes.
45. Was their classification ever changed in consequence of anything on the island? Continually, for misconduct, which was reported to me at the end of every month by the task-work clerk, and, according to the nature of the offences of which they were convicted, they were reduced in their classes.
46. Were they promoted to higher classes for good conduct? They were promoted for good conduct.
47. Upon what data were they promoted for good conduct? Their promotion for good conduct depended very much upon the representation of the Superintendent; the overseers came more particularly under his notice than the men in gangs, but the latter were recommended either by the overseers of gangs or the task-work clerk, who recorded the amount of work they had done.
48. It was upon the report of the Superintendent that indulgence was given in that particular? Yes.
49. Do you recollect the circumstance of a prisoner named Fox not being released from the island? I cannot charge my memory with that.
50. Was it in your time or not? I do not remember it.
51. By Captain Ward: At what time were the prisoners generally locked up in the evening? Immediately after their supper.
52. I refer to their being put inside the square? There was no square at the time I took charge of the island; it was merely an open hollow square, without the slightest protection from the prisoners who were allowed to roam all over the island.
53. By Mr. Merewether: The men were mustered from work at what hour? I have frequently seen them marched up from their work to supper, and immediately after they had their suppers marched off to the wards.
54. By Captain Ward: After the hours of business, what were the legitimate hours for recreation? I should not say there was any recreation.
55. Was there not some time between the period of their knocking off work and of going to bed, or being locked up in the wards? Yes.
56. This was their time of leisure—had they any recreation then, or how did they spend their time? They roamed about the square, smoked their pipes, and talked together. After dinner they were allowed to smoke, between the time of finishing their dinners and of being returned to their gangs.
57. During these hours of leisure would you have objected to the prisoners taking recreation in such a way as playing at leap-frog? Yes.

58. By Mr. Merewether: You would have objected to their sparring? I should, decidedly.
59. By Captain Ward: When I ask you whether you would have objected to their taking recreation, I mean, of course, provided it were orderly? I think a prison is not the place for recreation. I should not have advised it to be permitted. I cannot say that it did not take place, but it was never brought under my notice; if it had been I should have objected to it.
60. There were no regulations at the time to forbid orderly amusements? I do not know that there were; but I imagine that the allowing amusements would have been a matter for the exercise of my discretion, and if Mr. Ormsby and myself had disagreed with reference to it, I should have referred it the Government. I say it might have taken place, but it was never reported to me by the Superintendent.
61. There were no regulations at the time to forbid orderly recreations? No there were not, I believe.
62. By Mr. Merewether: Do you think that kind of recreation compatible with prison discipline? I think not.
63. By Captain Ward: Did you, at any time while you were Visiting Magistrate of the island, notice any scenes which would indicate that spirits had obtained free access to the island; for instance, were the prisoners ever found drunk? Yes, there was one case, if not two cases, of the kind, where the question arose respecting spirits; but it was, if I recollect rightly, after the appointment of police on the island, and at that time, in organising the police, we had some difficulty in getting decent men. One or two of the police were, in the first instance, discharged for drunkenness. I think, upon reflection, only one case was brought to my knowledge where spirits had been brought to the island through one of the police. A servant appointed to attend upon the police was found tipsy. I think that is the only case that came to my knowledge, but I have heard it rumored that spirits were left on the island at night. I do not, however, know that as a fact.
64. In this particular case, had you any reason to suppose that the spirits were brought to the island through any negligence on the part of the Superintendent—did he exercise due vigilance to prevent it? No; the Superintendent could not be always at the wharf, and at that time, I think, I acquitted the Superintendent and dismissed the constable, who was the man on guard. I think the spirits were brought by some of his friends in the boat. I did not blame the Superintendent.
65. You say that during your government you ordered that no private boat should be left on the island? Yes.
66. Then how was it supposed that the Superintendent would get to Sydney and back to the island on his own private business? He informed me by letter on what days he wished to go to Sydney, and as I usually visited the island twice a week, he used to say, I should like the boat to be at the island at eleven o'clock, twelve o'clock, or any other time, and I took care that the boat should be sent for him. It was sufficiently large to take himself and family, and he was allowed to use it.
67. Was he allowed to have this boat by the Government on his own private business, according to your understanding? No, I did not allow him to have the boat for his private business; he applied for permission to leave the island, and I sent the boat to bring him to Sydney, and to take him back.
68. Did he apply for it on official business? He only applied to be allowed to leave the island on certain days, and on those days I gave him the means of coming to Sydney and of returning to the island.
69. If he had applied to come to Sydney on his private business would you have allowed him to have had the boat—is the Superintendent authorised to employ the boat one day of the week upon his private business? During the time I was Visiting Magistrate there was no boat attached to the island absolutely; but * * * * * and with that I manned a four oared boat, and that boat was, to all intents and purposes, a Water Police boat. It used to go armed with carbines, cutlasses, and everything in the same way as a boat employed by the police. That boat went for the Superintendent, took prisoners to, or brought them from the island, and only went and came as directed by me.
70. Do you consider that the Superintendent after being allowed any boat on the island was authorised to use that boat, if he got leave one day of the week upon his private business—I want to know if when he wanted to go to Sydney on his private business he was allowed to use the boat? Yes; he went to Sydney on his private business. When he obtained leave he might do what he liked till he came back again.
71. When he applied to you, and informed you that he wished to leave the island, the boat went for him and took him back to the island at what hours he liked? Yes.
72. Even if he went on his own private business? Yes.
73. By Mr. Merewether: But it was not at his disposal all the time? No. I know Mr. Ormsby complained very much; he thought it a very great hardship to be so completely shut up in an island of that kind without having a boat at his control whenever he thought proper.
74. By the Chairman: Did you ever authorise Mr. Ormsby to take the boat for pleasure parties or picnics? He never asked me for it.
75. And you never authorised him to employ it for such purposes? I am sure I never authorised it.
76. By Captain Ward: Have you ever known the Superintendent to confine prisoners for misconduct, and to release them again upon his own responsibility, without bringing them before the Visiting Magistrate? I dare say there might have been one or two cases of the kind, but it was not a general principle.
77. Was such a complaint ever brought before you by any of the prisoners or subordinate officers? I do not think he ever did so; when he considered it necessary to confine a prisoner he never released him till I came to the island; if he then begged him off, in consequence sequence of his previous conduct on the island, which might have been the case, I might have acceded to his request, but I do not think he went so far as to release prisoners without bringing them before me.

78. The case was handed over by him to you to be adjudicated upon? Yes.

79. You spoke of the reformation of prisoners—was there any power in the clergyman to have a prisoner kept off work for the purpose of mental improvement, for reading, writing, or other similar occupation? One of the prisoners, I think, acted as clerk to the clergyman who visited the island, and he had some exemption from duty, in order that he might attend in the hospital and read to some of the prisoners who were sick.

80. Generally, is the clergyman allowed any discretion to recommend prisoners to be kept off the works? No; I do not think it was done in my time.

81. By Mr. Merewether: Do you consider it absolutely necessary, from the experience gained by you during the time you were on the island, that there should be a boat attached to the island, what you call a visitors' boat—that there should be any such communication established? My impression on that point is, that it is very advisable there should not be a boat. I have had many conversations with Mr. Ormsby upon the subject, and I believe he agreed with me frequently in the views I advocated, that the less the means of communication with the prisoners the better. There were police on the island who were attached to the boat, and, as we know the class of people to which many of the police belong, it was not unlikely that they would be the means of communicating between the prisoners and their friends in Sydney. In order to guard against any evil from this cause, while I was Visiting Magistrate I would not allow the Water Police to land upon the island, or to mix with the island police. As soon as I landed they were sent off the island to the barge.

82. Was there any complaint of inconvenience from the officers as to the want of a boat? Yes, they all thought it very hard that they should be placed at such a distance from Sydney, and be obliged to depend upon me for the means of communication. I agreed that it was a hardship, but I believed that the public service was benefited by the arrangement. I know Mr. Ormsby complained of it very much.

83. You think, for the convenience of the officers, it is desirable that a boat should be attached to the island, but that for the public service it is objectionable? Yes.

84. What is your general opinion of the mode in which Mr. Ormsby carried on the management of the island? As far as I saw, during the long period that I was Visiting Magistrate, although we might have differed upon some points, he generally performed his duty in a very satisfactory way. We were always upon the very best terms, although we were, on duty, as distant as if we had never known each other; and when I felt it to be my duty to complain, I did complain, and I found that Mr. Ormsby attended to my directions.

85. You were generally satisfied with Mr. Ormsby's management of the island during the time you were there? Yes. I think he had a very difficult task to perform; and with the means and appliances at his command when he first went there, I think it redounds much to his credit that he was able to keep the people in the order he did.

John McLerie, J.P., was called in and examined, as follows:—

J. McLerie,
J.P.

17 Nov., 1857.

1. By the Chairman: You are the Visiting Magistrate of Cockatoo Island? I was.

2. You succeeded Captain Browne? Yes; I succeeded him in June, 1851.

3. In what state did you find the island in point of discipline? Very good.

4. What was the conduct of the prisoners? Very good, generally; there were exceptions occasionally.

5. Did you know of the existence of the rule established by Captain Browne for the destruction of refuse rations—that is to say, the sweepings, or what was left by the men after breakfast or dinner—are you aware that there was in existence any rule for throwing away the refuse? I cannot, at this moment, recollect. I know that when I had charge of the gaol at Darlinghurst I had a rule to that effect.

6. Are you aware that this refuse homminy was disposed of in any particular manner? I am not aware.

7. You do not know what became of it? I do not recollect that the matter was ever brought under my notice in any way. [The minute book was produced]

8. By Mr. Merewether: Did you ever see this minute book—it was opened by Captain Browne about the time he took charge? I never read this minute book. I kept one myself; or, rather, carried on this from the time I took charge.

9. You were not aware of the entry at the foot of the page, which directs that the refuse homminy shall be thrown away? No, I do not recollect ever seeing that before.

10. By the Chairman: Perhaps you can charge your memory with this—whether you authorised any other disposition of it? Not to my knowledge.

11. Did you ever order it to be distributed among the free overseers for their stock? If I did it will be found in my minute book; all my orders were entered there.

12. What were the rules with reference to the conduct of prisoners in their wards—were there any rules in existence in your time with reference to that? You mean after being locked up?

13. After being locked up? Yes, there were rules, and I think I made some change in them that I thought might be an improvement. I employed wardsmen under the free overseers outside, who were responsible for the conduct of the prisoners.

14. Was there anything like singing in the dormitories? After being locked up they were allowed to talk, but not after a certain hour.

15. What was that hour? Eight o'clock, I think.

16.

16. Were there any rules as to their conduct, during work, as to silence? The silent system was not enforced, but no improper language was allowed.
17. During their leisure hours was any recreation allowed? When I first took charge of the island they were allowed to make cabbage-tree hats in their spare hours.
18. By Mr. Mercwether: Will you explain what you mean by their spare time? When not employed on the public works under the engineer.
19. What were the hours? The hours varied according to the season of the year.
20. By the Chairman: During some portion of their meal hours did they make cabbage-tree hats? Yes, at any time when they were not employed otherwise.
21. After being locked up? Yes.
22. Before eight o'clock? Yes; before the hours fixed for silence.
23. They were allowed to make straw or cabbage-tree hats at these times? Yes, at that period.
24. How long did that continue? I think it was discontinued in 1853.
25. On account of some objections having been made to it? Yes.
26. Were these objections which you yourself entertained? Yes; I was very glad when the Government did away with it.
27. You thought it open to abuse? Yes.
28. Were recreations, such as singing, dancing, leap-frog, allowed during the time they were not employed on the public works? Innocent amusements of such a kind as leap-frog, so long as the amusements were not too boisterous, or offensive, or likely to lead to a breach of discipline.
29. You considered that allowable? Yes.
30. On Sundays would the same recreations have been allowed? Not on Sundays, certainly.
31. In what manner did the Superintendent obtain leave of absence when he required it? On the first of every month an application was made to me from the Superintendent, which application I forwarded to the Governor General for his approval. In this application the Superintendent mentioned the days on which he wished to leave the island, and as, from various causes, principally on account of the public service, it was not sometimes convenient for the Superintendent to leave the island on the days allowed by the Governor, I found it necessary, shortly after I took charge, to add the words, "and if any of the days so named should be found inconvenient on account of the public service, such other days in lieu thereof as may be approved by the Visiting Magistrate."
32. And, except with that permission, the Superintendent could not leave the island? No.
33. In what manner did he avail himself of the permission—when he did leave how did he get to Sydney and back again to the island? He was allowed to make use of one of the boats, one of the guard-boats.
34. Was that a boat sent for him? No; all the boats belonging to the island remained there.
35. What boats were then allowed? The guard-boat. The visitors' boat, although not unserviceable, required extensive repair, and I applied to the Government for a new boat, which was given. After the other boat was repaired, it was retained as a supernumerary boat, in case of any accident to either of the others.
36. So that there are two visitors' boats in fact? There was one before, but it was an occasional boat.
37. By Mr. Mercwether: Was the visitors' boat established on your taking charge? In Captain Browne's time the visitors' boat was part of the Water Police establishment, and Captain Browne had two additional men allowed him for the purpose of that boat.
38. Was that arrangement radically changed when you took charge? Yes; there were four men placed in the boat as a crew.
39. By the Chairman: Thenceforward that boat was called the visitors' boat? Yes.
40. The other boat was called the old boat, and the third the guard-boat? Yes. Sometimes the old boat was required on Sundays, as one of the clergymen lived on the North Shore and the other in Sydney, and two boats were sometimes employed.
41. Was this old boat that was unserviceable, and afterwards repaired, the old police boat? Yes.
42. Then, in one of these boats the Superintendent would come to Sydney when he had leave? Yes.
43. With respect to spirits—was there any restriction as to bringing spirits to the island? There were orders against it; but I found after the number of civil officers increased, and people connected with the Engineer's Department, that it was a restriction they would not assent to. There was a Board appointed, and the rule was modified.
44. Then there was a rule in existence against bringing spirits to the island? Yes; but when the number of free officers connected with the Engineer's Department increased on the island, they would not submit to the restrictions imposed by these regulations. There was a modification of the rule made by a Board appointed, of which two of the gentlemen now present were members.
45. Do you remember receiving a letter from Mr. Ormsby, of which this is a copy? (The copy of a letter was handed to the witness, and was read as follows):—

J. M. Lorio,
J.P.
17 Nov., 1857,

" Cockatoo Island, 19 September, 1853.

" Sir,—I have the honor to enclose you two reports made to me by Acting Inspector "Finnucane, relative to the conduct of the free mechanics employed under the Civil Engineer, "by which you will perceive that they are not under any control, and presume to commit "themselves in a manner that persons dare not do in Sydney. From the repeated misconduct "of these men, and no notice whatever having been taken of it, I am half inclined to think that "the Government do not wish to have them interfered with; had it not been that the wives

J. McLerie,
J.P.

"of the Messrs. Hodgekiss were with them, and the hour so late, I certainly would not have allowed them to land.

17 Nov., 1837.

"Mr. Warwick was, also, I am informed, in a state of drunkenness yesterday, walking about the island. The noise and bad language made use of by Mr. Hodgekiss was disgraceful, and ought not to be tolerated at a penal settlement. I trust you will at once take measures to prevent a repetition of such conduct; for, if persisted in, and an example is not made of some person, all control, not only of the free officers of the island but also of the prisoners, will be lost. This is the same man who was connected with the wheat transaction. I think that Mr. Mann ought to send his boat on Saturdays and Sundays for the accommodation of those men, as our boat is constantly employed by them on these days.

"I have, &c.,

"CHARLES ORMSBY,

"Superintendent.

"Jno. McLerie, Esq., J.P.,

"Visiting Magistrate."

Yes, I received a good many communications of this kind with reference to the conduct of these people who arrived on the island

46. Then, in fact, Mr. Ormsby did represent to you that irregularities occurred? Yes, and I brought it under the notice of Government, and in consequence of similar representations the Board was appointed, and the modifications were made.

47. Did any one ever ask you for permission to land spirits—I mean the free overseers. You are aware that by one of the regulations of the Government no spirits can be landed without permission of the Visiting Magistrate—were you ever asked for permission? I think there is an exception; I never had such an application from a subordinate officer.

48. Do you know whether spirits were brought to the island without such permission? I cannot say.

49. Was it ever reported to you that spirits were unduly imported to the island? I think I recollect on one occasion some report having been brought to me that a bottle of wine had been found in possession of one of the police. Mr. Ormsby informed me of it, and said the man was unwell, and I told the Inspector not to take notice of it, as it might be looked upon as medicine.

50. Was there any complaint that spirits were brought freely to the island? There were no complaints but I was convinced that spirits were brought, as on one or two occasions I had to punish prisoners for being drunk.

51. Therefore you were satisfied that spirits got to them? Yes. There is one thing I ought to mention in justice to the authorities—the officers of the island. We found on one occasion spirits in a "plant," as it is called. After the prisoners are recalled to their barracks, the sentries are withdrawn from the shores of the island, which are thus left unprotected, and boats can land; spirits may then be planted among the rocks in positions with which, by preconcerted signals, the prisoners may be made acquainted.

52. By Mr. Merewether: By what means? By people coming over in the boats. After the evening the sentries are drawn around the prison, and the shores are all exposed; and I have no doubt that other prohibited articles, besides spirits, are left in the same way.

53. By Captain Ward: Can you suggest any means of stopping such things in future? Nothing but a cordon of sentries, and that would be rather expensive.

54. By the Chairman: You think that the prisoners need not resort to the boats which visit the island during the day for the means of conveying spirits to them, so long as their friends could have access to the island by night and conceal them where they would be able to get them when they wanted? No. Of course the officers are always on the look out for such things, but on such an extensive island it is easy to elude their vigilance.

55. By Mr. Merewether: Are not all the prisoners concentrated on one part of the island for work? No; they are all round the island.

56. So far as my observation has served me when I have been on the island, they have all been concentrated upon one point? There are nearly a hundred prisoners who are not on the works, who are variously employed as servants to the officers, cooks, and sentries.

57. But outside of all of them there is a cordon of sentries? These are called in at night.

58. You do not appear to see the point of my question. If there is a cordon of sentries in the day, these men can have no access to the shore, as if they break the line the sentries are at liberty to shoot them? But they do not break the line. When the prisoners are withdrawn the sentries are drawn round the prison, therefore the shores are left exposed; by previous arrangement parties come to the island at night and plant the spirits, which the prisoners take the next day.

59. By the Chairman: How could they go to get them the next day? Supposing a prisoner to be leaving the island to-day and coming to Sydney as a free man, he might make an arrangement with his previous comrades to plant spirits in a certain place.

60. In what manner would the prisoner get down to the place? It would be left in such a way that the prisoner would have access to it.

61. But, as Mr. Merewether said, he would have to break the line of the sentries to get to it? Suppose two men are working at a certain stone and one of them is to be set free to-morrow, he says to his comrade, "If you look under this stone the day after to-morrow you will find something." The man would then deposit it in the place agreed upon inside the lines. One of the reasons of my looking upon Cockatoo Island as an objectionable place for a penal establishment was that it was so near Sydney; and, therefore, so easy of access by the companions of the prisoners.

62. Are you of opinion that it is next to impossible to prevent spirits being conveyed to Cockatoo by that mode? Yes; the only limit being the want of means on the part of the prisoners to purchase them.

63. The police of the island are, I believe, under your orders? They were.

64. Did they ever complain to you of spirits being brought to the island in the island boats? I do not remember. J. M'Levie, J.P.
65. Are you aware whether the police did their duty in searching the boats? They had their orders. There was a complaint made by Mr. Ormsby—something about a package of his being searched for spirits; that was about the time that the rules, as applicable to the Engineer's Department, were modified. 17 Nov., 1857.
66. Are you aware of the fact whether the boats were searched or not? I cannot be aware of the fact.
67. Are you aware whether the police had or had not a copy of the regulations? They had a copy of the regulations.
68. Of the new regulations? The old regulations were in the book, and every officer had them read to him before he was sworn in.
69. They were the old regulations? There was no change in the police regulations.
70. Was there not this important difference in the two regulations, that the police were under the Superintendent in the old regulations and under the Visiting Magistrate in the new—will you read that? (A copy of the regulations was handed to the witness.) I see that, but they were under me before.
71. But they appear to be under Mr. Ormsby in the old regulations? Yes; he had a certain control on the island, but I did not assume any more authority after the new regulations than I did before.
72. Had they a copy of these regulations with the alteration to which your attention has been directed—do you remember one of the policemen applying to you for a copy of the regulations and being refused—Constable Scott, for instance? I do not think it likely any constable ever applied to me for a copy of the regulations.
73. Did you ever make such an answer as this, upon an application being made to you for the regulations—"Your instructions are that you are to obey the orders of your superior officer"? Yes, I do remember the circumstance now. At the time these regulations came out the rules for the police, as drawn up, were not applicable to the body as it then existed, but to a smaller number; the rule as to posting sentries did not apply. I had intended to bring this matter under the notice of the Government, and to have the rule changed, and before I did so, I remember the Inspector asking for the rule, and I said, "for the present obey the orders you receive." But these rules, with that exception, ought to have been in the possession of the police, and I am not aware that they were not.
74. By Mr. Merewether: It is the fact that a change was made in the rule that refers to the management of the police, and that the name of the Superintendent was scratched out and that of the Visiting Magistrate inserted? That did not affect my responsibility in the least.
75. But did it not render it necessary that the rules should be placed in the hands of the police?
76. By the Chairman: All we want to know is whether an application was made to you by the policeman for a copy, and whether you declined to give it him? I did not decline; I remember giving him the answer I have just been reminded of. I intended to have brought this point under the notice of the Government, and when I was applied to by the Inspector, I said, "for the present obey the orders you receive."
77. Did any deaths occur on the island while you were Police Magistrate? Frequently.
78. Were inquests always held upon them? Yes.
79. According to your recollection? Yes.
80. By Captain Ward: This same Constable Scott applied to Mr. Ormsby for the regulations, and he declined to give them—was it under your authority he declined to give them or not? I do not know whether he heard what passed.
81. You declined to give them because they were not perfect in certain details—was Mr. Ormsby cognizant of that? I remember having a conversation with Mr. Ormsby as to the change necessary to meet the altered number of the police.
82. Had Mr. Ormsby any authority, direct or indirect, to refuse these regulations until they were altered? Not to refuse them.
83. When Inspector Dunning applied for them, do you think Mr. Ormsby ought to have given them to the police? He was perfectly aware that I was about to apply to the Government to make the alteration in the rule.
84. By the Chairman: But you never did obtain that alteration? No; I left the island about that time to obtain my present appointment.
85. You gave no authority to Mr. Ormsby to refuse him; if the Inspector were refused it was not by your authority? No, not by my authority.
86. You never gave the Inspector a copy of the regulations? No.
87. Then the Inspector was left without the new regulations? Yes; for the reason I have stated.
88. Do you remember the death of a man named Dunmore? Not by name.
89. He was a young man who died in the hospital of inflammation of the lungs; a memorial was drawn up and signed by some of the prisoners charging the dispenser with having sent him to the exempt ground and thereby exaggerated disease; that he was taken to the hospital and died two or three days after? If such a charge were made against the dispenser, I have no doubt I handed it over to the Visiting Surgeon.
90. It was in March, 1856—were you Visiting Magistrate then? Yes; but I do not remember the circumstance.
91. Do you remember a person on the island named Merewether? Yes.
92. Can you tell us what sort of a character he was? On the island he was a man who gave me some trouble, and I was obliged to punish him for a breach of the regulations.
93. In what respect? He was a good penman, and a short time after he had been on the island I appointed him assistant to the task-work clerk, where he was not mixed up with the other prisoners, and I found that he had been encouraged by the wife of an officer then on

J. McLerie,
J.P.

17 Nov., 1857.

on the island to go to her house and write letters, which she or her servants conveyed to the town, which was a breach of the regulations.

94. What officer was that? Lieutenant Davis, of the 11th.

95. Was there anything else against this man? Well, there was a suspicion which, perhaps, I should not mention, of impropriety of conduct in another way—there were grounds of suspicion.

96. In consequence of these grounds of suspicion, what did you do? I sent him back to labor with the other prisoners.

97. It was not a suspicion of such a nature as to induce you to confine him separately? No; it did not amount to that.

98. Do you remember a prisoner of the name of Groom on the island? I do not remember him at all. I may also mention that Merewether was a man of a superior class to the prisoners generally, and was a kind of leader in all sorts of complaints.

99. Do you remember his being at the head of a deputation about a man who was said to have been ill-used by the dispenser? Yes; I remember, on one occasion, Merewether did come with another man to the office.

100. Do you remember that occasion, and whether you inquired into the circumstance complained of or not? If I knew the date I would refer to my minute book—to the best of my recollection I referred the matter to the Visiting Surgeon. (The witness referred to his minute book.) Here is the entry, the 13th April—"George Stokes, Joseph Murphy, John Merewether, Henry Snelgrove, Charles Skerritt, and John Clarke, were admonished for making certain statements against the dispenser, Mr. Peers, which, upon investigation, turned out to be without foundation."

101. Generally, as to the management of the island, were you satisfied with the discipline of Mr. Ormsby? Yes, generally.

102. Do you think he was a man who carried the regulations of the island generally into effect? Yes.

103. Was he firm in the discharge of his duty or pusillanimous? I always considered him firm; that was a quality which I considered he possessed in an eminent degree.

104. Was his treatment of the prisoners kind and humane or the contrary? If I had any fault to find with him, it was that he was almost too humane.

105. His system was rather of the mild than of the severe order? Yes.

106. Have you any fault to find with his system as being unreasonably mild, or was he given to favoritism or partiality? No.

107. Was there any such charge against him during your time? In an establishment of that kind, where there are berths, as they are called, to be given, it was almost impossible to avoid the charge of partiality. I made the appointment, as Visiting Magistrate, but the prisoners were under the impression that the men appointed were recommended by Mr. Ormsby.

108. Have you had complaints of partiality made? I have had complaints.

109. If any complaints were made, did you inquire into them? I satisfied myself by referring to the previous history of the parties, and their conduct on the island.

110. Were you satisfied that Mr. Ormsby had acted rightly? Yes; there may have been occasions where I have found fault with Mr. Ormsby.

111. Are you aware whether persons have ever slept upon the island who did not belong to it, with or without the permission? Not without it.

112. Were you in the habit of giving permission occasionally? The only instances where I departed from the rules were, when the wives of free officers have been confined, and have required nurses; in such cases I have given permission to their relatives, or other persons, to come to the island to nurse.

113. Are you aware whether the regulations were carried into effect with reference to the number of fowls, and other animals, allowed to be kept on the island by the Superintendent and officers? I was aware that a regulation did exist as to the number to be kept. I have asked Mr. Ormsby whether the number was exceeded, and he has replied that it was not.

114. You knew nothing upon that subject yourself? I never counted the poultry, but Mr. Ormsby told me that the regulation was carried out.

115. Do you know what became of the poultry, or any part of it—it has been suggested to the Board that you have had a present now and then? I had a present once. Mr. Ormsby had a very handsome description of Cochin China fowls some few years ago, and was kind enough to send me one of each sex on one occasion.

116. And a turkey upon another? I do not recollect—it may have been the case, but it must have been a long while ago. I recollect Mr. Ormsby requesting me to accept a cock and hen of the Cochin China breed, which was then so much in request.

117. I put these questions at the request of Mr. Ormsby. Do you remember the circumstance of Mr. Ormsby asking leave for the boat to go a-fishing? I do.

118. One more than one occasion? Yes. Mr. Ormsby said the policemen had, in their leisure hours, made a net, and he asked me would I have any objection to their fishing in the bay in one of the spare boats. I gave him that permission when the police were not on duty.

119. More than once? More than once.

120. Do you know the circumstance of young Mr. Ormsby living on the island? Mr. Ormsby was Clerk of the Bench at Wollombi, and the Government at that period gave him an appointment at the Treasury in lieu of it; and Mr. Ormsby said, as his son was in a Government office, and living in Sydney, he should be glad if he could be permitted to live upon the island. I spoke to the late Governor, Sir Charles Fitz Roy, upon the subject, and he gave permission.

121. Are you aware that two of his sons lived upon the island? Yes; that was with the permission of Sir Charles Fitz Roy.

122. Are you aware that they kept a boat? Yes; that was mentioned also. On one occasion, coming from the island with Sir Charles Fitz Roy, we met his sons in their boat. J. McLerie,
J.P.
123. Was that under the sanction of Sir Charles Fitz Roy? Yes.
124. Are you not of opinion that the keeping of boats at the island was subject to great abuse? It was perfectly understood by Mr. Ormsby that if it were found to lead to any abuse it would be immediately stopped; but I do not believe it was ever abused. 17 Nov., 1857.
125. He was informed of that? Yes.
126. And the young men were also informed? Yes.
127. You have no reason to suppose that it was abused at all? I have no reason.
128. By Captain Ward: With respect to the days when Mr. Ormsby had the use of the visitors' boat to come to Sydney, was he allowed to have the use of it for the whole day? There was no rule with regard to the visitors' boat; but it was perfectly understood that when the boat was not required for the purpose for which it was granted it was at the service of Mr. Ormsby.
129. When he applied for the boat for a certain day, was it left at his disposal for the whole of that day? Provided it did not interfere with any public duty.
130. By Mr. Merewether: That was your regulation? There was no regulation.
131. By Captain Ward: Captain Browne kept it as his own boat? Yes; he was the executive officer of the Water Police, and required it himself; I did not require it for any purpose.
132. We are told that up to eight o'clock singing was allowed in the wards—can you justify that? I have already answered that question—that I did not discourage innocent amusement; and so long as there was nothing offensive or disgusting in the song, I should not have objected. I was anxious to introduce reading among them during their leisure hours.
133. By Mr. Merewether: Singing and reading are two very different things—do you think amusement of that kind should have been allowed? I have said I should not have objected to it if the songs were not of an offensive character.
134. By Captain Ward: We are told that presents of clothing have been sent to the prisoners—was that during your time? Whenever an application was made to me by the friends of prisoners to be allowed to send under-clothing for the winter I permitted them to do so; but I allowed no article to be worn that changed their external appearance.
135. Small articles, as neck-ties? I have allowed woollen comforters, mufflers, worsted socks, and drawers; but I have never allowed any change in the outer garb of the prisoners.
136. I do not think you have stated how long you were Visiting Magistrate of Cockatoo? I was appointed in June 1851, and I ceased on my appointment to my present office, in October 1856.
137. I want to get some sort of opinion from you with respect to the regulations being refused by Mr. Ormsby to Inspector Dunning, whether he was aware of your having first refused the regulations, and of the grounds of that refusal? I cannot answer that question. When I was asked by Dunning for the regulations I cannot say whether Mr. Ormsby was within hearing or not.
138. Do you consider that Mr. Ormsby ought to have given these rules to Mr. Dunning when he required them? I can see no reason why Mr. Ormsby should not have given them, subject to the alterations I have referred to.
139. By Mr. Merewether: I should like to thoroughly understand under whose control the visitors' boat was—was it under yours or Mr. Ormsby's? It could not be under my control, for I never saw it, except on the days that I visited the island.
140. Then, am I to understand that under your administration he had the entire control over it, except when employed to fetch yourself, the Visiting Surgeon, or the clergymen? Yes.
141. You left it under his control? Yes; I could not have the control when I was in Sydney. To shew that I did not look upon it as a boat exclusively for the officers for whom it was purchased, there is a memorandum, in my writing, to the effect that on all occasions when there was a spare seat in the boat any free officer going to or coming from the island should have the use of it. It was a boat for the use of the free officers of the island, as well as for visitors.
142. Was that the object for which it was voted? It was for the conveyance of the visiting officers who did not reside on the island.
143. Then you thought you did not depart from the rule by extending its use to the free officers on the island? Certainly.
144. By Captain Ward: Did you recognise Mr. Ormsby's using the boat when it was not required for the public service? Yes.
145. Without your leave having been previously asked? Yes. Mr. Ormsby could only use the boat on days when he was authorised by the Governor General to leave the island.
146. You are not aware whether he ever left upon any other days than those for which he obtained leave? I do not believe Mr. Ormsby ever did; I have no reason to suppose he would infringe his orders.
147. It must have been during your time he went to Chowder Bay? It was.
148. That was by your permission? Yes.
149. By Mr. Merewether: Did you give Mr. Ormsby permission to go with the boat to Chowder Bay? Mr. Ormsby asked whether, instead of coming to Sydney on the day for which he had obtained leave, he might go to Chowder Bay.
150. Had you the power to give that permission? That is a question which remains for the Government to decide. I presume I had the power.
151. Then, in case of any diversion of the boat from its ordinary uses, it was necessary for Mr. Ormsby to apply to you for leave? Yes; but I have taken prisoners over in the boat myself.
152. That was for the public service? Yes.
153. Whose duty was it to inspect the boats arriving at and leaving the island—from your recollection?

- J. M. Leric, J.P.
17 Nov., 1857.
- recollection? I think there was a former order—either the Superintendent or Deputy Superintendent.
154. You are not aware whether that is carried out? I am aware that every boat approaching the island has been reported to the Superintendent when I have been there.
155. You are not aware whether the regulation has been carried out—and the Superintendent himself has been present when the boat has arrived? I am perfectly satisfied he could not have been in many instances, because at the time the boat arrived he has been engaged with me.
156. Whose duty was it to be present? Under former orders, the Superintendent or his deputy.
157. You say that young Mr. Ormsby was allowed to have a boat, and that there were three other boats—do you think it advisable there should be so many boats attached to a penal establishment—are not the facilities for bringing spirits and other forbidden articles to the island thereby increased? I do not think so, if precautions are taken.
158. Do you think it desirable that there should be frequent communication between the island and the mainland? It is not desirable; but at Cockatoo Island, in its present state, frequent communication could not be avoided. There are two or three boats connected with the Engineer's Department.
159. As far as the statements made to the Board have gone, the people who come to the island are brought in the island boats? That is a mistake.
160. What other boats are there? Watermen's boats; one of the officers of the Engineer's Department lives off the island; he has permission from Captain Mann, who himself has a boat.
161. By Captain Ward: Those boats are sent off to the buoy after the parties have landed, are they not? Yes.
162. By Mr. Merewether: There are other boats than those attached to the penal department of the island constantly going backward and forward? Yes; and this, of course, increases the difficulty of keeping up the penal nature of the island.
163. And renders it still more desirable that the Superintendent, or some one, should be there to receive the boats? The Inspector of Police is always there.
164. By Mr. Dillon: Are there not two other boats, one kept by Mr. Broderick, and the other by Mr. Duff, an officer in the Engineer's Department? Yes, there are two boats connected with the Engineer's Department, besides Mr. Mann's.
165. By Captain Ward: In fact, there is no limit to the boats? No.
166. By the Chairman: In consequence of the proximity of the island to Sydney, you are of opinion that it is not a suitable place for the carrying out of penal discipline effectually? Yes, I have always represented that to be my opinion. In fact I regard Cockatoo Island, at present, as only a slight improvement upon the old stockades of the country.
167. Do you think that the introduction of so many free people under another department (the Engineer's) has increased the difficulty of the management of the convicts? It has. I have always represented that the increase of free people on the island, connected with the Engineer's Department, renders it more difficult to carry out the penal discipline strictly.
168. By Mr. Merewether: Can you mention in what way it increases the difficulty? The more constant communication between the island and the mainland increases the number of visitors to the island; I have sometimes given half-a-dozen permissions in a day to the friends of people on the island.
169. You might have refused those persons who applied to you? I might, but I should not have felt myself justified in doing so. I should not think it fair to treat free officers as if they were prisoners. I have, however, frequently refused people.
- At the request of Mr. Dillon the following regulation was read*:—"The Superintendent is not in any way to interfere with the officers and men of the Civil Engineer's Department; his power being restricted to the officers and men of his own department."

Samuel North, J.P., was called in and examined, as follows:—

- S. North, J.P.
17 Nov., 1857.
1. By the Chairman: I believe you are Visiting Magistrate of Cockatoo Island? I am.
2. And have been how long? Twelve months, exactly.
3. Will you be so good as to tell us whether you are aware that any regulation existed with reference to refuse rations at the time you took charge? I am not.
4. You are aware that there was an old order of Captain Browne's that the refuse rations should be thrown away? I have heard there was such an order, but I am not aware.
5. What was the practice at the time you took charge—what became of the surplus rations? I was not aware there was such an order until it was brought under my notice.
6. Until a complaint was made of the appropriation, and then you found it had been the practice to distribute them among the officers? Yes.
7. And you put an end to that? Yes.
8. Had you reason to suppose that it occurred afterwards? Yes.
9. Do you know how it came about that the order made by Captain Browne came to be relaxed? No, I never heard a reason given for it.
10. You never heard the circumstances under which that order originated? No.
11. You never knew what became of the surplus rations, or whether they were, or were not, destroyed, until the complaint was made against the Superintendent, which you inquired into, and then made an order that they should be thrown away? Yes; I did so without knowing there had been a former one.
12. As to the kind of recreation allowed to the prisoners during their leisure hours, was any recreation whatever allowed during their leisure hours on Sundays, or at other times when they were not at work? I am not aware of any regulations respecting recreation.
- 13.

13. Did you lay down any rules upon that subject? No.
14. Did you impose any restrictions as to their being allowed to sing, dance, play, wrestle? No; it was never brought under my notice.
15. Did you ever authorise any particular recreations; were you ever asked whether the men might be allowed to sing at night? I have no recollection.
16. Were you ever asked whether the men might be allowed to play at leap-frog? No.
17. Or to wrestle, box, spar? No.
18. Were you ever applied to upon the subject at all? No; I think I heard something said about it, but not in the way of asking my sanction. There is something on my mind about it.
19. Are you aware how they employed their leisure hours? No, I am not.
20. Then you do not attend to anything that is not matter of complaint or adjudication? No; I do not consider I am there for that purpose. I attend to my rules, and have always considered these were matters for the Superintendent to arrange.
21. As to spirits—were there any complaints made to you of spirits coming to the island? No.
22. Did you ever give permission for spirits to come? No; I gave permission this morning for a bottle of porter to go there.
23. Is that the first instance of an application having been made to you? Yes; a paper was brought to me, stating that it was required for a woman who was confined the other day.
24. That is the only occasion upon which an application has been made to you? Yes.
25. Do you think that one bottle of porter has been the supply to the island during the twelve months? No, I do not.
26. Then, as you never gave permission, if it got there it must have done so without permission? Yes.
27. Are you aware that it should be only taken to the island with the permission of the Visiting Magistrate? Yes.
28. By Mr. Merewether: Have you ever been requested to relax the rule prohibiting overseers and subordinate officers bringing spirits to the island on any pretence whatever? No.
29. By the Chairman: In what mode has the Superintendent obtained leave of absence during the time you have been Visiting Magistrate? He always, on the first of every month, names the days on which he wishes to leave the island.
30. This goes through you to the Governor General, and is sanctioned by him? Yes; it is signed by Sir Wm. Denison.
31. In what manner does he avail himself of it—how does he leave the island? In what is called the visitors' boat.
32. You are Water Police Magistrate? Yes.
33. Have you a boat of your own? Yes, for Water Police purposes; but the island boat conveys me to and from the island.
34. Does the Superintendent use it for the purpose of visiting the main when he has leave? Yes.
35. Does he use it without asking your permission? He does not ask my permission; he uses it himself.
36. It is under his authority? Yes.
37. When he has asked leave has it been for the special purpose of a pleasure party, or a picnic? I am not aware that he did ask permission to use the boat for any purpose.
38. Did he ever ask permission to go upon a picnic party? Yes, I think so.
39. Do you know how often, or whether more than once? I recollect one occasion; I think he was going somewhere down the harbour, he asked some officers of the 11th, and he asked me to be of the party; but I was prevented and did not go. I do not remember any other particular occasion, but I think he then went in a steamer; I do not think he used the boat.
40. Did you ever know him to use the island boat for the purpose of picnics? I did not.
41. Is there an Inspector of Police now on the island as well as a Sergeant? Yes.
42. Do you know whether the Inspector of Police ever applied to you for a copy of the regulations? He spoke to me at one time about them.
43. About the new regulations? Those are the only regulations that have been in force during my time.
44. What answer did you give him? I said I would inquire about them. I spoke to Captain M'Lerie and Mr. Ormsby about it, and they said they all knew their orders very well.
45. He asked you for a copy of the regulations, and you did not give it? Yes.
46. You did not tell him to go to Mr. Ormsby? No; but I understood from Mr. Ormsby, or the clerk, that they had the orders posted up.
47. Then you did not tell Mr. Ormsby to give him a copy? No.
48. Do you think he would have asked for a copy if he had one? He might not.
49. Do you remember Gleadall's case? Yes.
50. What was that case? You mean the cause of his dismissal?
51. Yes—he was constable, was he not? Yes.
52. Do you remember whether he ever applied for the regulations? No, I am not aware; I do not think he did.
53. Upon what charge was he dismissed? Drunkenness.
54. Upon whose complaint? The Roman Catholic Chaplain's.
55. Did you inquire into that? I did.
56. Your decision was that he should be dismissed? Yes.
57. Did Mr. Ormsby give evidence upon that matter? I do not think he did; but I could ascertain from the depositions. I think the Roman Catholic Clergyman and the boatmen were the parties examined.
58. Where was the inquiry conducted? At the Water Police Office.

S. North, J.P.

17 Nov., 1857.

- S. North, J.P. 59. By Captain Ward: You cannot say whether Mr. Ormsby's opinion of the man had any influence on that occasion? I am quite sure it had not.
- 17 Nov., 1857. 60. By the Chairman: But, if Mr. Ormsby stated, either upon his solemn affirmation or upon his oath, that the man was not drunk, would not that have influenced you? It might; but a considerable time might have elapsed from the period when he was said to be drunk until Mr. Ormsby saw him, and he might have sobered by that time. I would observe, with respect to that case, that, after hearing the whole of the evidence and the constable's defence, before coming to any decision I placed the whole matter before the Inspector General, and his advice was to dismiss him.
61. That is Captain McLerie? Yes.
62. Do you remember the case of a man named Murray, one of the boatmen, who was suspended? Yes, I remember something about it.
63. Do you know on how many occasions he was suspended? I cannot exactly recollect; I think twice before.
64. And his pay stopped—do you remember that? No; for it was not in my time he was suspended.
65. If any stoppage of pay occurred would it not appear in the abstract? Yes; it is paid to the Police Reward Fund, and a receipt taken from the Treasury for it.
66. If the pay were stopped it would be paid into the Treasury? Yes; into the Police Reward Fund.
67. Do you remember more than one occasion? No.
68. Do you remember his having been suspended by Mr. Ormsby, and not by yourself? No.
69. Could his pay be stopped upon any other authority than yours, or some other magistrate's? No; I should say not. I have never stopped their pay where they have not been legally convicted.
70. Did this man complain to you that his pay had been illegally stopped? No, he did not.
71. By Captain Ward: With respect to the two first occasions, can you say whether his pay was or was not stopped—is there any mode of ascertaining that? The Board might obtain the information from the Treasury.
72. Do you not sign cheques for the payment of every thing that is paid for on the island? I pay in one cheque for the whole abstract.
73. Where is this abstract kept? In the Treasury; a copy is also kept at Cockatoo.
74. Would not the abstract shew if his pay were stopped for any particular week or day? No; the abstract is made out for the full amount of pay, and we send in a separate form for the fines.
75. When the pay is stopped, as a rule it is paid into the Police Reward Fund? Yes.
76. When that is paid in you send in a return with it, and, by comparing that with the pay list, we should be able to ascertain when the pay had been stopped? Yes.
77. Does not the man sign for his full pay? Yes.
78. And it is in his power to refuse to sign if he do not receive full pay? Yes.
79. If he did not sign for full pay they would not pass it at the Audit Office? No.
80. By the Chairman: Do you remember the case of a man named Sadleir, whose pay, it has been said, was stopped? I remember fining a constable named Sadleir.
81. And Cahil? Yes.
82. Did any of these men complain to you of Mr. Ormsby stopping their pay without your authority? They never did.
83. Do you believe that they ever could have done so or ever did? No.
84. Have you ever authorised strangers to sleep on the island? I have, in some instances.
85. Whom did you ever authorise? Some of the near relatives of some of the overseers, or of the police, who have been on a visit, I have allowed to remain during the night. Sometimes, in case of sickness or confinement, a female has gone to nurse her married sister.
86. Do you remember the case of Philip Donohue and another man who absconded for forty-eight hours, and respecting whom there was a suspicion that they had been guilty of an unnatural offence? I do not remember the names of the parties, but I remember a circumstance of the kind being mentioned to me by Mr. Ormsby.
87. Some seven or eight months ago? Yes.
88. Did you inquire into the charge? No, I did not. Mr. Ormsby told me that no evidence could be procured, and I therefore thought it not advisable to bring the matter forward.
89. By Captain Ward: Murray states that he was suspended three times before he was dismissed; that on the first two occasions he was not brought before the Visiting Magistrate, but that his pay was stopped—can you ascertain whether the pay was stopped or not? Yes.
90. By Mr. Merewether: One of the witnesses has stated—"I remember one circumstance of suspicion of unnatural offence. On unlocking the wards one morning it was reported that one man had gone to another's berth. That case was reported by me to the Superintendent, and by him to the Visiting Magistrate, and the charge was dismissed as without foundation"—do you remember the circumstances of that case? I think that must be the case I have referred to, respecting which Mr. Ormsby said he could not bring evidence in support of the charge.
91. There was also a case of suspicion of unnatural offence which arose about a year ago, where one of the prisoners approached another, placed his hand upon his shoulder, and was knocked down. That case, it is stated, was reported to you, and you dealt with it, and punished the man by confinement in the cells—do you remember that case? I have no recollection of that particular case; very possibly it may have taken place. At the time Mr. Ormsby mentioned the circumstance to me he said he had not sufficient evidence, and I approved of not bringing the men forward unless he had, because I think it better not to enter upon such investigations without sufficient evidence.
92. It came out in the evidence of one of the witnesses, that in the boat which brings the recognized luxuries for the prisoners there "are occasionally brought some articles in addition addition to the clothing allowed by Government, as comforters and under clothing? I know S. North, J.P. two or three instances in which clothing has been sent.

93. Sent with your permission? In one case, it was Mr. Jenkins wished to send a flannel waistcoat and comforter to a man who had been his overseer, and I allowed them to be taken. 17 Nov., 1857.

94. You are not aware of their having been taken in the ration or shop boat? No.

95. Is that according to the rules, or is it a matter that should be left to the discretion of the Superintendent? I think it should be left to the discretion of the Superintendent.

96. Do the Inspector and Sergeant of Police apply to you for leave of absence? They have done so; but I think the Superintendent is the person to whom they should apply, unless for any prolonged time.

97. In the face of these regulations, you still think the police ought to apply to the Superintendent? Yes, I think so, in the first instance.

98. Although it is laid down in the regulations that they are under you? Yes; all persons on the island are under the Superintendent.

99. By Captain Ward: Not the Inspector of Police? He takes his orders from him. I send my orders to the Inspector through the Superintendent.

100. The Superintendent has not, according to the regulations, the power to give any orders to Inspector Dunning. The police are placed under the Visiting Magistrate? By the regulations every one on the island is under the Superintendent.

At the request of Mr. Dillon the following rule was read:—“The Assistant Superintendent, overseers, and other subordinate officers of the penal department, will be under the control and immediate orders of the Superintendent, whose instructions they are strictly to obey, and are never to be absent from the island without his sanction.”

101. Have you ever given the Inspector and Sergeant of Police leave of absence at the same time? No, they never asked; I never knew an instance of it.

Mr. William Elyard was called in and examined, as follows:—

1. By the Chairman: What is your office? I am Under Secretary to the Government.

2. We wish to ask you what records the Government have of the boat establishment in connexion with Cockatoo Island? I am not prepared to give the history of the original establishment of the visitors' boat at Cockatoo Island, but I find that some years ago the engineer's boat was used as the visitors' boat. I have here a paper which shews the days on which the various officers were conveyed to the island by the Royal Engineer's boat, and the officers conveyed. I do not know the date of the paper, but it shews that the Visiting Magistrate and Medical Officer were conveyed on different days, and that the Protestant Clergyman, the Superintendent and family, and the Roman Catholic Clergyman and the Deputy Superintendent and family, were conveyed on other days.

3. Can you state what is the earliest definite notice you have of the employment of the boat? The papers to which I have referred do not shew that. The matter to which I have more particularly directed my attention is the complaint of the late Chaplain, the Revd. Mr. Pendrill, but I have not the different regulations under which the boat was employed.

4. By Captain Ward: Can you state whether any discretion is allowed the Visiting Magistrate to permit Mr. Ormsby to use the boat for his private purposes, or whether it is an understanding that he may use it when not required for public purposes?

5. By Mr. Merewether: What was it established for in the first instance—can you tell us when the visitors' boat was first established? I could not; the Visiting Magistrate could give you better information upon that point. It is a matter of long standing, and without searching the correspondence throughout I could not say what has passed on the subject. There is an item in the regulations which refers to the visitors' boat; but those are revised regulations, and, of course, the particular uses of the boat must depend in a great measure upon what had been the practice for a number of years; there is, however, a regulation which refers to the use of the boat. My impression is, that the boat was originally established for the purpose of conveying the Chaplain, the Surgeon, and the Visiting Magistrate to the island, as well as any other officer who might require to go to or from the island. For instance, if Mr. Ormsby wanted to come to Sydney, if the boat were not otherwise employed, I imagine it would be quite at his disposal for that purpose. I imagine, from inquiries made both of the present and former Visiting Magistrates, that it has been the practice when the boat has been carrying the official visitors to take other passengers, that it is not for the exclusive use of any one person for any one time, so long as due regard is had to the convenience of the parties.

6. By Captain Ward: Do you think it was recognised by the Government that Mr. Ormsby might use it for picnics when not required for public purposes? I could not say that.

7. Can you say whether the Government has known of such things, and recognised such an employment of the boat by not taking notice of them? I am not able to say that something may not have occurred, in a long course of years, different from my own impression upon the subject, but by the regulations Mr. Ormsby is to have permission to go off the island, and that permission being given, I should imagine that, for any reasonable purpose, he must have the means of leaving it.

8. Then you think, within reasonable bounds, he may use the boat for his private purposes? Yes, I should say so. I know that the practice was formerly for him to use the boat.

Mr. W. Elyard.
17 Nov., 1857.

MINUTES of Proceedings before the Board appointed to inquire into certain charges preferred against Mr. C. Ormsby, Superintendent of Cockatoo Island.

WEDNESDAY, 27 JANUARY, 1858.

Present:—

SIR W. W. BURTON, KNT.

E. C. MEREWETHER, Esq., | CAPT. E. W. WARD.

Mr. Dillon applied to the Board for a further postponement, on the ground that he had not had an opportunity of revising the answers he had prepared to the charges preferred against Mr. Ormsby.

Mr. Dillon withdrew.

Mr. Ormsby was then called in.

The Chairman: Have you anything you wish to say to the Board?

Mr. Ormsby: I am sorry to state that there is a very disagreeable misunderstanding between Mr. Dillon and myself. I am most anxious to meet the Board. I have no wish to delay. I have every document necessary, in my own view, contained in this paper. (A parcel of documents held by him.) Mr. Dillon wishes to make some alterations in these documents, but I do not know that it is necessary. I have nothing but a simple, plain, unvarnished tale to tell; it is all contained here; and I will refer you to some witnesses, if you wish to call on them, not on my own account, but in order to satisfy the Board, if necessary. I do not like to say much about Mr. Dillon, but there have been some disagreeable circumstances between us, so much so that he has taken serious offence and so have I. I felt this morning, and I have felt for two or three days since I heard the Board had written to Mr. Dillon, that any further tampering with the Board or delay was improper. I am anxious to meet the Board, and Mr. Dillon says if you press it he will come forward with the papers that are here; but if you give him a certain time longer he would be better prepared to discharge his duty according to his own view. For my own part, I have in my hand what I think is a fair and honest statement, and I would be willing at once to hand it in, but I believe Mr. Dillon's great anxiety is from a fear that, as there is an action now pending, we should do anything that would prejudice me in that matter.

The Chairman: You must remember, Mr. Ormsby, that we only admitted Mr. Dillon in order to assist you, and at your request, but we suggested to you, upon more than one occasion, whether the course being pursued was doing you any good; but we must now put it to you whether you are prepared to go on with the case? The Board have come to the conclusion not to delay one day longer. We sent your legal adviser all the points which were to be met, and I have no hesitation to say that I, or any other gentleman of the Board, that any gentleman of the legal profession, or that yourself, might have drawn up a fair categorical answer to those points in two or three days.

Mr. Ormsby: I believe it could be done, and it is done here. (Referring to the papers held by him.)

The Chairman: Are you prepared to go on with the case yourself, or is Mr. Dillon?

Mr. Ormsby: Mr. Dillon is prepared to go on with the case if you press it.

The Chairman: I think you say you have the papers here ready to lay before the Board—have you drawn up any statement?

Mr. Ormsby: I have the charges here, and my answers to them.

The Chairman: What else is required?

Mr. Ormsby: I can refer you, in support of my statements, to officers on the island who have not been examined at all.

Captain Ward: Are you prepared to go on with the case without Mr. Dillon?

Mr. Ormsby: If you will allow me I should wish to call in Mr. Dillon, not because I am not prepared to conduct the matter myself, but there is an action going on, and I am afraid he might withdraw my action.

The Chairman: You are afraid if he were not called in he might withdraw your action?

Mr. Ormsby: He might withdraw himself from conducting it, and cause me great difficulty and expense to put it in other hands.

[Mr. Ormsby withdrew. After a short time Mr. Ormsby and Mr. Dillon were called in.]

Mr. Dillon: I take the liberty of stating, having understood that the Board will not postpone this case, and that therefore I must elect between going into the case, which I am not prepared to do, or abandon it, that of course I will do that which I consider the best mode of discharging my duty to my client, and shall therefore endeavour to convey to the Board my views of the case, and to lay before them whatever documents Mr. Ormsby now proposes to give. I have only to request, as an indulgence, that a gentleman as an assistant may be allowed to sit beside me while I address the Board.

The Chairman: The Board see no necessity for anything of the kind; you have got on hitherto without such assistance, and may do so still. It is now one month since you received the points from the Board, and have had abundant time to prepare your reply.

Mr. Dillon: The first observation I feel it my duty to address to this Board is, that it ought to be, and I respectfully submit to the Board has been, one of the chief matters for their consideration, that whilst the charges forwarded to me to be answered amount to twenty-six, there are none of them, as it appears to my humble judgment, worthy of grave remark, much less of serious censure, or calculated to endanger Mr. Ormsby as a citizen, or in the general line of his character. It is, I say, and I respectfully submit it to you as a matter well worthy of the gravest consideration, and as one of the most impregnable features in Mr. Ormsby's case, that it is most gratifying that he comes before you as a man free from every imputation against his integrity, the slightest against his moral character, against his indulgence in those habits or vices which prevail, if not in this Colony and among official officers of the highest rank in this Colony, at least in every other part of the British dominion where offices of the highest honor are held. I appeal to the convict population, to the infamous community over which his misfortunes have compelled him to preside at a paltry amount of salary for the support of himself and children, not proportioned in any degree to his position, an amount which I am compelled to pay an assistant, if I could get one. I appeal to the infamous residents of that place, some of whom can boast of family names which ought to command respect. I appeal to those ruffians whether he has ever exposed himself to the slightest imputation that could bring him before you as a man of any kind of character beyond that of an unquestioned man of honor; as a gentleman who would faithfully discharge those duties required of him. (Mr. Dillon having become somewhat excited and vociferous, was reminded that gentlemen in the offices adjoining and overhead might be disturbed in the discharge of their duties.)

Mr. Dillon: Your Honor has known me many years, and I would appeal to you, and I have the written testimony of men all but as eminent, who have known me, that even in moments of the deepest distress I have never lent myself to the shielding of dishonesty; that I have never uttered a word that I did not believe to be an honest one; and I would cut my tongue out before for Ormsby, for my very wife, I would state anything but the very truth. And let me remind you—but I need not remind you, for you know it—that without truth, without that purity, that clearness, that light which Heaven gives to every created object, life is not worth enduring, and Government a name for tyranny and corruption. If, from the earnestness of my manner, or the strength of my expressions, I seem to exceed the proper bounds, I trust you will not attribute it to disrespect, or suppose that I have lent myself to any unworthy defence.

Weil, gentlemen, suppose we go to the charges at once—"Singing in the wards." The paper I am now reading contains the answers to the twenty-six charges sent to me by Mr. Merewether on the 24th of December last.

The Chairman: Do you intend to hand that in?

Mr. Dillon: I intend to read it, and to comment upon it as I go along, and then to hand it in. I shall protect Mr. Ormsby and myself from any possible errors in it, by stating this much respecting it:—Some days ago I went to Cockatoo Island to prepare my answers to these charges—that they were delayed before was owing, solely owing, to my belief that I should have had access, with Mr. Ormsby, to the evidence recorded here, so as to pick out of that evidence the facts which I know, or which certainly were stated by the witnesses themselves, as sufficient to answer these charges. If I had had that access, and had thus been enabled to have picked out of the mass of matter that is there the pithy points that would have gone into my statement—and that which alone was pithy and relative to Ormsby—and certainly not be expected would be searched for in the Courts above or the places where this evidence will go, I would have picked out and put in this paper. Having failed in that way—rightly or wrongly I will not attempt to say—but I did not get them. Mr. Ormsby impressed upon me, with a degree of earnestness which frightened me very much—for I have undergone more labor and anxiety in the management of this case than any amount of money would pay me for—Ormsby pressed me with such a degree of earnestness to go into the case, fearing that there might be suspicion raised of some trick or delay on his part, that I devoted one whole day from morning to night in dictating this paper. It was a long paper, and I am lawyer enough to know that, without lending myself to any trickery or evasion, a lengthened paper, like a lengthened letter, or a lengthened affidavit, without a person is on the spot to explain what he meant to convey by it, may leave the person making it open to be picked at by vermin calling themselves lawyers, and I know that there are such vermin here, living upon the corruption, upon the festering wounds, upon the maggots of which they feed. I know that there are men who would do any kind of dirty work, and knowing that, I felt—although I had drawn up that paper myself, had dictated it to Mr. Ormsby's clerk, walking up and down the room with Mr. Merewether's paper in my hand—I felt that it was too grave a thing to go from my hand without being more carefully revised; and, when I left Mr. Ormsby on that day, I ordered that a copy of this should be made, and that I would then finally alter it for settlement, and when I could not get the evidence that was before the Board, I would pick out of my own notes of the proceedings, which extended over eleven days here and four or five days in the Supreme Court, such points as appeared necessary. I devoted Saturday last, from morning to evening, with Mr. Ormsby's clerk in doing that; and I made my arrangements so that everything should be cut and dried, in order that I might attack at once the vulnerable points, and satisfy you on the subject. That arrangement was interfered with, and I have not been able to prepare the revised paper; and Mr. Ormsby now thinks that the paper which was dictated by me at his house is sufficient, and this I shall therefore proceed to lay before you. But I crave of you to bear these facts in mind, so that if there is anything which appears to you as honorable men not to meet the charge as it should for Mr. Ormsby, or if there should be anything stated which you deem unsafe to him, that you will say to me, "Mr. Dillon, we think that is insufficient;" and I will then be prepared to meet your objection. At the same time, let me entreat you, do not visit on poor Ormsby's head the fault that is my own.

Having said so much by way of preface, I do not apprehend that anything more is necessary for me to do than read the charges, and the answers as I drew them up upon the spur of the instant. (Mr. Dillon then proceeded to read the several charges, and answers thereto, thereto, and to comment thereon. Having concluded, he handed in the same, with several letters appended.)

[In the course of Mr. Dillon's address Mr. Merewether left the Board, in order to attend a meeting of the Executive Council.]

The Chairman : Here you must be, in my judgment, and I am quite sure you know enough of me to feel that my judgment is correct, when I tell you that you have done wrong in imputing a course—in imputing motives to one of the members of the Board. It is my duty, as President of the Board, to call upon you to make an apology for that ; and at the same time, in order to exonerate your mind for making that apology, you must take my judgment and my word for it, that there was not any cause or any ground for imputation. The other member of our Board, now absent, has been kind enough to take a great deal of trouble in this matter, and has thus spared us. He has kept the evidence ; he has written the letters, but we have dictated those letters or given the points to him ; he has done all in his own name simply because he wrote the letters which we desired him, but in all that Mr. Merewether did, he simply did what the Commissioners agreed upon, and nothing else. The fact of his name having appeared more prominently in the affair than any of the other members of the Board has, I apprehend, been the cause that Mr. Dillon, from his professional habits, has taken an idea of a bias on his part. Now, my judgment is, that Mr. Dillon has erred very greatly in making three or four insinuations and imputations in the course of these proceedings, and, therefore, I call upon him in express terms for an apology.

Mr. Dillon : I should be wanting in the first duty which I have invariably had in my view in every transaction with men of character, if I did not at once admit the impropriety of insinuating, much less asserting, anything that could give offence, and anything more especially as I now unfeignedly believe, from what the learned Judge has said, that is without the shadow of foundation. I therefore, do most earnestly, and most humbly, but I believe most heartily, and without abating anything of the feelings of a man and a gentleman, apologise to the Board, and more especially to Mr. Merewether as a member of the Board, for having done so.

The Chairman : As to the refusal of a copy of the evidence, it is right we should tell you that Mr. Parkes applied for a copy, and it was refused to him. He has not been allowed to be here while the evidence has been taken, or to have a copy of it ; and for that reason the Board thought it right to refuse it to you, knowing an action was proceeding between you.

WORK PERFORMED BY PRISONERS IN DARLINGHURST GAOL.

(RETURNS RELATIVE TO)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 8 October, 1858.

THE UNDER SECRETARY to THE SHERIFF.

*Colonial Secretary's Office,
Sydney, 16 August, 1858.*

SIR,

I am directed to request that you will be good enough to furnish, at your earliest convenience, a Return of the work performed in Darlinghurst Gaol since 1st January, 1854; specifying the quantity of each kind of work, and the prices either obtained for such work by the sale of the articles manufactured, or the value entered in the book; as also the number of persons employed in its execution.

I have, &c.,
W. ELYARD.

THE SHERIFF.

P.S.—Similar letter to the Visiting Justice of the Gaol, Parramatta, for a Return of the work performed in that Gaol.

RETURN of all work performed by prisoners under sentence in Her Majesty's Gaol, Darlinghurst, since the 1st January, 1854, to present date.

* This is the average number employed weekly during the year; it is impossible to say what number of men were at any particular work or the length of time any individual was at the same occupation, the short sentences of the generality of the prisoners rendering the changes so frequent.

† Throughout these returns the stone cut is charged a uniform price per foot running measure, and this charge includes the cost of setting. If this work had been performed by contract (free labor) the cost would have far exceeded that set down here, as the different kind of stone cut would have been different prices, according to the labor bestowed; thus, the stair steps would have been valued each at one day's labor, 12s. or 15s., instead of being measured by the foot. Reversals, door-steps, window-sills, stones for corridors, would all, by the trade, be extra, and the moulding stone, which in the return for 1858 is charged 3s., would cost in the City 7s. per foot for cutting only, but the uniform price and measurement has been adopted, in order to keep the estimated under the real value of the work done.

BUILDINGS and PORTIONS of BUILDINGS Erected by the Prisoners under Sentence, since the 1st day of January, 1854, in H. M. Gaol at Darlinghurst.

1. Debtor's Prison and Principal Turnkey's House.	Is built entirely of cut stone—48 feet by 40 feet, and 26 feet high—has a slated roof, and contains 8 cells for Debtors, each 8 feet by 12 feet, with a large dining room and 5 rooms, and kitchen for Principal Turnkey, with water-closets and dividing wall. Masons', carpenters', painters', blacksmiths', and slaters' work in this building was done by prison labor during 1854 and 1855.
2. Water-Closets.	Nine stone water-closets in prisoners' airing yards, containing 1,932 feet of stone.
3. Watch-Boxes.	Two stone watch-boxes for Turnkey on duty, one 10 feet by 6 feet, and 10 feet high; the other 5 feet square, 9 feet high.
4. New Wing.	The stone-work of this building has been complete some time waiting for the roof, which is now being put on; it is built of 56,938 feet of stone, cut and set during 1856, 1857, and is divided into 78 Solitary Cells. A sketch showing the measurement and elevation of this building is annexed.
5. Dead House and Dissecting Room.	Walls are complete; this building is now waiting to be roofed, but all the carpenters are employed upon the roof of the new wing; it contains 2,363 feet of stone, cut and set during end of last and beginning of present year.
6. Kitchen for the Female Turnkeys.	Walls partially built; they now contain 2,142 feet of stone, but are to be raised 8 feet higher.

In addition to the above Buildings the Mill-House, intended originally for the Treadmill, has been floored on the two upper storeys, and flagged on the ground floor, and has been fitted up as an Hospital for Male Prisoners, Gaol Store, and Dispensary.

All Prisoners at Work in Darlinghurst Gaol are allowed Tea and Sugar as an indulgence, but only when they do as much work as their Overseer thinks they are able to perform, and occasionally when a Prisoner has made himself useful to the establishment by his labor and good conduct, he is allowed a small gratuity on his discharge from Gaol. The cost of these indulgencies is charged to the money earned principally by tailors and oakum pickers, as may be seen by the foregoing Returns, and the amount expended is shown in the subjoined Account.

(FURTHER RETURNS RELATIVE TO.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 8 October, 1858.

THE VISITING JUSTICE to THE COLONIAL SECRETARY.

H. M. Gaol, Parramatta,

2 September, 1858.

SIR,

I have the honor herewith to enclose a similar Return of the description and value of work executed in this Gaol from the 1st January, 1854, to the 31st December, 1855, to that forwarded to you by me on the 27th ultimo for the subsequent period to July, 1858; in doing which I beg to state that the records kept in the Gaol do not enable me to show the number of persons employed in its execution, and no price is stated in the books for the work performed for the Government; nor are the accounts sufficiently ample to enable me to make out the return month by month. In every instance practicable I have valued the Government work at the price at present charged for such work.

I have, &c.,

F. O. DARVALL, P.M.,

Visiting Justice.

WORK PERFORMED BY PRISONERS IN PARRAMATTA GAOL.

(RETURNS RELATIVE TO.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 8 October, 1858.

THE VISITING JUSTICE to THE COLONIAL SECRETARY.

*H. M. Gaol, Parramatta,
25 August, 1858.*

SIR,

In accordance with the instructions conveyed in your communication of the 16th instant, I have the honor to herewith enclose a Return shewing the quantity, the description, the value as per book, of work performed within the Parramatta Gaol; and the number of prisoners employed in its execution from the 1st January, 1856, to the 31st July, 1858.

The two previous years' accounts having been kept on an entirely different system from the present, and being prior to the present clerk entering into office, will take a longer time to prepare; I have therefore deemed it expedient to forward the enclosed, and will have the others prepared and forwarded with the least possible delay.

I have, &c.,

F. O. DARVALL, P. M.,
Visiting Justice.

THE HONORABLE
THE COLONIAL SECRETARY.

H. M. GAOL, PARRAMATTA.

RETURN shewing the work performed in the above Establishment, from the 1st January, 1856, to the 31st July, 1858, specifying the quantity and description of each kind of work, the prices either obtained for such work or the value entered in the Books; also the number of persons employed in its execution, together with the actual expenses incurred by such work, and the proportion of proceeds received by the Prisoners and by the Government.

Legislative Assembly.
NEW SOUTH WALES.

ALLEGED CASE OF KIDNAPPING ISLANDERS.

(CORRESPONDENCE, &c., RELATIVE TO CAPTAIN WILSON'S PROCEEDINGS.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 14 July, 1858.

THE COLONIAL SECRETARY, MAURITIUS, to THE UNDER SECRETARY, NEW SOUTH WALES.

*Colonial Secretary's Office,
Mauritius, 6 April, 1858.*

SIR,

I have the honor, by direction of His Excellency Governor Stevenson, to transmit to you the accompanying Papers, disclosing a very apparent case of kidnapping perpetrated by the Master of a vessel recently sailing out of the Port of Sydney. His Excellency trusts that by bringing these circumstances to the knowledge of the Government of New South Wales measures may be taken to prevent a recurrence of similar practices, and the punishment of the offenders.

I have, &c.,

HUMPHREY SANDWICH,

THE UNDER SECRETARY TO

Colonial Secretary.

THE GOVERNMENT OF NEW SOUTH WALES,
Sydney.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY WILLIAM STEVENSON, ESQUIRE, Governor and Commander-in-Chief of Mauritius and Dependencies, &c., &c., &c.

YOUR EXCELLENCY,

The humble Petition of William Ferrier, late of Byron's Island, now of Port Louis,

Respectfully Sheweth:—

That on or about the month of October last, Captain Joseph Wilson, of the English barque "Sutton," called at Byron's Island, where your Petitioner and his family resided since sixteen years, and induced your Petitioner to ship himself on board the said barque, as interpreter, to the effect of enabling him, the said Captain J. Wilson, to gather cocoanuts from all the neighbouring islets.

That with Petitioner, the said captain took on board the said barque six natives of the said Byron's Island, composing the crew of your Petitioner's canoe.

That it was only to be serviceable to Captain Wilson that Petitioner, with his crew, consented so to embark in the barque "Sutton."

That the express condition and agreement made with the said Captain Wilson were, that as soon as he would have effected his object—to wit, of gathering cocoanuts—he would land your Petitioner and his crew on the said Byron's Island. That at Peru and Clark's Island the said J. Wilson induced about sixty-five male natives to ship themselves on board the "Sutton," for the same object as above, and under the express condition to land them back on their respective islands in a short time.

That instead of acting up to such agreement, the said captain made for Mauritius, where we arrived last month, and again made for Bourbon in twenty-four hours. That on our passage out to Mauritius Petitioner strongly remonstrated against the captain's conduct; whereupon he tried to hush up the matter—made Petitioner drink liquors—and when he was almost insensible, caused him to sign his articles, as steward and seaman. The chief of his crew resisted all the captain's efforts to make him sign the said articles.

* 372—A

That

That on our arrival at Bourbon the said Captain Wilson landed the same sixty-five natives, who were engaged to certain planters for the consideration of £40 a head, and sold the said English barque "Sutton" for £1,600, as Petitioner was told.

That your Petitioner having applied to the said Captain Wilson for his maintenance at Port Louis, his passage back, board and lodging, from this Colony to Byron's Island, and for a compensation for the trouble and misery he has subjected your Petitioner to, the said Captain Wilson flatly declined to afford any redress to your Petitioner.

That having applied to the Marine Magistrate of Port Louis, he has raised doubts on the power he has to entertain your Petitioner's case, and ultimately refused to admit your Petitioner to sue in forma pauperis.

That your Petitioner being altogether destitute at Mauritius, where he lives on charity, has not been able to enter his complaint against Captain Wilson.

Wherefore, your humble Petitioner craves your Excellency's interference in this case, to have redress against the said Captain Wilson.

And your Petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c., &c., &c.

WILLIAM FERRIER.

Port Louis, 8 December, 1857.

DEPOSITIONS TAKEN BEFORE THE CROWN SOLICITOR.

William Ferrier: Has resided on Byron's Island (Kingsmill's Group, on the Line, N.E. of Australia); has been there 16 years. Captain Wilson, of English barque "Sutton," arrived at Byron's Island in August last. He engaged me as an interpreter, to procure natives for him. He was to go about amongst the islands to procure his complement of men and to return in three days to Byron's Island to land me. An American named William Meadows, who was also residing on Byron's Island, came on board also in the same boat with me; we both went on shore again. I went to tell my family that I should be absent for a few days; we embarked after this willingly—I as interpreter, and Meadows worked on board as seaman. Some twelve natives of Byron's Island came on board, and went below of their own accord; no one asked them to come on board, or to remain on board; no one prevented their landing again. I believe that they were under the impression that the ship would return again in three days, as they had heard me tell my family so when ashore. The "Sutton" left Byron's Island in the evening of the day that she arrived there, taking away myself, Meadows, and about a dozen natives. We sailed for Pirhoot Island, one of the same group, distant 28 miles from Byron's Island. We arrived there next morning; a lot of natives came off in canoes. By the captain's desire I spoke to the natives, and asked whether any of them were willing to come to make cocoanut-oil for the captain on an island a short distance to the west; I told them that the captain would bring them back in ten or twelve months at the furthest; that they would be paid 1lb of tobacco, or one dollar per month for their trouble. About 20 natives embarked willingly, and we sailed that night. We arrived next morning at Clark's Island, one of the same group, about 40 miles west of Pirhoot. I spoke to the natives there as I had done at Pirhoot; about 20 natives embarked at Clark's Island on the same promises as had been made to the natives of Pirhoot. We sailed same evening to the southward, the captain saying he was going to take me back to my island. We beat for 24 hours against contrary winds and current, and the captain then said he could not spare any more time to take me back, and he stood to the west for about four or five days, when we reached the Solomon's Group of Islands. The men of Kingsmill's Group had been accustomed to ship as they did in the "Sutton" for the purpose of making cocoanut-oil. It was usual to bring them back again. There was a Frenchman on board called Captain Dumaine. He heard all that the captain told me to say to the natives. The Kingsmill Group belong to the British Government. There is no Government Officer on any of the Islands. The men were not confined on board; they were well treated. Besides the captain and Captain Dumaine, there were two mates, a carpenter, and six seamen, besides myself and the Yankee. The crew had each of them a cutlass; the officers of the ship had each a musket; two muskets were put in the cabin that was occupied by the Yankee and myself; the captain gave them to us to be used in case of the natives rising. There were plenty of muskets, cutlasses, carpenters' axes, adzes, and gunpowder in canisters in the captain's state room. He said that they were to purchase ponies in Torres Straits. There were two swivels mounted on the quarters of the ship. Before arriving at the Solomon's Group, the captain said that I must sign articles, as he was afraid of falling in with a man-of-war. I don't know whether he asked the Yankee to sign articles. I refused to sign articles, and asked him to take me back to Byron's Island according to promise. He asked me to go with him as interpreter to the island where he was to make cocoanut-oil. He never told me the name of the island. I said I would go if he would touch at Byron's Island and let me take my children. He asked me repeatedly to sign articles, and I refused, but one morning, Captain Dumaine having given me two tumblers of rum to drink, the captain induced me to sign. The captain asked the natives who had embarked to sign articles to work for ten or twelve months making cocoanut-oil. Captain Dumaine was present. I acted as interpreter. He said to me that if he fell in with a man-of-war, and the men had not signed these articles, he might be taken to be a slaver. The natives all touched the captain's pen by way of signing. I explained to the men, by the captain's order, what they were signing—I told them it was an engagement to work for ten or twelve months at the utmost, making oil, at the end of which time they were to be taken back to the places from whence they came. I engaged as interpreter, steward, and seaman; I was to have £5 a month. The natives were to have 1lb of tobacco or 1 dollar per month.

This

This took place on the morning that I had been drinking, and in the presence of Captain Dumaine. It occurred after we had left Kingsmill Group and just before arriving at Solomon's Group, whilst out of sight of land. I did not read the articles or engagement which was signed. I cannot read very well. I was not offered the perusal of them.

We arrived at Solomon's Group about six days after leaving Kingsmill's Group. We stopped there six days, cruising about amongst the different islands. We took twelve natives from two islands. I could not speak the language of these islanders; I do not think that any one on board could speak their language. The captain landed here two men belonging to Clark's Island and Pirhoot; he landed them because they were insubordinate. They regretted having left their native islands, and told the other natives that they intended to kill the captain and me. One of them was arrested as he was coming aft with a knife in his hand. I do not know what he was going to do with the knife, but the natives told me that he was going to kill us. Some of the natives caught hold of him, and he stabbed one of them with his knife. Both these men were made fast and kept below with the others until we reached the Solomon's Group, where they were landed. The other natives could have released them if they had chosen, as they were at first made fast with cord. They were afterwards made fast with a chain and padlock. The men who were taken on board at Solomon's Group appeared to embark of their own free will. I did not see any force used. The captain went ashore at the Solomon's Group to look for copper, but did not find any. We sailed for Torres Straits. The captain tried to procure ponies at one of the islands there in exchange for muskets, powder, and axes, &c, &c, but he could not succeed; he only got one pony and one buffalo. From there we came straight to Mauritius, where we anchored outside the Bell Buoy for a day, after which we proceeded to Bourbon. About 60 natives were landed and left at Bourbon. I heard ashore that they were engaged for five years, and that the captain got £40 a head for them. The ship was sold there, and the crew paid off and discharged. I got about £22. The captain paid the passage of myself and crew up to Mauritius. Six of the natives who embarked with me from the same canoe at Byron's Island, on the promise of being sent back in three days, were also sent up here. The captain has found a passage for the Yankee and for these six natives to go back again, whether to Sydney or to Byron's Island I do not know.

WILLIAM FERRIER.

William Henry Meadows: I had been resident on Byron's Island for about sixteen months. On 12th August last, the English barque "Sutton," Captain Wilson, arrived there. I went off to her with Ferrier. Captain Wilson asked me if I could procure him some natives to make cocoanut-oil for ten months on an island to the westward. He would not tell me what island, saying he did not wish to let every one know his business. He promised to land Ferrier and myself, as well as six natives who came off in the canoe with us, in three days' time, on the place from whence we came. We procured 15 natives from Byron's Island (not including my boat's crew). They were told that they were to go and make cocoanut-oil on an island, and were to be brought back to Byron's Island in ten months. We went to Pirhoot, and got 16 or 17 men there in the same manner and upon the same promises. From thence we went to Clarke's Island, where we got 13 or 14 men in a similar manner. All these men came on board willingly, upon hearing the terms of agreement. Ferrier and myself acted as interpreters, and translated what Captain Wilson and Captain Dumaine told us to say. I do not know what was Captain Dumaine's business on board, but he seemed to be much the same as the captain of the ship. On leaving Clark's Island, Captain Wilson tried to go back to Byron's Island, for the purpose, as he said, of landing Ferrier, myself, and my boat's crew. He beat for two days against a strong wind and a head current. He then told me that he could not put me back on Byron's Island, as the wind was against us, and said I had better come on with him. I asked where he was going? He then said he was going first to look for some copper, of which he showed me samples, and that if he did not find any copper, he would go and make cocoanut-oil, as he had told me before. I persisted in asking to be put back on Byron's Island. The captain, however, bore away to west, Byron's Island being then to east of our position. The captain shortly after asked me to sign articles. I positively refused. I believe that Ferrier did sign articles one morning when he was half drunk. The captain, to my knowledge, had given Ferrier some drink on this occasion. All the natives, with the exception of my boat's crew, were induced to sign by touching the captain's pen, in a large book. Captain Dumaine was then present. I do not know what they signed. I had been asleep, but woke up and came into the cabin in time to see the last eight or ten sign. I asked what they had been made to sign, and got an evasive answer. I then told my boat's crew not to sign, and they did not do so. The captain said if we did not all sign he might get into trouble in event of falling in with a man-of-war. Two of the natives became quite crazy when they found that they were being taken away altogether from their native country. They became violent, and it was found necessary to make them fast. None of the others were confined in any way, or ill-treated. There were quantities of arms in the cabin and state-room, about 30 or 40 loaded muskets, 2 swivels on the ship's quarters, and the crew had each man a cutlass. The captain said to me one day, "There is a musket a-piece for you and Ferrier," pointing to two in the cabin. I told him I did not want them. There were plenty of axes in cases; also a case of muskets. There were cutlasses and pistols in the cabin. I do not know what they were for. We went to the Solomon's Group. Captain Dumaine, the mate, a boat's crew, and some ten natives, landed and went to search for copper. They came off in the afternoon without any copper, saying that they had been afraid to go into the interior, as they had been surrounded by natives. We took on board 13 natives at this group. Some of these natives could speak a word or two of English.

English; none of us could speak their language. The captain conversed with them by signs, and gave them pipes and tobacco. They appeared to embark willingly. Captain Dumaine spoke to them; he appeared to understand a word or two of their tongue. We landed the two crazy men at this group, and sailed for Torres Straits. The captain tried to purchase ponies at some of the islands in exchange for muskets, powder, &c., but could not succeed. When the captain was bargaining at Sabre Island with a man for ponies, he said he should want two men for each pony to take care of them; he was answered, that one man was enough to take care of two ponies. The captain got one pony and a bullock; that was all he got. He sailed for Mauritius, where he arrived in October last. He anchored outside for seven hours, and then went to Bourbon, where he landed all the natives except my boat's crew. He wanted to dispose of my boat's crew, but I told him I would get him hung if he did. When the doctor came off at Bourbon, I told him the circumstances under which the natives had been embarked. The captain told the doctor not to listen to me, as I was drunk. I heard that the natives were engaged for five years, and that the captain got £40 a-head for them. The ship was sold at Bourbon, and the crew paid off and sent up to Mauritius. I received £20. As soon as I landed here I went to the American Consul, and told him everything. He gave me a letter to Mr. Slade. I went to Mr. Slade, and asked that I and my boat's crew might be sent back to Byron's Island, and that the captain might be made to pay me damages for having taken me away. I said I wished to bring the matter before a magistrate. Mr. Slade told me, in the captain's presence, that the captain was willing to compromise the matter, and recommended me to accept a compromise, as law business was very uncertain, and I might be detained here by legal proceedings for a long time. The captain did not speak to me. The compromise offered was, that the board in this island of myself and boat's crew should be paid; that a passage should be found for us to Sydney, and from thence to Byron's Island; that all our expenses at Sydney should be paid; and that £6 should be paid me. Mr. Slade wrote out three or four documents that I refused to sign. He drew up a fourth one, which I signed. There were some blanks left in the paper which I signed. The draft of an agreement was read to me, which I agreed to. The copy which I produce, and which I signed, was never read to me. I signed it in presence of my consul. My boat's crew have been put on board the barque "Fernand," to be taken to Sydney. This vessel has been advertised to go to Singapore*. I was told that my passage was paid on board the "Fernand." I went on board this vessel yesterday, and the mate said he knew nothing about the matter.

* She is going to Sydney.—W. H. M.

Christian Miller: (A Dane, late A.B. on the barque "Sutton.") The barque "Sutton" took natives as passengers from some islands of the Kingsmill Group. Ferrier was interpreter, also the American, Meadows. I do not know what instructions were given to the interpreters by the captain, or Mr. Delmayne. I do not know what the interpreters told the natives. It was talked of amongst the crew that we were going to the westward to make cocoanut-oil, and that the natives were engaged to work there for ten months. I do not know whether the captain said anything of the kind. I never heard either him or Mr. Delmayne say so. The natives were well treated on board, and appeared happy and contented, as far as I could judge, not knowing their language. Two of them went mad during the voyage, and it was found necessary to make them fast. The captain landed them on two different islands. One of the islands was New Georgia. I do not recollect the name of the other island. I do not know that the natives signed any agreement. I very seldom went into the cabin, as my business was forward. I did not know until after I had arrived at Bourbon that Ferrier was borne on the ship's articles. I do not know when he signed the articles. I never heard that the captain was afraid of meeting with a ship of war. I do not think that the natives were taken away against their will.

CHRISTIAN MILLER.

John Thompson, late carpenter on board the "Sutton," was examined by me on board the "Blue Rock," a vessel now in the harbour, in which he was shipped as carpenter. He corroborates the foregoing statements in most of the particulars. He says that he managed to pick up some words of the language spoken by the natives, and that he is convinced that they did not know where they were being taken to. They said that they were to be taken back in twelve months. He believes that Ferrier knew perfectly well where the men were to be taken to, but cannot say what he told them. The natives all—with the exception of the boat's crew of the American, Meadows—signed in an emigration printed book, which was put on board on purpose. This man, at first, was not disposed to give any information unless he knew whether it was to be used for or against Captain Wilson. On my telling him that he would be summoned before a magistrate and compelled to state what he knew, he gave me the above information.

Charles Wilkie, late seaman on board the "Sutton," now on board the "Blue Rock," does not know what promises were held out to the natives, nor where the ship was going. He confirms the story told by the other witnesses in nearly every other particular.

CHARTER

ALLEGED CASE OF KIDNAPPING ISLANDERS.

CHARTER PARTY.

Sydney, 15 May, 1857.

It is this day mutually agreed between Joseph Wilson, master of the ship "Sutton," of Sydney, burthen, per register, 232 tons, now lying in Sydney Cove, and Didier Numa Joubert,—That the said ship, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed proceed to the South Sea Islands and there receive on board as many male and female immigrants as shall be engaged by Mr. John Delmayne, who proceeds in the said ship, cabin passenger, free of expenses. The number of immigrants not to exceed in all three hundred and seventy, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, water, and furniture, and exclusive of the poop or cabins, which shall remain for the use and benefit of the captain and owners. The said Joseph Wilson to provide all necessary dunnage and ballast; and, being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to the Port of St. Denis, Island of Réunion, (Bourbon,) or so near thereto as she may safely get, and deliver the same, on being paid freight as follows:—The sum of three thousand pounds sterling per calendar month, from the first day of June, 1857, until the day of the delivery of the said immigrants at St. Denis. The said freight to be paid in cash, free of commission or interest, fifteen days after the delivery of the immigrants: (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, during the said voyage, always excepted.)

The freight to be paid on unloading and delivery of the cargo.

The charterer to supply the provisions, water, and water casks, for the immigrants.

In default of the freight being paid as above specified, demurrage beyond that time to be paid by the charterer eight pounds sterling per running day.

Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, one thousand pounds sterling.

POLICE No. 4, TRAVAILLEURS EMIGRANTS.

St. Denis, 27 Octobre, 1856.

MONSIEUR,

En réponse à votre demande j'ai l'honneur de vous informer que l'Administration vous autorise à tenter l'introduction à la Réunion de Travailleurs recrutés dans les Iles de l'Océan Pacifique. Vous avez exposé que les résultats de cet essai n'étant pas assez assurés pour que vous puissiez opérer des affrètemens, vous desirez avoir la faculté d'effectuer le premier ou les deux premiers voyages par navire étranger pris sur les lieux.

Cette autorisation vous est également accordée, à charge par vous de vous entendre avec M. le Consul de France à Sydney pour la régularisation de vos opérations, et notamment pour le choix d'un délégué dont la présence est obligatoire. Les conditions fondamentales imposées à l'Immigration par la Législation qui régit la matière sont, indépendamment de cette obligation de placer à bord un délégué de l'Administration, que les travailleurs soient en état de liberté au lieu de recrutement, qu'ils connaissent parfaitement les clauses des Contrats de Travail qu'ils sont appelés à souscrire, et qu'ils consentent pleinement à les accepter.

L'Administration écrit en ce sens à M. le Consul, en le priant, dans l'intérêt de la Colonie, de vouloir bien faciliter par ses interventions la réussite de cette entreprise.

Recevez Monsieur l'assurance de ma considération très distinguée.

Le Directeur de l'Intérieur,
ED. MANÈS.

Legislative Assembly.
NEW SOUTH WALES.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

(RETURNS CONNECTED WITH.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 13 April, 1858.

THE INSPECTOR GENERAL OF POLICE to THE COLONIAL SECRETARY, transmitting Returns connected with the Metropolitan Police during the year 1857.

Office of Inspector General of Police, Sydney, 27 March, 1858.

SIR,

I do myself the honor to transmit, for your information, the enclosed Returns, numbered from 1 to 7, in connection with the duties of the Police in the Metropolitan District (including the City of Sydney,) during the year 1857.

2. As these Returns have for the first time been framed in accordance with the forms used by the Commissioners of the London Metropolitan Police, in their Annual Returns submitted for the information of Parliament, there are no means of shewing comparatively with previous years many of the particulars contained in those Returns.

3. The Return No. 1 gives the number of persons of each sex taken into custody in each month during the year, shewing a total of 4,157 males and 3,049 females, or 7,206 offenders of all classes; and this number, although apparently large, it is satisfactory to observe, is a decrease of 2,148 compared with 1856, the number of persons taken into custody in that year having amounted to 9,354. The number of persons charged with felony during the year 1857 shews an increase on 1856 of 20; but this increase is confined to one species of crime only, that of shoplifting, or stealing show goods, no less than 390 persons having been apprehended on this charge during the year; on other offences, exclusive of drunkenness, there is a decrease of 175, and the number of cases of drunkenness shews a satisfactory decrease of no less than 1,993.

4. Although the number of persons taken into custody appears to be 7,206, it is proper to observe, that the actual number of offenders during the year was only 5,376; 1,930 of the offences included in the former number having been repeatedly committed by the same individuals, viz., 810 twice, 417 three times, 293 four times, and 310 five, or more times; in the last number some female offenders are included, who have been 18 and 19 times in custody for drunkenness, and crimes arising out of that offence during the year.

5. Return No. 2 shews how the persons taken into custody have been disposed of. 1,309, or about 18 per cent., have been discharged by the Magistrates; 202 committed for trial, and 5,695 summarily dealt with.

6. Return No. 3, giving the ages of persons apprehended, shews that only 47 males and 26 females (about 1 per cent.) under 15 years of age, were taken into custody during the year, thereby presenting the pleasing fact that juvenile delinquency does not exist to any great extent, notwithstanding the number of unfortunate children that are permitted to roam about the City, unheeded and uncared for, by their parents. The prevalence of offences among the old and hardened female criminal population of the City, as already referred to, is further exemplified by this Return; the number of females taken into custody for drunkenness, obscene language, disorderly conduct, and vagrancy, being 2,599, whilst 1,977 (or 72 per cent.) are shewn to have been committed by females above 30 years of age.

7. It would appear, from Return No. 4, that of the persons taken into custody during the year about 45 per cent. had received no education, 49 per cent. an imperfect education, and that 6 per cent. could read and write well.

8. The sum of £8,569 5s. 6d. is stated, in Return No. 5, to be the final loss during the year on property reported to the Police as stolen; but this sum must not be taken as the actual value of the amount stolen as frequent cases have occurred in which burglaries, robberies, and thefts have been reported to the Police where it was subsequently ascertained beyond any doubt that no such offence had been committed, but that such reports were made for the purpose only of screening the loss of money or other property in some questionable place, or by some means not desirable to be known.

9. The number of persons taken into custody for other offences than drunkenness and petty misdemeanors, during the year 1857, was 1,423, and Return No. 6 shews that this is a large increase on previous years,—the number of this class, in 1856, having been 802 only. It may, however, be observed by the same Return that the number of persons committed for trial was 202, against 224 in 1856, thereby shewing a decrease of 22 on that year; whilst the number summarily disposed of by the Magistrates amounts to no less than 738, or an increase of 481 on the year 1856. Of this increase, 226, as shewn by Return No. 2, charged with the crime of stealing show goods, or shop-lifting, were summarily disposed of under the jurisdiction given to Magistrates by the provisions of the Acts of Council 16 Vic. No. 6, and 19 Vic. No. 24; and, as this species of petty larceny has increased since the summary jurisdiction has been given to Magistrates to the amount of 40s., and is, in fact, becoming daily more prevalent, it is quite apparent that, so far from the punishments awarded summarily for the commission of this offence having the effect of checking its repetition, they are of that slight nature, compared with the sentences formerly passed at the Courts of Quarter Sessions, that they have entirely a contrary tendency.

10. Under the Police and other Acts, 515 informations have been filed by the Police during the year; of this number there were 416 convictions, 72 dismissed, and 27 were withdrawn on the nuisance, &c., being abated.

11. In conclusion, it is considered necessary to remark, that in the number and description of persons taken into custody, as shewn by these Returns, seamen, apprehended for offences against the Merchant Seaman's and Shipping Acts, are not included, neither the offenders nor offences being considered as affecting the moral or social state of society within the City of Sydney.

I have, &c.,

JOHN M'LERIE,

Inspector General of Police.

THE HONORABLE

THE COLONIAL SECRETARY,

&c. &c., &c.

POLICE GUARD FOR COCKATOO ISLAND.

(PROPOSED STRENGTH AND COST OF.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 13 April, 1858.

W. DENISON,
Governor General.

Message No. 4.

The withdrawal from the Colony of a large portion of the Troops, will render it impossible to furnish a Military Guard for the Penal Establishment at Cockatoo Island, and it becomes necessary, in consequence, to provide immediately for this Service by a reorganization of the Police Force.

The annual expense to the Colony of the present Military Guard and Police at Cockatoo Island is £3,698 14s.; and that of the Police Force proposed to be substituted is estimated at £4,615 13s. 9d., as explained by the accompanying statement; and the Governor General invites the Legislative Assembly to make provision for the additional sum of £916 19s. 9d., which will be required to carry this arrangement into effect.

THE GOVERNMENT RESIDENT, MORETON BAY, to THE COLONIAL SECRETARY.

*Government Resident's Office,
Brisbane, 8 July, 1858.*

Sir,

I do myself the honor to forward to you a Return of the expense of the Native Police Force, for the quarter ending 31st March, 1858; also, the estimated expenses of the quarter ending 30th June, shewing a probable saving on a moiety of the vote for the expenses of the Force for 1858 of about £1,000.

2. I also enclose a Return shewing the strength and distribution of the Force on the 17th of last month.

I have, &c.,

JNO. C. WICKHAM,
Government Resident.

THE HONORABLE
THE COLONIAL SECRETARY.

THE GOVERNMENT RESIDENT, MORETON BAY, to THE COLONIAL SECRETARY.

*Government Resident's Office,
 Brisbane, 21 July, 1858.*

SIR,

I do myself the honor to inform you that fifteen recruits, from the southern part of New England, reached this place yesterday, on their way to Wide Bay, for the purpose of being added to the Leichhardt and Port Curtis division of the Native Police.

2. They are strong young men, and appear most anxious for employment in the Force. This augmentation raises the number of Troopers to 92, and I hope that before long the full number will be completed by recruits from the Namoi, or some other southern district.

I have, &c.,

J. C. WICKHAM,

Government Resident.

NATIVE POLICE FORCE.

No. 1.

THE UNDER SECRETARY to THE GOVERNMENT RESIDENT, MORETON BAY.

*Colonial Secretary's Office,
Sydney, 30 June, 1858.*

SIR,

I am directed by the Colonial Secretary to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, No. 229, reporting the proceedings of Lieutenant Murray, in command of the 1st Division of Native Police, in the Leichhardt District.

2. In this Report it is stated that Second Lieutenant Wheeler having been directed to join Lieutenant Murray, was unable to do so in consequence of the desertion of all the troopers of his detachment, who, it appears, were recruits obtained about three months since from the Clarence District; and also that much difficulty is experienced in procuring natives for the service, and to complete the Force to its full strength.

3. The Colonial Secretary desires me in reply to express his deep regret in receiving this report of the wholesale desertion in the corps, and to state, that a Select Committee having been appointed by the Legislative Assembly on the subject of the Native Police, an opinion has been expressed by a witness, at whose examination Mr. Cowper was present, that no difficulty would be experienced in obtaining a sufficient number of recruits in the Namoi District, and that they would not be so likely to desert. The gentleman who expressed this opinion being an experienced settler, it is the wish of the Colonial Secretary that you should direct the attention of the Commandant to this suggestion, as, if it can be carried out, it would appear to provide an immediate remedy for what has been supposed to be the greatest drawback to the efficiency of the Native Police. Mr. Cowper is indeed surprised that Mr. Morisset has not long before taken this course in recruiting his Force.

I have, &c.,

W. ELYARD.
