14. Yes; are they too numerous? I cannot recollect all I have published at this present moment. The books are here in the Colony. There are also the Transactions and Proceedings of the Geological Society.
15. That is previous to your arrival here? Oh, yes—years before.
16. You were then recognized as a geologist? Certainly.
17. Were you a member of any Scientific Societies? Yes.
18. What Societies were you a member of? I was a working Fellow of the Geological Society, to begin with, and before I arrived I was a member or Fellow of various other Societies—for instance, the Royal Society of Literature, the Zoological Society, and the Meteorological Society. I have been connected with such Societies for many years. I believe I was Vice-President of a Philosophical Society more than thirty years ago.
19. Have you ever in Europe visited any gold countries? Yes, I have—on the Rhine, and in other parts of Germany.
20. But you had no previous intimation of gold having been found here before you arrived? No, I had not—I did not know anything about it.
21. Did you make any communication to any one on the subject before 1851? Yes, certainly; I think I can shew that very clearly. Will you allow me to prove that to you?
22. Yes? I will prove it in a way which cannot be mistaken, from the Spectator newspaper. There is an article here—
23. Not emanating from yourself? Oh, no.
24. This question refers to anything which may have been communicated previous to 1851? Yes, the information was communicated in 1849; and I want to shew that it was known in England that it had been so communicated.
25. By Mr. Hoskins: What effect will this have upon the object of this inquiry? I do not know. You know best. I was asked whether I communicated anything respecting gold previous to 1851; and I am going to shew, by an extract from a letter of mine (published without my knowledge in 1850 and 1851), that I had so communicated. This is what it says:—(Witness here read an extract from the Spectator, of September 6, 1851. Vide Appendix A.) The extract referred to is from a letter I wrote to Sir R. Murchison. In the month of April, 1850, he himself published an article on the Gold of California, and produced the same extract in the Quarterly Review. Previous to that I had communicated papers to the journals in Sydney, upon the subject of gold.
26. By the Chairman: Did you print anything on the subject of your geological researches either here or in Europe? Yes, you will find in the pages of the Sydney Morning Herald statements to that effect.
27. That is, previous to the year 1851? Yes, previous to 1851. I have enumerated, in the little book which I published sometime ago [Researches in the Southern Gold Fields of New South Wales, by the Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A.], the facts as they really occurred; so that that here, in fact, is almost a catalogue of the circumstances; and I am quite prepared to prove everything stated in it as far as regards myself.

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A.

28. Did you lay before Parliament any account of the Coal Fields of the Colony? This Parliament?

9 April, 1861.

29. Yes, this Parliament? Yes.

30. Can you refer us to any Report on the subject? Yes, there is the Report from the Select Committee on Coal Inquiry in 1847, in which you will find my evidence, containing an account of all that was known in reference to the existence of coal in this Colony, and from my own researches.

31. Will you have the goodness to read to the Committee what you did? Yes; here is the Report of the Committee on Coal Inquiry; and you will find in it, apart from the evidence, a long account of the matter addressed to Captain King, and forwarded to the Chairman of that Committee, the present Speaker of your Honourable House. (Vide Appendix B.)

32. By Mr. Mate: A Select Committee was appointed, and you were called to give evidence? Yes, I gave evidence before a Committee called on "Coal Inquiry," on the 3rd June, 1847, and here is the evidence. The answers, of course, were expanded afterwards. In working out the coal, I naturally worked out all the rocks that were connected with the coal. And what I am now saying bears upon the first question I was asked as well as the present. In working out the coal I made a large collection of the fossils connected with the coal beds.

33. Did you ever send to Europe any collections to make known the geological character of the country? I did, and I wish to point out what collections I sent. I forwarded collections to Professor Sedgwick, in November, 1844—2,673 specimens of rocks and fossils, which are now deposited in the Woodwardian Museum, Cambridge. (List of Specimens read. Vide Appendix C.)

34. By Mr. Hoskins: Did you send any quartz specimens? Yes. You will observe that I have put against the specimens mentioned in the list the letters c and a; c means carboniferous rocks, and a means auriferous.

35. What year was it that you sent these specimens? In November, 1844.

36. And to whom? Professor Sedgwick, of the University of Cambridge.

37. Was any public notice taken of them? Certainly. The public notice taken was this: Professor Sedgwick, in his "Synopsis of the Classification of the British Palæozoic Rocks," published in the year 1855, has this note:—"I am happy in this place to express my own thanks, and those of the University of Cambridge, to Professor H. Rogers, of the United States, and to the Rev. W. B. Clarke, of Sydney, New South Wales, for the very valuable palæontological collections presented by them to our museum." That is, the University thanks me. A portion of those specimens consisted of fossils, and at that time Professor McCoy (now in Melbourne) examined some of them, and published an account of them in this little book with these figures. [Mr. F. McCoy on the Fossil Botany and Zoology of the Rocks associated with the Coal of Australia, with Illustrations] I intended to publish myself, but was deterred by the expense. I have made drawings of the fossils. (Witness here exhibited three books containing drawings of fossils.) These consist of about half my proper collection, but it would have cost £1,500 to have them published.

38. By Mr. Mate: And they have never been brought before the public? No, only those published in that small work to which I have just referred. In a lecture on "Our knowledge of Australian rocks, as derived from their organic remains," the late Professor Forbes uses these words respecting my coal examination—(it is a question of difference of opinion between myself, Mr. McCoy, and some others):—"All competent observers who have examined the strata on the spot, especially Mr. Jukes, Mr. Clarke, and Mr. Dana, assure us that the beds pass into each other, and are not only conformable—i. e., lying on and parallel to the beds below, but also, evidently, in sequence—i. e., deposited without the intervention of a long interval of time. The peculiar fossil fish, already alluded to, supports the view, to which, after consideration of the arguments on both sides, I certainly incline, and would therefore set down the Coal Fields of Australia and Van Diemen's Land as formations of the carboniferous sections of the palæozoic era—which, in other words, means as equivalents of the most productive coal fields of the northern hemisphere." This question is not yet settled. We are still disputing about it. I have taken great pains to work it out, and if I could take up your time I might shew you that it is now extensively canvassed by writers in France and other countries. In speaking of me again in this lecture, Professor Forbes says, "I have already said that this metal (gold) is found either in connection with palæozoic rocks, or tertiary drifts of a very recent epoch, yet, of anterior origin to the general physical features and appearance of the animals and plants now indigenous to Australia. Of the mineral character of these rocks and drifts it is not for me to speak; indeed, a far better notion of it than I could possibly give, you can obtain by perusing any documents on the subject signed by Mr. Stutchbury or Mr. Clarke; and there are several papers by those gentlemen among the documents respecting the discovery of gold in Australia, ordered to be printed by Parliament. I mention their names only because, being able geologists, their observations and descriptions of the rocks which they have personally explored are more precise and valuable than those written by persons unacquainted with geology." I think then I have shewn that some interest has been taken in Europe in reference to this question.

39. By the Chairman: Have you made any collections, or assisted to arrange any, for any public institution here, so as to make them useful to the Colony? Yes; the collection sent home to Paris in the year 1855, exhibited first in Sydney, attracted very great notice, and I had a silver and bronze medal awarded to me in this Colony and in France in consequence of that collection. The words used, as you will find by reference to the French report, are these—"in consequence of the serious and scientific character given to the Exhibition from this Colony." I have given my assistance for years in the Museum here, gratuitously.

Thoso

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A. Those geological specimens arranged there were arranged by me. Thus, I have been constantly at work.

- 9 April, 1861. 40. It was in 1848 that gold was discovered in California, was it not? Yes, I think so.
41. Did you ever advise any persons emigrating to California not to leave this Colony? Yes; there is a letter in the Herald newspaper (I do not know where to lay my hand on it) advising them not to do so.
42. By Mr. Mate: Why did you advise them not to do so? Because I knew there was gold here, and plenty of it. I told them so. Here is a note, dated 16th February, 1849. This does not refer so much to California as to the supposed discovery of gold in Victoria at that time—1849. I will read a passage. This letter was written for the purpose of preventing people going to Melbourne.
43. By the Chairman: But not to California? No; but you will find allusion to it in the very article in the Spectator to which I have referred. Personally, I have spoken to dozens of people, and I have no doubt, if one could advertise and get them, they would give evidence to that effect. This is the letter. (Vide Appendix D.)
44. That has reference to Victoria? It has reference to what was reported in 1849, concerning which there has been a great dispute.
45. Had you formed any opinion of the mineral wealth of the Colony, and if so, did you communicate it to any persons in and out of the Colony? Most undoubtedly. I can shew you plenty of proof of that.
46. That has reference to this Colony, not to Victoria or California? I have not published the letters in my last book, but merely alluded to them. They were published in the Blue Book. I will shew you the originals. (Witness here produced a number of letters.) These original letters have never been seen by any one but myself. Here they are. There are ten to which I can refer. Here is one from Mr. W. Rutledge. It is dated Belfast, Victoria, 17 August, 1860. It is a letter written in reply to one of like kind, forwarded at the same date as those to others, to the writers of which I have just referred, but Mr. Rutledge went to England, and the answer did not get to me at the time.
47. By Mr. O'Brien: What is the date of those letters in your hand (the original letters just referred to)? These letters were dated about the year 1852. There are some earlier than that, in 1851. There was a little question as to whether I knew anything about the gold here before the year 1851. The only way I could prove it was, not on my own testimony, but on the evidence of others—for I do not think any man should wish to have such a question decided on his own testimony. I, therefore, wrote to persons who I knew were aware of the fact, and these are the letters I got in reply. They are from His Honor Mr. Justice Therry, Dr. Gill, Mr. H. K. James (in the Bishop's Office), Mr. James Macarthur, the Rev. Mr. Gore (of Muswellbrook), Mr. F. E. Manning (brother of Sir W. M. Manning), the Rev. Mr. Sowerby (of Goulburn), and from Mr. Charles Blakefield, a gold digger.
48. By the Chairman: Those letters are all on the subject of the Gold Fields? They all come to this same point, of which Mr. Rutledge wrote, "In reply to your note of 6th instant, I beg to state, that I have a perfect recollection of the first time you mentioned to me, at Parramatta, in 1841, that gold was to be had in large quantities in the Colony of New South Wales. This, as well as I can recollect, was after Count Strzelecki had reported the existence of gold in Gipps Land." [Here he has committed a great mistake. It is a mistake of memory. Count Strzelecki never found gold there. There is a report he wrote about the Murrumbidgee country, and a portion of the Bathurst country, 21st August, 1841, in which he mentions auriferous pyrites, but certainly, when he published his book in 1845, he left it out. You will not find anything about it in his book.] The letter proceeds: "and in speaking of that circumstance, I remember your earnest reply to my doubts, 'that ere long the production of gold in considerable quantities 'would be made manifest in several parts of New South Wales, besides Gipps Land.'" [That is also a mistake—there was no Gipps Land in it.] "You then alluded to your researches and discoveries in the Bathurst and other Western Districts, and stated confidently that gold would be discovered there, and in other parts of Australia, in as large quantities as probably in any other part of the world. I recollect, on other occasions, between 1841 and 1844, and since then, your frequent mention of the confidence you felt that gold discoveries that would astonish the world would, before many years, be made in the Australian Colonies, to which I paid but little attention, until I found all you said fully verified by the disclosures of 1851, when I was convinced of your thorough knowledge by the numerous Gold Fields then opened up in this and the neighbouring Colony."
49. Is there any other letter bearing upon the subject to which you would like to refer particularly? Here is one, the writer of which I do not know, dated 15th August, 1860. (Letter read. Vide Appendix E.) I wrote to him to say that I remembered perfectly well the circumstance, but that my remark did not apply to Muswellbrook, but to the country immediately beyond it, over the Liverpool Range, from which I had just come back. It is this same fact Dr. Gill speaks of in one of his letters.
50. By Mr. O'Brien: What is the date of that letter? 15th August, 1860.
51. And what is the name of the writer? Mr. Thornton; he is a medical man at Muswellbrook; but it is very clear that he had a recollection from some one of the conversation, and I can tell you how I know that the date of my exploration is accurate. Mr. Gore married, and I went to perform his clerical duties for him. I wrote to him to know the date, and he gives me in reference to my question the reply contained in his letter, "You were at Muswellbrook in 1844, for the first time. I ought to know, for it was at that time I was married." I wrote to him to know the date. I was there two years—in 1844 and in 1845, but I had a sort of dim recollection that it was in 1843 and 1844.
52. Did you ever receive collections from others of rocks and other minerals? Yes.

53. Did you employ any one to examine them in places to which you did not go yourself? Yes, I had a number of persons occupied in collecting for me, very extensively, all over the country. Some of those specimens sent to Professor Sedgwick were collected in that way. I did not collect them all. Altogether I have collected about twelve thousand. I had people all about the country collecting for me—some of the surveyors for instance. Captains Blackwood and Stauley, and others who went along the coast, made collections where they went. Those collections I saw. I had particularly in my service Mr. Nichols, an American, living in the Southern country. I have a letter here which I might read, to shew you that that was the fact. All these things were sent up to me, and of course I worked out of them a considerable knowledge of parts of the country to which my duties would not allow me to go.
54. Did you ever mention the probable wealth of the country to any members of the Government or Parliament? Yes; but will you allow me to fill up a little gap? You asked me a short time ago if I published anything. I now recollect that I published a paper on this subject in the year 1847—a Comparison of the Geology of Russia and Australia.
55. By Mr. O'Brien: That is in England? No, in the Herald newspaper, in Sydney.
56. Oh! were you here at that time? I have been here nearly twenty-two years. All my work—no, not all, but the greater part—which nobody here has ever seen, except Mr. Shepherd, was done before the year 1849.
57. To what year do you now allude? 1847.
58. By Mr. Hoskins: Did you publish the paper in Australia? Yes. This is the third volume, No. 5, of the "Tasmanian Journal of Natural Science, Agriculture, Statistics, &c.," which was published at Hobart Town. The editor of the Tasmanian Journal finds my article in the Sydney Morning Herald, and transfers it to his pages, with this heading:—"The following article appeared in the Sydney Morning Herald newspaper, of 28th September, 1847, and we have no hesitation in transferring it to our pages, although the author is unknown to us." It goes on to compare the geology of Russia with that of Australia. It takes the formations, as they are in Russia, and the parallels, as they are in the Colony; and it winds up with these words:—(Vide Appendix F.)
59. In reference to the question as to whether you mentioned the matter to members of the Government or of the Parliament, you say "yes"? I did.
60. What did they say to it? I will tell you what Sir George Gipps said to it, when I shewed him some gold. He said, "Put it away, Mr. Clarke, or we shall all have our throats cut." That was in 1844. I will tell you how it occurred:—Sir George Gipps was living at Parramatta. I was there too at that time, and had the honor of being frequently at Government House. I went up one morning to see Sir George (he was ill), and Lady Gipps said to me, "Don't go away; stay and spend the day with Sir George; he is unwell." I had to call elsewhere, but I came back and brought the gold with me. Sir George Gipps said, "Where did you get it?" I told him, and he said, "Put it away, or we shall have our throats cut." I had forgotten the date, but I asked Mr. Dobie, and he gave me the date at once. He said, "Don't you remember the great meeting held by the squatters at the Royal Hotel?" It was on that time. Sir George Gipps was so ill, that on that day he did not dine with the family, but had his dinner sent into the drawing-room; it was probably the anxiety about the squatter's meeting. That was in 1844, and it was then that Sir George Gipps said, "Put it away, or we shall have our throats cut,"—alluding of course to the convicts.
61. Does not Sir Roderick Murchison claim to have written to the Secretary of State in that year on the same subject? No; I have published his letter in this book. [Clarke's Southern Gold Fields]. He wrote to the Secretary of State in 1848, and not in that year; but he must have seen Strzelecki's collections after the time I speak of. I cannot tell you the date, but my own opinion is that he never saw Strzelecki's specimens until after I had spoken to Sir George Gipps on 9th April. I am pretty sure he had not—he could not, because if you look through his writings, you will find it was an impossibility; he had come home from Russia for the second time, I think—
62. By Mr. Hoskins: Who? Sir Roderick Murchison. He wrote a letter on his return from the Continent in 1848. He had inspected the specimens of Count Strzelecki in 1844, but he did not say anything about the gold then.
63. What year was that? In the year 1844. He says, "In the year 1844 I instituted a comparison between the rocks of Eastern Australia, numerous specimens of which had been brought home by my friend Count Strzelecki, and those of the auriferous Ural Mountains, with which I was personally well acquainted. This comparative view was printed in the same year (1844) in the journal of the Royal Geographical Society." Now, by comparison of dates, it appears that he never saw these things of Strzelecki's until after I had spoken to Sir George Gipps, in reference to the gold of this Colony.
64. Have you not disputed the priority with him? I have, upon that very ground. I knew of the gold in 1841; his was a most admirable determination, and it turned out to be true. I wish to give him all the honor and credit I can, but I actually knew of the gold in 1841.
65. Do you not know as a fact, that Sir R. Murchison delivered a lecture, or read a paper before the Geological Society some time in 1844, in which he predicted from the geological formations of Australia, and their similarity to the Ural Mountains, and the country through which the chain runs—that gold would be found in Australia? That is not in 1844. I will read to you my allusion to it if you like.
66. You recollect his reading a paper? I will tell you what I recollect of it. "From facts communicated to the Geological Society, Sir R. I. Murchison has already adopted the same view as the present, respecting the probable mineral wealth of Australia. He has even gone so far in a letter addressed to Sir C. Lemon (the date of which he gives, 1846,) "and

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A.

9 April, 1861.

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A. "and which is published in the last number of the Philosophical Magazine, as to advise that a person well acquainted with the washing of mineral sands, be sent out to Australia, speculating on the probability of auriferous alluvia being abundant, and he suggests that such will be found at the base of the western flanks of the dividing ranges."

9 April, 1861.

67. That does not answer my question. Do you know, or do you not know, that Sir R. I. Murchison, in a paper he read before the Royal Geographical Society, stated, that from the geological features of Australia being so similar to those he had seen in Russia, and also from having seen the specimens of Count Strzelecki, he predicted the existence of gold? No; I do not know that, but I will tell you what I do know. He compared the rocks in 1844, and you will see immediately, if you look through this little book of mine (Clarke's Southern Gold Fields), the bearing of that comparison. He had not then completed the comparison, because he gives me credit here of having done that for him. I have printed the letter, &c., at p. 283, and there can be no mistake about the matter. He says:—"In referring to geology, I must express my thanks to Mr. Clarke for having first elicited the fact of the presence of true fossils of Silurian age in some of the less metamorphosed limestones of the S. W. tracts of New South Wales and the adjacent region of Victoria Land; and also for the indication of intersection of certain rocks near to which metallic ores prevailed; since these are phenomena which have been observed in other auriferous regions." This is from Sir R. I. Murchison's address, at the Anniversary Meeting of the Royal Geographical Society in 1853. In a paper read before the same Society in 1852, he spoke of a "geological discovery recently communicated to him by the Rev. W. B. Clarke," namely, "the existence of many fossils of known Silurian species, including Pentamerus Knightii, and many shells and corals on the flanks of the dividing range in New South Wales." And he says, "This discovery is important, because it completes the resemblance of the Australian Cordillera (along which Devonian and carboniferous fossils had been found) with the Ural Mountains, the two chains being thus shewn to be zoologically as well as lithologically similar, and both to possess the same auriferous constants." In a letter which he wrote to me in 1852, he says, "In the course of reading the Memoirs presented, yours on the Gold of Australia was read on Wednesday last, at the Geological Society. It was followed by a brief resumé of my own publications on the same subject, and of which you seem to have been ignorant. Of course I stated that I was quite sure you would have made allusion to my published views of 1846 (not 1844) on Australia, as auriferous in future, if you had seen them as printed in Cornish papers, and repeated in the transactions of the Geological Society, Cornwall, of that year." I assure you that I have never seen those papers or transactions.

68. By the Chairman: That was in 1846? Yes. He proceeds:—"I then detailed the various other occasions (to say nothing of the first, in 1845, when I named your range, the Cordillera of Australia), and lastly, avowed myself, in my communication, to be what was indeed generally known, the author of 'Siberia and California,' in the Quarterly Review, the article to which you allude." That is where I got the extract. "In giving you the highest credit for your discovery of Silurian fossils, which completes the original parallel with the Ural Mountains, and in speaking of you as an exploring geologist worthy of every praise and encouragement, I do not subscribe to your theory (for such it is) as to the outbursts of auriferous chains having any definite relation to the quadrature of the circle." I will explain that to you. I had stated that the gold rocks in Australia ran nearly north and south. I consider that is one of my discoveries, and one of the most important I have made, because it enabled me to go to work and predict places where there could be no kind of mistake as to the existence of gold. Sir Roderick Murchison once adopted the theory of Humboldt, and formerly entertained a similar idea, but afterwards recanted and gave it up as being of no use, and again adopted it. But after I had adopted it, and worked it out, and found it to be true here, he writes to me—"I do not subscribe to your theory (for such it is) as to the outbursts of auriferous chains having any definite relation to the quadrature of the circle." (This was an incident only.) He goes on to say,—"You are in error in supposing that the north and south ridge of the Ural Mountains has produced three and a half millions sterling of gold. On the contrary, this produce results from the ridges of Siberia, spread over eighty degrees of longitude; the Ural producing only half a million sterling. Hence you see that the theory vanishes. It is not even applicable to your own Continent, various ridges of which, between its eastern Cordillera and its west coast, may prove to be auriferous. But your Silurian discovery rejoices me, and will enable me to introduce you with flying colours in a little general work on the primordial rocks, which I am preparing. I have incorporated all that is new which you have written as coming directly from yourself, and as being most important additions to what Strzelecki, Jakes, and others have written." The end of the letter is about information sent by Mr. Evelyn Denison, and it concludes with these words—"Such anticipations are of no great value in the eyes of scientific men, but they have great weight among statisticians and politicians. Thus, I have as much credit here as you have in Australia, without having any more than yourself profited by the golden riches. The north and south theory has gone much out of fashion, for, according to Erwan's maps, the exceptions prevail. Still I hold to the value of the great meridian chains, such as the Ural and its parallels, the Cordillera of America, and that of Australia. I am very anxious to know if any of the original sites of the ore have been discovered, to what extent, and if the people are fools enough to work into the solid rock when they can do everything most profitably in the 'drift.' Although you have trodden on my toe, I shall always say that you have done very much indeed for the geology of Australia."

69. By Mr. Hoskins: But still you must admit, even from what you have read, that Sir R. Murchison

- Murchison predicted in 1845 that gold would be found in extensive deposits in Australia? Yes, but I have shewn you that I did that in 1841. The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A.
70. But your predictions were not published in England anterior to Sir Roderick Murchison's? No; but to prove to you that I made the prediction in 1841, I will read to the Committee this letter. I have a brother-in-law in Tasmania. Having left a living in Lincolnshire he came to Adelaide, and afterwards removed to Melbourne. Subsequently he accepted a living under the Bishop of Tasmania. When this question was agitated before (knowing that I had written to him in England upon this subject), I wrote to him to send me the letters I had written, and here is his reply. (Vide Appendix G.)
71. I believe you know that the first printed prediction made in England of the probability of gold existing in Australia was made by Sir Roderick Murchison? No doubt; I do not deny that; but that there is no jealousy on that score, between him and me, will be clearly seen from the following extract from a letter I received from him under date October 31, 1860:—"I was glad to hear that the New South Wales Parliament was doing you the justice you deserve for your long, energetic, and successful researches. The justice of your claim at my hands shall of course be awarded to you in all future publications of mine, or of any body with which I am connected, in which Australia is mentioned, and certainly no new edition of Siluria shall appear without the correction of your initials and name."
72. At the same time you know, as a matter of fact, that Sir Roderick Murchison was the first person in England who printed or made public his predictions in reference to the discovery of gold? Yes, but that has no more to do with me than with the man in the moon.
73. By the Chairman: But you afforded him a great deal of ———? I cannot say what I afforded him. All I can say is what I did myself.
74. By Mr. O'Brien: When I heard Sir Roderick Murchison lecture in London, he predicted the existence of gold from his own researches? When Count Strzelecki returned home after examining the rocks, he found that there were indications of the same epoch in the rocks of Australia and those of the Ural Mountains, but you see his comparison was incomplete until I furnished him with the materials in 1852. It was in consequence of what he had seen in Russia that he, perhaps, said, "Why, bless my life! these rocks are so much alike that there must be gold in one as well as in the other."
75. By Mr. Hoskins: He also assumed it from the geological features of the country, independent of that? No.
76. And also from the direction in which the cordilleras ran? As I have already told you he first adopted that argument and then threw it away. He had been twice in Russia, and had collected very extensively. He had unlimited means of exploring; the whole of the Russian Empire was at his call. When he came back, Count Strzelecki had just arrived from Australia with his collection of rocks, and, having seen them, Sir Roderick Murchison saw that they were exactly like the rocks which he had just been examining.
77. I only wished to get this fact, which was disputed in the House when the Select Committee was moved for—that Sir Roderick Murchison was the first who gave expression, publicly, to the fact that he believed heavy deposits of gold would be found in Australia? If you mean by printing—
78. In England? Nobody denies that.
79. It was denied in the House, privately? I have here a number of letters, which if you desire to read privately you can do so.
80. I am not disputing your claim to have made it public in New South Wales? If I were to bring all the documents I have upon the subject, I should cover this table; but I would be happy to let any Hon. Member of the Committee examine them. I feel very easy upon the subject, for I have never asked the Government to do anything for me.
81. By the Chairman: You were employed by the Government in 1851 to make explorations for gold? Yes. I have been very often employed by the Governments.
82. What led to your employment? In the year 1851 (I cannot remember the exact date, but it was the end of June or the beginning of July) a friend of mine came to me several times, and said to me, "The Government are in a great fix"—"They are in great difficulty respecting what is going on in the country. They cannot let the matter rest, and they want fresh discoveries to be made. Those already made are not sufficient to satisfy the public—why do you not go forward with all your knowledge and assist them?" In consequence of this being urged upon me several times, in an interview with Mr. Deas Thomson, an expression was given to this effect, that I was ready under certain circumstances, to assist the Government. The Government proposed first of all to have a Committee consisting of certain individuals, with a stationary Chairman, sitting in Sydney. Mr. Stutchbury and myself were to go abroad and pick up information for them to make use of. To that I objected, and wrote this letter. (Letter produced.)
83. By Mr. Wilson: Was that letter addressed "Mr. Deas Thomson" or "The Chief Secretary"? No; to the Hon. E. Deas Thomson, Esq. It was written to him as Chief Secretary; but at the same time —
84. By Mr. Hoskins: As a private communication? It has not been held as a private communication. It is to be found in the Chief Secretary's Office. It is what they call sub-official or semi-official. (Witness here read a copy of the letter referred to. Vide Appendix II.) This was followed by another letter, dated 9th July. (Letter read. Vide Appendix I.) That is the history of my engagement. I was referred to as one being able to assist them by hunting up gold in places where people had never heard of it.
85. By the Chairman: What arrangement was made respecting your ministerial duties? It was this: It came to be a matter of official communication. Sir Charles Fitz Roy wrote me a letter, and my reply to it was that the application must come through the Bishop.

The Rev. W.B. Clarke, M.A. "I am a clergyman in his diocese, and consider myself bound by my clerical duties, and you must let it come through the Bishop;" and the Bishop wrote to me.

86. Where had you been employed as a clergyman up to that time? I was then at St. Leonard's. I came out here in 1839. They told me that the Government pay to clergymen was £200 a year, and that the congregations added another £200, and that there would be a glebe, a house, and other advantages. On my arrival the Bishop said, "I must appoint you to Campbelltown." I said, "What sort of a house is it." "Oh," he said, "there is no house." I said, "I do not understand that, I thought there would be a house." He said, "There is no house, but I suppose they will build one some day or other." The next day (I was staying with him) he said, "Mr. Forest has been here from Parramatta, and is anxious to leave the King's School for a time—have you any objection to take his place?" "Well," I said, "if it would convenience your Lordship, for a time I have no objection." I went, and up to December, 1840, I was at the King's School, when I abandoned it, for reasons which I need not here explain. Attached to this duty was the charge of the district of Castle Hill, extending down to the Hawkesbury. There was no stipend excepting the surplus money out of some fund the Government had, but the Bishop provided that I should get £150 a year. I spent the first year's stipend thus:—£80 for house rent and £70 for horse-keep. That duty continued until 1844, when the Bishop made an arrangement with Mr. Vidal, with whom I exchanged duties for a few months, and then I was translated to St. Leonard's—so that up to that time I had plenty of opportunity of moving about.

87. Then the Bishop sanctioned your new duties? The Bishop having received this communication from the Governor, wrote to me. He said the Governor had applied to him to (you know the common phrase) "lend you;" and I was "lent" to the Government. He then said, "Now, you can do a most important service. Your going into the interior will enable a good deal of duty to be done. Many people may be visited who could not otherwise; and besides, you can gain a great deal of information for me if you choose to do it. I shall give my sanction, and be very glad to do so." Well, the matter was arranged in this manner. But the Bishop said, "I must give a license to whoever takes your duty." He gave a license to Mr. Smith. There cannot be two people licensed for one place, and I said, "You have taken my license away, now give me a license for the whole of the diocese;" and he did so. I went away with a commission as a clergyman as well as a commission from the Government. I did officiate frequently. I have had congregations of three and four people under trees, and done much missionary work of that sort.

88. By Mr. Hoskins: As you were appointed by the Government of course you will have no objection to let us know the terms upon which you were engaged? No; certainly not.

APPENDIX.

A.

THE AUSTRALIAN GOLD-BED.—Prosperity is said to have visited New South Wales with its crowning disaster in the discovery of a Gold Field vast in extent. There is still room, however, to think that this report may have been exaggerated, and that the amount of "native gold" may not be so great as materially to hazard the welfare of the Colony. The total sum of the facts ascertained is, that a young gentleman brought into the town of Bathurst a piece of gold weighing eleven ounces; an old man brought "several lumps," weighing about two pounds in all; the manager of the bank and two gentlemen went forth, and each picked up a piece. One of those gentlemen brought back a few handfuls of loose earth which produced gold to the size of a small pea; and Mr. Stutchbury, the "Government Geologist," extracted from a handful of earth metal to the weight of twenty-one grains. Gold, therefore, unquestionably exists; but the average proportion in the soil and the extent of the field are questions wholly undetermined. The proportion is an especially undetermined question. The simple character of the geological structure of Australia, however, renders it probable that the whole extent of territory which bears the same aspect superficially has also the same character geologically; and it is most likely, therefore, that an extensive Gold Field does exist in that part of Australia if not also in other parts. Indeed it was already known that gold existed. More than a year ago, in April, 1850, we published an extract from a letter by a good practical geologist in New South Wales which may be now repeated (Extract referred to):—"This Colony is becoming a mining country, as well as South Australia. Copper, lead, and gold are in considerable abundance in the schists and quartzites of the Cordillera (Blue Mountains), &c. Vast numbers of the population are daily going to California; but some day, I think, we shall have to recall them."

B.

St. Leonard's, 7 July, 1847.

My dear Sir,

You are as well aware as I am, of the extreme difficulty of following out any particular bed in the coal measures of Australia, in consequence of the great variability of their condition—a remark which applies so generally to all the members of the carboniferous formation of New South Wales, that it is hazardous to trust any of the rocks further than we can see them.

Moreover, owing to the very frequent interruptions of the planes of dip, and the dislocations which have taken place, partly from contraction and partly from mechanical violence of intrusive masses, it requires much patience and study to come to any conclusion as to what may be the actual mean dip in any wide extent of surface.

In my evidence I have made frequent mention of undulations, the result, I think, of contraction and lateral pressure, and no person can examine the coast about Newcastle without being convinced of the existence of these undulations, for the cliffs exhibit, within comparatively small distances, very contrary dips, which, with the interruptions occasioned by faults, and the denuded intervals between the separate portions of the cliffs, together with the abnormal variation in plane of some of the beds when compared with others, and the thinning out and osculation of seams (all which phenomena are more or less traceable by the eye), so complicate the question as to make any decision as to individuality of beds or seams a matter of much hesitation.

I am, however, quite aware that such a dip as you speak of to N.W., and also others to N.N.W. and N.E., may be found in the vicinity of Newcastle, and that the dip of your worked seam is to N.W.

I have admitted nearly so much in my evidence, for, in my answer to Question 20, I mention the probability that the Burwood seam is "the summit of a fold in the undulation of one of the Newcastle seams"; perhaps it is the one you are working, as the dip tends to N.W. So, in the cliff near Khaterin (south of Shephard's brush cliff), the dip is slightly to N.W.; but close to this there exists an anticlinal curve, one end dipping to N., and the other to S.; and on the beach, south of the valley which descends seaward from the Burwood tunnel, the coal is thrown down to nearly high-water mark, and is broken up by numerous small faults, disappearing to the southward, under the pudding stone of the Valley of Palms, to rise again near Corigulla; and then, finally, it dips southwardly under the sea after the union of two seams at Red Head, to appear along the coast at Reid's Mistake, at a moderate height above the beach. After this, the pudding stone, which heaps all the strata from Nobby's southward, occupies the beach level, the coal seams being carried downwards by southerly dip and various faults.

Mr. Threlkeld, in his evidence, states loosely enough (in Answer 65), that there is "a very trifling dip to N. at Lake Macquarie; either Newcastle has risen, or the other has sunk, or vice versa." Without doubt, on the north of Reid's Mistake, the dip appears to be N.W.; and in one place near Ebenezer coal drift the dip is W. N. W., but from a plan of the first adit made there, given to me by Mr. Threlkeld himself, I find the dip of the coal seam he then worked was E. S. E. by compass, which direction I verified myself. Again, south of Reid's Mistake, the dip near the faults is reversed from northerly to southerly. Such phenomena as these must always occur in a district like that under review; and it is remarkable that the strike of the coal measures being N. E., and consequently the dips, folding over the axes of undulation, being necessarily to N.W. or S.E., examples of both cases are very distinct along the Hunter. At Milberring Creek for instance (as stated in my Answer 15), the dip is from ten to sixteen degrees S. S. E.; a similar dip occurs near Ebenezer, where a fault running parallel with the coast line of the bay cuts off the seam, and beyond this the dip is reversed.

Your friend Strzelecki has noticed similar facts along the Hunter, for he says (p. 87). "each detached portion has its own strike or dip;" but there are, nevertheless, some general features which appear to be invariable, and nothing can be more striking than the fact, that all the greenstone and trachytic dykes along the coast from Nobby's to Broken Bay, range nearly from S.E. to N.W., the very directions in which the undulations occur.

The very nature of undulation is to produce alternate synclinal and anticlinal folds, and, of necessity, at the bottom of the one set, and at the apex of the other, the dips must meet in reversed order. But let this occur never so often, there may still be a general tendency to a given plane of inclination, and this is all I meant when I assumed the dip of the beds (by which I meant all the masses of the formation) at and near Newcastle to be to the south; for I considered that the carboniferous rocks are thrown off to the south by the porphyries of Port Stephens; as, for example, in Bird Island, where the dip is twenty degrees to S.W., and at Raymond Terrace, where the dip is southerly, as it is in Nobby's Island, and in some spots along the coast.

And I am convinced, that a careful search would prove that south of the Bundoo, or Clyde River, where the ancient rocks on the flanks of Maneroo throw off the coal measures, the mean dip or general inclinations of the latter is to the north.

M. de Strzelecki, from different data and independent observations, came to the same conclusion respecting the southerly dip of the "north-eastern margin of the Newcastle basin" (p. 125). The same author says, "the strike at Illawarra is N.W.," but in the passage referred to (p. 126) I presume he used strike for dip, the latter being N.W.; for we agree as to the probable converging of the basin towards the County of Cumberland.

I have thought fit to enter into this long explanation because it may seem to some that I have contradicted local facts in alluding to general phenomena; and because in my desire to explain the state of the case, according to my views, in as simple a way as I could to the Committee, I have not been always sufficiently guarded in the employment of the term "beds" to satisfy strict geological technicality. In fact, there is mention of "fields," and "beds," and "seams," and "basins," and even "saucers," by the witnesses and examiners without proper contradistinction between those terms, whereas if we had occasionally used the term "coal measures" no apparent discrepancy would have occurred; but in visu voce unpremeditated evidence, errors of this sort will creep in, and afterwards it is difficult to correct them without making confusion or destroying identity of statement.

In Questions 164 and 165 put to you, it is inferred that the seams at Bullai and Newcastle may be identical. Your answers appear to me to be very proper and satisfactory; but I think my meaning in Answer 17 was slightly misapprehended by the Committee; I did not imply that those seams must necessarily meet in the most direct line of junction or that of the coast; I assumed a dip, in a true line from the points in question, to shew what might probably be the case; but my opinion (as expressed in Answer 16) is, that the Newcastle seams are on the western, and the Illawarra seams are on the eastern side of a basin comprehended between those localities, the longitudinal axis of which runs nearly parallel with the escarpment of the overlying great sandstone at the back of Illawarra; in which case there must be a considerable tract of coal measures washed away to the eastward of Newcastle, or sunk by a downcast fault below the ocean.

The axis I have thus assumed will run, as it ought, according to all the physical conditions of the country, nearly through the Wianamatta trough; in which case, if we could consider them continuous so far, we might expect to find the Newcastle seams a little to the eastward of Burragorang, where coal occurs immediately under the great sandstone, and over fossiliferous strata identical with those of Maitland; and it may be observed, that a line of faults and vertical fissures of great depth is marked by the direction of the Wollondilly, the Warragamba, and Nepean Rivers, westward of which the coal measures at their edge have been hoisted up by the elevation of the dividing ranges of the Blue Mountains.

On the other hand, assuming a basin which shall comprehend the whole of the area mentioned in my Answer 6, the coast from Illawarra to the Hunter may be assumed as an irregular eastern boundary, in part of which the extreme portion as stated just before, and in my Answer 16, must be missing.

Respecting your "saucers," I understand you to mean truncated anticlinal folds enclosing synclinal depressions or small basins, such as I spoke of in Answer 9, and merged in one great basin for the sake of conciseness. In Answer 7 I have described how these small basins may have been formed.

It will be found, I think, after this explanation, that no discrepancy about dip exists between us; and if you will bear in mind a few admitted facts as to the dip of the Illawarra beds and that of your worked seams, you will see that the Newcastle seams cannot lie in the exact plane of the Bullai seams; for the strike at Bullai must be, at least, 25 miles in advance of the strike at Newcastle; and on this supposition, with a dip of four degrees, allowing the dip in both places to be N.W., the coal seams at Bullai would be at least 9,000 feet below the seams at Newcastle—a result so utterly improbable that the data must be rejected, or the N.W. dip in your seam must be taken as a local affection.

Admitting with you, therefore, the probability that the Coal Fields may be made up of numerous small basins, I see no other alternative for avoiding the consequences of admitting other suppositions, which consequences are monstrous in themselves, than the assumption that these basins are due to undulations produced as I have suggested.

I will mention one calculation which will show the necessity of close attention to the dynamical conditions and structural phenomena of the large solid masses of strata involved in the problem before us.

If we assume that there is a basin with Newcastle at one end and Maitland nearly at the other, since the dip of the underlying elevated rocks at Harpur's Hill is from two degrees to six degrees to N.W., and similar rocks are proved to exist, by the imbedded fossils about thirty feet below the surface at the

The Rev. W.B. Clarke, M.A. Long Bridge, and elsewhere between it and Morpeth, and as at Mulberring Creek the dip of the same beds is from ten degrees to sixteen degrees to S.S.E., we shall then have the coal about 3,300 feet below the sea at the junction of the Williams and Hunter Rivers, whereas the coal measures in that neighbourhood are from 200 to 250 feet or more above the sea. On the south-west edge of this assumed basin we should have the underlying fossiliferous rocks, if they were present, forming an anticlinal arch between the heads of Wallis Creek and Harpur's Hill, the apex of which would be upwards of 6,000 feet above the sea, and, of course, at least 5,800 feet above the coal measures; whereas, on the Buttai Range, which is above the former, the upper coal measures are not quite 700 feet above the sea; a fault of such enormous magnitude can hardly exist, and, therefore, as I said before, I see no means of reconciling the difficulties in our way, and of explaining the matter satisfactorily, but by adopting the explanation I have given, viz., that the strata are folded up and drawn in long or short undulations, so that the coal beds are alternately elevated and depressed, and the underlying rocks made to partake in similar changes, becoming prominent at points where the strata fold anticlinally, by which the lower beds seem to occupy an apparent position not actually belonging to them. In this case, Lake Macquarie will be found to occupy a synclinal fold; and if so, coal underlies the whole of the lake between Ebenezer and Reid's Mistake, and also underlies the ocean between the latter place and Red Head, the line of strike agreeing with an observed rise in the beds, occupying the beach at Red Head, and in Nirritinba, or Mutton-bird Island, which is an outlier of the mass of coal measures now destroyed.

9 April, 1861.

I have troubled you at this length, in order to assign my reasons for the conclusions at which I have arrived,—conclusions which, I think, will hold good, till actual investigations, by artificial means, shall modify or disprove them. And if such investigation should prove what I think far from improbable, that the fossiliferous beds, generally supposed to be invariably below the coal, interpolate the series of coal beds as I know they do on the flanks of Mount Wingan, all that will, in that case, be effected, will be the establishment, by fresh proofs, of the truth of the supposition as to the vast thickness of our carboniferous formation.

To the Editors of the Sydney Morning Herald.

16 February, 1849.

Gentlemen,

We may well exclaim in the language of the poet—
" Quid non mortalia pectora cogis
" Auri sacra fames! "

when we call to mind the rush made to California; and now again we are startled by the cry of Mammon from Australia, inviting the indolent and covetous to make a hasty revenue from the clays and rocks of the Pyrenees.

Far be it from me to deter any adventurous individual from acquiring experience at his own cost, since it can do no harm for any one to become convinced that it may be bought too dear. I think it will be found so in the present instance. Gold is not so rare a mineral as many imagine, nor is there any lack of it in this country. It would not, indeed, be surprising if it should eventually be found in some abundance; but the story in the Melbourne Herald, which you have copied to-day, contains something improbable. That a shepherd-boy may have found a specimen in a quartz rock is likely enough—that he could not find another, after some days' digging, is actually stated!

The Editor of your Melbourne contemporary says—"From the specimens we have seen, an immense mass of gold lies in the bowels of the earth in the district of the Pyrenees, which has been thrown up in lava in volcanic action," &c.

It is, perhaps, rashness to deny the truth of this statement; but I venture to inform such of your readers as, on the strength of that announcement, are about to turn gold hunters, that there is no instance known of gold, either in little or great quantities, occurring in lava thrown up by volcanic action.

The fact stated, that the gold is mixed with quartz, proves distinctly that it occurs (if at all) in the Pyrenees, as it does in other parts of the world, and that there is nothing extraordinary about it. It generally occurs in veins of quartz traversing mica-schist, or chlorite schist, both of which rocks occur much nearer to Sydney than to the Pyrenees. It may do no harm to add, that there is no instance of a man making his fortune by opening a gold mine, and that it is only in countries where labour is as cheap as it is with slaves and serfs, that even gold-washing pays.

PLUTUS.

E.

Muswellbrook, 15 August, 1860.

The Rev. W. B.
Clarke, M.A.

Sir,

I take the liberty of addressing you, trusting that I shall, at least, receive pardon, even though you may decline giving the information which I solicit. 9 April, 1861.

When you were doing the Rev. Mr. Gore's duty in this town, many years ago, it is reported that you made use of this remarkable expression while standing under Mr. Nowland's verandah:—"If you good people of Muswellbrook knew what a mine of riches was under you feet you would not rest quiet in your beds"—you pointing at the time towards the hills opposite. Now, sir, as the town is in a most depressed state, and knowing that your acumen in geological matters is most acute, I naturally suppose you referred to a paying Gold Field, and have, therefore, been led to solicit information as to whether a paying Gold Field is possibly within the neighbourhood of this town, and in what direction a search would be likely to prove successful. Being the medical man practising here, I can speak from experience that the poverty among the labouring classes here is extreme; and should you be able to give me any hints to ameliorate the circumstances of the people you will be doing an act of charity to many.

As to the advisability of raising that state of excitement called a "gold fever," with all its concomitants of evil, I take it that the Almighty having, in his Divine wisdom, placed gold in certain places, and having blessed men with understanding to search and find it, has done so for some purpose of good. Therefore, I do not think, with some, that (because evil accompanies the discovery of gold), it is a sound reason to abstain from the search of gold, or that a man of science should object, on that ground, to make known the discoveries which He who is the giver of all wisdom has blessed him with the ability and means of making.

I am quite aware there are other reasons which might induce you to withhold any information on the subject you may possess, and to them I pay the respect due, not attempting to argue against them, but merely putting the subject in this way:—

You, possibly, are in the possession of information which, if divulged, might lead to the discovery of a paying Gold Field. I, as a stranger, ask you have you any objection to give me that information or part of it. Should you object, I submit to your decision, as I have no claim on you for it. Should you, on the contrary, acquiesce, I will not only feel indebted to your generosity, as well as honored by receiving a communication from one of the most scientific geologists of the present day, and one who has done so much, and received so small a reward from his country.

I have, &c.,
A. W. THORNTON,
M. R. C. S., &c.

F.

Now we have here a third striking resemblance to the condition of the Blue Mountain Ranges, which in Australia run rudely in a general line, not far from the meridian, through thirty degrees of latitude, in Tasmania and New Holland, and New Guinea, having their highest points at an altitude of from 5,000 to 6,000 feet above the sea; with an axis of chloritic and talcose schist, and quartzites, with occasional limestones of Silurian age, in which occur metallic ores and gold in veins of quartz. Moreover, granitic rocks of a comparatively younger age break through them.

As on the flanks of the Ural, the carboniferous formation reposes, so in this country occurs the very same order of deposits.

It is, therefore, highly probable that, besides the lead and copper which exists in the Blue Mountain Ranges, auriferous sands will be found in the rivers flowing from them. Indeed, gold occurs not only in the veins of quartz which traverse the schist, but in the black striated cubes of pyrites so common in the Bathurst country. Nor ought there to be any astonishment if, hereafter, it be discovered that platinum also exists in N. S. W. In respect of all other phenomena, the dividing ranges of New Holland are similar to the Ural, with the exception that the slope in this hemisphere is to the west, and the escarpment edges of the deposits to the east; and let it be observed, that the general direction of the South Australian mineral ores is nearly, if not (on the large scale) actually parallel with the greater chain to the eastward. N. S. W. will, probably, on some future day, be found wonderfully rich in metals.

G.

Green Ponds, 16 August, 1860.

When we arrived at Melbourne your dear sister had some of your letters (three, I think) which were written in 1841; two containing allusions to the auriferous character of the mountain ranges of N. S. W. If you recollect, she sent those letters to you in the summer of 1851, when they fell, together with my testimonials forwarded to the Bishop of Newcastle, into the hands of the scoundrels who robbed the mails and burned all the contents of the bags. I had to get my papers out from England again when I came over here. On referring back, however, to my articles in the Herald at the time (the Melbourne Herald I mean), I find the following quotation from one of them. The date is Tuesday, June 3, 1851. Speaking of the gold as fine and plentiful, you ask, "Who would turn badger and mole to get it, but one who has no other way of procuring it?"

If you can get a file of the Herald for June and July, 1851, you will find several articles of mine alluding to these letters.

Rev. W. B. Clarke.

WM. TROLLOPE.

H.

St. Leonard's, 7 July, 1851.

My Dear Sir,

After I left you on Saturday, I reflected on the conversation which had taken place, and gave full attention to what fell from you respecting a Commission, with an elected Chairman.

In the course of the day I became acquainted with the sentiments of one gentleman named by you.

The result of my consideration is to strengthen my prejudice against any incorporation whatever, and I therefore deem it a bounden duty to state frankly that, though I am prepared, to the best of my humble ability, to serve the Government and the Colony in the proposed survey and report, my own reputation is too much concerned in the matter to allow me to undertake it in conjunction with others. You will observe that in the case of Murchison and M. de Verneuil, that they were obliged to separate from Baron Meyendorff in consequence of a difference of objects, and that the success of the two geologists depended altogether on their perfect unity of purpose, zeal, diligence, and geological animus.

In the case supposed, there can be nothing of this kind, and the only result to me would be vexation and annoyance. I am not prepared to sacrifice for this, my present quiet endeavour to complete my report of the Colony.

When

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A. When you consider that I have now been at work unassisted in any way for twelve years, that I have nearly finished a survey of the whole country, and that it is my wish to complete it by myself, you will see at once how completely opposed it will be to my design and desire, to be bound and shackled by those who will not keep pace with me, and whom I must either work for, or yield too often perhaps against my own conclusions.

9 April, 1861.

With an able practical geologist, who has really acquired his experience in the field, I should be glad to work in company; but as this cannot be, however high, as undoubtedly it is, my opinion may be of my contemporaries, I can only, in common justice to myself, and what is expected from me, offer my services unfettered by connection with others. No doubt the proposed expedition would enable me to fill some gaps in my report, which will be at last for the benefit of the Colony, and not of myself; but I would rather forego whatever advantages I might gain than place myself in a false position.

I must beg you to believe, notwithstanding, that I am anxious to do what I ought, and what I can, in the present emergency.

Believe me, &c.,
W. B. CLARKE.

The Honorable
E. Deas Thomson, Esq.

I.

St. Leonard's, 9 July, 1851.

My dear Sir,

I would have called before with the accompanying papers, but have been prevented by the weather, by funerals, and attendance on sick parishioners.

I think you have all the ideas I wished to convey respecting the extent and object of the proposed exploration for the purpose in view.

I am quite willing to undertake this exploration alone, and would much prefer being disconnected from others. The object is a simple one, and would be facilitated by such exploration, and a report respecting the results of the survey would be more useful as embodying the general deductions of one than the, perhaps, opposed principles of several.

All I would require would be to be supplied with all that might be necessary to carry on the survey, in the way of expense, and such remuneration for the loss of present income, &c., as the service would deserve, coupled with the option of being allowed to be the bearer of my own report to the Home Government, accredited by the Colonial Government, if necessary to send Home the report.

If arrangements can be made to set me free by the beginning of August, I would be ready to start within a few days afterwards.

I hope to be able to see you to-morrow (Saturday) as I wish to shew you the results of some experiments upon quartz rock, which, I think will be interesting to you. I have sent a letter respecting them to the Herald, for publication.

It is better, however, to forward the papers at once.

Believe me, &c.,
W. B. CLARKE.

I. SHEPHERD, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

The Rev. William Branwhite Clarke, M.A., called in and further examined:—

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A. 89. By the Chairman: With the permission of the gentlemen of the Committee, before I proceed to ask you the questions that I intend to do, in resumption of your evidence, I would like to ask you in reference to a question put to you by Mr. Hoskins, in regard to a lecture given by Sir Roderick Murchison in 1844. Reference was made by the honorable gentleman to some matter contained in that lecture, with some remarks as to what Sir R. Murchison had done in 1844. Can you offer any explanation on this point? Yes. I have purposely brought all the papers having reference to this very question.

12 April, 1861.

90. By Mr. Hoskins: You may remember that the purport of my question was, as to whether you were aware that Sir R. Murchison had read a paper before the Royal Geographical Society of London, and also, that this paper, and the opinions it contained, had been printed; that in this paper he had inferred, from the similarity of the formation of the Australian Alps with the Ural Chain, that the former would be found to be auriferous as the latter had been; and that this publication was anterior to any publication of your views in England? Exactly; and if you remember I said they were so. That the publication of these views of Sir R. Murchison was prior to the publication in England of anybody else's theory, I readily admit. I may say that I never saw the document alluded to, before the other day. I had, of course, heard of it before, and immediately I reached home, after the Committee closed the other day, I searched out the volume of the Geographical Society's Journal, in which this paper occurs; and I have now here with me, a copy of the article itself. This is, no doubt, the passage to which you alluded—he is speaking of the crystalline rocks which are prolonged along the whole of the Eastern Coast of New Holland, and then proceeds to draw out a general comparison between the Ural Chain and the Great Australian Range—he says, "With the exception then of a few embranchments towards its southern end, which throw off the waters of the Darling and its tributaries into the new settlements of South Australia, and of the curvilinear band in Van Diemen's Land, this

"chain may be said to have a meridian direction through upwards of 35° of latitude, and is therefore considerably longer than the Ural, another great meridian chain, of which I have elsewhere spoken, even if we include in the latter the great islands of Nova Zembla. The Australian chain further resembles the Ural, in being composed, according to Strzelecki, of an axis of eruptive or igneous rocks (greenish syenite, greenstone, porphyry, serpentine, &c.), some metamorphic rocks (quartz rocks and slate), with unquestionable palæozoic deposits on either flank. It still further resembles the Ural in altitude, and in the total absence of all free transported blocks or boulders, all the alluvia or diluvia being local; but it so far differs from the Ural and many other meridian chains, in having, as yet, offered no trace of gold or auriferous veins."

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A.
12 April, 1861.

91. By Mr. Wilson: What was the date of this address? It was read on the 27th May, 1844. I have also looked through his book upon the Ural, and I find that the date of his dedication to the Emperor of Russia is May, 1845. His position as the first publisher in England of the theory of the resemblance of the Ural and the Australian Chains, is not at all assailable. With regard to the actual discovery, however, Sir Roderick, in his work on Siluria, 3rd edition, 1859, p. 491, after saying in the preceding page, "The Rev. W. B. Clarke did, however, rouse the attention of the inhabitants of New South Wales in 1847, to the auriferous character of these rocks, and indicated, as I had previously done, their similarity to the rocks of the Ural Mountains, including the meridional direction of the two chains," goes on, "Just as in Siberia the greatest amount of gold is found in heaps of debris, or old alluvia derived chiefly from veinstones in old slaty rocks, and often adjacent to or associated with eruptive rocks, whether granites, porphyries, or greenstones. I also assumed that the chief auriferous slaty rocks of Eastern Australia are of the same age as the central masses of the Ural, viz., Lower Silurian; because, like them, they are overlaid in parts by strata which contain Pentameris, Trilobites, and Corals, indicative of the Upper Silurian Group. Many of these last have been identified by my friend Mr. Lonsdale, who considers some to be Upper Silurian, and others referable to the carboniferous era. The shells examined by Mr. Salter confirm this conclusion; and the carboniferous strata, with European forms of life, appear to be clearly separable from the Devonian." Now, I am prepared to shew you that what Sir R. Murchison assumed, I had in my hands prior to 1847; and I have also documents coming from his own office to shew that the specimens he here alludes to were not in his hands, and examined by him until 1856. Consequently he has shewn here, as having been alluded to by him in 1844, matter that was not actually in his power until 12 years after that time. I have no doubt but that this omission of dates was made by mistake, and I have already written to him on the subject, when I am sure he will do me justice. I now produce before the Committee, these letters, which principally come out of Sir Roderick's own office. One dated 12th July, 1858, from Mr. Lonsdale; another May 9, 1856; and a letter from Sir R. Murchison himself, dated 30th May, 1856, in which he enters into some of these very points. All these letters go to shew that Sir Roderick made a mistake by omitting the date in what he wrote in his Siluria; for what he should have said in place of what I have read is, that since he made the remarks he did in his address to the Geographical Society, in 1844, he had received such evidence of the correctness of his theory, as unmistakably to establish it. And here I may remark that to a very great extent he has thanked me for having established this point.

92. By Mr. Hoskins: I am perfectly satisfied upon the point? But you could not have been satisfied, because you could not have known of the existence of these documents which I now produce before the Committee. Then, again, there has been a controversy between Mr. George Windsor Earl and Sir R. Murchison in reference to the anticipation of the latter of the gold discoveries in Australia; and in one of the letters of Mr. Earl, published in a pamphlet in 1853, and addressed to Lord Colchester, as President of the Geographical Society, the following passage occurs:—"I first became aware of the fact that Sir R. Murchison was himself a party to the claim, subsequent to the dispatch of my letter to your Lordship of the 10th April, 1852. The intelligence reached me through the proceedings of the Geological Society at the meeting of February 4th of that year, in which Sir R. Murchison defends the originality of his anticipations, &c., against a rival claim set up by the Rev. W. B. Clarke, also a Fellow of the Geological Society. The paper of Sir R. Murchison, which was read on that occasion, also notices the fact of fossils of known 'Silurian' species having been discovered in the dividing range of New South Wales (by the Rev. W. B. Clarke), and which is described in the paper (by Sir R. Murchison) as completing the resemblance between the Australian Cordillera and the Ural Mountains of Asia, the two chains being thus shewn to be zoologically, as well as lithologically similar." Now this discovery of "fossils of known Silurian species" in the dividing range was my work, and the passage becomes more clear by the words I have inserted in parenthesis; and when Sir R. Murchison read his papers to the Geological Society, he must have been in receipt of my letters proclaiming this discovery. The fact is that the whole mistake has occurred through a jumble of dates; and the only thing I care about in the matter is, that I shall not be deprived of the credit of this, which is a point to which I have paid very great attention since my arrival in the Colony. I also produce another letter from Mr. G. W. Earl to Captain Smith, also on the same point, clearly proving my right to claim the priority in the actual discovery. I put all these documents before the Committee for fear that they should have misunderstood what I have said.

93. The Committee have not misunderstood you, but I fear you have mistaken the tenor of my question? I only wish to place myself right before the public. And here again are three letters from Sir R. Murchison to myself in reference to my claim, and one from Mr. Earl to a friend of his, in which he asks his friend, "Please do not move in the matter " until

The Rev. W. D. Clarke, M.A. "until I shall have had further opportunity of inquiry, but if it will serve Mr. Clarke, & Co." So that the Committee will see that this matter has been pretty well ventilated at Home; and the documents I now lay before the Committee are of very great value to me, because they shew that the discovery of the fossils proving the age of the rocks, shewing them to be of the same genera and species as those found in Russia, and in other countries where gold is abundant, was my work, though it was not this discovery which first led Sir R. Murchison to the conclusion that gold existed here.

12 April, 1861.

94. By Mr. Wilson: Then, in point of fact, it was from an inspection of these fossils, and your description of them, that Sir R. Murchison was first led to judge that the rocks were auriferous? I will explain. It so happened that Count Strzelecki reached Home from Australia, with numerous specimens of the rocks of the Australian Cordillera, just about the same time as Sir R. Murchison got Home from Russia with his large collection of specimens from the Ural; and there is no doubt whatever but that he compared the two, the more particularly as I was informed that Sir R. Murchison edited Count Strzelecki's work on the "Physical Description of New South Wales." There was, however, this difference between the two in Sir R. Murchison's mind, that gold had been found in the Ural, but none in Australia, and this distinction he clearly marks in his address delivered in 1844. In fact, Sir R. Murchison received no specimen of gold from Australia until 1846. In 1852 he got from me an account of my discovery of fossils, when he gave me the credit of completing the comparison between the Ural and the great Australian chain which he had begun in 1844. These documents which I have laid before the Committee establish this fact in my favour, and shew that in his Siluria, Sir R. Murchison has not sufficiently pointed it out. He has, however, more than once promised to put me right with the public in this respect; and I have no doubt but that he will do so. I may mention that there is really no actual difference between Sir Roderick and myself; and having now before him documents that were not at hand before, he will doubtless come to a different conclusion to that at which he had previously arrived.

95. He delivered a second lecture subsequently? He did. The date of that address was in 1846, and after that, or about that time, it was, that he got the first specimens of gold from Australia, I believe from Mr. T. W. Smith. I have no feeling against Sir R. Murchison in this matter. I believe that he made an unintentional omission, and my only anxiety is that I should be put right before the public.

96. The only object of the Committee is to put you in your true position? That is all I require; and from the passages I have read, and the letters I have laid before the Committee, it is clearly shewn that Sir R. Murchison admits that, on the 27th May, 1844, when he delivered his address, he did not know of, and did not venture to declare, the existence of gold in Australia, whatever he may have surmised; whilst it has been clearly proved that I communicated my discovery to several persons in 1841, 2, 3, and 4, and to Sir George Gipps on the 9th April, 1844. At the same time I admit that the first reference to the similarity of the Ural and the Australian chains published in England was by Sir R. Murchison.

97. By the Chairman: My last question to you at the previous meeting of the Committee was, whether or not the Bishop had sanctioned your employment in the way proposed by the Government, and to this you answered that he did—I would now ask you what were your receipts from the Treasury up to the time of your employment as a geologist? I have a return from the Auditor General of the whole sums I have received from the Treasury up to the present time.

98. What I wish to know is, what were your receipts from the Treasury from the time of your arrival in the Colony up to the time when the Bishop sanctioned your new employment? I had occasion some time ago to require, for my own use, a memorandum of the various amounts I had received from the Government since my arrival to the present time; and I consequently wrote to the Auditor General, to request that he would furnish me with an account of every sum paid to me from the Treasury of New South Wales, from the 26th May, 1839, to the 31st December, 1860. From the account thus furnished me, I find that from the 26th May, 1839, to the 31st August, 1851, when I was otherwise employed by the Government, I received £1,675 11s. 11d., including £75 12s., for a period of 12½ years, for travelling expenses, or less than £137 annually.

99. Was that your total amount of income from all sources? From all public Colonial sources, yes.

100. You were not then in receipt of income from any other public source? I was not.

101. What stipulation was made as to the remuneration you were to receive for your services? My salary was fixed at £150 a year for 12 months after my arrival. I subsequently received a stipend at the rate of £200 a year, with an occasional allowance for travelling expenses. The amount is made up as follows:—

The Rev. W. B.
Clarke, M.A.

12 April, 1861.

102. What I meant to ask you was, whether upon entering upon your geological duties at the request of the Government you made any arrangement with respect to the compensation you were to receive for your services? I think I explained to the Committee before, that I was spoken to by the Government to join a Board, to be established permanently in Sydney, which Board was to receive and collate the reports upon the Gold Fields received from various quarters. This proposal I rejected, as I preferred making my own surveys, and arriving at my own conclusions with the facts fresh before me. The matter then came before me in another shape, and it was proposed by the Government that I should undertake a geological survey of the country in relation to gold discovery. I informed the Government that I had no objection to undertake this duty, provided that my Diocesan offered no obstacle. The Governor thereupon wrote to the Bishop to know if my services could be spared for a time; and the Bishop on this allowed me to go, and wrote to me acquainting me with the fact. The thing then was so far settled, and afterwards I had an interview with Mr. Deas Thomson, then Colonial Secretary, when he said to me, "The Government have some little difficulty as to the way in which they are to remunerate you,—can you suggest how this is to be done." I at once replied, that if I were a layman, I could tell the Government in a moment what I had a right to expect, and what they ought to do—for I knew well the extent of work that would have to be performed, and how to perform it; but, I told him, situated as I was, receiving an income from the country as a clergyman, I did not feel myself in a position to drive a bargain with the Government. At the same time, having a family to provide for, I must take care not to lose anything by my journey, and therefore if the Government would save me from loss, and provide me with all I want, I would undertake the duties required of me; and then afterwards when the work is finished, you can remunerate me for my labours, as you may think fit. This was the arrangement then made, and I have it in writing from the Government. In the despatch from the Colonial Secretary to myself, dated 8th August, 1851, the concluding paragraph is as follows:—"In conclusion, I beg to add that your equipment and pecuniary allowance will be in accordance with the terms suggested in your note of the 4th ultimo, namely, to be supplied with all that may be necessary to carry on the survey at the public expense, and allowed such compensation as may be sufficient to cover the loss of present income, and such further remuneration as the service may appear to entitle you to; but I am distinctly to state, that the Government cannot accede to your stipulation or request, that when your final report has been furnished, you should be allowed to be the bearer of it to England." I may say here, that my object in requesting to be allowed to be the bearer of these reports to England, was in order that I might be enabled to publish there something in relation to the geology of the Colony, which I could not possibly do here. I hoped that by taking my work Home to England to be published, I should be able to do so more cheaply, whilst, at the same time, I should be brought into contact with many of my scientific friends, from whom I should have received very great assistance.

103. At that time you did not ask the Government to compensate you for more than the amount of which you were then in receipt? No; I did not ask for more. I must, however, clearly explain this. All I asked from the Government was, to compensate me to the extent of £300; my income, however, was much more than that which I received from the Government, for if it had not been, I could not have lived upon it at that time. My stipend was then £200; my income more.

104. What was about your annual income when you made this arrangement with the Government? It was about £420 or £430 a year; and in the course of the conversation with Mr. Deas Thomson, I suggested to him that, as in undertaking the duties of the survey, I was not looking for money, but merely desired to do a service to the country, the Government had better make me compensation to the amount of £300 a year, and I gave up the remaining £120. But, whilst I did this, I had left upon my hands the parsonage at St. Leonard's, which I had to maintain and keep up.

105. By Mr. Hoskins: You considered that £300 a year was all that you could legitimately claim from the Government? As I have said, I was in the receipt of more than that, but as I was not desiring to drive a bargain with the Government, as a layman would have done, I did not ask for compensation for more than £300 a year; nor should I have pressed this, only that my family was then in England, and I required the money in order to remit to them.

106. By Mr. Mate: What was the full amount of your income from all sources for that year? It was between £420 and £430, up to the Easter of 1851.

107. By the Chairman: You are satisfied with the arrangement entered into with you by the Government? Yes; I have no complaint whatever to make against them, since they did all I asked them to do, and gave me all the means I required for carrying out the survey. They supplied me with all the articles I demanded, and allowed me £300 a year compensation during the time I was employed, though this was not sufficient to cover the loss of all the income I was then receiving. However, I do not blame the Government for that, because they gave me all I asked for, and I have no doubt that, if I had demanded more, I should have got it; and I only mention the matter in order to shew that I was not driving a bargain with the Government, for if I had been, I should not have allowed myself to be a loser.

The Rev. W.B. Clarke, M.A. 108. Did you receive any instructions from the Government? Yes. The letter from which I have just quoted, in regard to the compensation, was from my first letter of instructions, dated August the 8th, 1851.

12 April, 1861. 109. What were those instructions? The letter, after stating that the Government accepted my services "to proceed to ascertain the probability of the existence of gold in various parts of the Colony, not only in the alluvial deposits, but also in the rock, both visibly and "invisibly," directed my attention more particularly to the following places, viz. :—The heads of the Macintyre Brook; the waters running into the Severn; the country at the head of the Apsley; the country below the Apsley Falls; the heads of the rivers joining the Peel, near Tamworth; the heads of the Talbrago and Coolaburagundi; the whole of the creeks and rivers flowing to the Macquarie, as far as Sappa Bulga; the head of the Colo; the heads of the Lachlan; the rivers and creeks falling eastwardly and westwardly, between the Crookwell and Cooma; the heads of waters falling south-eastwardly from Cooma to Cape Howe; the country between 35° and 37° south, and between 147° and 149° 30' east; such portions of New South Wales as lie south-west from the Tumut; the Meridian ranges, between 146° and 149° east, and between 32° and 34° south; and the country at the head of the Logan and Richmond. As a preliminary step, I was ordered to examine "the ranges" dividing the waters of the Hunter from those falling to the coast, between the Hunter and "Broken Bay, where metals are reported to exist." The instructions then say, "It will be necessary that observations should be made on the geological features of the country, as well as experiments to ascertain, not only the wealth and extent of auriferous alluvies, but the existence and amount of invisible gold in the rocks; but it is not desired to confine you to any distinct system of observation, as you will, no doubt, be better able to ascertain the speediest and surest way of gaining the end required by following your own "discoveries."

110. Who supplied the Government with the names of the localities mentioned in these instructions? I did. They were places at which I expected to find gold, and I supplied the list to the Government.

111. Were instructions to survey and search for gold given at the same time to any one else? Yes; to Mr. Hargraves.

112. Are you aware what those instructions were? Yes; in the letter from the Colonial Secretary to Mr. Hargraves, dated 10th June, 1851, it is stated :—"It has been suggested to the Government, by a gentleman of great scientific acquirements, that the 149th meridian passes through a rich metalliferous region, and where schists traversed by quartz rock, and which have been transmuted by igneous rocks, occur, are localities in which creeks running laterally into waters falling north should be examined. It is also stated, that, south of Bowring, the main creeks run south into the Murrumbidgee, which deserve attention; and the heads of the Tumut and Cooradigbee, Tarentta, Yiven, &c., are mentioned as likely places to supply gold. The whole 149th meridian indeed ought to be examined."

113. Who supplied the names of the localities here mentioned? I did. That was the first time that I had seen Mr. Hargraves, or spoken to him. I happened to be with Mr. Thomson at the time, when he said, "Oh! here comes Mr. Hargraves." I then asked him to introduce me to that gentleman, and when he came up, we were introduced. I then congratulated him on his appointment, and asked him why he had not come to see me, as he had been requested to do. Mr. Thomson then asked me to sit down and write the names of the places which I would consider it advisable Mr. H. should visit to search for gold. I thought this a very odd request at the time, as it implied one of two things, either, that it was thought that Mr. Hargraves did not know where to go, and that I was to direct him, or else that I did not know, and that Mr. Hargraves was to prove that I did not; and so I felt bound to at once shew that I had no fear on the subject, and that I really did know what I was about. I then sat down and wrote the names of the places which I should advise to be searched; and the names I have just read from the instructions to myself and Mr. Hargraves are those of the places in which I expected gold to occur; and if the Committee will but take the trouble to look at all these places, where they are situated and how very widely apart, they will see how very large an extent of country is here designated, nearly the whole of which has since been proved to be auriferous.

114. From what sources did you derive your knowledge? I think I explained that the other day, but I may again say that some of the localities I had examined, whilst others had been examined by persons employed to do so, who had transmitted to me specimens of the rocks; on these I formed an opinion as to the auriferous nature of the ground, in the same way as Sir R. Murchison had previously or subsequently done with regard to Strzelecki's specimens. It seems also, that in every instance I came to a conclusion that turned out to be a correct one.

115. Did you point out to the officials of this country any other locality which you declared, before any gold had been found there, as likely to be highly auriferous? Yes. I pointed out to Mr. Deas Thomson the Mount Alexander country on the map. The Colonies had just then been separated, and he asked me if there was anything in Victoria as in New South Wales. I told him there was, and I can remember putting my finger on the spot where Mount Alexander is marked on the map, and saying, "there is the tail of it." This remark was made in Mr. Hargraves' presence. On the 18th June, 1851, I printed the announcement of this fact in a pamphlet ("Plain Statements," &c., p. 12.) in these words, "Thus gold ought to be found, if at all, in the province of Victoria, between 143° and 145° E., north and south of 37° S. lat."

116. Were these statements of yours confirmed by subsequent discoveries? Most certainly; because the two great Gold Fields of Bendigo and Ballarat were both in connection with Mount Alexander.

117. In one of your reports you mention that before long an area of 16,000 square miles of auriferous land in New South Wales would be open to the researches of the miner; has that prognostication been realized? It has, to the fullest extent, an immense deal more than that quantity having been opened, and being now under work. Here is a passage from one of my Reports to the Government, dated 20th May, 1852.

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A.
12 April, 1861.

118. So that with regard to the 16,000 square miles, your prognostication was strictly within the limits of truth? Yes, and very far within; but before we go further, I should wish that the Committee would permit me to clearly prove this point in reference to Mount Alexander.

119. I was coming to that in my next question. Did the Government or the Parliament of Victoria acknowledge your services in relation to the gold discovery there, in any way; and can you shew that you were at all instrumental in any of the great gold discoveries there? I can. I have before me, in the Parliamentary papers of Victoria, a Report from the Select Committee of the Council, appointed to inquire into the claims for the discovery of gold in Victoria, dated the 10th March, 1854, in which the following passages occur:—
“ Mr. Thomas Hiscock, a resident at Buninyong, induced by the writings of the Rev. W. B. Clarke, and by the discovery of Brentain’s nugget in the Pyrennes district, five years before, had kept a constant look-out for gold in his neighbourhood. * * * It is obvious that Mr. Hiscock’s discovery, at Buninyong, by attracting great numbers of diggers to the neighbourhood, was the cause of the discovery of Ballarat, and is, in fact, upon the same range, and at no great distance—about six or seven miles. * * * In the language of a disinterested witness, Mr. Alfred Clarke, of Geelong, ‘the discovery of Ballarat was but a natural consequence of the discovery at Buninyong.’” The Report, however, opens with the following passage, which plainly shews the grounds upon which the Committee proceeded:—“ In dealing with this subject, your Committee cannot but draw some distinction between scientific and practical discovery; for although the former would in reality have been equally as beneficial as the latter, had the colonists been as ready to trust to the scientific theories of the scholar as they were to the tangible demonstrations of the actual digger, yet, seeing what has been the result of the Rev. W. B. Clarke’s discovery in 1841, as compared with that of Mr. Hargraves’ in 1851, your Committee feel called upon to recommend a more substantial reward to the one than they can do to the other. At the same time they admit the higher claims to honor and public consideration that the scientific explorer possesses. It appears from the evidence given by the Rev. W. B. Clarke before the Select Committee of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, that as far back as 1841 he discovered gold in the mountainous country to the west of the Vale of Clwyd.” The Report then goes on to mention the facts in relation to my discovery of gold at that period, and then continues:—
“ Thus it appears that the Rev. W. B. Clarke did all in his power to make his discovery serviceable to a country not then in a position to make that discovery available, and your Committee feel bound to recognize his claim to be considered the first discoverer of gold in Australia.” The Report concludes with several recommendations, amongst which is the following:—“ Your Committee recommend that the sum of £1,000 should be awarded to the Rev. W. B. Clarke, in appreciation of his researches into the mineral wealth of the country.” I would also wish to read a few passages from the evidence given before that Committee upon this point. Mr. William Patterson, a gold broker of Geelong, gave the following evidence, in answer to Mr. Strachan:—“ Q. 184. Do you know Hiscock? I do.
“ Q. 185. When did you first see him on the occasion of the discovery of gold? I did not see him then. It is only within the last few weeks that I have known him. All that I knew of him before that was from the reports in the Geelong Advertiser. Q. 186. Has he spoken to you of his discoveries? Yes; and he says that it was from reading the writings of the Rev. W. B. Clarke that he was led to make a search for gold in this Colony.” Mr. Alfred Clarke was asked if this discovery led to the discovery of Ballarat, and he says it did. Mr. Thomas Hiscock was also examined before the same Committee, and gave evidence very much to the same effect. Now I told Mr. Thomson previous to this, that was in 1851, that the gold extended to Mount Alexander, and this evidence as to the correctness of my views came out in this Report of 1854.

120. Did the Government of New South Wales agree to give you any further remuneration at the close of the term for which you had arranged? They did.

121. What sum did they give you? It was stipulated in the original agreement that they should give me such further remuneration as in the words of the instructions “the service may appear to entitle me to.”

122. What sum did they propose to give you? I produce a letter from the Colonial Secretary, dated 2nd September, 1853, in which he informs me that the question of the amount of gratuity to be awarded to me for my services had been considered by the Governor and the Executive Council; that he was now directed to inform me, that as I had during the time of my employment been in the receipt of £800 a year, the Council had expressed an opinion that I should receive a gratuity of £500, which amount His Excellency now directed to be paid to me.

123. The Governor and Executive Council awarded you the sum of £500? They did.

124. Did you receive any addition to that amount; and if so, upon what grounds? Yes; I received an additional grant of £500, and on the following grounds:—A Committee of the Legislative Council was then sitting to inquire into the state and management of the Gold Fields, and they took my services rendered to the country into their consideration, and came to the conclusion, that the Government had awarded me an insufficient sum, recommending that the sum of a £1,000 should be placed upon the Estimates for me instead of £500 as proposed by the Government. This was notified to me by a letter from the Colonial Secretary, who informed me, that this sum of a £1,000 was at my disposal.

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A. 125. By Mr. Hoskins: To what Gold Committee are you now alluding? To one appointed by the old Legislative Council, and which sat for three Sessions to inquire into the state and management of the Gold Fields. They were sitting at the time the Government awarded me this sum of £500, and regarding it as insufficient to meet the justice of my case, recommended its increase to £1,000. This sum was subsequently agreed to by the Government, and I received a notification of the fact from the Colonial Secretary.

12 April, 1861.

126. By the Chairman: Did this sum of £1,000 cover the expenses you had incurred in preparing for and executing your instructions? Upon this point I should like to say a few words beyond giving a direct answer, out of a sense of justice to myself and my position. If I had been a layman, and making a bargain with the Government for my services, I should not, of course, have left it open to decide, after the work was done, what sum I should have received, but should have fixed the amount at once that I considered my work would be worth. Being a clergyman, I could not do this. If I had been asked to fix upon a sum to pay my own personal expenses on these expeditions, I should have named £500—the amount awarded me as remuneration by the Government; for it must be remembered that I was incurring very many liabilities; for, besides giving up my clerical engagements, which were performed by another person, I still had the charge of the Parsonage at St. Leonard's, which was maintained at a cost of between £60 and £70 a year; and besides this I had to make a rent allowance to my successor in the ecclesiastical duties. There were also very many little things that I did in order to carry out the expedition successfully, all of which entailed considerable expense upon me, so that I had really but very little left out of the £500 awarded to me when the balance was struck. As to the £500 remunerating me, I do not think that ten times that amount would have been more than a fair remuneration for the work I did.

127. Did you express yourself satisfied with the amount awarded to you? I replied to the communication informing me of it, that I was thankful to the Government for what they had done, as I regarded it as a testimonial to the value of the services I had rendered.

128. However it did not leave you much profit? I did not look for it. Profit was the last thing that entered into my consideration. All I looked to was, the establishment of my reputation and the advancement of the Colony.

129. By Mr. O'Brien: To what extent did the Gold Committee then sitting recommend the amount awarded by the Government to be increased? By £500 in addition to the amount awarded. The Governor and Executive Council decided upon giving me £500, and then the Committee recommended that this sum should be increased to £1,000. When I was informed of this, I replied to the effect that the two sums were to be looked upon as two separate testimonials, the one from the Executive and the other from the Legislative Council.

130. You were informed then that the Gold Committee recommended that the £500 should be extended—to how much? To £1,000; but I had no communication with the Committee; I was informed through the Government that such a recommendation had been made; the information came from the Colonial Secretary's Office.

131. By Mr. Wisdom: How long were you engaged upon this survey? I left Sydney in September, 1851, and returned in June, 1852; I then went away again in October, 1852, and returned in July, 1853. Altogether I was engaged twenty-two months in the survey; that was the time which elapsed before I again assumed my duties as a clergyman at St. Leonard's.

132. That, however, includes the time you were in Sydney? Yes; and I take that time into account, because I was just as hard worked then as I was when in the country; for I was engaged in drawing up a supplement to my reports, and in correspondence with the Government. The actual cause that brought me down was this:—The Bishop was then on the eve of his departure to England, and I wished much to see him before he left. Mr. Thomson had written me a private letter, requesting me to continue my surveys, the original understanding with the Bishop being that I should not be engaged upon it for more than a year. I told him that I was willing to continue if the Bishop assented; and then I received this official letter, dated in April, 1852. [Letter from Colonial Secretary to Rev. W. B. Clarke, April, 1852.] I set out for the Northern Districts in October, 1852, and was engaged there about ten months; and if I had had another year, it was my intention to have gone through the Western Districts.

133. By the Chairman: You were not employed to dig for gold? No, certainly not; I only went in the capacity of a geologist, to make a geological survey of the country.

134. How many men had you with you? Two men.

135. The Government allowed you these? Yes, and paid them. One was cook, and the other had to look after the horses. I again say, that I have no complaint to make of the Government, for they did all I asked them to do.

136. Had you any further assistance—any staff of officers? No. I was dependent entirely upon my own knowledge. All I did was done single-handed; and I never had an atom of help.

137. Did the two men give you no assistance? Not at all. They were rather a nuisance than anything else, and if I were going again on a similar expedition, I should pursue a totally different plan.

138. By Mr. O'Brien: Did the £1,000 embrace your two years receipts from the Government? Yes, it embraced everything.

139. By Mr. Hoskins: You have however received £1,000 besides the compensation of £300 a year? Yes, certainly.

140. How did you receive it? In one sum. I had not received the first £500 when the second was awarded to me by the Committee.

141. By the Chairman : You have made numerous reports to the Government in the course of your researches? I have. Upwards of thirty.
142. Have your reports been published for general information? Yes, both here and by order of the British Parliament.
143. They have then attracted a considerable degree of public attention? Yes, everywhere. They are now well known all over the world.
144. By Mr. Wisdom : They were printed, I believe, amongst the Parliamentary papers, by order of the House of Commons? Yes, in the ordinary mode. They were printed here first, and were then sent Home to the Government. The Ministers laid them on the Table of the House of Commons, and they were ordered to be printed. A great many of them appear in this work of mine on the Southern Gold Fields, and I may as well here state that my object in writing this book was simply this:—I had received very numerous applications from all parts of the country for copies of these reports, and finding upon inquiry that they were out of print, I waited upon Mr. Cowper and Mr. Robertson, to ask them if they had any objection to my reprinting them. They made no objection, so I compiled them in this work, and I may say that I have every reason to be satisfied with the way they have been received both here and at Home.
145. By the Chairman : Are these reports well known in foreign countries as well as in England? They are.
146. Have any foreign writers expressed an opinion upon them, or upon your claim to be considered the discoverer of gold in Australia; and if so, can you shew the Committee where they have done so? I think I can do so, but I shall have to prove it by referring to books which I have not here with me. Here, however, is a letter from the Vicomte d'Archiac, dated the 21st March, 1851, in which he alludes to my reports. He is a highly scientific gentleman, employed to collect and collate the geological reports for the French Empire. Here is another letter received from St. Petersburg, from Tarassenko Otreschkow, a Councillor of State, dated the 25th July, or our 8th August, in which he highly compliments me.
147. Have you made any discovery of valuable minerals and metals besides gold and coal? Yes. With regard to tin I consider that I was the first to find tin in the Colony. Amongst other metals I have seen and reported on a good deal of lead and copper.
148. By Mr. O'Brien : Did your researches lead you to the discovery of tin at the Ovens? No, I did not find it there; it was on the Murrumbidgee, on the Alps, and in New England I got it.
149. By Mr. Hoskins : Where did you discover it—in the black sand? No. And with regard to the black sand of New England, which has always been regarded as a detritus, I may mention that I have had some correspondence respecting it with Mr. Cleghorn, a practical miner; and I have placed some of it under the microscope, and I find that instead of being a detritus it is a mass of pure crystals.
150. By the Chairman : Have you explored other Colonies besides New South Wales? Yes; parts of both Victoria and Tasmania.
151. Have you been instrumental in discovering gold in Tasmania as well as in Victoria? I have; and besides that, I claim the priority in having discovered it also in New Zealand.
152. Have you evidence to shew this? I produce a copy of the Illustrated London News, of December 3, 1853, containing an illustration of the first working of gold in New Zealand, and in the description attached to it, the following passage occurs:—"The New Zealand settlers were first led to search for gold in their country by an opinion of the Rev. W. B. Clarke, the Government Mineralogist in New South Wales, expressed in the Geological Report of that gentleman on the Australian Gold Fields, and which was to the effect that a similar geological formation to that of the auriferous mountains of California, and of Bathurst, N. S. Wales, might be expected to exist in the principal mountain ranges, extending in a direction north and south, in New Caledonia and New Zealand. About the month of June, 1852, some specimens of quartz, from the vicinity of Wellington, Cook's Straits, were transmitted to Mr. Clarke, and were found by him to contain gold." As is mentioned here, I received at different times, a lot of specimens from New Zealand, and very many persons wrote to me asking my opinion as to the probability of finding auriferous deposits in New Zealand. My answer was, that from the knowledge I had of the structure of the main chain, I had no doubt but that they had gold there; and I proved the fact by crushing some of their quartz and finding gold in it.
153. Was there ever an offer made you of an appointment in either of these Colonies? Yes; I received offers of appointments, both from Tasmania and New Zealand. From New Zealand I was offered a permanent appointment, as geologist, with a salary of £500 a year; and from Tasmania, I received a letter from Mr. W. Henty, the Colonial Secretary, dated 10th March, 1858, in which he informed me that the Legislature of the Colony had voted £5,000 for the expense of a geological survey of the Colony, with a report on its mines and minerals, and offered me the appointment with a salary of £600 per annum, with an allowance for travelling expenses, for a term of six years certain. He concludes his letter in the following terms—"But for your presence in a neighbouring Colony, the Government would at once have addressed themselves to some friend in England for the selection of a surveyor there, but believing that you may possibly be at liberty there, and remembering the interest previously exhibited in your spontaneous labours when a visitor in Tasmania, they have a pleasure in placing the appointment at your disposal, as an individual already well known and appreciated, and whose services would therefore command our confidence and give great satisfaction to the people of this Colony."
154. You declined these offers, did you not? Yes, I declined them both.
155. On what grounds? Partly because I was not in such a condition in regard to my health as would warrant my undertaking the duties of the office offered me; and partly because I thought thought that, as a clergyman, it would not be altogether right or becoming in me to go to another Colony to do that which I might do here for those amongst whom I have been so long.

156. To what cause do you attribute your ill health? I attribute it to accidents which happened to me some years back when on service, by which I have twice suffered contusion of the brain, since which I have been subject to very severe attacks, so that in 1856 and in 1859 I had for a time to leave my clerical duties.

157. Had you any attacks of illness whilst you were on your exploring tours? Yes, I had two; one whilst in the Alps, and the other when on New England.

158. And have you been attacked since then? Yes, twice.

159. You do not attribute these attacks to the effects of exposure whilst on your exploring tours? No. I think they originated in the first instance from the effects of the accidents, and possibly their virulence may have been increased by the exposure; but I do not allege this.

160. Do they affect you in your limbs, with rheumatism for instance? No; it is in the head that they affect me.

161. I would now ask you what it was that caused you to print your book upon the Southern Gold Fields? I stated just now that I received so very many applications for copies of my reports on the Southern Gold Fields, that I was led to make inquiry about them at the Government Printing Office, when I found that they had run out of print. I waited upon Mr. Robertson and Mr. Cowper, to know whether, as the reports were undoubtedly Government property, they would permit me to publish them for public information. They at once allowed me to do so, and stated even that they were much obliged to me for suggesting the thing. I consequently compiled the whole of my southern reports, and took advantage of the occasion to introduce a great variety of new matter, which had originated partly before and partly since the writing of these reports, and in this way I managed to make up a very good history of the Gold Fields of the Southern Districts.

162. Is it your intention to publish a systematic account of the Gold Fields of the other Districts of the Colony—the northern and western? Well, it was my intention to have gone into the northern reports, and subsequently into the Western Districts if I could have had an opportunity of examining them minutely; and these I purposed to make even larger and more precise works than the book on the Southern Gold Fields, in order to carry out an object that I have always very much desired, which is, to have a complete work upon the Gold Fields of the Colony generally. That, I say, was my intention, but book publishing is not a very profitable thing in this Colony.

163. By Mr. Hoskins: How is it not profitable? The expense is so great that you cannot sell enough copies to reimburse you.

164. But you must have sold a large number of your work on the Southern Gold Fields? Yes; but the cost was very great. The least that it cost must have been £260.

165. For how many copies? I am not aware. The way it was published was this: I went to the publishers, and asked them what they would charge me for printing the work. They told me it could not be done under £10 a sheet. I replied that this would amount to a much larger sum than I felt disposed to speculate with; and they then asked me if I would be willing to come to any terms with them for the copyright. I answered that I could do nothing of the kind, as, although I had received permission from the Government to reprint them, yet I considered the reports to be public property, and therefore not for me to dispose of; but I told them, if they would take the risk of publishing them on themselves, I would be responsible for any deficiency that might arise between the cost and the amount realized.

166. So that you have no pecuniary interest in the sale of the work? None whatever. The only interest I have in it is, that I am liable to be called upon for any deficiency; profit I did not calculate on, and never thought of making.

167. By the Chairman: Have you, since your return from your exploring expeditions, continued your geological pursuits? Yes; there were a series of reports upon the Gold Fields of Tasmania, furnished by me, and published in the Parliamentary Papers of that Colony, and also amongst the Parliamentary Papers of Great Britain, on the 25th August, 1857.

168. Your labours, however, have not been merely limited to this? No, certainly not—for the applications made to me, and the correspondence I receive, give me really more than I well know how to do. I have had correspondence with all sorts of people from all the Colonies on the subject of gold; and not merely with them, but with scientific men and others in various parts of the world. I have already produced letters from Paris and St. Petersburg, and I could shew dozens of others. Besides the offered appointments by the Governments of the neighbouring Colonies, persons in Western Australia, South Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand have made repeated applications to me, on points that they required solved, or on which they wished my advice. All this is, no doubt, very troublesome—but I look upon all these applications as so many testimonials in my favour.

169. By Mr. O'Brien: I see that this letter you have handed in says, that if a prolonged arrangement were entered into, the salary would be fixed at £400 or £500 a year—that you would be paid your travelling expenses—and that all necessary assistance would be supplied at the expense of the Government—but that if any particular work were required it should be contracted for; am I to understand that you contracted for the work? No, I did not accept the offer, on the ground, as I have already stated, that, as a clergyman who had for many years received a stipend from New South Wales, I was bound to work for that Colony, and not for any other. From the very moment I arrived here, I devoted myself to the discovery of the correct geological formation of the country. That task, which I had imposed upon myself, I have followed out ever since; and it was only at the request of the Government of Tasmania that, whilst there, I went to inspect and report upon their Gold Fields.

170. By the Chairman: You have been applied to for advice by the neighbouring Governments? Yes; I have received more than one application of that sort. For instance, when Dr. Hockstetter was here, I received a communication from Sir W. Denison, on account of Governor Gore Brown, requesting me, as a geological surveyor, to work out the coal formation in New Zealand. The Austrian frigate, "Novara," happened to be here at the time, on board of which was my friend, Dr. Hockstetter, and, having asked him if he was willing to undertake the work, I recommended him, and he was appointed. My views throughout have been simple and sincere—my only object being to do that which was right and proper. On a former occasion I received a letter from New Zealand, asking me to give my opinion upon the capabilities of several persons, who were applying for the office of geological surveyor there. As it happened, I did not know one of the parties, and so I informed the Government, recommending them to whom to apply on the subject. As I have said, I look upon all these applications to me as so many clear testimonials to me of the value of my researches.

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A.
12 April, 1861.

171. If means were afforded you, would you publish a much more extended work than you have hitherto done, on the geology of Australia? It has always been my intention to collect all the available information I could get upon the geological structure of these Colonies, in order that I might publish a work that would be of use to the Colony, and would bring credit to myself. I am, however, more desirous of doing that which will be of use to the Colony than that which will be of benefit to myself.

172. You have already made considerable collections for this purpose? I have; ever since my arrival in the Colony, this has been my great aim and end.

173. Can you explain to the Committee what progress you have made in the work? I could shew you, in my house at St. Leonard's, the very large collections of notes and manuscripts I have made, with the portions of maps that have been completed, and the collections of rocks and minerals ready to figure or describe for the illustrations, but these of course I am unable to bring here. I have with me a geological map, which I have coloured, and also some of my sketches of specimens, which I now produce.

174. By Mr. O'Brien: All those who have ever made themselves acquainted with the researches of scientific men, are fully aware that your name ranks very high amongst them; this Committee does not, therefore, for a moment, doubt your scientific attainments, their only object now is to discover whether you have been sufficiently remunerated for the services you have rendered to the Colony? I am aware of it.

175. By the Chairman: How far have your inquiries gone beyond the limits of this Colony? You have had proofs of this in the reports I have already handed in. But the labours may be said to be divided for some time past; Mr. Stutchbury has done his part for the neighbouring Colony of Queensland, as has Mr. Selwyn his, for the Colony of Victoria, and myself for New South Wales. Numerous reports have been sent in by these gentlemen, as well as by myself, and if all the matter thus furnished from these three sources were put together, I should have been able to draw up a full report upon the geology of the whole country.

176. Have you recently been engaged in any fresh gold discoveries—in Lambing Flat for instance? No. I have not been there, but I have evidence before me of what I believe to be the existence of a much larger Gold Field than that of Lambing Flat.

177. Is that in the Western District? Yes; but I have never been in that part of the Western District.

178. You have already stated the whole amount of money that has been paid you from the Treasury up to the time of your engagements by the Government; will you now tell us what amount you received on account of your exploration, and what amount was expended by you in investigating the country, and preparing yourself to undertake the survey? The account is contained in a return that I obtained from the Auditor General, for another purpose. In 1851, from the 1st September to 31st December, there was charged against me £163 3s.; being remuneration at £300 per annum, £100; travelling expenses, £8 5s.; and forage allowance for three horses, £54 18s., but as the last item ought clearly not to be taken into account as part of my receipts, the sum I actually received in that year would be £108 15s. In 1852 there are charged against me the following items:—

| Remuneration | 300 | 0 | 0 |
| Travelling expenses | 21 | 2 | 5 |
| Forage allowance for 3 horses, at 9s. per diem, from 1st January to 12th June..... | 73 | 16 | 0 |
| Ditto for 4 horses, at 12s., from 1st September to 31st December..... | 73 | 4 | 0 |
| | £108 | 2 | 5 |

Here again the forage allowance is clearly not chargeable to me as an actual receipt, and the amount really received in that year is reduced to £321 2s. 5d. In 1853, I am charged with the following items:—

| | £ | s. | d. |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------|-----------|----------|
| Remuneration to 31st July | 175 | 0 | 0 |
| Forage allowance, at 12s., to 30th June | 108 | 12 | 0 |
| Loss of instruments..... | 13 | 10 | 0 |
| Lodging of Rev. E. Smith, from 5th July, 1852, to 30th June, 1853 | 33 | 9 | 6 |
| | £330 | 11 | 6 |

Here

The Rev. W.B. Clarke, M.A.
12 April, 1861.

Here the only amount I actually received, for myself, was the £175, which form the first item; the forage allowance is clearly not chargeable against me; the amount for loss of instruments arose from one of the men upsetting the cart on the ranges near Cunningham's Gap, and destroying part of my apparatus, which I had to replace; and the lodging allowance to the Rev. E. Smith was given to him at my request, he being the gentleman who had undertaken my duties at St. Leonard's during my absence—the Government, however, very kindly consented to reimburse me this amount. The whole amount that I have received from the public Treasury, since I have been in the Colony, is £5,474 1s. 1d., including the £1,000 and all forage and travelling allowances, loss of instruments, and Mr. Smith's lodging money, and which, for the 21 years and 7 months that I have been here, gives me an average of £194 4s. per annum, if the gratuity and other items be omitted.

179. Did you contribute in 1854 to the Great Exposition in Paris, and was any opinion expressed in the English and French reports of the value of your collections? Yes, a very favourable opinion indeed was expressed upon them, and the French Jurors awarded a medal each to Sir Alfred Stephen, Dr. Smith, and myself, for the serious and scientific character we had given to the Exhibition by our collections. I also received a silver medal, in addition, for the collection.

180. Have you not acted on appointments by the Government upon several Boards of Inquiry, particularly upon those instituted in respect to supplies of water? Yes; I have been so employed upon several occasions. I was upon the Board appointed to inquire into the practicability of establishing Artesian wells, and also, when at Parramatta, I reported to the Water Works Board. I have done some useful work in this way for the present Government.

181. In fact you have, as far as lay in your power, contributed to the public knowledge in other matters besides geology? I have.

182. You have been an active member of the Board of Management of the Sydney Museum? Yes; I have been a member of that Board ever since I have been in the Colony.

183. I have no further question to ask you, and have now only to express a desire that you would allow the Committee to visit you and inspect your collections? I should be most happy to exhibit them to the Committee. Before this meeting closes, I would wish to repeat what I have said before, that I came here, not to prefer a claim, but merely in obedience to the wishes of the Committee. I see by a letter in one of the daily journals that some remarks have been made upon what the writer calls, "The Claims of the Rev. W. B. Clarke." Now, I call the Committee to witness that this term has never been used by me. I come here to answer such questions as the Committee may think proper to put to me in relation to the subject they are investigating, and not to proffer any claim. If I had had any claim to make, it would have been made in 1851, when my arrangement with the Government was entered into. That arrangement has been fairly and honestly carried out by the Government, and I have no complaint to make in respect to it; and I hope, from the explanation I have offered, the Committee will acquit me of any desire or design, in entering into that arrangement, of making a bargain for my own private interests.

184. I can only say, in regard to this Committee, that I did not consult you before I made the motion for its appointment, nor am I aware that you were consulted by any person in the matter? That, I presume, will acquit me before the Committee.

I. SHEPHERD, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

The Reverend William Branwhite Clarke, M.A., further examined:—

The Rev. W.B. Clarke, M.A.
17 April, 1861.

185. By the Chairman: When you were present the other day it did not occur to me that there were other questions which I wished to put to you before the examination was closed. I would now wish to ask you whether you took any prominent part in reference to geological pursuits in this country previous to the year 1841, and whether you have in your possession any documents to shew that you did? Nothing but note-books; all that I had then done was confined to my observations.

186. You have note-books to shew what you did? Oh yes.

187. I am anxious to trace your proceedings in the Colony from the very first, to shew the Committee when you began your geological pursuits, and to shew what you did. If, therefore, there are any documents that will throw light upon these matters I should like to have them exhibited? I can shew my books of notes, which were made on the spot, and which extend from the year 1839 to 1851; but nothing was done of any importance up to 1840.

188. As far as I can understand you, you say you commenced your career as a geologist here in the year 1839 or 1840? In 1839 and 1840.

189. Well, I wish to shew the Committee what was done at that time? I can shew the notes I took on the spot; but nothing was worked out up to that time—1840.

190. Nothing was published I know; but I wish you to exhibit your note-books, to shew what what you really did at that time? Yes. I have been in the habit, for a long time, of going about different countries on geological pursuits, making notes. I will shew you every thing I did in this country. I produce some of the note-books, filed up in the different spots I visited.

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A.

191. What is the earliest date at which any of those notes were made? I think I can shew you memoranda made in 1840, when I first went down to Illawarra. Some of these notes were made in January, 1840. There are a good many of these books on that part of the country; some of them no one can understand but myself, who put them together. I think there are notes in this book, used in 1840, of various places, partly in the Hunter district, and partly in the county of Cumberland, across the Nepean, on the Bathurst line of road. This is another book of notes, made in the year 1841. This goes up as far as the range between the Fish River and Cox's River. All these note-books were filled up in the same way; but there does not appear in these books now produced to have been any thing later than 1851.

192. I understand you to say there has been no official recognition of those particulars? Except in papers I have written upon the subjects. I think the particulars have been described. There is a paper on an exploration made with my friend Mr. Jukes. In 1846 I again went through Illawarra, and he published a joint paper for the Geological Society, which, I think, embodied some of these notes. I have published various others from them. I began the work upon a regular plan—it was not done casually.

193. And you have continued to extend that plan since? Yes, up to the year 1853, and later—up to 1860.

194. But I understand you to say you supplied the Government with the names of the various localities you considered it desirable to visit, and that these were referred to in your instructions? Yes; but that was in the year 1851.

195. Did you also give any intimation to the Government of that day as to the various localities to which they should instruct Mr. Hargraves to go? Yes.

196. Was he privy to those instructions? Yes. He received his instructions, and was present when I wrote down the names of the localities it was desirable he should go to. That, also, was in the year 1851.

197. Previous to his instructions to make a geological survey? That was embodied in his instructions. That was all stated in my previous examination the other day.

198. By Mr. Cooper: At one time the Government placed at your disposal the Printing Office, to enable you to publish what you had done? No. I think a vote was passed in the House to assist in paying the expense of it; but I did not receive the money.

199. Then the Legislature did vote the money for it? Yes.

200. You know that as a fact? I do not know it officially; but I believe £210 was voted.

201. Why did not the publication go on—it was understood that that sum would cover the cost? It might have paid it at that time to a certain extent, but more than that amount of money has been spent upon this. (Clarke's Southern Gold Fields.)

202. My question did not refer to your receiving the money; but as the Legislature did provide for the publication of the results of your labours up to a certain time, it was necessary to have a record here of the reason why it was not carried out? I have a letter from yourself upon this very question, in reply to one from me. In that reply you state you know that I had never received the money, and that it was insufficient.

203. This does not meet the matter. You say you know the two hundred guineas were voted by the House, and that you never received official intimation of it from any quarter, and also that you never received the money. I ask you why it was, that when the Legislature placed the money at your disposal, you did not avail yourself of it? I think I can give an answer to that. I wanted very particularly to publish illustrations of the fossils, having three or four books filled with them; and having made inquiry as to the cost found it would require £1,500 to get them lithographed. A little after that time a great noise was made about the discovery of gold, and the whole thing was set aside. Neither I nor any act of mine had the object of hindering the carrying out of the proposal.

204. The Legislature having voted a sum for the purpose of placing the result of your labours before the public, you did not then avail yourself of it? That is the fact. The sum was perfectly sufficient for the purpose of giving a short general account, as I have done in my reports, but not at all sufficient for the publication of a complete work upon the subject. £210 would have to be spent in the engraving only. The sum, therefore, was thoroughly insufficient. Subsequent to that things occurred which gave an opportunity to increase the material, so that it became perfectly impossible for any one to do anything with that sum of money.

205. By Mr. Hoskins: If you had received, as you might have done had you applied for it, this £210, you would then have had altogether £1,210 from the Legislature, having received £1,000 before? I admit that I received £1,000, but not "before" the vote of £210.

206. £1,000 is all you received from the Legislature? Yes, but that is for such work as was done in the years 1851, 1852, and 1853, not for that of other years previously.

207. By Mr. Wilson: I wish to ask you, provided you had taken that £210, would you have considered yourself bound to go on with the publication of the work? I should have considered myself bound to publish such materials as would have been paid for by the £210; but it would have been perfectly useless to do anything of the kind.

208. It would have been out of your power with that amount of assistance to publish such a work as you would like to have published? Certainly. You have probably seen Sir Thomas Mitchell's two volumes on "Eastern Australia." He told me that the lithographing cost him £500.

209. By Mr. Cooper: Supposing it were desirable, or considered so by the Legislature, to give

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A. give the world the benefit of your geological researches, what sum of money would be sufficient to enable you to bring out a publication of them? It is a matter of difficulty to say. I cannot tell you. That involves another thing—time is money. As I am now situated, and probably shall be for some years to come, it is clear I have not time to devote to such a thing. Besides it is not a mere matter of money, because you could call in any one, whether he had a knowledge of the subject or not, and tell him to do the work. But it is necessary that such a work should be conducted by experienced and thoroughly qualified geologists. I did not, however, understand that to be the object for which I was brought here. I could have answered that by private letter.

17 April, 1861.

210. By the Chairman: You have a large number of manuscripts by you? Yes; it was my intention, if I had the leisure and means, to have published them, not wishing to be assisted by anything official. I am perfectly aware that the field notes, long as they are, will require extension; but a great deal of the material is in only a secondary stage. Besides I do not think such a book can be published in the Colony.

211. By Mr. Cowper: What is the difficulty? The illustrations. We have not people here to do the engraving. No engraver or lithographer can publish things of that kind unless he has some knowledge of the subject, and has superintendence to direct him. It is a very different matter to engraving ordinary things.

212. By the Chairman: Could you by any means give the country the advantage of your researches without being compelled to go to England to do it? I wished to go to England for that special purpose in 1853, and I was induced to make a stipulation with the Government in 1851 that I should do so. Why it was denied me I do not know. That was my particular object.

213. Although we could not get the full benefit of your researches, yet we might obtain considerable benefit from them if the means of publication in the Colony were availed of for that purpose? I have done all I could with the means at my disposal in that book (The Southern Gold Fields.)

214. That is valuable, but cannot you give still further information? Of course.

215. By Mr. Cowper: Has the sale of that work repaid you? No; I never intended it to repay me. I had been repeatedly urged to republish the reports I had sent in to the Government, and I went to yourself and Mr. Robertson, and asked whether there was any objection to my publishing them. You said, no; and Mr. Robertson said, I was at liberty to republish them and he would be glad of it. I have added new matter, and it is now held to be a valuable book.

216. What amount do you think, after the publication, you will be out of pocket? I may explain the circumstances, and the way in which the work was published. I have told you that the printers asked me if I should like them to make an offer to buy it. I told them no, it contained matter belonging to the Government, from the publication of which I had no right to make money. They then said, "Will you allow us to publish at our own risk?" I said, "On condition that you lose nothing by it." It has cost already about £260. These were the considerations by which I was guided.

217. By Mr. Walker: How many were struck off? I do not know. They asked me originally ten guineas a sheet.

218. By Mr. Hoskins: You told us during your previous examination that you were not aware that a Select Committee had been appointed for the purpose of investigating your claims? I said I had no communication regarding it made to me by any one.

219. You were not cognizant of the fact that the Committee had been moved for? Of course I was.

220. But previously you were not aware that it was to be moved for? No.

221. Were you not aware that, during the present Session of Parliament, Members of the Assembly had urged your claims upon the Legislature by motion, asking that a sum of money might be placed upon the Estimates as a requital for your services? I do not recollect. Do you allude to Mr. Byrnes' motion?

222. No, during the present Session? No, I do not recollect that there was such a motion.

223. I believe the Chairman of this Committee put such a motion on the paper previous to his asking for the appointment of a Select Committee? Well, I believe he did put a notice on the paper to that effect.

224. Are you aware that Mr. Byrnes also moved in the matter last Session? I am well aware of that; it was a matter of notoriety.

225. You say you make no claim upon the Legislature? I will explain what I mean by claim (as I have done before); I gave a definition of the word. I said it involved the idea of right withheld, and under these terms, I said, I make no claim whatever.

226. You consider, however, that you have not received such a remuneration as you have a right to expect for your geological researches? I think I ought not to answer that question, and therefore respectfully decline.

227. I believe you were absent from the Colony three or four years ago? Yes, and last year.

228. Are you not aware that a pamphlet has been published, and circulated among the Members of the Legislature, urging your claims? Yes. I received a copy of that pamphlet when I was down in Tasmania, but from whom I could not recognize by the address.

229. Are you not aware that parties have made applications to Government—various Governments—on your behalf? No.

230. You told us that your reason for coming out to this country was that, as you were practically acquainted with the science of geology, you were desirous of making yourself acquainted with the geology of this country? I was asked why I left England, and I said that, whilst in France, I contracted a severe rheumatic fever, and, in consequence of the dampness dampness of the building in which I afterwards officiated, the complaint returned, and that I required a change of climate. That induced me to leave England, and I lost a valuable living by doing so. The first letter I received after arriving in this country informed me that the incumbent of that living was dead. It could not be filled up by me, being here.

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A.

17 April, 1861.

231. But when you came here you anticipated continuing to officiate as a minister? No doubt. I stated that the reason I chose this country was partly on account of the climate, and partly on the ground that I wished to explore it.

232. You wish, by your explanation, to convey that you came here with a view to obtain private information, by making yourself acquainted with the geological features of the country, and to continue your vocation as a minister? No doubt. I carried on what I did at intervals, and only as I had an opportunity. I had no opportunity until the year 1851 of going out for a long period. For instance, my duties were exchanged for those of other clergymen, and I took the opportunity, when in their districts, to work them out.

233. You told us that you sent reports and specimens to England in 1844, but you did not tell us of what description they were? I gave you a list of them marked.

234. Did you not know that Mr. Stutchbury had sent specimens and reports? To England! He was not here! He did not arrive till the year 1850.

235. Are you not aware that persons in the interior—shepherds and stockmen—had frequently reported that they had discovered gold previous to its discovery in 1850 and 1851? Of course.

236. You have heard of a shepherd coming into the township of Wellington bringing gold with him? I never knew of it until 1843 or 1844.

237. You never heard of gold being discovered by chance by persons who had nothing to guide them to a knowledge of its existence prior to 1844? Well, I do not know of any case; I only know what I did myself.

238. You state that you found gold in 1841? Yes, in 1841.

239. Have you heard of persons finding it before that time? I have been told it. I have heard that this shepherd you allude to found it, but I am not aware of the fact. I have told you before that I knew nothing about gold existing here when I first came.

240. You know gold was found in Victoria in 1849? There was said to be a nugget of gold found there in 1849, in the Pyrenees, by a shepherd boy. I wrote a letter about it in the Sydney Morning Herald, pointing out the absurdity of people going to Melbourne when they had the gold here.

241. The nature of your engagement with the Government, when deputed to make a survey of the country, was, I believe, that you were to receive £300 a-year, and if the Government considered your services merited more, they would increase it at the expiration of your engagement? When first the idea was suggested to me of going out exploring, it was, as I understood, from a friend coming to me, in consequence of the Government having expressed a wish to obtain information which would afford them a guide to the character of the geology of the country. It was then suggested to me to offer my services. I did so. I put my services at their disposal, and a proposition was made that a Committee should be formed in Sydney with a resident Chairman, and Mr. Stutchbury, I think, with myself, was to go about, and report; a statement of the results of the proceedings to be sent to the Chairman, who was to draw up an official report.

242. By Mr. Cooper: Was this the Government proposal? Yes. I wrote two letters on the subject. That proposal was made to me; but it placed me in a false position, and I had nothing to do with it. I stated to Mr. Thomson that these were not the services I expected to be asked to perform. That gentleman said the Government were in doubt as to how I should be properly remunerated. I said in reply, that were I a layman I would state my opinion upon that subject at once; and he then said I need not feel any delicacy about it. But I determined to guard against anything that would in any degree compromise my position as a clergyman. In his office the question was again mooted. I then stated that I wished not to be relieved of my present income, and have at my disposal things necessary for carrying on the work, and that if my services were rendered I would leave the remuneration to themselves. They adopted the proposition conveyed in this explanation. You will see why I declined to enter into the first arrangement; I might in the field have done never so much good work, and the Committee in Sydney might reject it.

243. By Mr. Hoskins: Did the Government stipulate that you should not make private use of the reports as by taking them to England? There was a sort of stipulation on my part that I should be allowed to go to England when the reports were finished, for the purpose of laying the matter before my geological friends, and for getting assistance in their publication.

244. And the Government refused to allow you to do so considering that the reports were Government property? The officer then in charge of the Government ordered it to be refused. But the grounds of refusal were fallacious, because it would have done the Government a service.

245. Mr. Hargraves was also sent to explore the country, I believe? Oh, yes!

246. And the result was the discovery of the Turon? I do not know.

247. Have you been examined previously by the Committee with reference to the services you performed? No. I was, in 1852 and 1853, examined before two Committees, and was asked certain questions as to the tracts of country I had explored, and as to when I first found gold; but nothing else. The questions were mostly directed to the management of the Gold Fields. Mr. Cowper asked me whether there was gold to the north; in reply to which I said there was. I then determined to lay a report upon the subject before the Government.

248. You received a sum of £500 from the then Executive under Mr. Thomson, they having employed you to proceed on this exploration—and at the termination of your services was it never never represented to them that this was a miserably insufficient remuneration? I held myself sufficiently high in my own conscience not to represent it to them that the remuneration was insufficient. I did not condescend to ask them for anything more.

The Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A.
17 April, 1861.

249. You are aware that the Government of that day ought to have a better appreciation and knowledge of the value of your discoveries than the present Legislature? I do not wish to give an opinion of my own on the subject.

250. The Government who deputed you to proceed on your explorations merely authorized you to receive £500? I gave up £120 that I said nothing about, because I wish the world to understand that I have acted honorably and straightforward without reference to my pecuniary benefit. I was willing to survey the country, and went out to do so; but I cannot beg from it.

251. By Mr. Cowper: The fact remains that the Executive who appointed you gave what must be considered as in their opinion a sufficient remuneration? I can give the opinion of one gentleman high in office at one time in the Government, I think.

252. The Executive who appointed you awarded for your services £500? I think they regarded me in the light of an ordinary surveyor, and made their calculation accordingly. I think that was the view they took. It was a matter of calculation as to what a person had a right to expect if put in the position of a surveyor; but you must know the difference in the positions. It is not every one who would or could have undertaken that work, especially at my age. I was fifty-three when I started on that exploration.

253. By Mr. Hoskins: The necessary expenses in surveys, together with the loss of your income as a minister, have never been reimbursed by the £1,000 you received—that is, the two sums of £500 each? It is a difficult matter to make calculations upon that point. I do not think the £500 put anything into my pocket. Geological pursuits are the most expensive of any; a man cannot undertake them without considerable means at his disposal. Suppose in this Colony I want to compare a particular fossil, where am I to go to get a comparison? There are not men of the particular kind of qualification to go to; and I have to buy costly books in order to obtain a comparison. If I attempted to make a calculation of the expense I do not know where it would end. I took up the study of geology forty-one years ago, and having been a hard student ever since, have spent considerable sums of money upon it. The Colony, upon my undertaking its survey, got the advantage of what I knew before coming here, and what I had learned up to 1851.

254. You told the Committee that, as a recognition of your services, the Governments of the Province of Nelson and the Colony of Tasmania had made offers of service to you as surveyor? Yes.

255. Have you not heard that the present Government contemplated the fresh appointment of a Geological Surveyor? Mr. Robertson stated it in the House, I believe, and Mr. Cowper has said as much to me in private.

256. So that whilst these neighbouring Colonies recognized your claims and the benefits derived from your labours, the Executive of New South Wales do the same? Not for what is past, but for what is future. I am not master of the future, and what has been done in the past is known. I understood the Committee was appointed to review the past, and not look to the future. If an appointment were offered me, which I could not, to the honor of my profession as a clergyman, accept, or which would take me from my duty, and entail labour in the field, which the state of my health will not allow of, these things would require debating before I could decide upon my course of action; and I should not like the office to be contingent upon an annual vote of Parliament.

257. The appointments you were offered in the Colonies before alluded to would be dependent upon annual votes? They offered me a fixed period of service, and a fixed sum. In Tasmania they obtained a vote of £5,000 on purpose for me. I have a letter from Mr. Chapman, in which the offer is made. He says, we want a geological survey of the country, and a report upon it. We think it can be done in six years; and he states, that the amount they propose to pay for this service will be about this £5,000. I was then exceedingly ill, and declined the offer. I considered whether I should be justified in throwing up the work of a clergyman. In 1851, 1852, and 1853, I did the whole work of my clerical office, and I consider that the £300 I received was to pay, in part, for my services as a clergyman, and had nothing to do with geology.

258. Have you made application for permission to publish your reports in a compiled form—I understood they were for the use of the Government? Nothing of the sort. Captain King, once, in speaking of the matter, used these words:—"Shut them up in a box! No; give them to the public." I blamed the Government for not keeping them in print.

259. Mr. Stutchbury was also appointed to make explorations? Yes.

260. Do you know the terms of his engagement? No, they were never mentioned to me; but I believe he was paid from £600 to £800 a year.

261. After receiving this amount he never made further claims? I might refer to Mr. Stutchbury's case at some length, but it does not become me to speak of dead men.

262. By Mr. Walker: Do you produce the field book, containing the memoranda when you first discovered gold? Yes; that is the book.

263. What is the date? The 23rd. and 24th of February, 1841.

264. Where at? I will shew you the place on the map. The first gold I saw was on the direction of the road between Hartley and Hassau's Walls.

265. On the Western Road? A little off the road; near what you call Mount Kirkley.

266. In what quantities? Merely sufficient to prove that there was gold. I was working among the decomposed granite, and found a few specks of gold. I afterwards found some in

267. Did it occur to you then that there was gold there in sufficient quantity to make it worth

- any one's while to work for it? Nobody knew how at that period, because few persons knew anything about working for gold. I have been in gold countries, but had not at that time any speculation about there being a rich field. There could not be any speculation about it. Afterwards, when I instituted a series of inquiries into the geology of the country, and began to collect and gather information, in 1841, I came to definite views about the Colony, and I set people to work to collect for me.
268. Did it occur to you in 1841 that gold, in paying quantities, was to be found? Not at the time I found it, but afterwards, in that year.
269. How long afterwards? I cannot tell the exact date, but the letters I have produced would satisfy you upon that point. Two letters speak positively about 1841, and others thence to 1844. I was continually at work on the question from the year 1841.
270. Did you ever make it public or at what time did you make it public, that in your opinion there was gold to be found in this Colony? I have already given evidence on that, and these books were brought here by me, supposing that there might be a wish to be satisfied on the point of dates. These are the original notes made on the spot.
271. What sum have you received altogether for your geological services to the country? £1,000 in addition to £300 when out exploring, and at the same time officiating as a clergyman. I left it to the Government.
272. By Mr. Cowper, junior: You stated that this £300 was nearly absorbed by keeping up the establishment at St. Leonard's during your absence? No; what I said was that it was in lieu of any receipts as a minister.
273. I fancied, from your evidence, that you considered you were obliged to keep up the establishment at St. Leonard's just as if you resided there as a clergyman? This was explained in my former evidence.
274. By the Chairman: A good deal has been said in reference to the recognition of your services, as a geologist, by the previous Executive,—now, had you been a private individual would you have considered the amount the Government thought proper to award you anything like a sufficient recognition for your services? Had I been a layman, and had given as much information to the country I should have thought myself not overpaid with £5,000.
275. You did not receive what you have had as a recognition, or remuneration? No, only as a testimonial, or "acknowledgment." I wrote a letter in reply, stating that I considered my desire and willingness to serve the country were of infinitely more importance to me than any sum of money whatever.

I. SHEPHERD, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

The Honorable Edward Deas Thomson, C. B., M. L. C., attending by permission of the Legislative Council, examined:—

276. By the Chairman: This Select Committee has been appointed to inquire into the claims, if any, of the Rev. W. B. Clarke, and the gentlemen who form it have thought it desirable to request your attendance in order that they might elicit certain information from you. Perhaps you will allow me to ask you, in the first place, if you remember the circumstance of £1,000 being paid by the Government of this Colony to the Rev. W. B. Clarke, having reference to that gentleman's geological researches in New South Wales? Yes, I have a perfect recollection of that circumstance. It was part of the agreement with the Rev. Mr. Clarke when he voluntarily undertook the duty of making a geological survey of the country, with reference to gold, that he was to receive a gratuity when he completed his services. The gratuity fixed by the Government was £500. A Committee of the late Legislative Council was sitting at the time, and they inquired into Mr. Clarke's claims, and I find the following passage in their report:—"Your Committee while on the subject of gratuities, feel it due to the Rev. W. B. Clarke to record their high appreciation of the geological reports which he has addressed, at different times to this Government, and their opinion that the sum of £500 placed on the Supplementary Estimate, as an acknowledgment of his services, should be increased to £1,000." That is an extract from the report of the Committee on the Management of the Gold Fields, and is dated 1853. The Committee consisted of Mr. Wentworth, Mr. Jas. Macarthur, Mr. Cowper, Mr. Deas Thomson, Mr. Nichols, Mr. Bligh, Mr. Darvall, Mr. Murray, Mr. Macleay, and the Solicitor General—Mr. Manning at that time, now Sir William Manning. I find that the original agreement with Mr. Clarke was in these terms,—"To be supplied with all that may be necessary to carry out the survey at the public expense, and allowed such compensation as may be sufficient to cover the loss of present income and such further remuneration as the service may appear to entitle you to." That is an extract from a letter addressed by me to him on his appointment to proceed on a geological tour.

The Hon. E.
D. Thomson,
C.B., M.L.C.
24 April, 1861.

277. By Mr. Cowper: The "present income" alluded to is his stipend as a minister? His stipend as a minister. He obtained leave from the late Bishop to undertake this duty, and it was necessary to provide a substitute to perform his clerical duties. He was then incumbent of St. Leonard's, North Shore. His locum tenens received his stipend during his absence, and a similar sum was paid to Mr. Clarke as part of his salary. I find, for instance, that he was employed on this duty from 1st September, 1851, to 30th June, 1853, and he received, in lieu of his clerical stipend, during that period, at the rate of £300 a year. Besides this, he was allowed servants, forage for horses, and, in fact, the whole expenses consequent upon the performance of this duty.

278. Besides the £500? Besides the £1,000 that was afterwards paid to him.

279. By the Chairman: We are to understand then that this sum of £1,000 was given as a gratuity and not as remuneration for his services? Well, I can scarcely distinguish between the two, it was certainly intended in both ways, both as a gratuity and as an acknowledgment of his services. Those services were extremely valuable. The reports were admirably drawn up, and, I believe, of very great value to this Colony. He undertook this duty at considerable personal risk, and great personal labour, and suffered in his health frequently in his journeys —

280. I believe Mr. Clarke made no specific bargain with the Government as to what sum he should receive, that in point of fact, he did not ask for any sum? He did not ask for any specific sum, but, as already stated, part of the agreement was that he should receive a gratuity on the completion of his services.

281. By Mr. Cowper: A gratuity, I suppose, means compensation? It is, I suppose, compensation—I see I called it a gratuity myself, and, I suppose, that was passing through my mind at the time, and correctly designated what I intended. Mr. Clarke, in a letter, dated 6th September, 1853, addressed me, as Colonial Secretary, to the following effect:—"I do myself the honor of acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 2nd instant, apprising me that His Excellency the Governor General, having brought before the Executive Council the question of amount of gratuity to be offered to me, the Council had expressed an opinion that I should receive a gratuity of £500, and that, therefore, His Excellency had specially recommended to the Legislative Council the appropriation of that amount to be paid to me accordingly. I beg leave to request that you will be good enough to convey to his Excellency and the Executive Council my thanks for this mark of their consideration and thoughtfulness, and my desire to be allowed to regard the proposal and its recommendation as a proof that my endeavours to further the interests of the Colony have met with the approbation of the Government, an object of higher importance to me than any gratuity, whatever may be its intrinsic value." That was before the sum of £1,000 was voted or paid, and had reference, as will be perceived, to the smaller sum of £500.

282. Is there any example of gratuities of sums of money having been supplemented—for instance, in the case of Mr. Hargraves, was not the sum first proposed to be given to him afterwards increased? The sum at first proposed to be given to Mr. Hargraves was, I think, £5,000, and it was afterwards increased to £10,000.

283. Was that as remuneration, or as a gratuity? It was a reward for the discovery of gold, that is to say, the practical discovery of a working Gold Field. Gold had been discovered long before. The existence of gold in the Australian Colonies was also well known to myself. I had taken gold from quartz, and I had searched for gold in rivers, but I had not the knowledge of gold washing which would enable me to discover it.

284. Do you recollect making any observation to the late Capt. King upon the importance to the public of the publication of the Rev. Mr. Clarke's reports, and saying that you would make some arrangement for the Government to bear the expense? Some years ago (I think it was several years before the gold discovery) Mr. Clarke had been engaged in geological researches throughout the Colony. He had collected a vast amount of information, and was desirous of publishing the results. The work would have been an exceedingly expensive one, because it would have had to be illustrated by maps and sections, which cost a great deal here for engraving. He made application to the Government, I think, through Capt. King, to assist him in this matter, and the sum of £210 for the purpose was accordingly placed on the Estimates for 1850. That sum was voted. It stands in the Votes in the following words:—"A sum not exceeding £210 to enable the Rev. W. B. Clarke to publish a report of his geological researches in Australia, illustrated by maps and sections." He had not completed the work at that time, and I think the payment of the sum depended upon its publication. I believe that sum has not been paid, and I am not aware that Mr. Clarke has ever been in a position to claim it.

285. From what you believe, or perhaps, know of the Rev. Mr. Clarke, would you consider that the sum of £210 would be sufficient to cover the expense of publishing such a work? That I cannot say; such a sum would not, I think, go very far in publishing a work of that kind. I do not, however, believe it was intended to cover the whole of that expense, for the work would have been the private property of Mr. Clarke when published. I think it is a great pity that the result of all these geological researches cannot be given to the world. I am sure it would be found to be exceedingly valuable.

286. Those made by Mr. Clarke? Yes.

287. By Mr. Cowper: Were there any services rendered by Mr. Clarke to the Government, at the request of the Colonial Government, exclusive of those for which £1,000 was supposed to have been the remuneration? I do not remember any. We were in frequent communication with him, as he was considered a great authority, and he was very kind in giving information to the Government that was useful to it; but I do not remember any other specific services on which he was employed.

288. By the Chairman: Has Mr. Clarke in any other way rendered useful service to the country? As a most useful clergyman, and valuable member of society.
289. In reference to scientific pursuits? I believe he has been in the habit of publishing to the world, through the medium of the press, the result of many of his researches, which have been very useful.
290. For which he has received no compensation from the Government? Compensation could not have been expected. It would not be within the province of the Government to remunerate services of that kind.
291. By Mr. Hoskins: I understood you to say that the Rev. Mr. Clarke received £300 a year salary in lieu of his clerical stipend? Yes.
292. Can you tell us what was his clerical stipend at that time? I find, in a minute made by myself, on a private note from the Rev. Mr. Clarke, of the 4th July, 1851, to the following effect: "I am verbally informed by the Rev. Mr. Clarke, that the emoluments which he will have to give up during his absence on this duty amount to upwards of £300 a year. Independently of this, he will expect to receive, in addition to the payment of his actual expenses, a fair remuneration for his services. It will be necessary of course to determine what amount shall be so paid to him."
293. Then I presume the Executive Council considered that the £500 they intended to ask the Legislative Council to vote to Mr. Clarke was a remuneration for the services he performed, in addition to the salary he received? Yes.
294. I understood you to say that the Gold Committee recommended that an additional £500 should be voted to Mr. Clarke in acknowledgment of his eminent services? They recommended that the gratuity of £500 should be increased to £1,000, and I have already explained that that sum was placed on the estimates by the Government, voted by the Legislative Council, and paid to Mr. Clarke.
295. And was understood to be as a recognition of, and as a remuneration for, the Rev. Mr. Clarke's services? Undoubtedly.
296. I believe Mr. Stutchbury was appointed by the Government as geologist, to make a survey of a certain portion of the Colony? All information relating to Mr. Stutchbury's appointment will be found in the paper printed by the order of the late Legislative Council, in 1851. It is headed "Geological Surveys," and gives the whole of the correspondence of the Government on the subject with the Secretary of State. It contains also the correspondence of the local Government with Mr. Stutchbury on his arrival, and shews the precise circumstances under which he received his appointment, and the object for which he was appointed. In 1849 a despatch was addressed, by the late Governor, Sir Charles Fitz Roy, to the Right Honorable Earl Grey, in which he pointed out the expediency of causing a mineralogical and geological survey to be made of the Colony. It is not necessary that I should go into the several points referred to in that despatch, but I will mention one or two. At that time the mining capabilities of the Colony began to attract considerable attention. Copper and iron mines had been discovered, and specimens of gold in quartz had also been found. A specimen of alluvial gold was placed in my hands in the early part of 1849, by the late Mr. Smith (a lapidist), who stated it to have been found in some portion of the country to the westward of the Great Dividing Range. He would not further describe where it had been found, but he endeavoured to obtain the promise of a reward from the Government. Sir Charles Fitz Roy in his despatch says—"In some parts of the Colony I am informed that auriferous ores have been discovered. A specimen weighing about three ounces and a half was lately exhibited to me. I have not been able to learn the precise locality where it was found; except that it is on the western side of the Great Dividing Range in the Sydney, or Middle District." He goes on to say, in consequence of these mineral indications, "I would take the liberty of suggesting to your Lordship the expediency of sending out to the Colony a well qualified geologist; whose employment in the public service should probably be limited to such a period only as may be necessary to accomplish the object of his appointment. It would, of course, be his duty to furnish the Government, from time to time, with reports of his proceedings, and maps shewing the geological structure of the country examined. I would further take the liberty of pointing out that, probably, by application to the Chairman of the Geological Society an individual well suited to undertake this duty might be selected." In consequence of that the Secretary of State entertained the proposition, and communicated with Sir Henry de la Beche, who was, I believe, the President of the Geological Society at that time, and he recommended Mr. Bristow for the appointment, but he was unable from family reasons to accept it. It was then offered to Mr. Beete Jukes, who had formerly been employed as naturalist and geologist on board H.M.S. "Fly."
297. I merely wish to know whether Mr. Stutchbury was appointed, in consequence of Sir Charles Fitz Roy's recommendation, as geologist to the Colony? He was eventually appointed. He was recommended by Sir Henry de la Beche in a letter to Mr. Hawes, then Under Secretary of State. It is dated 26th April, 1850; he says, "I have the honor to commend to Earl Grey, as highly qualified for the service, Mr. Samuel Stutchbury, Fellow of the Geological Society of London, and member of various other learned societies, now, and for many years past, the able Curator of the British Scientific Institution, and with whom I have been personally acquainted for many years. Mr. Stutchbury is well instructed in our mode of work on the Geological Survey of Great Britain, has had great experience as a coal viewer, and is perfectly acquainted, not only with mineralogy as a science, but also practically with the mode of occurrence of the ores of the useful metals." Then the terms upon which he was appointed were these—I find them detailed in a letter addressed to him by myself, as Colonial Secretary, under date the 27th December, 1850:—"With reference to my letter of the 23rd instant, I am directed by his Excellency the Governor to inform you that, under

"under the instructions of the Secretary of State, you will be paid a salary, whilst employed in making a Geological and Mineralogical Survey of New South Wales, at the rate of £600 per annum." Then in another part of the letter,—“In addition to your salary, you will be allowed the equipment hereafter mentioned, and your actual expenses for yourself, your men, and horses, when travelling—on an account to be rendered by you in such form as may be satisfactory to the Auditor General.”

298. What I wished to know was merely whether Mr. Stutchbury was the Government Geologist at the time the Rev. Mr. Clarke was making his geological surveys? Yes.

299. And therefore Mr. Clarke's services were purely voluntary? Yes; he tendered his services to the Government, but the Government was too happy to avail themselves of them, and there was quite field enough for two mineralogical surveyors. It was considered extremely important at the time, that the various localities throughout the Colony, containing auriferous deposits, should be ascertained, examined, and reported on by some properly qualified geologist, and most desirable, therefore, that Mr. Clarke's services should be so availed of.

300. By the Chairman: Mr. Clarke had made several geological surveys previous to that time? Yes. I have already alluded to his desire to publish the work for which the sum of £210 was voted.

Extracts from the published writings of SIR RODERICK I. MURCHISON, G.C. St. S.; D.C.L.; M.A.; V.P.R.S.; V.P.G.S., &c., &c.

“Having, in the year 1844, recently returned from the auriferous Ural Mountains, I had the advantage of examining the numerous specimens collected by my friend Count Strzelecki, along the eastern chain of Australia. Seeing the great similarity of the rocks of those two distant countries, I had little difficulty in drawing a parallel between them; in doing which I was naturally struck by the circumstance that no gold had ‘yet been found’ in the meridional Australian ridge, which I termed in anticipation the ‘Cordillera.’” * Impressed with the conviction that gold would sooner or later be found in the Great British Colony, I learnt in 1846, with satisfaction, that a specimen of the ore had been discovered. I thereupon encouraged the unemployed miners of Cornwall to emigrate and dig for gold, as they dug for tin in the gravel of their own district. These notices were, as far as I know, the first printed documents relating to Australian gold.”—From Siluria, 3rd edition, 1859, p. 489.

* “The announcement that ‘no gold had yet been detected,’ which was printed in my ‘Provisional Discourse,’ (Trans. Roy. Geog. Soc., 1844), is the clearest proof of my ignorance of a trace of the metal having been discovered by any one. Some time after the practical opening out of the gold mines, however, facts transpired which were totally unknown to me when I ventured upon my comparison. Thus it appeared, that Count Strzelecki himself discovered traces of gold in 1839; but on relating the fact to some friends, and to the Governor of New South Wales, Sir G. Gipps, secrecy was enjoined, and the Count never more reverted to the subject, not even in his own work of 1845. It also appears that the Rev. W. B. Clarke wrote to a friend in the Colony (1841), mentioning that he had found gold ore. * * * * My views, whatever they may be worth, were therefore formed quite irrespectively of any such proceedings. * * * * I now simply affirm, that no one in Britain or the Colonies had for several years printed anything on the auriferous character of the Australian rocks except myself, and that my Memoirs of 1844, 1845, and 1856, are the earliest publications relating to the subject.”

"MR. MURCHISON'S Address—Australia.

" Another traveller, M. de Strzelecki, who has already given some short accounts of a southern portion of this chain, will shortly appear before the public with an important work explanatory of its general structure and physical features. Passing five years in the country, he traced these mountains continuously on foot from 31° to 44° S. lat., and whilst making this survey, which obtained for him the warmest approbation of the Governors of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, Sir George Gipps and Captain Sir J. Franklin, R.N., M. de Strzelecki repeatedly crossed it, and examining its lithological characters in detail, ascertained that it had a mean altitude of about 3,500 feet, and was on the average 70 miles distant from the sea. In Van Diemen's Land he found the axis of the same crystalline rocks to be prolonged in a curvilinear direction, whilst to the north of our settlements of New South Wales, he found by sailing along the coast the same chain, there coming close to the sea, as determined by the admirable survey of Captain P. King, was persistent to Torres Straits at the north end of the Gulf of Carpentaria, and that on the north side of these straits it is again prolonged in the same direction far into New Guinea.

" With the exception then of a few embranchments towards its southern end, which throw off the waters of the Darling and its tributaries into the new settlements of South Australia, and of the curvilinear band in Van Diemen's Land, this chain may be said to have a meridian direction through upwards of 35° of latitude, and is therefore considerably longer than the Ural, another great meridian chain, of which I have elsewhere spoken, even if we include in the latter the great islands of Nova Zemlia. The Australian chain further resembles the Ural in being composed, according to Strzelecki, of an axis of eruptive or igneous rocks (greenish syenite, greenstone, porphyry, serpentine, &c.)—some metamorphic rocks (quartz rocks and slate) with unquestionable palæozoic deposits on either flank. It still further resembles the Ural in altitude and in the total absence of all free transported blocks or boulders, all the alluvia or diluvia being local; but it so far differs from the Ural and many other meridian chains, in having as yet offered no trace of gold or auriferous veins. Apologising for having momentarily drawn your attention to a comparison between this Australian chain, and one with which I am acquainted, I must refer you to the forthcoming work of M. de Strzelecki, for many mineralogical and geological views, as well as for barometrical and meteorological observations made over a very large area by that intrepid and intelligent traveller, entirely for the love of science, and at his own expense."—Address to the Royal Geographical Society of London, on 27th May, 1844. (Journal Roy. Geog. Soc., vol. 14, p. xcix.-c.)

The whole Notice of the year 1845, alluded to in the preceding extract from "Siluria."

" In reference to the encomium which I last year thought it my duty, as it was my pleasure, to bestow on the gratuitous and important researches of M. Strzelecki along the great Cordillera of Australia, so I now congratulate you on the appearance of the volume, in which the condensed results of his travels are embodied. The trade of bookselling is, I regret to say, very adverse to the development of that species of detailed knowledge which geographers specially covet, particularly from those who describe new lands; hence this able and industrious explorer has been necessarily compelled to abstain from giving us his views in the form of a narrative, followed by general inferences, and to abridge that style of graphic description in which I know he excels. The work, however, which is now produced, small though it be, in relation to what M. Strzelecki could bring forth, is a well arranged and methodical view (geographical as well as geological) of a great and slightly known chain, and he is entitled to our warmest thanks for considerably improving our acquaintance with the physical features and structure of this lateral back-bone of the vast south-eastern Continent, and for presenting to us a new map of that part of the world."—*Presidential Address to the Royal Geographical Society of London, 26 May, 1845. (4.)

Extract from Letter of SIR R. I. MURCHISON to SIR C. LEMON, in the year 1846, on the rocks of Cornwall.

" If gold exist not (in any remarkable quantity at least) in your otherwise richly endowed mineral county, there are, I am happy to say, good grounds to hope that in their most distant Colony, Englishmen may find it abundantly. In an address to the Royal Geographical Society, delivered in May, 1844, when commenting on the valuable labours of Count Strzelecki, in decyphering the structure of the great north and south chain which ranges along the eastern shores of Australia, I especially insisted on its striking resemblance to the Ural Mountains within, in direction, in structure, or in alluvia, remarking by the way that as yet no gold had been found in this alluvium. I now learn, however, that fine specimens of gold have been found in the western flank of the Australian Cordillera, particularly at the settlement of Bathurst, where it occurs in fragments composed of the same matrix (via., quartz rock) as in the Ural.

" My

"My friend and associate in the Imperial Academy of Petersburg, Colonel Helmersen, has recently suggested that a careful search for gold ore in the Australian debris will, it is highly probable, lead to its detection in abundance, since the Russians had long colonized the mountains, and had for many years worked mines of magnetic iron and copper in solid rocks, before the neglected shingle gravel and sand on the slopes of their hills and in their valleys were found to be auriferous. If, then, in the course of your statistical inquiries, you may know of any Government Cornish miner about to seek his fortune in Australia, be pleased to tell him to apply his knowledge of the mode of extracting his ore from his own gravel to the drift and debris on the flanks of the great north and south chain of Australia, or any smaller parallel ridges of that great country, for great would be my pleasure to learn that through the application of Cornish skill such a region should be converted into a British El Dorado."

Extract from the Report of the British Association, for 1849, of an Address by SIR RODERICK I. MURCHISON.

"He reminded his auditors that, in considering the composition of the chief meridian ridge of Australia and its parallels, he had foretold that gold would be found in them; and he stated that in the last year (1848) a resident in Sydney (Mr. Smith), who had read what he had written and spoken on this point, had sent him specimens of gold ore found in the Blue Mountains, whilst from another source (Mr. Phillips) he had learned that the parallel north and south ridge, in the Adelaide region, which had yielded so much copper, had also given more undoubted signs of gold ore."—*Report of Sections, Brit. Extract from the Presidential Address to the Geological Society of London, by R. I. MURCHISON, ESQ., on 18 February, 1842.

"Slender as our information is as yet, respecting the natural history of that wide and detached continent which British industry is reclaiming, we cannot but anticipate a rapid accession to our knowledge, now that some highly gifted naturalists are established in it. Whilst I simply allude to Mr. W. Macleay and Captain Philip Parker King, whose researches are directed to branches of science connected with our own, it is my duty to mention more specially the Rev. W. B. Clarke, a member of this Society, who has previously contributed to our Proceedings and Transactions; and who, in his recent voyage to Australia, has afforded fresh evidence that his leisure hours will still be employed in geological pursuits. A short residence at the Cape of Good Hope enabled him to communicate to us a memoir on the structure of that Colony. * * *"—Proceedings of the Geological Society of London, vol. iii., p. 645.

Sydney, 30 July, 1852.*

Reverend Sir,

Referring to my letter of the 8th August, 1851, notifying the Governor General's acceptance of your offer to proceed to ascertain the probability of the existence of gold in various parts of the Colony, and to your note of the 2nd instant, I have now the honor to inform you that His Excellency approves of your proceeding so soon as your arrangements will permit, to ascertain and report on the auriferous character of the Northern Districts of the Colony.

2. The following localities, specified in my letter of the above date, include much of what it will be desirable for you to explore, viz. :—

- 1st. The Heads of the Mackintyre Brook.
- 2nd. The Waters running into the Severn.
- 3rd. The Country at the head of the Apsley.

4th.

- 4th. The Country below the Apsley Falls.
- 5th. The heads of the Rivers joining the Peol, near Tamworth.
- 6th. The heads of the Tulleragua and Coolabaragundi.
- 7th. The heads of the Colo.
- 8th. The Country at the head of the Logan and Richmond.

3. I may also mention the necessity of your following down the westerly waters towards the meridian of Warialda, and examining so much of the adjacent country as time will allow.

4. In prosecuting the object of your expedition, you will have the goodness to follow the general instructions communicated to you in my letter of the 8th August.

5. As you are doubtful whether you will be able to get a cart up the range from Grafton to the Table Land without more horse power than you will probably be able to command, His Excellency approves of the mode of getting on to the Table Land being left optional with you.

1854.—NEW SOUTH WALES.—DISCOVERY OF GOLD IN AUSTRALIA.

Appendix to Answers 12 and 13, in the Evidence of the Rev. W. B. Clarke, M.A., F.G.S., taken before the Select Committee on the Management of the Gold Fields, on Friday, 24th September, 1852.*

No. 1.

From R. THERY, Esq., one of Her Majesty's Judges of the Supreme Court.

*Keera Vale, Wollongong,
2 October, 1852.*

My dear Sir,

I can have no hesitation in stating I quite well recollect the circumstance of your communicating to me your discovery of gold. The conversation took place on board the Parramatta steamer, some time in 1844, on my return to Sydney from a visit to a part of the country which I then represented in the Legislative Council. On that occasion, you shewed a piece of quartz in which two or three large specks of gold shone very distinctly and brilliantly; and you intimated that from that and other specimens you had seen, and from the geological observations you had made, you were confident that gold would be found in abundance in this Colony. I mentioned the matter to many of my friends at the time, and the recent extensive discoveries of gold brought very vividly to my recollection your predictions, which these discoveries have verified.

I therefore can have no objection to the mention of my name in the manner in which you have introduced it in your evidence.

Rev. W. B. Clarke.

Believe me, &c.,
R. THERY.

From MR. CHARLES BLAKEFIELD, a successful Gold Digger, written voluntarily.

Sofala, 11 September, 1852.

Rev. Sir,

The long controversy in the public papers respecting the alleged original discovery of gold in this country having now ceased, I beg to apologize for my negligence in not having sooner added my evidence in proof of your attainments as a geologist.

About nine years ago, I gave you a piece of gold in quartz, found at Mitchell's Creek, and brought down by McGregor, the shepherd, when you informed me that nearly the whole of the rivers on this side of the Dividing Range were highly auriferous. At the time I asked you

*12. Have you any objection to state to the Committee, when your attention was first directed to the existence of gold in this country? It was in 1841, when I crossed the Dividing Range to the westward of Parramatta, in endeavouring to satisfy myself as to the extent of the carboniferous formation in that direction, that I first became aware of the existence of gold in Australia, by detecting it at the head of the Winburndale rivulet, and in the granite westward of the vale of Clwydd.

13. By Mr. Holroyd: Did you go further to the westward? No; I had satisfied myself as to the object of my journey, and returned home. At that time I knew little of the history of gold, but since then I have obtained every information I could upon the subject. There are many persons living who know that I, very shortly afterwards, began to speak of the abundance of gold likely to be found in the Colony, and that as early as 1843, I mentioned it generally. On the 9th April, 1844, I also spoke to the then Governor, Sir G. Gipps, and exhibited to him a sample, but without any result as to further inquiry. The matter was regarded as one of curiosity only, and consideration of the penal condition of the Colony kept the subject quiet as much as the general ignorance of the value of such an indication. In that year I exhibited the gold, and spoke of its probable abundance to some of the then Members of Council, and one of them, the late Mr. Robinson, replied to me, "you ought to have been a miner," but took no further notice of it. The only person who seemed to take much interest in the subject was His Honor Mr. Justice Therry. I am able to fix the date of the time when I spoke to Sir G. Gipps, by the recollection that I spent that day with him at Parramatta, and that it was the day on which a certain great meeting of squatters was held in Sydney.

you why you did not make the fact known to the public, when your reply was that you was afraid that it would tend to the utter disorganization of society, particularly as then constituted.

But had I known that the whole science of gold washing lay in the shaking of a tin dish, I am doubtful whether any such considerations of public policy would have prevented me from essaying the facts at that time, particularly as a friend of mine was also at the time extremely urgent upon me to join him in a prospecting tour.

Carrabost, Tarcutta Creek, 20 November, 1851.

My dear Sir,

Although some years have passed since we met at Appin,* I have, during the last few months, often recalled to mind your saying that you knew where to find gold on the Bathurst side, and finding that you proved a good authority in that case, I was tempted to go prospecting here, as I hear you stated that this was a likely locality to find gold. I think you will hear that your prediction proves to be correct. This place is situated on the right hand branch of the Tarcutta Creek coming up, and is about forty-five miles from its junction with the Murrumbidgee River.

A shepherd, in the employment of Messrs. Walker and Co., at a place called American Yards, eight miles lower down the creek, has also found gold there, of the same description as it is here; and he tells me that he has found some on a hill side that looks "as if it had been melted"; and he will not shew me any of this.

Camden Park, Camden, 29 July, 1854.

My dear Sir,

I have deferred answering your note in order to refresh my memory by a reference to memoranda connected with public transactions, which I know took place at the period of our conversation, relative to your first discovery of gold in the Hartley District, and your conviction, from geological investigations, that Australia would prove to be a great gold producing country. I find, upon reference to those memoranda, that your communications to me, on the above subjects, must have been in 1843 and the early part of 1844. I well recollect that you pointedly alluded to the grave objection to opening gold mines to the cupidity of a population which, at that time constituted the great majority of the inhabitants of these Colonies, and you mentioned the strong views entertained by Sir George Gipps, as to the ill consequences to be dreaded from a disclosure of what you had ascertained.

On more than one occasion you expressed a hope, that opportunities would be afforded to you to pursue your geological researches, and you declared your firm conviction that gold, with other valuable metals, would, at no remote period, constitute a most important part of the resources of the Colony.

You also mentioned that your own object, apart from your public duties, were confined exclusively to the extension of science.

Extract of a Letter from H. K. JAMES, Esq., Secretary to the late Bishop of Sydney.

"I have no certain recollection when you first told me that you had found gold in this country, but I thought, and still think, that you alluded to the fact in one of your notes to me a very long time ago, which, if I could have found it, would be of much value to you now.

"You have been, as long as we knew you, always speaking about the 'mineral resources of Australia'—that it was full of gold—that we should 'live to see this one of the richest places on the globe,' and so forth. 'Clarke's prophecies' upon these subjects were as 'familiar as household words;' they seemed, however, at the time, long before H. was ever heard of, to be idle tales, and as you were very generally regarded as a scientific enthusiast, your observations and truthful predictions received very ordinary attention, and entirely failed to make the impression they were calculated to do. I have often thought,

My dear Sir,

Having noticed a remark of Mr. Hargraves upon your claiming to have been the original discoverer of the Gold Field now being worked, and which appears to me to attach doubt as to the correctness of your statement, I think it right to remind you, that about two or three months ago, you pointed out to me on Dixon's Map of New South Wales, a considerable extent of country in the neighbourhood of the Cauobolas in which gold was known by you to exist in large quantities.

If this communication can be of any service to you, you are at liberty to make any use of it you please.

" I must here pay a tribute to the foresight and scientific investigations of the Rev. Mr. Clarke, who unquestionably had ascertained the existence of an extensive Gold Field in Australia long before any excitement had been caused by the recent discoveries in California.

" Mr. Clarke was investigating the geological structure of the country about Murrurundi and the Page's River, I think in the year 1845, and I recollect his telling me that he had discovered gold in the Bathurst district in sufficient quantities to pay a person for working it, or I think his words were, in quantities sufficient to enable him to earn a subsistence, if necessity had driven him to such a course; he also mentioned at the same time, that most probably it would be found along the western flanks of the great Dividing Range, north of Murrurundi, where it is now found extensively disseminated, thus proving how surely and accurately the predictions of science are to be realized. * * *

Extract from the Leading Article of the " GOULBURN HERALD," of 20th May, 1851, forwarded to me by the REV. W. SOWERBY, Incumbent of Goulburn, who says, in his Letter enclosing it:—

" I am glad you are going to defend yourself. It is due to yourself and your friends everywhere to meet your opponents clearly and fearlessly. I intended long ago to write to you to urge you to do it, but I thought surely ' he does not require any advice on a subject so important as the defence of his fair fame.' "

Extract from the " GOULBURN HERALD" of the 20th May, 1851.

" Should there be any of our neighbours to whom the voice of warning is of no avail, we would say, ' Bide awhile'—there will be no necessity for travelling 150 miles to gratify their inordinate love for adventure in the hope of gaining great riches by easy means. Bide awhile. We have in our own county a gold mine as rich as that which is now causing so much excitement in the public mind. For the truth of this assertion we refer them to the first article, headed " Gold," in the second page of this number. It will be there seen that the Rev. W. B. Clarke, whose labours in geological research in this Colony have scarcely been appreciated, stated between 1842 and 1847 that gold exists in the Dividing Range (between Bathurst and Wellington), and also in the county of Argyle. †

* I did not know of the existence of this publication till May, 1854, when I wrote for a copy of it to the author, John Gill, Esq., J.P., of Tamworth, a gentleman of the highest respectability and acquirements. In reply he states, that it was about the year 1844 (and not 1845), and he is right, for I was on duty in the first three months of that year at Muswellbrook, in place of the Rev. W. Gore, and I then visited Bickham. I left Muswellbrook on Ash-Wednesday, and after eight week's duty, I met with a severe accident on my way to Jury's Plains, which gives me the true date, 21st February. Mr. Gore, to whom I applied to fix the year, says in a letter dated 25th July, 1854, " you were at Muswellbrook in 1844, for the first time; I ought to know, for it was at that time I was married."

† The tract of country which I spoke of as auriferous was the District as well as County, and in the latter I found gold in 1842. The whole eastern border of the county along the Shoalhaven, I proved in 1851 to be auriferous; and the Gold Fields about Braidwood, Araluen, &c., are in the adjoining county.—W. B. C.

" This Dividing Range is the same line of hills which lies east of Richlands; and as the recently proclaimed Gold Field has been discovered to extend indefinitely to the northward, it is but fair to suppose that it does to the southward, and that the whole scope of country is rich in gold.

* * * * *

" Hence arises the curious question—'How came the treasures of our adopted country to remain so long a sealed letter to those who daily traversed the scene?' The answer is plain and simple. We had no mineralogists or geologists amongst us."

To this the editor appends the following remarks in a foot-note:—

" We cannot entirely agree with the writer. The Rev. W. B. Clarke is acknowledged to be a thorough geologist, and years since he was aware of the existence of gold in the very localities in which it has been recently found in abundance. During a visit to this gentleman, a considerable time previous to the discoveries made by Mr. Hargraves, we were shewn a specimen of gold found in the Bathurst Ranges; and we have seen letters, written by Mr. Clarke to his friends in England, ten years ago, which proved he then knew the country to be auriferous. The Rev. Gentleman did not make public his knowledge of the existence of gold in Australia, simply because, considering that New South Wales had only a short time ceased to be a Penal Settlement, and that the people were not remarkable for their virtue, he feared it might become a curse rather than a blessing."—[Ed. Colonial Secretary's Office, Sydney, 11 November, 1853.

Reverend Sir,

With reference to my letter of the 2nd of September last, respecting the gratuity which it would be proper to offer to you on the completion of the geological exploration on which you have been recently employed, I am now directed by His Excellency the Governor General to annex an extract of the report of the Committee of the Legislative Council on the Gold Fields Management Bill, in which the subject is adverted to; and to inform you that, fully concurring in the appreciation therein recorded of the geological reports which you have addressed at different times to the Government, His Excellency, with the advice of the Executive Council, reviewed his decision with respect to the amount of gratuity to be awarded to you, and invited the Legislature by a Message, dated 21st September last, to appropriate a sum of £1,000 for this purpose, in lieu of £500 which had been before placed on the Estimates. This amount having, in consequence, been voted by the Council, I am further to inform you that a warrant has been signed by His Excellency for its payment to you from the Colonial Treasury.

I have, &c.,

Extract of the Report of the Committee of the Legislative Council on the Gold Fields Management Bill, referred to in the Colonial Secretary's letter to the Reverend W. B. Clarke, A. M., of 11th November, 1853.

" Your Committee, while on the subject of gratuities, feel it due to the Rev. W. B. Clarke to record their high appreciation of the geological reports which he has addressed at different times to this Government, and their opinion that the sum of £500, placed on the Supplementary Estimates as an acknowledgment of his services should be increased to £1,000."

*Superintendent's Office,
Nelson, N.Z.,
7 June, 1855.*

Sir,

Your reputation as a scientific discoverer of minerals, and reports that you have some intention of visiting New Zealand, have induced me to address you with reference to a Mineralogical Exploration which the local Government is anxious to institute in some portions of the province of Nelson.

The Government more especially desires to have a reliable examination of and report upon the Coal Fields of Massacre Bay, where coal is now being obtained in places twenty-five miles apart by quarrying on the surface, where it has been exposed by the action of streams.

The country to be explored in that district is partially open fern land, and partially covered with dense forest, the district itself being easily traversible, and in most places accessible by water.

Next to the desire of the Government for a scientific report upon this valuable Coal Field, it is anxious to ascertain the probable extent of copper ore which the province contains, which ore has been discovered in considerable quantities in close proximity to the town of Nelson, and is believed to exist in other places.

Plumbago and chromate of iron have also been discovered; and gold is reported to exist, and specimens have been exhibited, but without sufficient evidence that they were actually obtained within the province.

From the above it is evident that an interesting field for mineralogical research exists here, and the Government is most anxious to assist in the development of the economic resources of the province, which would result from certifying the existence of fields of valuable minerals in such positions as to be capable of being profitably worked.

It might possibly be within your power to conduct personally, for a time, an exploration of the character required, or some person in Australia competent to the duty may be known to you, and you would in the latter case confer an obligation on the Government if you would make known its wishes to any such person with a view to an engagement being entered into with him. If a prolonged engagement were entered into a salary at the rate of from £400 to £500 a year would be paid, and all necessary assistance supplied at the expense of the Government, but any particular work might if reference be specially contracted for.

I have, &c.,

E. W. STAFFORD,
Superintendent.

Sir,

The Government of this Colony having decided on defraying the expenses of an expedition in search of gold, and being desirous also of obtaining further information than it at present possesses respecting the coal beds on Tasman's Peninsula, I am directed by His Excellency Sir Henry Young to state that, if it should meet with your views, this Government will be glad to avail itself of the services of so experienced a geologist as yourself in examining and reporting on the geological character of the country in the neighbourhood of Fingal, and other places supposed to be auriferous, and also in endeavouring to ascertain the existence and extent of coal formations on Tasman's Peninsula, and elsewhere.

Should

Should you be disposed to render to this Government the assistance desired, your expenses will of course be defrayed, and such a personal remuneration allowed you as may be agreed upon; and on this point, as well as on the subject of this letter generally, I shall be glad to hear from you at as early a period as possible.

My dear Clarke,

I send you a letter and enclosure which I have just received from New Zealand.

I know no one so competent as yourself to enter upon the examination of the Coal Field. Do you feel inclined to run down to New Zealand and report upon it? If so, I shall be very glad to be able to think that my mission has been so well fulfilled. If, however, you do not feel disposed to go, can you recommend any man whom you think competent to afford such information to the Government of New Zealand as they require?

Colonial Secretary's Office,
10 March, 1858.

Sir,

The Legislature of this Colony having, during its late session, made provision for the expense of a Geological Survey of the Colony with a report on its Mines and Minerals, I am directed by the Government to request, that you will do them the favour to accept the appointment.

The sum voted by the Parliament is £5,000, and from this it is proposed to allow £600 per annum as the remuneration for the services of the geologist, with an allowance for travelling expenses in the Colony.

The duties of such an officer it would be presumptuous in me to attempt to define. It is desired that the Surveyor should, before the expiration of six years, prepare a Geological Map of Tasmania, and also a book ready for publication, on the Mines and Geology of the Colony.

But for your presence in a neighbouring Colony the Government would at once have addressed themselves to some friend in England for the selection of a Surveyor there, but believing that you may possibly be at liberty, and remembering the interest previously exhibited in your spontaneous labours when a visitor in Tasmania, they have a pleasure in placing the appointment at your disposal, as an individual already well known and appreciated, and whose services would therefore command our confidence and give great satisfaction to the people of this Colony.

The Rev. W. B. Clarke,
St. Leonard's, near Sydney, N. S. W.

I have, &c.,

You will doubtless have heard of our determination to have a Geological Survey of the Island; will you let me know in confidence if you will undertake it. We should presume the salary, for five or six years certain, would be about £600 to £800 a year. In haste.

St. Leonard's,
9 April, 1858.

Sir,

The offer which, on the part of the Government of Tasmania, you have made me in your letter of the 10th ultimo, demands my best acknowledgments, not only on the ground of the confidence which you are pleased to say is placed in me by the Government and the people of your Colony, but on account of the very kind and flattering terms in which this proposal has been conveyed to me.

I do myself, therefore, the honor of requesting you to accept my thanks, and also to convey them to the other Members of Government, for their acceptable testimony to the value of the humble services which I have been enabled to render in the development of the resources of the Australian Colonies, and for the good opinion entertained of me.

Proportionate, however, with the sense of the obligation under which this offer has laid me, is my regret, that circumstances (partly connected with the state of health in which my illness in 1856 has left me) must render it my duty to decline an opportunity of exploring your Colony, which some years since would have been to me an object of ambition.

It

It is not without very careful consideration, that I have come to this decision.

It would, to say the least, be as unjust to the Colony to undertake the responsibility which would devolve on me, as it would be unfair to myself to lay aside my duties in this Colony, were I not perfectly convinced, so far as human foresight can go, that I should be able to carry out the views of the Tasmanian Government and my own desire to give satisfaction without withdrawing in the midst of my labours on the score of physical inability to complete the task.

Nor would this be materially affected by the opportunity, which I suppose would be readily allowed, of carrying on, in conjunction with my explorations, voluntary missionary labours in the secluded parts of the country.

It is not without reluctance that I feel compelled to abandon the prospect of completing my knowledge of Tasmania, and of endeavouring to repay, in some degree, the kindness and attention which I have already received from its inhabitants, and to oblige whom would be a source of satisfaction to me.

I beg leave to add, that if I can in any way, from my experience of what is required, be of any service to your Government, on consultation, I shall be happy in placing such service at your disposal.

I have, &c.,
W. B. CLARKE.

Colonial Secretary's Office,

Sir,

I have the honor, by direction of the Colonial Secretary, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, declining to undertake the Geological Survey of Tasmania, and to express his regret at the cause which has led to that decision, a regret fully shared in by His Excellency the Governor and the other Members of the Government.

In the last paragraph of your letter, you kindly volunteer your aid to forward the objects in view; and to that end I am directed to ask if there is any gentleman with whom you may be personally acquainted, who, you think, is qualified for the task, and willing to undertake it, whose scientific knowledge is of such extent, as to give weight to his opinions, and in whose report you yourself could place thorough confidence.

My dear Sir,
Mr. Robertson has it in contemplation to frame some new regulations, having for their object the better development of our mineral resources, and when seeking the best assistance within reach in such a matter, he naturally turns to you. Do you see any difficulty in the way of presiding over the labours of a Board composed (say) of yourself, Mr. Keene, and the Deputy Surveyor General, having for its object the suggestion of such a code of regulations as may under the present circumstances of this Colony facilitate the working of coal-bearing and mineral lands, other than auriferous lands?

Answer me in the negative at your convenience.

Rev. W. B. Clarke.

Yours, &c.,
MICL. FITZPATRICK.

Department of Lands and Public Works,
Sydney, 18 September, 1858.

Reverend Sir,

I am directed to inform you that the Secretary for Lands and Public Works is desirous of having the advantage of your assistance in framing a Code of Regulations, under which the coal-bearing and mineral lands of the Crown may be worked to the greatest public advantage; and, assuming that this service will be compatible with your other avocations, I am to request that you will have the goodness to meet the officers named in the margin, for the purpose of forming a Board to carry out this object.

2. It is conceived that through the Deputy Surveyor General the Board will have ready access to all existing laws and regulations, relating to the sale or occupation of the waste lands.

3. I am instructed to add, that it is not desired to confine your suggestions to what is practicable under the present state of the law; on the contrary, Mr. Secretary Robertson is anxious rather to ascertain what regulations the Board may consider likely to develop the mineral resources of the country, without regard to the now state of the law. But it would, at the same time, be a great convenience if any recommendations, which may proceed from the Board, were so distinguished as readily to shew which of them were possible under existing regulations, and which of them required special legislation to render them operative.

4. It is believed that any office accommodation, which the Board may stand in need of, can be supplied by the Deputy Surveyor General.

The Rev. W. B. Clarke,
St. Leonard's.

I have, &c.,
MICL. FITZPATRICK.

The Deputy Surveyor General,
The Examiner of Coal Mines.

Extract from a Letter from a Member of the Select Committee of the Legislative Council of Victoria, on the Claims for the Discovery of Gold in Victoria. (Report dated 10 March, 1854.)

My dear Sir, I may tell you that the Committee feel bound to recognize your claim to be considered the first discoverer of gold in Australia. This paragraph in the Report which recognises the distinction of merits, was carried cheerfully and unanimously, by the whole Committee. I did not contemplate the probability that the Committee would recognize your services in a pecuniary way, and anxious that your scientific claims should be fully and freely admitted, consequently I did not move any pecuniary recognition. I am the more pleased to be able to inform you, that in resolving as to who should be reported to the House as worthy of pecuniary reward, your name was proposed, and carried unanimously, as one who, from the value of your scientific researches into the mineral riches of the Colony, should be recommended for £1,000. I feel certain that it cannot but be gratifying to you to know, that the Committee have recorded their sense of the value of these services; and further, I feel that you will look upon the pecuniary recommendation with more pride, emanating, as it did, from a party with whom you have had no communication. We have placed you, even in a pecuniary point of view, on a footing with our best men, and in other respects immeasurably before the grade of them. I see by the remarks of the Sydney Herald, that they are convinced the country will, sooner or later, do you justice. I am happy that the first step in the right direction has been taken by our Committee, and I do not think that the Committee have any cause to blush at the distinction marked, though it be that they have drawn it in favour of science.

Yours, &c.
 The Rev. W. B. Clarke,
 St. Leonard's,

Recently my thoughts have been recalled to Australia; first, and chiefly, by a letter from the Governor of Tasmania which almost announces that you are going thither as the Government Geologist. This last piece of news has gratified me, because it leads me necessarily to infer that your health has much improved, to allow you to undertake so laborious a task. You are certainly well qualified, by all your knowledge and experience, to effect the object of the Tasmanians, and I heartily wish you success.

Yours, &c.
 "ROCK. I. MURCHISON."

My dear Sir,
 I have read with considerable interest your valuable reports of geological surveys which you have undertaken (and so creditably to yourself) in New South Wales, and I cannot but express a hope that you may publish them in a separate form, so as to render that survey less voluminous than the general blue book is, and thus more acceptable to the reader, and handy to all those to whom the subject is of interest.

Your discovery of fishes is very important, as it will bear on many points, and particularly on the analogy which the succession of Australian geological periods has with those of the rest of the world.

With my best wishes, and thanks for your kind remembrance,—
 Believe me, &c.,

 " 1841, le Rev. W. B. Clarke, étudiant la géologie des Montagnes-Bleues, avait découvert de
 " l'or a peu près à trente lieues de Sydney : il avait observé cet or non seulement à l'état
 " roulé, mais même dans sa gangue. * * * * *

 " science sont facilement méconnus et oubliés du vulgaire."

My dear Mr. Clarke,

Wivenhoe, 7 January, 1854.

I was not under the impression that you had received the sum voted for printing your geological notes. Upon some occasion, if I remember correctly, you informed me the sum allowed was insufficient for the service, and that, as matters stood, you did not intend to take any steps in the matter. And, recently, good old Mr. Berry hinted that a larger sum would be asked for, or some suggestion of the kind, just as the Council was closing; and, as I knew nothing could then be done during the Session, I did not listen very attentively to what fell from him.

It is a pity the result of so many years of scientific labour should be lost to the community. By the way, what is Mr. Stutchbury about? I cannot say I have formed any very great idea of his talents, natural or acquired. Thomson said I should when I had read his reports; I did read them, but saw nothing to applaud in them.

Wishing you the compliments of the season,

Believe me, &c.,

CHARLES COWPER.

No. 1.

MR. CROFT to COLONIAL SECRETARY.

*Pitt-street South,
15 February, 1859.*

SIR,

I beg leave to enclose to you a Memorial from myself, received per last mail, with two letters * from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, requiring that the same may be laid before His Excellency the Governor, which I request the favour of your doing.

I have, &c.,

JONATHAN CROFT,
Dy. Purveyor Half-pay, and late Apothecary.

[Enclosure in No. 1.]

To His Royal Highness Field Marshal the Duke of Cambridge, K.G., G.O.M.G., G.C.H., &c., &c., &c., Commander-in-Chief of the British Forces.

The Memorial of Jonathan Croft, late Deputy Purveyor and Apothecary for the Military, Civil, and Convict Services in New South Wales,—

HUMBLY SHEWETH:—

That Your Royal Highness' Memorialist, who in 1835, had the purveying duties of the Military General Hospital at Cork, a post which he had held for many years, was ordered from full pay to proceed to New South Wales, for special duties connected with the Military, Civil, and Convict Services.

2. That it was ordered that he should receive his half pay, together with the difference between that and his full pay, with allowances from what was then in the Colony termed the Military Chest.

3. That in the duties of the three services, he was actually engaged for sixteen years, until its reduction, when he was ordered Home, the Governor giving authority for his family to have their passage allowed, with his two months pay, &c., during their stay in the Colony.

4. That this arrangement was not carried out, the Commissariat Department here considering your Memorialist to be upon full pay, and not entitled to the allowances ordered by the Governor.

5. That in consequence of your Memorialist being ordered to leave Sydney for London forthwith, and his family, fifteen in number, being unable, by the non-conformity of the foregoing arrangement, to accompany him, the idea of their following him without the care of a male protector was obliged to be abandoned, although at that time he possessed the means, if with the foregoing, to defray the extra expense of their passages.

6. That at the advanced age of Memorialist, seventy-five years, he is scarcely able to re-open a correspondence with the Colonial Government, in respect to a matter which has been so long in abeyance, and he therefore, by the advice of many friends, addresses Your Royal Highness, to whom he most respectfully submits his claims. These claims are as follows:—

(1.) He believes that he is, in the first place, entitled to the difference between two months' full and half-pay, ordered by the Governor to be paid, when, at the expiration of sixteen years service, he was ordered Home. This difference amounts at the rate of ten shillings per diem, with lodging money, forage, rations, and servants' pay, amounting to fifty-eight pounds, which he prays may be commuted to fifty-eight acres of waste land.

(2.) For Memorialist's sixteen years services in this Colony, he received no increase or gratuity, but only a small increase for his former military services, although he had here performed the duties of three distinct and responsible departments, and the increase which he did receive was calculated from a precedent in the case of Purveyor Peirce, who obtained an increase of three shillings per diem—who for his own convenience had asked to go on half-pay, his son succeeding him. Whilst Memorialist, after nearly fifty years service, only obtained the same allowance, and by the reduction in the departments in this Colony, he and his son (who was then medical clerk) lost their offices. Having received his appointment as purveyor, and as by the orders of the Governor, as apothecary, Memorialist was entitled upon his arrival here in 1836, in accordance with the then existing regulations (he being considered on half-pay), to a grant of sixteen hundred acres, which other military and naval officers similarly circumstanced obtained. Such a grant Memorialist would then have applied for had he known that he was not to receive it in full as then allowed. He has since received a grant of four hundred acres, and therefore a further grant of twelve hundred acres is due to him. He would respectfully submit, that it was not by his own choice that he was placed on half-pay, but by arrangements of the Government, as mentioned, and which militated against his own interest; he therefore submits, that he is entitled to the twelve hundred acres, which, being cultivated by his children, will tend to augment the revenues of this Colony.

(3.) By the same want of understanding here, Memorialist's son (as per certified copy enclosed) and who received from the Secretary of State the appointment of medical clerk to the principal Medical Officer of New South Wales, for special duties, has not received the sum of one hundred and fifty-six pounds eight shillings due to him, which amount of money Memorialist's son, who is now absent from the Colony, has authorized Memorialist to commute for one hundred and fifty acres of waste land.

(4.) Field Marshal, the late lamented Duke of Wellington, in consideration of Memorialist's services at Waterloo, and elsewhere, offered a commission of the value of four hundred and fifty pounds to a son of Memorialist, who accordingly took his son to England, as requested, but the expense of a military education was incompatible with his circumscribed means, he, therefore, at the cost of three hundred pounds, brought his son back to the Colony, after two years waiting, although recommended by the Secretary-at-War for a civil appointment in lieu. A loss of seven hundred and fifty pounds was therefore together sustained by reason of these untoward circumstances, which Memorialist also prays may be duly considered and commuted into land to the extent of seven hundred and fifty acres.

(5.) The Home authorities approved of Memorialist having a reward from the Colony for his civil services in New South Wales, and for having effected a saving to the Colony of two thousand pounds, in consequence of his having issued (by permission of the Government) medicines and other necessities necessaries at the reduced English charges, from the Imperial chest for the public service of the Colony. On this account Memorialist's assistant (and an assistant surgeon of the Royal Navy) received a step of promotion and increased pay, and an extra allowance of one pound one shilling per diem, for the same duties other officers so employed. Officers similarly situated to Memorialist, at the Cape, Mauritius, and Ceylon, received one hundred pounds per annum; an allowance which this Colony did not make, from its not being previously arranged, and it was stated, as too poor; and it was thought by the Colonial Council that Memorialist would receive such allowance from the Home Government. Memorialist was arduously employed every night, and from his communications with the Quarantine Department, where thirteen medical officers had to be furnished with separate and distinct returns at a time when six of his own children were at the point of death, most possibly by inhaling the poison of my pressing and unfumigated letters. Your Royal Highness' Memorialist would here beg permission to state that upon the reduction of the Convict Establishment of New South Wales, the first clerk, Mr. Thomas Ryan, in consideration of his thirty-four years service, received a pension of two hundred and twenty-two pounds ten shillings per annum; two other clerks in the same office, Mr. Glaister and Mr. Rogers, after fourteen years service, received gratuities of four hundred pounds each; Captain (now Colonel) Barney, commanding the Royal Engineer Department, was placed on Colonial pay; Deputy Commissary General Laidley, after four years Colonial service, received an allowance of ten shillings per diem,—equivalent to three thousand four hundred acres of land, which was granted. Under these circumstances, Memorialist respectfully submits his claim for the allowance of three thousand acres in consequence of the reduction of the Convict Department, and for Memorialist's sixteen years service, and his consequent loss of office.

* The letters alluded to were forwarded to the Secretary of State with Mr. Croft's memorial.
See No. 11.

(6.) The Imperial Government having authorized the payment of their passage Home of the wife and family of your Memorialist according to a scale at Van Diemen's Land, amounting in all to two hundred and fifty-six pounds thirteen shillings and four-pence, but which arrangement, for the reasons already stated, was not able to be carried into effect. Memorialist therefore submits that the promise of such allowance may be commuted to two hundred and fifty-seven acres of land.

(7.) By a regulation established in Memorialist's department, it is ruled that subordinates eligible for commissions must have served three years abroad, or five years at Home. Memorialist and Deputy Purveyor Pratt were, in consideration of their length of service, allowed increase to their respective pays, which arrangement continued until the year eighteen hundred and forty-seven. Since that date Mr. Pratt, junior to Memorialist, and serving at Home, has been in the receipt of one hundred pounds per annum more than Memorialist, who, although serving abroad for four years of the above period of time, was performing the duties of three important and separate services, as already represented, has had no such increased pay. He therefore submits his claim for four hundred pounds, or a commutation of four hundred acres of waste land.

(8.) Memorialist was deemed eligible, and was offered full pay whilst lately at Home, but from the position in which he has been placed since the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty until the present date, he has lost the difference of four hundred pounds per annum during the seven years, commutation for which one thousand nine hundred acres of waste land he believes that he may justly claim. He has tried to extricate himself from these representations in order to be above making this appeal, but in vain; the expensive necessities of this Colony now requires it, and it has been found so publicly and officially; he is away from his connection and interest, and that against his will and of great deprivation of advantages to his family. The foregoing circumstances occurred before and while the land of the Colony was under the Imperial control.

(9.) The total quantity of land which is the amount of the foregoing commutations is seven thousand seven hundred and twenty-one acres.

Your Memorialist now earnestly begs the attention of your Royal Highness to the testimonials as to his character and long services, annexed herewith; he would particularly beg to refer to those bearing the signatures of Sir James M'Grigor; Surgeon General Keate; Robert Keate, Esq., Inspector General of Hospitals and Surgeon to the Queen; J. Gunning, Esq., Deputy Inspector General, P. M. O., and Surgeon to the late King; and Dr. Hemming, Deputy Inspector-General of Hospitals.

Your Royal Highness' Memorialist, having made this statement of the losses he has sustained in consequence of his appointment to mixed services in this Colony, and the misunderstanding which he has described in reference to the conflicting opinions entertained by the heads of the Imperial and Colonial Departments here,—

Humbly prays, that your Royal Highness will take the promises into consideration, and direct such steps, as your Royal Highness may deem meet, to be taken to discharge the claims which Memorialist now submits for your Royal Highness' consideration. And your Memorialist, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c., &c.

Sir, No. I. (Copy.)

Malta, 10 May, 1809.

Mr. Croft, who has been in the Medical Department for several years, under the patronage of Sir Richard Croft, M.D., has procured leave of absence to go to England on his private affairs. He has been five years in the Mediterranean, between three and four of which he has been attached to me; and, during the whole of that time, he gave me the most perfect satisfaction, by his punctual attention to his several duties, and by his extreme correct conduct as a private individual. In fact, he is a most respectable young man, and one for whose welfare I am much interested; I, therefore, beg leave to recommend him to you as being very deserving your protection and patronage.

Surgeon General Keate, in acknowledging the receipt of Mr. Croft's letter, has particular satisfaction in bearing testimony to his reported great attention, zeal, and abilities, during the whole period of his services, abroad and at home, in the Purveying Department; and, as a proof of his good opinion, he urged his being ordered from Malta to Spain, where his services would have been more conspicuously useful in 1809. Mr. Croft is at liberty to avail himself of the above testimonial in such manner as may lead to his promotion or otherwise.

Nothing from myself can add to the high approbation he has met with, in the heaviest and most arduous duty that ever fell to the lot of one individual, which he has performed in the most exemplary manner; he has been fourteen years in the service, and most actively employed, and is most worthy of recommendation.

I certify that Deputy Purveyor Croft was most actively employed as Deputy Purveyor of the General Hospitals at Brussels, at and subsequent to the Battle of Waterloo, and that he was in charge of the Purveying Department of the Hospitals there, and was left as Chief Purveying Officer. During his services under my superintendance, I found him to be a zealous and active officer, and he fulfilled to my perfect satisfaction the duties intrusted to his charge.

Dear Sir,

Finding that Sir James Grant, who is now here, is doing you the justice of bearing testimony to your extraordinary exertions at Brussels, in the arrangements for, and subsequent attention to the soldiers who were wounded at Waterloo, I cannot allow the opportunity to pass without offering my own sentiments upon the subject. I conceive myself authorized to do this, because you were under my own immediate eye during the whole of the hurried scene which took place for the first fortnight after the action, and having afterwards the charge of the Jesuits' Hospital and of the wounded officers. I do not hesitate in stating, that to your judicious and incessant exertions was due the most serious service which any man of your department could confer on the wounded soldiers, or the medical officers, and on the country which employed them; for, unparalleled as were the severities, your zeal and experience met and lessened them all. I can only add to this testimony of your services, my sincere hope that they will be taken into consideration, and my assurance that I am, &c.,

THE ARMY.—Several officers of the medical staff have been ordered to Australia, amongst whom is J. Croft, Esq., who has had the management of the Military General Hospital in this City for many years. Mr. Croft rendered essential services to the public here during the period the cholera was prevalent, having exerted himself actively in the organization of the temporary hospitals, for which many years experience had eminently qualified him. Mr. C. proceeds in the "Roslyn Castle," much respected by those who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, and amidst the regrets of the poor of his neighbourhood, to whom he has been a friend and benefactor.

Dear Sir,

Your services have been long and meritorious, and your claims are in proportion very great; the duties that devolved on you after the Battle of Waterloo, I should have thought, would have been sufficient to one who has deserved so well of his country: But the race is not always to the swift! I will see Sir James M'Grigor, and if anything should occur where I could serve a public officer who has deserved so well of his country, I shall be most happy to aid you in any manner that would be gratifying to myself.

My Dear Croft,

Before leaving New South Wales, I have a duty to perform in thanking you for the able and zealous manner in which you have always performed the services required of you, while in charge of the Military and Convict Medical Depôts in this Colony. They have been very extensive, and the issues and receipts have been so frequent as to render necessary unceasing daily attendance and vigilance.

I have likewise to offer my best thanks for the assistance I have ever derived from you, and the benefit of the advice of an old and intelligent officer.

SIR,

Referring to my letter of the 17th August last, respecting your Petition, preferring claims for pay and allowances to which you consider yourself entitled, and which you wish to commute for land in the Colony, I am directed to enclose for your information; a copy of a Despatch that has been received from the Secretary of State, by which you will observe that His Grace, having considered your Petition, cannot find that you have any claim upon the Public which has not been satisfied; and that it is quite beyond the power of the Secretary of State to order a grant to be made to you of any lands of this Colony.

Legislative Assembly.
NEW SOUTH WALES.

MR. WILLIAM MEADOWS BROWNRIGG.
(PETITION FROM.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 6 May, 1861.

To the Members of the Legislative Assembly of the Colony of New South Wales, in Parliament assembled.

The Petition of William Meadows Brownrigg, of Sydney, Licensed Surveyor,—

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH:—

That your Petitioner was appointed a licensed surveyor in the month of January, 1859, he having been, for a period of eighteen years, previously, extensively and successfully engaged, as a private surveyor, in surveying and sub-dividing some of the most valuable and the most extensive estates and properties in the Colony of New South Wales, and to the expressed satisfaction of one and all of his numerous employers.

2. That your Petitioner, on his appointment, was, for his guidance, furnished with copies of the Departmental Regulations which were in force, in respect to the payment of the accounts of licensed surveyors, which Regulations set forth, that all accounts were to be rendered monthly, and that, on their presentation, seventy-five per cent. of the amount ("the largest amount it was considered safe to pay") would be immediately paid—the residue of twenty-five per cent. being retained by the Department till such time as the work performed should have been examined and checked.

3. That, relying on the observance of good faith being kept in regard to these Regulations, and on the faith of the system on this head, as enunciated by the Acting Surveyor General (Mr. McLean), in his evidence, as given before the Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly, appointed to inquire into the management of the Survey Department, in the month of May, 1858, your Petitioner entered upon the duties of his office, and forthwith proceeded (as ordered) to the squatting district of Monaro.

4. That your Petitioner, by the total violation, on the part of the Acting Surveyor General (Mr. McLean), of the Regulations alluded to, combined with other acts of injustice and great wrong of the said Acting Surveyor General, your Petitioner has sustained much professional injury, suffered great pecuniary loss, and has been exposed for a period of two years to great privations and much mental suffering—the Acting Surveyor General, as your Petitioner has reason to believe, being actuated by personal feelings of ill-will towards your Petitioner.

5. That your Petitioner, on his appointment, nominated, with the sanction of the Survey Department, Mr. Adam Wilson, as his private agent in Sydney, to receive his moneys from the Survey Department.

6. That your Petitioner, shortly after his arrival in his district, finding that he could make more beneficial local arrangements for his pecuniary accommodation, intimated to the Survey Department the change he desired to make in his agency, and solicited that the moneys then due to your Petitioner might be paid to the parties named by him, and from which parties he had received, on the faith of his pay bills, the pecuniary assistance he required.

7. That your Petitioner was denied this just and reasonable request, and was informed that the Regulations of the Department alone would be complied with, and that no moneys would be paid to your Petitioner, save into some Bank in Sydney, to be named by him; your Petitioner's bills were, in consequence, dishonoured, and your Petitioner was thereby subjected to great obloquy.

8. That your Petitioner, not being aware of the existence of such imperative Regulations, and having been permitted, in the first instance, to appoint an agent (to whom your Petitioner's moneys had been paid for two months), respectfully appealed against such decision, and sustained his right to make such arrangement as he found most beneficial for the appropriation of his funds—more particularly so, when your Petitioner was employed at a distance of 400 miles from Sydney, with a limited postal communication.

9. That, nevertheless, your Petitioner's request was refused, although the arrangements, subsequently entered into with your Petitioner, shewed that the Regulations insisted upon were fallacious.

10. That while a prolonged correspondence on this subject was carried on, an order issued from the Supreme Court, on the 17th August, 1859, at the instance of one Henry Weaver, attaching all moneys due or accruing to your Petitioner, in the hands of the Acting Surveyor General.

11. That this fact was intimated to your Petitioner by the Acting Surveyor General, on the 20th August, 1859, who informed your Petitioner that no moneys could be paid to him till such time as the attachment was satisfied.

12. That at the time of such attachment issuing, your Petitioner had to his credit at the Survey Office the sum of two hundred and seventy-eight pounds (£278), or thereabouts, the attachment being for only the sum of one hundred and thirty pounds (£130), and which sum of £130, save and except the sum of forty-two pounds (£42), your Petitioner, with much surprise, has recently learnt has never been paid by the Acting Surveyor General, and in consequence of which unexplained and unaccountable conduct your Petitioner is, at this moment, subjected to unlooked for annoyance, and involved in unmerited legal proceedings.

13. That your Petitioner, from the month of May, 1859, to the month of February, 1860, was subjected to great pecuniary injury, great privations, and much mental disquietude, owing to the fact that, during the period in question—nearly ten months—your Petitioner never received one shilling of his earnings, save and except the sum of £42 above alluded to, and, notwithstanding that, during the period in question, such earnings had amounted to the sum of seven hundred and forty pounds (£740), or thereabouts. And, notwithstanding, that during such period of ten months, your Petitioner had frequently made the most urgent appeals for the payment of some portion of the money due to him; that such appeals were unheeded, and that, in consequence, your Petitioner's property was twice sold under legal process, to satisfy debts that had been incurred in the district; a loss, hardship, and degradation, to which your Petitioner would not have been exposed had it not been for the cruel, unjust, and oppressive conduct pursued by the Acting Surveyor General (Mr. McLean) towards your Petitioner.

15. That, after a lapse of ten months, your Petitioner received, on or about the 8th February, 1860, the sum of two hundred pounds (£200), accompanied by a letter from the Acting Surveyor General stating, that the delay in payment was attributable to the imperfections and errors which appeared in some of your Petitioner's plans, forwarded to the Department. Such plea, or excuse, your Petitioner maintains, was not sufficiently justified by facts, nor sustainable under the Regulations of the Department, or the testimony of Mr. McLean himself in respect to these very Regulations already alluded to in the second paragraph of this Petition.

16. That in your Petitioner's case, it was not the sum of twenty-five per cent. (as provided for under the Regulations in question), that was withheld from your Petitioner, but that it was the whole of his earnings that were retained; thereby reducing your Petitioner to great pecuniary distress, and almost incapacitating him, mentally and physically, for the discharge of his duties.

17. That on the 2nd December, 1859, your Petitioner forwarded to the Acting Surveyor General, a series of plans of surveys made during the previous months; that on the 16th December, 1859, some of these plans were returned to your Petitioner for explanations, which explanations were immediately given, to wit, on the 24th December, 1859.

18. That on the 26th March, 1860, four months subsequently, the Acting Surveyor General transmitted to your Petitioner the remainder of the plans forwarded by him on the 2nd December, 1859. That, in returning these plans, the Acting Surveyor General, in his letter of the 26th March, 1860, just alluded to, expressed his regret and surprise that your Petitioner should have been guilty of so much error and neglect, and so unmindful of the warning conveyed in his letter of the 16th December, 1859, which would justify him, the Acting Surveyor General, in immediately ceasing to employ your Petitioner as a licensed surveyor.

19. That your Petitioner, in reply, brought under the notice of the Acting Surveyor General the inconsistency of his conduct, and the inapposite and unjust character of his censure.

20. That the Acting Surveyor General in his letter of the 26th March, 1860 (above referred to), directed that your Petitioner should not commence any new surveys until those returned should have been completed and corrected, and until your Petitioner should have received authority to proceed with his surveys.

21. That your Petitioner having complied with the instructions received, returned the plans to the Acting Surveyor General on the 18th April, 1860. That your Petitioner, conceiving that the Acting Surveyor General would have seen and acknowledged the error he had lapsed into in his letter of the 26th March, 1860, believed that, on the receipt of your Petitioner's letter of the 18th April, 1860, he would have been permitted to proceed with his surveys.

22. That up to the 1st July, 1860, your Petitioner being still left without any instructions, and being without means for the support of his family, having been previously, for a period of ten months, as already stated, left to maintain, as he best could, an establishment of men and horses for the discharge of his duties, to sustain his own position as a gentleman, and to support a large family of eight persons. Your Petitioner addressed the Acting Surveyor General, forwarding accounts of surveys not previously rendered, and solicited payment of the same.

23. That your Petitioner, at the same time, pointed out the great injury he was suffering, by reason of the practical suspension that had been, as he maintains, most unjustly in operation against him for a period of three months; as also the utter impossibility of procuring private employment in such a remote part of the Colony.

34. That under date the 10th July, 1860, the Acting Surveyor General informed your Petitioner that he would not pay him any more money. The District Surveyor (Mr. Gordon) having reported that some of your Petitioner's surveys were so imperfectly marked, and, in many cases, so erroneous, as to render them unavailable. That in the very face of this plea of Mr. M'Lean's, and long before he, Mr. M'Lean, had received any such report, it was within the knowledge of your Petitioner, and which he can prove by the most undeniable evidence, that it had been the avowed pre-determination of the Acting Surveyor General, as made known to others, that he would not pay your Petitioner any money.

25. That your Petitioner, not having that confidence, professionally, in the gentleman making the Report, nor for the acting head of that Department, to whom that Report was made, did, on the 21st July, 1860, demand that your Petitioner should be furnished with a detailed statement of the errors complained of, in order that they might be explained; and, if really existing (of which your Petitioner entertains the strongest doubts), that they might be forthwith corrected, and which your Petitioner expressed his readiness to do instantly, and at his own cost.

26. That your Petitioner, not receiving an answer to this letter just alluded to, made repeated subsequent applications to the Acting Surveyor General, to be furnished with the information he considered he had a most unquestionable right to demand, and with which, in common justice, he ought to have been furnished. That such repeated applications were totally disregarded, and that they remain (most improperly so) unnoticed to the date hereof.

27. That under date the 1st October, 1860, your Petitioner was furnished with the copy of a letter stated to have been addressed to him on the 8th August, 1860; the original of which never was received by your Petitioner.

28. That by this letter, your Petitioner is not only denied the payment of any portion of the large amount which he claims as being due to him—to wit, the sum of five hundred and eighty pounds (£580), or thereabouts—but he was then informed that the practical suspension, under which he had been so unfairly placed, and under which he had been held for a period of seven months, and without any means of employment, was to be considered permanent, so far as the District in which your Petitioner had been so long employed was concerned.

29. That your Petitioner did, in the month of October, 1860, repair to Sydney, with a view of obtaining redress; that having failed to obtain such redress at the hands of the Acting Surveyor General, that your Petitioner immediately (to wit, on the 22nd October, 1860) addressed and transmitted through the prescribed channel, the Honorable the Secretary for Lands, a Memorial addressed to His Excellency the Governor General and the Executive Council, setting forth your Petitioner's grievances, and praying for a Court of Inquiry to investigate the same.

30. That no notice having been taken of such Memorial (not even the official etiquette in acknowledgment of its receipt) up to 29th November, 1860, your Petitioner again addressed the Honorable Secretary for Lands on the subject; to which second letter no reply or notice having been made, your Petitioner sought for and obtained an interview with the Honorable the Colonial Secretary, who then assured your Petitioner that he had never heard nor seen anything of your Petitioner's Memorial, and therefore recommended your Petitioner to apply to the Lands Department for information.

31. That on applying at the Office of the Secretary for Lands, the only information or satisfaction your Petitioner could obtain from the Under Secretary was to the effect that your Petitioner's Memorial addressed to the Governor General and the Executive Council had been handed over to the Acting Surveyor General (Mr. M'Lean), and that nothing more was known on the subject, which circumstance your Petitioner made known to the Colonial Secretary.

32. That your Petitioner humbly conceives, that when he made such grave statements as were set forth in his Memorial, that his case would have entitled him to some immediate consideration; and furthermore, that when such a large amount of money is concerned, and that when your Petitioner expressed his readiness to rectify at his own cost any errors that could be fairly shewn to exist in his surveys, that he should not have been denied the opportunity to do so, much less that he should be deprived by the mere fiat of such a functionary as the temporary acting head of the Survey Department, of the money which your Petitioner claims; your Petitioner from time to time having duly rendered his accounts, not one single item of any account so rendered having ever been objected to, nor one single error or irregularity pointed out.

33. That a period of three months having elapsed since the last application was made for redress, and that no notice having been taken of your Petitioner, or the Memorial he had addressed to the Governor General and the Executive Council, your Petitioner is in consequence driven (most reluctantly) to appeal to your Honorable House, for such inquiry and redress as your Petitioner's case may appear to demand.

That, therefore, under all the circumstances of the case, your Petitioner earnestly and respectfully prays for inquiry before your Honorable House, before which tribunal your Petitioner will be prepared to substantiate all that he has set forth in this Petition, and in his Memorial to the Governor General and the Executive Council; and which Memorial he prays may be called for, and the subject matter of the same inquired into.

And, as in duty bound, your Petitioner will ever pray.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

THE UNEMPLOYED.
(SYDNEY AND SUBURBS.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 6 May, 1861.

To the Honorable the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, in Parliament assembled.

The humble Petition of the undersigned Mechanics and Labourers of the City of Sydney and Suburbs,—

MOST RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH :—

That your Petitioners have been in a state of involuntary idleness for many months past, produced by causes over which your Petitioners had no control—the consequences have been and are, that many of your Petitioners are in a most deplorable state of destitution, which was forcibly shewn before a Committee of your Honorable House, and which has been gradually increasing; and as there is no reasonable hope of the building and shipping interests reviving, to which callings your Petitioners mostly belong, we respectfully request your Honorable House to urge upon the Government the absolute necessity of proceeding with the Public Works of the Colony now in abeyance, which, according to the statement of the Chief Secretary, amounts to some three hundred thousand pounds. Such an amount in active operation would almost entirely relieve the miseries your Petitioners are now so acutely suffering.

The cause of Public Works being in abeyance, according to the statement of the Chief Secretary, is that no eligible tenders can be obtained, which your Petitioners would therefore most respectfully submit may be obviated by setting to work those who are now starving, for your Petitioners contain within their ranks the requisite talent and practical skill for directing and executing any of the Public Works of the Colony.

Your Petitioners would further most respectfully submit that it seems a grievous wrong that a large number of men should be deprived of the opportunity of earning bread for themselves and families through the professional errors of architects and engineers, or the cupidity of contractors.

Your Petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that your Honorable House will take their case into your favourable consideration, and will take such steps in the premises as will grant the prayer of their Petition.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c., &c., &c.

Dated at Sydney the 15th day of April, 1861.

TAKEN BEFORE

THE SELECT COMMITTEE

ON

WILSON'S SETTLEMENT INVESTMENT BILL.

TUESDAY, 5 FEBRUARY, 1861.

Present:—

MR. DICKSON,
MR. LEARY,MR. PARKES,
MR. SHEPHERD.

HENRY PARKES, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

William George Pennington, Esquire, called in and examined:—

1. By the Chairman: You are Solicitor for this Bill? I am.
2. Have you got the deed referred to in the commencement of the preamble? I produce the deed. (Witness produced the same.)
3. Is that the deed which appoints Mr. John Campbell as trustee for Mrs. Mary Wilson? Yes.
4. By Mr. Shepherd: Does that deed contain any power to sell and invest the proceeds? Perhaps I had better explain the nature of the deed. Captain Wilson purchased, in the year 1852, the land in question, for the sum of £550, and in lieu of taking a conveyance to himself he took a conveyance to Mr. John Campbell, as a trustee for his wife and children. This deed merely contains authority for the trustee to pay the income of the land, arising from letting it, for the benefit of his wife during her life, and the children after her death, and upon the children attaining their majority the land belongs to them absolutely. The deed contains no power to the trustee to grant any lease, or to create any tenancy otherwise than of the narrowest description.
5. By the Chairman: The deed contains no power to sell? No.
6. Have you ever seen the buildings alluded to in the preamble? I have not, but I am prepared with two witnesses who have seen and inspected them.
7. Have you any knowledge as to whether this property could be sold advantageously? No personal knowledge.

W. G.
Pennington
Esq.
5 Feb., 1861.

Jules Joubert, Esquire, called in and examined:—

- J. Joubert,
Esq.
5 Feb., 1861.
8. By the Chairman: You are aware that this Committee has been appointed to consider a Bill to enable Mr. Campbell to sell certain land of which he is trustee? I am.
9. Do you know where the property is situated? Yes, at Balmain, at Waterview Bay.
10. You know the property? Perfectly well.
11. Will you be kind enough to state to the Committee in what condition it is? The house was one of the first that was built on the Balmain estate; it was built between thirty-eight and forty years ago, of weatherboards on a stone foundation; the shell of it is in passable condition, and the frame is good, but the roof and floors and all the internal parts are only fit to be pulled down.
12. The building is in a dilapidated state? Yes, fearfully so.
13. Is it untenantable? Nearly so; it was only by dint of some repairs a few days ago that the present tenant was able to keep it a little longer.
14. Would the property find purchasers in the market? As it is now it would only find purchasers for the land.
15. The land is a valuable site, I suppose? The land is a valuable site decidedly.
16. Do you know Mrs. Mary Wilson? I have known Mrs. Wilson for some years.
17. Are you aware whether she is anxious to have this property sold? I believe it has become a necessity at present.
18. By Mr. Shepherd: Do you imagine that the property will go on deteriorating or increasing in value in course of time? If no repairs are made to the house it will tumble down; of course the land cannot deteriorate.
19. Will the land increase in value if a sale does not take place immediately? The land itself will increase in value decidedly; any land in that neighbourhood is sure to increase in value.
20. Do you imagine it is a matter of necessity that Mrs. Wilson should have the property sold? If it is not sold now it will fetch less in a few months hence, because the house will be no more; whereas if it be repaired now it may be worth something.

Robert Pemberton Richardson, Esquire, called in and examined:—

- R. P.
Richardson,
Esq.
5 Feb., 1861.
21. By the Chairman: This Committee is appointed to consider a Bill to enable the trustee of some property at Balmain, held in trust for the benefit of Mrs. Mary Wilson and her children, to sell, and invest the proceeds—do you know the property? Yes.
22. Can you state in what condition it is at present? Knowing that my evidence would be required here, I went over, yesterday, to examine the property. I found the house dilapidated, and in a perfectly untenantable state.
23. How many buildings are there upon the property? One large cottage; it is a very old cottage—one of the first that was built at Balmain—called Waterview House; it wants re-roofing, and is otherwise in a very bad state of repair.
24. Is it a saleable property as to site—is it an eligible site? Yes; it is rather a pretty situation.
25. Do you think the property in its present state could be let? I do not think it could. The present tenant, Mr. Steynhouse, has threatened to go out of it, because they cannot repair it.
26. Do you know Mrs. Wilson? I only know her from her having, at one time, put the property in my hands for sale.
27. Should you consider it desirable for her to sell this property? I think so, if she is not in a position to repair it; that is, if the proceeds are properly invested for her.
28. What would it cost to put the premises in repair? I am scarcely in a position to give that information.
29. By Mr. Leary: What would it let for if in ordinary repair? From £110 to £120 a year.
30. What would it sell for? I should think about £800.
31. What requires to be done to the house besides roofing? It is generally in a decayed state; the roofing and the flagging require repair; and I think the outside timbers are decayed—in some parts they appear as if they were just kept together by the paint.
32. By Mr. Shepherd: Do you think this is a good time to sell? No, I do not; but it depends upon whether there is any probability of getting better prices for real property.
33. Do think it is likely to increase or deteriorate in value? I consider it is a falling market, and likely to fall lower.

Mrs. Mary Wilson called in and examined :—

34. By the Chairman : This Committee is appointed to consider a Bill which has been introduced into the Assembly for giving Mr. John Campbell, who is, I believe, a trustee on your behalf, power to sell certain property at Balmain? Yes, I am aware of that.
35. This is the trust deed, I believe (referring to deed produced by Mr Pennington)—Is that your signature? It is.
36. That deed gives the trustee no power to sell the property? I believe not.
37. The property is at present in a very dilapidated and untenable state? It is.
38. Do you think it desirable that it should be sold? Decidedly, or else I shall have no means of educating my children at all.
39. Are you desirous that the land should be sold and the proceeds invested for the benefit of yourself and family? Yes, I am.
40. You are convinced that it would be for your benefit that the property should be sold? Yes; quite so.
41. You desire, in fact, that Mr. Campbell, as your trustee, should have greater powers over the land, to sell it, or let it, or deal with it according to the best of his judgment? Yes; for my benefit and my children's benefit.
42. I will just read to you that part of the preamble which recites the facts in which you are more particularly concerned :—“ And whereas the said indenture contains no power for the trustee or trustees therein named or thereby to be appointed to sell the said land to grant leases thereof or to create any tenancy upon the security of which a tenant or occupier would be induced to expend money in repairs And whereas the buildings on the said land are in such a dilapidated condition that they will soon become wholly untenable and thereby cease to yield an income and there are no funds belonging to the said trust estate available for the repair of the said buildings And whereas it is considered that if authority can be obtained for the sale of such land the proceeds of the sale thereof may from time to time be advantageously invested in the purchase of other lands in New South Wales or upon real or Government security therein And whereas the said Mary Wilson is desirous that the said lands should be sold and the proceeds thereof invested as aforesaid”—You concur in all this? Quite.
43. Are there no funds belonging to the estate available for the repair of the buildings? No.

Mrs. Mary
Wilson.

John Piper
Mackenzie,
Esq.

21 Mar., 1861.

16. By Mr. Dick: What was the rental at the time of the settlement? At the time of the settlement I can hardly recollect; I think perhaps the two cottages together would produce £300.
17. What are the rentals now? I think £90 the two. The rent has been reduced in consequence of what I have stated.
18. Do I understand you to say that one is uninhabitable? They are both in a state that no one could go into them unless something were done to them; and one part has been pulled down by the occupant to repair another.
19. You say it would be an advantage to all parties if the powers sought by this Bill were granted—has Mrs. Mackenzie expressed a wish to that effect? She is pressing it strenuously.
20. Is she in the Colony? She resides at Melbourne.
21. You know that to be her wish from letters? Both from letters and from conversations I had with her when she was in Sydney twelve or fifteen months ago.
22. She told you that she desired it? Yes, I had a conversation with her at Mr. Norton's respecting it.
23. Have you made any efforts to lease it, or have you any power to lease it? I made many attempts, but found the time too short; I devised a plan under the Building Societies Act.
24. Do you know whether any instructions were given to insert such a power in the settlement? No; I believe it was the usual practice in Mr. Norton's office at that time to draw all deeds in that way where no instructions were given—where he was left to himself.
25. By Mr. M^r Carthy: Are you prepared to speak to the probable proceeds of the sale if this land were sold? I think it would realize upwards of £4,000; I value the front at £10 a foot, and there are 250 or 252 feet. The two cottages at the back would I think sell, one for £550, and the other for £450, and the new front leading from Denham-street would bring about £400. One of the cottages is entered from that street now. I may state that I have in writing Mr. George Cox's consent to this application.

Thomas W.
Bowden, Esq.

28 Mar., 1861.

25. By the Chairman: You have had considerable experience in valuing property in the neighbourhood of Sydney? Yes.
26. Do you know certain property situate in Crown-street belonging to Mr. W. H. Mackenzie? Yes.
27. What is the character of the property? It is partially improved—there are two old houses upon it; it is a large extent of land—perhaps an acre, or a little more—may be an acre and a half. At the eastern extreme of it are two houses in bad condition, tenanted at present.
28. Only a small portion of the land is occupied by these buildings? Yes.
29. They are old? Yes.
30. And dilapidated? They are in bad repair.
31. Yielding, I presume, a small rental? I think so.
32. What is the value of the land as a building site? The total value of it would depend upon the extent of frontage, which is not quite clear.
33. Is it valuable or not as a building site? Yes; the frontage now improved is valuable.
34. Then it would be advantageous probably for parties to have the power to sell this land? Yes, or to build upon it.
35. Do you think it would be for the interest of the parties who are the owners of the land to have power to grant building leases of the land, or to sell it? To sell it; I do not think it would be desirable to make it leasehold, it would not be so beneficial to the owners.
36. By Mr. Wilson: Are you aware what is the rental at the present time? Not of my own knowledge, I should presume it would not exceed £120 a year for the whole.
37. By the Chairman: What would it realize if it were sold? I think if subdivided and sold it would realize something like £3,000.
38. By Mr. Piddington: Does that valuation refer to the vacant land? To the whole.
39. Both land and houses? Yes, if properly subdivided. The old houses I should sell with a certain portion of land as they are.
40. By the Chairman: Some years since would not the property have brought much more? No doubt; another thousand at least.
41. Probably the parties have lost by having the property so tied up? No doubt, if they wished to sell three years ago, and could not from some impediment, they have sustained a loss. To make out the sum of £3,000, I consider that the two cottages, with the portion of land I should attach to them, would realize from £800 to £1,000, and the frontage sold, say at £8 a foot, would make up a total of about £3,000.
42. By Mr. Piddington: Do you know the extent of land not built upon—the frontage? 264 feet less seven inches.
43. Is there frontage to more than one street? No; there is an entrance which might be converted into a street; at present it is merely an approach from Denham-street.
44. What is the street to which there is a frontage? Crown-street. In fixing this value I speak of the probable result in the present market.
- (Mr. M^r Carthy produced letters from Mr. W. H. Mackenzie referring to the Bill, and expressing a desire that it should be passed.)

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE

THE SELECT COMMITTEE

ON

HOSKING'S TRUST BILL.

THURSDAY, 21 MARCH, 1861.

Present:—

Mr. DICK, | Mr. MATE,
Mr. WINDEYER.

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

W. G. M'Carthy, Esq., appeared as Solicitor on behalf of the Promoters of the Bill, and was examined:—

1. By the Chairman: You are Solicitor for this Bill? I am.
2. Do you produce the deed referred to in the preamble? I produce the original settlement of the 26th May, 1845, between Rosetta Terry of the first part, John Hosking, and Martha Foxlowe, his wife, of the second part, and Francis Clarke and Henry Terry Sheldon of the third part. (The witness produced the same.)
3. Messrs. Clarke and Sheldon are the trustees appointed by the deed? They are.
4. Does that deed give any power of sale or substitution or exchange? No, it does not—these powers are omitted in the deed altogether.
5. Will you briefly state what are the powers given by the deed and shew where it is deficient? The recitals are as stated in the Bill. (The witness recapitulated the recitals and provisions of the settlement.)
6. Does the deed contain any power of sale or of investing the proceeds of such sale? It does not, it contains a power of appointing new trustees which has been exercised by a subsequent deed recited in the Bill.
7. The object of the Bill is to give trustees this power? Yes.
8. Do all the parties who are interested under this deed approve of these powers being given? Yes, they are parties to the petition.
9. Is it considered that it would be desirable for the advantage of persons interested under this settlement? It is; and the evidence I shall bring forward will shew, what I think is almost self-evident, that unimproved land of this sort intermixed with other land which prevents access to Crown Lands, and water, and so on, is not a very available property for sale by itself. What we seek is, that, Mr. Hosking having other property purchased from the Crown which he is about to sell, we may be enabled to sell ours at the same time, as if his land should pass into other hands our chance would be gone entirely.
10. Do you produce the deed appointing new trustees? I do.

W. G.
M'Carthy,
Esq.
20 Mar., 1861.

THURSDAY, 28 MARCH, 1861.

Present:—

Mr. MATE, | Mr. PIDDINGTON,
Mr. WILSON.

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

W. G. M'Carthy, Esq., appeared as Solicitor for the promoters of the Bill.

John Hosking, Esq., called in and examined:—

11. By the Chairman: Do you know the property that is the subject of the Bill before the Committee? I do.
12. Is it your opinion that it would be for the benefit of the parties interested that additional powers should be given to the trustees of purchasing, exchanging, and selling? It is, inasmuch as a sale has actually been made, and it went off in consequence of the entail. If you will allow me, I will briefly state the circumstances connected with the settlement of this property. The greater part of this property, called Foxlowe, was mine in 1834. In or about 1838 or 1839 I gave a mortgage to Mrs. Terry, Mrs. Hosking's mother, for £4,000, upon it. Somewhere

J. Hosking,
Esq.
20 Mar., 1861.

J. Hosking, Esq.
23 Mar., 1861.

Somewhere about 1843 I required some money, and went to her for assistance, she then offered me this deed to do as I chose with it. Upon this occasion I did not make use of it; but in 1845 she obtained the equity of redemption, and redeemed, and then expressed a wish that it should be settled in any way that might be thought prudent for Mrs. Hosking. I accordingly instructed Mr. Want, and the deed was drawn. I took the draft and read the greater part of to Mrs. Terry. She said, "What is the use of reading it further to me, you can give instructions to Mr. Want about the deed." I mention this to shew that she had no particular object in the entail. Having given instructions generally to Mr. Want, I did not go on with the reading of the deed, and it did not attract my attention till a sale was made of that property, and of what I subsequently purchased. The deed lay in Mr. Want's hands from the time it was signed; and, not contemplating that it had been entailed, in 1859 I made a sale of my portion of the property to Mr. Routledge, and of Mrs. Hosking's, at one uniform price. It will be seen by reference to the plan, that these properties should be sold together. If my portion of the estate were sold by itself, it would materially injure Foxlowe proper; if that were sold alone it would not injure mine to the same extent.

13. By Mr. Wilson: I think Mr. Routledge left the Colony and went to England, thinking he was the purchaser? Yes; in fact we did not know of the entail, and Mr. Want did not seem to know of it until the deed was referred to, and we were then brought up all standing, and could not carry out the sale. This shews the necessity for this application. The surveyor will be able to explain this even better than I can. (The witness referred to a plan, and pointed out the relative position of the two properties.) 1,073 acres is Mrs. Hosking's property, and 2,701 is mine; and Mr. Routledge would not take one portion without the other.

14. Then I understand you, in reference to this, that it was left to you to have this trust deed drawn up as you liked, and by a mere oversight the property was entailed? Yes, by an oversight.

15. You are of opinion that Mrs. Terry had no intention to tie up the property? No; she would have given it to myself if I had liked; but I said as Mrs. Hosking had other trust property, it might be as well to have this also in trust.

16. Does Mrs. Hosking consent to this application? She signs the petition applying for this Bill, and must become a party in that way. I am quite certain, on the one hand, that I could make at least 40s. an acre of my portion, if it were sold by itself; and I do not think the other, if sold by itself, would make more than the upset price. Mr. Routledge was to have given 28s. an acre. If this amount could be obtained, it would realize a sum of money the interest of which would be more than double—three times—as much as the land would ever rent for, and thereby, of course, the parties interested—the children whose interest of course would be protected—would be benefited. If Mrs. Hosking were to die to-morrow, the children would be benefited by getting a large return of interest for their investment; we propose to have ample security for them.

17. Is it the fact that the profitable return from these lands depends upon personal management and supervision? Yes.

18. You are about to relinquish the management? Yes; I wish to give it up; the interests of all parties concerned are involved.

19. You have two children, I believe? Yes, daughters.

20. Under the age of 21? Yes.

21. Is Mr. Sheldon—one of the trustees—dead? He is, and Mr. Mitchell is appointed, as the deed provides, in the place of Mr. Sheldon.

22. In the first part of your evidence you referred to a deed—do you mean the settlement mentioned in the Bill? I do.

23. And Mrs. Terry is the settlor in that deed—the conveying party? She is.

24. These lands you have spoken of have been managed as one property? As one property.

25. By Mr. Wilson: And from their peculiar situation it is almost impossible to divide them—they are so interwoven with each other? Yes, because I have purchased entirely with reference to the protection of the run; and if the Committee could see the lay of the country, they would at once find that I had accomplished that. If I were to sell mine without the original property, the latter would be considerably damaged.

Francis Mitchell, Esq., called in and examined:—

F. Mitchell, Esq.
23 Mar., 1861.

26. By the Chairman: You are one of the trustees for Mrs. Martha Foxlowe Hosking, under a settlement made by Mrs. Rosetta Terry? Yes.

27. Mr. Francis Clarke is the other trustee? Yes.

28. Do you know the object of the Bill proposed to be introduced to the Legislature for giving additional powers to the trustees? Yes. The land would be unproductive in itself, and it would be very much to the advantage of the estate if it were sold to be with other land of Mr. Hosking's.

29. You approve of the proposed alteration? Yes.

30. You think it would be for the advantage of the children? Yes.

31. You know Mrs. Hosking? Yes, quite well.

32. Do you know whether she approves of having this change made? She has petitioned for it, and I know she is very anxious for it.

33. Do you know whether she is personally desirous of it? Yes.

34. Is she not well at present? No, she is not.

(Mr. Windcyer vacated the Chair pro temp., and Mr. Wilson having taken the Chair,—)

J.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON HOSKING'S TRUST BILL.

J. B. WILSON, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

Thomas Weaver, Esq., called in and examined:—

35. By the Chairman: You are a licensed surveyor? Yes.
 36. Have you had considerable experience in valuing and surveying land? I have been at it many years. I have had great experience both at home and out here.
 37. How many years experience have you had in this Colony? Eight.
 38. Do you know the Foxlowe Estate? I know it perfectly well.
 39. Do you know the adjoining property purchased by Mr. Hosking? Yes, it was measured by myself for sale.
 40. In asking you the question, do you know the Foxlowe Estate, I am alluding more particularly to the original estate—the settled property? I know it perfectly well.
 41. And you also know the adjoining properties purchased by Mr. Hosking? I know them all. I measured them for the Government at the time of sale.
 42. Do you think it would be advisable to sell, or could a profitable sale be effected of, the Foxlowe Estate without the other? The property would not realize nearly so much separate as it would as a whole.
 43. By Mr. Mate: Why? The best part of the land is what is called Black Heath, clear open land, and there is no water to be had without going on to the other—that is the best land on the property. That portion of the trust property is hemmed in on both sides by the purchased property. (The witness referred to a plan.)
 44. By the Chairman: Is there not a considerable part of the run that would be naturally attached to the settled portion? It is a sheep station; the purchased portion is in the centre of the run, and without that the other would be of little value.

T. Weaver,
Esq.
28 Mar., 1861.

W. C. WINDEYER, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

45. By the Chairman: In fact the purchased portion commands the chief water? It does; there is a sufficient supply of water through the leased land, but here is the only good open land for folding the sheep.
 46. By Mr. Wilson: The purchased portion commands the run? Yes; I had the selection of it, and of course I took the best portion of it to secure the run; the other is valueless without it. In taking that spot I consider that I took the cream out of the whole district.
 47. By the Chairman: What would be the value of the settled portion if it were sold separately? If sold separately 25s. per acre, amounting to £13,416 5s.
 48. If sold in conjunction with the purchased portion? £1,609 more, or £15,026 in the whole.
 49. Do you hand in a statement of the value of this property? Yes. (The witness handed in the same. Vide Appendix A.)

SEAMEN.

 PROGRESS REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE of the Legislative Assembly, appointed on the 29th January last, "to inquire into and report upon the working of the various Acts which have special reference to the shipping, discharging, and lodging of Seamen in the Colony of New South Wales," "with power to send for persons and papers;" and, on the 12th February, instructed "to consider and report upon the general condition and treatment of Seamen in the Colony of New South Wales," have agreed to the following Progress Report:—

Your Committee have given the inquiry intrusted to them by your Honorable House their earnest attention and consideration, and have examined seventeen witnesses, representing each grade in the calling of Seamen, including Shipowners and others, whose views for the most part, are in accordance with those of the Seamen, as will be seen by the evidence hereto appended.

Your Committee would direct the attention of your Honorable House to the main features of what appear to be the evils emanating from the Laws relating to Seamen.

The working of the Shipping Office is found to be vexatious, and, in many instances, oppressive to Seamen, whilst to owners it is doubly so, through the detentions to vessels caused by the forms imposed, and at present necessary to be complied with. Favourable opportunities of sailing are lost, and an amount of expenditure that otherwise would have no existence is entailed on the owner, who receives nothing whatever in return. The weight of evidence appears to favour the discontinuance of that establishment, at least, as far as Colonial Shipping is concerned.

Your Committee would call attention to that portion of the Act, 17 Vic., No. 36, which relates to Seamen's Lodging-houses. Whilst your Committee admit the desirability of providing, if possible, well regulated lodging-houses, for all classes of the community who may choose to resort to them, they cannot but think, the present system of compelling Seamen, as a class, to live in lodging-houses—is a restriction calculated to cause the discontent, apparently, now existing amongst Seamen with reference to this matter.

It

It also seems, that ships' articles are generally unequal in their action, binding the employed only, as to the time of leaving; whilst the employers are free, or liable only to a fine for any violation of contract,—for similar breaches of agreement, the employed being subject to imprisonment, as for criminal offences.

As the late period of the Session prevents any further inquiry, and as applications to be examined have been made to your Committee, on what are stated to be matters of importance, your Committee have determined to report progress to your Honorable House,—hoping to be enabled, at an early date, to resume an inquiry, the necessity of which is clearly apparent from the evidence.

D. C. DALGLEISH,
Chairman.

Committee met pursuant to summons.

The Chairman produced a draft Progress Report, as desired by Committee on the 3rd instant.

Introductory paragraphs of proposed Report read, verbally amended, and agreed to.

Paragraph 2 read, viz. :—

“ Your Committee would call attention to that portion of the Act, 17 Vic., No. 36, which relates to seamen's lodging-houses. It is found to be very objectionable, restraining the proper liberty of the subject in reference to seamen, by preventing them from choosing their abode in any other place than in a house specially licensed for that purpose, a provision which does not apply to any other class.

“ Whilst your Committee admit the desirability of providing, if possible, well regulated lodging-houses for all classes of the community, where ventilation and cleanliness would be maintained under proper inspection, they would deprecate any attempt to make residence compulsory by fine or otherwise.”

Amendment proposed (Mr. Windeyer) to omit “ It is found,” (line 2) &c., to the end, and insert, as follows :—

“ Whilst your Committee admit the desirability of providing, if possible, well regulated lodging-houses, for all classes of the community who may choose to resort to them, they cannot but think, the present system of compelling seamen, as a class, to live in lodging-houses, is a restriction calculated to cause the discontent, apparently now existing amongst seamen, with reference to this matter.”

Committee deliberated.

Question,—That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the Report,—negated.

Question put,—That the words proposed to be inserted, be so inserted.

Amendment (further) proposed (Mr. Love) to substitute the following :—

“ Whilst your Committee think it desirable that lodging-houses, under proper inspection, should still continue to be licensed for the comfort and accommodation of seamen, your Committee would recommend that the same liberty be granted to them as all other classes enjoy, in the choice of their residence, and that they should not be compelled to resort to licensed lodging-houses, should they prefer lodging elsewhere.”

Committee deliberated.

Question put,—That the words first proposed stand part of the Question.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE THE

SELECT COMMITTEE

ON

SEAMEN.

TUESDAY, 5 FEBRUARY, 1861.

Present:—

|------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| Mr. ALLEN, Mr. DALGLEISH, | Mr. LOVE, CAPTAIN MORIARTY. |
|------------------------------|--------------------------------|

DANIEL C. DALGLEISH, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Samuel North, Esq., called in and examined:—

1. By the Chairman: We are met to inquire into the working of the various Acts which relate to the shipping, discharging, and general management of seamen in the port of Sydney, and for that purpose desire to obtain information from you? I shall be happy to furnish you with any information in my power.
2. You are Shipping Master of the port of Sydney? I am at present.
3. How long have you held that situation? Two years.
4. I presume you are thoroughly conversant with the Merchant Seamen's Act? Yes.
5. You have to adjudicate under that Act? I ship and discharge seamen under that Act.
6. Are you well informed yourself with regard to the duties of seamen? I think I know pretty well what their duties are, having had seven years' experience as Water Police Magistrate.
7. Are you acquainted with the practical duties of seamen on board their vessels? As Shipping Master I have nothing to do with that.
8. You are not acquainted then with the practice obtaining as to the hours of labour on board ship? I am, so far as these matters come under my notice, acting judicially as Water Police Magistrate.
9. Have you a deputy? I have in the Shipping Master's department.
10. What part of the duty devolves upon him? The shipping and discharging of seamen. It is impossible that, with my duties as Water Police Magistrate, both executive and judicial, I could be always in the Shipping Office; and as it is necessary that men should be shipped in the presence of the Shipping Master or his deputy, a deputy was appointed to act when I could not be present.
11. Have you any other assistants in the shipping department? I have.
12. What are their duties? One is the accountant and the other the clerk.
13. Then there are three in the department altogether? There are three, and two runners.
14. If the captain of a vessel brings any case before you, or requires a warrant for any breach of discipline, does the practice obtain in your Court of advising the party so complaining to be strict in his supervision over his crew—to carry out in its strictness the letter of the law? He comes before me as Water Police Magistrate, not as Shipping Master.
15. As Shipping Master do you feel yourself bound to protect the interests of the seamen equally with those of the captain or owner? Most assuredly.
16. Do you consider that the laws, as they at present exist, tend to protect seamen in these Colonies, or owners? I think the law is stringent, and gives great power of punishment, but it was passed at a time when it was absolutely necessary it should be strict—the time of the gold diggings.

Esq.

17. You consider that that necessity has now passed away? I would not say that altogether.

18. But you admit that this law was passed when a far greater necessity for strictness existed? At that time it was impossible for a captain to keep his crew when a vessel entered port.

19. Consequently extreme measures were adopted? I presume so; it was before I was Water Police Magistrate.

20. You must admit that the necessity for these strict laws does not now exist? I would not say that; but I would say that the law is not carried out with the strictness it was in these times, because it is discretionary with the Magistrate to commit to hard labour for twelve weeks, or twelve hours, or one hour.

21. But if you sentenced a person for more than one month he would have the power to appeal to the ordinary Courts of Justice? I am not aware of that.

22. I believe you will find in the Imperial Act that any person sentenced for more than a month has the power, upon giving notice, of appealing to the Quarter Sessions? I am not aware—I never knew an instance of the kind. The Imperial Act has, I think, 560 clauses, but you will remember that there is a Colonial Seamen's Act.

23. The Imperial Act also obtains here? With British vessels, but not with Colonial; the latter come under the Colonial Act.

24. Does it not imply that the necessity for the strictness of this enactment does not now exist, when, in your discretion, you do not carry out the penalties which it is competent to you to inflict? The Magistrates do sometimes carry them out in bad cases, and I think it is a wise discretion to allow the Magistrates.

25. In extreme cases—but should not the law be made for the rule and not for the exception? I think the Magistrate ought to have the discretion given by the present Act, and I hope that discretion will always be exercised properly.

26. Can you tell me whether, if any person be suspected by a policeman of being a runaway seaman, the policeman can apprehend him without any warrant? It has been constantly done.

27. Is it your opinion that this is in accordance with the rights of British subjects? I think a person who was not a deserter would have a cause of action, but that is a question for a lawyer.

28. You say he would have ground of action? I may be wrong in that; I am not a lawyer.

29. It is merely your own opinion—but what would be the value of this action against a water policeman—what compensation could he get? When you say water policeman I must tell you that the greater number of those who are apprehended are apprehended, not by the water, but by the city police.

30. I must amend my question, and I would ask what compensation would he be likely to get from a city policeman? I have no hesitation in saying he would not get much from a constable.

31. So that an action would only result in a farther expenditure of money? Yes.

32. Have any particular cases of this description come to your knowledge which have been attended with great hardships? I cannot recollect any particular instances just now, but there have been some I believe.

33. Will you be kind enough to inquire in your office whether there have been such cases, and let the Committee know the result? I will endeavor to do so, but it is a difficult matter to find cases of that description now; it would be necessary to search over the records of years.

34. I do not allude to the records of years, I confine myself to the time during which you have held this office of Shipping Master? The questions put to me refer more to my duties as Water Police Magistrate than as Shipping Master.

35. The duties of Shipping Master are supposed to be identical with those of one placed for the protection of seamen—and I ground my question upon the protection the seamen ought to be warranted in expecting from the Water Police Magistrate? If I found any case of oppression, as Shipping Master I would bring it into the other Court, under the notice of the Water Police Magistrate. As it is, the Deputy Shipping Master constantly attends before me to prosecute men whose ships have left the port, and whose captains have left authority with him.

36. Do many complaints of the working of the shipping laws reach you from owners and seamen? No.

37. By Captain Moriarty: I think probably the idea of protection which, as Shipping Master, you would wish to afford to seamen, would be confined to the fact that in any one of the acts connected with their shipping, you would see absolute justice done to them? Yes; and I would see that the seaman's accounts were correct. If a man is not satisfied with his accounts, it is my duty, as Shipping Master, if the captain will not agree to pay, to advise the man to get a summons against him.

38. That would be what you would consider one of these simple acts of justice to be performed by you, as Shipping Master, as between the man and the master of the vessel? Yes; that would be one of my duties.

39. By the Chairman: In your capacity of Shipping Master, do any cases of ships' or steamers' articles being thrown up before the completion of the time come under your notice; and if so, do you know the cause of their abandonment? I know that old articles are cancelled.

40. I refer to cases where old articles are cancelled, and new ones are immediately entered into? I am not aware of such cases except where there is some change in the voyage that would render the old articles incomplete, or where the whole of the crew has been discharged.

41. Have any cases come under your notice where, after the crew of a steamboat or other vessel has, under the Colonial Act, engaged a crew for a period of three months, during that period wages in the port have fallen, and in order that the owner or employer might get the advantage of the reduction in the price of labor, he has, without any fault on the part of the men, exercised the power universally held by the shipowner, by reason of the one-sided manner in which the shipping articles are drawn up, discharged his men at the end of the voyage, and before the expiration of the term for which they were bound? I am not aware that complaints of that kind have been made.
42. Have such cases come under your notice in any way? I cannot say that they have.
43. As Shipping Master you have not observed such cases? If a man is discharged improperly before the term of his articles he is entitled to a month's wages.
44. By Mr. Love: In addition to what he has received? Yes.
45. By the Chairman: Do you recognize this as a correct copy of the usual articles signed by seamen in this port. (Handing witness a copy of ship's articles.) If so, you will observe that there the owner considers himself justified in discharging his seamen at any time within three months without compensation? That is a correct copy of ship's articles—all articles made here bear the signature of the Deputy Shipping Master, Captain Shorter.
46. You perceive that the men in those articles agree "for any period not exceeding six calendar months"—are you aware that in this case the owner considered himself justified in holding the parties signing for the full period of six months? He can do so no doubt.
47. But that he claims a right to discharge any, or all of the crew at any time during the six months, at his own pleasure? There is no condition of the kind in the articles.
48. Have not cases come under your notice where you have held that the owner was justified in so discharging? I am not aware of any.
49. Do you consider that a seaman who had signed these articles would be justified in leaving prior to the end of the six months? I do not think he would.
50. And you do not consider that the owner would be justified in discharging one of these men before that time? I think he would be liable to the payment of a month's wages, provided the man sued him for it.
51. You are not aware then that Steam Navigation and other Companies are in the habit of discharging their hands without paying them a month's wages, and without giving them a month's notice? No, I am not.
52. No such cases have come under your notice? No, but I would beg to observe that in matters of that kind the Deputy Shipping Master, who does the work, would be better able to give you information than I, because my employment is on the other side of the building, and I only go to the Shipping Office if a particular case requires my attention.
53. Do many cases of wilful disobedience of orders come before you, either as Shipping Master or as Water Police Magistrate? In my capacity as Water Police Magistrate they do frequently.
54. Have you observed instances of hardship to seamen in such cases? Sometimes there is hardship, and the cases are disposed of on that ground if the masters are unreasonable in their demands.
55. Will you be kind enough to look at that case (referring the witness to the proceedings at the Water Police Office, reported in the Sydney Morning Herald of Friday, December 9th, 1858)—do you recognize that case? I do.
56. Do you recognize the penalty inflicted? I do.
57. Was that a case of hardship? These men were bound by their articles to discharge the vessel at whatever time it came in.
58. Is that stated in the articles? It is—at least it was proved in evidence, and I presume was on their articles. I remember this from having read the depositions at the Water Police Office very recently.
59. Will you have the kindness to forward the depositions taken in that case? I will. (Vide Appendix A.)
60. Having read the depositions you consider there was no hardship in that case? I think not; the men were sentenced to six hours' imprisonment, which shews the feeling of the Magistrates was in their favor.
61. But do you not know that they were in the lock-up all night? I do not know that.
62. Or if they were not, that they were bailed out? They were found guilty of disobedience of orders, but under the circumstances they were sentenced to only six hours' imprisonment, and they recovered their wages from the master; he wanted their wages to be forfeited, because they were not in proper time to go with him, but the Bench would not hear of that.
63. Do you know whether the practice of requiring seamen to discharge cargo upon the arrival of a vessel at a port, at whatever hour of the night she may arrive, obtains among any other owners than the owners of the Kiama? No.
64. Do you think after these men had been at sea all night, and had arrived at a port, they should be called upon to discharge cargo, and then immediately to proceed to sea again—do you not think it too much to impose upon humanity? I think it is not what I should have done had I been owner; I would not have exacted the "pound of flesh."
65. By Captain Moriarty: This was within the bond entered into by all the parties? I think so; because the crew are bound by the articles to do whatever the master lawfully orders, and therefore, at whatever hour a vessel arrives in port, if he orders the men to discharge cargo they are bound to do so, or are guilty of disobedience of orders if they do not. They were punished for a breach of the law, but the penalty was very light indeed. It is an assault for you to raise your hand to another gentleman, even though you are not within a foot or two of him, and if you were charged with it, it must be treated as an assault, and punished; but in such a case the punishment would be very light indeed.

S. North,
Esq.

5 Feb., 1861.

66. By the Chairman: Does it obtain under the Colonial Act that a less price is charged to the owner for shipping a crew than is proportionally paid by a single individual? I can shew the Committee the scale of fees. (Vide Appendices B. and C.)

67. There is a scale of fees in the Imperial Act—is that scale similar? The Imperial Act authorizes the seaman to be charged 1s. when he ships, and 1s. when he is discharged; but here the captain pays 2s. each for shipping, and the seaman pays 2s. when he is discharged; so that the expense to the seaman is exactly the same as in England.

68. By Captain Moriarty: Only collected in a different way? Yes.

69. By the Chairman: Except that coasters in England do not sign articles at the Shipping Office; they are charged nothing, either for shipping or discharging? I believe not.

70. According to this scale, as the riches of the party increase the tax diminishes? The amount proportionally decreases as the tonnage increases.

71. Have any complaints reached you as Shipping Master, with regard to the changing of a crew from one ship to another? There were complaints of that nature, but that has been settled by Act of Parliament.

72. In what way has that been settled? A new Act has been passed to enable the owners to compel crews to serve in any vessel belonging to the owner to whom they have signed articles (23 Victoria, No. 11). That was passed at the solicitation of owners of steamers.

73. Have you had any complaints from seamen with regard to this Act? I have not.

74. By Captain Moriarty: I understood you to say that the articles were mutual only so far as to entitle the seaman to one month's pay, in the event of his owner discharging him prior to the expiration of his term? Yes.

75. By what clause of the Act has the master the right to discharge a seaman by payment of one month's wages, although the articles may have been signed for six months? You will find the clause in the Imperial Act, which gives power to the Magistrate to impose a penalty in cases of breach of agreement of not more than one month's wages.

76. By the Chairman: I think you did not understand my former question, which was this—Whether you would consider it just, that in consequence of the fall of wages subsequently to the signing of articles, and for no fault on the part of the men, the master should cancel the first articles before their expiration, and re-engage the men at a lower rate? He could not substitute new articles without the men were willing.

77. Might they not be compelled by circumstances? I am not aware of any complaint of that nature having come before me.

78. You are not aware that no later than last week the articles of the "Collaroy" steamer were broken and new engagements entered into for the purpose of reducing wages? I am not.

79. By Mr. Allen: Did I understand you to say that if this agreement were broken before the six months expired that the men would be entitled to a month's pay? Yes.

80. The ship's articles before me say—"The M'Leay River or any port or ports on the coast, backwards and forwards, forwards and backwards, for any period not exceeding six calendar months." Suppose this vessel made two trips in four months, and the owners then required to discharge the men, could they not do so? On payment of a month's wages. The Police Magistrate could not give more, but the men might sue in the District Court for damages.

81. By Captain Moriarty: I wish to elicit your view of the matter, if you will be kind enough to favor me with it—I understand you to say that these articles are binding on the crew for six months, and that they are only operative upon the owner to the extent of one month's wages? I think that is all the men can sue for in the Police Court.

82. So that if wages rise the men already shipped can derive no benefit? Suppose a man to have shipped for three months at £3 a month, and at the end of the first month, wages rise to £6 a month, the captain can keep him; but, on the other hand, if he ships at £6 a month, and wages fall to £3, the captain can discharge him, so that in fact there is no mutuality whatever, and the articles, so far as justice to the seamen is concerned, are a farce.

83. By Mr. Love: (Referring to the ship's articles produced.) Is this the usual form of drawing up ship's articles? Sometimes there is an addition made.

84. I speak with reference to the words "not exceeding six months?" If it is intended that they are to be discharged at any other port it is stated.

85. By Mr. Allen: That is not the point—suppose the ship comes here four months after the articles are signed, and the voyage is terminated, is the captain at liberty to discharge the men without giving them a month's wages? He ought to give a month's wages, and the men can sue him for it if he did not.

86. By Mr. Love: Would it not be better, in drawing out documents of this kind in future, to bind both parties for an equal length of time? I do not see that, for the seaman knows if he is discharged before his time, and has his remedy.

87. By the Chairman: Has it ever come to your knowledge that a seaman has obtained this month's wages? I cannot recollect a particular instance, but I have no doubt there have been cases.

88. Will you have the goodness to send to the Committee such evidence on this point as you can lay your hand upon? I will endeavour to do so. (Vide Appendix—Letter, par. 2 and 3.)

89. Do you consider this a breach of the shipping regulations (referring to the ship's articles, and pointing out the words "sufficient without waste," under the head of "Scale of Provisions")? It is the custom on board Colonial vessels, and if the captain does not satisfy his men he has to suffer for it.

90. Are you aware that great dissatisfaction exists in many employments and many vessels from the want of a regular scale of provisions? No, I am not, and I do not think it does, for this reason, that that part of the article is always particularly explained to the men; if any dissatisfaction were expressed the regular quantity of bread, beef, pork, &c., would be put in. I believe the men in Colonial vessels generally prefer to have those words in the articles, and they have as much as they can eat.

91. Does it not prevent any inquiries being made into the stores of a vessel proceeding to sea;—does it not tend to defeat any such inquiry? I do not know anything about inquiries into such matters, but I believe such inquiries are never made of Colonial vessels.

92. Vessels going to the cedar rivers are often blocked in for a long time and the crews are almost starved—is not that so? We have no means of remedying that.

93. If an examination were made of these vessels prior to their proceeding to sea, as to the supply of stores on board, would not that lessen this evil? No doubt it would if power were given to make such an examination.

94. If this (the ship's articles) were to leave your office without such a condition the power would not exist? If they had a short allowance on board they could not give the men sufficient.

95. By Captain Moriarty: I understand you to say that these articles are binding on one party and not on another? They are binding on both; they are binding on one to give six months' service if employed so long, and if not the other party has to pay a month's wages.

96. That is the law? And the practice.

97. The men are bound absolutely for six months—the master is not? Yes.

98. Are you not of opinion that all articles should be equally binding on all the parties who sign them? Yes.

99. By Mr. Allen: Have you any information to tender to the Committee respecting the seamen's lodgings? I have a return of all the lodging-houses, shewing their number from the date of their first establishment in 1854. (Vide Appendices D, E.)

100. Do you find the establishment of seamen's lodging-houses, apart from common lodging-houses, works well—do you think it tends to improve the comfort and morality of seamen? I think it does; it prevents their being plundered in common dens and public-houses. We hope to have a Sailor's Home before long. When the new Governor arrives we hope to have the foundation stone laid.

101. In lodging-houses for sailors the charges are regulated by law, I suppose? No.

102. There is no law as to the amount the owners of these houses may charge? No; the number of licenses issued last year was 28, the smallest number ever issued.

103. Have they the opportunity of charging any price they like? Yes.

104. And the sailor must go to them and nowhere else? Yes, but there is great competition among lodging-house keepers, and some receive sailors at very low rates.

105. By the Chairman: Do you conceive that this system tends to increase the morality or improve the social position of the seaman, or that it is a mere adjunct to the police department to enable the police more readily to lay their hands on seamen? I think the sailors are more comfortable in these houses.

106. Will you tell the Committee why? Because these houses are inspected by the police, and I never grant a license until I see that the house is fit for the purpose; that there is proper accommodation; that the house is kept in a clean and proper state. I always visit these houses in the months of December or January, before the licenses are issued.

107. At stated periods? At uncertain times. I visit them before issuing the licenses, but my Inspector visits them monthly.

108. Generally at stated periods? Not exactly at a stated period.

109. Within three or four days of licensing? When I visit them I go as late in December as I can.

110. So that the lodging-houses can be prepared in every way for your inspection? But my Inspector visits them monthly; he has to make a report of the state of the houses during the year.

111. His visits insure the cleansing of these houses once a month? I suppose they are cleansed more frequently, for he does not go at any stated period, either at the first or at the last of the month, but when he feels inclined, or when I order him.

112. Have you any knowledge of the system of licensing lodging-houses in Great Britain? I have been so long in this Colony that I have no knowledge of these matters.

113. By Mr. Allen: I understood you to say that the competition between the lodging-houses was a sufficient guarantee that the seamen's wants and comforts were provided for? I would not say that it was sufficient protection, but that it tends greatly to his comfort. It is far to be preferred to the old system, when the sailor went to disorderly houses and fell into the hands of prostitutes.

114. By Captain Moriarty: Are you of opinion that all the keepers of lodging-houses are persons of good character? They are so certified to me; they have to obtain the certificate of five persons.

115. Has it come to your knowledge that some certificates have been given to disreputable persons? When it has come to my knowledge I have refused to give the parties a license again.

116. Have there been such cases? There have.

117. Have there been many? No.

118. By the Chairman: Do you inquire into the respectability of the persons recommending? I see who they are, they are residents in the neighbourhood, and their occupations are put down.

119. By Mr. Love: Are there any lodging-houses for seamen licensed on the place called "The Rocks?" Yes, the greatest number of these lodging-houses.

120. Formerly Gallows Hill? I do not know Gallows Hill; but along Gloucester, Cumberland, and Harrington streets, these, with Lower George-street, are the principal streets where these lodging-houses are found.

121. By Captain Moriarty: You have stated that the number of persons engaged in keeping lodging-houses for seamen affords a guarantee that their comfort shall be attended to; do you you not think if every person keeping a boarding-house might accommodate them their comfort would be still further provided for? If there were a General Lodging-house Act, there would be no occasion for a separate Seamen's Lodging-house Act; but so long as we are without such an Act, I think the present Act is necessary. Before the passing of this Act seamen were crowded together in a most uncomfortable and unhealthy manner. Now every house is licensed for a particular number. If a house has accommodation but for ten, it is licensed for ten only; if for twenty, it is licensed for twenty.

Esq.

122. Is there any valid reason why a seaman should not go and live where he pleases? I can see no reason except to promote his own comfort.

123. Would you not allow every man to judge for himself as to what would contribute to his comfort—?

124. By the Chairman: I believe what Captain Moriarty wishes to express is, whether there is any reason why a seaman shall not lodge where he thinks proper, irrespective of this license? The law is against it, that is all I know. Even now the Attorney General is of opinion that it is unlawful for a publican to take in a seaman* without he takes out a license for that purpose.

125. By Captain Moriarty: The propriety of the Act is what we are considering—its advisability or necessity? I think it is a wise Act. There are no instances of hardship arising. No person has ever been prosecuted for taking in a single seaman, a friend, or a relative. The Act is not carried out in a severe manner.

126. By the Chairman: "A friend" is a very wide term, and if a person were never prosecuted for lodging a friend, I imagine that it might always be pleaded by a person who had a seaman in his house that he was a friend? I would not conceive that in such a case the house could be called a "common" lodging-house. If you or I took in a cousin, a nephew, or son, to lodge with us, it is not likely we would be prosecuted for it.

127. But at the same time, according to your own shewing, it is the Attorney General's opinion that should a publican allow a seaman to board and lodge in his house he would be liable to conviction under the Act, as keeping a common lodging-house? The giving accommodation to a solitary seaman would not constitute the house a common lodging-house.

128. The Act does not make such a distinction, this is a distinction made in your discretion? I make a distinction between a common lodging-house for seamen, and a house which gives accommodation to one seaman.

129. Do you consider the protection afforded by that law is equal to the inconvenience caused by it? Do you mean inconvenience to the seamen?

130. Yes? I think seamen are pleased with it, and would rather have it.

131. With regard to the shipping charges, have you any schedule that would show the profit, if any, resulting to the Government from this direct tax upon the labor of seamen? Yes.

132. Shewing the amount of profit over the working expenses? Yes.

133. Will you be kind enough to append that? Yes. (Vide Appendices E and G.)

134. Have any cases come under your notice where Magistrates have adjudicated in their own causes? I am not aware of any; if such cases had come to my knowledge, I should have objected to the parties sitting.

135. Can you remember whether, in the case of the "Kiama," to which I have referred, the Magistrates sitting with you on the Bench were unanimous in their decision? I believe so. Captain McLean and Mr. Graham, I think, were the Magistrates, and were unanimous. I cannot charge my memory with that. I may be wrong.

136. With respect to the discharge of cargo at any hour of the night you think he is bound by the Act to do so, quite irrespective of any fatigue he may feel? I think if it is in his agreement; particularly when a great loss might arise to the owner if it were not done.

137. Without any regard to his fatigue, he must work as though he were a cast-iron man or machine? I have nothing to do with the making of the laws; I simply administer them.

138. I think I understood you to say that this short Act meets your approbation in all respects? I do not say that. There was an amendment made at the very last moment, at my particular wish, in favor of the man—"Provided also that any seaman who has a claim for wages may sue either the owner or master of the vessel in which he has last sailed notwithstanding that the said master has not signed the agreement." That was put in at my suggestion by Mr. Wise, who was then Attorney General. (Vide Appendix—Letter, par. 4.)

APPENDIX.

Water Police Office,
Sydney, 9 February, 1861.

Sir,

As requested in your letter of the 7th instant, I have the honor to return herewith the copy of my evidence before the Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly on the Merchant Seamen's Acts.

2. I regret to find that, in the part of the evidence touching the engagements of seamen, as set forth in a copy of ship's articles placed in my hands by the Chairman, I have committed an unintentional error in stating that under that agreement a seaman could recover a month's wages if discharged before the end of the six months for which he had engaged. On referring to the Imperial Act, the Colonial Seamen's Act, and the Water Police Act, 17th Vict., No. 36, section 10, I find that the clause only authorizes compensation when the seaman is discharged before the commencement of the voyage, or before a month's wages is earned.

3. A crew engaged for a voyage "from the port of Sydney to any port or ports on the coast backwards and forwards and forwards and backwards for any period not exceeding six calendar months" may, after going two voyages, be discharged in Sydney on payment of the wages then due, without further compensation.

* NOTE (by witness on revision):—Take in seamen, not a seaman.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON SEAMEN.

4. I wish also to remark, with respect to my last answer, in which it is stated that the Act of Parliament, 23rd Vict., No. 11, was passed whilst Mr. Wise was Attorney General, on consideration I now think that although the Bill originated with him he had ceased to be Attorney General before it became law.

5. I beg you will lay this letter before the Select Committee, with my request that the explanation may be added to my evidence before it is printed.

I forward the undermentioned Appendices (thirteen, vide A to M).

To Charles Tompson, Esq.,
Clerk of the Legislative Assembly.

I have, &c.,

And Deponent saith that the said six seamen did, on the fifth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine, at Port Jackson aforesaid, in the Colony aforesaid, unlawfully refuse to obey lawful commands on board said steamship, contrary to the form of the Statute in such case made and provided. Mr. Robert Ellis, Solicitor, appears for prisoners.

Robert Mailler v. Richard Fuller, James Lattimer, James Fuller, William Jones, and Thomas Nielson.
Disobedience on Board Steamer.

Prince F. Little, on oath, states: I am a Constable in the Water Police; about a quarter past eleven o'clock yesterday forenoon I apprehended the five prisoners in Phillip-street, by virtue of the warrant I produce, charged with disobeying lawful commands on board the steamer "Kiama," on the 5th of this month.

Prisoners plead not guilty.

Robert Mailler, on oath, states: I am the master of the Colonial registered steamer "Kiama," now in this harbour; the five prisoners are seamen belonging to that vessel; they signed the articles produced for the voyage, which commenced on the 16th of October last, and is for six months; I charge those five men with disobeying lawful commands on Monday evening; at half-past five on Monday morning the steamer left Shoalhaven, but we did not arrive here till midnight, through stress of weather; we were advertised to leave here again the same night, at eleven o'clock; when I told the five prisoners to discharge the vessel they refused, and afterwards when they were on the wharf I ordered them again to do so, in the presence of Mr. Manning, and they still refused; with great difficulty I found men to take their place to work out the cargo, and Mr. Manning insisted on my having other men to go the voyage; I then told the mate to inform the men, but the five prisoners were not then on board, having left the vessel without notice; I engaged six other seamen, in place of prisoners, for the run, and on the following morning (Tuesday), at daylight, when the vessel was ready to sail, the prisoners came on board, when they were told that men had been engaged in their places; I hold an account for £8 8s., which I had to pay the men employed in place of the prisoners.

By the Bench: It has always been customary for the crew to discharge the deck cargo if called upon to do so in the middle of the night; the prisoners refused to do any more work on board before a third of the deck cargo was discharged on this occasion; the deck cargo consisted of pigs, and kegs of butter.

butter, and bags; the crew take the watches on board in their turn; I wanted all hands to assist in discharging; there is a special clause in the articles produced which states that "all stock and cargo to be landed on arrival at the wharves."

Cross-examined by Mr. Ellis: We commenced at five o'clock on Monday morning to take in the cargo, owing to the men having refused to do it on Saturday evening; the crew discharged about one-tenth of the cargo; I wanted them to pull or carry the pigs on shore, as it is dangerous to drive them on shore in the dark; we were 15 hours on the passage; the crew were not twenty-one hours continuously on duty on Monday; they did duty watch and watch alternately at sea.

By the Bench: Occasionally, when there is no other boat to take our place, we have had to discharge cargo and leave again the same night; we are due in about seven, and out at eleven, but on this night were late, as stated.

Cross-examined by Mr. Ellis: It was in the middle of the night that I wanted the men to discharge the cargo; I have discharged the cargo with the crew in the middle of the night on numerous occasions before this.

JAS. E. GRAHAM, J.P.

Thomas Pringle, on oath, states: I am the chief officer of the steamer "Kiama"; on Monday night when we arrived here the crew commenced to discharge the deck cargo, and had removed a quantity of butter and some hen coops, but when they heard that orders were given for them to discharge all the cargo, and load the other cargo, they stopped work; when they stopped I told them it was Mr. Manning's request that they should discharge the old cargo and take in the new one that night; they said they could not do it, they were not able; one or two of them said that: they were all present; they did not do any more work, but went and cleaned themselves, and went on shore I believe; with the assistance that we had, it would have taken three hours for the men to have discharged the cargo, and other two hours to load the other cargo; at daylight, when we were ready to start, prisoners came on board, but we did not take them, as we had men employed in their room.

Cross-examined by Mr. Ellis: We left Shoalhaven at 9 o'clock, after taking in cargo there; called at Kiama and Wollongong, where we also took in cargo; prisoners did not refuse work until they arrived here; the prisoners were offered yesterday their discharges if they would take them without wages.

By the Bench: I have been three years in steamers; it has been customary at the Phoenix Wharf to discharge cargo and take in the new cargo late at night; the pigs would average about one hundredweight each; when the prisoners refused I did not hear the captain say he did not want them.

FOR THE DEFENCE.

Peter Byrne, on oath, states: I am a seaman belonging to the steamer "Kiama"; on Monday last on our arrival here we discharged all the deck cargo, with the exception of the pigs and calves, and bags of maize and potatoes; the watch in which I and two of the prisoners were, was below three hours on the passage from Shoalhaven; the crew consists of six hands; before we knocked off work we went to Mr. Edye Manning, who was on the wharf at the time, and asked him if he wanted us to discharge all the cargo; he said he did not expect us to do anything unreasonable; we then went below, as we expected the pigs were not to be unloaded till daylight; the Captain afterwards sent the Mate forward to order us to unload all the cargo; we came on deck, when the Captain told us we were to carry the pigs on shore; we told him we were not able to do it, that we had been so long at work we were too fatigued to do it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Ellis: Yesterday morning the Mate told us on the wharf that we could have our discharges, but we should have no wages; I went home, and one of the other prisoners left the vessel with me.

By the Bench: We offered to drive the pigs off the deck, but we were told we must carry them, also the calves; he said we were to carry the stock; he did not mention either pigs or calves.

Present:—

MR. LEWIS,

CAPTAIN MORIARTY.

DANIEL C. DALGLEISH, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. David Gibb called in and examined:—

- Mr. D. Gibb. 139. By the Chairman: What is your profession? Engineer.
 140. Are you accustomed to the sea service? Yes.
 8 Feb., 1861. 141. Out of this port? Yes.
 142. And subject to the regulations of the Merchant Seamen's Act? Yes.
 143. How long have you been sailing out of this port? Four years and nine months.
 144. In one employment or in several? In one employment all the while.
 145. During that time have you been continuously at sea or alternately at sea and ashore? Never ashore except when the ship I was in at the time was laid up undergoing repairs.
 146. Have you any grievances to complain of in respect to the manner in which you have been treated under the operation of the shipping law? In what respect?
 147. In any one respect. Does the action of the Merchant Seamen's law affect you to your detriment in the pursuance of your usual avocation as a sea-going engineer? I consider it puts us to a great deal of inconvenience in regard to going backwards and forwards so often to the Shipping Office, where there is not the slightest occasion for it in my opinion.
 148. Have you anything to complain of besides the inconvenience? Yes, I do not see that there is any justice in it at all; I consider it unjust.
 149. In what respect? In having to go through the form of being discharged and signing fresh articles, when you belong to the same ship and are not leaving the ship, every month or every two months or three months, as may be. I do not see any use in signing articles and paying two shillings for a discharge when you are going on in the same vessel you are getting the discharge from.

150. I have here a return, which I have obtained by favor of the Water Police Magistrate, Mr. D. Gibb. from the Deputy Shipping Master of the port, with regard to the number of times that you have been discharged and shipped during a period of four years and nine months. I see by 8 Feb., 1861. this that your first engagement in this port was on the 10th May, 1856? Yes.
151. And you were discharged on the 1st of July—that was not a period of two months. I find you were shipped again on the 1st of July; were the usual shipping articles run out on that occasion? That was when I joined the vessel first; I did not join at the commencement of the articles, I only got my name put on the articles.
152. By Captain Moriarty: Have you yourself accurate knowledge of the days when you were discharged and shipped; can you furnish us with that information yourself? I have the days that I joined a certain ship and left a certain ship, but I could not tell how often I signed articles within that period. I can say how often I have signed articles during the last twelve months. I have been in the one ship for fifteen months; I signed articles when I joined first, and then perhaps every two or three months during that fifteen I have had to go to the Shipping Office and pay two shillings and sign articles again, still in the same vessel. I have the different dates here—the dates on which I joined and left particular ships, and, during the last twelve months, the dates on which I have been discharged and again signed articles.
153. By the Chairman: Will you put in that document as an Appendix to your evidence? Yes. (Witness handed in the same. Vide Appendix.)
154. It was by the effluxion of time that you were discharged on the 1st July, and your not having joined at the commencement of the articles accounts for the shortness of that engagement? Yes.
155. I find that your next date of discharge is the 16th September; your engagements are usually for three months? For any period not exceeding three months; that is how the articles are worded, if I recollect rightly. The ship was laid up in that September.
156. I find that in the "Eagle," in 1859, you joined that vessel on the 1st of August, and were discharged on the 19th August? Yes.
157. Can you account for that discharge in that short period of time? She was only intended to make one trip a month—to sail on the first of every month.
158. Did you sign articles for one month? Yes.
159. Your articles were drawn up on that occasion not to exceed a month? I could not exactly remember if those were the words.
160. Were they the usual articles that you signed on that occasion? They were the usual articles, I believe; the space for the period is left blank and filled up as the case may be.
161. I find also that on the 1st September and 22nd September, 1859, you were discharged had you to pay two shillings on each of those occasions? Yes.*
162. So that at this rate it was two shillings a month that you were paying to the Shipping Office? Yes.
163. And what you complain of is, that whilst still in the same employ you were constantly required, under the provisions of the Act, to go to the Shipping Office and be retaxed for employing yourself? It is not being in the same employ—I was hiring still in the same ship. I would not consider it so bad, even in the same employ, if I was going to another ship; but in the same ship to go every month, or every three months, and pay two shillings, I think it is not just.
164. In this case it was every month? Yes; still in the same ship, and it was the same in the "Waratah"; you will see by the dates there how often I paid it.
165. January 5th, April 10th, May 22nd, June 25th, all in 1860—these are the respective periods of your discharge? Yes.†
166. So that on these occasions you had again to pay at the rate of two shillings a month for re-shipping in the same vessel? Yes.
167. Is that the vessel you are in at present? That is the vessel I left last week.
168. Do you know anything of the lodging of seamen? No.
169. Are you a married man? No.
170. Do you lodge in a licensed lodging-house? No, I stopped on board the ship; I had no lodgings at all.
171. Would you consider it just that you, a seafaring man, should be compelled to lodge in a seamen's lodging-house? No, very unfair; I have discussed that with two or three.
172. Do you consider that it is in any respect a benefit to seamen to be compelled to lodge in these licensed lodging-houses? No.
173. What are the evils you apprehend to result from the system of compelling seamen to lodge in a particular place? A man might have a brother or friend of any description where he might go to lodge, where he might think he would be more comfortable, and where I have not the slightest doubt he would be more comfortable than in a seamen's lodging-house.
174. But supposing that the law does not extend to relatives—it is a disputed point, I believe—would you consider it just to be compelled to lodge in common lodging-houses under any circumstances—Is there any reason why seamen should not be compelled to resort to licensed lodging-houses? I do not think they should be compelled to go to licensed lodging-houses, because they might make themselves more comfortable elsewhere, even though they might have no near friends to go to.
175. I find that in one part of your evidence you complain that the articles are drawn up for a period not exceeding three months—is that arrangement equal on the part of the seaman so signing and on the part of the Company or shipowner to whom he signs? No, from far from it.

* Note (by witness on revision):—Only on the 22nd.† Note (by witness on revision):—January 5, April 10, May 22, July 9, October 29, all in 1860.

Mr. D. Gibb. 176. What is the inequality? Well, a seaman or anybody belonging to the ship cannot leave, without the captain's option at all events, until these three months are up, or if he does he must either forfeit his money or he can be punished for it at Court.

8 Feb., 1861.

177. By Captain Moriarty: Three months, or whatever the time may be? Yes; but he can be put away or discharged before the time without anything being said.

178. Have you known any case of this description? No, I cannot say I have personally.

179. Were you chief engineer in the Company's employment? Yes. I have discharged many a man, but it was when he came and told me he was going to try and better himself, and if any man could better himself of course I let him go.

180. By the Chairman: But that was optional on your part? Yes.

181. Do you remember the case, in your own vessel, under your own supervision, of a subordinate wishing to leave before the expiry of his articles, and not being allowed? That is not exactly it, because we were signing articles, and he asked then whether if he wanted to leave when the ship came into port next, he would be allowed.

182. Of whom did he ask this—the Shipping Master, the Captain, the Water Police Magistrate, or whom? I could not be positively certain, but I think he asked both the Shipping Master and the captain.

183. You are sure he asked either the one or the other? Yes.

184. You were present on the occasion? Yes.

185. Do you remember the answer? I think he said "Y s."

186. That he could leave? Yes; it is long since, a good many months ago, and I forget.

[Captain Moriarty objected to the reception of a statement of this kind, unless the witness could speak positively as to his personal knowledge of the facts. Witness ordered to withdraw. Committee deliberated. Captain Moriarty withdrew his objection. Witness recalled, and examination continued.]

187. By the Chairman: Will you be good enough to connect your ideas, as far as possible, with the preceding evidence, and go on as you were going before in your own way? As I said before, we were signing articles, and the man asked whether he would be allowed to leave when the ship came again into port. I could not be positive as to the exact words of the answer; and what I meant by his saying "Yes" was, that I do not remember whether he said anything more than the word "Yes"; but that the answer signified as much as that he could leave.

188. So that, although you sign articles, a man can leave whenever he has a mind? Not without the captain or engineer's permission.

189. By Captain Moriarty: Do you discharge your own crew—give us a little information on that point? I have always got to be there to ship my crew, although I have not got to sign my name to the discharge; the captain always asks me if I have all my crew there; the captain has nothing to do with looking out for firemen or trimmers for a ship.

190. By the Chairman: There is more than that—can the captain discharge your crew without your permission, or against your wishes? Well, I was never tried; but I believe not.

191. Does the captain, during any part of the voyage, take any command of your crew—has he any power to order them, except in cases of extraordinary emergency, with regard to any part of their duties, or are they wholly under your superintendence? I do not know whether the captain has power to order them or not; but I never saw him do it.

192. On the occasion you have just been alluding to, when you were signing articles you say the second engineer inquired of the captain or the Deputy Shipping Master, as to whether he could leave in the event of some probability or other—in the event of something which was probable occurring? Yes.

193. And the answer was "Yes"—that he could? Yes.

194. Did that person, your subordinate, wish to leave afterwards? No; he did not leave.

195. Did he express a desire to leave? Not after the ship returned in.

196. Prior to the ship going to sea—immediately after signing the articles—did he express a wish to leave? No.

197. Nor when the ship came back?—

198. Then you have no evidence to offer with regard to this question, as to whether a subordinate of yours wished to leave at any time and was prevented? No.

199. Of your own knowledge you know of no case of that description? No.

200. You have frequently, you say, taken firemen and trimmers to the Shipping Office, to discharge them, prior to the articles being expired? Yes.

201. Do you know the reason why you so caused them to go the Shipping Office; was there any particular reason? If the articles are not up I am not required to go; the captain can do then.

202. Can you tell us the reason why these men have been discharged prior to the time for which they engaged themselves, and been re-shipped in the same vessel and almost on the same day—in fact I see by the list that they have been shipped on the same day? The articles were up; we were discharged and shipped in the same vessel, but not before the last articles were up.

203. By Captain Moriarty: One set of articles expired, and in order to render your conduct on board the ship correct, you had to sign fresh articles, previous to going to sea? Yes, and the grievance is that we have to pay two shillings each time, although still in the same ship.

204. It is a simple question of money? It is not exactly a simple question of money to me, but I believe to others it is.

205. By the Chairman: Do you consider the money or the injustice of the case to be the grievance—the evident injustice of compelling you to pay two shillings to engage your services or to be discharged—or is it the amount of money? With me personally the money has nothing to do with it; it is the injustice of the thing altogether.

206. And you also complain of the unfairness of the articles in binding you, and allowing the Company or the captain of the ship, to which you are bound, to retain or dispense with your services as he thinks fit? Yes. Mr. D. Gibb.
8 Feb., 1861
207. Have cases come within your own knowledge of the articles being broken for the express purpose of re-engaging the crew of a ship at a less rate of remuneration? Well, I did not get it from a reliable source; I only overheard it, that such a thing was the case.
208. It has never occurred with yourself—your crew have never been discharged that they might be re-engaged at a lower rate? Not before the articles were up.
209. By Captain Moriarty: I understood you to complain of being obliged to go backwards and forwards to the Shipping Office, when, in fact, you are always in the same employment? I said always in the same ship.
210. Is it your opinion that if you were enabled to enter into an agreement as an engineer, with the proprietors of the vessels generally, for a certain period, it ought to be sufficient to enable you to be transferred from one ship to another? It is now.
211. You are obliged to go to the Shipping Office on each occasion? Not now; there has been an amendment lately.
212. Then you are not obliged to pay now when transferred from one ship to another? Not until the articles are up.
213. In signing the articles you enter into a certain contract with somebody—who is it? Well, really, I have read the articles over, but I forget how they are worded.
214. By the Chairman: I think you sign articles to the ship's husband, Captain Munro? Yes; we sign articles under Captain Munro now, in the Northern going boats.
215. By Captain Moriarty: When your name is entered on the ship's articles, you enter into a contract with some one—who is that person—is your name on the ship's articles now? My name is not on any ship's articles now.
216. Supposing you went to sea to-morrow, would your name be on the ship's articles? Yes.
217. That would be entering into a contract with some one? Yes.
218. Who is that person? I forget how they are worded, but I know the captain's name is mentioned on the articles.
219. Then you in point of fact enter into a contract with the captain? What I was going to say was, that I cannot remember whether the owners of the ship are mentioned in the articles.
220. By the Chairman: Here is a copy which you can suppose to be a copy of your own articles, in order that you may explain to Captain Moriarty the question he wishes to have answered? I see the articles are signed to the captain, or whoever may be the master of the steamer.
221. By Captain Moriarty: You sign as one of the crew? Yes.
222. And you with the rest of the crew enter into a compact with the captain to perform certain services for a certain period for a specific remuneration? Yes.
223. By the Chairman: This used to be the form of articles you signed—but is not the name of Captain Munro, who is ship's husband to all the Company's vessels, now inserted in the place where the name of "Alexander Collins," as master of the steamer, is inserted in these articles? I was going to say so.
224. As master of the vessel, of course? I never had a copy of the articles since they were altered in that way, but I believe Captain Munro's name is there; I know we sign under Captain Munro.
225. Captain Munro, at the present time, has to go to the Shipping Office to ship and discharge the men, and to perform the same functions as the captain of the vessel formerly did? The captain has to put his name on the discharge.
226. But Captain Munro has to be there? Yes.
227. By Captain Moriarty: Why? We sign under Captain Munro, although the captain of the vessel signs the discharge.
228. Could you suggest any remedy to do away with the evils you have alluded to, in unnecessarily going down to the Shipping Office and paying a sum of money for frequent discharges? If a man is not going to leave the ship he has no use for a discharge; you never get the discharge in your hand; it is just left on the table and passed from the Deputy Shipping Master to the clerk, and he just puts it on the file.
229. It is an unnecessary demand for money upon you? It is quite unnecessary to sign fresh articles, and quite unnecessary to pay two shillings. If you were going to leave the employment, or going to another ship, there might be some reason in it, but to be compelled to pay two shillings for a discharge when you again sign articles in the same ship is quite unjust.
230. By the Chairman: Are you aware of the English method of conducting this department in the coasting service? No; I never went to sea in England.
231. By Captain Moriarty: You stated that you discharged a man when he wanted to better himself—I do not see anything in the articles giving you or any person but the captain the power of discharging men? Of course I spoke to the captain.
232. Then it was his legal act? Yes.
233. By the Chairman: If a man in your department commits an indiscretion can you not insist on the captain discharging that man, not as his whim, but as your right to have him discharged? Yes.
234. By Captain Moriarty: By what law? I do not know if it is law.
235. By the Chairman: You can refuse to carry any man to sea that you consider would be a hindrance to you? Yes, I can go to the captain and complain.
236. You can refuse to take him? Yes, I believe so.
237. It is the custom? It is.

Mr. D. Gibb. 238. By Mr. Lewis: I understood that you said you could go to the captain and complain of any man under you—but could you go to the captain and compel him to discharge the man?
8 Feb., 1861. Not compel him.

239. By the Chairman: You could refuse to carry that individual? I cannot compel the captain to discharge him of course, but I could put the man off duty.

240. Were the captain to insist upon your engaging a certain number of men of whom you had no knowledge, would you consider it wilful disobedience of lawful commands, or that it would subject you to an action in Court if you were to refuse to proceed to sea with those men? Whether it is justice or not I could not say, but, of course, if I refused to put to sea there would be another man put in my place.

241. Have you any other evidence to offer in this case? There is many a time that you want to discharge a man and ship another when you have not got the man that is going to ship ready at the Shipping Office at the same time as the man that is going to be discharged; it is done, but Captain Shorter has told me himself that it is not according to law. When the man goes to ship the captain has to be there along with him; a line from the captain will not do.

242. His personal attendance is necessary? Yes; that is another very inconvenient thing. I think the party who is going to ship ought to be able to go to the Shipping Office by himself, with a line from the captain, stating that he is the party that is going to ship.

243. You consider it a grievance to have to waste time in this manner? Yes.

244. You complain also of being compelled to sign articles twice within one month for the same vessel, while in the same employment, simply because the owners might save your board in the vessel whilst she lay at the wharf—what object do you imagine the Company had? Not twice in one month.

245. You will find that though not twice in one month, it was twice in a month with regard to time—not twice in the same calendar month? What their object for it was I really do not know.

246. Were you while thus unemployed receiving the same amount of wages, and the same amount of advantage as you would have been if your name had been on the ship's articles? Yes, I was receiving the same amount of advantage.

247. You were kept on board the ship? No, I was not kept on board the ship, but I got equivalent to it.

248. You got board wages in addition? Yes.

249. Did the firemen get board wages? No.

250. Were the crew kept on? No.

251. They got no board wages? No.

252. They were discharged? Yes.

253. So that there was an advantage in the crew being discharged? Yes.

254. They were discharged immediately the cargo was landed, and engaged when the vessel was ready for sea? Yes.

255. By Captain Moriarty: What length of time elapsed between their discharge and re-shipment? You can tell there (referring to document previously handed in.) I do not remember the dates.

256. By the Chairman: You joined the ship on the 1st of August, the date of discharge is not given, but you joined again on the 19th August in the same year—or, is that the time occupied in the run? Yes; I joined on the 1st and was discharged on the 19th.

257. When did you re-ship? On the 1st September, in the same ship.

258. Then your grievance is, or rather the grievance of the men forming the crew would be, that it was a saving to the Company that they should be discharged from the 19th August to the 1st of September—they had to go to board and lodge, and were thrown out of employment for that time? No, they were working.

259. They were thrown out of employment as seamen? Yes.

260. By Captain Moriarty: Was the ship lying idle all the time? Yes.

261. By the Chairman: They were taking in cargo, were they not? Not in that ship; in the "Waratah" they were.

MR. LEWIS, | MR. LUCAS,
MR. WINDEYER.

DANIEL C. DALGLEISH, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Edmund Debenham called in and examined:—

262. By the Chairman: What are you? A fireman.
263. Have you been a fireman for any length of time in this Colony? Yes, nearly three years. I was eighteen months in the last boat.
264. Are you acquainted with the Shipping laws in this Colony? Yes.
265. Are you acquainted with the manner of shipping in England or Scotland? In England I am.
266. Is the same method adopted here as there? No.
267. What is the difference? In signing articles in the West India boats we sign for three months, and not to exceed three months.
268. Can you be discharged before you have completed the term? We were always discharged when the ship returned to port; that generally was from six weeks to two months.
269. The reason for that—are you aware of it? When the ship is in port the hands belonging to the engine-room are kept to work on port wages; that is even more beneficial than sea wages.
270. The port wages at Southampton are higher than sea wages, so that the advantage is in favour of the seamen? Yes.
271. Would not another reason be that the seamen could not proceed to sea a second time under the same articles, as there would not be sufficient time remaining to enable them to complete the voyage? Yes, that is the reason.
272. That is the true reason why the men are discharged at the end of the voyage? Yes; sometimes the voyage last three months, as we always sign for any port in the West Indies and the American coast between New York and Rio de Janeiro.
273. If you do not like the employment you are at liberty to leave when you come back? Yes.
274. They cannot detain you after the voyage if you think proper to leave? No. We always look to be discharged three days after the ship's arrival in port.
275. Does it not appear on the ship's articles that you can, on your own request, be discharged three days after the ship's arrival in port? Yes.
276. What is the difference between the practice in England and the practice in this Colony? We sign to serve for three months here.
277. That is the same as at Home—for any period not to exceed three months? Yes.
278. What is the difference then? At Home the articles are equally binding upon the master and men, here they are all on the one side; the captain can compel us to stay the full time, or discharge us at a minute's notice.
279. This agreement is not equal? Not at all, it is all on one side.
280. Have you yourself in any instance, or have you known any other person who wished to leave before the expiration of the three months, who has been prevented? Yes; I know one man in particular who lost a good situation in that way. He was a man who conducted himself in a proper manner, and he asked to leave and was refused.* It was about nine months ago, and he was kept two trips longer than he wished, and could not get away; but had the captain wished to discharge him he could have done so, and the man could not have said nay.
281. Have you anything else to complain of? The provisions are very indifferent at times.
282. Are there any charges which are unusual, or which bear heavily upon seamen at the shipping office? Yes. At Home there are no fees paid by seamen on being discharged; I never paid any myself; but whether it is included in the wages I do not know. Here it is 2s.
283. Have you ever been in the coasting trade in England? No.
284. You find this 2s. a heavy tax upon your earnings? It is generally felt so, especially in the way the discharges are made. The men are discharged at any time the owners or captains think fit; perhaps they are discharged one trip, and they have to pay 2s.; then they go another trip, are discharged again, and have to pay another 2s.
285. Do the owners discharge men, and replace the same men during the currency of an engagement. Suppose a man had signed articles for three months, during the currency of that period might an owner, for some cause, discharge his seamen, and re-engage them the same day? It has never come under my notice, but it has happened to many others, to my knowledge.
286. Are you a married man? No.
287. Do you live in lodgings? Yes.
288. Is it a licensed lodging-house you reside in? I cannot say; I did not ask that.
289. It is a general boarding-house for seamen? Yes, or any one.
290. Or mechanics? Yes.
291. Are you aware that there are houses specially licensed for the boarding and lodging of seamen in the Colony? Yes.
292. Are you aware of any such system existing in any other place? No, I am not.

Mr. E.
Debenham.

12 Feb., 1861.

293.

* NOTE (by witness on revision):—About one month of the articles had expired.

- Mr. E. Debenham.
12 Feb., 1861.
293. What was the cause of your leaving the ship you were last in? I left on account of the provisions.
294. Look at those articles—they are the articles of the "Illalong," the "Collaroy," and the "Sampson," boats belonging to the A. S. N. Company, the same Company in which you say you were employed? (The Chairman handed the articles to witness.) This is the same as we signed. We always sign to the same effect—"sufficient without waste."
295. You say you had to complain of the quantity of your provisions? Not of the quantity—we always had sufficient, but the provisions were of such a quality that it was impossible for any one to eat them.
296. By Mr. Lucas: In what respect? The meat was stinking for two days. At the Shipping Office we complained to Captain O'Reilly about the provisions; we were all told to go about our business. *One of the men said, "If I sign under those articles for three months, and have the same sort of provisions, I shall be starved before the time is out."
297. Who discharged you and sent you about your business? The captain of the ship.
298. By the Chairman: It appears strange that a respectable company like the A. S. N. Company should give bad provisions to their men? The captain supplies the provisions.
299. The captain provides the ship at his own cost? No; he is allowed so much a man from the Company.
300. Is he then supposed to find you in provisions as if the Company provided you according to these articles? Yes, that is what Captain Shorter explained to us—that he was supposed to find us "sufficient provisions without waste."
301. You complained at the Shipping Office? Yes, and this was the cause of our leaving.
302. You were at the Shipping Office for what purpose? To re-sign.
303. You have no fault to find with the ship? No other fault than the provisions.
304. In what department were you? I was a fireman.
305. Who was the engineer of that vessel? Mr. Harper.
306. Was he satisfied with your services? Quite so. I have a note to that effect. We all left contrary to his wishes; he went to Mr. Macarthur and tried to get us back again, but while he did so Captain Reilly got other men at the Shipping Office. (The witness produced a certificate of character for eighteen months from the Chief Engineer.)
307. Since that you have been unemployed? Yes.
308. When did you leave? On the 27th December last. Captain Reilly said none of us were to go in the ship again. Mr. Harper would have taken us back again the next trip if there had been room for us, but he was not allowed.
309. So the captain refuses to employ you himself and does what he can to prevent your being employed? I do not know any further than his refusing to employ us in his own ship.
310. By Mr. Lewis: You say you complained to Captain Shorter of the quality of your food? Yes.
311. And your captain discharged you then and there? Yes.
312. Do you think he discharged you because you complained of your food, or because the term of your articles had expired? The term of our articles was up, but we were all at the Shipping Office to sign again, and when Captain Shorter spoke about the provisions we said they had been of bad quality.
313. By Mr. Lucas: Do you know of any other grievance seamen are labouring under in this port which they are not subject to in any other? I believe they principally complain of their usage in the Shipping Office by having to pay 2s.
314. That is all? Yes.
315. And you know nothing about seamen's lodging-houses, because you do not stop at one? No.
316. As to the power of the police to interfere with seamen, have you anything to complain of in that matter? I think not.
317. By the Chairman: That is as far as you are personally concerned? Yes.
318. Are you aware that you can be apprehended without warrant, summons, or any other legal document, simply on suspicion of being a runaway seaman? Yes.
319. Are you liable to the same thing in any port in Great Britain? Not that I am aware of.
320. Have you any other statement to make to the Committee? In the steamers at Home oatmeal is always allowed to the firemen to be mixed with the water to drink, and in some ships here it is used, but we have often asked for it and been refused. It is a great boon. †

Mr. Donald Sinclair called in and examined:—

- Mr. D. Sinclair.
12 Feb., 1861.
321. By the Chairman: What are you? I was coal trimmer on board the "Collaroy" last.
322. When was that? I left on the 31st of last month.
323. Were your articles up, on board? No; they had a month more to go.
324. You were discharged for bad conduct, I suppose? No; we were took up and reduced a pound.
325. That is to say, you were taken to the Shipping Office, discharged, and re-engaged at a reduction in your wages of one pound? Yes.
326. Is that the usual proceeding? No, I never was used that way before; we were shipped for "not exceeding three months," but suppose wages had risen a pound, we would not get the

* Witness, upon revision, wished to omit the passage between the asterisks.

† NOTE.—For the passage between the asterisks witness wished to substitute the following upon revision:—Here it is not allowed, although it is of the greatest importance to firemen.

the advantage, but they thought of reducing us, and they took us to go to the Shipping Office and reduced a pound, and they made us pay 2s. for our discharge; I was the only one who left.

Mr. D.
Sinclair.

327. What was the reason that the others did not leave? I expect the reason was that they were afraid of losing their situations. 12 Feb., 1861.

328. In consequence of the redundancy of labour—the great number of men out of employ in the seafaring line? Yes; they thought if they said anything against it they would be discharged altogether.

329. How long have you been in the Colony? About three years and nine or ten months.

330. By Mr. Windeyer: Have you had any employment since? No; I have not been very well since; I was not very well at the time, still I would have stopped till my time was up.

331. By the Chairman: There was no fault or any other reason for cancelling the original articles than a desire to reduce wages? No, not that I am aware of.

332. You say you complain of having to pay 2s.? Yes.

333. Do you complain more of having had to pay 2s. in that case than of the general practice? Yes; because if they had let us remain till our articles were up, we would not be served so.

334. During the period you have been in the Colony, how often have you been in the habit of shipping within the year? I used to ship four times in the year. This was the first time we were took up and discharged before our articles were up.

335. Are you a married man? No.

336. Do you live in lodgings? Yes.

337. At a seaman's lodging-house? No.

338. Not a seaman's lodging-house? No; there are no seamen there.

339. The house in which you lodge is not a house licensed for seamen? No.

340. Do many seamen live there? No; there are no sailors there.

341. Remember that you are a sailor yourself, every individual who signs ship's articles is a sailor? I do not think the people of the house pay license, but I am not sure.

342. How many lodgers are there in the house you reside? Five.

343. What accommodation is there in that house? Very good accommodation, we have very good usage; I have stopped with those people when there has been nobody there but myself; any time I have been ashore these three years I get my washing done there, and at any time I am ashore I stop there.

344. Have you ever known lodging-houses licensed for seamen especially in any country where you have been? I have not.

345. Have you been employed in the capacity of seaman or fireman in England? In the capacity of fireman; never was a sailor. I have been a fireman ever since I was at sea.

346. Out of what port? Out of Hull, in Yorkshire.

347. That is one of the principal ports in England? Yes.

348. What was the usage there in reference to shipping? There we used to sign for a length of time; and any time that any of us wanted to leave, we got leave by giving a week's notice. We were never discharged at any time, except for bad behaviour, or anything of that kind.

349. By the Chairman (handing the witness a copy of ship's articles): Do you recognize that as a copy of the articles you used to sign? (The witness examined the copy.) Did you never read the articles? No.

350. Have you never had them read to you? I have heard them read.

351. Have any objections been made to the articles when the seamen heard them read? No, I do not think there have.

352. When seamen hear the articles read, they are not in the habit of listening? Yes; they just hear the thing read over; they are not in the habit of making objections to anything, for there are too many too glad to get situations at any wages—for the sailors were taken up and reduced 10s. at the time we were reduced a pound—and I dare say they were more afraid of losing their situations than anything else.

353. Have you any complaints to make in reference to the scale of provisions? No, not in the "Collaroy"—we were pretty well found by Captain only there was no use in our making complaints. Sometimes we used to grumble among ourselves; but there was no use in any one making a complaint, for we knew we should be discharged if we did.

354. If you wished to leave the "Collaroy" before the ship's articles were up, would you have been allowed to do so? I do not expect I should—I never tried that, and I do not know whether I should have been allowed or not; but I know that if the wages were to be raised, and we went in any of the vessels, we should not get them till the time our articles were up.

355. Have you known any cases of this description on board your vessel? Have you known any of your mates try to leave before the time? No.

356. You say this 2s. is an unusual tax on the labour of seamen? It is; it is a thing I never paid in England. We paid once a year this 2s.

357. What did you pay once a year? Two shillings. We should have paid it once in six months; but in the boat I was in we were not discharged, and we had not to pay it for the last twelve months; for when the ship was laid up in winter, we were kept on—our wages went on the same.

358. You have sailed on a foreign voyage out of that port? Yes; we used to go to Christiana, in Norway.

359. Were you ever in a coasting vessel? No.

360. You do not know the custom of coasters in England? No; but I do not think in coasting vessels they go to any Shipping Offices at all—it is only the ship's articles they sign. It was only in foreign-going vessels they have to go and sign articles in the Shipping Office.

Mr. D.
Sinclair.
12 Feb., 1861.

361. By Mr. Windeyer: Were you under articles at the time you were discharged in this port? Yes; we signed for a time not exceeding three months, and two months of the articles were gone, and we were discharged a month before our articles were up.
362. Was any reason given? No; we heard such a thing was to be when we came into port, and knew no more about it till the captain said we were to go up to the Shipping Office and get our discharges—and then we were reduced a pound, and had to pay 2s. All went back but me—and I think the cook's boy left.
363. Have you heard anything of the kind before in any steamer? No.
364. By the Chairman: Do you know that such a thing has not happened? No; but it has not happened in any of our ships.
365. You are perfectly aware that seamen could not leave prior to the expiry of their articles—and, if the wages had risen, that the owners would not have allowed them to leave? Yes.
366. By Mr. Lewis: By this you mean to say that your masters can make any change or alteration in your wages, or rations, when they think proper, without any notice at all—but you can't get your liberty unless the term of your articles is served? Yes.
367. You are altogether in their hands, in that respect? Yes.
368. By Mr. Windeyer: You say the articles you were under were such as these (pointing to the ship's articles on the table), and the agreement to serve was for any period not exceeding three months? Yes.
369. By Mr. Lucas: Do you know of any grievances that seamen are labouring under in this Colony, which they are not subject to elsewhere? No, I cannot say I do.
370. With reference to the police apprehending them—their having the right of taking them up as runaway sailors—do you know whether that is the same in any other port? I never heard anything of the kind till I came out here.
371. You have already stated that you did not know that lodging-houses were licensed in any other port but Sydney? Yes.
372. Do you think that it is beneficial to seamen to have only these licensed lodging-houses, or that they should have a right, like other persons, to lodge where they please? I do not think it right that they should have to pay a license for them any more than others; for a seaman might lodge in a house, and might be a pound or more short, and the lodging-house keeper might trust him till such time as he got a ship, whereas in any other house not acquainted with him he would not get that; but the owners of the place which he has made his home when he is on shore may be willing to receive him and allow him to remain, until he can obtain a ship and is able to pay his arrears.
373. By Mr. Lewis: Do you think it right for the authorities to compel a seaman to make his home where they please, and not to allow him to select his home where he thinks proper? I think it is not. I think a man ought to have liberty to go where he likes.
374. By the Chairman: You carry this out practically by going to a house which is not a lodging-house for seamen? Yes. I do not see why persons should pay a license for seamen to lodge in their houses any more than for other persons.
375. By Mr. Lucas: With reference to this 2s., you complain that you have had to pay 2s. for your discharge on all occasions, whether you have served the full time or not? Every time we leave we have to pay 2s. for our discharge; but in England, if the owners discharge the man they pay the 2s. themselves, if a man leaves on his own accord he has to pay.
376. By Mr. Windeyer: Do the men complain of the working of the Water Police Court at all? No.
377. You know nothing as to how it works? No, for I never was pulled up for anything of the sort in my life.
378. Have you never been there as a witness? No.
379. By the Chairman: Have you any further statement to make to the Committee? No.

DANIEL C. DALGLEISH, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. George Robertson called in and examined:—

Mr. G.
Robertson.
15 Feb., 1861.

380. By the Chairman: What profession do you follow? I have been master of a vessel for the last five years.
381. Out of this port? Yes.
382. Are you thoroughly acquainted with the usages of the port? Yes.
383. And the requirements of the Merchant Seamen's law? Yes.
384. Is there anything in that law that you complain against? There is one thing in regard to the Shipping Office, the shipping and unshipping of seamen.
385. What is the complaint? There is 2s. for each man that you have got to pay at the Shipping Office before you can ship a hand.
386. Is that a usual charge in other ports? Not that I am aware of.
387. Have you sailed out of other ports? Yes.

388. In England? In England and Scotland too.

389. In the coasting trade there, do they charge for shipping and discharging seamen? Not when I was at Home.

390. Is there anything else you have to complain of in regard to the working of the Merchant Seamen's Act? There is another thing, the licensing of seamen's boarding houses.

391. Do you consider that objectionable? Yes.

392. Are there any advantages to the seamen that you are aware of, from the system of licensing? Not that I am aware of.

393. You consider that it is a total disadvantage to the seaman? It is a disadvantage altogether. There is many a man I know in this port that has got sisters keeping boarding-houses, and they cannot go and lodge with their own sisters, for fear of their being fined.

394. Have you known any person in that position fined? No, I have not, only what I saw in the papers some time ago about licensed houses; but I know the Water Police make a practice of coming to boarding houses that are not licensed for seamen, and overhauling them.

* 395. Have you any other grievance to complain of, or any other statement to make with regard to the working of the Act? No. I have been trading to the Manning River for the last five years; and sometimes when I have had a passenger I have gone down to clear him out a little too late, and in order that I may not lose a wind I have sailed without clearing him; well, the Water Police would then come on board, take the passenger out of the ship, and lock him up from Saturday night to Monday morning, and threaten to take me away out of the vessel too for taking a passenger without a clearance. Many a poor man has not got the means to give 2s. for to get a vessel, and must go wanting employment.

396. Provided a man were to lose his discharge I suppose he would get another from the proper officer at the Shipping Office, without any further payment? He would have to go and make an affidavit before the Magistrate, and still have to pay the 2s.

397. Make an affidavit—to what effect? That he had lost his discharge.

398. How much would he be charged in that case? 2s.

399. For the affidavit? No; for the discharge.

400. Would he pay anything for the affidavit? No. The man has to pay 2s. for a discharge, and the master of the vessel has to pay 2s. for shipping the hands.

401. When a man has lost his discharge he pays 2s. for the affidavit and renewal of the discharge? It is for the renewal of the discharge.

402. Are you aware of the habit of transshipping seamen from one vessel to another, belonging to the same owner? I think it is a very wrong thing.

403. You are aware that that is part of the shipping law? Yes.

404. What is your reason for objecting to it? I think it is a hardship for a man who signs under a certain master for a limited time—three or six months—to be transhipped to another vessel, and go away at an hour's notice, perhaps.

405. And if he refused to go from one vessel to another? He would be punished and forfeit his wages.

406. In what way would he be punished? He would be fetched up before the Magistrates and they would give him two or three months in gaol.

407. For wilful disobedience of lawful commands, I suppose? Yes.

408. I suppose the objection a seaman would have to such an exchange might be something of this character:—Suppose there were two vessels belonging to the same owner, for one of which—a good, comfortable, seaworthy vessel—the seaman might have shipped; the other, a vessel of indifferent character, in which there might be a great deal of trouble and a deal of work, owing to her inefficiency as a sea-going vessel. I suppose a sailor would consider it a great hardship to be transhipped from one vessel to another under such circumstances? Yes.

409. But he is obliged to submit? Yes.

410. I think you say you are master of a vessel? Yes.

411. In case you want to ship a whole crew at one time, do you not get a discount allowed, so to speak, you can ship a crew all together cheaper than one by one? No.

412. I think there is such a provision in the Act? I have never seen it since I have been shipping hands.

413. By Mr. Lewis: When a man goes to the Shipping Office to ship, does he ship in a particular vessel, or under the Company at large? In a particular vessel.

414. Are the employers at liberty to take him from that ship, and place him in what vessel they think proper? Not if he ships for the same master and the same ship.

415. They have no liberty then to take him out of that vessel, and put him in another, against his will? Not unless it is so specified in the articles.

416. By Mr. Allen: Then it would not be correct for any person to say that a seaman, shipped in one vessel to one master, can be transferred, by the owner of the ship, from that vessel to another, against his will? No.

417. By the Chairman: Are these (handing to witness a set of ship's articles), the usual articles a seaman signs in this port? Yes.

418. In these articles the services of the men seem to be limited to the schooner "Pacific,"—now what would be the difference in the wording provided you wished the seamen to go in one or more vessels, would it not be "the schooner 'Pacific,' or other vessel, belonging to the same owner"? Yes.

419. So that it is merely a matter of form in the preparation of the articles. If you have only one vessel, of course you do not require to make a specification for a change? Just so.

420. Do you observe there that the seamen sign for a period "not exceeding six months"? Yes.

Mr. G.
Robertson.

- Mr. G. Robertson.
15 Feb., 1861.
421. What do you understand by that agreement—the seaman is evidently by that bound to stay for a period of six months; but are you bound, provided he behaves himself and does his duty, to keep him six months? Yes.
422. You are bound to keep him? You are bound to keep him, by the articles.
423. Have you ever discharged a seaman before his agreement was up? Yes; but he has been willing to go—to leave the vessel.
424. You have never known seamen discharged before their time had expired, when they were not willing to leave the vessel; that is to say, discharged for the purpose of re-engagement at a lower rate of wages? No.
425. Have you ever been employed in the inter-colonial steamers? Yes.
426. In what Company? The old Company, in the "Telegraph."
427. In the Melbourne trade? Yes.
428. Are you aware of the system of shipping in the port of Melbourne? No, I never sailed out of Melbourne.
429. Are the articles read over, in every case, in the Shipping Office here, before the seamen sign? Yes.
430. Do you think seamen in general pay any attention to them? They very seldom do.
431. Do you think six seamen out of the port of Sydney are aware of the meaning or effect of the regulations of the Merchant Seamen's Act? I do not think many understand them.
432. Do you think the majority of masters understand them any further than relates to the shipping and discharging of men? I do not think they do.
433. By Mr. Allen: Could you suggest any plan to make seamen thoroughly acquainted with the particulars of the Act? I think the only plan is to read the articles over. ¶
434. You know of no plan of making a sailor intelligent who is not naturally so? No.
435. You do not seem to have a very high opinion of the licensed boarding-houses—were you in the Colony before these boarding-houses were established? Yes.
436. If I remember right, there were a great number of complaints about seamen being led off by what they called "crimps" at that day? Yes.
437. Who got them into improper houses, associated with girls, in order to plunder them? Yes; I saw it done in London, but I never knew it myself in this Colony.
438. I am speaking of the time before the Seamen's Act was passed, and I was asking if you remembered this state of things? I have been in the Colony twelve or thirteen years, but I never went to any of these houses.
439. You have heard such was the case? Yes.
440. By the Chairman: Have you ever heard of mechanics being robbed in houses of ill fame? Oh! yes; it is an every day occurrence.
441. By Mr. Allen: Did you consider that this was an inquiry into the question whether mechanics are as a general rule robbed in houses of ill fame, or did you consider it an inquiry into the working of the Merchant Seamen's Act? (The Chairman objected to this question, and requested the witness to withdraw. Witness re-introduced.)
442. By Mr. Allen: With respect to seamen's boarding-houses, you have just said that, previous to the passing of the Lodging-houses Act, seamen coming to the port were liable to be deluded away by crimps, and in the company of women got plundered—now have you heard complaints of that character lately, as a general rule, since these lodging-houses were established? Yes.
443. By their stopping out of these lodging-houses of a night? And by stopping in them.
444. Are the girls admitted into the lodging-houses? No, I do not think so.
445. Will you be kind enough to explain how you think seamen are still deluded by these girls and by the crimps? I cannot see that a seaman is deluded any place except at his own option; but I think it is a very wrong thing that a person who takes a seaman into his house should have to pay £5 for a fine; I have known an instance where a son could not go into his mother's house for fear of being fined; she kept a lodging-house, but not a seamen's lodging-house.
446. Are you aware that the Lodging-house Act contemplates preventing, or actually does prevent, seamen from lodging in their own houses or in their friends' houses? Oh! yes.
447. Did you ever know any person to be brought up for lodging with his friends—brother, sister, or mother? It is not allowed.
448. I am asking if you ever knew of anybody being brought up and punished for it—I think we will find it is allowed, but that people are not allowed to take in seamen as boarders without a license? No.
449. But there is nothing in the Act to prevent them living in the houses of their friends? Well, it is the case, I believe; I consider it is a very wrong thing; I think every man has a right to go to what house he thinks proper.
450. Have you ever known any damage arising to seamen in the lodging-houses—any robberies or any evil coming upon them—are they over-charged? Well, I do not doubt but they are.
451. Do you know of any instance of seamen being over-charged? I have not in this country, but I have at Home.
452. We are speaking of this country? I never was in a boarding-house in this country.
453. You do not know anything of their management? I know by hearsay, of a man that has been shipmate with me, how he has been used.
454. Could you inform the Committee of the nature of the bad usage he got that you refer to? No, I could not; I am a stranger to that line myself; I never was in them.
455. Now I gather from your evidence with respect to the seamen's lodging-houses, that you know of no injury they have done to seamen? Well, I do not think it is any benefit.
456. But you do not know of any injury they have received? At the seamen's boarding-houses houses they are very saucy to the seamen; they know the men cannot go anywhere else, and they deal with them as they think proper.

457. Are you aware how many seamen's boarding-houses there are in Sydney? I am not aware how many, but there are a good few.

458. Do you not think the competition amongst these people would induce civility and cheapness too? Well, I do not know; a sailor is put— (The Chairman objected to the mode of examination.)

459. By Mr. Allen: You said something about sailors' sisters keeping a boarding-house that they could not stop in? Yes; not with their own mothers even.

460. Do you know of any instance in which a young man could not go and stop at his sister's house? Yes, I have heard of it.

461. Do you know of any yourself? No.

462. With respect to shipping and discharging seamen—do you think there is an inconvenience or injustice arising out of charging them 2s.? Yes, I think so; a poor man sometimes has not got 2s., or 4s. it would be if he had lost his discharge.

463. Do you think it is necessary for the trade of the port that the Shipping Office should be continued at all? Well, I do not think it is, as far as the coasters are concerned; I think it is more a nuisance to them than any thing else; many a time I have lost a run by it; it is a vessel of 35 tons that I belong to, and if I could not get my cargo on board, and get cleared out in time, before the office closed, I have perhaps lost the north-easter, and by a change of weather while I was waiting to clear, I have been windbound for a week or a fortnight.

(The Chairman again objected to the mode of examination. Witness ordered to withdraw. Mr. Douglas moved, "That Mr. Allen's questions are in order, and the Chairman's interruptions are uncalled for." Debate ensued. Motion withdrawn. Witness re-introduced.)

464. By Mr. Allen: The last question you answered was, that you considered the Shipping Office was not necessary to the coasting trade? I do not think it is; that is my opinion.

465. What effect would the abolition of it have, do you suppose, upon the general shipping trade of the Colony—that is, the abolition of it with respect to coasting vessels. I want to elicit from you whether you think it would facilitate the desertion of crews from foreign vessels entering the port, if they found they could get away on the coasters without registry in the office? Well, there have been a great many instances of that in former times—hands running away.

466. Do you think the registry of seamen, as at present carried out, is the only way to stop coasters from taking runaway sailors from foreign shipping coming into port—is that what I understand you to say? Yes; but for coasting vessels I do not think it is a bit of good at all.

467. The Shipping Office is only, in your opinion, necessary for the protection of foreign ships coming into the port—that is, so far as the coasting trade goes it might be done away with? Yes; there is not much running away now from the big vessels, they are very glad to ship on.

468. By Mr. Lewis: I should like to ask a question concerning the cleanliness of the lodging-houses—if you know whether they are kept in a proper state? That is a question I cannot answer; I never did go into the lodging-houses.

469. By Mr. Douglas: You have seamen in your employment? Yes.

470. What is the character they generally give of the accommodation they receive in the lodging-houses? They give it a bad name, any that I have spoken to; they say they do as they like with them in the sailors' boarding-houses; they give them anything they like, and if they do not like that, they tell them they can go elsewhere.

471. Then they use their privilege as a means of exacting from seamen what would not be exacted from them at other houses? Yes; they combine together, and if a seaman goes to another house, he falls in with the same treatment.

472. Is there any scale of charges to which they are obliged to submit? I believe there is; they are charged more I think than what another boarding-house would charge.

473. Have you ever known any instances of seamen being discharged under an agreement previous to the expiry of their time, and subsequently re-engaged by the same party at a lower rate? I have heard instances of that occur sometimes.

474. How do you account for the fact that a sailor would submit to do so, knowing that it was in violation of his articles? Both parties might be agreeable first before the hands were discharged.

475. Can you conceive that it would be agreeable to a sailor to submit to a reduction of wages to which it was not absolutely necessary he should submit? No.

476. Then I can hardly imagine that you can know of any instances where they have actually submitted? You will find they have, but it would not be willingly on the part of the seamen.

477. It would be in fact forced upon them by their employers? Yes. I have been experienced myself in the coasting trade, and many a man who signs articles for three or six months, when wages are high, has to submit to have them reduced when wages fall before the time is up; the masters or owners of vessels try and put extra work upon the hands, and keep them at it, to annoy them till they wish to leave the vessels, so as to get the wages down.

478. Is it customary with the Steam Navigation Companies to tranship one set of men trading, for instance, to the north, and send them in another vessel to Melbourne or any other port? I have never seen it since I have been in the country.

479. By the Chairman: How long is it since you were employed by the Steam Navigation Company? Going on six years.

480. Have you any further information to tender to the Committee? No, I think not.

Mr. G.
Robertson.

15 Feb., 1861.

Mr. James Dunn called in and examined:—

- Mr. J. Dunn. 481. By the Chairman: What are you? Boarding-house keeper. I have been a seaman for 25 years.
- 15 Feb., 1871. 482. A licensed boarding-house for sailors? No.
483. How long have you been keeping a lodging-house? About eleven months.
484. Who are the parties that frequent your house—seamen or landsmen? Landsmen.
485. What position in society do they hold as a rule? They are mechanics generally.
486. What do you mean by mechanics? Carpenters, painters, and other tradesmen; we often have labourers too.
487. Do you know anything with regard to the working of licensed lodging-houses for seamen? Yes, I know something of it.
488. What do you know about it? I know that I have been fined myself.
489. What was that for? Not having a license to keep seamen.
490. What led to your being fined? An information was laid by a man living close to me, that keeps a licensed lodging-house; we had a few words, and he laid an information against me.
491. How many seamen had you in your house? Two.
492. How long had they been there? A few weeks; I never had any more than three or four weeks.
493. How long had the two men you allude to been there? About two weeks; I had one nearly three weeks.
494. How many lodgers have you generally in your house? They vary greatly; generally five or six. (Vide Appendix A.)
495. How many rooms have you in the house? I have five rooms and a kitchen.
496. Has each man a separate bed? Oh! yes.
497. Was any fault found with the condition of the house when you were visited by the police? None whatever.
498. Was the house unclean in any way? No.
499. Were the characters bad—did they keep late hours? No.
500. What led these seamen to prefer lodging at your house, when provision has been made for them by which they can lodge at a licensed house? My opinion is, that seamen in general dislike going to licensed houses; I have heard them express themselves so.
501. Do you say so, as a seaman, in this instance, or are you merely giving your opinion as a lodging-house keeper? As a seaman I say so; I have heard seamen frequently say so.
502. How long is it since you left following the sea as a vocation? About eight years.
503. Then you are not acquainted with the present Mercantile Marine Act? Not much.
504. You have not shipped under it? I have frequently shipped out of this Colony.
505. But not under the present Act? No, I think not.
506. Have you any further evidence to give? No; I merely wished to state my opinion, that seamen think it a great grievance to be compelled to go to licensed houses. (Vide Appendix B.)
507. When you were in the habit of going to sea eight years ago, as you say, at that time seamen were shipped, if my memory serves me right, by a number of individuals licensed as shipping masters? Yes, much in the same way as they are now.
508. Excepting that they could ship a seaman without going to the Shipping Office? No, they could not; I always had to ship out of this Colony at a Shipping Office, and always had to pay for discharging and shipping.
509. Have you been a seaman in any port of Great Britain? Yes, in England.
510. In the coasting trade? No, generally foreign.
511. Had you to pay there for shipping or for a discharge? I never paid anything out of England, or for discharge either.
512. Were registry tickets in vogue at that time in England? Yes.
513. Are you aware what led to the discontinuance of the register system in England? Because they caused the thing they were intended to remedy—I mean desertion; they were the cause of all the seamen leaving the country and going to America.
514. You know this of your own knowledge? I do.
515. How long was the Registry Act in operation? I think it did not last above four or five years.
516. Were there any disturbances in connection with that Act at Home? I am not aware of any open disturbance; I know there were a great many complaints about it, and dissatisfaction amongst the seamen.
517. And afterwards it was abolished? Yes.
518. By Mr. Allen: You say you are a lodging-house keeper? Yes.
519. Did you ever apply for a license for a seaman's lodging-house? No, I did not.
520. I think you remarked that the police visited your house and had no fault to find? I was never visited till I was served with a summons.
521. You had two seamen about two weeks? Yes.
522. And the police visited you because you had broken the law? Yes, they acted on an information that was laid at the Water Police Court before the Water Police Magistrate, and the Deputy Shipping Master prosecuted; this man that I spoke of laid the information, but he did not wish his name to appear on the warrant, and the Deputy Shipping Master took it up. I paid Mr. Moffat two guineas to plead for me, but he was not in attendance at the time, and although I requested the Water Police Magistrate to stay the proceedings till he appeared, he refused to do so. (Vide Appendix C.)
523. You say many sailors complain of having to go to the licensed lodging-houses? They complain of the law, and they have a very bad opinion of the licensed boarding houses. (Vide Appendix D.)

524. What is the nature of their complaint? They say they do not like them. Mr. J. Dunn.
525. Do they say they are dirty or badly kept? Yes. (Vide Appendix E.)
526. By the Chairman: Is this a general complaint? They mention that there is not a respectable one in Sydney; they say in general they are disreputable.* 15 Feb., 1861.
527. Seamen then, I understand, find fault more particularly because they, as a class, are obliged to live in lodging-houses licensed by law, while other classes are not? Yes. (Vide Appendix F.)
528. By Mr. Allen: Then the grievance is more imaginary than real? I think it is a real one.
529. By Mr. Douglas: Are you aware of the time when these regulations came into force—how many years ago? I am not quite certain of the time.
530. It was shortly after the discovery of the gold fields? Yes.
531. When there were a great many runaway seamen? Yes, I think seven or eight years ago.
532. Was it considered that this licensing of houses would lessen desertion? Yes, I believe that was what it was said it would do.
533. Do you think it did do so? No.
534. Or does it do so now? Not at all.
535. Has any good thing arisen out of the licensing of these lodging-houses, any thing whereby the sailors may be said to have benefited? None whatever.
536. You know of the existence in some ports of what are called Sailors' Homes? Oh! yes; I have stopped at one for years in London.
537. Have you known them in other English ports? Yes, and in America too.
538. Are they beneficial to sailors generally? Generally, they are.
539. Are they under any form of license? No.
540. They are provided, I suppose, by benevolent individuals, who wish that sailors should be properly lodged? I believe that is generally their intention. Seamen have more protection there, I think, than they generally have in private houses.
541. By the Chairman: Have you ever been in Sailors' Homes? Yes; I stopped for about fourteen years in the London Sailors' Home.
542. By Mr. Douglas: Has it ever been attempted to establish a Sailors' Home here? I believe they have been talking about it.
543. By the Chairman: In all cases, even where these Sailors' Homes exist, a large number of sailors prefer to lodge in private houses? Yes; the greater part in any port prefer it where they are acquainted.
544. During the time you resided in Sailors' Homes, were the establishments ever subjected to police inspection? None whatever; seamen would not go to them at all if they were.
545. By Mr. Douglas: Then one of the great objections to licensed lodging-houses is, that they are subject to police control—the lodging-houses as now existing in Sydney I mean? I think that is a means of making sailors dislike any such house.
546. I suppose sailors, if they come in with money in their pockets, are occasionally robbed in a seaport town like this—have you known instances of such being the case? I do not know that I know instances; I have heard of different instances.
547. Where do you suppose, from your general knowledge of sailors, that this generally takes place—have you ever heard of its being the case at these licensed houses? I cannot say I have; I have merely heard and read of different cases, but I cannot recollect where they happened, or how they happened; it generally happens by drink—getting intoxicated.
548. By Mr. Love: In speaking of these lodging-houses, you said that some of them were disreputable? That is the general opinion of sailors.
549. What meaning do you attach to the words "disreputable"? Well, that they are not very orderly.
550. There is a meaning attached to the word by some, which perhaps you do not mean to attach to it—what do you mean by "disreputable"? That they are not to be depended on; some of them, I say; I am speaking in general terms. (Vide Appendix G.)
551. Do you mean anything in the way of allowing women of the town to be there? No.
552. If a sailor were lodging in one of these houses, and thought proper to stay away all night, in another lodging-house or in a house of ill fame, is there any means to compel him to go home at a proper hour? No, not that I know of.
553. Then, in fact, although he is staying at a licensed lodging-house, he may be absent during the night anywhere? Oh, yes, a week if he likes.
554. By the Chairman: You say you have lived in a Sailors' Home? I have.
555. Is there any means of keeping seamen in these Sailors' Homes at night? No, not in any that I stopped in.
556. But I think, if my remembrance serves me right, that there is a means to keep them from coming in after a certain hour—they are not allowed to come in unless they have previously given notice of their intention to be out late? Yes, if they give notice the attendant will open the door at any time, but they are not allowed in after eleven o'clock without.
557. Nor if they come intoxicated? As long as a man behaves himself, no matter how intoxicated he is, he is admitted.
558. By Mr. Douglas: The object, then, of the Sailors' Homes which have been instituted is to afford cheap and wholesome lodging, where a sailor can get a clean bed and good and cheap food? Yes.

* NOTE (corrected by witness on revision, thus):—Not respectable.

Mr. J. Dunn, 559. Women of bad character I suppose are not admitted? Oh! no, not in any Sailors' Homes I know of.
 15 Feb., 1861. 560. Are women admitted into them as servants? They are not allowed near the premises. (Vide Appendix II.)

APPENDIX.

A.

Answer No. 494—ADDENDUM (by witness on revision):—I beg to state, that civilians also think the law a great hardship on them, as in these Colonies it is often very difficult to tell who are sailors, as at one time they are diggers or labourers, or anything else; and to make certain, they would have to question almost every one that came to their house.

B.

Answer No. 506—ADDENDUM (by witness on revision):—When they would prefer going to a friend, a relative, or an acquaintance.

C.

Answer No. 522—ADDENDUM (by witness on revision):—I wish also to state that the two seamen I had were also summoned or subpoenaed to give evidence against their will, and which they bitterly complained of.

D.

Answer No. 523—ADDENDUM (by witness on revision):—In general, but their chief objection to them is the idea of being coerced to go there; they wish to be free when on shore, and they often ask is this a free country, with such a law in force?

E.

Answer No. 525—ADDENDUM (by witness on revision):—Several of them.

F.

Answer No. 527—ADDENDUM (by witness on revision):—And the £5 paid for keeping a license is taken out of them, by stinting them in their living or some other means.

G.

Answer No. 550—ADDENDUM (by witness on revision):—I wish to recall the word "disreputable," and substitute the words "not very respectable."

H.

Answer No. 560—ADDENDUM (by witness on revision):—I mean women of doubtful character. In some Sailors' Homes respectable females are taken as servants, such as cooks; and in Mr. Green's Home in London there are some women servants; but in the principle one in London—I mean the one in Well-street—there are no women at all, and I think it a much better plan.

Mr. William Rowbotham called in and examined:—

Mr. W. Rowbotham, 561. By the Chairman: What are you? A seaman.
 562. Out of this port? Yes.
 563. Are you acquainted with the regulations of the port? Yes.
 15 Feb., 1861. 564. Have you any cause of complaint as to the way in which the seamen of this port are treated—are they treated in a manner which is not usual in other ports? Yes. I think it is very unjust to tax us with paying for our discharge. About twelve months ago I was obliged to remain on shore in consequence of having no discharge, and pay a pound a week for my board and lodging. Mr. Shorter would not allow me to go in a ship called the "Conreddin Lachman," because I had mislaid my discharge. I had previously arranged with the captain to go in the vessel, and went to the Shipping Office for the purpose of signing the articles, but on arriving I found I had not my discharge. I went back to the boarding-house, could not find it, and did not find it for some time after. He asked me if I could borrow 4s., 2s. for to make an affidavit that I had lost my discharge, and 2s. to give him for another; I told him I could not, as I did not wish to be in debt to anybody; and then he said, if you can get 2s. for the affidavit I will trust you the other 2s. till you come back. I said I could not get it. "Well, then," he said, "I cannot ship you." I afterwards shipped on board a vessel called the "Alice," to China, and returned here with a cargo of sugar from the Phillipine Islands. After attending one of Mr. Love's meetings at the Woolpack Inn, I was accosted by Wilson, one of the runners of the Shipping Office—men who run after seamen to see that they go on board their ships when they have signed articles, or send them up when the vessel is about to sail—they are a great nuisance. Wilson met me in George-street, and said, "Weren't you at Love's meeting? I said, "I was." He said, "I know it. I not only saw you, but heard you." "Did you hear anything wrong?" said I. "Well, never mind," said he, "but it will be a long time before you get a ship again." He said this because he had heard me speaking the truth about the way the Shipping Office is worked. If these runners have any particular friend among the sailors who are waiting to ship, they nod to him to come in, and if I wanted to go in to sign articles, it would be—"Keep back you, you are not wanted."
 565. What power have they to tell you to keep back? They act as constables at the Shipping Office.
 566. And in the capacity of constables keep you out of the Shipping Office? Yes.

567. And in the capacity of runners they take any one in they think proper? Yes; whoever they take a fancy to, and whoever a boarding-house keeper may wish to get shipped. A boarding-house keeper will bring down his men, and say to the runner, "There are three men standing out there, I wish you would get them a ship;" and then those three men are called in and I am left out.
568. You think the boarding system acts injuriously to seamen with regard to giving a preference to those men who are in debt to the lodging-house keepers? Yes.
569. That the lodging-house keepers make interest with these men you call runners, and by that means obtain a preference for men who are in their debt? Decidedly so, frequently.
570. How would this benefit them? Because these men they speak for are men over head and ears in debt, and the lodging-house keepers generally receive their month's advance as part payment, and trust for the rest on the return of the vessel.
571. How can they make sure of receiving that? If the advance note is issued to the seaman, they will take care to get it; they will not let him take his clothes out of the boarding-house till he gives up his advance.
572. They get his advance note? Yes; it is a printed form, to this effect:—"This is to certify that I agree to pay the bearer £3 in advance, provided he sails in the above ship, within three days after the departure of the ship."
573. £3, or any other sum, as the case may be? Yes, whatever may be the monthly wages. This note is signed by the brokers, and at any time it is as good as money.
574. How do you mean as good as money; if you had a £5 note, you could get £5 for it, but if you have a £5 advance note, would you get £5 for that? You would have to pay a shilling in the pound discount for waiting the three days.
575. Would that be charged to the seaman—would the seaman have to pay for cashing the note? Yes, of course.
576. Have you been a seaman at Home? I have followed the sea thirty-one years.
577. Have you lived in a Sailors' Home? Yes.
578. What is the advantage of a Sailors' Home? The advantage of a Sailors' Home, as far as my knowledge leads me, is that seamen, on returning home off a voyage, have a comfortable place to go to, where no crimps or tailor's runners, or any parties liable to impose on seamen, are admitted; and you can register your money, if you feel inclined to do so, leave it in the Savings' Bank, or send it to any part of the United Kingdom, free of expense. Masters of vessels make a practice of coming to the Sailors' Homes to select their crews, and undoubtedly those men residing in the Home have the first preference. If they find any indifferent characters amongst them they generally expel them, after giving them a reprimand once or twice, so that it has every advantage. It is kept up in a very respectable manner, supported by voluntary contributions, and the seamen are made perfectly comfortable. I lived in the Sailors' Home in Wells street three or four years, and also in Mr. Green's.
579. Are these establishments subject to police visitation? Not that I am aware of; I never saw a policeman inside the door.
580. What objection exists to the present system of licensed lodging-houses—are you aware? Supposing I had a sister or a brother, or any near relative here in the town of Sydney, and did not wish to mix with the common class of men, and wished to keep myself aloof from indifferent society, I would not be allowed to do so; except they pay a license they are under the fear of the police entering the house and ascertaining that I am following the sea and boarding with them, and then they are finable £5 for the first time, and, if fined again, it will be doubled. I think that very hard, because there are many men, I for one, who do not prefer going into these licensed boarding-houses. I would rather go to a private house at any time. I am not one of the fellows that likes to ramble about the streets and disgrace myself. I came first to this Colony 28 years ago. ●
581. Do you think that the power of police visitation has any weight with seamen in causing them to object to these lodging-houses? No, I do not think it has.
582. Do you think seamen like to be under police supervision more than any other class of men? No, I think not.
583. Then you think it is an objection? I do not see why we should be subject to police visitation more than any other class.
584. Are you aware of any other mode in which seamen are subject to police visitation more than any other class of men? I cannot say I am myself.
585. Have you any further communication to make on the subject? There is another very unjust thing, I think, on seamen. In the coasters men are compelled to work from six to six, discharging, perhaps, 60 or 70 tons of coals in the small vessels where there are only two or three men, and then compelled to keep watch at night—and if they do not do so, the man that ought to be on the watch is fined—it is hard work for that man to keep his eyes open. I think from six to six is quite long enough to work, without being compelled to keep watch.
586. Do they not frequently go to sea on the same evening when they discharge? Yes, very frequently. There are plenty of men in this port who would be very glad to take a watchman's berth. It is nothing but right a watch should be kept; and I would rather that those in charge should be seafaring men, so that they would know what to do when asked by the police—such as running out a warp or anchor. In one employment in this town, I have been repeatedly eye-witness to very great hardship that exists among them—that is Mr. Manning's. A boat will come in at eight or nine o'clock, and orders are left to discharge her immediately; and perhaps at eleven o'clock that same night the men are called out of another boat to go into that boat to sea, or lend a hand to unload her—although they ought to be in their beds—after working all day for less wages than any other Company is giving in the port.

Mr. W.
Rowbotham.
15 Feb., 1861.

587. By Mr. Allen: Do you know of any injustice to the seamen that has grown out of the boarding-house system, further than that it compels them to go and lodge in these particular houses? No, I do not.

588. Were you in this country before the Act was passed? I was.

589. Do you remember the outcry that used to be amongst the people here, against the crimps that followed the sailors about and dogged them? Yes, I remember it very well.

590. Do you think the sailors' boarding-houses and the Merchant Seamen's Act have in any way contributed to do away with that imposition on the sailors? I have no doubt they have in some measure.

591. This 2s. that is charged, is it for a discharge? For a discharge.

592. Are you aware that a similar charge is made in England under the new Act. Yes, I have been charged with it in England.

593. With respect to these boarding-house keepers, you say they obtain a preference for their own customers, in order to get paid—could you suggest any plan by which they could not do that? I cannot say that I could suggest any plan.

594. It is natural for them to take means to get their money if they can? Oh! yes.

595. But these runners, I do not feel quite satisfied with their conduct as reported by you——? You may depend upon it that if there was a change in the Shipping Office, and impartial men allowed to remain there, things would be much better; there would not be half as much fault to find.

596. You think there is more fault to be found with the mode of carrying it out than with the law itself? I think there is quite as much, with respect to Captain Shorter, as he calls himself, and these two runners.

597. When an advance note is presented at the end of three days, is the full amount paid? The full amount is paid.

598. It is only while passing from hand to hand that the discount is charged? It is paid to the party who presents it, but he deducts the discount from the seaman; the seaman cannot get it changed without paying the discount.

599. And then when it comes to be paid, it is paid in full? Yes.

600. By the Chairman: Have you ever known a larger amount than five per cent. to be charged? Yes.

601. Does it not depend upon the character of the man holding the note? In some instances.

602. For instance, a shifty man, who could not be trusted to go on board the ship, would hardly get any one to cash a note of this description at all? Very likely; that has frequently been the case.

603. By Mr. Allen: You have said that you object to lodge in a licensed house, that you would prefer a friend's house? Yes.

604. Do you know of any person who has been fined, under the Lodging-house Act, for boarding with a sister, brother, mother, or any other relation? No, I do not.

605. You complain that seamen are compelled when in harbour to work from six to six, and then keep watch—can you suggest any plan by which that could be remedied? Yes, by employing as watchmen some of the old sailors now walking about Sydney, who are unfit for sea service, and who would be very glad to accept the position of watchman; or do as they do in the New Zealand Company, the man who keeps watch is off duty all next day; that is a very reasonable request, I think, that they might make on any shipowner.

606. It is spoken of as a grievance that seamen are met in the street by constables, and without any further reason than the suspicion that they are runaway sailors are confined until dealt with, and that whether they are runaway seamen or not, they have no means of getting released until they are brought before the Magistrate—do you think that is a grievance of a general character, or only an occasional thing? I think it is a general grievance, decidedly so.

607. That men are taken up in the streets on the mere suspicion that they are runaway sailors, although they may be on their legal business? Yes; they may be sent on shore by the captain, for anything the policeman knows; if a man tells the policeman that, very likely he will say, never mind, I will put you in the watch-house, and hand you over to the captain in the morning; as was the case about six weeks ago, with a man belonging to an American ship, who was picked up in Wynyard-square by a constable, put in the watch-house all night, and brought before Captain North in the morning, and proved not to be a deserter.

608. Was anything done to the constable that apprehended him? Nothing.

609. He was not censured or anything? Not at all.

610. By Mr. Lewis: Do you think these licensed seamen's lodging-houses are objectionable on the whole to the sailors? I do.

611. I understood you to say awhile ago that these lodging-house keepers go to the Shipping Office, and make interest for the shipping of those who lodge with them? They make interest with these parties at the Shipping Office.

612. Do you not think that is beneficial to the sailors, that they gain their shipment through these means? It may be beneficial to those seamen in the long run, but so far it is not beneficial that the generality of these licensed boarding-house keepers will endeavour to retain the seaman on shore until his month's advance has been run out, and then it is to his interest to get this man out of the way as quick as he can, and by making friends with these runners he is enabled to do so.

613. You mean to say the lodging-house keeper does this for his own pecuniary benefit? Yes; were such things as this not to exist, I or any other man, whenever we thought proper to leave the shore, could go down and ship, without any person making interest for us.

614. By Mr. Douglas: How many runners are there at the Shipping Office? Two.

615. Are they paid by the Government? Yes.
616. From the nature of your answer just now, I should infer that they make a good thing out of it? They do, indeed; no doubt of it.
617. The lodging-house keepers, I suppose, are pretty much at the mercy of these men, if they like to inform against them? They very frequently inform against lodging-house keepers, if they find they have seamen boarding with them, and they have not a license out. I have known a person named Wallach, who keeps a clothier's shop in George-street, bring men down to the Shipping Office, call the attention of one of the runners to them, and say, these are men that I want to have shipped; all right, the runner would say, let them stop there.
618. You stated that the men in the employment of the Illawarra Steam Company were subject to considerable hardship by having to go to sea again at night—are you aware whether there is any express stipulation in their agreements which binds them to do so if required? Yes; they do not sign articles under the captain; they sign under the Company to be at their orders at any hour, which I think is a very unjust way of doing things;—why not have it as formerly, to sign articles for one vessel in particular.
619. You state also that this Company gives a lower rate of wages? Yes.
620. What are the characters of the men in the employ of this Company—do they get good characters as seamen? Yes, they are generally very good seamen.
621. How do you account for the fact that this Company is able to get a good class of seamen, if the wages are lower and they are subject to these inconveniences? A great number of the men that have been serving Mr. Manning lately have been men who have been what is termed regularly hard up—short of money, and in debt to the boarding-houses, and consequently glad to get anything to do; sooner than run any further into debt they go and hire for a certain length of time with Mr. Manning, but whenever they get anything that suits them better, they do not stop with him.
622. By Mr. Love: I think one of your grounds of complaint at the meeting you have spoken of was that you could not get into the Shipping Office unless you bribed the runners? Yes.
623. That was some time ago? Yes.
624. Has there been any change for the better lately? I have not been down to the Shipping Office since the election took place until about ten days ago; and then, whether it was through the medium of the runners, or what was the cause of it I do not know, but, after the captain had taken my previous discharge, and called me in to sign the articles, there was a little conversation between Mr. Shorter, the captain, and the mate of the vessel, and my discharge was handed back to me, and they told me they did not want me. That was the schooner "Rebecca," Captain Devlin.
625. By the Chairman: You have reason to believe that the Shipping Master influenced these men against you? I have every reason to believe it was done through the medium of the runners.
626. By Mr. Love: And you think that was in consequence of your having complained of the runners having taken bribes? Yes.
627. Are you aware of your own knowledge that these men have taken bribes? No; only what I have previously stated, that I know the boarding-house keepers bring down their men, point them out to the runners, and leave them outside.
628. You are not aware for a fact whether they have taken bribes or not? No.
629. You have only heard it? I have only heard it; but from the whole tenor of Wilson's conversation a few nights after your meeting I have every reason to believe such is the case, by his saying I should be some time before I got a ship. I have no doubt that if the thing was sifted properly, we should find men in Sydney who have given them money; I think it would not be a very difficult matter to ascertain the fact.
630. By Mr. Douglas: If you wished to ship, is your only means to present yourself to these runners in the office? Yes.
631. Then in fact you cannot ship unless you go through the ordeal of their approval—it amounts to that? It amounts to that. I may make what arrangements I like with the captain, but if these men who stand at the door do not think proper to let me in and sign the articles, they may bias the captain, or bias Captain Shorter, and prevent me from shipping.
632. Do you mean to say they absolutely refuse to admit you if you make the demand? I have never gone so far as to try, because they have always told us they would lock us up if we came near the door.
633. Have you ever been so threatened? No; because I have never put it in their power; as soon as they have told me to stand back, I have gone back.
634. Have you known any men who have been so threatened? Yes, I know it has been frequently said at the Shipping Office.
635. Then it is quite possible that if any man was hard up, he might bribe these runners to get put on a ship's books? Yes, it is quite possible. A few mornings after that runner had spoken to me, after Mr. Love's last meeting, a vessel called the "William Watson" was going to sign articles, and he said, "I suppose, since we have been shown up in the papers, we must keep back ourselves;" and he walked back and said, "You can all go in—the whole crowd if you like." That was the only morning that he came away from the door and admitted any one in.
636. By the Chairman: May I ask—you may please yourself about answering the question—have you been troublesome on board ship while under engagement, so as to get a bad character? Never in my life. I can produce testimonials now as good as any man's, and I do not care who sees them.

Mr. W.
Rowbotham.

15 Feb., 1861.

Mr. W. Rowbotham. 637. Will you shew your testimonials to the Committee? Certainly. (The witness produced a number of certificates of character, obtained from various persons at different ports.) In this Colony they merely give you a common discharge without any character at all. I have been in the British Navy as a quarter-master.

15 Feb., 1861.

638. I should like to have one of these put in as an Appendix, if you can spare it, to shew the form? Certainly. This is what we ought to have here. (The witness handed in one of the certificates in question. Vide Lithograph—Separate Appendix.)

639. You said that at Home 2s. was charged for shipping? Yes, shipping and unshipping.

640. In the coasting trade does that exist? No, it does not extend to the coasting trade.

641. It is only for foreign vessels the charge is made? Yes.

642. By Mr. Douglas: How long is your experience of this port? Twenty-eight years.

643. I see one of these certificates is of late date in England? I have been backwards and forwards in all trades and in all capacities. I have had charge of prizes in Her Majesty's service going down to the West Coast of Africa and to St. Helena. I have also a certificate from the master of a surveying vessel called the "Tartarus," previous to my getting a chief officer's berth on board a British barque. I had no certificate of service or of competency with me at the time, and the English Consul would not allow me to go in the vessel unless I could get one. Having been in the service ten years, I immediately went on board, and asked the sailing master to put me through an examination. He asked me a few questions, said he was quite satisfied, and gave me the certificate.

| CAPT. MORIARTY, | | MR. LEWIS, |
| MR. STEWART, | | MR. ALLEN. |

DANIEL C. DALGLEISH, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Charles Smith, Esq., called in and examined:—

C. Smith, Esq. 644. By the Chairman: You are a shipowner, I believe? I am.

645. You are also a member of the Pilot Board? I am.

646. You are conversant with the ordinary mode of procedure under the Colonial Merchant Seamen's Act? Yes, I should say I was.

5 Mar., 1861.

647. Are you aware that that Act is complained of by seamen as oppressive? Do you allude to the Act that was passed last year?

648. I allude to the law affecting merchant seamen as a whole, not merely with regard to the short Act passed last Session for the transhipment of seamen? I think they complain more of the way that the law is carried out, than of the law itself.

649. With respect to the short Act passed in 1860, authorizing the transfer of seamen from one vessel to another belonging to the same owner, do you consider that oppressive? It is an Act very liable to be abused.

650. I believe seamen take very strong prejudices in regard to the vessels they sail in? Not only in regard to the vessels, but also to the masters they sail under.

651. And this would render any compulsory change of master or vessel liable to objection on their part? No doubt.

652. You say that the objection of seamen lies more against the mode of carrying out the Act than against the Act itself, will you explain your views on this matter? In the first instance, there are a good many objections in regard to the shipping and discharging of seamen.

653. What do you conceive to be objectionable in the mode of procedure now followed? There is a good deal of objection raised by masters of vessels in this way—that, when they go down to the Shipping Office to ship their men, the Shipping Master will not put the men's names on the list unless he is there present himself.

654. The Act to which you allude is the 23rd and 24th Vict., No. 11? I allude to the 17th Vict., No. 36; the complaint against the whole of the present system is, that the facilities given for shipping seamen here are not so great as those given in England. They have to take very much more trouble about the matter. Then again, in regard to shipping the men, the boarding-house keepers get the men's discharges from them when they come into their house, and the result is, that these parties will not afterwards give them up, when these men require to ship, without applying to a Magistrate. The men owe them money, and they hold the discharge until they are paid, knowing that the men cannot ship without it. Such a thing as this is unknown in England, as there they cannot hold the men's discharges for an amount over five shillings.

655. You consider then that the Seamen's Lodging Act is likewise at fault—that it also is in fact a grievance? No, not a grievance, for I look upon it as being for the seamen's protection; but then it is not carried out here as it is at Home. At Home a seaman is not obliged to go to a boarding-house to live; for, if he has a father, or a brother, or a cousin, he may go and stop with him. If he goes to a boarding-house the house ought to be licensed, because certain recommendations as to the persons being of good character are required, which acts as a surety before such licenses are granted; and all this helps to provide a safeguard for the seamen.

656. Are there licensed lodging-houses for seamen in England? *Yes, I believe there are. I sailed mostly out of Liverpool, and am certainly under the impression that they were licensed there.

C. Smith,
Esq.

5 Mar., 1861.

657. By Mr. Stewart: Are they established generally in the seaports of Great Britain; or are they confined to the two chief seaports of London and Liverpool? They are not general, I believe. I do not think there are any in seaport towns of Scotland; but, in all the large seaports of England, I think they have the seamen's lodging-houses licensed.

658. By the Chairman: They are not general? I can hardly say. I speak mostly from my experience of Liverpool, as that was the port which I knew best.

659. And it is not compulsory on the seamen to go to them? I am not aware of the precise arrangements; but I think that, with regard to seamen's lodging-houses, they have the same law there as here. I know that they have these seamen's lodging-houses at Home, and that seamen are not obliged to go and live there, when they have friends with whom they may wish to stay.

660. However, you complain, as an owner of vessels, that your time is needlessly wasted, and that much delay is occasioned by the many forms with which you have to comply in shipping the hands you may require? No doubt.

661. In this respect, then, you consider that the law should be revised? The law is a good one, if carried out in its integrity. The law is just the same as that at Home, and is a very good one if carried out liberally; but, in saying this, I do not speak in regard to that Act we have just spoken of, which is not at all in accordance with the English law.

662. By Mr. Stewart: Your last remark applies to the Act which authorizes the changing of seamen from one vessel to another of the same owner? Yes. That Act is altogether contrary to the whole intent and spirit of the English law, as it is attempted to be carried out here.

663. By the Chairman: We have it in evidence that, in this Colony, it is competent for a policeman to take into custody any person he may meet in the streets and whom he may suspect of being a runaway seaman;—this is the power given to constables under the Colonial Act—is it the same in the English Act? It might be as well to put some check on this power, if they have it; but I rather think it is under some old Colonial Act, that has reference not to seamen only, but to every one else in the Colony just the same.

664. By Captain Moriarty: Would it not, in your opinion, be an advantage to consolidate all the laws relating to merchant seamen into one Act? No doubt it would.

665. By the Chairman: I presume that you are well acquainted with the nature of the duties which merchant seamen are called upon to perform? I am very well acquainted with them.

666. We have had complaints before this Committee, from seamen working on board Colonial steamers, with regard to the oppressive hours of labour they are compelled to submit to; and, on their complaining at being overworked, they have been punished for refusing to obey lawful commands to work, although they had expressed their utter inability to do so, from fatigue—do you consider that to be just, when the vessel was at the wharf for instance? It would be a very difficult thing for me to answer that, unless I knew the amount of labour they were required to do, and the time they had been employed at it.

667. The facts are these. The vessel was supposed to leave Shoalhaven, I believe, at five o'clock in the morning, and the hands were employed in taking in and stowing cargo until nine o'clock. They called at two or three other ports on their way, taking in and discharging cargo at each, arriving at midnight at the wharf in Sydney. They were then ordered to discharge the inward cargo, and to load the outward cargo, in order that they might go to sea at once. After discharging the deck cargo, the seamen refused to proceed further in discharging the cargo from the hold. In consequence of this they were apprehended on warrant, although they expressed their utter inability, from fatigue, to work longer; and what is more, were fined for a disobedience of what were held to be lawful commands. Now do you consider such a mode of treatment to be just or fair? I should say not, taking the case as you express it.

668. From what you know of seamen, and their duties, you would consider this as being over what was naturally to be expected from them as labouring men? Certainly. This is one of the ways in which I think the new Act is calculated to work harshly; for it may happen that the men on board a steamer may have been up all night with bad weather, on their passage to Sydney, and on arriving here may find another steamer of the same owner short of hands, and just about to go out. Well they are liable to be called upon to go in her, and if they are, and the weather should still continue bad, they will be up another night also. This, I consider, is too much to ask of any men, and, in this respect, I regard the Act as very oppressive.

669. In the coasting trade of Great Britain there is no check imposed in the way of shipping or discharging seamen, as there is here? I am not aware; I have not been in Great Britain since that Act—the Coasting Act—has been in force.

670. You have already stated, that you believe the Act for licensing seamen's lodging-houses is a benefit? Yes, I think so.

671. Will you state the reasons which lead you to that conclusion? Because it brings them more immediately under the eyes of the police. The men who keep them must have good characters, or they will not be licensed, and they have also to find sureties for their good conduct. By licensing them, you keep them under the eyes of the police, whereas, it is

* NOTE (by witness on revision):—In regard to this and the three following answers, I find, on reference, that lodging-houses are not licensed at Home; and, as I have been in many instances giving my views as to what would be a benefit to the sailors here, I would prefer being re-examined on this point. (Re-examined accordingly. Vide Proceedings, 27th March, 1861.)

C. Smith,
Esq.
5 Mar., 1861.

is well known, that, without the licensing system, they get spread about the town, in all directions, and there is no knowing where the men lodge. We all know, too, that, when sailors come ashore with money in their pockets, they are very improvident and careless, and this licensing is a protection to them, because, if the lodging-house keepers behave badly, they are more likely to be brought to justice from his residence being known. Where I think the Lodging-house Act wrong is, that men are not allowed to go where they think proper, supposing them to have a friend or relation with whom they might wish to stop; but I do not think that such a thing as this was anticipated when the Act was passed.

672. By Captain Moriarty: You think it should not be compulsory on the seaman to go anywhere unless he chooses? No, not if he has a friend or relative to go to.

673. There is no particular reason, you think, why a seaman, more than any other person, should be compelled to go to a particular place to lodge? I see none. He ought to be allowed to go where he pleases. It is only those houses where they make a practice of boarding seamen that should be licensed.

674. By the Chairman: When you spoke of seamen's boarding-houses, in England, might you not have been alluding to Sailors' Homes? No, they are quite distinct things. The Sailors' Homes are kept up by public subscription, and are different, in other ways, from boarding-houses. Some of them are kept up upon a very large system, and have been founded and maintained by public subscription.

675. By Mr. Stewart: Chiefly supported, I believe, by the contributions of philanthropic individuals? Yes.

676. By the Chairman: That was their origin, but they are now, I believe, mostly self-supporting? Yes, I believe they are, or nearly so.

677. In speaking of lodging-houses, I understood you to say, that the lodging-house keepers kept back the discharges of the seamen, as security for the amount of their bill, whatever it may be? Yes; I believe, in many instances where seamen are in debt, the lodging-house keeper not only withholds the discharge, but objects to the men going away in some particular ship from which he will not be able to procure such an advance as will pay the lodging-house keeper's claim.

678. Does that appear to you to be an objectionable practice? No; I do not think the lodging-house keeper is particularly to blame in the matter, because private individuals would do precisely the same; but what I object to is, that the Shipping Master should permit such things to be done.

679. By Mr. Stewart: There is nothing in the Act to justify persons in holding a seaman's papers as security for debt? No; and they know it, for they deliver up the discharge immediately, when a person acquainted with the law goes and demands it.

680. Then this is not an abuse of the Act, but an abuse of authority under the Act? Yes, and a very great one, and it arises only from parties who have the carrying out of the Act allowing it to be done.

681. By the Chairman: Do you consider that the charge to the seaman of two shillings, on the completion of his agreement, is a just charge? Yes, I do—very just.

682. A seaman may be in your employment continuously, for years, but be obliged, by law, to sign agreements with you, from three months to three months, and though he does not leave your employment, or your ship, he still has to pay his two shillings every three months—do you think this right? Yes, I think so. I pay the Shipping Master every three months for engaging him, and it is only reasonable that he should pay for his discharge. Every thing in regard to this matter should stand on its own bottom, and as we keep a staff of officials to protect seamen, it is only reasonable that they should be made to pay some portion of the expense those officials entailed.

683. Are you aware whether this establishment pays its own expenses? Yes, and considerably more than pays them.

684. And, as this establishment considerably more than pays its expenses, do you think it right that it should be made the means of extorting revenue out of the wages of seamen, who are the most underpaid class in the community? I do not know that. I think the sailor is paid quite equivalent to what other classes are getting.

685. When he gets £3 a month? They are getting now from £3 10s. to £4 per month, with their keep; and it is well known that it is of no use to give seamen any thing that is not of the best. So that they are really paid better than most working men.

686. Wages in this community are generally considered in relation to the wages paid at Home, so that, comparing the wages paid to seamen sailing out of these ports with those paid to seamen at Home, and comparing also the wages paid to other working-men here with those paid to them at Home, I conceive that I am justified in saying that they are the most underpaid portion of our population? Seamen are like every other class in the community; their wages will always be regulated by the law of supply and demand. They must depend upon this. A little time back they were getting £8 and £9 a month, solely because their services were in demand. So that they are altogether like every other class.

687. I do not wish you to consider my question in regard to anything except the surplus of the Shipping Fund; and I wish to ask you if a revenue ought to be raised in this way from the wages of seamen, it being a direct tax on their labour; and I allude to the fact of their being lowly paid merely to show the greater injustice of the charge? Where there is a surplus not expended in keeping up the necessary staff some reduction might be made. There ought only to be so much revenue derived as will be sufficient to keep up the staff necessary for the seamen's protection.

688. And where there is a surplus after paying expenses? That ought not to be. The establishment ought to bring in a revenue sufficient to keep up an efficient staff, but no more.

689. Under the Imperial Act I believe that no such charge as this is made, neither is it necessary necessary for the seaman to go to a Shipping Office to sign articles? In answer to this I may say that I am not aware how the Imperial Act is carried out in regard to coasting business.

C. Smith,
Esq.

5 Mar., 1861.

690. Will you look at clause 149 of the Act 17 & 18 Viet., cap. (Act produced), and tell the Committee the construction it bears? I have now read that clause, and it appears to me that it is as much as to say that we may make laws for our own guidance in regard to our coasting trade. Any vessel trading from here to Newcastle or Moreton Bay, or any place along our coast would be bound by any laws we may pass; but a vessel sailing from here to the Mauritius or to India, or to any foreign port would come under the operation of the Imperial Act. The same Act would apply to them as would apply to British ships sailing out of British ports; and when they got to the Mauritius they would find that they would be dealt with under the Imperial Act in regard to anything that may have taken place on the voyage.

691. You will observe however that this clause shews that it is not necessary at Home for the seaman to sign articles at the Shipping Office? So it would appear.

692. By Mr. Lewis: Do not these vessels when here come under the Colonial Act as well as the Imperial Act? I hardly comprehend the question.

693. You say that foreign-going vessels come under the operation of the Imperial Act; but, in coming from a foreign port here, do they not come under the operation of our Colonial Act as well as under the Imperial Act? No. All foreign-going vessels trade under the Imperial Act. If, however, they are put in the coasting trade, then they come under our Acts, as we are empowered to frame laws in regard to our own coasting trade; these laws, however, have no force beyond our own boundaries.

694. By Mr. Stewart: In fact, our own laws can only be enforced within our own jurisdiction? Of course.

695. By the Chairman: I have this Act laid before you for the purpose of drawing your attention to the points contained in the 149th clause, and so of eliciting your opinion as to whether there is anything in the management of seamen in this Colony that would prevent them from having the same liberty here, when shipping in Colonial vessels for the Colonial trade, that they would have when shipping in British vessels for the coasting trade of Great Britain? I am not aware of there being anything to prevent them.

696. They are not so unmanageable here as to require to be bound down more than in England? I think not. I may mention that I have heard it said that the high wages in this port made seamen run away from English ships; and that, if it was left open to captains to sign articles on board their own ships, there would not be so many absconders. I think this remark is exceedingly fallacious; because, if once a seaman makes up his mind to leave a vessel, not all the laws you can pass will hold him or prevent him from getting off.

697. By Captain Moriarty: I should like to know your opinion on this fact—whether there is any necessity for a difference existing between the Act for the regulation of the coasting trade in England and the Act for the regulation of that trade here? Certainly not. It is my opinion, that, the more we assimilate our Shipping Acts to those of England, the better it will be for all parties, seamen as well as employers.

698. You said just now, that you considered it necessary for seamen to contribute something in support of the establishment made and kept up for their benefit; now, ought the exact sum that they should be called upon to contribute to be dependent upon the amount necessary for carrying out the purposes of the Act? Yes, certainly.

699. And he ought not to be called upon to contribute one farthing beyond the amount absolutely necessary to produce the effect desired? That is my opinion.

700. By the Chairman: Then I hold that you consider the Shipping Office, as established in Sydney, to be an incubus more than a useful institution? I consider that there might be very great improvements made in it.

701. As you think that our Colonial law should be assimilated to that of England, and as there are no Shipping Offices in England, of course that is equivalent to saying that the Shipping Office should be abolished? Not the abolition entirely. I take it in this way, that though in England you sign the ship's articles on board, yet it is thought necessary to have a duplicate copy of the articles to lodge in the Shipping Office. If this were omitted it would soon lead to very great irregularities.

702. But you would do away altogether with this unequal tax imposed on seamen, if you did away with the necessity for signing the shipping articles at the office? No, I think not, according to the present law.

703. Yes, but if the work of the department is all but abolished, that must be equivalent to abolishing the department? No. You might reduce the work so as to reduce the department, and so reduce the fee from seamen to one-half of what it is now; but I do not think it would be equitable to abolish the payment altogether.

704. You think then that foreign-going ships should still sign their articles at the Shipping Office? Yes; foreign-going vessels would have to do so, under the Imperial Act.

705. In coasting vessels, however, the seamen at Home sign articles on board ship, "a duplicate being sent to the Shipping Office"? This is not the law at Home, but I would recommend it to be adopted here, in lieu of the half-yearly returns required by the Home Act.

706. Is it not a custom in some ports to sign articles at the Custom House? No. They are always signed in proper Shipping Offices. The practise, as I understand it, and as it has been described to me by London captains, is just this:—The captain takes up with him to the office whatever hands he has, and wants to ship; they are called into a room with the Shipping Master, and the articles are read over to them. If he has not all the hands he wants, and requires more men, one of the persons in the office goes out in front, and calls out for any men who wish to ship in the vessel, giving her name; if any of them come in, the articles are read over to them also, and they sign them. The business of the master of the vessel is then done, for the Shipping Master sees that all the men who have signed articles go on board. The men are all known to him, and it is known where they lodge, and the Shipping Master looks to the lodging-house keeper to see the men go on board. In this way everything is more regular, whilst the master of the vessel has not one-tenth part of the trouble he has here.

707. Is not the Shipping Office sometimes in the Custom House? No.

708. By Mr. Stewart: In small seaports, is there not a room in the Custom House sometimes used as a Shipping Office? It may have been so, but there is a regular Shipping Office in every port now.

709. By Mr. Lewis: I understood you to say that there is no charge made to the seaman on his signing articles? No; neither here nor at home. The owner pays 2s. each for shipping the men; the men have to pay 2s. each for their discharges.

710. But there is no payment required for discharges at Home? Yes there is.

711. By Mr. Stewart: But not for seamen engaged in the coasting trade? No.

712. There is no reason for a different arrangement being made with regard to seamen employed in the coasting trade and those employed in other trades? Yes, there is; and I have already given one reason. It would never do for a captain to be at liberty to take a man who had no discharge, because it would lead to all sorts of irregularity; and, if the man must have a discharge, it must come from the Shipping Office in order to be authentic. He might be allowed to sign his men on board ship to the regular ship's articles, and then lodge a duplicate of the articles with the seamen's discharge at the Shipping Office. It would facilitate desertion and lead to all sorts of irregularity if the captain were allowed to sign all the men he chose on board his own ship, and without discharges.

713. The seamen then should have his discharge from the Shipping Office before he is entitled to ship again? Certainly.

714. By Captain Moriarty: You think that, if it were otherwise, a seaman would be likely to enter into a contract with one captain whilst he was actually under an engagement with another? Just so.

715. And that is one of the evils you contemplate if the discharges were not insisted on? It is.

716. By Mr. Allen: You are aware, perhaps, that it is the duty of this Committee to inquire into the social condition of the seaman as well as into the mode of shipping him; and I believe you have already given some evidence in regard to seamen's lodging-houses? I have.

717. On the whole, do you think that the establishment of seamen's lodging-houses has been an improvement upon the old plan of letting them go where they like? I think that the law is a very good one if it were carried out in a different form. As I take it, it was never intended, when the law was passed, that men should be forced to go to a licensed house to lodge.

718. I have the same impression. It can scarcely be said that the law forces him to go to these lodging-houses, though it is said to do so; and because a seaman happens to stop with a friend or relation, the fact of his doing so is scarcely sufficient to constitute that a seaman's lodging-house. It should be the general business of the House to make it come within the meaning of the Act. The Act, however, has been so strained as to compel all houses in which seamen lodge to be licensed, and this you consider to be objectionable? I consider that it is a benefit to have all these houses under license, in the first place, because they are thus more brought under the eye of the police; and, in the second place, a great deal more protection is provided for the seaman.

719. By the Chairman: I would draw your attention to one thing, and it is this—that Mr. North, in his examination before this Committee, has stated, that it is the opinion of the Attorney General that one seaman lodging in a publican's licensed house would constitute that a seaman's lodging-house, and, if not specially licensed for the purpose, permitting the seaman to lodge there would be a violation of the Seamen's Licensed Lodging House Act. This would be the case even as regards a publican who is specially licensed to keep a house of entertainment for travellers, who, though thus licensed, would be subject to fine if he permitted a seaman to live in his house? I certainly was not aware that such an opinion as this had been given; but I am very much of the same opinion as the Attorney General. I think that it is only right that where sailors really do lodge, and where such houses are really known to be seamen's lodging-houses, an opportunity should be given to the police to make some inquiry respecting them, so that they should not be legally authorized to carry on this business until they had complied with all the requirements of the Act; that is, until they had shewn themselves to be men of good character, and had provided sureties for their proper conduct.

720. By Captain Moriarty: But surely a publican's house, which has been already licensed by a Bench of Magistrates, after the fullest inquiry into the character of the man who is to keep it, and after exacting heavy sureties from him, must stand in a very different position from an ordinary boarding-house? Yes, certainly.

721. By the Chairman: You have frequently stated in the course of your examination, in speaking of the advantage of licensing these lodging-houses, that they would be more under the eye of the police: now does this remark apply to the seaman or to the lodging-house keeper—or does it apply to both of them, or to one more than another? I meant my remark to apply to the lodging-house keeper rather than to the seaman. We all know very well that when a seaman comes ashore off a voyage with plenty of money in his pocket, he rollicks about town, throwing his money away, getting drunk, and doing all sorts of foolish things. When he is in this state, he is very likely to fall into bad hands, and to get all his his money taken from him. It is, therefore, with a view to his protection, under such circumstances, that I say that the places where seamen live, which are the houses to which they will usually resort, should be known to the police, so that their eye might be always on them. At the same time it is a great advantage, as regards the seamen themselves, that the police should always know where they are.

C. Smith,
Esq.

5 Mar., 1861.

722. And you regard this license, then, as a kind of certificate from the Bench of Magistrates, that the lodging-house keeper is properly qualified to undertake the duty? Yes. At all events, it shews that there is nothing in the police records against these people, and that, so far, they are to be regarded as honest people.

723. You have some acquaintance amongst the captains of foreign-going ships? I have.

724. As there is some doubt whether the Seamen's Lodging-house Act is in force in Great Britain, you might, if you would be good enough to do so, verify the opinion you have already given by some further inquiries into the matter from the masters of foreign ships; you can then supplement your evidence by such further information as you may thus acquire? I will do so, with pleasure.

725. By Mr. Allen: It has been given in evidence before this Committee that it sometimes happens that sailors going through the streets are taken up by the police, on suspicion of being runaways, that they are confined in the lock-up, marched through the streets handcuffed, brought before the Police Court, and when tried are found not to be what they have been described—now do you think that sailors experience any hardship in being treated in this harsh way that no other class is exposed to? I think not, because all classes are exposed to the same thing. For instance, if you take out a warrant for a hired servant who has absconded, the police will apprehend any man who may answer the description, and yet this man may be innocent.

726. By Captain Moriarty: But that is a different case,—there you have a warrant from a Magistrate to authorize the arrest? I apprehend there is no difference, because the constable apprehending the hired servant would do so without having the warrant, and, perhaps, without having seen it.

727. By Mr. Allen: It has been given in evidence, that, some time about Christmas last, a sailor was taken up on suspicion of being a runaway from some ship or other; he was confined in the watch-house on that accusation during two nights; he was then brought before the Bench, tried, and declared not to be a runaway—do you not regard this as a hard case? It is a hard case, I quite admit that; but then it is a solitary case. It is well known that you cannot carry out any law without hardships to individuals.

728. In your opinion is the case I have quoted a solitary one, or is it one that often happens? From my knowledge I should say that there were very few such cases. I do not think that there are many seamen apprehended without warrants being out for them. Some years ago, when wages were high in the port, I remember that there were warrants upon warrants lying at the Police Court for the apprehension of seamen from all manner of ships. Well, these men would get away from Sydney, some in one direction, some in another; and a good many of them were in the habit of getting about Middle Harbour, where they got some kind of employment. Well, the police would go in that direction and sometimes come across as many as a dozen men together. Of course they would apprehend them all, and yet out of the lot there would be some two three perhaps who would not be identified, but who, nevertheless, were runaways equally with the others.

729. Mr. North's evidence goes to shew that of the number of sailors apprehended, independently of those charged with drunkenness and felony, the number actually convicted was something less than two-thirds of those apprehended—this, I presume, would shew a different state of things to what you conceive, and lead you to believe that the instance I adduced was not a solitary one? No. It is exactly as I have just now said. There are a great many men taken up as runaways, who might be convicted, but yet who are not. There may be no evidence against some of them, some may not be identified, and a good number are let off at the request of their captain, and sent back on board ship. The fact is, the general policy of all the Police Courts is not to convict a sailor and send him to gaol, unless you are obliged to do so.

730. By Mr. Stewart: Then the number of convictions, as compared with the apprehensions, is no fair indication of the men being unfairly apprehended? No, not at all.

731. By the Chairman: If a policeman is entitled to apprehend a man without a warrant, what becomes of the liberty of the subject? Every stranger passing through the streets would be liable to be apprehended by any policeman who may take it into his head to imagine him to be a runaway. In allowing this discretion to the police, do you not virtually violate the liberty of the subject? That is a very difficult question to answer, as so many points have to be taken into consideration. I may say, however, that I have seen persons brought into this town from the country in chains, on suspicion of being runaways, and yet they proved on examination not to be so. These men had been in many instances torn away from the means of getting their living, and yet they received no redress.

732. By Mr. Allen: That was when this was a penal Colony? Yes.*

733. At that time every free man required to have a pass if he wished to travel in the country? Yes; and every sailor required to have a pass from his officer if he only went ashore for a few hours.

734. By Captain Moriarty: That was many years ago? No, not so very many years back. However, we are growing out of all that gradually.

735. By the Chairman: However, in the case of a seaman, the mere venial offence of runaway from his ship should not subject him, on conviction, to be incarcerated with common thieves?

* NOTE (Added on revision):—And since.

C. Smith, Esq. thieves? I should decidedly say not; the further you keep the seamen from thieves and felons the better.

Mar., 1861. 736. Should seamen, in your opinion, be subjected to the indignity of being marched through the public streets handcuffed, and openly, under the escort of the police? That is a very difficult question to answer in the form in which you put it. Every man who has committed himself to such an extent, as that a warrant should be granted for his apprehension, subjects himself to be treated in this way. However, the less all this is done the better; but in saying this I do not state that there may not be cases in which it is necessary to do this.

737. I would point out to you that, after their conviction, seamen are manacled in pairs, and are marched under charge of the police openly through the streets to the goal—now do you think that such an exhibition is either proper in itself or pleasing to the feeling of the seamen? I am not prepared to answer that question. It takes two forms. With regard to some seamen, marching them through the streets in this manner would be as heavy a punishment as you could inflict on them, and would be so much felt, that it would prevent them from infringing the law a second time.

738. You would regard this exhibition then as part of the punishment? Yes.

739. If it is to be so regarded, ought it not to be detailed by the Magistrate in giving his decision? Perhaps it would be better that it should be so.

740. I have asked you these questions because I find that, for criminals of a deeper die, a public vehicle, closely enclosed, has been provided in order to keep them from the eye of the public. That being the case, I would ask you if there is anything so very repelling in the offence of absconding as to induce the authorities to cause the seaman to be paraded through the streets like a common felon, and then to be confined with felons? I certainly think it very objectionable to confine him with felons.

APPENDIX.

A.

I would recommend that all the Water Police Acts be revised and consolidated into one, with a view to abolish the stringent laws found necessary in the height of the gold fever, and would adopt in their stead the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, with a few necessary alterations fitting it to the requirements of the Colony; but even after the law is so amended, it can only be satisfactorily carried out by a Magistrate who is practically conversant with seamen and maritime matters, as most of those who sit at the Water Police Office are unacquainted with the duties of a sailor.

The Shipping Master should be distinct from the Magistrate.

THURSDAY, 14 MARCH, 1861.

Present:—

MR. LEWIS,
MR. LOVE,

CAPT. MORIARTY,
MR. WALSH.

DANIEL C. DALGLEISH, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

William Edgar Shorter, Esq., called in and examined:—

W. E. Shorter, Esq. 741. By the Chairman: You are aware for what purpose you have been requested to attend here? Yes.

14 Mar., 1861. 742. This Committee has been appointed for the purpose of examining into the working of the laws having reference to seamen? Yes.

743. Are you the Deputy Shipping Master of this Port? I am.

744. How long have you held that situation? Two years and three months on the last occasion; I held it before for twelve months, from 1856 to 1857, but the Assembly struck off two of the officers, and I vacated the office for a time.

745. I presume you are conversant with the Merchant Seamen's Act in force in this Colony? Yes.

746. Are you acquainted practically with the hours of labour on board ship? Yes.

747. Have you any deputy under you in the shipping department? No, I am the only deputy.

748. Have you any officer under you? There are two clerks in the office.

749. Are there any other subordinates under your charge? Two messengers.

750. Are they what Capt. North describes in his evidence as runners? They are the same.

751. What are their duties? To provide seamen for captains when they require them—they bring in seamen to be approved by the captains; to go on messages when required to do so; to look after seamen that have shipped in vessels and got advances; to put them on board their ships—in fact to do anything that is requisite in connection with the business of the office.

752. You say they have to provide seamen for captains when they wish to ship men here? They bring seamen from outside who are standing about for the arrival of captains that may want to ship men.

753. Does not this leave them to shew a preference to certain seamen over others? It may leave them some power.

754. Does it not do so? I think very seldom.

755.

755. In what way then can they select them if they have not the power of selecting whom they think proper? By calling out from my door that so many seamen are wanted for a certain ship, and that those who wish to engage may come into the office. That is the general course pursued. W. E. Shorter,
Esq.
14 Mar., 1861.

756. Do you think it is impossible for them to favour any particular boarding-house keeper with regard to the seamen so engaged? It is not impossible.

757. Do you think it is done? I do not think it is.

758. You have no knowledge of its being done? I have not, and I do not think it is.

759. If you had, what do you consider it would be your duty to do? To report it to the Shipping Master if they gave undue preference.

760. Do you consider that the law is equitable in its action to seamen and owners in this Colony? Yes, I do.

761. Is a written agreement necessarily entered into between seamen and captains or owners? It is, in order to conform to the laws.

762. Is a written agreement between seamen and owners so great a necessity as to require special legislation? It is, for the protection of seamen, and also for the protection of owners; as, if a captain could call a man on board ship as he pleased, and engage him, there would be only one copy of the articles; that might possibly be lost; there would be no proof of the shipment, of what they shipped for, the terms of their engagement, or anything.

763. Should not the agreement for the time be as binding on the owners as on the men? I consider it is equally so.

764. At present? Yes.

765. Do any cases of ship's or steamer's articles being thrown up before the completion of the time for which the agreement has been made come under your notice? Yes; frequently.

766. Is that the justice or the protection which you consider seamen obtain, to be discharged before the end of the time for which they have agreed? Excuse me, but I think you would imply by that question that they agree positively for a certain time, which they do not.

767. By Mr. Walsh: Suppose a crew sign articles for a voyage from London to Sydney and back, which is the usual form, is it not? Yes.

768. Do you know instances in which the crew have been discharged upon their arrival in Sydney? Yes, it is frequently done by mutual consent.

769. Have you known instances in which the crew have been discharged without their consent? No; it would be illegal to do so.

770. By the Chairman: Do you recognise that as a copy of ship's articles (handing a copy to witness)? Yes.

771. What is the agreement there entered into? That the crew are to go on voyages for any period not exceeding six calendar months.

772. Can the crew, having signed those articles, leave prior to six calendar months? No.

773. Can they be discharged? They can.

774. Is that equal justice to the crew and owner? Yes.

775. On what do you ground your opinion? I ground my opinion on this, that it is a benefit to seamen to sign in this manner, whereby they may be kept in a vessel for six months, as if they did not, seeing that steam-vessels are liable to break down constantly, they would only ship men for every voyage, or for not more than a month at a time, and would thereby oblige the seamen to make a new engagement each month. "Voyages," being in the plural number, they cannot discharge the men before two voyages.

776. Have you never known many cases where men have been discharged before they had made voyages? In some instances—one.

777. So that seamen are not practically protected, but, seeing that the owners can contract the time to any period they think proper—should wages fall that they can discharge them and re-engage them at a lower rate of wages—do you consider that to be equitable? I do not think it would be equitable if they were subject to very sudden rises or falls, which we are not here. It is seldom that any rise takes place so suddenly. The Port Curtis rush is the only instance I remember when there has been any very sudden rise.

778. What punishment is awarded to a seaman for a breach of his agreement? The punishment laid down in the 13th Victoria not exceeding thirty days for desertion, but it is in the power of the Justices to award so many hours if they like; that is in the Colonial Act, 13th Victoria.

779. What is the penalty on the owners? The penalty on the owners is two days' wages for one for ten days, if a man is kept out of his discharge or wages after being put out of his ship.

780. But the manner in which the articles are made out exempts the owner from any payment? Under such an agreement as this (referring to the articles produced.)

781. That agreement is sanctioned by law? It is sanctioned by law—I am not now speaking of the new Act, which I never approved of; for if under this a man shipped on board the "City of Sydney," and were transferred to the "Wonga Wonga" when the vessel arrived at Melbourne, the captain would have no hold upon the men, nor they upon him.

782. Is a Shipping Office a Government institution in any other country than this—I do not mean is it licensed by Government, but is it a Government institution, formed by it, and having officers paid by it? I am not aware how it is in England, it is so long since I left, but it is in Victoria, and I believe it is at Hobart Town.

783. You are called upon in the capacity of Shipping Master to act under the Imperial Act, it seems? Yes.

- W. E. Shorter, Esq.
14 Mar., 1861.
784. You will find this a copy of the Imperial Act—(handing the same to the witness)—will you turn to clause 162, the second rule? “Certificates for all trading ships.”
785. Is there any similar rule for the benefit of seamen in this Colony? There is no certificate granted in this Colony, excepting it is to act as pilots.
786. Are there any running certificates? No.
787. Look at clauses 167, 171, 173, and also at 174; are there any similar Acts here applying to seamen? We have a clause similar to the 167th in the Colonial Act.
788. You will observe that that will be with reference to English vessels, I say with regard to Colonial vessels, to persons signing articles for the Colonial trade? We have in the 17th Victoria a very similar clause.
789. But evaded by making out the articles in this form? I do not consider it an evasion, for it is an understood engagement.
790. Still it evades that rule of the English Act? No, it is equally applicable if they are discharged before the voyage it has been given.
791. Look at the 171st, 173rd, 174th, and 175th clauses of the same Act? The 171st “must deliver an account of wages.”
792. Is there anything similar to that in the Colonial Act? There is no Colonial law touching that.
793. 172nd? There are no certificates of competency.
794. The 173rd? Shipping Master may decide questions—I frequently have to decide questions—little quibbles about a day's wages more or less.
795. The 174th? I do not think we have anything in the Colonial law like that, but in the case of a British ship, we should call upon the master to hand over his official log.
796. The 175th, with relation to wages? We do not act upon that in this Colony. We do with all British ships, but not with Colonial.
797. Is it not equally necessary for Colonial vessels to have the advantage of a law like that? It would be a benefit to the captain to be able to shew the owners the amount of money he had paid, and that the ship was released from all claim on the part of the seamen.
798. And also to the seaman that he must have a copy twenty-four hours before payment? I think it would be a benefit to the seaman.
799. Do you remember the case of the “Norna”? I remember from the time the captain was brought up to be examined before the Water Police Magistrate—I heard nothing of the case before.
800. Did not the “Norna's” case involve a question of law under that clause of the Act? In regard to the payment of wages?
801. As to the Shipping Master's duty with reference to it? I think it did.
802. Will you look at the 231st clause—are such benefits as these secured by any Colonial Act to the seamen? No, I think not.
803. The 232nd and the 233rd, but more especially the 233rd—was the “Norna,” when in these waters, subject to the action of the Imperial Act? Yes.
804. Was it not your duty to punish any person who contravened that 233rd clause? I do not think it was my duty as I was acting under the Shipping Master.
805. The Shipping Master has given evidence that the more important part of the duty is performed by you—that has regard especially to the working of the Shipping Office, is that so; provided you had been the Shipping Master and not the Deputy Shipping Master, what would you have done? If I had been the Shipping Master I should have expected the money to have been paid to me, to be distributed amongst the crew.
806. It was the duty of the Shipping Master to have upheld, in its integrity, that clause? Yes.*
807. I think it points out that it was the Shipping Master's duty to see that the wages were distributed individually to the crew? I considered that by that law the money had no right to be paid to any one but the Shipping Master.
808. Do you not consider that it was his duty, as a Magistrate, to prosecute any person who took that money and applied it in contravention of that clause of the Act? If you will excuse me, I would rather not express an opinion upon the conduct of my superior officer.
809. Will you look at the 239th clause of the Act, which, with the following, are principally punishment clauses? Yes.
810. I think, as far as my reading serves me, every part of those punishment clauses is incorporated with the Colonial Act? Yes, if there are not the same words, there is the same meaning.
811. Then you observe that the benefits of the English law are not secured to the seamen although the punishments are fully secured to him? The punishments, according to the Colonial Act, are much less.
812. That is to say, imprisonment is for one month instead of three months? Yes.
813. Still, although the punishments are less in degree, in some instances they are all served out, and in some cases there are more punishments? I think they are less in degree, and I do not think there are so many punishments. For instance, the Board of Trade allows a certain scale of forfeiture which is embodied in the agreement, but we have nothing of the kind here.
814. Are not these minor offences punished by the Magistrates? Yes, but in England these matters are settled at sea, and the men are mulcted two days pay or three days pay as the case may be.

* NOTE (by witness on revision):—There is an inaccuracy in the answer to the question on the top of the 17th page, No. 806, in that, as in all other questions reflecting on the conduct or duties of my superiors in the Shipping Office, I requested leave to decline giving an answer.

815. Are these forfeitures allowed in the coasting trade? I think not, I am not aware. W. E. Shorter, Esq.
816. Is not the coasting trade here assimilated to the coasting trade of Great Britain? I think it might be worked nearly the same, excepting that it would militate very much against our British and Foreign vessels, if Colonial vessels could ship seamen as they thought proper without coming to the Shipping Office, whereas British ships are bound to go before a Shipping Master, or where there is no Shipping Master before an officer of Customs. 14 Mar., 1861.
817. Is there any reason why British subjects should not enjoy the same liberty in Australia as in Britain? None.
818. Would it not be a breach of liberty if such an Act as that exists, namely, that to protect the owners of British ships an injustice should be perpetrated upon the whole body of Colonial seamen? I think that question could hardly be answered without looking to the circumstances of the locality. We have so few men here at times to supply ships while in England they have an abundance.
819. I ask it as an abstract question? It would, no doubt, be unfair to coerce any set of men more in one part of Her Majesty's dominions than in another.
820. Look at clause 246 of the Imperial Act—is that clause, or any like it, in operation here? We have the same in the 17th Victoria—the Water Police Regulation Act.
821. So that, according to the Colonial Act, an action for damages would be against an owner causing a seaman to be wrongly apprehended? It would.
822. Are you aware whether, under the English law, a policeman can apprehend a seaman on suspicion of his being a runaway, without a summons or a warrant? I do not know; that touches more upon police matters than comes under my observation; I know it has been done.
823. I speak of Home? If so, it would be under some of the Police Acts, not under the Merchant Seamen's Act.
824. But it has been acknowledged by the Shipping Master to have been a frequent practice here? I know men have been frequently apprehended without warrant, but that has been where the police have had good ground to know they were deserters.
825. They have been apprehended without warrant? Yes.
826. Not by the owner or captain? No.
827. Then what compensation do you think could be obtained by a party so apprehended, if not guilty of any offence, from the person so apprehending? I fear it would be none.
828. Then it is a direct violation of the liberty of the British subject? I think it is wrong.
829. We have taken some evidence with regard to a case tried at the Water Police Office, on December 9th, 1859. It was the case of the crew of the "Kiama" steamer, who were apprehended for wilful disobedience of lawful commands—have you any knowledge of such a case? I know there was such a case, but, being a purely judicial affair connected with the Water Police Magistrate, I do not know much about it.
830. Is it not the duty of the Shipping Master to step between the owners or captains and their crews, to see that impartial justice is done? Not without he is called upon as a witness.
831. The case was brought before the Shipping Master? In his double capacity of Water Police Magistrate and Shipping Master; it was not brought before me as his deputy.
832. You were called upon in that examination? I do not think I was, to the best of my memory.
833. Will you read the case as it stands here, in an appendix to the evidence forwarded to the Committee from the Water Police Office? (The witness read the same.)
834. Do you consider that a case where the law should have been brought into effect? Excuse my answering that question, as it touches very much upon the conduct of my superior again; it is purely a police matter. It was a case, too, in which, not only the Water Police Magistrate, but two other Magistrates, thinking the men had transgressed the law, punished them, but the punishment was very slight.
835. Do you consider that the Shipping Master should have interfered for the protection of these seamen? I think if the Shipping Master had seen any opening whereby he could have interfered, being the chief Magistrate on the Bench he would have done so and dismissed the case.
836. You will recognise, by the whole tenor of the Merchant Seamen's Act, that an important part of the duty of the Shipping Master is to protect the seaman in every case of injustice—that he has the power awarded to him of sitting and deciding upon cases similar to this, or even cases involving more important considerations than that involved in this? He has not that power in this Colony.
837. He has in the Imperial Act? He has.
838. There is no such advantage obtained in this Colony by seamen? The Shipping Master cannot interfere with the judicial proceedings of the Bench.
839. The protective power is taken in a great measure from the Shipping Master? It is not the same in this Colony as in England.
840. Especially with regard to the power to protect the British seaman—do I understand that? I do not know how far in England the Shipping Master may interfere in a Police Court; I think he could not; he might attend and offer his evidence, but if he were not allowed to do so I think he could not insist upon it.
841. I am not alluding to the duty of the Shipping Master as Water Police Magistrate; I am alluding to the duty of the Shipping Master as Shipping Master—is it not his duty to protect the seamen of Great Britain? Yes, it is.
842. Is there an equally protective power given to the Shipping Master here? I am not aware of the full powers of the Shipping Master at Home; I know here that the Shipping Master cannot interfere with the Bench of Magistrates.

- W. E. Shorter, Esq.
14 Mar., 1861.
843. Before a case comes before the Bench? He may advise the captain or crew to settle a matter; but he has no power to arbitrate or to enforce a certain course unless both parties are willing to leave the matter in his hands as a common arbitrator.
844. By Captain Moriarty: He cannot act magisterially? No.
845. By the Chairman: Is it your opinion, that any advantage is derived to the public service by the amalgamation of the duties of Shipping Master with those of Water Police Magistrate? No; I think the only benefit derived is not having to pay a Shipping Master.
846. You consider it not advisable to amalgamate the two offices? I think they worked better when separate, at least as far as the Shipping Office goes.
847. I think, from your answer to a former question, you recognise that, should wages rise from £3 to £6 during the period of a seaman's engagement, he can be bound to the full extent of that period? Yes, he is bound for the period for which he has signed, whatever the rate of wages may be.
848. Should wages fall from £6 to £3, he can be discharged in order that he may be put upon the ship's articles at a lower rate? Such is the nature of this engagement.
849. Then is there any mutuality in this engagement? It does not appear to be so in the first instance, but, as I mentioned before, there is this advantage to the seaman, that instead of being discharged every month he may possibly be kept on for six months.
850. If they were discharged every month, would not seamen have the advantage of any rise of wages? Yes.
851. Do you not observe, that, under the present engagement, they are debarred from that advantage? Yes.
852. While the Company or owners have the advantage of discharging and re-engaging them at lower wages within the period of six months? Yes.
853. Do you consider that mutuality? Not exactly so; but, by their being discharged every month, the Company would have only the advantage they have at present, for they never lower wages in the middle of a month, only at the end.
854. While the Company would not obtain advantage, would not the seaman have the advantage of any rise of wages? Yes.
855. Have you not the right to consider the advantage of the seaman equally with the advantage of the owner? Yes, as Shipping Master.
856. As Deputy Shipping Master you are being examined now? Yes; in fact I always have studied to consider their advantage as equal.
857. Consequently, during this examination we would wish you to keep your mind unbiassed, either as on behalf of the seaman or of the employer. How would you propose to remedy an injustice of this description? I do not see any remedy.
858. I find, from evidence previously obtained here, that in answer to a question put to Mr. North, as Shipping Master, he stated that, in the case I recently put to you, personally he would not have exacted "the pound of flesh"—that is, the full amount of work which he could have claimed from those seamen on board the "Kiama." I think I could ask that question from you in another way, which would not involve censure on the part of your superior officer—do you consider that a seaman should be compelled, regardless of fatigue, to turn to, whenever called upon, when a vessel is not placed in jeopardy—when, in fact, merely a pecuniary loss might be sustained by the owner in consequence of having to employ further labour to discharge his cargo? No; I think they should not be called upon for anything of the sort; they should not be required to do more than their fair share of duty.
859. Do you think it desirable there should be a provision to check that exaction on the part of the owner? I think it would be wise.
860. Are you aware if any exists at the present moment? No, none at present.
861. You are aware that seamen can be punished for not working at command? As the law stands they can.
862. Irrespective of fatigue—irrespective of anything, without regard to any actual loss that can ensue, or anything that may place the lives of the crew or the safety of the ship in jeopardy—by the action of the present law can seamen be punished who, labouring under extraordinary fatigue resulting from working for such a number of consecutive hours, refuse to load a vessel at midnight when lying at a wharf? I think, as the law stands, they would be liable to punishment to whatever extent the Magistrates might think fit, but that has more to do with the police than with the Shipping Master's office—this punishment comes under the eye of Magistrates.
863. Are you aware that seamen are dragged handcuffed through the streets of this city when they are about to undergo the penalty of imprisonment for disobedience or desertion? I know some have been handcuffed for desertion, but I have known many brought along without being handcuffed—when they have been quiet.
864. I am speaking of after they have been sentenced? In former times they were taken handcuffed, but now, generally, a large omnibus comes down and takes them from the Water Police watch-house.
865. Are you aware that they are placed in gaol in company with thieves, pickpockets, and the worst of characters? I am not aware except from hearsay—I believe there is no discrimination.
866. Do you not believe that is very prejudicial to the moral character of the seamen? I do. I think it would be better if they were classified and kept apart from the other prisoners.
867. We find from the Appendix to Captain North's evidence that a revenue is derived over and above the working expenses of the Shipping Office in this port? Yes, there is a revenue over and above the expenses. I cannot say just now the amount.
868. Do you consider it desirable a revenue should be derived from such a source? I think not.

not. I think the first intention of the establishment was that it should be just self-supporting and no more. W. E. Shorter, Esq.

869. With regard to lodging seamen, are you aware of any law compelling seamen to lodge in any particular place in any other country than this? I am not aware of any.

14 Mar., 1861.

870. Do you consider that any special advantage accrues to seamen from the fact of lodging-houses being licensed in this country? Yes, I think it is a great advantage to seamen.

871. What advantage do you think seamen obtain from that? It keeps them in cleanly habitations, the party keeping the boarding-house, being afraid of losing his license, does not attempt to overcharge them as they otherwise might. Another great matter is this:—Seamen shipping for long voyages get advance notes; and as long as they have any money left from that advance note they will not go on board. We know, by having these licensed boarding-houses, where to find the seamen; and when a vessel is leaving and some of her men are on shore, we send our runners after them, that they may not lose their ships.

872. You look upon them as adjuncts to the Police Department? Yes, and Shipping Office.

873. Then a part of the advantage to seamen accrues from the fact that the policeman knows where to find them? It is not the policeman; it is the runner from the Shipping Office.

874. Is not a runner in your office more than half a policeman? He is a special constable; he is bound to have that power, in order to quell any disturbance.

875. Can you tell it is nothing more than an adjunct of the Police Department? They get the men more by persuasion; they have no power to take the men out of the houses by force.

876. I ask you whether the advantage to the seaman is that he is placed under police surveillance? I do not think he is placed under police surveillance, excepting so far as to see that the houses they live in are properly kept.

877. And also that the police—the special constables—shall know where to find him? Yes, that is one advantage to the seaman, to put them on board their ships, otherwise they would lose their passage. It is frequently the case that they lose their passage, by straying away from these boarding-houses, and getting into some lanes and alleys where the captains do not know where to look for them.

878. Are you aware that in London these advance notes are also given to seamen? Yes.

879. Yet, in a city like London, which is so much more populous, so much larger in extent, where it must be so much more difficult to find seamen, lodging-houses are more plentiful; why then do you think it necessary that they should be licensed in Sydney? In London the number of seamen is so large that they are always glad to get employment, and they seldom leave their ships.

880. We find, from the evidence of a witness before this Committee, that a person was given by runners to a man who had lived in several boarding-houses; and that he himself has suffered from a practice being given to some man or other. May I ask his name, if it is Rowbotham? I know the circumstances of his case, but his name is not given. He was going to ship in the little "Rebecca," for the South Sea Islands. When Captain Devlin looked at him, without a word from him he said—"I am afraid you are too old for me, my friend; I must have a younger man, that will perhaps save my head among the blacks."

881. The ship I allude to is the "Commodore"? I do not recollect any particular instance. (The Chairman read the evidence to the witness.) I have no recollection of that particular case.

882. Is it not a great hardship for a man to leave a ship in which he was engaged, in which the captain was willing to employ him, to have to continue in a boarding-house at an expense of £1 a week because he had not his discharge, and had not a few shillings to pay for an affidavit, when by looking at your books you might have found he was entitled to his discharge? I do not think it hard at all; and you would not think so if you knew the schemes and artifices they resort to, such as telling or landing discharges to deserters, and then coming and asking a statement of this fact. It is necessary to take a very great precaution before giving a person a second discharge.

883. Should the power of making an affidavit not be given to these men without a charge, when they assert that they are not in circumstances to pay—that they have not two shillings and cannot borrow two shillings, and that without their discharge they must continue to be homeless vagabonds? That is a Police Office matter. The affidavits are made in the Police Office.

884. I ask you, as Deputy Shipping Master, whether a man should be kept out of a ship when he might obtain one if he had but his discharge—I refer to cases where men have good characters, as in the case of Rowbotham, who produced characters of the best description? That case of Rowbotham was purely the captain's affair.

885. I am alluding now to the case of the "Commodore"? The authorities cannot tell what has been done with a discharge unless an affidavit be made; it may have been given or sold to a deserter.

886. You say that the runners call in men to ship—I find in Rowbotham's evidence that these runners are in the habit of saying to particular men, "Oh, you are not wanted"—that they have the power to keep any particular man back to whom they have an objection from entering the Shipping Office? I do not think they exercise such a power—I have not heard them.

887. Can they exercise it? I should say they could not, for my seat is close to the door, and I should hear them unless they spoke very low. There are some instances where a captain will say, "I want so many able seamen, good men, used to this particular trade." In such a case it is their duty to pick out men suited to the captain's views.

- W. E. Shorter, Esq.
14 Mar., 1861.
888. By Mr. Love: Are there many foreign seamen who come into this port? Not a great many.
889. What country are they generally natives of? They come from Germany, Holland, France; but the greater part of the foreign seamen who come here are Americans or Dutchmen.
890. Any coloured seamen? From India occasionally—Asiatics.
891. Any other country? We have people from all countries—Spaniards, Prussians, Russians, Finlanders.
892. Are the Asiatics men of much weaker constitutions than Europeans generally? Yes.
893. A greater number are required to work a vessel? Yes; when I was going to sea we used to consider it was necessary to have three for one.
894. Are you aware whether these Asiatics are treated worse than Europeans by captains? I have been in Calcutta, and in other trades, and I believe the serang frequently punishes—probably under the direction of the captain or other officer.
895. What is the serang? The same as a boatswain over a British crew.
896. You have perhaps sailed with Asiatics? No, I have not myself.
897. Have you heard of any complaints made by these coloured seamen, respecting harsh treatment on board? I never heard of any complaint excepting the "Norna's" case.
898. Did you ever see a man named Budeen, a sailor on board the "Norna"? No, I did not see him.
899. Has he ever been in the Water Police Office? I have heard of his being in the Water Police, in the lock-up, but I did not see him; he was not in the Shipping Office.
900. You cannot give any information about this case at all? None whatever.
901. Has a case ever come to your knowledge where a lodging-house keeper has wished to detain a seaman in his house until all his money has gone, instead of allowing him to go to sea? No particular case of that kind has come to my knowledge.
902. By the Chairman: I find in the evidence of a seaman that that has been done, and that by a lodging-house keeper making friends with the runners, he is enabled to obtain situations for those who are in his debt? I do not believe that to be the fact, and I have known these messengers for five or six years.
903. Is it possible that by arrangement this could be done? Yes; it is of course possible for any men to behave badly.
904. By Captain Moriarty: You are the Deputy Shipping Master? Yes.
905. You have power to act in the absence of the Shipping Master? I have.
906. You have no authority to act when he is present, at variance with any directions he gives you? No.
907. I think you made some statement as to the payment of wages of the crew of the "Norna" to some person—was the money due to the crew of the "Norna" paid to any one in the Shipping Office? Not to any one in the Shipping Office.
908. What is the law upon that point according to your view of it? My view of the law is, that the Shipping Master is the only person authorized to receive that money, irrespective of any lawyer's claims or powers of attorney, and that it is his duty to pay that money to the crew, always considering that what it is right to pay the lawyer should be deducted.
909. According to your idea of the law the money should have been paid to the Shipping Master? That is my opinion.
910. In these individual instances it should have been paid to the Shipping Master? I think so.
911. And distributed by him, according to the law, to the men, to whom it was fairly due? That is my opinion.
912. Then any deviation from that would, according to your views, be an improper arrangement? You are aware that these questions will bring me very much in contact with my superior.
913. Supposing this money had, in the absence of the Shipping Master, been paid to you, as Deputy Shipping Master, should you have considered that you were the proper person to have received that amount? Yes.
914. Supposing the money had been paid into your hands, what distribution should you have made of it? I should have taken the advice of the Shipping Master as to whether any portion should have been retained for the lawyer, and what portion.
915. Is not the Act specified that the money must be paid by the men? Yes; but having my superior at hand I act under his instructions.
916. But, according to law—the law being distinct upon the point, that the money should be paid to the crew—would you not consider it a deviation from law—an illegal act—to appropriate that money? I should act under the instructions of my superior.
917. Am I then to understand that if the Shipping Master were to require you to perform an act which you knew to be illegal, you would obey him rather than the law. In such a case would you not deem it your duty to place the entire sum in the hands of the Shipping Master, and allow him to deal with it as he thought best? Yes.
918. There was a case came under your consideration of some men who had to discharge a ship, after having been a very long time at sea—do you consider it a legal order to require men, after arriving in port at twelve o'clock at night, to set to work to unload cargo, after having been hard at work all day? I do not think it is illegal.
919. Is it an order you would give yourself, if you were in command of a ship? I should not expect it except in some great emergency. It might have been that these people, after discharging the vessel, could have gone to sleep, and another gang put on to load. These men take watch and watch as long as they are at sea.

920. By the Chairman: If you refer to this case of the "Kiama," you will find that the reason these men were directed to work in the discharge of the ship was, that they might reload the ship and proceed to sea; and the fact that the vessel was unable to proceed to sea formed the ground of complaint of disobedience to lawful commands? The men were bound to discharge the vessel.

W. E. Shorter,
Esq.
14 Mar., 1861.

921. And to load it? Not to load, because in the part of the agreement where room is left to insert anything not contrary to law, it was inserted, "all cargo to be landed on arrival at the wharves, if necessary."

922. Does not that allude to ordinary circumstances? It alludes to general circumstances, if necessary.

923. Do you consider that it could be enforced where the men plead absolute fatigue and inability to comply, in consequence of their continued exertions? I believe it is a great hardship, but according to the agreement they could not refuse.

924. By Captain Moriarty: "According to their agreement"—have you a copy of their agreement? "All stock and cargo to be landed on arrival at the wharves"—that is under the new Seamen's Act.

925. That refers to deck cargo, I presume—to perishable goods? I take it to be the whole of the cargo, if necessary. It used to be all deck cargo, specifying "deck cargo" in particular.

926. By Mr. Lewis: Concerning the lodging-houses, I understand you to say that men are compelled to lodge in them? They are compelled.

927. And there is no restriction concerning what amount they have to pay for their board in these houses? None whatever.

928. There is liberty to charge what they please? Yes.

929. Do you reckon that fair that they are compelled to lodge in these houses, and yet that the keepers can charge what they like? There are so many that competition keeps down the price, otherwise it would be unfair.

930. Do you reckon it fair, in point of law, that they should be compelled to lodge in these places, and that there should be no restriction as to what they charged? Seamen are not compelled to lodge in them, but boarding-houses cannot take seamen in unless they have licenses. If every single seaman chose to go to a separate house nobody could interfere, for the law sets out that these are to be boarding-houses for seamen. A single seaman may live with any one he thinks proper.

931. I understood you to say, that seamen are compelled to go to board in these houses? Only so far as this, that the licensed boarding-house keepers are the only ones that can take them.

932. By Captain Moriarty: That pretty nearly amounts to the same thing? Pretty nearly.

933. By Mr. Lewis: In an indirect way they are compelled to board in certain places, and the lodging-house keepers can charge what they like? Yes; but they can go from one to another if they are not suited, and I know that the keepers of the houses do not charge more than the ordinary rate in lodging-houses.

934. By Captain Moriarty: Supposing a man gets in debt to a lodging-house keeper, is it not a possible or a probable case that a higher rate for board will be charged than that usually demanded? No; it is not at all probable that he would attempt it, because he would be liable to be summoned to the Police Court by the seaman.

935. I understood you to say that no scale of charges was fixed by any authority? No; but it would shew imposition if an attempt were made, because a man was in debt, to charge him more than he had done before, or more than he charged others.

936. Is there any valid reason why a seaman as well as any other member of the community may not be at liberty to go and lodge where he pleases? Seamen have not the same command over themselves generally speaking.

937. That is assuming sailors to be fools or children? We know that when they come from on board ship they are liable to be led into any court or alley by a courtesan, and I think it is necessary there should be a law to protect them.

938. Then this is an arrangement calculated to protect them? Yes.

939. Presuming them to be blockheads? I do not presume that they are always fools or blockheads, but I know that sailors are so called, and that they called me so when I first went to sea.

940. By the Chairman: Is there any law to prevent seamen being picked up by courtezans? No; that would affect the liberty of the subject.

941. Is there any law to compel a seaman to remain in his lodging-house after he has gone to it? No.

942. Consequently is there any security by the Lodging-house Act that the seaman shall not be inveigled and robbed by courtezans as you have suggested? His chest and clothes being in the boarding-house will naturally draw him towards it as his home.

943. Is the seaman when he is picked up by the courtesan generally picked up with his chest of clothes and his bag? No.

944. I find from the evidence of Captain Smith that cases have occurred where the discharge of the seaman has been detained by the boarding-house keeper as security for the payment of board and lodging, and that he has been compelled to deliver it up—is that an advantage to the seaman? No; allowing that it is the fact it is a disadvantage, but I do not know of any power to compel them to give up their discharges.

945. You say competition exists between boarding-house keepers, and that that secures to seamen an equitable rate for lodging? I think so.

946. Is there any Act to compel this competition on the part of boarding-house keepers? There is no scale of charges.

- W. E. Shorter, Esq. 947. Competition may cease to-morrow? It may.
- 14 Mar., 1861. 948. Consequently, seamen, being compelled to lodge in a licensed boarding-house, may be subject to whatever charge the extortion of the keeper can extract from him? There is not likely to be a diminution of the houses.
949. That is not the question—competition may cease? Many things may be which are not likely.
950. It is possible to cease, and if it does cease, there is no Act to regulate the charges? No.
951. There is no Act to prevent lodging-house keepers from combining to maintain a certain rate of charges? No; but it is impossible to make an Act to say that the rate shall be so much and no more.
952. But it is not impossible to pass an Act to compel seamen to go to certain lodging-houses? You could not fix the rate of charge, because there is a frequent variation in the price of provisions.
953. But the remuneration of seamen is subject to the same rise and fall as the prices of provisions? There cannot be such competition as there would be, if any one could take in seamen; if houses were opened all over the town competition would be greater, but I doubt whether the seaman would be better served. With regard to discharges—discharges are sometimes given up to boarding-house keepers, as a kind of security when men have not chests or clothes, but if, when a man wants to ship, the boarding-house keeper does not let the man have his discharge, I give the man permission to ship without it.
954. You do that of your own free will? Yes; because if a man —
955. If boarding-houses did not exist, would he not have a summary method of enforcing the relinquishment of his discharge? He has now, by summoning the boarding-house keeper.
956. Is not that power vested in you? No; in the Police Magistrate, the Shipping Master has no power.
957. By Captain Moriarty: You cannot act magisterially? Not at all.
958. By the Chairman: From your answer to a former question with regard to the shipping of seamen, I was led to understand that if it were possible to have a duplicate of the articles, the objection you mentioned with regard to the signing of articles on board a vessel as is customary in England would not hold? That objection would not hold.
959. It is perfectly possible to have a system where a duplicate of the articles should be left compulsorily at the Custom House or Shipping Office? Yes, perfectly.
960. We find from evidence already given here, that men have been four or five years consecutively in one service, and yet they have been compelled to pay a large sum of money for the power of engaging their services, not of entering on board different ships—do you consider that just? I presume you refer to the case of Gibbs: he has paid about two guineas in the last six years.
961. Should it be so? It as the law stands: it would alter the law altogether to say it should not be so; while the law is as it is it must be so. The law might be altered so that they should not be called upon to pay for discharges at all. I do not know that the country is better served, or the revenue much added to, by requiring the payment of these sums.
962. Would it be beneficial to have the law altered? I think if the fees were reduced, or in certain cases not charged at all, if a man remained in one ship a length of time, it might be a benefit to the seaman and no harm to any one.
963. Or in such a case as that of Rowbotham, where a man is compelled to continue in lodgings and to lose his employment from having mislaid his discharge, and not having two shillings to pay for another? I think that an extreme case, for a man to be unable to borrow two shillings.
964. If a man has a conscientious objection to borrow? I dare say he might be in debt to his lodging-house keeper, and he need not therefore have been afraid to borrow two shillings more.
965. I am not asking with reference to him, but with regard to any individual who had a conscientious objection to go into debt? I think it a very necessary and wise law that requires persons to account for lost discharges. I have had men come to me with discharges that did not belong to them, and when I have questioned them closely they have said, "I bought it of So-and-so for £1." If the man comes up he says, "I did not take a pound from him, I lost it." In the absence of a declaration how can I arrive at the truth.
966. Suppose both swear to the same thing? Of course I cannot tell which speaks the truth.
967. So this system of discharging leads to the demoralization you have pointed? I do not see any more demoralization than you constantly see in the District Courts, where there is constantly cross-swearing.
968. Do you not consider it a state of demoralization? It is, in a measure; but it is not often these affidavits are made out falsely—generally they are the test of truth, and the only test.
969. I allude to the demoralization between two seamen, when one says that he has bought a discharge for a pound, and the other says he did not sell it but that he lost it? No doubt there is great demoralization, as there will be thieves in all parts of the world.
970. Do you class seaman and thieves in the same category? Certainly not. I think they are too honourable; they are seldom found to be thieves; only it will be found that there are objectionable characters in all classes and in all parts of the world.
971. By Captain Moriarty: Thieving is not a vice of their character? No, I never considered them to be addicted to that, and I have known them these thirty-seven years.
972. By the Chairman: You said in answer to a question as to the Seamen's Act at Home, that that the Shipping Office is not resorted to by seamen and owners engaged in the coasting trade? I have heard so, but I do not know what is the law at Home.

973. You will find from the Imperial Act before you that there is a special reference to foreign-going vessels? (The witness referred to the Act.) Yes, there is.

974. You will find that there are not the same restrictions with regard to coasters: there they are bound to sign on board in presence of an attesting witness? I believe that to be the usual practice at Home.

975. By Captain Moriarty: We have had it stated in evidence that the police occasionally interfere by arresting persons at some distance from town, bringing them into Sydney, and confining them, if they arrived late, in some lock-up, until they had an opportunity of bringing them before a magistrate, without any reasonable grounds for such interference beyond mere suspicion on their part: what is your opinion of the propriety of such a course as that? I believe it may be necessary at times. I have known a ship to be delayed here a fortnight for want of hands where the men have left their ship, and there being no warrant the men were allowed to pass through Sydney on their way to the diggings.

976. How was it there was not a warrant? Because they were half way to Parramatta before the captain was aware that they had deserted.

977. The captain has it in his power to have a warrant issued on which the police can properly act? Yes.

978. What I want to know is whether a policeman in the country is to be at liberty, without anything to warrant the suspicion, to bring any man he likes from a distance of ten, twenty, or fifty miles to Sydney, à lens volens, upon the idea that he is a runaway seaman: do you think that a proper power to vest in a policeman? I think where a man is a seaman he ought to be able to give a satisfactory answer.

979. What do you call a satisfactory answer? I think he ought to be able to produce his discharge, or to shew by letters, or some means in his possession, that he has been legally discharged from his ship.

980. Would not that apply to any man? I think it applies to sailors particularly.

981. Suppose I were in the country, might I not be apprehended? I think nobody would take you for a runaway seaman.

982. By the Chairman: Would the same remark apply to me? I think a constable would be very stupid to apprehend you on suspicion.

983. By Captain Moriarty: Are you aware that one of the Judges of the Colony was arrested in that way, and brought down a hundred miles from the interior? Not as a seaman. Formerly the police were much more strict, when the gold diggings were at their height.

984. Is a man bound to admit that he is a seaman or a runaway—are you not bound to prove that a man has committed some breach of the peace before you are at liberty to incarcerate him? I do not know—that is part of the police law; it is purely a matter of law.

985. I ask you as a common sense question? I think a constable is justified in apprehending a man if he has good ground to suspect that he is a runaway seaman.

986. Supposing the man is not a seaman? He must be a stupid policeman if he does not know whether he is a seaman or not.

987. By the Chairman: Will you inform the Committee what you consider "good grounds"? He might learn by questioning him.

988. Are you not aware that, by the law of England, you are not allowed to question a man in order to criminate him, without first warning him that any statement he may make will be used against him? Yes.

989. Consequently, do you not think the ground given for your opinion at variance with English law? I think, generally speaking, men should not be interfered with, but I think where a man, from his appearance and manner, may be known to be a seaman, and has no discharge, he might be taken.

990. Do you think, looking at the matter free from any prejudice which may be caused by your position, viewing it in the light of an ordinary individual, of one subject to have the same abuse perpetrated on your proper person, it is right to allow to a constable the power of apprehending without any legal document, simply on an undefined suspicion? I do not know how to answer the question, for I have known such great necessity for stopping the men. It may possibly happen that one man out of a hundred may be improperly apprehended, and I know that it is generally acknowledged that it is better to let twenty guilty men escape than to take one innocent into custody. Still the shipping interest must be protected.

991. By Captain Moriarty: In point of fact, is it a possible case that your professional bias may give you a peculiar tendency to form this opinion, it being, as you admit, at variance with the ordinary principles which govern English laws? It may be a professional bias, for I know the misery of having ships detained for want of hands.

992. By the Chairman: You say ships must be protected—do you consider that ships should be protected at the expense of the public interest—that private interests should take place of public? No.

993. Is it not sacrificing public interests to private to break a fundamental principle of British law, in order to secure an advantage to a ship? —

W. E. Shorter,
Esq.

TUESDAY, 19 MARCH, 1861.

Present:—

Mr. LEWIS, | CAPT. MORIARTY,
Mr. STEWART.

DANIEL C. DALGLEISH, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

John Edye Manning, Junr., Esq., called in and examined:—

J.E. Manning, 994. By the Chairman: We are met to inquire into the working of the Merchant Seamen's Act, and the condition and management of merchant seamen, and we have asked you to attend to afford us such information as may be in your possession in reference to the matter.

19 Mar., 1861.

You are a shipowner, I believe, of this port? Yes.

995. Are you acquainted with the laws relating to merchant seamen and the management of seamen in general? Yes, with their general management, certainly.

996. Do you consider those laws oppressive in any way to the seamen in particular? I think that in some respects they are.

997. Could you name the respects in which you consider them oppressive? In compelling seamen, for instance, to pay for their discharge when they continue in the same ship for a certain period. When they remain in the same ship they have to pay for their discharge, and the owners have to pay again for shipping the same men. Under the old Act it was very oppressive, because men might be shipped, and after one or two trips some trifling accident might happen to the particular vessel in which they were, and as the Act then stood we could not put them into another vessel belonging to the same owner. The men were thrown out of employ, and could not get another job sometimes for ten days together.

998. You speak in reference to that short Act to enable seamen to change from one vessel to another in the same employ? Yes.

999. Do your remarks apply to steamboats in particular, or only to sailing vessels? Steamboats alone I should say; I cannot conceive it necessary for anything else.

1000. And then you only imagine that this benefit would accrue in case of accident, or other inevitable circumstance, causing the vessel to be laid up? Yes, it would be almost entirely so. It is never used except in that way, and very rarely then.

1001. There is an objection, I believe, in seamen to change from one vessel to another—they have prejudices in favour of one vessel and against another? Certainly; but they are always very glad to change, because they know that their own vessel is only laid up temporarily, and that afterwards they will have the option of going back to it.

1002. When the repairs are completed? When the repairs are completed.

1003. In case of an accident occurring to a vessel in that way you seldom or ever have any complaints? Never.

1004. But ought it to be made a practice to change crews from one vessel to another without this circumstance coming into play? There never would be any object in doing it.

1005. As the Act stands at present nothing of the sort you mention is taken cognizance of, consequently it is at the option of the owners to change their seamen on any pretext whatever from one vessel to another—do you consider the wording of the Act arbitrary in that respect? I cannot conceive how owners would do such a thing. It would be against their own interest to do it. In the first place, the men always do better in a boat they are accustomed to, and it would be more expensive to the owners to keep shifting them about.

1006. Have you heard any complaints from seamen with regard to the inequality of the articles signed as between the owners and the seamen—the right of discharging being given to the one without the right of leaving at any time being extended to the other? Yes, I certainly have.

1007. Do you think it an equitable arrangement as it at present exists? Well, it is rather difficult to say. We might want an extra vessel temporarily, and the seamen are generally allowed something extra. We generally pay for their discharge in such cases, or make them some other allowance when anything would come harshly upon them. We never take advantage of it.

1008. That is hardly what I allude to—in the regular agreements with seamen, as the articles are signed, you can compel by law a seaman to serve out the entire term of his agreement—six months, or three months, or whatever it may be—whereas the seaman has not the option, should circumstances arise to render it either necessary or convenient to himself, of leaving the ship without subjecting himself to the action of law and rendering himself liable to punishment for so doing? I suppose he has not legally the power of leaving, but I never knew of an instance in which we were not glad to get rid of a man who wished to go. In our employ it is invariably the case.

1009. I am not alluding to the practice which prevails in any particular employment, but to the equity of the arrangement? It is a one-sided arrangement, doubtless.

1010. Are you acquainted with the Imperial Act, as it works in Great Britain? No, I am not.

1011. Relating to merchant seamen? No, I am not; my knowledge is purely local.

1012. Are there any definite hours of labour recognized for seamen, and any definite periods for rest? Certainly, excepting in cases of emergency.

1013. What are they? The usual hours are from six till six, with three hours out of that for meals. From eight till nine the men never work; from one to two they never work; nor after the hour I have named—six.

1014. That is two hours only for rest, not three? Exactly; three meals.

1015.

1015. Yes; but I allude to seamen when out at sea? At sea they take watch and watch, J.E. Manning, invariably. Junr., Esq.

1016. That term would apply after leaving the heads? Yes.

1017. Until leaving the heads all hands are on deck—they are all employed in the harbour? 19 Mar., 1861. They have nothing to do. They may be straightening everything down—I suppose they are—excepting they go down at night. In vessels going down after taking in cargo—in the day time I dare say the men would be employed until they reached the heads.

1018. Do you remember any instances of severity in the punishment of men who pleaded fatigue in extenuation of refusing to labour for a longer period of time? Yes, there was an instance here the other day, but the Bench ruled that it was merely a subterfuge. I allude to the case of the "Corio," about ten days ago; but the men are not on that peculiar style of articles.

1019. Do you remember the circumstances of the case? Yes. They had come from Bellambi with a cargo of coals; they left Bellambi at seven o'clock in the evening; the officers had kept the deck the whole of the night to relieve the men, excepting the man at the wheel; they arrived here at one, and the men refused to get the anchor ready, and the vessel lay alongside a ship until six o'clock the next morning, when the men refused to turn out; they slept until eight, and refused to go to work after breakfast. About ten or eleven o'clock the Water Police went on board, and the men were then in their bunks, having been there from seven o'clock on the evening previous.

1020. That, I suppose, is an extreme case—it is seldom that you hear of such cases? Yes; they were all strange men that we had picked up, and it was accounted for in that way. The Water Police fixed upon two* of them as known characters; one of them was a practised thief, and known for everything that is bad, and he led the other men on.

1021. These men then were not recognized as sailors in the common acceptation of the term? They shipped as sailors.

1022. They shipped as sailors? Yes, and I believe they were sailors.

1023. Have you any remembrance of any other case? No.

1024. Do you recollect a case which occurred about two years ago in reference to one of your sailors, I believe, on board the "Kiama"? I recollect hearing of the case to which you refer, but I was not in Sydney at the time.

1025. You will gain the particulars from this Appendix (Appendix A attached to Mr. North's evidence)—was the "Kiama" then in your employ? Oh, yes; I see amongst these men some who have been in the employ ever since; they could not therefore have considered it a very great hardship. There are two of them here—two brothers—who have been on two occasions nearly drowned in that particular steamer—once at Wollongong, and a second time at the Clyde—and notwithstanding all those disparagements they are still in the employ.

1026. What I was about to allude to was the special circumstance that these men having been constantly in your employ, would be prima facie evidence that they were men of good character? These two men are certainly men of good character.

1027. And not likely to have shirked their work? No, I should fancy not.

1028. You will find by the evidence that these men were employed from five o'clock in the morning until twelve o'clock at midnight—when the vessel was lying at the Phoenix Wharf—that they were then ordered to discharge the hold and carry the deck cargo on shore? From five in the morning till twelve at night!

1029. Yes; and then, immediately, without any rest, they were ordered to discharge the cargo out of the hold. They said they appealed to Mr. Manning, who said he did not wish to oppress them in any way, but Captain Mailler insisted that they should go to work. The men pleaded excessive fatigue, and refused, and the vessel left without them. When she returned the men were apprehended by a warrant taken out against them by the captain, and they were imprisoned for wilful disobedience of lawful commands. This is a case long past, but would you now take cognizance of a similar case in the same way? I do not see anything here to confirm what you say. It merely says that the vessel left Shoalhaven at half-past five. The fact of being at sea for a longer time would make the rest longer.

1030. They went to three different ports to take in cargo? If they had made an ordinary trip, leaving at half-past five in the morning, they ought to have been in Sydney at half-past five in the evening. The fact of their being longer shews that the weather was not good, and the men would therefore have an easier time of it on account of being longer at sea.

1031. The men would have watch and watch? Yes.

1032. But then, having had watch and watch, and having to take out the cargo on their arrival at midnight, reload the ship and go to sea again at seven o'clock in the morning? That would have been an extraordinary instance. There must have been a special reason for it. It might have been unavoidable at the time. We never employ the men in the boat in that way. They assist to remove the deck cargo, but labourers on the wharf put all the cargo in and take it out. The seamen are never called upon to do it except in cases of emergency. We cannot disappoint the public. It might so happen that it would be hard upon men in particular circumstances, but we generally make allowance for it.

1033. But if that had been the case, would you now press such a case should it arise? I do not know what the particulars of the case were. The men might have been impudent, or guilty of some previous misconduct.

1034. Would you press a similar case now? Certainly not.

1035. That cannot be taken as a fair criterion? No. There must have been some other reason

* NOTE (Correction by witness on revision):—One.

J.E. Manning, reason for it, which is not shown. The men had perhaps given trouble before. This is Janr., Esq. (Apprentix) evidence given before a Court, and evidence could not have been given of previous misconduct, although I do not know that there was anything of the sort.

19 Mar., 1861. 1036. The fact of your having these men still in your employment, at least exempts them from gross misconduct? Yes, two of them are men of very good character; one is now acting as second mate.

1037. Still those men were punished in the manner here de-cribed? It is very possible that they were.

1038. It appears, too, from the evidence, that if they had agreed to forfeit their wages, this punishment would not have resulted? I do not know what that would mean. It might mean simply, that they would have to pay the men who did their work. It might not mean that their entire wages were forfeited, but only such a portion as would be sufficient to pay the men who did their work.

1039. Would you recognize that to be just, after these men had worked this number of hours, to stop a portion of the wages they had earned to pay for the services of fresh men?
 No; we never call upon them to do that sort of work. I was not in Sydney when that particular circumstance occurred. The men never do that extra work except from choice.
 They sometimes do it and get an extra five shillings a-piece, which would otherwise be obtained by the men on the wharf. This is a proof that, when it comes to a matter of money, they can do the extra work.

1040. And that is of frequent occurrence? Every Monday night there is a short trip.
 The vessel goes to Wollongong, and leaves about eleven.

1041. In other trades it is a thing of frequent occurrence for men to work over-hours, in order to obtain extra pay? Yes, and so here we always give the men the preference. We say, we want so much work done; if you like to do it you can, and have the money; and if not, we must get some one else. Some do the work, and some do not.

1042. It is not imperative? Certainly not.

1043. Do you know anything with regard to the lodging of seamen? I cannot say that I do; I have reason to believe, however, that the lodging-house keepers are very hard upon the seamen. We have frequently had to assist sailors to release their things. I cannot tell you any particulars in reference to that matter.

1044. Have you any knowledge as to whether the system of hiring special places for the lodging of seamen exists elsewhere? No, I have not. I know that the men complain very much of having to go to particular places to lodge; these people take advantage of them.
 I have often heard them complain that they were not allowed to go to their own relations in some instances.

1045. By Mr. Stewart: Could you suggest an alteration in that respect, which in your opinion would be advantageous? I do not know what the special object of the provision is. I think it is very hard that a seaman cannot lodge with his brother or sister as much as you or I could; and particularly seamen shipping in vessels trading along the coast.

1046. By the Chairman: Is there any reason why a seaman should be debarred from lodging with any one he desires, whether he be a relation or not? Certainly not, as far as the crews of coasting vessels are concerned. There might be some reason for such a provision as far as outward-bound ships are concerned.

1047. In England the crews of coasting vessels are not required to sign articles at the Shipping Office, or to pay fees for shipping and discharging except once in six or twelve months, and then I think they are paid by the owner? The owners pay for the shipping and the men pay for their discharge.

1048. But in Great Britain the Imperial Act exempts all masters from the payment of these Shipping Dues; do you know anything to prevent the same arrangement being carried out in this Colony? No, certainly not. We would rather not have any bother with the Shipping Office at all. We do not think it necessary.

1049. Do you know any reason why coasting seamen should not be allowed to sell their services in the same way as other labourers or trade men sell theirs? They do it now in a certain measure. Men do not always get precisely what they signed for. The only thing is, that they can only come upon the owners for what they have signed for.

1050. In agreeing with men on the wharves you pay some men higher than others?
 Undoubtedly; some men are worth a good deal more than others.

1051. But the system which now prevails of engaging men at the Shipping Office before you know what they are tends to prevent such an adjustment of wages, and the wages are equalized without any regard to merit? Undoubtedly, it is a bad system. We cannot get the best men at the Shipping Office, and frequently have to be content with the refuse. If it were not for this arrangement you could get picked men; you might engage them as they turned up from time to time.

1052. Is the Shipping Office any protection to seamen? I do not think that it is just either to the owners or to the seamen.

1053. Are seamen enabled to recover their wages any better through the medium of the Shipping Office? That is the only way appointed for them to recover their wages now.

1054. But supposing it did not exist? I should think they would recover their wages then under the Masters' and Servants' Act.

1055. By Mr. Stewart: That is a summary proceeding? Yes, that is the way they do recover it now, I think, because it is only sea-going steamers that are obliged to ship.

1056. The harbour boats have no occasion to ship? No; we have less trouble with the men in those boats than with any other men.

1057. Do you think it would be a mutual advantage to owners and seamen if there were no Shipping Office for the coasting trade? Yes. I think the Shipping Office is a great protection

- protection to men who do not do their work properly, because by hanging about the Shipping Office they frequently get a ship when otherwise they would be unable to do so. J.E. Manning, Junr., Esq.
1058. By the Chairman: Would it not place the seaman as well as the owner in a better position if they stood in the ordinary relation of employer and employed, without this special Act with regard to shipping? I think so. We should be glad to see it so. We have tried it both ways. We have almost as many steamers doing harbour work as running elsewhere, and the men are always anxious to get into those particular steamers. 19 Mar., 1861.
1059. You consider that a case similar to the one I pointed out to you a short time ago is not likely to occur again? I do not understand it.
1060. I allude to the case of the "Kiama"—some two years ago? Yes.
1061. Is there anything that suggests itself to your mind which you could state with regard to the working of the Act, or which, in your opinion, would tend to improve the condition of seamen? I think that the doing away with the Shipping Office would improve the condition of seamen as much as anything. Men would then be more likely to do their work properly, and those loiterers, who often get a ship now because other men cannot be got, would fail to obtain employment as at the present time.
1062. Your remarks do not apply to foreign-going ships, I presume? No.
1063. The Imperial Act would apply to foreign-going ships? I presume it would. My remarks would merely apply to the coasting vessels. I consider that the Act introduced last Session has been a great blessing both to the seamen and to the employers.
1064. You are now alluding to the short Act? To the short Act. I have asked the men particularly about it, and they have almost invariably said so.
1065. That is, providing it is used in the way you first mentioned? I do not see how it can be used otherwise to the interest of the owners.
1066. You are alluding to the matter, as far as you know, with regard to your own Company and the men in your own employ? Yes; in our Company they are more likely to be shifted than in others where the trips are longer, so that men might be rather unfavourable to it; but they are not so.
1067. Do you know anything about Sailor's Homes? Nothing further than having seen them. I have seen plenty of them at Home, and know the principle on which they are founded.
1068. Do you approve of the principle? Certainly.
1069. Are you acquainted with the Shipping Office, practically? I have to ship men myself. They ship to the owners under that Act.
1070. Do you know anything of the subordinates in that office called "runners"? I do not know what they call "runners," but I know a lot of the employés there.
1071. There are two men particularly—Mr. North calls them "runners"—they are special constables, and act as messengers of the Court? Oh, I know those men. There is always one of them in attendance at the Shipping Office to bring men in and so on.
1072. Do you think the position these men occupy would enable them, were they so disposed, to give a preference to any particular seaman or seamen in shipping? I should think so.
1073. They would be enabled to give an undue preference? They certainly would be able to give a preference. They would know when men were wanted, and if they saw one or two of their friends outside they could call them in and recommend them.
1074. Could they, as far as you have had an opportunity of judging, favour boarding-house keepers, or by gaining employment for particular men act detrimental to the interests of the house? Yes, in the way I have alluded to. Any one in the Shipping Office, I suppose, can do the same thing.
1075. By Mr. Stewart: Can you not go to the Shipping Office too? Yes, you can ship any one you choose, but you cannot always get the men you want. They may have been waiting to get a job in a particular steamer, and have just engaged elsewhere when there is an opportunity for their employment.
1076. You usually take such men as are in waiting? Yes, but some of the men do not understand anything about the work, and are utterly useless.
1077. By the Chairman: You mentioned the money paid with regard to the shipping and discharge of seamen—is there no greater grievance than the money—is that the primary object? That would be one thing, but I think the great loss would be men being thrown out of employ.
1078. Is time no object? I do not think that makes so much difference to the seamen as to the owners.
1079. I speak with regard to the seamen as well as the owners—this is a general question, and I wish it to be considered that my questions have a general bearing? It would fall unevenly. There would be the time of one owner against the time of a great number of seamen.
1080. Whereas, if seamen were allowed to go from one employer to another, they could engage their services without that loss of time? Yes, they could commence work at once. I have to wait hours sometimes before I can get there, and you cannot always get the men shipped for a day or two days—even giving notice beforehand that you want such and such articles drawn up.
1081. So that there is a great loss of time? *Undoubtedly.
1082. Which is injurious both to the owner and to the seamen? Yes, and for no benefit whatever, I think.
1083. By Mr. Stewart: You stated that it would be a mutual advantage to owners and seamen if that arrangement were done away with? Yes.
1084. And if seamen were engaged in the same manner as other servants? Yes, the same as for river-going steamers. We have always the best men there, because we can get them as opportunity offers.

- J.E. Manning, 1085. The present system is a positive disadvantage to the owners, and likely to be equally so to the seamen? Yes, I think the other plan would be better for both parties.
 Juar., Esq.
 1086. You can speak positively as to the owners? Certainly. It involves a great loss of 19 Mar., 1861. time, and sometimes inflicts upon us men who are perfectly worthless.
 1087. It debars you from obtaining the services of men you would be otherwise able to obtain? They compel you to have the names of the men on the articles, and if the vessel is to go away immediately you cannot get the men you want. You have to engage sometimes mere idlers, and then if others subsequently turn up, you cannot discharge them immediately, in order to make fresh engagements.
 1088. Have you observed seamen, after having been brought before a magistrate and sentenced, dragged through the streets in chains? Never.
 1089. You are not aware whether that practice exists? I have seen one or two men sent to the watch-house, so violent that they had to be lashed on drays—or rather, one at the bottom of a boat, and the other on a dray.
 1090. By Mr. Stewart: But those were cases in which any ordinary servant would have been similarly dealt with? Yes, they were not dealt with as seamen, but as drunken and disorderly persons.
 1091. By the Chairman: I was asking the question with regard to men whose crimes might be mere disobedience of orders? I have not seen it, but I believe that sailors are taken through the streets in irons.
 1092. Do you know whether they are confined separately or with common felons? I do not know.
 1093. In your opinion, should they be confined with common felons? Certainly not.
 1094. It would tend to demoralize the seamen? Yes, I look upon it that the crimes committed by the inmates of the gaol are widely different from an offence under the Masters' and Servants' Act.

James Munro, Esq., called in and examined:—

- James Munro, 1095. By the Chairman: You are ship's "husband"? I am marine superintendent.
 Esq.
 1096. For the A. S. N. Company. Yes.
 1097. Are you the head through whom the engagement of seamen for the Company takes 19 Mar., 1861. place? Yes. I am appointed by the Company to ship the men at the Shipping Office according to the provisions of the present Act.
 1098. I think you are a seaman yourself? Yes.
 1099. Have you any knowledge of the working of the Imperial Shipping Act at Home?
 No. I have not had much experience in that respect. I have shipped men at Home, but I do not know much about the working of the Act. As far as I know it is all right. I have not heard any complaints of the Home regulations for shipping seamen.
 1100. I was going to ask you whether the regulations here were similar to those which prevail at Home? Yes, I think so. The engagements are made with the owner of the vessel at Home in Home-trade ships.
 1101. Were you in the coasting trade at Home? No, never.
 1102. Are you aware of your own knowledge whether the coasters do or do not require to sign articles at the Shipping Office? As far as I can remember, the coasting service at Home had a book, and the captain of a vessel was allowed to ship his crew and keep an account for six months. All the men discharged or shipped in the meantime were entered in this book, and at the end of those six months the fees were duly handed in to the Shipping Office of the place to which the vessel belonged.
 1103. By Mr. Stewart: That is a sort of registry fee, is it not? It is a regular shipping of the men. The coasters at Home are allowed this privilege, whereas all foreign-going vessels must go to the Shipping Office and ship the men.
 1104. But what does the fee amount to? The seaman pays so much for the shipping and discharging in the same way. The captain of the vessel gives him his discharge from the vessel.
 1105. Is the fee as much as is paid in a sea-going ship? I think it is the same. They have to keep an account and hand in all the fees at the end of the six months.
 1106. It is a mere matter of convenience to the coasting trade, to relieve them from going to the office to perform the duty? Yes.
 1107. By the Chairman: The ship's articles are kept on board? They are kept on board.
 Possibly the articles will be handed in with the book in which the account is kept, at the end of the six months.
 1108. And the seaman signs those articles in the presence of one witness? I think there must be a witness to attest his name. I was never in the Home service, but I think this is the rule.
 1109. You do not know it of your own knowledge? No; I never shipped men in the Home service.
 1110. Is there any reason why the provisions of the Imperial Act in that respect should not be extended to this Colony? I do not see why they should not. There is no doubt that it would be a benefit to the trade generally.
 1111. Are you aware of any grievance which exists with regard to the harsh working of the laws relating to the shipping and discharging of seamen in these Colonies? I have not heard any particular complaints. I have heard sailors speak about the payment of two shillings as being too much. That is the only thing I have heard complained of. Two shillings does appear to be rather an exorbitant fee.
 1112. By Mr. Stewart: Is there no complaint of the inconvenience seamen are put to in having having to attend at the Shipping Office to engage? There is always inconvenience attached to it, and there is part of the day lost, which is an inconvenience to the employer.

1113. To the employer principally? Yes, because the sailor has the advantage of it. He makes use of the few hours he can get to his advantage.

1114. Could you not engage seamen with as much advantage to the employers without having a Shipping Office? I do not think so. I do not think you would have the rules so stringent. The sailors would not have the same dread of punishment when they offended. I think it a sort of go-between the master and the man. You would have to refer to other parties, whereas now you have only to refer to the Shipping Office.

1115. You think that compensates for the inconvenience and loss of time? I think so. Before the Shipping Offices were established at Home there was much inconvenience. When I was first at sea we used to ship the men on board ship. They came on board to be shipped up to about 1835 or 1836, when the Shipping Office was established. Before that the men were brought on board the ship and signed the articles there. You had an attesting witness, and that was all you required. But there was not the same binding agreement betwixt the sailor and the owner as there is with the Shipping Office.

1116. Would not the ordinary law with reference to master and servant be quite sufficient in such cases? It would put you to more inconvenience. There seems to be a kind of dread hanging over the sailor because of this Shipping Office, because if he does get out of the way he is known again. He does not get off with the same impunity.

1117. It is calculated to keep him to his duty? Yes, he will be more likely to keep to his duty.

1118. Do you find it necessary to have anything of the kind to keep the ordinary labouring men on your wharf to their duty? That is very different. They are always on the same spot, but here you may go away to Melbourne or Moreton Bay, or any where else.

1119. You are speaking now with regard to your foreign-going vessels? We have none other. They all go from Sydney.

1120. Those that go to Newcastle and the Hunter for instance—would you apply it to those? I would apply it to the whole. They could take advantage of you under any circumstances.

1121. By the Chairman: There is one law referring to the coasting trade at Home, and another to the foreign-going vessels? I think the same law is attached to each.* You are allowed this privilege of shipping your men on board. Your books go into the Shipping Office at the end of six months, and if you have any complaint to make it is entered in the book.

1122. Are you aware if that provision is contained in the Imperial Act? It is. I think I recollect reading it, but I have not seen it for several years.

1123. For how many years? At all events since the passing of the Imperial Shipping Act on 11th August, 1854.

1124. The laws have been revised since that time: the register system was then in vogue? Register tickets, do you mean?

1125. Yes? That was only for a short time. It did not extend over many years.

1126. It was found not to work well? No.

1127. It is almost seven years since the law with regard to register tickets was abolished? Yes, but I do not think it is different with regard to the shipping of men.

1128. Do you know anything about what are termed running agreements? I do not.

1129. Are you aware that in accordance with the present British Merchant Seamen's laws, running agreements can be entered into with regard to foreign-going vessels? No; it is something new, which I am not aware of.

1130. So that you are not acquainted with the provisions of the new law? No, not if there is anything newer than that.

1131. And what you have said with regard to merchant seamen is to the best of your belief—not to your knowledge? No; I spoke of things as they were when I was in the habit of sailing a vessel.

1132. I do not think you answered a question I put to you sometime previous with regard to labourers on the wharf—do you find it necessary to have such a dread in the minds of labourers on the wharf, as that which you say the Shipping Office is calculated to infuse into the minds of seamen?† The only dread we can have over them is, that we can discharge them and send them about their business at any time.

1133. Can you not exercise the same discretion with regard to seamen? Yes, but sometimes we find it very difficult to get seamen at places where our vessels may go. They are not always to be had.

1134. But you can punish seamen at present in any port where your vessels arrive, if there is a Bench of Magistrates in the place, and the men are found guilty of any offence, without bringing them back to Sydney? Yes.

1135. Would the same provision not exist if they were not under this Act? There is always so much trouble attached to those things that persons prefer to put up with a good deal of inconvenience rather than go to the trouble, and sometimes much annoyance, especially in a foreign port.

1136. Are you aware of the mode in which agreements are drawn up between seamen and their employers? Am I aware how they are drawn up?

1137. Yes, the form? Of the articles?

1138. Yes, the form of the articles—are the articles mutually binding? No, I should not say that they were exactly mutually binding, neither can I see how it is possible that they can be.

* Note (Correction by witness on revision):—The law is different with foreign-going vessels and Home-trade ships. In the latter you are allowed, &c.

† Note (By witness on revision):—I did answer that question, that the circumstances were different.

- James Munro, Esq.
19 Mar., 1861.
1139. What difficulty would exist? In the first place for the sake of the sailors, for one thing, that they may have a permanency for a time; the articles would be signed say for three months. That would not do for steam vessels if it were binding, because a vessel might be laid up to-morrow and you would be obliged to keep these men employed for three months. The vessel might make only one or two voyages, and then be laid up, and it is necessary to make the sailor understand that, although he signs the articles for three months, if there is not sufficient employment he can be discharged after three voyages; two voyages are generally specified.
1140. Is the same advantage held out to the seaman? The seaman understands it when he signs the agreement.
1141. Does he understand that he can leave at the end of two voyages if he thinks proper? Oh, yes; they never have any trouble in that respect. They leave when they like; we never think of keeping a person who is dissatisfied on board of any of our vessels.
1142. Has that never been done in your employ? Not to my knowledge. It may possibly sometimes occur and I not be aware of it. A man may go to the master and say, "I want my discharge," and the master may say, "I am not going to give you your discharge now, you may stop until it is convenient." A man might be bothered at times; but generally when they ask for it they get it.
1143. You say that the signing for three months is an advantage to seamen? No doubt it is; it saves them two shillings; if they have to sign oftener they will have to pay the two shillings oftener.
1144. Then it is only with regard to the payment of the two shillings that you consider it an advantage to the seamen? I do not know that it is of much advantage otherwise. It saves trouble on both sides.
1145. Are there any definite hours for seamen to labour, or any recognized rules? Well, I never saw any. When there is nothing particular to do they generally work from six to six; there are cases of emergency when they are obliged to work at other hours.
1146. Do they receive any recompense for work during those extra hours? No, none.
1147. Is it customary to allow extra wages in other employments when men work extra hours? I believe it is; but they are not articleed by the month.
1148. So that it would appear that this is a disadvantage to the seamen. By being articleed by the month they get no extra pay for extra work? No, they get no extra pay, and never have done since I can recollect. When there is work to do they have to do it, generally speaking; there is a regular routine. They go to work at six in the morning, have an hour for breakfast, and an hour for dinner. They have half-an-hour for grog at half-past eleven, and at four o'clock; they knock off at six. Circumstances may arise that a lighter comes alongside the vessel and must be discharged that night; then they set the men to work, and they discharge the vessel, but possibly in some cases they give a little leisure at other times to make up for it.
1149. In your employ, if vessels were to arrive at eleven or twelve o'clock at night, with cargo on board, would you think it right to make the men discharge it, notwithstanding that they had been employed during the day? We never have done.
1150. But would you consider it just to do so? It would not be just, neither would I consider it requisite, excepting under particular circumstances.
1151. Should the men refuse to work at such a time would you consider it a proper case to be punished by law? You see the articles state that they are to obey all lawful commands. That is a lawful command.
1152. Is there any exemption from that lawful command? Not that I am aware of.
1153. Sickness? Certainly.
1154. Over-exertion? Oh, over-exertion! They are never over-exerted.
1155. It is impossible for a seaman to be over-exerted? Yes; they take care of that.
1156. We have heard of a case before this Committee, where a seaman has been from five o'clock in the morning until twelve o'clock at night, on duty—at times discharging, and at times taking on board cargo; and being the rest of the time at sea. On arriving at the wharf the lawful command was issued, to discharge all the cargo? Possibly it may be the case in some instances.
1157. The men in this instance—although it appears from what you said previously, to be impossible—pleaded fatigue and impossibility to proceed further with the work. Was that a lawful command? Possibly not. I do not hold out for the enforcement of these things, but if there are laws to go by they must stick to them you know.
1158. I think you stated that the reason for the present provision of the law, relating to the discharging of seamen, was in consequence of the laying up of ships, which would otherwise subject the owners to considerable loss in having to pay seamen, when their services were not required? I do not say ships generally.
1159. Steamboats? Yes, steamboats.
1160. With regard to these has it been a custom, in the employment, to discharge men when those circumstances have not existed, to which you have referred. When steamboats have not been laid up have not agreements been broken through in the middle, in order that the men might be re-engaged, or the services of others secured at a reduced rate of wages? It has been done.
1161. Do you consider that an advantage to the seamen? No.
1162. That is not one of the advantages to the seamen which you enumerated? No; it is not an advantage at all.
1163. Have you prevented the crews of vessels from leaving when wages have risen in the middle of an agreement? Not that I can recollect.
1164. Is it possible for you to do so by law? Yes, it is possible, but I do not think we should go to that extreme.
- 1165.

1165. But it is possible? It is possible.
1166. And it is impossible for the man to leave in the same circumstances? It is not impossible.
1167. I mean, without coming under the law in both instances, of course? The law states that it is an infringement of the law for a man to do so.
1168. He is subject to punishment? He is subject to punishment.
1169. Consequently the articles are not mutual? They are not mutual.
1170. Is it desirable that they should be so? Not unless you ship the men under a different head altogether. Not unless you ship them for short periods, or voyages, and do not state any time; then it can be done.
1171. In England in engaging seamen by the month, the ship is liable to certain forfeitures providing they break agreement with the seamen? In foreign-going ships.
1172. Yes—you state that your experience is in reference to foreign-going ships. Does any such provision exist here? I am not acquainted with foreign-going ships here. I am only acquainted with steamers here.
1173. Steamers going from here to Melbourne, which may be termed foreign? You can scarcely term them foreign when they are here twice a week.
1174. Steamers go from England to France twice a day, do they not? Yes. I imagine that the Home-trade articles are kept up in those steamers as in the coasting vessels generally.
1175. I think you will find that they come under the provision of foreign-going vessels? It is a thing thoroughly impossible that they can come under the same head. Steamboats are situated in such a way that it is impossible for the proprietors to know whether a vessel will break down to-morrow, and are they to keep paying these men.
1176. The question is, why should not the seaman be allowed to leave in the same way, and by the same law, that allows the master to discharge him? There is no reason why it should not be done. When they wish to go we always let them go.
1177. Are you acquainted with the lodging of seamen? No.
1178. In the course of your experience in London have you known any licensed lodging-houses for seamen? No, I do not know anything at all about that matter.
1179. Have you any opinion in reference to the lodging of seamen? No, I know nothing about their lodging-houses generally. I have been inside Sailors' Homes in England, and I consider them first-rate establishments. As to the other lodging-houses I know nothing about them.
1180. Are you aware that a law exists here compelling seamen to lodge in one particular class of houses, termed boarding-houses for seamen? All I know about it is from seeing cases in the papers about some persons being pulled up.
1181. If such a state of things does exist would you consider it just? To have licensed boarding-houses?
1182. To have seamen restricted to one particular class of houses? Certainly not. A sailor, has a right to spend his money where he likes, the same as any one else, so long as he behaves himself.
1183. Are you aware whether seamen are mixed up in gaol, when put there for minor offences—such as drunkenness and disobedience of lawful commands—with thieves and men of the worst character? That I do not know.
1184. If it should be so, would you consider it objectionable? Certainly; it would only make them a good deal worse than they are. Generally speaking, sailors are not bad, they only want proper leading.
1185. Sailors, as a class, are willing to do their work? Generally speaking, they are, but like other people they try to take advantage occasionally. If they can take an advantage they will do it, as much as any one else.
1186. Is there any reason why special legislation should exist for the engagement of seamen any more than for any other class of men? But can you tell me what other class of men you speak of? We do not want any engagement for mechanics and others; they are hired by the day; you can tell them to go about their business to-morrow, if you do not want them any longer; but with a sailor, you wish him to serve you at least until the voyage is completed. If you had the Home Trade Act for the coasting vessels here, you could ship your men again after each voyage, if it were requisite.
1187. We have had evidence given before this Committee to shew that seamen at Home pay the shipping fee once in twelve months? That is in the Home trade?
1188. No, in the St. Petersburg trade—in the steamboats? Once in twelve months?
1189. Yes? That is almost a coasting trade. It is just running there and back again. It would only take about a week or ten days.
1190. It is something more than coasting, is it not, to go from Hull to St. Petersburg? With a steamer the time occupied is little more than a vessel would take to run round the coast of England to Ireland and back again. In fact it is quicker.
1191. Are you aware why the provision was introduced into the Imperial Act to enable them to change seamen from one vessel to another? No; I know that on one occasion some of the large shipowners in London had a number of ships lying at Calcutta. One vessel was to be dispatched before the others, and they wished to transfer to it some men from another vessel. The men refused, in many instances, and I think some legislation took place on that occasion, and men were compelled to work on board other vessels belonging to the same owner when required. When this took place I really cannot say.
1192. Are you aware whether this rule applies to the coal trade on the Thames—do you know anything about that trade? I think they have a system there of shipping a crew merely for the run, say to Newcastle or to London. The men then leave the vessel. She

James Munro,
Esq.

19 Mar., 1861.

James Munro, Esq. is left to herself, with the exception of probably a boy or two, and another crew is shipped to take her back again, when the coals are discharged. Sometimes these vessels wait so long in the Thames that the men make more money by this arrangement, and the owner is also benefited in a greater degree.

10 Mar., 1861.

1193. Are you aware of any other reason? No.

1194. Do you not know that the crew are not allowed to discharge a cargo of coals in the Thames? I knew that was the case many years ago, but I did not think of it.

1195. It is found to be an advantage to the seamen to change from the full vessel into the empty one? This was long before the steam colliers were invented.

1196. The whipping, of course, has always been in vogue? Yes—since I was a boy at least.

1197. So that that would render it necessary to get an Act for the transfer of seamen from one collier to another, and that would be a mutual advantage to the owners and the seamen? This running system, to which I have alluded, has only been in vogue ten or twelve years. Before that, the crews remained on board the vessels, and went back with them. In London River they had to anchor, and wait their turn for a length of time—possibly for a month. Then they got the system of taking men by the run—up in one vessel and down in another.

1198. By Mr. Stewart: And then, as soon as the boats come to anchor—? The men are not required.

1199. This system results in a saving to the owner? Yes, and also to the seamen.

1200. By the Chairman: You think the way in which labourers are commonly engaged would apply also to the engaging of seamen? I think not.

1201. Not for the Colonial trade—not for the Hunter River trade? Possibly it might do for the Hunter River trade, because they are here and there every day. It might answer the same purpose—paying daily wages.

1202. Is there no other complaint than the mere fact of the money with regard to the shipping? The complaint has always been on the side of the owner. We have many times lost the services of the sailors for a whole day, especially when the gold fields here were in vogue. The sailors would go away to sign the articles, and possibly they would never see them again. Although they had signed articles they would never come near, and we did not take the trouble to punish them in any way, as we ought to have done. They had gone off on a drunken freak, and we could get other men in their place.

1203. Who is it that finds the crews of your vessels in provisions? Sometimes the captains; other vessels have providores. The captains, at one time, all had the finding of the vessels; but these last two or three years the Melbourne boats have been found by providores.

1204. In the case of the Moreton Bay vessels, who finds the food for the crew? The masters.

1205. What system is in vogue in the finding? The articles are signed that they are to have as much as they can eat without waste.

1206. Which supposes, of course, that it is of good quality? Certainly.

1207. Have there been any complaints with regard to provisions in the boats in that trade? No. I have heard sailors complain—no, not sailors—firemen complain, about eating biscuit on board the "Yarra Yarra."

1208. By Mr. Stewart: About eating biscuit instead of bread? Yes.

1209. They did not complain of any deficiency? No.

1210. By the Chairman: You are not aware of any other complaint. If a complaint were made would you think it necessary to discharge the man on account of that complaint? Discharge the man?

1211. Yes, on account of the complaint? No, you could not discharge a man for complaining.

1212. I find the case of complaint is not there was not a sufficiency, but that that which was put out to eat was unfit for use? You are alluding to the case of Captain O'Reilly, I presume.

1213. Captain O'Reilly's, or rather Captain Reilly's name appears? As far as I can understand that case, the vessel was bound for Moreton Bay. In the morning they killed a sheep. The weather was excessively hot, and by the evening, before the meat could be eaten, it began to taint. But that has nothing to do with the discharging of the men.

1214. The evidence here says, "The meat was stinking for two days"? I think there must be something wrong there, because Captain O'Reilly told me that the sheep was killed in the morning and that before evening it was tainted.

1215. Is not the man likely to give as correct a statement as Captain O'Reilly? But has that anything to do with the discharging of the men? If you will allow me to explain to you the circumstances of that case I will.

1216. Most decidedly? The time of the crew had expired. I went to the Shipping Office with Captain O'Reilly, as it is necessary for the Captain to put his name to the articles. While we were commencing to ship the men, one person, who was the worse for liquor, said, "Well, Captain, what about the provisions?" Captain O'Reilly said, "What about them my men?" "Oh," he said, "are we to have better provisions?" Captain O'Reilly said, "The provisions are as good as I can give you: if you do not like to go in the ship you can leave." This was before they signed the articles.

1217. We have evidence here given by the engineer? You will allow me to explain. Upon this the engineer said, "Oh, if that man leaves, they will all leave"—which I think was thoroughly uncalled for on the engineer's part. I spoke to Captain O'Reilly, and referred him to the manager, who told him to discharge all those men who were dissatisfied. Captain O'Reilly, I believe, has a name for having his vessel well found at all times. This - is the first complaint I have heard during the whole seven years he has been in those boats. James Munro, Esq.

1218. By Mr. Stewart: And this complaint just alluded to is the only one? Yes—this man who was half tipsy said, "What about the provisions?"
1219. By the Chairman: What is the name of this man? I do not know. 19 Mar., 1861.
1220. But there is no evidence here about what you state concerning the engineer? I am stating facts.
1221. By Mr. Lewis: Is not there some inspector to inspect the quantity and quality of the provisions? The vessels are found in this way: The captain takes on board the ship salt meat; but it is beneath these parties to eat salt meat, and so the captain takes also a number of sheep on board and kills them as they are required. Captain O'Reilly was getting near to Moreton Bay, and it happened to turn out very hot, and a sheep got spoiled on his hands, or a little tainted. If the men had gone to the captain and said that the sheep was bad he would have seen into the matter.
1222. By Mr. Stewart: Did you not hear of this before? No.
1223. By the Chairman: Would it have been the duty of the men to complain to you? No, to the captain, and he would have had it rectified.
1224. Do you know that they did not complain to the captain? I am not aware. I think not, because I heard the captain say, "Why did you not come to me and complain, and not go and complain in that manner in the Shipping Office?" The Captain, I think, did quite right. He said, "My man, if you don't like to go in the vessel you can leave." How would any person like to be accused by a half-drunken person, in the Shipping Office, of giving bad provisions? I believe Captain O'Reilly has always been in the habit of giving as good provisions as are to be obtained in any ship leaving this port.
1225. We are not putting Captain O'Reilly on his defence—we are asking who does find these vessels? Captain O'Reilly finds that vessel, and Captain Bell the "Yarra Yarra."
1226. We find by the evidence given before this Committee that this state of things existed for two days, consequently the remarks you have made cannot apply? I was told one day that — 1227. And that on one of those days the ship lay at Moreton Bay? Well, if that had been represented to the captain he would have seen that the men had proper food.
1228. Also that the men did complain, but that the captain was not on board? The captain was not on board! Well, it is left with the steward, and the steward would have got them good provisions.
1229. So that it is perfectly possible that these complaints might have been made and not have reached the captain? Yes.
1230. What is the office of Shipping Master established for if not to receive complaints made by the men, as stated in the law? But the men were at liberty. They were not bound to the ship.
1231. But you have stated, I think, that the Shipping Office was not the proper place to make a complaint. As it is there that they agree about the provisions, it must be the proper place to complain? No, the magistrate is the proper person to complain to in a case of that kind.*
1232. The magistrate and not the Shipping Master? In a case of grievance of that kind he should apply to a magistrate for redress. The Shipping Master cannot interfere.
1233. Will you point out that provision? About applying to a magistrate?†
1234. Yes? I have not overhauled the Act for a length of time.
1235. So that although you say so you are not aware. The evidence runs thus: "The meat was stinking for two days. At the Shipping Office we complained to Captain O'Reilly about the provisions. We were all told to go about our business?" That is wrong.
1236. One of the men said, "If I sign under those articles for three months, and have the same sort of provisions, I shall be starved before the time is out?" There was never such a word said. I have stated to you exactly what occurred—word for word.
1237. By Mr. Stewart: Are you aware whether there is any clause in the Act under which a seaman could get redress in that way? Not that I know of, but whenever a sailor has any complaint to make he can refer to a magistrate.
1238. And unless some redress were given he would not ship with the captain again? They can make the captain pay for deficiency of provisions or for their bad quality. It has been done in many instances where the provisions have been proved to be bad.
1239. By the Chairman: I think you are alluding now to the English Act. You will find according to Mr. Shorter's evidence that that does not exist in the Colonial Act? The English law?
1240. That the English law, in that respect, does not exist here? I do not know.
1241. When I made the remark previously I did so with a knowledge of that fact, and when you contradicted it I thought you had some fresh authority? No.
1242. By Mr. Stewart: You are not aware whether there is any clause to enable seamen to get redress for any deficiency? Only from the Home law.
1243. By the Chairman: Do you consider that captains are the proper persons to supply ships in this way? Yes.
1244. Was it not found objectionable in the Melbourne trade? Never.
1245. Is the providore system found to work well in that trade? Very well; but the captains appeared to have no more to do with it before than now.
1246. But does not the profit go to the captain? Yes.
- 1247.

* Note (By witness on revision):—In port such complaints should be made to the master, falling him, to the manager of the company, or owner, and if no redress is obtained then refer to a magistrate.

† Note (By witness on revision):—Clause 232, Imperial Act.

- James Munro, Esq. 1247. Would not the captain be a fairer arbiter were the ship found by a providore and the profit did not accrue to himself? It is natural that it should be so.
- 19 Mar., 1861. 1248. Seeing then that the captain has the profit arising from the finding of the seamen and passengers, and also the power of discharging them if they grumble —? He has no power to discharge them for grumbling. As I told you before, these men were discharged already, and if they did not like to go in the ship again still that was no reason why they should bring up their grievance at the Shipping Office.*
1249. By Mr. Lewis: They might like the ship very well although they might not approve of the provisions? Well, I have told you that I never heard a complaint before, and if the meat unfortunately got tainted, the captain might have escaped their censure that time at any rate.
1250. By the Chairman: How long had these men been in the service of the Company? They had been on and off, just making a convenience of it.
1251. We find from the evidence, that some of these men had been continuously in the service for five years? They are here to-day and gone to-morrow, in most cases.
1252. Do you think that these men would state that they had been longer in the service than they really had been? As I told you before, they are changing every day.†
1253. But where they have given direct evidence that they have been constantly employed in one service, do you think they would state that which was not the fact? I do not think there is any such thing as any of those men having been continuously employed in the service of the Company.
1254. Have you any means of ascertaining? Yes, it can be found out with a good deal of labour by overhauling the articles.
1255. Would you have any objection to furnish it as an appendix to your evidence? I do not think I can find time.
1256. In that case, if you have no objection, I will obtain the information for you from the Shipping Office? Very well.
1257. Would you have any objection, then, to receive it as an appendix to your evidence? I do not think I recollect of any of the men having been successively in the employ of the Company for five years.
1258. But if I obtain this information for you, will you then adopt it as an appendix to your evidence? You can do what you like with it. I am only stating what I think is the fact. These men can state that they have been so long in the service of the Company.
1259. If these men have been so long in the service of the Company, would not that be a guarantee of their respectability—their desire to remain permanently, and their general good character? The fact is this, they just make use of the Company. If they can better themselves to-morrow they will go.
1260. In other words, they make use of the Company, as the Company makes use of them? Exactly, when they want them.
1261. Then you consider that length of service is no guarantee of character in your Company? If the men do not behave themselves they are discharged.
1262. Consequently, if they are there for a certain number of years the reverse would be inferred? No doubt about that.
1263. Therefore, if these men had been continuously employed for a lengthened period prior to this it would establish the fact that they were not the discontented men which they are represented to be in a former part of this evidence? I did not say that they were discontented, I merely said that they complained of the provisions in that particular case.
1264. And were discharged for so doing? They were discharged previously. Their three months had expired, and they went there purposely to get their discharge.
1265. Had it not been for this complaint, would those men have been employed again? I believe they would. The whole of them might have gone there and then if this man had not made the complaint. I believe the whole of them would have gone again only for the engineer—with the exception of that one man—who was intoxicated.‡
1266. You appear to speak with great stress in reference to the engineer; have you any reason to do so? No; I state what is the fact.
1267. Then you know as a fact that these men would have shipped again had it not been for the engineer? Yes; they came and asked for their discharges one by one.
1268. Then they had not been discharged? The discharges were made out and left there, and any man on asking for his discharge had it given to him. If they ship again these discharges are handed to Captain Shorter to shew that the men are engaging again.
1269. Have you any further suggestions to offer to the Committee in reference to the subject of this inquiry? I think that two shillings is too much to pay for the discharging and shipping of seamen, and that one shilling would be quite sufficient.
1270. Sufficient to pay for their registration? Yes.

WEDNESDAY,

* NOTE (Addendum by witness on revision):—Without having first complained to the master or owner.

† NOTE (Addendum by witness on revision):—If any had been so long, it is the strongest proof they had no cause to complain of the provisions.

‡ NOTE (Addendum by witness on revision):—It was not for making a complaint, but for doing so in the first instance at the Shipping Office, and that on the eve of the departure of the steamer, without having previously complained to the master or manager. Had they taken the proper course, and not have attempted to obstruct the service of the Company, I believe they would all have signed the articles again.

WEDNESDAY, 27 MARCH, 1861.

Present:—

Mr. DOUGLAS,
Mr. LEWIS,Mr. STEWART,
CAPT. MORLARTY.

DANIEL C. DALGLEISH, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Alexander Milne called in and examined:—

1271. By the Chairman: What are you? I was brought up to the sea, but I have not followed it for the last fourteen years. I have worked along shore. Mr. A. Milne.

1272. Have you any knowledge of the working of the Seamen's Act as it exists in this Colony? I have, slightly. 27 Mar., 1861.

1273. Have you any statement to make with regard to it? I have through working along shore, loading ships with wool and so on, seen what I consider to be a great evil in the system of licensing boarding-houses, and I have heard in conversing with fellow-seamen pretty general complaints about the tax imposed—particularly among those employed on coasters—of two shillings for their discharges. Another thing that is felt pretty considerably is the worse than passport system that is exercised upon seamen by policemen. I refer to their liability to being arrested when walking through the streets merely, without any authority whatever from the magistrates.

1274. Have you known cases of that kind? I have. I know a couple of men, citizens, who were going to see some friends off to Parramatta some time ago; they were actually stopped at the railway station and fetched back as runaway seamen, merely because they were, like myself, men working along shore, and there were warrants out for men who slightly answered to their description. They were locked up until their wives went to the lock-up and identified them.

1275. You say that men employed on coasters complain of having to pay two shillings for their discharges—how do you propose to remedy that? I think the Masters' and Servants' Act is quite sufficient for all purposes. I think this is a tax equally oppressive upon owners and upon seamen. I think there ought not to be this tax upon seamen any more than upon the labour of any other class in the community. I think the Masters' and Servants' Act in operation in this Colony is quite sufficient for the coasting trade.

1276. Would you propose to abolish the Shipping Office altogether with regard to the coasting trade of the Colony? I would.

1277. Do you think there is any protection for seamen in it? I do not. Whatever protection it affords is, I think, quite the other way.

1278. How long have you been in this Colony? I came here on the 20th February, 1842.

1279. In what capacity have you been employed since? I was in the coasting trade till within the last fourteen years. During three years and a half I was in the Government service as boatman to the civil engineer of Cockatoo Island. I resigned that about six years ago.

1280. Are you aware of the prevalence of the system of crimping at one time in the Colony? I believe it never existed to a greater extent than at the present moment.

1281. Will you explain what you mean? I do not mean to say that it extends to all the boarding-houses, there are exceptions, but I believe many of them keep on one or two persons expressly for the purpose of crimping seamen. I have seen, when I have been working on board ships, a man come lounging about, perhaps smoking his pipe, or fishing, get into a conversation with the seamen, and then drop it —

1282. You mean that he gets into a cursory conversation with some of the men? Yes; how the ship is carried on—what sort of officers they are on board—how the men are treated—what wages they are paid. Perhaps if the seaman has shewn the least disaffection to the ship, he is met coming on shore at night, taken to a neighbouring public-house. The man will then ask, "How much is due to you?" "Why do you stop when the wages of coasters are so much?" Perhaps telling him ten or fifteen shillings more than the wages of the port. "Well, I would leave if I could get away." "All right, put your clothes in such a place." It is all agreed between them and perhaps there is some convenient wood-boat, or some convenient small coaster that Jack is put on board. Should there be a good reward offered the man is pinned by the police; but if you look over the papers you never find the conviction of the party who has harboured him.

1283. You say there are no convictions of the parties harbouring? Very seldom. I do not mean to say there are none—the conviction is the exception not the rule.

1284. It would appear from your evidence that there must be some connivance between the boarding-house keepers, these crimping people, whoever they may be, and the police? I merely express what I believe to be the fact—that if you take notice of the papers you will seldom see the case of a penalty being imposed upon the party that harboured the man.

1285. By Mr. Stewart: Do you think cases occur where men induce seamen to leave their ships with the object of getting the reward for their apprehension? I believe seamen are induced to run away from their ships, and that these boarding-house masters make use of them to suit their own purposes. If a good reward is offered he is hustled out of the house with "Here are the police," and the police are laid on his track, or else the police are made acquainted with the fact, and the money is then divided between the parties. My reason for making this statement is this:—I happened to be in Quebec in 1839; the place was under martial law, and I, with some of my shipmates, had gone on shore; we were informed that we must return on board at nine, or we should be placed under arrest; we were sitting round a table, as sailors will, having a glass of grog, and talking of two or three other ships

- Mr. A. Milre. that had come in; a man came in, dressed in plain clothes, and said in French to the landlord—"Where are them birds?" He says, "Three doors further up, in the garret."
- 27 Mar., 1861. 1286. You understand French? Yes, I speak French fluently—at least, I could in them days. I mentioned to my companions that the gun was gone, and that we had better go on board. "Oh no, there is no occasion for you to go on board, remain where you are—so long as you do not make any noise the policemen will not disturb you." That was seeing we had money to spend. In about another hour the twenty-six were walked off to the watch-house, to be dismissed the next morning. No doubt the same system is carried on here.
1287. Have you anything to suggest, in order to remedy the evil of which you complain? I do not know of any positive remedy, but I think any seaman coming home ought to have the right of lodging where he liked. For instance, I might have a brother who was following the sea, and I should think it a great hardship if, when he came here, I could not have him to lodge in my house without being liable to a penalty.
1288. You do not so much find fault with the system of licensing houses as of compelling seamen to go to those houses? Certainly; I think when the Seamen's Home is erected, it will stop a great deal of this crimping system.
1289. By Captain Moriarty: You have cited cases where the system in operation has led to the abstraction of men from the ships to which they have belonged, by crimps or some persons connected with boarding-houses—does not that shew you the necessity of some mode of registering seamen—? I do not know any system that cannot be evaded. In Quebec, when the place was under martial law, there was the most rigid surveillance, and every one who was out after nine o'clock was liable to be locked up, without he had a passport from the military authorities, and yet crimping was carried on. My opinion is, that the binding down of seamen by a number of laws, more severe than those which are imposed upon any other class of Her Majesty's subjects tends to their absconding. I believe these very prohibitive laws causes men to leave their ships.
1290. You think restrictions on liberty in any way tends to create a disposition to resist? I do.

Mr. Thomas Stewart called in and examined:—

- Mr. T. Stewart.
27 Mar., 1861.
1291. By the Chairman: You are a shipowner? Yes.
1292. Are you acquainted with the Shipping Office in this port? Yes.
1293. Have you any statement to make with regard to it? It gives a deal of trouble to vessels trading coastwise, to Melbourne, Moreton Bay, and New Zealand. It is very troublesome to have to take hands down to the Shipping Office to ship them there.
1294. How do you propose to remedy that? By shipping them on board the vessels, getting them to sign on board, and then taking them, when they are at leisure, with the captain, to the Shipping Master to acknowledge their signatures.
1295. You would still retain the Shipping Office? Yes. I think it is a service to merchant vessels, but not to vessels trading on this coast.
1296. You mean to English and foreign merchant vessels? Yes.
1297. I think the provisions of the Imperial Act extend to them? It is no benefit to coasters whatever.
1298. What do you principally complain of? There is the detention caused by going there to ship your men. If a large vessel is shipping men you are kept waiting about all day; and if you ship a man without going to the Shipping Office, and he works seven or eight days without signing the articles, he can demand days pay for the time he has been on board. Another objection is, that if I engage a man on the wharf and take him down to sign, there are a number of hangers about the Police Office who will maltreat him if he is willing to engage at less wages than they tell him are the wages of the port. I have myself seen men assaulted for that reason.
1299. Do you employ any other than seamen's labour? I employ tradesmen sometimes.
1300. In what way do you engage them? By the day or by the job.
1301. Or by the week? No, mostly by the day or by the job; perhaps there is not a week's work for them.
1302. Do they sign any articles? No.
1303. Do you find any difficulty in keeping these men, or in getting anything you require to have done, done by them? No; sometimes they get on the spree.
1304. Have you any reason to think that seamen require articles more than tradesmen? I think they do, more than tradesmen.
1305. Have you any reason for thinking so? Yes, I think they want something to bind them, for they often refuse work, and say, "It is none of my work."
1306. Is there any reason why seamen should be bound, more than any other particular class? They may refuse work, and say it is none of their work, for instance, they might refuse to lend a hand to a drayman to get heavy goods off his dray for cargo.
1307. Does the Shipping Act give any relief in such cases? Yes; the articles bind down the men to protect cargo both on board and on shore. If they were not bound by their articles, sailors would, if told to unload a dray, turn round and say it was not their place.
1308. Are goods cargo before they are on the wharf and signed for as being freight for the ship? No, they are not cargo, but the men are expected to lend a hand if a drayman brings down a load of heavy goods for cargo.
1309. If a tradesman employed by you were to say in answer to some order that it was not his work, what would be your answer? I should tell him to go about his business.
1310. If a seamen did so what should prevent your doing the same in his case? I might do

- do the same thing, but it would put me to great inconvenience; I might do it every hour of the day, and discharge all hands. I might be engaging and discharging hands all day.
1311. And yet you find with other persons labouring in different capacities that that does not occur? If I engage a man for six months, three months, or one month, I have an agreement with him.
1312. Do you require to go to a Shipping Master or a Police Magistrate with that agreement? No.
1313. Is there any reason why a seaman should be treated differently from another man in this respect? There is no reason at all why the agreement could not be made on board ship as well as before a Shipping Master.
1314. Do you complain of the charges? The charges are high; and I do not see why, if both master and man are willing to re-engage at the end of their term, they should be put to the expense of two shillings each.
1315. Do you not observe, that if your plan were adopted of signing the ship's articles on board, and afterwards of taking the men before the Shipping Master in order that they might acknowledge their signatures, it would be necessary to maintain the staff of the office, and that, therefore, payment must be made to meet the expense? The articles might be signed as they were formerly, on board ship, and no Shipping Master was then required.
1316. And no charge was made? And no charge was made; the captain made out his own articles, and the men signed before witnesses. There was then no trouble or delay; the men came down to the vessel, and if they wanted berths, they could sign articles and you could proceed to sea the next day, or that night.
1317. By Captain Moriarty: They could go to sea that night? Yes; perhaps that night.
1318. By the Chairman: You complain of the loss of time? Yes.
1319. Do you know anything of the lodging of seamen? No, I do not.
1320. Do you hear any complaints of the licensed lodging-houses? Yes; I hear the mates and men complain that they cannot lodge with their friends without their friends being punished for taking them in as lodgers.
1321. By friends you do not mean relations? No, friends; and in the same way they complain that they cannot lodge with their relations, those who have any.
1322. Is it against the licensing of lodging-houses you object, or against the men being compelled to go to these houses? The compelling people to go to these houses.
1323. By Captain Moriarty: You seem to be of opinion that the proper course would be to allow seamen to ship on board coasters even when they were about to go to sea on the same night? If it were requisite.
1324. Would not that facilitate desertion from other ships? It would be necessary that they should produce discharges from the ships they had left.
1325. What guarantee would there be that the discharge was a true discharge? I do not know that there would be any guarantee.
1326. You would perhaps require that it should be indorsed by the Shipping Master, the Water Police Magistrate, or the Collector of Customs? Yes.
1327. Then you would require that there should be a regular discharge from the master of the last ship in which the man had served, certified by some person whose signature you knew? Yes; all the discharges should be signed by the captain, and witnessed by some other person. The captain could always get a witness to his signature, as was formerly the case when the men signed articles on board. There were then witnesses to the discharges, and also to the payment of money.
1328. By the Chairman: In that case, there would be the same protection against forgery as exists in the case of other documents—the person committing the forgery would be liable to prosecution—there would be the same protection as the banks and other institutions now have? Yes; the certificate of discharge should be signed by the captain and a witness.
1329. By Captain Moriarty: That is, supposing everything is done in a straightforward, honest way? Yes; the parties would be liable to be punished for forgery, and if the captain signs a false discharge he should be punished as well as the man.
1330. You think it of importance that the nature of the contract entered into between the owner or master of the ship and the seamen should be distinctly specified, that the parties should understand the terms upon which the agreement was made? Yes.

Mr. T. Stewart.
27 Mar., 1861.

Mr. James Merriman called and examined:—

1331. By the Chairman: Are you a shipowner? I am.
1332. Have you any statement to make with regard to the Shipping Office of the Colony as it exists at present? I do not know a great deal about the working of it, but I think the masters of ships ought to be summoned to give evidence about it. All I know is, that it causes great detention to shipping. It is now necessary to go to the Shipping Office to ship men; I have myself gone down to ship a crew, and have been unable to get one man. The crimps now stop the men from shipping, whereas, if they were allowed to sign articles on board the vessel, as they used to do, a crew might be shipped without any trouble whatever. I have known a vessel to be detained a week for want of men.
1333. Is there any reason why there should be so much special legislation for seamen? I do not see it. I think the restrictions are, in a great many cases, very severe, and that these make the men worse than otherwise they would be.
1334. Are you prepared to offer any suggestion to remedy this state of things? I have none, except to allow the men to ship as they used to do.

Mr. J. Merriman
27 Mar., 1861.

- Mr. J. Merriman. 1335. Would you abolish the Shipping Office as far as coasting vessels are concerned? Yes; I think the men themselves would agree with that.
1336. As an owner, do you suffer considerable loss? We do at times.
- 27 Mar., 1861. 1337. From detention. Yes.
1338. More than from the money payment? Yes; but the money payment comes very severe; every voyage nearly we have to go to the Shipping Office; and though the men themselves have to pay for the discharge, we have to pay for the shipping.
1339. Is there any reason why seamen should not be engaged in the same way as mechanics, tradesmen, or labourers? I would rather think you ought to be a little stricter with seamen than with mechanics; for instance, your vessel may be ready for sea, a man gets tipsy, and you can do nothing with him.
1340. Would it not be an advantage in that case to replace him with a sober man? Yes; but if you have to go to the Shipping Office, you may be detained two days.
1341. We are not now talking of the Shipping Office—supposing it did not exist, I ask you why a seaman should not be engaged as a labourer is in the market, if there is no reason for this legislation for the seamen in particular? I do not think there is now, and that there would not have been, but for the gold diggings. At the time there were so many men going to them the shipping interest wanted some protection.
1342. Do you know anything of the lodging of seamen? No.
1343. By Mr. Stewart: You are not allowed, at present, to make any arrangement with, or to ship your men on board the vessel? No, we must go to the Shipping Office.
1344. If you were allowed to make your arrangement and then to go to the Shipping Office for the purpose of having it witnessed, would that facilitate your proceedings? It has often been done. The agreement has been made, and then when we have gone to the Shipping Office the men have been decoyed away. I have known a whole ship's crew to go down to the Shipping Office to sign, and when they have got there they have been all decoyed away.
1345. You think the men who congregate about the Shipping Office exercise an influence upon those who go there to sign? A number collect there who have no intention of going to sea themselves, and to prevent others unless they get a certain rate of wages. They say to men who are going to engage, "Don't you go unless you get such and such wages," or, "Don't go unless you get half a month's advance."

Mr. John Rayner called in and examined:—

- Mr. J. Rayner. 1346. By the Chairman: Are you a shipowner? I am.
- 27 Mar., 1861. 1347. Are you acquainted with the mode of shipping seamen in this port? Yes, and have been for the last thirty years.
1348. Have you any suggestions to offer with regard to the present arrangements for the shipping of seamen? In the first place, I think it is a great hardship that a sailor cannot make his own bargain. A man comes on board a vessel, and says, "Do you want hands?" The captain says, "Yes, I want hands; what wages do you want?" "Five pounds a month." "I cannot give you those wages; my wages are four pounds; if you like to go for that you can." The man says, "Very well, I will ship with you." Another man says, "I will ship with you." "Very well," says the captain; "we will go the Water Police Office, and you shall sign." He goes down there with the men, and there are a parcel of crimps hanging about. Well, perhaps a man owes money to one of them. "What ship are you going by?" says the crimp. "So-and-so." "What wages have you shipped for?" "Such wages." The men go inside the office, and Captain Shorter says, "Are you aware the wages of the port are so-and-so?" So that, between the crimps and Captain Shorter, I consider that the men cannot ship as they like. I have seen that more than once or twice. I consider that any sailor should be allowed to make his own bargain, so long as he has got his discharge to produce from his last ship.
1349. Can you suggest any mode of improving the position of the sailor and owner in this respect? My suggestion would be to let the sailor, as long as he had got his discharge, come on board, make his bargain, and sign, leaving his discharge as a security to the captain that he is the man the discharge represents. If it is still wanted to keep up the Water Police Office, the sailor might be discharged but he ought never to be shipped there. I consider that neither sailor, master, nor owner has fair play there when they go there to ship.
1350. You think the Shipping Office ought to be abolished with regard to the shipping of seamen? If you abolish the Shipping Office entirely, there must be some guard on sailors against their giving wrong discharges. The discharge ought not only to be signed by the captain, but witnessed by the owner or agent, so that some one in Sydney might be referred to.
1351. Do you allude to foreign ships? Many ships come to Sydney whose owners are in Melbourne, Newcastle, and other ports in the Colony, and these have their agents here, who might witness the discharge, and guard against imposition.
1352. If this were carried out you think there would be no need for a Shipping Office? Yes; but still the shipping would require some protection in some shape or other. There should be a boat's crew —
1353. We are not speaking of the abolition of the Water Police Office but of the Shipping Office. I presume your answers have been dictated by your supposing I was speaking of the Water Police Office? Only my last answer.
1354. Do you employ other labour besides that of seamen? Yes; I have a wharf.
1355. Do you find it necessary to enter into a written agreement with the men? I employ my men by the week, and if a man does not suit me, at the end of the week I tell him to look out for another place.

1356. Is there any reason why you should not do the same with seamen? Because the sailor is bound not only for a certain time, but to go to a certain place; for instance, he signs to go to any port or ports in India —
1357. That is not coasting? If you had not such articles you would be in a very bad fix. If the men are not bound in some way or other a captain may take men to go from here to Melbourne and back. When the vessel gets to Melbourne a man may say, "I want my discharge." "I will not give it," says the captain. "I demand it,"—and the consequence may be, that double wages are paid for another man. If this were carried out you would never know how to take freight or to make a bargain.
1358. Could you not, in that case, make a bargain with the seamen, as you make a bargain with the men at your wharf, only that instead of making it from week to week you made it from port to port, and back? That is the very bargain we make now.
1359. I thought you said it was a bargain for a certain time? You must specify a certain time. You would calculate the time the voyage would take; perhaps a month or two, or three months, to visit certain port or ports, "not to exceed" a certain time. If you do not put that in you might keep the men away for two or three years. Generally, both time and place are mentioned in the articles.
1360. By Mr. Stewart: In the articles is it generally the case that a certain port is specified, "and any other port or ports"? If a man signs for any Australian port he can be discharged in Melbourne or Adelaide, but the men generally sign for any port or ports, and for a period not exceeding six months.
1361. It is not usual for the men to be discharged at any out-port? Not unless both parties agree to it.
1362. The general agreement is back to Sydney? Yes; the port they have started from.
1363. By the Chairman: So that it is virtually the case that you do engage your seamen in the same way as you engage men at your wharf, from a certain port to another port or other ports and back, and if a man wants to leave he can do so? If both parties are agreed.
1364. In Sydney? If a man wanted to leave in Sydney there would be no objection, because both parties would be in the position they started from; but if he wanted to leave in a port where wages were double, and had the power of doing so, it would be a great disadvantage to the owner, as he would have to give another man double wages.
1365. Have you any knowledge of the lodging of seamen? None.
1366. You have no knowledge of the Lodging-house Act? None.
1367. You have spoken of crimps—whom do you mean by crimps? Lodging-house keepers I mean. For instance—when you go to the Shipping Office to ship men there are always a lot of lodging-house keepers round about there. Well, it is to their interest to get as much wages for the sailors as they can, because they will then have the more to spend; but sometimes the sailor has no cash, and the boarding-house keeper does not mind keeping him a week or two, so he says, "Don't be frightened, you can stop with me." Of course, when times are bad and freights are low, we cannot give the same wages we can when freights are up; and on several occasions when freights have been down to 18s. to Melbourne and wages have been £4 a month, I have said I would not send unless I could get men at £3 10s. a month. When I have got them I have gone down to the Shipping Office with them, and the first thing has been Captain Shorter has asked them, "Do you know the wages of the port?" Now I consider it was not his business to interfere, but to see the men sign: he had no right to say anything in the matter. If the captain agrees to give the men certain wages, and the men agree to take them, what right has Captain Shorter to make a remark like that?
1368. It appears, then, that you do know something of the lodging-house keepers? That is all I have seen of them.
1369. Do you consider that that conduces to the welfare of sailors? No; I think sailors ought to be allowed to lodge where they like. I should think it very hard if three or four respectable men wanted to lodge with me, that I could not receive them without taking out a license.
1370. Is it the system of licensing houses, or of compelling seamen to go to these licensed houses, that you object to? I think one is tantamount to the other, if a man cannot lodge in a house without it is licensed.
1371. If houses were licensed like public-houses, and the seamen were not compelled to go to them, in that case might not the desire to obtain a license induce people to supply cleaner and better accommodation? I do not see the utility of licensing the houses.
1372. Would you see any objection if the licensing system were carried out without the obligation upon the seamen to go to licensed houses? I think there would be no use in licensing them then.
1373. By Mr. Stewart: If a person took out a license as a guarantee that he was of good character, and that his house afforded competent accommodation? If a man liked to take out a license to shew that his character was good, and chose to stick it outside, I should have no objection to that.
1374. Your objection is that private persons cannot lodge seamen, and that they cannot lodge with their friends? I should think it a great hardship if I could not say to any respectable man who was going to sea, because he was in an inferior station, and was not an officer, "Come and stay with me while you are in the harbour"—or if I did so to be fined for lodging any man whom I knew to be respectable. That is the law as it now stands.
1375. You think that is a hardship to both parties? Yes.

Mr. J. Rayner.

THURSDAY, 25 APRIL, 1861.

Present:—

Mr. DOUGLAS, | Mr. LEWIS.

DANIEL C. DALGLEISH, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Prince Francis Little called in and examined:—

- Mr. P. F. Little.
25 April, 1861.
1376. By the Chairman: Are you a seaman? I am.
1377. At present you are in the Water Police Department? Yes.
1378. As a seaman have you any knowledge of the working of the Mercantile Marine Act at Home in Great Britain? Not in Great Britain; I never was in Great Britain.
1379. In this Colony? I have in this Colony.
1380. For how many years? I have not been sailing out of this Colony, but I have some knowledge of it from being acquainted with the Water Police and Shipping Departments.
1381. Where were you a seaman? I was a seaman from the United States.
1382. You have never been a seaman out of Great Britain? No, I was never in an English vessel.
1383. Are you aware of any causes of discontent that the seamen in this part of the world have to complain of? I am.
1384. Will you be kind enough to state to the Committee what you know of those causes of discontent? I am aware that one great grievance amongst seamen out of this port is paying for their discharges at the Shipping Office; I have frequently heard them speak about it on the verandah at the Water Police Office.
1385. Do you think it is well grounded? Well, I cannot say as to that.
1386. Do you know, from your experience as a seaman in America, whether such charges are usual there? I never saw anything of the kind.
1387. Are there any other causes of complaint existing among seamen here, that you are aware of? They generally complain about being sent to gaol for desertion, and those things. They think they are harshly dealt with by being taken to gaol in irons; they object to that and the like of those things.
1388. Are you aware whether there is any discontent expressed with regard to the lodging of seamen in the Colony? There is. I have frequently heard seamen say that they considered it a very hard thing for them to be compelled to go to a certain house—a seamen's lodging-house—when they had friends and relations in town that they could go to.
1389. Do you consider that complaint to be well grounded? Well, I should think it was.
1390. Are you aware of any similar law in any other country? I do not know of any such law existing in the world, only in this Colony.
1391. With regard to the Shipping Office, you have stated that seamen grumble at paying for their discharge? Yes, I have frequently heard them.
1392. In the performance of your duty, are you brought into contact with the owners or masters of vessels? Frequently with the masters, not owners.
1393. Have you found any dissatisfaction amongst them with regard to this tax? I cannot say I do know it of my own knowledge, but they do consider it a grievance I have heard.
1394. Have you heard any further complaint on their part, besides the payment of the money? Yes; I have heard from Captain M'Clements that he thought it very hard that if a seaman should neglect to come on board his ship at the last moment, the vessel should be detained twenty-four or forty-eight hours before he could ship another in his place.
1395. As the law at present exists, a seaman absenting himself would necessitate the detention of the vessel until another seaman could be shipped in his place? Yes, unless the captain chose to go to sea one hand short.
1396. To go to sea short-handed would be dangerous, would it not? It would in small vessels, because most of them are just barely manned, and that is all.
1397. Under certain circumstances, such as the occurrence of severe weather, it might lead to the loss of the ship, and of the lives on board? It might.
1398. What is your opinion of such a law, as a seaman? I should consider it would not be justice to the captains and owners of vessels. Captain M'Clements was saying he considered a captain ought to have the right to pick up any man on the wharf, and put him on board his vessel at the last minute if necessary; but I consider that would be scarcely justifiable, because a man might walk on shore from a big vessel, and stand alongside a small one, and the captain might take him away, the man being at the same time a deserter.
1399. Are there any laws in America, as far as your experience would give you a knowledge of the fact, which would protect owners of large vessels in similar circumstances? I never heard of a seaman deserting from a vessel in America that he was booked for; I never heard of such a thing. I know I have shipped myself in vessels in America, and I have gone to the captain and told him I had altered my mind, and there was no law to enable them to press me on board the ship.
1400. When a seaman is determined to leave a vessel, and feels in his own mind that he cannot be comfortable or cannot work in unison or harmony with the crew, is he likely to be an advantageous acquisition to the vessel? I cannot say. It is according to the discipline of the vessels. If that seaman feels in fear of what the seamen term the after guard, I do not consider he would be anything of the kind.
1401. We have had some evidence with regard to the lodging of seamen which would seem to imply that it is possible collusion might exist between the runners of the Shipping Office and the keepers of the lodging-houses, by which means they could obtain an undue preference for for shipping seamen who might be in debt or have other means of gaining favour with the lodging-house keepers or runners—from your knowledge of the circumstances at the Shipping Office, would you be inclined to consider that such might exist? Well, it might exist without my knowledge, but it never has to my knowledge.

Mr. P. F.
Little.

25 April, 1861.

1402. It is possible it does exist? It is possible.

1403. What advantage do you imagine accrues to seamen from compelling them to lodge in a licensed lodging-house? This is all the advantage that ever I was learnt, that these licensed lodging-houses are compelled at any time, night or day—at any time in the twenty-four hours—on demand of any person in the police or shipping departments, to open their doors for the purpose of searching for seamen deserters, whereas in private houses we cannot enter without a warrant—in fact, if we know for certain that a deserter is in a private house we dare not go in without a search warrant, and while we are away to get the warrant the man may escape.

1404. Then, with regard to seamen's lodging-houses, the old law that an Englishman's house is his castle is no longer law? No.

1405. The liberty of the subject is violated in this respect in order to secure advantages to the Police Department? Yes, and the Shipping Master's Department has the same authority as ourselves.

1406. You do not consider it is any protection to the seaman? No protection whatever that I can see.

1407. Were you a seaman out of this port you would consider it a hardship to be compelled to go to a licensed house? I should think it a very hard thing. I should consider it very unjust, if I had friends that I went to stay with, that those parties should be brought up and fined.

1408. Even if you had no relations nor any friends that you cared for, would you think it just to compel you to lodge in a certain house? No, I consider it would be an act of injustice.

1409. Do you think a seaman requires to have special legislation for him more than any other member of the community? No.

1410. Do you think he is more childish or not sufficiently able to take care of himself? I consider most of them quite able to take care of themselves. There are some very soft, but they are generally led away by runners for boarding-houses.

1411. So that instead of a protection, in that case these boarding-houses would be the reverse? Yes. There are a certain class of sailors who never think of anything else than to get to a boarding-house; a sailor's boarding-house is their glory.

1412. And of course it requires no law to compel them to go? No.

1413. In America, I believe, a seaman can be engaged on the wharf in the way in which you were relating that Captain McClements wished to do? In my experience of shipping in America I was always shipped and discharged in the owner's office. Whenever I have consented to go in a certain ship, I have been taken by the owner into his office and signed articles before him and the captain.

1414. The contracts in America between seamen and owners are generally carried out? They are. I never saw any compulsion used towards a seaman to compel him to go to sea in a certain ship if he altered his mind after shipping. Such laws may exist in New York, but I do not know of them in New Bedford, a whaling port, where there are some five or six hundred whale ships, some of them shipping and discharging almost every day.

1415. When seamen have been before the Water Police Court and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, it is usual to remove them from the Water Police Court to Darlinghurst Gaol, is it not? Yes.

1416. In what way are they usually removed to the gaol? If there are not more than three or four they are generally placed in handcuffs and conveyed to the Central Police Station, where they are handed over to the authorities there, and they are conveyed from there to the gaol in the van with the prisoners from the Central Police Office. But if a ship's crew disobeys lawful commands, and continues to disobey them for a certain time, the van is generally sent for to take them.

1417. I presume that is to save trouble to the department—to save guards? I do not know. We are sometimes very short of guards.

1418. So that, in case of taking a large number of men at one time to gaol, you would find it difficult to procure the necessary number of policemen to guard them? Yes, frequently.

1419. In that case the van is sent for? Yes.

1420. It is out of no regard to the feelings of the seamen? Well, I do not think it is anything of that kind. I have been in the habit of taking them back and forth for nearly six years, and where one man has to be conveyed to gaol we very seldom put the handcuffs on him, unless he is known to be a refractory character; but when two men are sent and only one constable, to save himself he is compelled to put them in irons.

1421. Do you not consider it is very hurtful to the feelings of seamen to be paraded publicly through the streets—is it not a large augmentation of the punishment? I should consider it was. I have frequently heard them ask not to be put in irons, but of course when there is only one man to convey two he could not well convey them safely without putting them in irons.

1422. Of course he only does his duty? He does his duty as he has the by-laws laid down for him in the book.

1423. You say you have taken seamen as prisoners to the gaol? Yes.

1424. Are you aware whether they are confined separately in the body of the gaol, or mixed with other prisoners, long-sentenced prisoners and hard-labour men? I don't know anything about the interior of the gaol. I have frequently been to the gaol to take seamen on board their

- Mr. P. F. Little.
25 April, 1861.
- their ships, and they have been called out of the hard-labour yard, but whether they were with long-sentenced men or bad characters I do not know. I have had no opportunity of knowing that.
1425. Do you think the character of the seaman has undergone a change—that he is not altogether the simple character we have represented on the stage, but a man who knows the world and its ways, and understands the value of money? Seamen are so enlightened now that they ought to understand most things.
1426. As a general rule, from your own knowledge of seamen, is it the case or otherwise. Are they enabled to save their money in proportion to others. You find, I suppose, many seamen who are very careful with their means, and others who are very careless, as in all other classes. Do you think they require any special legislation for them? I should think they did, because with seamen in general the first thing they do when they get on shore is to get away into the city amongst a low class of characters. This I know of my own knowledge, from seeing them, because, when men absent themselves without leave, and the captain gets a warrant for them, and we are sent to look for them, we most generally find them in some bad place spending their money. There is a certain class of them that generally spend their money in drink and such like.
1427. Have you ever been brought into contact with miners or others that have been kept separate from society for a lengthened period of time? I have not.
1428. Have you heard of similar orgies committed by men in that position? No, I cannot say I have.
1429. By Mr. Douglas: Are you aware of the number of convictions that have taken place under the Act which provides for the lodging of seamen in licensed houses. Are people prosecuted for lodging sailors without a license? They are. One conviction has taken place lately—I do not recollect the man's name—in Sussex-street; he lived near a lodging-house, two doors off I think, and the lodging-house keeper that was licensed gave information upon the one that was not licensed. I have known several cases where a conviction has taken place for keeping seamen without a license.
1430. You say you have the power at present to enter into these licensed lodging-houses for the purpose of searching to see if there are any deserters? Yes.
1431. Do you think it likely, that being the case, that deserters would resort to such houses? I do not think they would go there unless decoyed away by the runners, or some person belonging to or staying in the lodging-house. I know an instance that happened last week—four Malays, who were discharged from a ship a short time ago, were staying in a lodging-house, when a Dutch ship lost a Malay seaman, and the captain came and reported it, and he was found in the lodging-house, with these four men, unknown to the lodging-house keeper at all.
1432. In reference to the transfer of prisoners to gaol—is the van in constant attendance at the Water Police Court? It is not; it only comes when sent for; it can be procured at any time on application of the Inspector of Water Police to Mr. Higgins.
1433. The van is not in very constant requisition? No, not unless there are six or eight prisoners at a time, or a ship's crew.
1434. By the Chairman: Have you anything further to communicate to the Committee? Nothing further than to lay before you some cases shewing the conduct of some seamen when we are bringing them from gaol to place them on board their ships. I recollect one instance where the man was not put in irons; he was taken out under Darlinghurst Court House, by the underground passage, in order to let the governor of the gaol see him; shortly after getting out, he turns round upon the constable and strikes him a blow which knocked him down, and when down he kicked him severely, and was making his escape, when a sergeant of police ran and arrested him a second time; the constable was off duty for a week or ten days from the severe bruises he got. In another instance, a constable was bringing a man down to his ship, when he slipped off one of his shoes, which were large and heavy, and threw it through a large glass window, thinking that for that he would be sent back to gaol, and so get clear of his ship. Well, the man was sent down to the Water Police Office, and the captain consented to pay the damage, so that the man was sent on board his ship. In another instance, I was sent with an American seaman, not in irons, and when we got to Clark's Hotel he pulled off his cap and placing his hands in it pushed it through two panes of glass in the window. He also thought he would be sent back to gaol. I took the man on board the ship, and acquainted the captain, who went on shore and satisfied the publican, otherwise he would have prosecuted the man, and he would have been sent to gaol again.
1435. In those cases is the amount stopped out of the man's wages? I presume it is, but I do not know it for a fact.

Mr. Martin Wilson called in and examined:—

- Mr. M. Wilson.
25 April, 1861.
1436. By the Chairman: What are you? A runner at the Shipping Office.
1437. What are your duties? My duties are chiefly as a messenger. When there are any seamen required the master of a vessel comes up to the Shipping Master, and he will call me and say, there are so many men wanted for such a voyage and such a vessel, and I secure the men for him—supply them rather.
1438. In what way do you supply the men? I go to the door and call out that there are so many wanted for such a vessel and such a voyage, and state the wages.
1439. Is that the whole of your duty in relation to procuring the men? Yes, that is all with respect to procuring the men. If there are not men there I go and get them.
1440. Would it be any part of your duty to refuse admission to any man into the Shipping Office?

Office? Not unless the place was too full, or unless I had an order from the Shipping Master not to let in more than one crew shipping and one discharging. Mr. M. Wilson.

1441. Do you let in more than one man at a time? Yes, the room full. The room is ^{25 April, 1861.} generally crowded. It is a very small room. A steamer's crew cannot all go in at once—it will not hold the firemen and the seamen at the same time. There are two large tables which take up nearly all the room, leaving only a narrow space at the back. The Shipping Master is continually singing out to keep the room clear, so as to get fresh air, and if they stand near the window he calls out to keep them out of the light.

1442. So that it is in your power to keep men from going into the Shipping Office? When I am ordered to do so.

1443. It is in your power? Not unless the Shipping Master tells me.

1444. When the Shipping Master tells you there are sufficient men in the office, you can prevent any others from coming in? I must obey his orders.

1445. By that means those first in the Shipping Office have the preference of shipping? Not always. Suppose the master of a coasting vessel comes to me and says, perhaps before he sees the Shipping Master, I want so many men to go to the Macleay (or perhaps to some other bar harbour), do not give me any but experienced men; I will say, Captain, I will get you the men, and you can choose for yourself. Then I will call out for men, and perhaps when they come he will say of some of them, do not give me these fellows, they will not do.

1446. Although he asks you to get experienced men, he uses his own judgment afterwards? Yes, he takes those that he thinks proper. It is an open verandah, and all the men are standing around, and he selects those he thinks most suitable. Numbers of men congregate round there who are not looking for ships—men who will not take a voyage when it is offered to them; if they cannot get a day's work discharging or working about the wharves, they come up there to loiter the time and pass the day.

1447. Were these men present on such an occasion as that—would you find it your duty to mention that they were loiterers or idlers? Not unless they were obstructing me, as they very often do in carrying out my duty; for instance, a captain may come up to me and say he wants so many men—three or four of these men will come up, with not the slightest intention of going to sea, and say, what are the wages, captain? he will tell them, and after they hear it they will say, can't you give 10s. more, then they will commence a conversation with him, only delaying time and interrupting; then I will tell the captain these men do not intend to go, and call forward the men who do want to ship.

1448. Have you any knowledge of the lodging of seamen? Of the lodging-houses?

1449. Yes, the licensed lodging-houses? Yes; I have been in a good many.

1450. In what capacity? As a special constable. I have been sworn in as a special constable.

1451. What occasions your visits to these houses as special constable? When I receive private information that anybody that there is a warrant out for is stowed away in any of these houses—any deserter from a vessel—then I endeavour to get him.

1452. Is it possible, under the Act as it at present exists, for the keeper of a lodging-house to allure a seaman from a ship to his lodging-house, and afterwards to give private information as to where the man is to be found, for the purpose of obtaining the reward? It is possible that such a thing could be done.

1453. Have you ever heard of such a thing being done? Yes; I have often heard of it.

1454. Have you ever known any case of that description? Not of my own knowledge. I only know by men when they have been brought before the Court, saying, So-and-so stowed me away until a warrant was out, and then he got me apprehended. I have heard talk like that.

1455. If a lodging-house keeper were to stow such a man away, and afterwards give you information that he had that man in his house, it would be your duty to apprehend him? Yes; no matter how the information came, if there was a warrant in existence.

1456. If he were to inform you that a runaway seaman was on his premises, with or without a warrant, what would be your duty? If I thought there were sufficient grounds I would go and apprehend him without a warrant, on suspicion of being a deserter.

1457. In a case where a seaman has been on the premises of a lodging-house keeper for any time before a warrant has been out for his apprehension, and immediately on the warrant being taken out he gives information, would it be your duty to apprehend the keeper of that lodging-house for having harboured this runaway seaman, and not having given him up previously to the warrant being out? That would not rest with me; the man would have to file that information.

1458. The seaman would have to do this? He would have to give his information to the Water Police Magistrate, and on his information the party would be summoned to attend the Court.

1459. Have you ever known a case where any prosecution has ensued from such information obtained from the seaman while before the magistrates? Yes.

1460. A prosecution of a licensed lodging-house keeper? Yes.

1461. What was the result? They have been fined.

1462. The licensed lodging-house keeper has been fined for having enticed the seaman from his ship? I do not exactly know the particular charge, but it was for some breach of the Merchant Shipping Law. Lodging-house keepers have been fined for secreting men who were deserters.

1463. Have you known any license cancelled for that offence? No, not that I recollect.

1464. Are you aware of any benefit that results to the seaman from the existence of these licensed lodging-houses? No.

- Mr. M. Wilson. 1465. Are you aware of any such system of licensing lodging-houses existing in any other country? No.
- 25 April, 1861. 1466. Are you aware of any complaints against the system of licensed lodging-houses in this country made by those who are compelled to live in them? Yes; I have heard seamen complain that it is very hard to be obliged to live in a licensed house. I have heard many acquaintances of my own say they would not go into one of them.
1467. So that these men break the law and run all the consequences rather than comply with the condition of going into these common lodging-houses? Yes; they would not go there on any account. I would not go to a lodging-house myself if I was following the sea.
1468. Are you a seaman? No, I have not been following the sea.
1469. Not at any time? No; I was brought up to the trade of a carpenter.
1470. Is it possible for a system of favouritism or a system of preference to exist with regard to shipping seamen by means of lodging-house keepers—that they could get a preference for one man more than another in getting them shipped? Only in this way, if he had men that were approved of by the captain he might get rid of men he had sooner than others. But they are not countenanced at the Shipping Office; they are not allowed to come inside the place; but they have other facilities without coming up to the Shipping Office. These lodging keepers always have people about them, and they wait on the captain coming on shore, or attend him at the ship chandler's, butcher's, or baker's, and acquaint the captain that they have so many men ready to ship.
1471. So that the system of touting and crimping may be said to be encouraged by the licensed lodging-houses? It is not crimping—it is touting. What I call crimping would be to take a man out of one vessel and give him to another.
1472. You have stated that the lodging-house keepers have induced seamen to leave their vessels to go to their lodging-houses, and if they have opportunities of favouring their reception into another, is not that crimping? I do not think you put the question that way before.
1473. Has not that existed? I believe it has.
1474. Is not that crimping? That would be in reference to deserters. A man enticed out of a ship would be secreted until there was a warrant out for his apprehension, and then he would be handed back to his captain.
1475. If there was no warrant out there would be no inducement to the lodging-house keeper to give him up? No. They give him up if they expect any reward.
1476. Is there not a standing reward for seamen? No, it is at the captain's option.
1477. You know of no benefit, then, that arises to seamen from these lodging-houses being licensed? None whatever.
1478. Do you hear any complaints of the charges for shipping and discharging seamen in the Colony? Yes, great complaints about the charge for discharging.
1479. Who are the parties that complain? The seamen.
1480. You have never heard any complaint about the charge for shipping? There is no charge to the seamen for shipping, the master pays that.
1481. Have you heard any complaint on that head from masters or owners? No.
1482. Have you heard any complaint about the time lost in shipping? Yes. I have heard many a master say he would rather pay twice as much if he could get away sooner.
1483. Are there many cases of delay? Yes, when there is a press of business. There is only one man to ship them.
1484. When there is a press of business, are vessels so delayed as to lose a voyage? So as to lose a wind.
1485. Which is equivalent to losing a voyage? Yes, for small vessels.
1486. This must be a very serious inconvenience? Yes, I should say it was to small vessels. These small vessels cannot keep men on when they do not want them; they ship at so much for the trip; and when they think there is a probability of a southerly wind, they all hurry up to get one or two men placed on their articles, and it often happens that one of the Company's large steamers is shipping a crew, and then they have to wait while 30 or 40 men sign articles. Then they have to come in rotation afterwards, and it often happens that the man who came first has to wait till third or fourth, because if he turns his back to go anywhere to do a little business, he finds somebody else occupying the shipping book.
1487. So that you find masters and owners complain as much on the one hand as the seamen do on the other? Yes, about the delay.
1488. Each complains of the loss of that which is most valuable to him? Yes.
1489. By Mr. Lewis: I understood you to say, that if you were a seaman you would not like to go to these lodging-houses? Yes.
1490. Will you state any reason why? Because I think a man might be allowed to go where he likes.
1491. Is there anything objectionable, in your opinion, in these lodging-houses? Well, I should not like to sit at table with every man that liked to come in, because he was a seaman, or to sleep in a room where there were three or four beds.
1492. On that ground you mean to say it is objectionable to seamen at large, the same as to you, individually? Yes, I should say so. Seamen are not all alike; some would live anywhere, but others would not put their heads into such places.
1493. I presume these licensed lodging-houses were intended for the benefit of seamen? Yes, I should say so.
1494. But from what I have heard from you this morning I cannot see that they are in any way beneficial, but rather prejudicial, to them—are you of that opinion? That is a difficult question for me to answer. I think seamen would be much better if they were allowed to select lodging-houses for themselves.

1495. Do you think these lodging-houses are beneficial to the owners? I cannot see how they are any benefit to the owners. Mr. M. Wilson.
1496. Did you not say the police can go there when they choose to seek for runaway sailors, whereas they cannot enter a private house without a warrant? Yes. 25 April, 1861.
1497. Is not that a benefit to the owners? Yes, you may call that a benefit.
1498. You said, concerning the Shipping Office, that there were sometimes certain parties of men waiting about who did not intend to ship? Yes.
1499. How do you ascertain that? I know them.
1500. You know they have no notion of going to sea? Yes.
1501. How do you come to that conclusion? Because, from my long experience in Sydney and the Shipping Office, I know most of the 'long-shore men, and can generally tell where a man is employed. I know when they come up they come only for a lark. On a day like this there are plenty of them. I had an encounter, just before I came here, with three or four men who were standing with their wet oilskins on round the door, and would not let Captain Clinch, of the "Tasmania," in.
1502. Is it not in the power of the runners to select one man and leave others? Yes, I could do that if I would be base enough, but I would not do it. I have a family of my own, and I would not keep a man out of a loaf of bread.
1503. It is in your power? Yes, if I chose to do it. I have had many a man tell me—though he did it with a very bad grace—that I might get him a ship if I liked. I would say, it did not lay with me. No, I said, I tell you, on the word of a man, the captain would not take you. The captain has told me inside privately that he would not take him, but the man has blamed me for keeping him out of a ship; but no respectable man on the coast would accuse me in that way.
1504. By Mr. Douglas: The Shipping Office, I think you say, is considered a sort of rendezvous by the men? Yes.
1505. And I suppose there are a good many idlers and loafers about at times? Yes.
1506. Has the existence of the Shipping Office any effect upon the rate of wages? There is a book kept in which the names of the ships, the voyages they go, and the wages given are entered.
1507. The rate of wages, I conclude, is subject to alteration from time to time? Yes.
1508. So that in effect the Shipping Office does rule the rate of wages to the different ports? This book rules it in a great measure, for when the master of a ship comes up, after he gets his seamen, he says to the Shipping Master, what are the wages to such a place? He will say such a ship gave so much, and the captain will say I do not want to give any more or any less.
1509. Then the rates of wages are ruled by the last quotations? Yes.
1510. If the master of a ship is very urgent, and requires to complete his crew immediately, possibly he may be induced to give a higher rate of wages—is that oftentimes the case? They are often compelled to do that.
1511. The last rate accepted is that which is entered in the book? Yes, all the wages paid are entered in the book, with the name of the vessel, and the voyage she is going.
1512. Are masters of coasting vessels well known in the trade likely to resort to the Shipping Office at all, or do they go to the chandlers' offices? If a master has been on the coast a certain time the men themselves know him, and they will go down to him.
1513. In such cases a master has no difficulty in procuring such seamen as he requires? Not at present.
1514. And after having agreed they merely resort to the Shipping Office for the purpose of completing the agreement? Exactly.
1515. So that in many cases the agreements are made outside the Shipping Office? Yes, as far as the men consenting to go.
1516. And the Shipping Office is only used as a formal mode of recognizing the agreement? Yes, and registering the men's names.
1517. Has it come under your observation lately that good men, acquainted with their duties, have any difficulty in obtaining engagements whenever they wish? Yes, there are plenty of good men I know very often hanging about and cannot get a ship. They will expect to go in a certain ship, and when the captain comes to the Shipping Office, as they think for the purpose of looking for his men, he has them already with him—men who have been on board the ship to him.
1518. I imagine you must be frequently consulted as to your knowledge of men that come up to engage? Yes.
1519. And of course you must be acquainted with the characters of many of the men who are applying? Yes, I know a great many of the men.
1520. On such occasions do you ever state your private opinion of the characters of these men? No, not to stop a man from getting a ship.
1521. By the Chairman: Or perhaps to facilitate his shipping? If I saw a man was a thief, or heard the captain who had discharged him give him that character, I should tell the captain if he asked me; but if the captain brought him up there to ship him without consulting me, I should not consider it my duty to take any notice of him.
1522. By Mr. Douglas: If the captain did consult you you would conceive it to be your duty to state what you knew of the man? Yes, if I thought it was a serious case. Many men go and ship that would set a ship's company in a mutinous state. I think the captain when he asks, ought to be made acquainted with these characters.
1523. By the Chairman: How do you become acquainted with the knowledge of the men keeping a ship's company in a state of mutiny? When a crew is discharging there is a sort of Court of Inquiry generally amongst themselves and the captain, and all their grievances

Mr. M. Wilson. grievances on the voyage are raked up, and then the captain will mention to the Shipping Master,—I have such a man here, and he has behaved in such a manner.

25 April, 1861. 1524. Then you constitute yourself a judge of the men's character? No, I merely mention it as I heard it.

1525. Do you not think that in that way you may, in many cases, do unintentional wrong to individuals? I would not do it unless I was asked.

1526. Even when you are asked, when your knowledge is of this hearsay character, do you think you are justified in giving—simply from expressions you hear dropped in the Shipping Office between the captain and the men when discharging, you form an opinion that a man is a mutinous character? I do not form any opinion. I hear the captain charge the man with this, and I hear what the man replies to it. A captain will come up to me and say, "Well, Wilson, I want two men; get me two good steady fellows." Well, I select the men, and he will say, "Do you know anything of them?" and if anything I know is not of a serious nature, I will say no.

1527. So that the power does rest with you, to a great extent, of finding a seaman a ship? No, they can get ships without coming to me.

1528. But the captains frequently place it in your power—it must be evident to yourself that a great deal is left to you—that you have the power of recommending? Yes, when I am asked the question.

1529. You state that the captains of coasters frequently engage their crews prior to coming to the Shipping Office? Yes, very many of them do.

1530. So that, with regard to coasting vessels, the Shipping Office can be no benefit? Only particular ones do that.

1531. Did you not say the majority? Not the majority. I mean by coasters small—vessels of 16 or 20 tons, going to Broken Bay or Shellharbour, or such places, getting shells or timber. Only a particular class of men will go in them. Men out of one of these vessels will go in another the next voyage.

1532. Do you call a voyage to Newcastle a coasting voyage? I do.

1533. How many of the description of coasters you mention sail out of Sydney? A great many of them.

1534. By Mr. Douglas: Do the Steam Companies resort to the Shipping Office to find men, as a rule? Not as a rule lately; but no later than yesterday I was applied to by the engineer of the "Collaroy" for six firemen. The demand for seamen is not near so great now as it used to be.

1535. Is the supply greater than the demand at present? Yes, I believe, very much so.

1536. Do you consider, from your observation of the Shipping Office lately, that there are many sailors who cannot succeed in obtaining employment? Yes; there are not vessels for them to go in.

1537. Have you any means of recording at the office those men who are desirous of obtaining a ship? No; only in the case of officers.

1538. There is no register of men? No; if that was to be done, you would want a clerk to attend to it, and he would be kept pretty busy too.

1539. Do you think seamen would object to pay a small fee to secure such a registration? I could not say that; there are some men, I dare say, that would rather pay something than have to come waiting about the door.

1540. Do you suppose the men generally would object to pay a small fee for this purpose? I think they would. They complain now of paying for their discharge, and I think they would complain still more if they had to pay for any more registration. There have been several men, in the course of the last seven years, since I have been appointed, who have said to me, "If you get me a ship I will give you something;" but I would say, "I will get you a ship, but I do not care a pin about the payment; I do not take any payment."

1541. Were you in the country when the present Lodging-houses Act was passed? Yes; I have been in the country all my life; I am a native.

1542. It was about the time of the excitement caused by the gold discovery? After that, in 1854.

1543. There were very frequent cases of desertion then? Yes.

1544. Has not desertion almost ceased now? There is not so much of it; but desertion has not ceased, and never will cease.

1545. The peculiar circumstances that then caused such frequent desertion have ceased? Yes; you will not get a man to stop in a bad ship; I would not myself.

1546. Do you find that the existence of these lodging-houses facilitates the recovery of deserters? No; I have got a great many men in other places besides the lodging-houses. For myself, I have not much opinion of the licensed lodging-house keepers, but I do not charge any particular one.

1547. By the Chairman: It is the system you have not a good opinion of? Yes.

1548. By Mr. Douglas: Are you acquainted with any ship chandlers who keep a registry of seamen for their own use? No. I know Mr. Lane and Mr. Mitchell very well.

1549. I should imagine it might be worth their while to establish registration offices, as you say the captains are in the habit of calling there? Neither of those gentlemen, I am sure, would do such a thing. These touters that I spoke of only avail themselves of such places as the meeting places of the captains, so that when a captain is going away they may tell him they have so many men that want to ship.

1550. Supposing the Shipping Office were done away, and seamen were placed on the same footing as other labourers, is it your opinion that agencies for the purpose of registering and hiring seamen would be established here, in the same way as they are for hiring labourers—would it pay to keep such an office? Yes, I think it would pay first-rate, but it would do do a great deal of injury to the men. I saw the working of that when I was in the City Police, before I joined the Shipping Office. Mr. M. Wilson.

1551. How would it injure the men? Because, when the agents had the shipping of the men, they only signed one copy of the articles, now they sign two in our office; and I have heard it commonly reported, with respect to these agents, that a man would sign for a vessel in the agent's office, or a public-house, or wherever they liked to take him, for one month's advance; but when the captain was going to sea, another set of articles would be given into his possession, with double the rate of advance set down that the men actually received, so that the men would lose that when they were going to a foreign port. 25 April, 1861.

1552. You mean to say that frauds were practised on the seamen? Yes.

1553. So that you believe the establishment of the Shipping Office has been a protection to seamen? Yes, to foreign seamen.

1554. Not to coasting seamen? Not so much, because the same frauds could not be practised upon them. If a man died on board ship, before the Shipping Office was established, the agent was quite cunning enough to tell the captain that he must leave the man's wages with him, but the man's friends never got it. Now we are certain, as near as we can, all casualties that take place at sea, and the captain has to pay the sum to the Shipping Master, and it is paid into the Treasury.

1555. By the Chairman: You have no other means of ascertaining casualties than the log of the ship? The newspapers generally mention casualties in giving particulars of a vessel's voyage.

1556. Those particulars are furnished by the captain in the first instance? Yes.

1557. Consequently, if there is any desire on his part to act dishonestly, you have no means of detecting it, unless on the information of some of the crew? We are sure to hear of it if anything does take place.

1558. By Mr. Douglas: It is your opinion that if the hiring of seamen were left to private agencies it would very possibly subject the sailors to deception? Yes.

1559. Are sailors more likely to be deceived than any other class of labourers? I think they are.

1560. Does that apply to the coasting trade also? Yes, the coasting trade generally. When I say the coasting trade I mean to New Zealand, Adelaide, Melbourne, and other places.

1561. By the Chairman: Do you consider New Zealand a coasting voyage? They call it all Australasia. I go by the way they consider the voyage in the office in shipping the men.

1562. Are there any coasting articles here, as distinguished from foreign? Yes, there are two forms.

1563. One under the Colonial and the other under the Imperial Act? Yes.

1564. Do the Colonial articles extend to New Zealand? Yes, to any part of Australasia.

1565. Is New Zealand in Australasia? Yes, one of the Australasian Colonies. I think it is included—by the way I have heard them read the articles.

1566. Do the crews of the "Lord Worsley," "Lord Ashley," and other vessels in the New Zealand trade, sign articles at the Shipping Office, as a rule? Yes, always.

1567. In what way do you consider that seamen are protected by the Shipping Office—you have not stated any protection that seamen receive in the coasting trade? As regards having their wages paid correctly, I think it is a protection to them.

1568. Do seamen not require, in many instances, to sue for their wages? Yes, that is when they object to the amount the captain thinks proper to pay them.

1569. If a dispute should arise in other cases, would they not still be open to sue for their wages? Yes, I should say they would.

1570. There is nothing compulsory, as regards wages, in the Shipping Office? Yes, the Shipping Master can compel payment.

1571. In what way? He can instruct the men how to take proceedings.

1572. Advise them to go to a solicitor, in the same way as the "Norna's" crew were instructed? I do not think that was in the Shipping Office. I think that must have been some outside influence.

1573. Were not the wages awarded under the Shipping Master? That was after they agreed to take their wages.

1574. If a man is only told to go to a solicitor, what protection is there? He is not told to go to a solicitor; he is told to go to the Water Police Magistrate and file an information against the captain.

1575. Take out a summons? Yes, for his wages; and the Shipping Master attends the Court with the articles. When a man comes in to get his discharge, before the Shipping Master signs it he asks have you got your wages, and if a man says no, he makes a memorandum in the book that taking his discharge does not affect the man's claim for wages.

1576. Is there anything further you have to communicate? No.

PRESENT SYSTEM OF TENDERING FOR THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE of the Legislative Assembly, appointed on the 29th January last, "to examine into the present system of Tendering for the Public Service, with power to inquire generally into the mode of expending Money voted by Parliament for specific objects," and to whom, at the same time, were referred "the Proceedings of, and Minutes of Evidence taken before, the similar Committee of the last Session of the late Parliament,"—have agreed to the following Report:—

In the course of the inquiry intrusted to them, Your Committee have examined several witnesses, who, from their acquaintance with the present system of tendering for the public service, derived on the one hand from official sources, and on the other, from practical experience in tendering, your Committee thought might be able to afford useful information.

The present Regulations, appended hereto, prescribed for the proceedings of Tender Boards, seem to your Committee to be suitable, though the general tenor of the evidence has led your Committee to the conclusion that some dissatisfaction exists amongst the trading community as to the mode in which the present system is administered.

This dissatisfaction appears to arise partly from the construction of the Tender Boards as well as from the mode in which their decisions are arrived at, and afterwards announced.

The majority of witnesses complain that the Boards, on account of the inexperience of the members, cannot in many cases be qualified to form a competent opinion as to the relative value of articles submitted for their approval, and that in some cases the proper tests have not been used when samples were supplied.

One case in particular came under the notice of your Committee, in which the rejection of a tender for oil, made by Mr. Harbottle, and the acceptance of another tender at a higher price, without the application of any proper tests, seems to have occasioned loss and inconvenience to the public service.

The witnesses therefore recommend that some person acquainted with trade, but no longer engaged in business, should be retained by the Government, to act and advise with each Official Board.

They

They also suggest, as a means of relieving the Board from difficulty in choosing between the numerous samples tendered, that fixed patterns should, as far as possible, be adopted, according to which articles should be supplied.

The chief cause of complaint, however, appears to arise from the length of time which elapses from the date of the tenders being sent in and their acceptance or rejection.

The attention of your Committee having been called to two cases of tendering in which the business firm was concerned of which the Honorable the Colonial Treasurer, Mr. E. C. Weekes, is a member, your Committee investigated the same.

The following appear to be the material facts connected with the case as to which there is most evidence before the Committee. On the 19th September, 1859, tenders for 400 pairs of handcuffs were called for by the Colonial Treasurer, Mr. E. C. Weekes. On the appearance of the advertisement in the Gazette, it appears that Mr. Charles Wye Weekes, a partner in the firm of which the Colonial Treasurer, Mr. E. C. Weekes, is a member, called the attention of Mr. Audsley, a clerk in his office, to the advertisement, and told him that they had formerly supplied some handcuffs to a party who had tendered to the Government, and that he would supply him at a certain rate if Mr. Audsley would tender for them.

Vide, 471.

It also appears that Mr. C. W. Weekes had formerly been desirous of tendering in his own name, but did not do so, in consequence of objections raised by Mr. E. C. Weekes.

Vide, 532.

On receiving the above intimation from Mr. C. W. Weekes, Mr. Audsley sent in a tender for the handcuffs required, at the same time requesting that the answer to his tender might be sent to the Post Office. Though not unusual for Mr. Audsley to receive letters at the Post Office, it appears that Mr. C. W. Weekes suggested that the answer should be sent there; Mr. Audsley apparently believing that the reason for the suggestion was that Mr. E. C. Weekes might not become aware of the transaction.

Vide, 559.

From the evidence of Mr. C. W. Weekes, and Mr. Audsley, it appears there was no sale of the handcuffs to the latter gentleman, until after the tender had been accepted by the Government. The evidence of both these gentlemen proves that Mr. C. W. Weekes was at liberty to sell the handcuffs to any person making an eligible offer, and that Mr. Audsley was not, in any way, bound to take the handcuffs, unless his tender was accepted.

The tender, however, was accepted for one-half of the number of handcuffs offered, Mr. E. C. Weekes, the Colonial Treasurer marking his approval of the tender by affixing his initials to it in the usual way.

For these handcuffs Mr. Audsley was paid by a cheque from the Colonial Storekeeper's department. This cheque was given in payment for the handcuffs by Mr. Audsley to Mr. C. W. Weekes, and by him paid into the Bank account of E. C. Weekes & Co.; Mr. Audsley receiving and making a profit of about seventeen shillings and sixpence on the transaction.

Thus,

Thus, though Mr. Audsley bought the handcuffs from the firm of E. C. Weekes & Co., and re-sold them to the Government, it is a question for the consideration of your Honorable House, whether the letter of the 28th section of the Constitution Act was not evaded, whilst it was violated in principle. That section is as follows,—

“ Any person who shall directly or indirectly himself or by any person “ whatsoever in trust for him or for his use or benefit or on his account “ undertake execute hold or enjoy in the whole or in part any contract
 “ or agreement for or on account of the public service shall be incapable
 “ of being summoned or elected or of sitting or acting as a Member of “ the Legislative Council or Legislative Assembly during the time he “ shall execute hold or enjoy any such contract or any part or share “ thereof or any benefit or emolument arising from the same and if any “ person being a Member of such Council or Assembly shall enter “ into any such contract or agreement or having entered into it shall “ continue to hold it his seat shall be declared by the said Legislative “ Council or Legislative Assembly as the case may require to be void
 “ and thereupon the same shall become and be void accordingly Provided “ always that nothing herein contained shall extend to any contract or “ agreement made entered into or accepted by any Incorporated Company
 “ or any Trading Company consisting of more than Twenty persons
 “ where such contract or agreement shall be made entered into or accepted
 “ for the general benefit of such Incorporated or Trading Company.”

In conclusion, your Committee recommend,—

First—The appointment, from time to time, of some non-official person to act with each Tender Board.

Second—The adoption, as far as possible, of fixed patterns.

Third—The attendance of Tenderers when the Tenders are opened, and the quicker announcement of the decisions of the Board.

Fourth—A strict adherence, in other respects, to the Regulations now in force.

ON THE

PRESENT SYSTEM OF TENDERING FOR THE PUBLIC SERVICE.

W. C. WINDEYER, ESQUIRE, IN THE CHAIR.

The Honorable Elias Carpenter Weekes, Esquire, M.P., Treasurer and Secretary for Finance and Trade, examined:—

1. By the Chairman: This Committee has been appointed "to examine into the present system of tendering for the public service, with power to inquire generally into the mode of expending money voted by Parliament for specific objects." Will you state what departments of the Government chiefly have to deal with the tendering system? I should say, for magnitude, the Department of Works, decidedly.
2. And next to the Department of Works? Perhaps my own, the Treasury.
3. I suppose the Colonial Secretary's Department has little if anything to do with it? I am not aware that he calls for tenders for anything.
4. Will you state what is the plan generally adopted when it is intended to carry out the objects for which a specific sum of money has been voted by Parliament? The system of tendering, so far as my department is concerned, resolves itself chiefly into two divisions, that is, where tenders for supplies pass into contracts, and where they are simple tenders followed by the immediate supply of articles named. The distinction arises thus: there are some tenders which are for services spreading over a period of time; these are always the subject of contract, and they pass into and become contracts, the party tendering, with two sureties, entering into a bond for due performance. In other cases, where the tender is for certain works to be performed, the same process takes place; the tender becomes a contract and we require from the party sureties, himself and two bondsmen, for the due performance of the work whatever it may be. Therefore, in these two cases, there is a positive contract, by bond. The other class of cases includes tenders for the supply of stores—odds and ends, hardware, slops, and so on, which are wanted from time to time. A tender is called for, and the party simply tenders at a certain rate, supplies the goods, and gets paid; he is not required to enter into any bond or contract of any kind; his tender, if the lowest, is accepted; he supplies the goods, and is paid. That is the chief distinction between the two classes of tenders. The way they are dealt with is this: tenders are duly advertised for in the Government Gazette. I have a form of advertisement

Esq., M.P.

advertisement here, for provisions, forage, and such articles required for the country districts, generally for gaols and so forth—"Notice is hereby given, that tenders will be received at this office until 12 o'clock of Tuesday, 21st February next, for furnishing for the Colonial Service the supplies undermentioned, in such quantities as may be required during twelve calendar months, commencing 1st April, 1860, upon the conditions hereafter specified." The conditions are very lengthy; they mention the periods at which payments are to be made, and, likewise, that the party whose tender is accepted is to enter into a bond, himself and two sureties, for securing the due performance of the contract. When the tenders are brought to the Treasury by the respective tenderers, they are deposited, by the parties themselves, in a box which is kept at the Treasury for that purpose. That box is kept locked with two distinct locks and keys—one of which is kept by the Colonial Storekeeper, and the other by the Under Secretary for Finance. When the time appointed for opening the tenders arrives, a Board, generally consisting of the Inspector General of Police, the Immigration Agent, the Colonial Storekeeper, and the Under Secretary for Finance, assemble to open the tenders. The tender box is produced and unlocked by the gentlemen who hold the separate keys, and all the tenders are then opened in the presence of the Board. They sort them, number them, and sign them, and they are then handed over to the Under Secretary to be placed in schedule, which is often a very tedious process. I have here a blank form of one description of tender called for for general supplies for gaols and all other establishments, the particulars, of course, naming separate prices for all these articles. (The witness handed in the same. Vide Appendix A to II.) Well then, as there are often many tenders, it is necessary to what they call place these tenders in schedule, because it is often a very great nicety which is really the lowest tender; it has to be worked out with a vast deal of trouble, to see what the total really produces. It may be that, in the case of minor articles, of which the consumption is very small, the tenderer may put in exceedingly low prices, so that it strikes the eye at first that this particular tender must be the lowest, because there are so many articles so much lower than others; but when you come to investigate it you find the quantity of these articles consumed is comparatively insignificant. The real test of a tender of this kind is in respect to articles of great consumption, and it is upon these principally that all tenders turn. Rations and forage being usually the largest items, of course where they are lowest in price the total of that tender will work out the lowest, taking into consideration the quantity consumed of each article. The Board then, as I have stated, schedule the whole of these tenders; and, after ascertaining by computation, and often by comparison of the consumption of previous years, the Board then decide upon some one tender and recommend that it be accepted. I have a tender here, from which the Committee will see the process that is gone through; this is one which has been dealt with, and here are the initials and signatures of the parties concerned; it relates to supplies for the Lunatic Asylum, at Tarban Creek. (The witness handed in copy of the tender referred to. Vide Appendix B and C.) The Committee will see that there are many articles the consumption of which is really insignificant; for instance, yeast, lime-juice, vinegar, tobacco pipes, loaf sugar, and things of that sort. It is only on articles of great consumption that the test can be applied with any degree of certainty. The tender I have just alluded to is indorsed, "In all three tenders opened, 14th August, 1860—(Signed) H. H. Browne, H. Lumsdaine, Henry Lane, Archibald Campbell." As the respective tenders are opened, each of the members of the Board signs in the way I have described every tender that comes in; they number them likewise, so that the proof of identification is complete. The Under Secretary generally brings in to me the recommendation of the Board, and I approve it. The only case in which I think it right to make any inquiry is where I see that the lowest tender has not been accepted, and when that is the case I call for some explanation, and do not approve the tender unless I am satisfied with the reason, which often is, with respect to the supply of goods, that the sample sent in at the lowest price was of so very inferior a character that the Board did not feel justified in accepting it.

5. In what mode do you express your approval of a tender? I put at the bottom the word "Approved," and my initials.

6. By Mr. A. Campbell: Then, practically speaking, the whole power of accepting or rejecting tenders rests with this Board? Yes, practically I should adopt any recommendation coming from the Board, except I saw something on the face of it that would compel me to make further inquiry.

7. Do they make their recommendations without specifying their reasons for arriving at them? I think they generally say So and So's tender being the lowest, and the samples of suitable quality, they recommend it; I think that is the extent to which they usually go in the way of giving reasons.

8. By Mr. Gray: But in case you find it necessary to make inquiries they then state their reasons? Yes, only in cases of that kind.

9. By the Chairman: In what mode do you make further inquiry? I generally make further inquiry of the Under Secretary, he being one of the Board.

10. It is a mere verbal communication? That is all.

11. What you principally look at in these tenders is the price of the articles accepted? Yes; I am guided principally by the recommendation of the Board, but where I see the price is not the lowest I require further explanation.

12. By Mr. Gray: Have you ever found it necessary to make an investigation with regard to the acceptance of any tender recommended by the Board, before you approve of it? No.

13. Is this Board, which you have before alluded to, the only Board which has to do with these tenders—is it the same Board in all departments of the Government? Not exactly. In fact sometimes it depends upon what head of a department can be summoned for the particular duty. The Board is not always composed of certain individuals, although the duty generally generally falls to the gentlemen I have named. For instance, it sometimes happens that the Chief Inspector of Distilleries forms one of the Board.

14. Any other person? In matters connected with harbors and light houses—such as tenders for boats and buoys and such things—the Harbor Master generally forms one of the Board.

15. By Mr. A. Campbell: Mr. Lane is invariably one? Mr. Lane is invariably one in everything connected with my department.

16. And Captain Browne and Captain McLerie? Yes.

17. These three gentlemen are invariably members of the Board, although sometimes associated with others? Yes.

18. By the Chairman: Are there any particular reasons why these three gentlemen should always set in these matters? No reason that I am aware of, excepting that it has always been the practice that certain heads of departments, or some heads of departments, should form these Boards.

19. But you know of no reason why these three particular gentlemen should be selected? No.

20. Were they members of this Board before responsible Government? I am not aware.

21. Did they form a portion of this Board when these matters first came under your cognizance as Minister? Yes.

22. By Mr. Daniel: May I ask if the forms of advertisement for tenders are the same now as those that were used by the former Government—has any change been made? I am not aware of any change in the forms.

23. By the Chairman: Upon a tender being recommended by the Board and approved of by you, what takes place then? The party is apprised of it.

24. And what happens in the case where tenders are rejected? They are also apprised that their tenders are rejected.

25. Is any reason given? No reason.

26. Is there any rule as to how soon they are to be apprised, or what is the practice? I believe it is done immediately—as early as possible after the decision.

27. Is it no part of the system to have the parties tendering at hand to offer any explanation when the tenders are being considered? No; not that I am aware of. I am not connected with the Board in any way, the operation of opening the tenders takes place somewhere else, in some other department of the Treasury.

28. You have spoken of there being two kinds of tendering, the first kind where contracts are entered into with sureties and a bond, and the second where it is a mere matter of simple contract without any bond being entered into? Yes. Here is a form of bond which a contractor signs, which I will hand in. (The witness hands in the same. Vide Appendix.)

29. This is for the first description of tender? Yes. Where it is a simple tender, this is the form of tender, which is all that the party signs. (The witness hands in the same. Vide Appendix.)

30. In the second class of tenders, for the supply of smaller matters, is notice given in the Gazette of these articles being required, in the same way as in the case of larger contracts? Yes; I have a form here of Tender for Clothing.

31. I suppose there is a time always limited by which tenders must be sent in? The time is always named; the notices invariably run that tenders will be received up to a certain hour on a certain day.

32. Supposing no tender sent in by the time stated is approved of, or that there is no tender at all, either early or late, of which the Board approve, what takes place then? The advertisement calling for tenders is repeated, and if no result arises from the second, or perhaps the third notification, it is the practice then to go and purchase the article required wherever it is to be had.

33. Whose business is it to do that? That falls upon the Colonial Storekeeper.

34. Supposing a tender, which appeared eligible to the Board, were sent in after the precise time mentioned for sending in tenders, what would be done in such a case as that? It would be shut out. Nothing is received into the box after the hour of the day named in the advertisement. There have been instances where, after the box has been cleared at the hour specified, a tender has been subsequently put in, but it has been rejected.

35. Have no such tenders ever been accepted? Not that I am aware of.

36. Then it would be contrary to rule and out of the usual mode of dealing with these matters, if any such tender were accepted? I think so. I think it is desirable to keep to certain fixed rules in these matters. The tender box is open up to a certain hour, and if a party desiring to tender has not availed himself of the notice in time, I think he is properly excluded.

37. In cases where articles are bought, failing any tender which is approved of, what instructions has the Colonial Storekeeper with regard to making such purchases? To buy at the most favorable rates he can, as the only alternative, failing the procuring of tenders after repeated notification.

38. Does it ever happen that where goods are required for the public service they are procured in that way without tenders being called for at all? I believe there are cases; they are generally articles considered too trifling in amount to submit to public competition, or anything pressing; for instance, some requisition may come down from some gaol requiring a few articles by return of the mail. To go through the form of tendering for a trifling amount would not only be a waste of time but a waste of money.

39. What is the rule—is there any rule laid down? There is no rule; it is left a good deal to the discretion of the Colonial Storekeeper. It is difficult to fix a rule to meet a case like that.

The Hon.
E. C. Weekes,
Esq., M.P.

24 Oct., 1860.

The Hon.
E. C. Weekes,
Esq., M.P.

24 Oct., 1860.

40. Then such a matter as that is quite at the discretion of the Colonial Storekeeper? Matters of small importance would be.
41. But he has no instructions as to what limit he is to go to without calling for public tenders? No, he must in a considerable degree be guided by the emergency of the case; for instance, there might be a sudden application from a gaol for pistols, or handcuffs, or something of that sort,—something wanted on an emergency, of which he naturally is the judge.
42. Then he is to be guided by the emergency of the case? Where he deviates from the practice of calling for tenders he must be guided by the peculiar circumstances of each case, and also the urgency of each case.
43. By the peculiar circumstances, do you allude to the smallness of the amount of money involved? The smallness of the amount would be one circumstance; it would be obviously absurd to call for tenders for a trifling amount of a few pounds.
44. You alluded just now to the purchase of handcuffs for instance in case of emergency—are you acquainted with the circumstances of a purchase of certain handcuffs on behalf of the Government, concerning which some remarks have been made? I am not able to give the Committee any information on the point of my own knowledge; all that I could tell them would be from mere hearsay, because I was quite in ignorance of the transaction alluded to until my attention was called to it; but I should be glad if the Committee would examine my son, who is a partner of mine and entirely manages and controls the business, in which I take no part whatever; I simply call there and open the letters at post time; beyond that I do not interfere with any matters of business. I have requested my son, if called upon by the Committee, to produce all the books bearing on the subject.
45. The case to which I allude was a case of tender for handcuffs, in September, 1859; for the sake of identifying it I may say it was mentioned in one of the public journals? Yes; I do not recollect the date.
46. Have you the papers referring to this tender? I have not.
47. I presume the papers are in your office? In the Colonial Storekeeper's Office.
48. Supposing the tender was initialled by you—the one I am speaking of for handcuffs—there were two tenders from your firm which have been alluded to? No, I do not say that; I do not say they were tenders from my firm.
49. You are a partner in the firm of E. C. Weekes & Co.? Yes.
50. Your son is your partner? One son.
51. Your eldest son, Mr. Charles Weekes? Yes.
52. But not your younger son? Not my younger son.
53. What is his name? John—J. W.
54. You yourself and your eldest son constitute the firm? I have a partner in England.
55. Has he been long in England, the other partner? He has never been in the Colony.
56. Yourself and your eldest son constitute the members of the firm in the Colony? In the Colony.
57. You say that of this matter you yourself have no personal knowledge? Not the slightest; it was only when my attention was called to it, a very considerable time afterwards, that I had any knowledge of it.
58. Does your younger son assist in the business? No, he is in the Commercial Bank; at that particular time he was a mere idler; it was before he had obtained a situation; he had just returned from the country, and was doing nothing, in fact.
59. When you initialled this tender, did you observe who it was from—either of these relating to handcuffs? One you will perceive is initialled by Mr. Robert Campbell.
60. But the second one? The second one only I think bears my initials.
61. Did you observe at the time whose tender that was? I did not; and I think that if my attention had been called to it, if the name had struck me, I should have hesitated. It is rather an uncommon name, and I am sure if the name had struck me I should naturally have liked to inquire into it.
62. You allude to the tender of Mr. Rayment Audsley? Yes.
63. At the date of that tender was a person of that name in your employ? Yes, he was.
64. Does your firm, in their business, deal in such articles as handcuffs? Yes.
65. Is this gentleman in your service at the present time? Still.
66. In such a case as that, how would payment be made? It would be made to the party tendering.
67. In what way—by cheque? Always by cheque, I believe; I do not know the exact rule, but I think it would be paid by the cheque of the Colonial Storekeeper; that is the usual way.
68. Does that cheque in any way come into your office? I do not know.
69. What is the ordinary course of proceeding in case of payments? Which cheque are you alluding to.
70. A cheque of this nature, to pay this contractor—what is the mode of payment? Excepting I contracted myself, I apprehend it would not come into my office.
71. Is there any voucher that is approved of by the Under Secretary, or anything of that kind? No; the tender is sent in in the form which I have put in, that the party is willing at a certain price to supply the goods; to that the Colonial Storekeeper replies that the tender is accepted; then the goods would be sent in, and the party would apply for payment.
72. And who would he apply to? To the Colonial Storekeeper.
73. Who draws the cheque? The Colonial Storekeeper.
74. What takes place after he draws the cheque? Since the late inquiry into the Colonial Store and the suspension of the late Colonial Storekeeper, my predecessor arranged that, pending the inquiry into the department, the cheques of the Colonial Store should be paid by Mr. Lane, on duly certified documents being produced to him in each particular case.

75. Before that inquiry took place what was the practice? Before that inquiry the cheque was signed by the Colonial Storekeeper.

76. What was the practice in September, 1859? I think the Colonial Storekeeper was suspended in January; and therefore the cheque, in the case alluded to, would have been drawn under the previously existing state of things. Mr. Samuel suspended him.

77. Then I understand that you consider it no part of your duty, on receiving a tender, to inquire at all who is the tenderer? No; whether it is Jones, Brown, or Robinson, it does not matter at all to me, provided the articles are good, at the lowest price, and the tender is recommended by the Board.

78. By Mr. A. Campbell: Supposing you saw the name of my friend Mr. Egan, here, to a tender, would not that strike your notice? I dare say it might; but I should know there were many persons of the same name in existence, and I should not certainly think it my duty to inquire whether the person making the tender was a Member of the Assembly.

79. Not in any case? In the case I have alluded to, had the name occurred to me, being a very unusual name, I should have made inquiry.

80. I refer merely to the general question—you said you did not care whether the tender were made by Smith, Brown, or Robinson, you accept it without reference to his position? Yes; if the Board recommend to me that Brown, or Smith, is the party whose tender they think should be accepted, I should approve of it.

81. If you saw in the tender the name of a gentleman whom you knew to be disqualified by law, would you then accept it? That is his look-out. I do not think it falls to my province to interfere from what may be a mere coincidence of names. I think it would be an unbecoming thing in me to assume, because there might be a similarity of names, that a Member of the Assembly would do that which he knew he could not do by law. It might be some different person altogether. I do not think I am called upon to do any such act as that.

82. That is the view you take of your position? That is the view I take of my position. I do not think I am called upon to interfere in anything of that sort. If it is contrary to law, the parties must take the consequences.

83. By the Chairman: Were you ever aware before that this person in your employ was carrying on any private business on his own account? No. I believe, if the Committee see fit to have my son here as a witness, he will be able to explain the whole transaction. I can only explain it from hearsay, which is not a very satisfactory mode.

84. Do you know, of your own knowledge, whether these articles were supplied from your establishment? Yes; I have examined the books, and I find that these articles were supplied from my establishment, to these respective parties, at a price which I find credited in the books as being paid, and which was not the price paid by the Government to them.

85. Your explanation is this, then, that the articles were sold in the one case to your younger son, and in the other to Mr. Rayment Audsley, and by them resold to the Government? So I am informed. I see certain entries in the books which bear out that presumption, and I feel sure that must have been the case. However, my son will be able to explain exactly what it was.

86. Does your son or yourself manage the bank account—is it in the name of your son or yourself? In the name of the firm.

87. Do you know whether that cheque was paid in to your account? No, I do not.

88. You have not inquired? I have not.

89. Mr. Audsley is still in your employ? Yes.

90. By Mr. Arnold: Is there any rule in the Government service that if articles are required—I mean articles such as you describe as not being supplied under contract—that any person who may be in business shall be prevented from supplying them, if he is a Member of the Assembly? I know of no rule.

91. Do you know whether it has been the practice for persons in such a position to supply articles to the Government? I believe it has; my firm have supplied them.

92. Is there any difference between supplying an article under tender and purchasing an article from a shop—Is there any difference in the two modes of purchase, except that one transaction is checked by competition and the other is not?

Mr. A. Campbell objected to the question being put, on the ground that the Committee were quite as well able to form an opinion on the point involved as Mr. Weekes. The Chairman considered that the question was admissible.

Is there any other distinction between purchasing from a shop without tender and taking goods under tender, except that in the one case there is no competition, and the transaction is made upon the sole will and responsibility of the officer making the purchase, and in the other the price is checked by competition? I see very little difference in the two cases, provided the Colonial Storekeeper discharges his duty properly. The only difference is between asking verbally and asking by advertisement. If the Colonial Storekeeper requires say a thousand reams of foolscap paper, and goes first to one stationer and asks the price, and to another, and another, and then takes the lowest offer, it is precisely the same; at least the distinction is very trifling, if any at all, between calling for a tender and then seeing what the respective parties will offer.

93. Is it the case invariably, where articles are procured from a shop on an emergency, that the person purchasing them does go round the town to see where he can get them at the lowest price—is it not the custom in the service to send to a shop for a certain article and trust to whatever the shopkeeper chooses to charge? I dare say that practice is pursued.

94. And in a case of that kind the circumstance of the shopkeeper being a Member of the Assembly would not prevent his being dealt with? I think not; at all events there is no rule against it.

The Hon.
E. C. Weekes,
Esq., M.P.

The Hon.
B. C. Wecker,
Esq., M.P.
24 Oct., 1860.

95. And in practice it has not been prevented? It has not. As to his being directly or indirectly interested in the supply, I take it it is almost impossible for anybody to avoid the construction of some indirect interest. If a man is desirous of tendering for a contract for salt beef, and goes to a Member of the Assembly who owns cattle, tells him he is going to tender, and asks "what will you sell me your cattle at?" of course it might be said there was an indirect advantage to the Member of the Assembly in that particular transaction, because he sells to the man who sells to the Government; but that I think would be straining the point.

96. Supposing articles are immediately required, and you call for tenders where no contract is made; a person sends in a tender signed A. B., with an address to a certain box at the Post Office, accompanied by a sample; supposing that tender to be the lowest, and in all respects unobjectionable, would not that tender be received as if it had been signed by the name of the person? I think it would.

97. And, provided the articles were supplied, payment would be made? Yes.

98. Would there be any objection to receive the tender of a broker, who was avowedly tendering on behalf of some person unknown? He would not tender as a broker. Of course it is competent for any man to tender for what he likes, but he does not state the capacity in which he tenders. I take it the man who tenders is assumed to be the party interested in the tender.

99. That is to say, he personally takes the responsibility of the tender? He takes the responsibility. In simple tenders for goods, unaccompanied by any contract, I very much doubt if the Government have the power of enforcing it, if the party chooses to decline supplying the goods. In all other cases the distinction is drawn that he becomes a contractor under seal, he signs a bond.

100. By Mr. Wilson: Who has the power of nominating the members of this Tender Board? I am unable to say when the nomination arose; I found the Board in existence when I went into office.

101. I think you stated that sometimes the Chief Inspector of Distilleries, and sometimes one head of a department and sometimes another, forms part of this Board? Yes; for instance, if one of the members of the Board is ill or out of town, in that case they send for some other head of a department; the whole concern could not stand over because Mr. Somebody was ill or out of town. I do not know that any particular parties are necessary at all; any other heads of departments would do as well; it is merely requisite that somebody should guide the Government by going into the minutiae of these things.

102. Have you the power of sending for any one you choose to constitute this Board? Yes.

103. Are the members of this Board paid? No.

104. By Mr. Gray: Are they always Government officers? Yes, heads of departments. Mr. Archibald Campbell is Acting Storekeeper. Of course the Storekeeper himself acted before he was under suspension.

105. By Mr. Egan: You stated that, in some instances, upon examination of the tenders, at the first glance at some of them the prices would appear exceedingly cheap, but upon more minute examination it would be found that the prices of other articles of greater consumption would more than make up the difference, do you not think it desirable that the probable quantities of each article required during the period should be given in the advertisement for tenders? I do not see any objection to it if it could be arrived at, but it would be only an approximate amount. I take it every tenderer must know pretty well what articles are most required; for instance, he must know that rations for prisoners in gaol must be one of the leading articles, while, at the same time, lime juice, vinegar, soda, and things of that sort must form insignificant items.

106. But a stranger would be unable to know what the consumption of the larger articles would be? He would, of course, unless he took some pains to ascertain the probable amount. I take it a man does not go into a matter of this sort without ascertaining the relative consumption of each article.

107. Do you not think it would be better for the party tendering to be present with his sample than to send it to the office. Who knows that the sample shewn as Brown's sample may not be Jones' sample. Do you not think it would be more desirable for each party to be present with his sample? I think there must be that amount of confidence placed in officers of the Government, that a thing of that kind wants no extraordinary protection. I do not see that it would be possible to have a body of tenderers in a room disputing over the quality of their goods. I have never heard any complaint. No representation nor suggestion has ever been made that any sample article has been changed from one tenderer to another.

108. By the Chairman: Have you ever heard that they have never been examined at all? No; no complaints of the present system have ever reached me.

109. Are you aware what the practice is in Victoria? I am not.

110. By Mr. Egan: I suppose you are aware that previous to responsible Government parties were always requested to be in attendance? No, I was not. One of the Boards that investigated the matter of the Colonial Store, suggested the alteration of having a set of sealed patterns, sealed with the official seal, which should be kept in the office as a permanent sample, which could not be changed or altered.

111. By the Chairman: Is any number appointed as a quorum of this Board? They all attend; that is, four; and if one is absent from sickness, the head of another department is called in.

112. As an usual thing, it is not regular to accept a tender unless the whole number are there? No.

113. By Mr. Egan: In Victoria do you know whether the tenders are not published, and the prices of the accepted tender? I do not know, but I think we publish ours too.

114. By Mr. Wilson : Not the unaccepted ones? No; we publish the accepted tenders.
115. By Mr. Egan : And the price? Yes. If we publish the one accepted, all the other tenderers can judge for themselves.
116. Was the tender for handcuffs, that has been spoken of, ever advertised? Yes.*
117. And the name of the person? I do not know.*
118. By the Chairman : Is it, in your opinion, the regular thing to advertise them? I am not quite sure on that point, but I think it is.
119. By Mr. Egan : You say that some goods urgently required the head of the department is allowed to purchase? I do not think the simple tenders are ever published; contracts are published; we publish contracts extending over a period.
120. My question was about the supply of any article? No, we do not publish the tenders where there are no contracts.
121. To what extent is the head of the department authorized to purchase without tender—what do you think has been the practice? I could not say.
122. To what amount do you consider the head of the department ought to be allowed to purchase without tender? I should say he ought to be limited to a very small amount.
123. Do you know whether it is the practice, in cases where goods are required without tender, that a list of these articles is forwarded to persons who deal in them, and they put the prices opposite? I am not aware.
124. Do you know that was not the practice previous to responsible Government? I do not know.
125. Do you know whether it is the practice of the Government, in any case where sums are voted for any public expenditure, that, if the head of the department considers that he can purchase what is required within the amount of the vote, no tenders are called for at all, and all the articles are purchased without tender? I am not aware of the circumstance.
126. You understand my question—that where a sum has been voted for the performance of any work, the party who had to see that work executed would undertake to purchase it without tender, because he thought he could obtain it for the amount voted? I do not think that is the practice. I am not aware that it prevails in my department.
127. By Mr. Gray : Have you ever heard of such a thing being done? No.
128. By Mr. A. Campbell : You stated that when tenders were asked for, and no tenders are sent in or accepted, the head of the department had liberty then to go and purchase where he liked? Yes, as a matter of necessity.
129. To what amount is that discretion or authority allowed? I could not tell the exact amount now.
130. To what extent do you consider such an authority ought to be given? I should say in all cases the system of tender ought to be pursued, but it is impossible to say what limit an emergency may render necessary.
131. By the Chairman : Supposing there were no particular emergency, and the Colonial Storekeeper pursued this course, if he exceeded what limit would you think it right to interfere and ask for an explanation why he had not called for tenders? It would not come under my cognizance at the time; a transaction of that kind would be done by the Colonial Storekeeper in the ordinary discharge of his duty.
132. Under whose control and supervision does the Storekeeper's department come? Under mine.
133. Supposing he purchased in this way without a tender, in what case, in the excess of what limit, there being no immediate emergency, would you think it your duty to interfere with him or ask for an explanation why he acted in that way? I cannot state any sum, but if I ever became aware that he was doing it as a practice to any amount, or even as a practice at all, I should interpose; but I could not say whether I should object to his doing it to the extent of £5 or £10.
134. Would you think £50 more than he ought to expend in that way? Yes, I should think, unless an emergency required it, articles to the amount of £50 should be called for by tender.
135. By Mr. A. Campbell : Do I understand you to say that nothing should be purchased to the extent of more than £5, without tender, except in great emergency? I do not say £5.
136. £20? £20; but then I think that expenditures of £20 should not be continued from day to day, because by that means the whole supply of the service might be carried on without tender; it should only be done in special cases, and the circumstances of each case must justify the departure from the ordinary rule.
137. In fact, then, the system of tender is resorted to in all cases where practicable? Yes.
138. And any head of a department purchasing to the amount of £50 or £100, without tender, would abuse the discretion allowed? Yes, in my department certainly.
139. There are purchases without your knowledge at all? Yes.
140. When no tenders are sent in, what is done? We repeat the advertisement perhaps once and again, and then, as I stated before, we are driven to go and buy in the open market; failing to obtain tenders, after repeated efforts by public advertisement, there is no alternative.
141. Have you ever known a case in which a tender sent in after the time appointed has been accepted; for instance, where no tenders have been found in the box, have you ever known a tender to come in an hour or two afterwards and that tender to be accepted? I do not know such a case.
142. And it is not the practice to do so? It is not the practice. The practice is, as I stated just now, certainly to exclude a tender that comes in late, where there are others in the the box; but in the case of a tender coming in at half-past twelve, there being none at all at twelve, and nobody, therefore, being in a position to be prejudiced if it were accepted, I am not quite clear what the practice would be.

143. By the Chairman: Have you ever known of such a case? No, I am not aware of such a case; but I do not see any harm that would ensue in such a case; no one would be prejudiced.

144. But supposing two or three kept their tenders back, and then sent them in after the time? It does not follow that because a tender comes in it should be accepted. I think, in most cases, when there is only one tender, another advertisement would be issued; it would show that sufficient publicity had not been given, or that there had been some combination, which a fresh appeal to the public might set aside.

145. You do not think it a proper course to pursue to accept a single tender? I do not say that in all cases; I think we should be guided by the tender itself; it might be a very reasonable tender, which it would be for the benefit of the public service to accept; but if a solitary tender is accompanied by a very high price, then I think it is a suspicious circumstance.

146. By Mr. A. Campbell: You have stated that the parties tendering are not required to be in attendance at the time the Board are considering the tenders? No.

147. Are you aware that the parties are required to be in attendance when the Commissariat tenders are opened? I am not aware what their practice is.

148. Having in view the large powers conferred on this Board, and the discretion allowed them, do you think that gentlemen in subordinate capacities, like Mr. Lane and the Colonial Storekeeper, are the very best persons to be on such a Board continually, bearing in mind that these persons must necessarily be under the direct influence of the Government of the day, and bearing in mind also that the interests of the public and of individuals are largely at stake and committed to these gentlemen? Yes, I think it is placing no more faith in their fidelity and uprightness than is due to gentlemen of their standing. The Government must place confidence somewhere, and I think it cannot place it better than in officers who have been a considerable time in the public service. I should be very sorry to throw out even such an insinuation against their integrity as I think your question conveys.

149. Have you ever had occasion to suppose the large discretion allowed these officers has ever been abused? I never had any reason to believe it.

150. I understand there has been a very serious investigation into the Colonial Storekeeper's Department, has that been connected with an abuse of power? Not as connected with the operations of this Board as a Board.

151. By the Chairman: You say that you do not in any way consider yourself responsible if improper parties tender—that you chiefly direct your attention to the price of the article? Well, I do not recognise the term improper parties—who are improper parties?

152. Supposing the Members of the Board tendered themselves? There is no doubt they would be considered improper persons, but the improper persons referred to in a previous question were Members of the Assembly. In that case I do not feel bound to interpose, or to suppose a man of a certain name is a Member of the Assembly.

153. By Mr. A. Campbell: In answer to a previous question you stated that you considered a tender signed A. B., and directing the answer to be sent to a box at the Post Office, would be one that would be dealt with? I think the Board would deal with a question of that sort.

154. Are you and the Board in the habit of dealing with anonymous tenders? You mean a tender put in with merely the letter A or B by way of signature.

155. Yes? That would not be accepted.

156. I thought you said such a tender would be dealt with—I understood that an element in the consideration of tenders is the respectability and responsibility of the parties tendering, in every instance—is it so, or is it not? Perhaps it may be in contracts extending over time, where the parties are bound with sureties for due performance; in such cases we should look to the respectability of the tenderers, and their ability to carry out their contracts. In the case of a contract for the supply of provisions extending over a period of twelve months, or for the carrying out of a great public work, I think we may fairly consider the respectability of the tenderer and look into the probability of his being able to carry out properly what he proposes to undertake; but where it is a mere supply of goods, ordered to-day and coming in to-morrow, I do not see that the respectability of the party has much to do with it. The quality of the goods and the price are the chief points to be looked to, and whether they are supplied by one party or another I do not see that it makes much difference, provided it is not accompanied by some other circumstances which would throw a doubt on the propriety of this particular party being a tenderer. I may refer particularly to the investigation in the Colonial Stores. In that case there is no doubt but what a clerk in the Colonial Store was continuously a very large tenderer.

157. In a name not known to the Government? Not known to the Government, but known I believe to his superior.

158. What I want to arrive at is this, whether you are in the habit of dealing with tenders when you do not know anything at all about the names or position of the parties tendering? The tenders only come to me after they pass through the Board.

159. I mean the Board—whether the Board you allude to deal with tenders under names that may be fictitious? I do not think they have any means of verifying the names. There is a great distinction between contractors and merely suppliers of goods; the transaction is over in 24 hours perhaps; the tender is accepted, the order given, and the goods go in.

160. In cases to a small amount; but supposing the amount was large, would they put the position of the party out of consideration? Supposing I were to call for a tender for a cargo of rice, to supply prisoners in gaol, I should not care whether the man offering to supply supply it was a doubtful character or not; if his rice were the best and the cheapest, then I say the public interest would be consulted by taking his tender, whether his character was bad or good.

The Hon.
E. C. Weekes,
Esq., M.P.

161. But would you accept a tender for a large amount without knowing whether the party had the means of supplying it at all? In the case of tenders coming in like that I should not hesitate to take anybody's at the lowest price. It is very different between contractors for a period, or contractors for a work, and mere suppliers of goods from hand to mouth.

24 Oct., 1860.

162. By Mr. Gray: You never pay the money before the goods are delivered? Certainly not.

163. By Mr. Arnold: Is this the case with regard to tenders, that in a contract extending over a period of time you look principally to the sureties? Yes.

164. The sureties must be responsible parties? Yes.

165. And in other cases you are satisfied if the goods are of the quality agreed to be supplied, and if they are supplied? Yes; then we do not want a contract at all.

166. By Mr. A. Campbell: I wish to elicit this, whether the Government deal with anonymous tenders, or tenders which may not be bona fide? How are we to know. Supposing a friend of yours, at your suggestion, tendered to the Government in his own name, why should we say we have some doubts whether you are not acting for Mr. Campbell.

167. If you knew that friend you would have no right to ask any questions; but supposing a man tendered under the name of Smith or Brown—A, B, or C—would you accept his tender without any inquiry at all? For the supply of goods that were wanted immediately, certainly.

168. The Chairman asked you some questions with reference to two cases which have lately attracted some attention—I mean the tenders of Mr. J. W. Weekes and Mr. Rayment Audsley; when did you become aware of those tenders having been sent in and accepted? I could not tell the exact date; it was some considerable time after they were sent in.

169. Did you become aware of it before the letter signed "Joe Hume" appeared in the newspaper? Yes.

170. By the Chairman: Could you state how long? No; my attention was first called to it when the investigation was going on into the Colonial Storekeeper's Department. Mr. Lane called my attention to it; I think he said Mr. Buchanan had said that some member of my firm had tendered for some goods. It took me by surprise, and I told him I believed he was mistaken. However, on looking to the book I found the name of "J. W. Weekes."

171. By Mr. A. Campbell: What steps did you take in your own establishment to ascertain what had been done? I inquired into it from my son, who has the management of my business.

172. In what capacity is Mr. Audsley employed by you? As clerk.

173. Book-keeper or shopman? Book-keeper.

174. By the Chairman: May I ask what salary he has? I think £175 a year.

175. Has he any trading privileges besides his salary? No.

176. You are not aware of any other case where he has purchased goods and sold them to other parties? No.

177. By Mr. A. Campbell: Has he in fact any right to trade at all? As long as he gives me the hours I require of him he may do as he likes.

178. Is there any understanding between you and him that he should not trade on his own account? No understanding.

179. By the Chairman: Have your firm a box in the Post Office? Yes.

180. In the name of the firm or numbered in the usual way? Numbered I think, I am not sure.

181. By Mr. A. Campbell: You say the goods this gentleman tendered for came out of your stock? Yes; so I am informed.

182. Was the tender alluded to the only one sent in by Mr. Audsley? So far as I am aware it was; I take it for granted or it would have been brought to light.

183. By Mr. Arnold: Is it very unusual for a subordinate in a mercantile establishment to enter into little trading transactions on his own account? I am not aware whether it is common or not, but it is a thing I should never think of interfering with.

184. You do not know whether it is common or not? No, I am not aware.

185. By Mr. Campbell: You stated that tenders are published as accepted? Contracts I believe are.

186. Do you not think it would be a great improvement and check on many abuses which might creep into the tender system, to make public the names of tenderers and the prices—do you not think it would be a check on improper dealing with tenders by subordinates? I see no objection to it, excepting the increased expense of the advertisements.

187. Do you not think the expense would be more than covered by the check afforded? A great deal turns upon the quality of the articles. A man might write very indignantly and say I could have supplied so and so at such a price while you have accepted a higher one; but when you came to compare the articles, the accepted tender would be obviously the best. However, I see no objection to everything being published.

188. Do you see any objection to the tenders being opened in the presence of the parties tendering? In some cases that would be a matter of impossibility. In the case of the Post Office, for instance, there are perhaps 150 tenders, and to have 150 tenderers coming into a room would scarcely be agreeable.

189. Are you not aware that the tenders in Melbourne are opened in the presence of the public? I am not aware of the practice in Melbourne. I do not know whether it is the effect of the system, but publicity does not seem to have preserved them from extensive corruption.

- The Hon. E. C. Weckes, Esq., M.P.
 24 Oct., 1860.
190. By the Chairman: How long has your second son been in the Commercial Bank? I could not tell exactly.
191. Do you recollect whether he went into it last year or this year? I think it was last year. But he was not in the Commercial Bank at the time of this tender, and he was not in my employ.
192. That was the time of the first contract? Yes.
193. Did he, between the time of the first contract and the time when Mr. Rayment Audsley tendered, go into the bank? I cannot say; a comparison of dates with these purposes would not strike my attention.
194. By Mr. Campbell: Does it often happen that you find people tendering for articles in which they are not in the habit of dealing at all? I take it a man may tender for whatever he likes; if he deals in soft goods there is nothing to prevent him from tendering for hardware.
195. Supposing you found the Chairman, who is a lawyer, tendering for such an article as salt fish, would you not think that very extraordinary? If the Chairman thought proper to do it, it would not be my business to say he should not; and perhaps the country might be much advantaged by his taking up the trade in so useful an article.
196. Did you ever know a lawyer to tender for supplies of merchandise to the public service? I am not aware of any circumstance of that kind; but I do not see why a lawyer should not sometimes take to trade when he finds his own business rather slack; I do not see why he should not go into trade and reap the benefit of his legal acuteness, which might be very useful to him.
197. By the Chairman: You alluded just now, speaking of cases of emergency, to handcuffs and pistols; have ever pistols been supplied in the way these handcuffs were? I cannot say.
198. I thought you had some case in your mind? I said that because I thought there might be some case of emergency, some outbreak in a gaol, or something of that kind, where the supply would require to be immediately furnished.
199. By Mr. Arnold: Was not a supply of pistols advertised for by this Government on account of New Zealand? Yes.
200. By Mr. Campbell: Do you recollect who got the contract? A dozen people. We swept the town of all Colt's revolvers that were to be had, and also sent to Melbourne for them.
201. By the Chairman: Did any of these articles come out of your establishment? I cannot say whether any person had bought them at any time before this; but I had no articles of the kind on hand then.
202. You do deal in such articles? Yes.
203. By Mr. Arnold: Do you remember whether any revolvers were then bought from Mr. B. C. Rodd? Yes.
204. Was he a lawyer? Yes; he is one of those lawyers who occasionally stoops to trade. By-the-bye, Mr. Rodd has a very extraordinary taste in that way; he gets possession of some of the rarest things imaginable.
205. However, in that case, a lawyer did tender for the supply of an article of ironmongery? I do not think there was a tender; it was an offer, I think, not in reply to an advertisement; he wrote to say he had a large assortment of these valuable revolvers, which he could put in at a certain price.
206. Is Mr. Rodd a relative of the Premier's? I believe he is.
207. Did you look upon it as a very suspicious circumstance, when you received this tender from Mr. Rodd? It did not strike me; but the minds of some persons might be open to an insinuation of this kind; but, nevertheless, as the articles were good, and at a reasonable price, I still ventured to take Mr. Rodd's offer.
208. Notwithstanding he was a lawyer and a relative of the Premier's? Notwithstanding the combination of those alarming circumstances.
209. By the Chairman: Do you know where he bought the pistols? No.
210. By Mr. A. Campbell: Do you recollect the price? No.
211. By Mr. Arnold: Do you know of any other suspicious cases of that kind? No; in fact I am not on the look out for these suspicious cases.
212. By Mr. A. Campbell: Did it strike you as a very odd thing that a lawyer should tender for pistols? I did not think it odd coming from Mr. Rodd, because I knew he was an eccentric gentleman who deals in very extraordinary things.
213. By Mr. Egan: Do you know whether the Board attend on the day the goods are delivered to see whether they are in accordance with the samples shewn to them when the tender was accepted? No; that falls to the Colonial Storekeeper.
214. The Board knows nothing about the delivery of the goods at all? No. Every operation of the Government might as well be watched by a Board of officers as that; you might carry it out into every department of the service; trust nobody, but send a Board to see all articles delivered into store and out of store; in fact, have a constantly itinerating Board.
215. By Mr. Gray: You hold the Colonial Storekeeper responsible for the reception of these articles? Of course, as head of the department, it is his particular duty to see to it.
216. By Mr. A. Campbell: Does the Colonial Storekeeper give any security? I believe so.
217. A bond? A bond. All public accountants do—those who have to account to the Government, and, I believe, the Colonial Storekeeper is no exception to the rule.

APPENDIX.

Separate tenders will be required for the articles enumerated under Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, respectively.

CONDITIONS.

1. All the articles required by this notice are to be of the best quality of their several kinds.
2. The flour and bread must be the produce of clean sound Colonial wheat, from which, when forming part of the ration to prisoners of the Crown, 10 per cent., and in all other cases 20 per cent., has been extracted in bran and waste; except for those who are authorized to receive the best bread or flour.
3. Beef and mutton to be issued in such proportions as may be required for the ration to immigrants and patients in the Lunatic Asylum; and when the quantity admits of it, this, as well as the convict ration of beef, to be delivered in fore and hind quarters alternately.
4. The maize meal to be similar in quality to the wheat meal, and to be twice ground.
5. The vegetables to be supplied are—potatoes, greens, pumpkins, onions, &c., &c.; or, in the case of issues to the Immigration Department, to consist entirely, or in part only, of potatoes, at the option of the Immigration Agent.
6. All supplies (no exception whatever being allowed) for the Penal Establishment at Cockatoo Island and the Lunatic Asylum at Tarban Creek, are to be delivered at those establishments by the contractors, contractors, without further charge to the public than may be included in the prices asked for the several articles. In respect of the supplies for other services, delivery must be made with the same understanding, at such fixed stations within the city or district, as may be pointed out by the officer in charge. The contractors will be bound to furnish any of the articles tendered for, for any service, in such quantities as may be required, when called upon to do so by the Government.

7. In the event of a difference of opinion between the contractor and the party receiving the supplies, as to the quality, the same is to be decided, in cases where the article is not of a perishable nature, by a Board of Survey. The party objecting shall name one person as arbitrator; the contractor or his agent, another; and these two will (previously to any other proceeding on their part) concur in naming a third as umpire; who, in the event of the arbitrators not agreeing in opinion, will be called upon for his decision, which shall be final.

8. If the Board, arbitrators, or umpire, shall decide that the article is not of proper quality, it must be immediately replaced by the contractor, failing of which it will be procured by the department requiring it, and the expenses charged to the contractor.

9. In the event of any unnecessary delay or failure of the contractor to supply the articles when required, they will be otherwise procured and charged in like manner.

10. In cases where the articles are of a perishable nature, or from some other cause injury would be sustained, either by the parties to whom they are due, or to the contractor, by waiting for a Board of Survey, the head of the department, or officer in charge of the party or parties for whom the articles are to be received, shall have power to reject, at the place of delivery, such article or articles as are obviously of inferior quality; it being distinctly understood that he will be responsible to the Government for so doing, and that the contractor will have a right to appeal to the Government, although in the meantime he must take back the rejected article and supply good in its stead; failing of which it will be obtained by the officer or party requiring it, and the expense charged to the contractor.

11. A repetition of irregularity in the quality or quantity of the supplies, or of any delay in delivery or replacing them when required, will also subject the contractor, upon the report of the officer in charge of the parties or establishment, to such mulct, not exceeding one-fourth the amount of his monthly account, as the Government may direct. It will also be in the power of the Government, upon such repetition, to terminate the contract forthwith.

12. It will be in the power of either party to limit the duration of the contract, by giving, in writing, a notice of three full calendar months to the opposite party, and to end the contract at the expiration of that period; it being understood that such notice can be given only from the first day of a month, and within the period for which the contract is made or agreed to be made.

13. The contractor will be required to prepare his own cash account, monthly or quarterly, in the prescribed form, which he will deliver in a complete state to the officer receiving the supplies. In these cases where advances are made to heads of departments for that purpose, the contractor will receive payment through the department; when such is not the case, the account will be forwarded by the officer receiving the supplies, to the Under Secretary of the Treasury.

14. The value of all packages to be included in the prices demanded.

15. Printed forms of tender may be obtained at this office; and at the foot of every tender there must be a memorandum signed by the party tendering, and two responsible persons as sureties, agreeing to be responsible for the due performance of the contract, in the event of the tender being accepted, and undertaking, in that event, that they will severally execute and deliver, within one month from the usual notification of acceptance, a bond to Her Majesty for securing such performance, otherwise such tender will not be taken into consideration.

16. The tenders to contain the names of the tenderers and their sureties, and places of residence, at length.

17. Each tender must be in the form referred to in paragraph 15, and enclosed in a separate envelope, marked "Tender for Provisions, &c."

18. Further particulars and information may be obtained on application at this office, to the Under Secretary to the Treasury, and to the several establishments for which the supplies are required.

19. The party tendering, or an agent authorized in writing to act for him, is requested to attend at this office, at the time appointed for receiving the tenders, to afford such explanation or information as may be required.

Separate Tenders will be required for the articles enumerated under Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, respectively.

CONDITIONS.

1. All the articles required by this notice are to be of the best quality, of their several kinds.
2. The flour and bread must be the produce of clean sound Colonial wheat, from which, when forming part of the ration to prisoners of the Crown, 10 per cent., and in all other cases 20 per cent., has been extracted in bran and waste; except for those who are authorised to receive the best bread or flour.
3. Beef and mutton to be issued in such proportions as may be required for the ration to Immigrants and patients in the Lunatic Asylum, and when the quantity admits of it, this, as well as the convict ration of beef, to be delivered in fore and hind quarters alternately.
4. The maize meal to be similar in quality to the wheat meal, and to be twice ground.
5. The vegetables to be supplied, are—potatoes, greens, pumpkins, onions, &c., &c.: or, in the case of issues to the Immigration Department, to consist entirely, or in part only, of potatoes, at the option of the Immigration Agent.
6. All supplies (no exception whatever being allowed) for the Penal Establishment at Cockatoo Island, and the Lunatic Asylum at Tarban Creek, are to be delivered at those establishments by the Contractors, without further charge to the public than may be included in the prices asked for the several articles. In respect of the supplies for other services, delivery must be made with the same understanding, at such fixed stations, within the city or district, as may be pointed out by the officer in charge. The Contractors will be bound to furnish any of the articles tendered for, for any service, in such quantities as may be required, when called upon to do so, by the Government.
7. In the event of a difference of opinion between the Contractor and the party receiving the supplies, as to the quality, the same is to be decided in cases where the article is not of a perishable nature, by a Board of Survey. The party objecting shall name one person as arbitrator, the Contractor or his agent, another, and these two will (previously to any other proceeding on their part) concur in naming a third as umpire, who, in the event of the arbitrators not agreeing in opinion, will be called upon for his decision, which shall be final.
8. If the Board, arbitrators, or umpire shall decide that the article is not of proper quality, it must be immediately replaced by the Contractor, failing of which, it will be procured by the Department requiring it, and the expenses charged to the Contractor.
9. In the event of any unnecessary delay or failure of the Contractor to supply the articles, when required, they will be otherwise procured and charged in like manner.
10. In cases where the articles are of a perishable nature, or from some other cause, injury would be sustained, either by the parties to whom they are due, or to the Contractor, by waiting for a board of survey, the head of the department, or officer in charge of the party or parties for whom the articles are to be received, shall have power to reject at the place of delivery, such articles or articles as are obviously of inferior quality, it being distinctly understood that he will be responsible to the Government for so doing, and that the Contractor will have a right to appeal to the Government, although in the meantime he must take back the rejected article and supply good in its stead, failing of which, it will be obtained by the officer or party requiring it, and the expense charged to the Contractor.
11. A repetition of irregularity in the quality or quantity of the supplies, or of any delay in delivery or replacing them, when required, will also subject the Contractor, upon the report of the officer in charge of the parties or establishment, to such mulct, not exceeding one-fourth the amount of his monthly account, as the Government may direct. It will also be in the power of the Government upon such repetition, to terminate the contract forthwith.
12. It will be in the power of either party to limit the duration of the contract, by giving in writing, a notice of three full calendar months, to the opposite party, and to end the contract at the expiration of that period, it being understood that such notice can be given only from the first day of a month, and within the period for which the contract is made or agreed to be made.
13. The Contractor will be required to prepare his own cash account, monthly or quarterly, in the prescribed form, which he will deliver in a complete state, to the officer receiving the supplies. In those cases where advances are made to heads of departments for that purpose, the Contractor will receive payment through the department; when such is not the case, the account will be forwarded by the officer receiving the supplies to the Under Secretary of the Treasury.
14. The value of all packages to be included in the prices demanded.
15. Printed forms of Tender may be obtained at this office; and at the foot of every tender there must be a memorandum signed by the party tendering, and two responsible persons as sureties, agreeing to be responsible for the due performance of the contract, in the event of the tender being accepted, and undertaking in that event, that they will severally execute and deliver, within one month from the usual notification of acceptance, a Bond to Her Majesty, for securing such performance, otherwise such tender will not be taken into consideration.
16. The tenders to contain the names of the tenderers and their sureties, and places of residence at length.
17. Each tender must be in the form referred to in paragraph 15, and enclosed in a separate envelope, marked "Tender for Provisions, &c."
18. Further particulars and information may be obtained on application at this office, to the Under Secretary to the Treasury, and to the several establishments for which the supplies are required.
19. The party tendering, or an agent authorised in writing to act for him, is requested to attend at this office, at the time appointed for receiving the tenders, to afford such explanation or information as may be required.

|-----------------------------------|--------|----------|
| | | |

William Munnings Arnold, Esquire, Secretary for Public Works, a Member of the Committee, examined in his place:—

218. By the Chairman: I believe the greater portion of the tenders for contracts for the public service come under the supervision of your department? Yes, the bulk in value. W. M. Arnold,
Esq.
219. For the public works? For the public works.
220. Does any particular Board inspect these tenders in your department, or is it the same Board that inspects the tenders in other departments? The tenders are opened in my department by a Board composed of the Under Secretary and the heads of the branches concerned in the tenders, attended by the chief clerk in the office. 24 Oct., 1860.
221. By Mr. Parkes: Suppose there were a tender for harbors or rivers, who would that be opened by? By the Under Secretary for Public Works and the Chief Engineer for Harbors and Rivers, attended by the chief clerk in the office, and by any other heads of branches who happened to have tenders coming in on the same day for works in their branches.
222. By Mr. Wilson: Supposing there were no other tenders coming in on the same day, the Board would then consist of only of these three Government officers? Yes.
223. By the Chairman: Is the system pursued with regard to calling for tenders the same as in other departments? I do not know.

- W. M. Arnold, Esq.
24 Oct., 1860.
224. Would you then just state briefly the system in your department—on a sum being voted by Parliament for any specific object, what is the mode pursued? A plan and specification are prepared, and advertisements inserted in the Gazette and newspapers calling for tenders on a certain day; there is a box in which all tenders are deposited, and they are opened on that day by the officers I have named in the presence of the chief clerk; they are numbered and initialled by the officers, and the clerk then makes out a schedule of them, and calculations are made to ascertain which is the lowest; these calculations are sometimes very elaborate; the tenders are then referred to the head of the branch, who reports upon them; and then the Minister for Works approves of any tender that he thinks proper, or he rejects the whole.
225. Who has charge of this box? It is kept locked, and I think a key is in charge of each of the officers—the Under Secretary for Works and the heads of the different branches.
226. Then do I understand that, after the tenders are opened, the head of the branch, under whose peculiar supervision the work lies, reports upon them? Yes, after they are scheduled and made up he reports to the Secretary for Public Works, making a recommendation.
227. Then he substantially decides? Yes, the Minister decides; but it is not the usual practice to do otherwise than confirm the recommendation of the head of the branch, because his recommendation is usually an obviously correct one.
228. Who is the gentleman performing that duty now—Captain Martindale? No, he makes no recommendation except in matters under his immediate charge.
229. The head of the branch, I mean? Mr. Whitton, Mr. Dawson, Mr. Moriarty, Captain Mann, Mr. Bennett, and Mr. Cracknell, are the heads of the respective branches; the two latter gentlemen being, however, immediately subordinate to Captain Martindale.
230. What have the Board really to do? Simply to open and schedule the tenders and initial them; they see that everything is done fairly and openly.
231. Then the head of the department virtually points out the tender which is to be accepted? He determines everything, and is responsible. It is not incumbent on the head of the department to take the recommendation of the head of the branch, and it is not always the case that he does.
232. And what is done when the tenders are accepted or rejected? It is intimated to the persons who have tendered, whether their tenders are accepted or not.
233. And in case the tenders are rejected? It is the same in both cases, whether they are accepted or rejected.
234. They are not present when the tenders are opened? Not necessarily.
235. They are not invited to attend? I think they are; but in many cases the tenders come from great distances—from Melbourne, for instance.
236. Are you aware of any instances where contracts have been accepted, in which complaints have arisen of delay in payment for the work done? Yes, I think there have been cases where complaints have been made of delay in payment.
237. What is the course pursued with regard to payment? The parties are paid on the vouchers of the proper officers; for instance, if we have a court house building, say at Wellington, the Colonial Architect is the superintending officer in that case; he sends a Clerk of Works there to report, and on his being satisfied with the report of the Clerk of Works, and on receipt of the necessary vouchers, he makes the payments, as they become due, to the contractor, and the delay complained of very often occurs from the difficulty of procuring the necessary vouchers, on account of the distance of the work from head quarters.
238. By Mr. Daniel: You name Wellington—has such a thing taken place there? I name it, because it is a long way off. It may not happen that we have any Clerk of Works there, and the delay often occurs in this way, that there are several buildings going on in the same neighborhood in different stages, one being finished before another, and in that case the Colonial Architect may not think it necessary to send a Clerk of Works to each of these buildings as soon as it is finished, but comprehends them all in one visit, if this can be done without undue delay. In some small cases, where there is no Clerk of Works on the spot or near, the matter is intrusted to the local authorities; in fact, we have to get the work done in the best way we can, consistently with economy and efficiency.
239. By the Chairman: Does it ever happen that work is done without tender, in the mode pursued, as you have just heard from the Minister, in the department of Finance? Work is sometimes done in that way. We have a variety of modes of getting work done by contract; some contracts are taken for general works for the whole year on a schedule of prices; for instance, one man tenders to do all the mason's work at certain rates specified in his tender, and other tradesmen, in other descriptions of work, do the same, and whatever work of the kind is required that work is done by them. Separate tenders are not always called for, unless the works are of sufficient magnitude; and sometimes work is done without tender at all.
240. In what cases? In the case, for instance, of a railway accident, or a stoppage of the railway from flood or any cause, we get a lot of men and set to work at once and repair it, without waiting for a tender; but then very often it is done under a schedule of prices by some contractor. In cases of that kind we must do it the best way we can, without waiting for tenders.
241. How is it determined who is to be applied to in these cases? The head of the branch would determine and report to the head of the department what he had done.
242. Then the head of the branch would do it on his own responsibility? He would immediately report that he was about to do so and so, and if the head of the department sanctioned it on his own responsibility then it would be proceeded with.
243. By Mr. Gray: In inviting tenders for public works has any fresh form been adopted by you, different from that used by your predecessors in office—in the acceptance of tenders do do you deviate at all from that which others have done before? I hardly know what the head of the department has done before. W. M. Arnold,

Esq.

244. Have you established any fresh mode of dealing with tenders? No.

245. By Mr. Egan: Supposing a sum of £400 or £500 were voted for the performance of any public work, would that be done by a schedule of prices instead of calling for tenders? 24 Oct., 1860.
Sometimes.

246. Take, for instance, the Aviary in the Botanic Gardens, for which £400 was voted—was that work done without tender? Yes.

247. Do you consider that a correct mode of carrying on the works of the country? Yes, I believe that work could not have been done for anything like the price by contract. The Government sometimes have a quantity of material on hand, perhaps derived from the pulling down of some old building or from some alterations; the Colonial Architect reports that he has this material, that it will come in for the projected work, and that it is of no use, lumbering up the yard; the work can then be done under a schedule of prices, which is practically under contract; and the work is urgent perhaps.

248. By Mr. Parkes: Is that kind of work always done under a schedule of prices which have been previously tendered for? Generally.

249. By Mr. Egan: No statement of that kind is ever made by the Minister when the money is voted, that the work will be done by schedule of prices in consequence of the Government having old material on hand? Very often statements of this kind are made as recommending an expenditure or explaining an amount. Besides that, in the work to which you have alluded, most of the stonework was done in the Gaol and cost nothing at all. Now if we had called for contracts we certainly should not have got anybody to tender for any portion of the work at nothing. Some of the other stonework was given to it; and, in various ways, it was done cheaper than it could have been done by contract.

250. It must have come within your knowledge that one of the largest items connected with that Aviary was the wire—do you know whether that was purchased by contract? I do not.

251. Do you know whether it was the largest item? I do not.

252. Do you know what it cost? No; the head of the department knows nothing of these details, unless on special inquiry.

253. By the Chairman: Who can give the information? The Colonial Architect.

254. By Mr. Egan: When a sum is voted for a work, is it entirely under the control of the head of the department as to how it is to be carried out? Entirely.

255. The Minister has nothing to do with it? The Minister has everything to do with it; he is the head of the department; the thing is entirely under his control.

256. You appear to know nothing about this? I know everything about it; I know it was ordered to be done; but the Minister does not go to every shop and buy the wire.

257. Do you think it is right to leave £400 or £500 in the hands of the head of a department to go and buy where he likes; do you think he ought to do that? The head of the department does not do it.

258. I mean the head of the department where the work is performed? The head of the branch.

259. Well, the head of the branch? I hardly know how else you could do it.

260. Do you not believe it would be more for the benefit of the public service to have the articles tendered for than to leave it in the hands of a person to go and purchase where he thinks proper, and to give such prices as he thinks proper? I do not think that is the case, that they purchase where they think proper. In the purchase of small articles, which is sometimes necessary, I presume the position of an officer like the Colonial Architect is considered some guarantee for the proper performance of his duty.

261. Supposing this wire cost £50 or £100, would you think that ought not to be tendered for? I have always made it a rule, as far as possible, to carry out the principle of tender and contract, and, therefore, I have always refused to agree to any proposal for doing work under private arrangement where it could be avoided.

262. Then you do consider the best mode is by contract? I think it is the best mode in this respect, that it keeps the heads of the department free from any kind of suspicion, which is often made to attach to their acting; but my experience shews me that it is not the cheapest way of getting the public works done in all cases.

263. If a contract is offered, under which you think the work will not be performed at the cheapest rate, you are not bound to accept it? I am satisfied of this, that very often private arrangements are made, by which work is done infinitely cheaper than it would be by contract; and in some cases we have resorted to it when we have found the tenders so exorbitantly high that we were not justified in accepting them.

264. By Mr. Gray: Did you make the arrangement in the case of the Railway between Maitland and Lochinvar? I was not in the Government at the time; but it was the case that a good deal of that work was done under private arrangement.

265. By Mr. Egan: Do you know whether it is the practice of the Colonial Architect, when a sum of money is voted for any specific work, that if he thinks proper he can perform that work without calling for tenders at all, if he thinks he can do it under the amount voted by Parliament? No, I think not.

266. Was not that the course adopted in the case of the supply of furniture to Government House by Mr. Lenehan? That was not in my time.

267. Surely you must be aware of that case? No, not of the circumstances.

268. Well, it was arranged that if the articles could be got at the sum voted they were to be taken? I was under an opposite impression.

269. It was the line of defence set up? I do not know anything about that case.

270. However, it is the case that many of the public works are performed without contract?

No,

W. M. Arnold, Esq. No, it is quite the exception. I hardly know any cases where, in some way or other, the work is not done under competition. It may be sometimes that a work is not performed strictly under contract; but I hardly know a case where the price has not been tested by competition.

21 Oct., 1860.

271. Do you not think it desirable that in the event of a contract being accepted it should be published—the name of the party and the price? It is very difficult to say what the price is sometimes.

272. You know the price when you accept a tender? No, we do not invariably know the exact price when we accept a tender.

273. How can you accept a tender if you do not know the price? In this way: Tenders for public works, say a bridge —

274. I mean articles? That is a mere bagatelle compared to our other expenditure.

275. No doubt, but still it is an item of expenditure? There may be a few pounds spent in wire, or something of that sort; but all these things are, comparatively, extremely small.

276. I am alluding to articles supplied by tender. Do you not think the name of the tenderer and the price of the articles should be published? I have already said that in respect to some of our tenders, we cannot say what the price is, because our tenders for large works are sent in in this way: they send in a bulk sum for which they will complete the work. Take the case of a large bridge, such as the Glebe Island Bridge. In such a case as that, the contractor would send in a bulk sum for which he would complete the work, according to the specification; but that is not necessarily the price at which the contract is taken; because, in addition to the bulk sum, he sends in a schedule of prices for every part of the work. It may be that the specification is in some respect incomplete—that is to say, some articles are not included; or, it may be, that the work will be found to require to be done in some other way than is provided in the specification; so that the Government protect themselves against extravagant demands for extras. They can order any deviation which is rendered necessary by circumstances in the course of construction, and then they pay under the schedule of prices for such deviations or extras. The bulk sum therefore may afford no precise information at first view; and it might be that the tender accepted would show a bulk sum greater than a tender that was refused.

277. Supposing a tender were out for two thousand pairs of blankets——? We do not deal with blankets.

278. I am not speaking about your department in particular—I am asking you whether, when such a tender was accepted, the name of the party tendering and the amount of his tender should not be made public, the same as in Melbourne? Well, I have not considered whether it ought to be; the information is always accessible, there is no difficulty in obtaining it. I should think it might be undesirable in some respects to publish it; my impression is, without considering the matter very much, that it would be undesirable, inasmuch as it would be a sort of guide to people tendering in future, as to the price the Government would give. I do not think there would be much gained, but it strikes me as a practice of no great importance either way. But if all this information were afforded to tenderers, they might be inclined to tender, not at what they could do the work for, but at what they had reason to believe they can get from the Government. Now, the Government estimate of the value of a work is generally concealed; for instance, we never make public the estimate of our engineers for their various works. It often happens that the tenders are very much below the estimates of our engineers, and if they are very much above them, we do not accept them generally speaking. It can hardly be conceived, the extraordinary difference in the amounts of tenders. We sometimes have for instance a large sum, say £2,000, voted for a work, for which the bulk of the tenders will come in, all ranging within a few pounds of the sum voted, while it may be that some tender will come in for a sum not more than twenty per cent., or one-fifth, of the sum voted. I think I have known an instance where the highest tender was near £2,000, and the lowest not much above £200. I would therefore suppose that the persons making the highest tenders are guided by some knowledge of the amount available, while the lowest tenderers have known nothing about the amount available, but have tendered at the price at which they could execute the work—perhaps from some local knowledge that they have.

FRIDAY, 26 OCTOBER, 1860.

Present:—

Mr. DANIEL,
Mr. EGAN,
Mr. GRAY,

Mr. PARKES,
Mr. PLUNKETT,
Mr. WILSON.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Archibald Campbell, Esq., called in and examined:—

A. Campbell, Esq. 279. By the Chairman: You are now Acting Colonial Storekeeper? Yes.

280. How long have you been in the Colonial Store? Eight years last February, I think.

281. During that time, or any part of that time, was it your business to attend particularly to tenders and contracts? Not until I was appointed Acting Colonial Storekeeper, during Mr. Buchanan's suspension.

26 Oct., 1860.

282. When was that? On the 1st of February this year.

283.

283. Since the 1st of February you have been acting in Mr. Buchanan's place? Yes.
284. And since that time the tenders and contracts made by the Government for your department have been under your cognizance and supervision? Yes.
285. Have you been since that time one of the Board appointed to open tenders and decide upon them, in the place of Mr. Buchanan? On my first appointment I opened the tender box, but took no active part with respect to the tenders. For about a month after I had been acting I did not sign the schedules. I kept one key and opened the box, but had no responsibility as to recommending tenders.
286. Have you been one of the Board at all? Since about March I have been one of the Board.
287. And have performed those duties that were previously performed by Mr. Buchanan? Yes.
288. You were summoned to produce some papers—have you brought them? I have.
289. By Mr. Parkes: What papers are those? Two schedules and tenders for handcuffs, bags, and buckets.
290. By the Chairman: You exhibit the documents connected with certain tenders for handcuffs? Yes.
291. Will you state the dates of those tenders? 22nd February, 1859, and 27th September, 1859; those are the dates on which they were approved. (The witness exhibited the original documents, and handed in certified copies. Vide Appendix.)
292. By Mr. Plunkett: What are the amounts? The amount in each case is £40.
293. By the Chairman: There are two tenders here, dated in February, one from Hawley and Co., and one from Mr. J. W. Weekes? Hawley and Co.'s tender appears to have been an irregular one, received after date, and therefore not acted on; as will be seen minuted on the tender itself by Mr. Robert Campbell.
294. By Mr. Gray: Was he Colonial Treasurer at that time? Yes.
295. By the Chairman: Mr. J. W. Weekes' tender was accepted? Yes.
296. There is another tender here from Mitchell and Co.? Yes, that is in the second schedule—Mitchell and Co. and Mr. Rayment Audsley.
297. There seems to be no report on this? Not on the tender itself; it is upon the schedule. In the case of Hawley and Co., the tender being irregular, the report was on the tender itself.
298. It appears that no offer for buckets having been received, the Treasurer directed that they should be obtained from Hawley and Co., at the price named in their tender? Yes; no offer was received that could be considered as a tender by the Board, Hawley and Co.'s having come in late.
299. The tender is the same? The tender is the same, but it was sent wrong; it was sent to Mr. Weston, who received it at the Colonial Stores and forwarded it on to the Colonial Treasurer, who opened it and made that minute upon it.
300. This tender of Hawley and Co.'s seems to have been addressed to the Honorable the Secretary for Finance and Trade? Yes, but it was handed to Mr. Weston, at the Colonial Store, not having been sent in in time, by mistake of the person intrusted to deliver it. The red ink memorandum was put on it previous to its being opened by the Treasurer.
301. There is no date to this? No, but the date of the tender itself is the same as the others.
302. The buckets then were purchased by private contract? They were purchased from Hawley and Co., at the price specified in their tender received too late, according to Mr. Robert Campbell's recommendation—theirs being the only offer for buckets.
303. What is the system in the Colonial Store with regard to purchasing goods privately—do you get any special order? We give an order.
304. What power have you, I mean, to purchase goods privately? I have no specific instructions. If things are required urgently, and the amount is not large, I am at liberty to buy them.
305. To what amount? I should say within £50 worth; but there is no precise order. There was at one time an order that all amounts over £50 should be certified by two merchants; but that has been done away with some time.
306. How long has it been done away with? I cannot tell the exact date.
307. However, at one time there was an order and a practice, by which all goods supplied to the Government, by private contract, were to be certified to as to price by two merchants, the same as in the Commissariat service? Yes.
308. That system has been done away with? It has not been in use for a long time; I do not know whether there were any orders to discontinue it.
309. How long is it since that system has been given up? I cannot recollect; I had nothing to do with the contracts previous to the beginning of this year.
310. In no case would you, as head of the Colonial Store, be authorized to buy things privately, excepting in case of emergency? I believe not. The requisitions come in in such an irregular manner and at such different dates, that things are bought by dribs and drabs—in small amounts at a time; they mount up in the aggregate to good sums, but the individual orders are very small; the service will not admit of waiting in all cases till they accumulate to a sufficient amount to call for tenders.
311. Any amounts above £50 you would consider it in excess of your authority to order without tender? Yes.
312. And up to that amount you consider yourself justified in purchasing at once without any hesitation? If the cases will not admit of delay; but if they will at all admit of it, I prefer tendering for everything.
313. Have you any practice by which the parties tendering shall attend at the time the tenders are decided upon? No, it is left to their own option.

A. Campbell,

Esq.

26 Oct., 1860.

- A. Campbell, Esq. 314. Are they invited to attend? In the case of large tenders they are invited by the advertisement to attend to give any information, but they merely wait in the waiting room; they are not with the Board when the tenders are opened.
- 36 Oct., 1860. 315. Never? I have never seen them.
316. By Mr. Gray: They are not present when the tenders are opened? No.
317. Is the box opened previous to the Board's meeting? No, never. The box has two separate locks, of which I hold one key and Mr. Lane the other.
318. By the Chairman: From your experience, can you state whether there is any dissatisfaction expressed with the present mode of tendering for Government supplies—whether parties tendering frequently make complaints that they are not fairly treated? I have heard of but one instance of complaint since I have had anything to do with it.
319. Will you name it? It was in the case of some oil purchased from Griffiths, Fanning, and Co., for which Mr. Harbottle tendered at the same time.
320. Can you state the circumstances under which their tender was accepted and his rejected? The samples were examined by the Board, of which Captain Browne was one. The oil was specially for the lighthouses, and as they are immediately under Captain Browne's control, he was supposed to have more voice in the matter than anyone else. We examined the samples; Griffiths, Fanning, and Co.'s looked good, but was two-pence a gallon dearer; the other was clearer, but did not look quite so good; we had some argument about it, and the majority were in favor of Griffiths, Fanning, and Co.'s sample. I mentioned at the time that I believed there would be more waste in that oil than in the other. This was the first contract I had been called upon to sign.
321. Were the samples tried in that case? No, they were not used in a lamp.
322. Merely looked at? Merely looked at.
323. And Griffiths, Fanning's was accepted from preference given to its quality on inspection? Yes.
324. Is that the only case in which you have heard complaints? That is the only one.
325. Since March last at any rate? Yes.
326. In receiving those tenders do you generally look to the person who signs the tender, or are you merely guided by the price and quality? By price and quality.
327. You make no reference at all to the persons who tender? Questions are asked; it is generally preferred to know who it is; the Board frequently ask me if I know the person. I have known every one who has tendered since I have had anything to do with it. Generally the same class of people tender.
328. If a strange name comes before you, do you consider it necessary to make inquiry? For my own satisfaction I always do, but I have no orders to do so; but the quality and price of the goods are the principal things; a man's name does not go for much.
329. You have had some investigation into the Colonial Storekeeper's department lately? Yes, it has extended over the whole time I have been acting.
330. In what did it originate? In questions as to the late Colonial Storekeeper importing goods and tendering under a fictitious name. I believe that was the first charge against him.
331. And out of that the inquiry arose? Yes; in fact it was for acting with Mr. Weston, and both of them tendering for goods.
332. Did not that inquiry arise out of fictitious tenders being sent in? Yes, that was it.
333. The result of that investigation of course is known, and is to be laid before the House; but that was the origin of it, that persons connected with the department were tendering under fictitious names? Yes.
334. By Mr. Gray: You are now one of the Board for opening tenders? Yes.
335. Perhaps you would state to the Committee the mode of procedure when you open the tenders? A notice is first published in the Government Gazette, inviting tenders, and attention is called to that notice in the daily papers besides. On the day fixed the Board meets—generally three persons, sometimes four, but three are enough. The Board meets at the Treasury; I take one key of the tender box, and Mr. Lane has the other; we then open the two locks in the presence of the whole Board; the tenders are taken out then, and handed to one of the Board, who opens them and signs his name in full upon the first tender, marks it number one tender, and initials and numbers the rest; the remainder of the Board do the same. If there are several tenders they are then put into schedule, after having been registered at the Treasury.
336. Who puts them into schedule? That is done either by myself or some one in my department, if they are stores for my department.
337. Do you do that while the Board are present? No, they are taken away—the original documents.
338. And scheduled by clerks? Yes.
339. Then the Board have never investigated the tenders before they again come to them in schedule? No, not in reference to samples.
340. Would it be possible for any of the clerks to alter the figures, or in any way alter the tenders, previous to their having been first seen by the Board and the Board giving their decision? No, I think not.
341. How so? The original tenders are always kept in the schedule; they are all kept together.
342. But you say they are out of the presence of the Board; that they pass through the hands of clerks previous to their first inspection by the Board and the Board giving a decision on them; you say they are merely initialled by the Board? They are not passed to clerks previous to their first inspection.
343. I know, but between the first opening and inspection and the Board's decision on them they are passed to clerks to be scheduled and calculated also? Yes.

344. Then the Board in reality never calculates the tenders when they inspect them first? A. Campbell, Esq.
- They do if it is not a very elaborate calculation.
345. Are you aware that complaints have been made that some of the clerks, in scheduling these tenders, have made erasures? I never heard of it; I never heard it hinted before.
346. Do you think it is possible that, while scheduling these tenders, they might make an alteration, such as would alter the amount and appearance of the tender—is it not possible for them to do so? It is just possible, but very improbable. They must be in collusion with the party tendering in the first instance.
347. Suppose that: provided they are in collusion with the party tendering, is it possible for some alteration to be made by some of the clerks, so as to make a particular tender appear the lowest? I hardly think it is possible.
348. By Mr. Wilson: Does the same party always schedule the tenders? In my department always the same; if I do not do it myself, the next clerk does.
349. Does he know whether he will have the duty? He generally knows that if I do not do it he will have to do it. There may be an exception.
350. By Mr. Gray: You are not of course aware how the business is done in other departments? No, I have nothing to do with that.
351. By Mr. Egan: When any goods are tendered, I presume samples are always forwarded? Yes, where it is necessary they are called for.
352. And the samples are inspected by the Board? By the whole Board.
353. By whom is the delivery of the whole quantity inspected? By the store clerk; he is responsible for the delivery.
354. It is left to the store clerk to see to the description of goods delivered? Yes, according to sample.
355. He might receive a very inferior quality of goods compared with the sample? The storekeeper generally sees them.
356. He could, if he liked, receive a very inferior article? I do not think he could, without its being subsequently discovered. The parties receiving inferior goods would be certain to complain.
357. Is it not often the case that a sample pair of blankets are sent in, and that the bales sent to the Colonial Store are never opened until they reach the place where they are intended for use? They are examined; a bale is taken here and there, if they are bales of the same mark.
358. Do you mean to say that bales have not been received that have not been opened at all? A great many.
359. That have never been examined? Not each individual bale. It would be impossible to open them all without damaging the goods, if they were to be stored for some time.
360. I do not see that it would damage the goods much just to rip the package and see that they were the same as the sample? It would occupy a great deal of time.
361. Do you not think that for want of this examination the system is open to fraud? I think not; in all my experience for eight years I never heard anything of the sort.
362. By the Chairman: In such a case as Mr. Egan has just mentioned, would not a dishonest person, of whom you know nothing and who might be worth nothing, have the door open to fraud in a very large contract. If you were dealing with a dishonest person, or a person whose business was to buy damaged goods at auction, would it be possible to commit a fraud under such a system as that? It is just possible; but if a person were unknown more care would be taken in the examination.
363. Then in point of fact you do look to the character of the tenderer as well as to the quality of the goods? Yes, we do in receiving the goods; but in accepting the tenders we scarcely look to the respectability of the person.
364. But it does form an element in the consideration of the whole matter? Decidedly.
365. By Mr. Egan: Do you not make any inquiry as to the person at all. Suppose a tender is received signed William Jones, do you not inquire who he is? During my experience I have known every one who tendered.
366. Supposing a person tendered that you did not know? Then I should decidedly inquire for my own satisfaction.
367. By Mr. Daniel: Who is the supposed head of your department? I am at present.
368. But beyond you again? The Treasurer.
369. Does he give you orders direct from himself, or does the Under Secretary? The Under Secretary.
370. Mr. Lane in fact is the principal? Yes.
371. When you have to go and purchase two hundred handcuffs, for instance, do you make a point of going to one particular establishment? We generally inquire the price, when it is done without tender, and take the lowest. We send round the town generally to all the respectable dealers in the articles. For small supplies we generally hold to one; it prevents confusion.
372. By the Chairman: You have no particular shops or stores where you deal? No, but for small supplies we go to those who we know are the cheapest. We generally get the prices before any considerable order is given.
373. By Mr. Plunkett: Who are the members of the Board for opening tenders? They are not always the same. The Colonial Storekeeper is on the Board when the tenders relate to stores, and the Under Secretary for Finance is invariably another; but the third is not always the same; in most cases Captain Browne.
374. By whom are the members of the Board appointed? By the Under Secretary for Finance and Trade; he sends a circular round requesting attendance.
375. You say there are sometimes four persons, who is the fourth? Mr. Lumsdaine, of the Distilleries, has been one of the Board sometimes lately, and Mr. Trickett, of the Mint.

- A. Campbell, 376. In what cases? It is very lately we have had four; I think it is as an extra check.
 Esq. 377. Do you know how the members of the Board are appointed, are you apprised of any reason for a change? No.
- 26 Oct., 1860. 378. Do these gentlemen act instead of Captain Browne? Sometimes if he is indisposed or away on any business.
 379. Is there any perquisite to anyone? No.
 380. By the Chairman: Do you not think the Board, as constituted, have very large powers conferred upon them? No, I do not think they have.
 381. Are they bound by any rules? The general rule is to take the lowest tender unless the sample is inferior.
 382. They have great powers in determining on the samples? No doubt.
 383. Do you think the Board you have named are the best parties to judge of merchandise—for instance, Captain Browne and Captain McLerie? They may be by experience now, but I do not think they knew much of it before they were on the Board. I think the Colonial Storekeeper, the person who generally has the handling of the stores, knows more about them.
 384. Do you think it is a desirable thing to have the Colonial Storekeeper and the Under Secretary always and in every case members of this Board, which you admit have very large discretionary powers—do you think they are the parties most likely to be disinterested and unbiassed? I think they are; I do not see who could be more so; I think on the part of the Government these two should be there.
 385. In a former part of your evidence, you state that a charge of importing goods and tendering under a fictitious name to the Government has been brought against one of these officers? Yes.
 386. Under such circumstances, do you think parties put in that position are the best possible persons to be appointed to decide in matters of this kind? Speaking of it in that light, I should say the Colonial Storekeeper was not; I mentioned it merely in the light of his experience and knowledge of the articles required.
 387. I am not talking of experience—I am talking of a person to decide without bias? Then I should say that another party would be better than the storekeeper.
 388. These two officers are always under the direct influence of the Government of the day? Yes.
 389. Then do you not come to the conclusion that parties not under that influence would be more likely to do justice? I think there should be a majority on the side of the Government—that two officers of the Government should be on the Board.
 390. But in this case all are officers of the Government? Yes.
 391. Do you think it would be a satisfactory mode of informing the public of what was going on in respect to tenders, to advertise the tenders accepted, with the name of the person and the price of the article—as in the case of these handcuffs, to have advertised that the tender of Mr. J. W. Weekes, dated such a day, for so many pairs of handcuffs, at such a price, had been accepted—do you think that would be a check? I think it would, and I think it would be satisfactory to the public.
 392. That would save an immense deal of importunity that the Government have to put up with now from persons requiring reasons? I think it would be very satisfactory.
 393. Do you think it would be satisfactory also that the parties tendering should be invited to be present in the room when all the tenders are opened and scheduled? I think it would; there could be no objection to it that I could see, and it would do away with any feeling of underhand influence they might have. I think it would be a very good plan.*
 394. By Mr. Plunkett: Are the sittings of this Board frequent? On the average nearly every week.
 395. How are they called together? By notice from the Treasury.
 396. By the Chairman: Supposing you saw the name of a Member of Parliament coming in as a tenderer, would that excite your attention or suspicion in any way? It would. In any transactions we always avoid having anything to do with Members of Parliament.
 397. You make that a point in all your transactions? Yes, as much as possible to avoid any dealings with them.
 398. Supposing I had a store in town, and supposing you were told to come to my store and buy tea or sugar, would you hesitate in doing so? I should, decidedly.
 399. Or supposing you saw my clerk or any dependent upon me sending in a tender, would that excite your suspicion? It would.
 400. What would you do? I could do nothing but report it to the Treasury, for my authority is very limited.
 401. By Mr. Plunkett: You would not reject the tender? I could not; my authority would not be sufficient.
 402. By the Chairman: Have you ever known a case where a Member of Parliament has been tendering? I do not know of a direct tender.
 403. An indirect one, then? Only from hearsay—these we have been speaking of.
 404. You do not know of any other? No.
 405. By Mr. Egan: Have you ever made any purchases under the £50 system from Members of Parliament? In very few cases, where we have had a special request to get the goods there.
 406. By the Chairman: What were those cases? There was one case the other day, where I sent a small order to Mr. Weekes' shop, because the Harbor Master said the tools and things required could be selected there to advantage; he selected them himself.

407.

* NOTE (by witness upon revision):—I recollect here stating—"That persons tendering should not be present when samples were compared and the decision arrived at."—A. C.

407. What was the nature of that order? Tools for boat-building—for repairs to the boats. A. Campbell, Esq.
 408. Is that the only case? That is the only case.*
 409. From anybody? From anybody.
 410. By Mr. Plunkett: What was the amount of that order? Under £12.
 411. By the Chairman: I thought Mitchell and Co. were the people you dealt with for such things? For ship chandlery we do; this was for tools for boat-building. In my own case I have always avoided sending to Members of Parliament.
 412. In fact you know it is known in the service that Members of Parliament are precluded from tendering either directly or indirectly? Yes, it is well known.

RAYMENT AUDSLEY.

M.

Mr. John Weston called in and examined:—

- Mr. J. Weston. 413. By the Chairman: You were a long time in the Colonial Store? Five or six years; I left the Colonial Secretary's Office to go there.
- 26 Oct., 1860. 414. What was the general system pursued with regard to tenders when sent to you from the Treasury? They were put in schedule.
415. At the Colonial Store? At the Colonial Store, and the recommendation and approval were attached.
416. By whom? The recommendation by the Colonial Storekeeper.
417. Is there not a Board? The Board merely opened the tenders, numbered them, and then sent them down for the schedule to be prepared. The Colonial Storekeeper prepares the schedules and examines the samples; the Board do not examine the samples.
418. I believe the Board consisted of Captain McLerie, Captain Browne, Mr. Buchanan, and Mr. Lane—these were the gentlemen who had to open the tenders? Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Lane generally were on the Board, in matters connected with their own department; seldom Captain Browne, but occasionally I believe he was one; I do not think Captain Browne was always one.
419. Then the recommendation was left to the Colonial Storekeeper? It was left to the department for which the supplies were required.
420. Without any Board? They sign the recommendation afterwards, before it goes to the Minister.
421. Then the functions of the Board are simply confined to opening the tenders? That is as it appears to me.
422. When these tenders were sent down to the Colonial Store and scheduled, the Colonial Storekeeper then proceeded to decide upon them? Yes.
423. By himself? No, not by himself; there is a paid person in the department whose duty it is to examine the quality of the stores.
424. What did Mr. Lane do in these matters? He simply opened the tenders in conjunction with the other members of the Board, and initialled the tenders.
425. He never attended to the final examination of the tenders upon the sample? No.
426. Nor Captain Browne nor Captain McLerie? No, I never saw them.
427. Did you ever see these gentlemen at the Colonial Store? Not on that business.
428. Then the sole power of rejecting or accepting the tenders resided in Mr. Buchanan? He put the recommendation to the schedule, and that was invariably adopted, except in one or two cases.
429. You have heard about two cases in which certain articles were tendered for by a Mr. Weekes and a Mr. Audsley? Yes, I saw the documents and prepared the schedules.
430. Under what circumstances? Mr. Weekes, the son of the present Treasurer, tendered in his own name, and Mr. Audsley tendered in his own name also. When I wanted Mr. Audsley's address, when he came down about it, he equivocated, and said we were to send the answer to the Post Office. I could not get out what he was doing; he merely said he had a few handcuffs, and that he tendered for them at the cost price; his manner was hurried altogether.
431. By Mr. Egan: He made it appear that they were articles he wanted to get rid of? Just so. They were not a very saleable article—handcuffs.
432. By the Chairman: When parties tendered, was it the practice to inquire who they were? No.
433. Then supposing the three gentlemen sitting here were to tender, you would take no notice of that? Certainly not.
434. By Mr. Egan: Did anything strike you when this man equivocated? It occurred to me afterwards, because I ascertained what he was and where he was, and then I could account for his hesitation.
435. To whom was the money for these articles paid? To Mr. Audsley.
436. In what way? By cheque. All payments are made by cheque except trifling petty expenses; any amount over one pound is paid by cheque.
437. Do you know any case during your employment as a clerk in the Colonial Store in which Members of the House of Assembly, or of the other House, have been in the habit of tendering for supplies? Only this case of Mr. Audsley that I could trace anything direct, and another case which I cannot understand, Mr. B. C. Rodd's case.
438. He is not a Member? No, he is not a Member, but the circumstances altogether are so queer.
439. What are the circumstances? In the first place tenders were called for, for revolvers, twice; in reply to the first notice Mr. Harbottle tendered, and we got four at £7 15s., I think; the notice was re-published, and no further tenders were sent in, but the next morning Mr. Rodd's tender came down through the Treasurer, so I believe, with no initials or anything on it. I cannot understand how he became possessed of revolvers.
440. By Mr. Egan: Was the number great? Thirteen, I think; the amount was £117 at £9 each. This tender of Mr. Rodd's was put on my desk by Mr. Buchanan. I asked him how he got it, and he said Mr. Lane had given it him, and that he had got it from Mr. Weekes. The thing is unusual, because there is no notation of any kind upon it.
441. By the Chairman: Not by Mr. Lane even? Not by Mr. Lane.
442. What did Mr. Buchanan do then? I suppose he recommended it. It was an offer; but what induced the offer?
443. Did you see the tender? Yes.
444. Was it written in the ordinary way, by Mr. Rodd himself? Yes.
445. On foolscap paper? No, on letter paper, I think; I cannot speak positively.
446. Where is the document? It ought to be in the Colonial Store; it is an office document.
- 447.

447. By Mr. Egan: These were 25s. or 30s. dearer than the others? 25s. Mr. J. Weston.
448. By the Chairman: Was that the only offer Mr. Rodd made? The only offer in my 26 Oct., 1860. time.
449. Did he never tender before? No.
450. Nor since? I cannot say since; I have not been in the office for some time.
451. Did you ever hear complaints of injustice being done from publicity not being given? No; we always forwarded written notice as to the fate of a tender, whether accepted or rejected.
452. Do you think it would be a very wholesome check if the tenders accepted were published, with the prices and the names of the parties? I think they generally are; but there is no rule.
453. Do you think it a proper mode of informing the public of what is going on? Yes, I think it would be useful.
454. How long have you been out of the department? About twelve months.
455. By Mr. Egan: You resigned, I think? Yes.
456. The Colonial Storekeeper would appear, from what you say, to have very large powers placed in his hands? Yes, it appears to me so. The Board did not see the samples during my time at the office; in some cases they may have; Mr. McLerie may have come down and seen them sometimes, when his approval was required, but I think that was very seldom.
457. By Mr. Daniel: During your time, after the tenders had been received, whose duty was it to see to the delivery of the goods, and that they were according to sample? The foreman of warehouse.
458. What mode of doing so was adopted—supposing they were blankets, were the bales stripped? That I cannot say.
459. Was it possible that they might be different to sample? I do not think it.
460. Did you look to the character of the persons supplying the goods? Character goes a great way.
461. That has been a portion of the system? It has.
462. By the Chairman: When goods were bought privately, were you in the habit of dealing with particular individuals, or did you get them wherever they were to be had at the cheapest rate? We got them at the cheapest rate we could. For small parcels of ironmongery we generally dealt with Hawley & Co., because their prices were always very moderate. They used to tender sometimes.
463. Did they not tender up to the time you left? Yes. The requisitions came in thicker at the end of the year; on other occasions the supplies required were not worth tendering for.
464. At the time these pistols were tendered for, were pistols very scarce? Yes; because in reply to the first advertisement we only got four; and to the second advertisement we did not get any offer; but the offer came in on the following morning from Mr. Rodd. He stated that he had imported them, and offered them to the Government at invoice price.
465. Gentlemen are often very liberal to the Government—they never charge more than invoice price? Well, it struck me as odd, coming from Mr. Rodd at all.
466. By Mr. Daniel: He is an eccentric person? Yes, I believe he is.

1861.

TUESDAY, 19 FEBRUARY, 1861.

Present:—

MR. DANIEL,
MR. DICKSON,
MR. EGAN,MR. PARKES,
MR. SHEPHERD,
MR. WINDEYER.

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

Charles Wye Weekes, Esq., called in and examined:—

- C.W. Weekes, Esq. 467. By the Chairman: Your father is the Colonial Treasurer? He is.
468. And you are his eldest son? I am.
469. And partner in his business? Yes.
- 19 Feb., 1861. 470. This Committee has been appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the present system of tendering for the public services; and with reference to a matter which came under the notice of the Committee in the previous evidence your father told us that you would probably be able to give us information. It is a matter relating to the sale of some handcuffs to the Government. Perhaps you will be kind enough to state what you know about the transaction? With regard to the first transaction, that in which my brother tendered for some handcuffs, he happened to be knocking about town doing nothing, and he saw that a tender was called for for some handcuffs; he spoke to me about it, and found out what he could purchase them at from me; he then tendered, got the contract, and paid me for them. That is all I know of that transaction. He paid me a certain price for them and got his profit on it.
471. You allude to your brother, Mr. John Weekes? Yes.
472. By Mr. Parkes: Did Mr. John Weekes speak to you first about them? I really cannot recollect now. He spoke to me several times about it; I suspect he did speak to me first about it; he was very frequently at the shop, looking at the Gazette when it came in, and and he spoke about anything he noticed.
473. By the Chairman: Do you recollect the second transaction? I do.
474. Will you state what you know of the circumstances connected with that? My brother was not any party to that at all; it happened to be one of our clerks. I saw a tender was called for, and called his attention to it. I told him we had formerly supplied some to a party who had tendered to the Government, and that I would supply him at a certain rate if he would tender for them; he tendered, got the contract, and purchased them from me. That is the whole transaction.
475. The Colonial Treasurer suggested that you would bring your books, have you them here on the present occasion? I have brought one book; I do not know if any of the other books will be of service. This is a rough cash book (produced), which shows the receipt of the cash at the time. As it was a cash transaction it is not entered anywhere else. That is one entry. Two or three of these books are kept on the counter, and just as the cash is received it is entered in this way by the party who receives it.
476. In whose handwriting is this entry? That is mine; of course I should be most likely to receive it being a large amount.
477. This is an entry, in your handwriting, dated Monday, March 14th, 1859, "Handcuffs, 200 pairs, £38 6s. 8d."? Yes.
478. Is this the entry of the first or second transaction? That is the first transaction I think from the date. You will find the other is entered in the same way.
479. In whose handwriting are the other entries under this date? Different persons at the same counter—two or three who happened to be at the same counter.
480. Can you state from whom you received that sum of £38 6s. 8d.? Well, I cannot state positively, but I have very little doubt it was from my brother.
481. You say he was knocking about town—that I think was your expression—was he doing anything in the shop at all? No.
482. Are any of these entries in his handwriting? No; he had nothing to do with the shop at that time, nor for eighteen months before.
483. What book do you call this? That is a rough cash book.
484. Does this entry appear in any other book? In a rough order book, where we put down memoranda.
485. Was that entry posted from that book into this, or from this into any other? That entry is made on receipt of the cash.
486. Then the first entry of the transaction would be in the rough order book? Yes.
487. Have you brought that up? No, they are in use at the counter and it was not convenient to bring them away, but if it is very particular I can let you see them.
488. Does this entry appear in any other book? Only as a memorandum.
489. In the rough order book? Just so.

490.

NOTE (correction by witness on revision):—One of the "unemployed" at that time.

490. Are not these entries generally entered into any other book? No, not at all; only the amount of cash is entered at the end of the day from all the cash books. C. W. Weekes,
Esq.
491. Is every amount, however large, if paid in the shop, only entered in this book? If paid as a cash amount. 19 Feb., 1861.
492. It does not appear in the ledger? No, certainly not.
493. Do you know whether you were paid that sum of £38 6s. 8d. by cheque, or in what way? Well, I cannot recollect—it is according to how he received it himself. If he got it in cash, he would pay me in cash; or, if by cheque, he would pay me by cheque.
494. By Mr. Shepherd: You are not certain it was your brother? I have very little doubt of it.
495. You might have received a draft from the Treasury yourself? No, I should have remembered that.
496. By Mr. Egan: Are the entries made in this book not copied into any other book? No.
497. How then can you ever know the state of the stock? That is a matter of our business; we keep our books in our own way.
498. By the Chairman: Do you keep your books by double entry? No, we do not.
499. What books have you in your office? All sorts of books—ledgers, journals, and so on.
500. Will you name those you use in the ordinary course of business? Ledgers, journals, consignment books, cash books, rough books, day books—that is all I can call to mind.
501. Were all these books used at the time this transaction took place? Only one of these books is used for a transaction of that nature.
502. Were all these books in use in the business at the time this transaction took place? Certainly.
503. Do you not recollect at all how that money was paid? No, I cannot recollect—it is a long time ago. I do not profess to recollect every cheque I receive two years after I have it.
504. What was the price at which these handcuffs were sold by you to your brother? The entry will tell you that best—I forget now. You can soon calculate it.
505. Is the entry of the second transaction in this book? Yes.
506. Is this it under the date of October 10th—"Handcuffs, £39 3s. 4d."? Yes.
507. In whose handwriting is that? In mine, too; most of the large amounts are in my handwriting.
508. You say that on that occasion you told Mr. Audsley that you had formerly sold some handcuffs to a gentleman who had sold them to the Government, and you suggested his purchasing these in the same way? I told him there was a tender called for, and he might tender if he wished, and I would sell them to him at a certain price.
509. Do you recollect whether any other conversation passed at the time? No, there would be no occasion for any particular conversation; it was a matter of every-day business.
510. How many handcuffs did you sell for that sum? I think it was the same number as in the former case; if I recollect right, there were 400 pairs called for that time, and he only got the tender for half the quantity, because somebody else tendered at the same price.
511. Do you recollect who paid you that sum of £39 3s. 4d.? Mr. Audsley.
512. Do you recollect how he paid it? If I remember right he gave me the Treasury cheque, and I gave him the difference in cash.
513. Then was the Treasury cheque paid in to the account of the firm at the Bank? Oh, yes, certainly it would be.
514. Then the sum of £39 3s. 4d. was paid after the tender was accepted, and paid by the Treasury cheque? Yes, of course it would be paid after he got the money if he gave me the cheque.
515. Was there any previous entry of this transaction in any of your books before this? I cannot say positively—there would be no occasion for it, unless I had it in a rough memorandum book of my own; he would only purchase them conditionally on his getting the order.
516. Then there was no transfer of the property in these handcuffs until his tender was accepted? There was a conditional transfer; in the same way as a man may come into the shop any day, and say, "I am going to tender for so and so, what rate will you supply them at?" I tell him; he tenders, and if successful he purchases from me. A gentleman came in to-day, and said he was going to tender for a large amount of goods; I told him what I would supply them at, and if he gets the tender, of course I expect he will purchase them of me.
517. By Mr. Parkes: Do you consider yourself bound to supply them to him at the price named? Yes, if he comes for them.
518. By Mr. Dickson: Do you consider yourself bound to hold the goods? Not beyond a certain time.
519. If a customer came in for the same goods in the meantime, would you sell them? Yes.
520. By Mr. Shepherd: In the day book who do you enter these goods against? We make merely a rough memo. of such things as these; we do not look upon it as a regular entry unless it goes into the ledger; of course everything that is a regular credit sale goes into the journal, and into the ledger.
521. But I imagine this was not a cash sale—the question is who did you enter them against? Most likely there would be merely a rough memorandum; I might have a memorandum of my own only in such a case as this.
522. I imagine if I went to your shop and made an arrangement with you, you would enter these goods against me? Undoubtedly, if you made an arrangement.
523. By the Chairman: If any one had come to the shop and offered you four shillings a pair for these handcuffs, you would have sold them to him? Certainly—of course I would.
- 524.

- C.W. Weekes, Esq.
19 Feb., 1861.
524. Is Mr. Audsley in the habit of receiving letters at your establishment? I really cannot say. All the letters that come to our establishment addressed to us would come into my hands.
525. Addressed to Mr. Audsley I mean? I have never received any addressed to him.
526. Do they come to your shop for him? I cannot say I have seen any come. Any that come addressed to our shop are put into our private box at the Post Office, and of course I get them.
527. Is he in the habit of getting his letters there? He cannot get them from the private box; the Post Office authorities will only deliver them to the parties holding the box.
528. Is he in the habit of having his letters directed there? I cannot say positively; I do not recollect. I do not recollect receiving letters for him, and I always get the letters from the box.
529. You do not recollect any instance? I do not; still I cannot say positively; there may be letters for him; letters come for all the people in the shop sometimes in the box.
530. Was the arrangement with regard to the sale to your brother of the same nature as that with Mr. Audsley—conditional upon his getting the contract? Undoubtedly; he would not want 200 pair of handcuffs if he had not got a market for them.
531. And you would have sold them in the same way as you say you considered yourself at liberty to have sold these of Mr. Audsley's? Certainly, if I had got a better price for them.
532. By Mr. Parkes: If Mr. Weekes had not been Colonial Treasurer, should you have tendered yourself for the handcuffs when you saw tenders invited in the Gazette? No, I should not, because he has expressed himself averse to it; I wanted to do so several times, and he objected to it.
533. If he were not in Parliament you would do it, I suppose? If he were not in Parliament I should tender for everything we might have in stock. But this I do not look upon as a regular tender. The clerks from the Colonial Store* come nearly every day, at all events every week, inquiring the price of articles; they say they are going round to see where they can get them cheapest; I give them my price, and sometimes I get the order, sometimes I do not.
534. Tenders were invited in the ordinary manner for these handcuffs? Well, I suppose you can call it a tender; they were advertised for.
535. By the Chairman: Do you know whether Mr. Audsley is in the habit of carrying on any business on his own account? Not that I am aware of.
536. Have you ever known him to carry on business on his private account of the same nature as yours? That is a matter I would not inquire about at all, unless it interfered with my business.
537. Have you ever known him to do it? No; I never took any notice.
538. He has not had any transactions of the same character as this with any other party through you? Not that I am aware of.
539. If he came and purchased goods in the same way you would be aware? Certainly.
540. You have never known him to do that? No, not for the public service; I do not suppose he has ever purchased anything at all.
541. Did I understand that you drew Mr. Audsley's attention to the advertisement in the Gazette? Yes. I looked upon it as a matter of business; my duty is to sell whatever I can to any party.
542. If he had not got the contract there would have been no sale? No sale, undoubtedly; it was the same kind of transaction as the one I was telling you of that happened to-day; the gentleman will not want the goods unless he gets the contract, and if he does get it, I expect he will buy them from me, because I believe I can sell them cheaper than the same kind of goods can be bought anywhere else.
543. By Mr. Shepherd: Supposing he could get them cheaper elsewhere, should you consider him bound to take them from you? No, I should not indeed; I say he would get them from me because I do not think he can get them cheaper anywhere else.

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Rayment Audsley called in and examined:—

- Mr. R. Audsley.
21 Feb., 1861.
544. By the Chairman: You are engaged in the firm of E. O. Weekes & Co.? Yes.
545. How long have you been with that firm? Upwards of three years.
546. You are not a partner in the firm? No.
547. What is your position with reference to the firm? Clerk.
548. Are you managing clerk? No, not exactly; I do not know that there is any difference in our grades; there are two or three others.
549. Do you recollect the circumstance, some time in 1859, of some handcuffs being tendered for to the Government? The transaction with which I was connected?
550. Yes? I do.

551.

* NOTE (correction by witness on revision):—Government Offices.

551. Will you be kind enough to state to the Committee what you know of that transaction? As near as I can recollect, at this distance of time, Mr. Charles Weekes called my attention to an advertisement in the Gazette requiring tenders for 400 pairs of handcuffs, and stated that I could have them at 47s. a dozen, if I chose to tender. He also stated that his brother had done so once before. Of course I was to fix my own price to the Government. I ascertained what they would be worth and sent a tender in, to which I received an answer some days afterwards, stating that only half the quantity was required from me in consequence of another party having tendered at the same price.

Mr. R.
Andsley.
21 Feb., 1861.

552. So that 200 pairs of the handcuffs were accepted instead of 400 for which you originally tendered? Yes.

553. Had you ever had before this any transaction of a similar kind? No.

554. And the one of which you have been speaking was suggested to you by Mr. Charles Weekes? Yes, Mr. Charles Wye Weekes.

555. Do you know when the Colonial Treasurer first became acquainted with that transaction? I am not aware that he was acquainted with it at all.

556. Not at the time you mean? Not at the time.

557. Did any conversation take place between you and Mr. Charles Weekes as to the mode in which you should send in your tender? No, it was left to my discretion.

558. Are you in the habit of receiving correspondence at the place of business of the firm? No, I have always been in the habit of having letters addressed to the Post Office,* both from the Colonies and from Home.

559. The firm has a box, I believe, at the Post Office? Yes; but as near as my recollection will carry me, Mr. Charles Weekes requested me to have this addressed to the Post Office,* in order that his father might not see it.

560. Do I understand that he gave that as his reason? He did not give that as a reason, but he said, "You can have your answer addressed to the Post Office." That was also what I was in the habit of doing.

561. Are they a salable article—handcuffs? No, not very; they are scarcely a thing required for private consumption.

562. Do you recollect who paid you for the handcuffs? I do not know the individual's name; I received a cheque from the Colonial Storekeeper's Department, from the accountant or cashier, or whatever he may be.

563. Were you asked any questions at the time you tendered, or during the negotiation with the Government, as to where the handcuffs came from? No.

564. By Mr. Daniel: Are you in the habit of drawing cheques for the firm? No, Mr. Charles Weekes does that.

565. By the Chairman: In what books of the firm would the sale of these articles appear? They were entered in a counter cash book, when the cash was received, and there was a rough memorandum in the day book.

566. Which entry was made first? That in the day book I should say, but I have nothing to do with the transactions in the shop, my duties are in the office, and I could not state positively. I know there is a memorandum in the day book, because Mr. Charles Weekes was referring to the entries this morning.

567. Did you see it? Yes.

568. What was the nature of it? Merely a note of the sale of the goods. Mr. Charles Weekes said he regretted he had not brought the books up with him when he was here, but he was not aware of this entry; it is not always made in a transaction of this kind.

569. Is there any name attached to the memorandum? I believe there is, but I did not observe it particularly. If you desire to see the books you can do so I have no doubt.

570. By Mr. Daniel: Have you any trading privileges besides your salary? That would depend upon circumstances, as to whether I had an opportunity of doing anything in my own time.

571. I mean during the business hours? No.

572. By Mr. Morris: Supposing your tender had been accepted for the whole four hundred pairs of handcuffs, what would have been the profit to you? About 35s.

573. Do you consider that a sufficient profit? If I could make it by half-an-hour's work I should be happy to do it every week in the year. There was no trouble involved in the transaction.

574. Is this the only tender of the kind you ever put in? Yes.

575. By Mr. Egan: In the event of the tender not being accepted, there was an end to the transaction between you and Mr. Charles Weekes? Certainly.

576. The handcuffs would not have been considered yours at all if the tender had not been accepted? No; my purchase was only conditional on my obtaining the opportunity of selling them.

577. Then in reality they were delivered to the Government before they were yours? They were mine when my tender was accepted; I did not buy them until I knew I could sell them. I believe that is usually the case in tenders of this description; the party ascertains the price, and tenders before he buys the goods.

578. Then in reality there never was a sale of the goods until such time as you paid for them? Oh! yes; I bought them conditionally at first, and finally when my tender was accepted.

579. The goods had been delivered to the Government before you paid for them? The goods had been delivered to the Government before I paid for them, but not before I had bought them.

580.

* Nota (by witness on revision):—Addressed to me, at the Post Office.

- Mr. R. Audsley.
21 Feb., 1861.
580. By the Chairman: What was the object in this condition of affairs in making the entry into the rough day book you have spoken of? The entry was made by Mr. Charles Weekes; I had nothing to do with that portion of the transaction.
581. Can you state whether or not it is entered as a sale to you in this rough day book? I cannot state; I have no doubt Mr. Charles Weekes would produce the book; he said this morning he was sorry he had not brought it up with him.
582. By Mr. Morris: Do Weekes & Co. deal with other persons unconnected with their office in the same way that they dealt with you in this matter, those other persons wishing to tender, and first coming and ascertaining the price of the goods that are called for—do they keep open the goods at the price until a person so applying ascertains whether his tender is accepted—is that the custom? I said before my business lies principally in the office, and I cannot say positively; but I believe it is frequently the case that a person comes in and ascertains the price of an article and does not buy it till he is certain of effecting a sale.
583. Is the article, in such a case, kept open for that party for the number of days necessary? You are supposing we have only enough in stock to supply his tender, but in most cases we should have sufficient in stock to supply twenty, so that there is no necessity for keeping it open.
584. If you could sell it at a higher price would you be bound to keep it open? That I cannot say.
585. By the Chairman: Do you recollect what time elapsed between the time you sent in your tender and the time you were paid the cheque? I do not.
586. Did you pay the cheque over to Mr. Charles Weekes before the handcuffs left the place? No, I had not received it then.

William Harbottle, Esq., called in and examined:—

- W. Harbottle, Esq.
21 Feb., 1861.
587. By the Chairman: You are an oil and colour merchant? I am.
588. Have you been any time carrying on that business? About four years.
589. You are probably aware that this is a Committee appointed to examine into the present system of tendering for the public service—have you ever in the course of your business had occasion to observe the present system? Yes; I have had some little experience by having something to do with tenders.
590. Have you formed a favourable or unfavourable, and generally, what is your opinion as to the present system? I think it would be much better to have larger Boards instead of two or three individuals constantly to decide upon the tenders. Larger Boards must be an advantage.
591. Are there any particular instances on which you have founded your opinion as to the advisability of altering the present system—have you, as a merchant, had any reason to be dissatisfied as to the mode in which your tenders have been treated? I have no particular grievance to complain of. I once tendered for about 5,000 gallons of Chinese oil, which the Government did not take, and which I sold at a higher price afterwards; but I have this to complain of that they took an article at 2d. a gallon more, which was in no way better than mine, as I am prepared to prove. I supposed, of course, that the lowest tender would have been accepted.
592. By Mr. Morris: Other things being equal? Assuming that they were equal of course. I look upon it as the only safe principle, to take the lowest tender, because the Government always make it a condition to have a suitable article supplied, or an article equal to sample, and it is always in their power to reject an inferior article. This transaction of the oil was the subject of some correspondence with the Treasury. In the first instance, I heard that the Government were about to purchase or were negotiating for the purchase, privately, of a quantity of oil, and as I had tendered and supplied the Government before, and had then a large stock on hand—in fact there was only one other house, Griffiths, Fanning, and Co., that had any quantity—I dropped a note to the Treasury to ask if they were likely to require any oil, and stating that if so I was in a position to tender for any quantity they might require. This led to some correspondence, and the result was that they called for tenders by a notice dated 15th May. I tendered, and after the lapse of a considerable time, eight or ten days, I heard by some means or other that my tender was the lowest, and consequently I made no doubt about my tender being accepted, when I got a note from the Colonial Storekeeper to say that my tender was declined. I then wrote, on the 30th May, this note to the Treasury, asking on what grounds my tender was declined. (The witness read and handed in the same. Vide Appendix A.) I did not get an answer for several days, so concluded it was not intended to take any notice of my inquiry, and I wrote again, saying that I intended placing the matter in the hands of a Member of the Assembly, as my tender was the lowest and had not been accepted. I must tell you that the notice in the Gazette calling for tenders stated that a sample of two gallons of the article would be required in order to be tested by burning; I sent three samples of two gallons each, which never were tested. Well, not having received an answer to the note I have just read, I wrote again to the Treasury, on the 7th June. This is the letter. (The witness read and handed in the same. Vide Appendix B.) The very day that they must have got this letter I received an answer to the first note. The letters could not have crossed, because I posted my second letter the night before, and I received an answer to the first at mid-day on the following day, the 8th of June. I may say I felt rather sore about the matter, because I thought a decided case of favouritism had been shewn. I had previously heard that the Chairman of the Board, Captain Browne, the Immigration Agent, was the individual who had recommended the Government to purchase a large supply of China oil from Griffiths, Fanning, and Co.'s when I made my first offer; in fact it was on hearing this that I wrote to the Treasury. I am not in a position to prove this, but having heard that the same person was Chairman of this particular Tender Board, I had some reason to think there was some favouritism in the matter. But as I say I did not care about it personally, because I sold my oil at from sixpence to a shilling a gallon more, privately. I must explain also that Chinese oil has lately come into use. It is an excellent article, and has never been imported by Colonial merchants on their own account; all that has hitherto arrived here has been on consignment; and, as Captain Smith was sending the "Agnes" for a cargo of tea, I made arrangements for a consignment of it. That was how I happened to have such a large quantity on hand. I had sent my own casks for it, so that I could get it in the cheapest way. However, having posted my letter of the 7th June, which I have just read, about mid-day on the 8th, I received this letter, replying to my letter of the 30th May. (The witness read and handed in the same. Vide Appendix C.) Well, on getting that letter, I was determined not to be put down that way, because it was saying that my oil was of inferior quality. I therefore called a survey, at which Mr. Stuart, of Towns and Co., who have a good deal of oil passing through their hands, and Captain Williamson, of the firm of Mitchell and Co., who knows, from long experience, the quality of oils and what the article is. These gentlemen acted as my surveyors. We tried the oil from the same samples that I had sent in with my tender, which we got back from the Colonial Stores for the purpose, in three different lamps, employing argand or sperm burners, which afford the severest test, and a report was drawn up by the two gentlemen I have named, which I beg to hand in. (The witness read and handed in the same. Vide Appendix D.) I sent that report to the Treasury, with a letter, dated 23rd June. (The witness read and handed in the same. Vide Appendix E.)

the

W. Harbottle,
Esq.
21 Feb., 1861.

593. By the Chairman: How long afterwards did you sell the oil at the advanced price you spoke of? I sold upwards of 500 gallons to Captain Williamson, at 4s. 11d., immediately after he had signed that survey—the same day or the day after—and since then, I have sold it at from 5s. to 5s. 6d.—in quantities I mean.

594. Did you get any answer to your last letter to the Government stating that you had held a survey? No, I got no answer to the last letter. I may say that I thought Mr. Trickett, who is an officer of the Mint, had no special knowledge whatever of oil, and was not therefore a proper person to be on the Board.

595. Did you ever see Griffiths, Fanning, and Co.'s oil? Yes; I had bought some of their oil before.

596. Some of the oil that they tendered to the Government? Yes; I have some of it now, I think.

597. From your own observation of this oil, what is your opinion as to its value compared to the oil you tendered? I considered my oil better oil than theirs, and that it would be more advantageous to the Government, because there was no sediment in mine. The jars in which Griffiths, Fanning, and Co.'s oil was are very inconvenient packages, being nearly round, and when emptied, a considerable sediment, nearly a pint, remains in each of them. I dare say the Colonial Storekeeper would tell you, if he were examined, that he had a troublesome job with it; they had to break up about a thousand of these jars. It is a very troublesome job to do, because the jars are of a loose earthen material, and will often break in your hands; I think the Colonial Storekeeper will tell you there was a great deal of waste.

598. Mr. Campbell, the Acting Colonial Storekeeper, is the gentleman you speak of? Yes.

599. Is there any other matter in connection with this tendering business that you wish to mention? I had a case the other day with the Public Works Department; they called for tenders on the 4th of December for general stores. I may mention that I had the contract last year from the Department of Works for castor oil, which is an article they use very considerably for lubricating engines; and also for other oils. They called for tenders, to be sent in on the 4th of December, and on the 31st December we had received no intimation as to whether our tenders were accepted or rejected; this was a most unreasonable time to keep us waiting, because the period for commencing the supply began on the 1st of January. On the 31st December I wrote to the Minister of Works to say, that from the unreasonable time that had elapsed since I had tendered, I should consider myself at liberty to accept or reject any articles they might give me. My reason was this, that if I waited so long to learn whether my tender was rejected or accepted, my stock was locked up, because if I had sold to other parties, I might not have been able to obtain a sufficient supply of some articles to carry out a contract with the Government. Take, for instance, the article of castor oil, which is difficult to get, as it is only from Calcutta it can be obtained—if any party had come to me and offered to buy 50 hogsheads of that article, I could not have sold it. Then again it is necessary to look out for and lay in some little stock, in the event of obtaining a contract. Well, we got no answer to our tenders till the 7th or 8th of January, though the running time of the tender commenced on the 1st of January; and then I got about a dozen articles, or perhaps fifteen or sixteen, but I sent them back, I would not have anything to do with them.

600. On account of the great length of time which had elapsed? On account of the length of time which had elapsed. Never more than two or three days should elapse. A merchant, or trader's whole stock may be locked up. I tendered for about seventy articles, and could not sell any of these articles in quantities till I knew whether the Government would accept my tender or not. This article of castor oil, in particular, is very difficult to get in quantities; I have had money in India two years for it before I could get it down.

601. Do you know whether there are complaints on this head from business men generally? Yes, very great complaints. They have a most absurd and ridiculous way of determining

W. Harbottle, Esq.
21 Feb., 1861. on the tenders there. They require samples of each article to be sent, and it must necessarily take the Board a long time to make up their minds as to whether this brush or that brush, or this article or that article, is the best, because almost all the articles require a special knowledge. I was told they hold up the brushes, or whatever the article may be, and divide upon them.

602. Have you known other instances where delays have taken place? No. I know of one transaction, which is pending, and therefore I should not like to say anything of it just now.

603. By Mr. Daniel: When the tenders are being considered, and the samples inspected, are the tenderers permitted to have an audience with the Board? No, we never see them.

604. You have no opportunity then of explaining anything relating to the tender or the samples? No.

605. By the Chairman: And no guarantee that the samples are properly inspected or tried? No, we know nothing about it.

606. You are not aware whether the Board themselves have them immediately before them? I should presume they have.

607. But you do not know? No.

608. Is there any other matter connected with this system of tendering to which you wish to call the attention of the Committee? I saw a report from some Board or Commission, printed in to-day's paper, recommending the abolition of the Colonial Storekeeper's Department. On that point (if the Committee will allow me) I may say that I think it a very necessary department, because if you have not one Colonial store you must have four or five departmental stores. The Public Works Department at present has a storekeeper, but I decidedly think their goods should come through the general store. Then the Colonial Architect would require a storekeeper, and so would the Surveyor General's Department, for they expend a good deal of money in materials, tents, and equipments of various kinds.

609. Could you suggest any way in which the tendering system could be improved, as to the mode of constituting the Board, or judging of the tenders? It occurs to me that the Colonial Storekeeper ought on all occasions to be a member of the Board, seeing that he ought to be a man who understands his business, and has a general knowledge of the stores under his charge—assuming that all the stores should be sent to one depôt. I think, also, that the Deputy Surveyor General, the Under Secretary for Public Works, and the Colonial Architect—representing the departments that principally require stores—should be members of the Board; and I should suggest that some mercantile man of high position—if possible retired from business—should represent the public,—a man, altogether distinct from the public service, in whom the public would have confidence.

610. By Mr. Morris: Did it ever occur to you that it would be better to have persons wholly unconnected with the Government to sit on these Boards—persons paid for their services, and called together for their qualifications to decide on the articles tendered for, not knowing who the tenderers are? I have often thought that matter over, and that if the tenders had only a number or something of that sort to distinguish them, the decisions would, beyond all doubt, give more satisfaction; but, as I always thought the Government would insist on one of their officers seeing these things, and looking at them, I did not imagine such a system would ever be heard of.

611. By Mr. Egan: Do you know the course pursued in Melbourne, that the parties tendering are all there? I was not aware.

612. Do you not think that very desirable? Yes; and the decision should be immediate.

613. By the Chairman: Of the two plans proposed, viz.,—a Board composed of Government officials, with another gentleman associated with them to represent the public, as you have yourself proposed; and the system suggested by Mr. Morris, that the Board should be composed of persons entirely unconnected with the public service,—which would you prefer, as a contractor and a man of business? Of course I should have every confidence in a Board of mercantile men, summoned in that way, if they took a declaration that they had no interest in any of the tenders; but at the same time I think it would be such a radical change that there might be objections to its adoption, and that under the modification I have suggested the public service would be sufficiently protected. I think no Government would very willingly give up supervision by its own officers in matters of this kind.

614. By Mr. Daniel: Suppose there were an amalgamation of the two—say half of each? Yes, that might do.

615. Have you ever heard that in some cases an inferior article to that tendered for and exhibited by sample has been delivered when the goods were supplied in bulk? I dare say such does occur, no doubt about it, in private matters as well as public. It requires vigilance on the part of the party receiving to guard against that, and that is one of the grounds on which I think that the Colonial Storekeeper's Department, properly conducted and with efficient men there, would be the best means of protecting the public service.

616. For instance, a pair of blankets might be submitted as a sample, and a hundred bales sent in, without the packages being broken, containing an inferior description altogether? Yes, no doubt that might be done.

617. By Mr. Morris: Is the price of an accepted tender advertised in the Government Gazette? No.

618. You are aware that it is so in Victoria? Yes.

619. By the Chairman: Is there any other suggestion? I think that in all cases the lowest tender ought to be accepted, and an immediate decision given by the Tender Board, excepting in cases requiring further information, which, if, as suggested by Mr. Egan, the tenderers were in attendance, could be got immediately. The delay which occurred in these very very important tenders for the department of Public Works, which involved a very large sum of public money, was perfectly monstrous, in my opinion.

620. By Mr. Egan: You did not get the answer for a week after the supply was to commence? More than a week.

621. By the Chairman: Do you think it would be advisable, immediately after tenders are accepted, to publish them with the names of the tenderers? They do so in the Public Works Department; for instance, in the following Gazette after I got the letter I saw the names of the different people who had got numbers so and so and so and so, the description of stores being numbered up to about two hundred.

622. Do you not think it would be advisable to publish the price? I am not quite prepared to say; I do not see any harm that would occur.

623. Do you not think the more publicity the better? Yes; I see no object in secrecy whatever. The quicker all these transactions connected with tenders are settled the more benefit would accrue to the public service. I should always be very willing to tender for the supply of any stores I have to the Government at five or six or seven per cent. on cost price, if I could always depend upon getting a prompt answer in respect to the tender, and a settlement on completion of delivery.

624. Did I understand you to say that before you tendered at all you heard that Captain Browne was in some way negotiating for the Government the purchase of oil from Messrs. Griffiths, Fanning, & Co.? I heard that Captain Browne was in some way concerned in a negotiation to bring about a purchase of Chinese oil from Griffiths, Fanning, & Co., and hearing that, and having a large stock just arrived in the "Agnes," I wrote the letter offering to supply the Government. (The witness read and handed in the same, together with a copy of his tender in reply to Treasury Notice when tenders were called for. Vide Appendix F and G.) I may mention that I heard that Mr. Trickett was not summoned for this Board, but that he happened to be by mere chance at the Treasury when the tenders were about to be opened, and was put upon it. I do not know that Mr. Trickett had any knowledge of oil. I have understood that the oil never was tested, though, from the circumstance of their requiring two gallons to be left, it occurred to me that they intended to try the oil, and, therefore, I sent three samples of two gallons each, which to this day I have never touched, except for the purpose of the survey I have before mentioned. On this point I may call the attention of the Committee to an extract from the notice requiring tenders:—"If possible a sample of not less than two gallons of the same oil which it is purposed to supply should be left at the Colonial Store. If a sample cannot be so left beforehand, it is to be understood in the event of a contract being entered into, that the oil will be subject to the test of actual burning at the light-houses, and in every case be accepted only upon that trial proving satisfactory."

APPENDIX.

A.

30 May, 1860.

Sir,

I have this day received a notice from the Colonial Storekeeper that my tender for the supply of China oil has been declined, in reference to which I beg to inquire on what grounds my offer has been rejected, and another tender accepted at a higher price?

Henry Lane, Esq.,
Secretary, Treasury.

Sydney, 7 June, 1860.

Sir,

In reference to my letter of the 30th ultimo, inquiring on what grounds my tender for the supply of China oil was rejected, and to which I have not received any reply; I have the honor to inform you that it is my intention to place the matter in the hands of a Member of the House of Assembly, and I do so for the following reasons:—

- 1st. That my tender being the lowest ought to have been accepted.
- 2nd. I am prepared to prove that my oil is of the finest quality, and imported per the "Agnes" direct from Hong Kong through the house of Messrs. Flower, Salting, and Co., and is in original packages; also, that Captain Smith (a member of the Pilot Board), will testify the oil to be of a very superior quality, the greater portion of it being in his stores at the time it was tendered to the Government.
- 3rd. In accordance with the conditions of the notice calling for tenders, I forwarded to the Colonial Stores three samples of two gallons each. Those samples were never subjected to the test of actual burning, which was the only object the Treasury could contemplate in inviting two gallons, if possible, to be sent.
- 4th. By the rejection of my tender the Public Treasury will be a loser to the extent of 10,000 pence.

From the above reasons, and from no personal motives or disappointment at not being the accepted tenderer, I have come to the conclusion, on public grounds, the matter should be inquired into. More especially as I have heard that Messrs. Griffiths, Fanning, & Co. were in negotiation like myself, to effect a sale privately to the Government, and which, from the extraordinary preference shewn, would almost appear to have been a foregone conclusion, and the ceremony of tendering a perfect delusion to the public.

Henry Lane, Esq.,
Under Secretary, Treasury.

I have, &c.,

*The Treasury, New South Wales,
8 June, 1860.*

Sir,

In reply to your letter of the 30th ultimo, I am directed to inform you, that samples of the China oil tendered for the use of the Light-houses were submitted to the judgment of competent persons, namely:—

1. The Chairman of the Steam Navigation and Pilot Board;
2. Mr. Trickett, of the Royal Mint;
3. The Acting Colonial Storekeeper;

who were unanimously of opinion that the quality of the article offered by Messrs. Griffiths, Fanning, and Co., was so far superior to that of the oil tendered by you, as to warrant them in recommending it for acceptance, notwithstanding that the price asked was two-pence per gallon more than that required by you.

I have, &c.,

HENRY LANE,
Under Secretary.

W. Harbottle, Esq.,
George-street.

Sydney, 22 June, 1860.

We, the undersigned, hereby certify that, at the request of William Harbottle, we have tested and examined, at his stores, three samples of China or Teil Nut Oil, of two gallons each, numbered respectively 1, 2, and 3, said to be returned from the Colonial Stores, being samples of five thousand gallons tendered to the Government.

No. 1.—Sample of 50 barrels, or 1,500 gallons, we find to be an oil of superior quality, and gives out a brilliant light in actual burning.

Nos. 2-3.—Samples of 70 hogsheds, or 3,500 gallons, are a very superior oil, of a clear light colour, and, applied to the test of actual burning, gave a brilliant light.

The lamps used in testing the oil were fitted with sperm or argand burners.

The above samples of oil are, in our opinion, of the best quality, and, as far as our experience goes, equal to any ever imported into the Colony.

R. TOWNS & CO.

Sydney, 23 June, 1860.

Sir,

Referring to your letter of the 8th June, and especially to that portion of it which asserts that my oil is an inferior sample, I have the honor to transmit to you the enclosed report on the oil rejected by the Board of competent persons.

It is scarcely necessary for me to add, that the gentlemen who conducted the survey have a large and practical knowledge of the quality of oils, and are well known to the Government.

I have, &c.,

Henry Lane, Esq.,
Under Secretary to the Treasury.

It is now upwards of twelve months ago since I supplied the Government, by tender, with China oil for the use of the light-houses, and, as the stock in the Colonial Store must be very considerably diminished, I take the freedom of informing you that I have a supply of that article, and am in a position to tender for any supplies that may be required.

I remain, &c.,

WEDNESDAY,

WEDNESDAY, 27 FEBRUARY, 1861.

Present:—

Mr. DANIEL,
Mr. EGAN,Mr. MORRIS,
Mr. PARKES,

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

Charles Wye Weekes, Esq., called in and further examined:—

625. By the Chairman: We were informed the other day that you had found another book, C.W. Weekes, in which there was an entry relating to the matter of the tenders for handcuffs? Yes. I must say, gentlemen, that after the account of the transaction that I gave when I was last here, I was rather surprised that you should desire to see the transaction in any other form. You have the whole detail of the transaction, and any amount of entries cannot alter the character of it; and I must say I was very much surprised when I heard that you were still in doubt about the character of it. †
626. Since your examination, I believe you have found a book containing another entry relating to the matter of the handcuffs about which you were examined before? I have. (Book produced.) That contains one entry referring to the sale to Mr. John Weekes.
627. By Mr. Morris: Is that the day book? That is a rough order book, not the day book; the day book is what the fair copy is made into.
628. By the Chairman: The entry under date February 28, 1859, "J. W. Weekes, 16½ doz. Police handcuffs, at 46s., £38 Gs. 8d.," is the entry you refer to? Yes.
629. There is something written across it—the word "Paid," I think? Yes, "Paid."
630. There are some figures under the word "Paid"—is that the date of payment? I do not think it has any reference to it.
631. What does the date refer to, if not to that? I cannot say at this moment what it is; it may be a memorandum of date, but I could not make it out; I could not say what the date was exactly.
632. The figures appear to be "21/5/59"? No, it is the 14th of some month, either the 5th or the 3rd—the 3rd, I think, by the look of it.
633. At all events, these figures appear in conjunction with the word "Paid," written across the original entry? They are written across the entry, but I would not positively state that they refer to it.
634. The figures are immediately under the word "Paid"? Just so.
635. What do they refer to if not to the entry? I cannot say at this distance of time. It may be the exact date of payment, but I cannot say positively.
636. Are you in the habit of entering payments like that across the entry, when the transaction is of this character? Sometimes I merely say "Paid"—sometimes I put the date.
637. At all events, the word "Paid" and these figures were not written at the time that entry was made? They must have been written after the entry, of course.
638. But they were not written on the same day or date that the entry was made? If that is the date of payment, they would be written on the date when I received the money.
639. And the word "Paid" was written on —? On the date when the money was paid. If you refer to my former evidence you will find the date on which the money is entered in the cash book, and I expect that will correspond with the former entry.
640. On re-consideration, the figures appear to be "14/3/59"? Yes.
641. What was the quantity actually supplied—was it 16½ dozen? That was the quantity I supplied to my brother; what he supplied to the Government I cannot state.
642. That would be 200 pairs? Yes.
643. Your brother tendered for more than 200 pairs, did he not? I cannot say; I dare say he tendered for as many as were wanted, whatever that number may have been.
644. Is there any entry here of the second transaction with Mr. Audsley? (Witness produced another book similar to the last.) That is merely entered as a cash entry—sold to cash, 200 pairs, at 3s. 11d.
645. What date is that under? Monday, October 10th, 1859. It is merely made as a memorandum just for my own guidance at any future time.
646. The entry under date Monday, October 10th, 1859, "Cash—200 pr. chain handcuffs, at 3s. 11d.—£39 3s. 4d." refers to the transaction with Mr. Audsley? Yes.
647. Is the entry in your handwriting? Yes.
648. Was it all written at the same time? Yes; I should imagine from the appearance of it that it has all been written and marked at the same time. It is merely a memorandum for my own guidance.
649. And written on that date? On the date when it was paid, just as cash—nothing else.
650. Is there any entry, with reference to the transaction with Mr. Audsley, of a similar character to that in the case of Mr. John Weekes? That is a similar one; the only difference is that I put the name to one and not to the other.
651. The entry to your brother is in the rough order book, what book is this entry to Mr. Audsley in? In a rough order book, the same class of book.
652. Then this book is, in fact, a continuation of that book? We keep a lot of these books on the counter—four, generally—and just whichever book happens to be handy it is put into.

* NOTE (by witness on revision):—This answer being irrelevant to the subject, I should wish it to be expunged.

† Vide "Proceedings," 27 February, 1861.

- C. W. Weekes, Esq.
27 Feb., 1861.
- into. Any transaction which is a regular sale to go into the ledger is copied into the journal, but anything that is for cash is entered here and then it is done with.
653. Then the whole of your transactions over the counter are not entered into one book? They are entered into four books; there are four books on the counter to be used if we want them; though sometimes we may only use one book all day long.
654. You say this entry was made when the handcuffs were paid for? I imagine so from its being marked in that way.
655. Is not the inference that it was made on the 10th October, 1859? Just so.
656. How is it that this entry appears in the other book that you shewed us when you were examined before? It appears there as cash received.
657. Why were two entries made? Because this is only a rough book, it will not shew the cash; the cash as it is received goes into the till and must be put into some book. If a person at any future time refers me to a sale of this kind, in the manner you have now, I turn to the cash book and find the entry, perhaps only handcuffs; then I turn to the rough order book bearing that date, and there I find the particulars of it, as you find them there.
658. Is the book you produced the other day made up from this book? No, it is all cash received, made up from no book at all. This has no reference to that book; this is merely a memorandum, nothing else.
659. I want to know why, if this was a cash transaction, it was entered in both these books? For the mere sake of having a memorandum of the transaction.
660. Is not the entry in the cash book a memorandum? No, I think, if I recollect, it merely says handcuffs a certain amount. This is merely for reference at any time, that I can turn over and see what it was.
661. At all events there is no entry in any of your books of 400 pairs of handcuffs sold to Mr. Audsley? Not unless we had sold them to him. It appears he only had 200 pairs, and of course that would be the only entry I should make, and I would not think of making it till it was all complete.
662. Do I understand that these two books, which you now produce, are both rough order books? Certainly, you may call them rough order books or memorandum books, because they are for everything; rough memoranda of every kind are put into them.
663. Then both these entries of the transactions with your brother, Mr. John Weekes, and with Mr. Audsley, were only entered in these rough order books or memorandum books when the handcuffs were paid for? I cannot exactly say whether it was the same day. You have the dates there, they will tell best. It is very probable I might make no entry at all until I got the cash.
664. It appears by the dates that the entry in the rough order book was made six days after Mr. John Weekes tendered? So it appears.
665. By Mr. Morris: Which, as a matter of fact, was the day on which the tender was decided upon? That I cannot say.*
666. By the Chairman: Then the entry of the transaction with Mr. Audsley is not of the same kind as the entry of the transaction with Mr. John Weekes? Yes, precisely similar; they are both entered as rough memoranda.
667. The entry of the transaction with Mr. Audsley is made when the handcuffs are paid for? I cannot say positively whether they were paid for on that day; I cannot say positively that that was the exact date.
668. Can you, from looking at your books, say whether there was any entry of the transaction with Mr. Audsley before the date when you were paid? † That I cannot say. † This is the only entry necessary.
669. You said you found certain entries, and you have got your books here which shew those entries, I want to know, from your books, whether there is any entry of the transaction with Mr. Audsley before the date it was paid? If this is the date it was paid there would be no entry before that. As I stated before, in transactions of this kind, I often keep nothing but a memorandum on my own desk; I sell the goods for cash, and make no entry until I get the money for them; it is not necessary to keep any other record.
670. Do you, in all transactions of this kind, make a memorandum in the cash book you produced the other day, as well as a memorandum in this book? Yes, if there are any circumstances calling for it; in the case of an amount of this kind, £30 or £40, I put a memorandum here for future reference, so that at any future time I may be able to turn to this book and find the particulars. Of course this is the amount Mr. Audsley paid me for them, and whatever the difference between that and the amount the Government paid him that would be the amount of his profit.
671. But, in point of fact, the entry in this rough order book does not give any more information than the entry in the rough cash book you shewed us the other day? That is according to what the entry was; that entry perhaps only stated a certain sum for handcuffs, this gives the number of pairs.
672. Did not the entry you shewed us the other day state the number of pairs? I do not recollect. If I remember right one mentions the number and the other does not.
673. Both the entries relating to the transaction with Mr. John Weekes, and to the transaction with Mr. Audsley, are in your handwriting? Yes, both. I may mention that I have got a transaction of a somewhat similar character in hand now; I have a lot of goods, £200 or £300 worth, under offer to a gentleman who I know is tendering to the Government; if he gets the tender I shall sell him the goods, and the only entry that will be made will

* NOTE (addendum by witness on revision):—The entry was most probably made when he told me that he had obtained the order.

† NOTE.—Fencilled through, on revision.

will be in the cash book when I get the money, or it may be in the rough memorandum book. It is a transaction of every day occurrence. C. W. Weekes, Esq.

674. By Mr. Morris: In the mean time, before you knew whether this gentleman obtained the tender, would you sell the goods to any one else, if you had the opportunity? That all depends upon the arrangement I make with him; if I promise to keep them for a certain time, of course I should not sell them; if he buys conditionally on my keeping them a week for him, and he has the power of refusal, of course I keep them for him. 27 Feb., 1861.

675. By the Chairman: Do you know when the Colonial Treasurer first became acquainted with this transaction? I cannot say, positively; I should fancy he might see it in the cash book at any time.

676. Is he in the habit of inspecting the books? No, not at all; he seldom looks at them.

677. Is he in the habit of attending your place of business? Only to see if there are any letters for him; he has nothing to do with the business, and does not interfere in the least; he has no idea of what is going on from one week's end to another.

James Williamson, Esq., called in and examined:—

678. By the Chairman: You have been engaged in business for many years in Sydney? I J. Williamson, Esq. have.

679. As a ship chandler and merchant? Yes.

680. This Committee has been appointed to examine into the present system of tendering for the public service, with power to inquire generally into the expenditure of money voted by Parliament for specific objects. In the course of your business, have you been able to form any opinion as to the present system of tendering? I have formed an opinion so far as it has fallen under my own knowledge. 27 Feb., 1861.

681. Will you be kind enough to state any matters within your own knowledge that may enable the Committee to form an opinion as to the present system? There is one great objection which I think may be made to the system of tendering for stores, which is more particularly what I am conversant with—

682. Do you mean marine stores? All kinds of stores. I think that the Boards for opening tenders have been too much confined to one or two individuals, and although I could not say that favouritism has ever been shewn, still I think that suspicions might very well be entertained that there has been, on account of the confined Board—

683. The close character of the Board? The close character of the Board.

684. Then I understand you that the present system is not such as necessarily commands public confidence on the part of business men? I think not.

685. Would you state any facts that have come under your own observation, which have induced you to come to this conclusion? Perhaps they may be called suspicions rather than facts, because these things are seldom openly known; but there are circumstances which give dissatisfaction. I had occasion once, for instance, myself, to tender for certain moorings that were required for Bellambi, or one of the harbours to the southward, and after the tenders had been sent in to the Board of Works, they were referred to the Pilot Board, and I am aware that the Pilot Board, instead of giving an answer whether my tender ought to be accepted or not, took the opportunity of instructing some of their own officers to inquire all round, at different places, to see if they could be got cheaper than the price at which I tendered. I did not think that was fair; and although the Government afterwards took my tender, still I believe it was because they found, after all their inquiries, that they could not help themselves. Now, as I understand the principle on which tenders are called for, it is that the lowest tender of equal quality should be accepted by the Government. I think if the Government receive tenders they ought at once to decide, yes or no, shall this or that tender be accepted. Instead of that, after the tenders are lodged, by that means knowing somewhere about the price, they can go round to the different dealers in those articles, and offer so much less. I think that is objectionable in the system of tendering. I remember one instance, which, though it did not come exactly under my own business, I know as a fact, where, when tenders were called for for a steam dredge for the Hunter, by being regularly published in the Gazette, and other papers, a tender was sent in at a certain amount—(I do not know whether there were more tenders than one)—and the Government kept that tender for some time without an answer, and at last it was declined, when immediately afterwards the Government called for fresh tenders. Well, the person who had tendered at first, if he did tender again, of course would tender at the same price; but another tender was sent in, a few hundred pounds lower, which was accepted. That was a matter of £8,000. Now, I consider that was giving an unfair advantage to those who had not tendered at first, but who sent in tenders on the second occasion, probably after the amount of the first tender had leaked out. For instance, I might have certain articles in store that I wished to tender at what I would consider a fair price, but if I thought that for a few shillings less I would get the tender, the probability is that I would take a few shillings less; but when I have sent my tender in, and the amount of that tender is known, it gives an unfair advantage to any one else who would tender at a lower figure.

686. Do you think that in all cases where only one tender is sent in that tender ought to be accepted, and no fresh tenders called for? I think it ought, or the work be declined at that time at any rate.

687. How do you mean the work declined? For instance, if stores are tendered at a certain price, if the price looks a reasonable price it ought not to be rejected, or if rejected the tender ought to be destroyed and become waste paper. It should not be known.

688. Secrecy ought to be observed? Secrecy ought to be observed.

J. Williamson, Esq.
27 Feb., 1861.

689. Do you mean to say that in this case secrecy was not observed? I think it was not, in fact I knew the amount of the tender a day or two afterwards. There are in the public service two or three departments altogether separate and distinct, all of which are in the habit of receiving tenders. For instance, the tenders for Public Works form a different branch from the tenders for Stores; then there are the tenders for Postal Communication which constitute another branch. All these separate branches might well have separate Boards, and on all the Boards there ought to be a sufficient number of members to prevent the possibility of any individual members being able to influence the decisions of the Board in favour of the tender of any particular friend. In a little community like ours even those who wish to act without the slightest bias cannot help feeling a bias now and then; and if the Board is composed of but two or three individuals it is but natural to think that a bias in favour of a particular tenderer, if the price was not altogether different, might be exercised; whereas if the Board was composed of say six members I think there would be less chance of favouritism being shewn.

690. Then in the first place I understand you to recommend that there should be different Boards for the different departments? I think so.

691. By Mr. Morris: It is so now, I believe, as a matter of fact? It is to a certain extent. But in the Public Works Department, for instance, there are tenders received for stores—coals, and so on—all of which I think ought to go through one channel. Public works are a separate affair altogether, and those who might be competent men to sit on Boards for stores might be quite incompetent in the matter of public works; and the same with respect to tenders for postal communication. The Postmaster General is not likely to be a person who knows much about works or about stores, but he is very necessary to be on a Board in his own department. The same with the Colonial Storekeeper; he ought to be on all Boards where stores are required, because a certain knowledge is required to know which are the proper articles to accept; but at the same time it would not be necessary that he should be on the Board for the postal service or public works.

692. By the Chairman: Do you think it would be well to have on such a Board as that, a gentleman appointed by the Government but not connected with any Government department—some gentleman of high standing who would have the confidence of the business community? I think on all of them it would be a very great improvement. I think some retired merchant, or some person who would not be likely to be biassed either one way or another ought to be on all these Boards. It would give great confidence to the people if you were to increase the number to say six, one or two of whom should be business men of some kind. It is of no use having a Board composed of men who know nothing about business; for instance, the Registrar General and several of those men, who are all very well in their own places, but if put in the places of business men must either sit as dummies, not giving any opinion, or be influenced by the others. They make up the number, but they are of no assistance I should imagine.

693. By Mr. Morris: They are rather placed there, I apprehend, to see that the tenders are all properly opened, not to give an opinion on the goods? Men connected with a business department would be quite capable of seeing fair play too.

694. By the Chairman: Do you think it should be made a rule that persons tendering should always be at hand? It is the rule, but it is not carried out. I know at one time when we, Mitchell and Co., tendered at first, we always sent up one of the clerks, or I went myself, to wait, because it is stated in the requisition that some person connected with the tenderer should attend at a certain hour, but we were never called upon, and therefore the practice has been dropped.

695. Then the practice has fallen into disuse on account of the Board never calling on parties tendering for any information? I suppose so. For instance, if I were to tender now for stores, I should merely send up a boy with the tender just before 12 o'clock; formerly I should have sent some one who could have answered questions.

696. Where articles are to be inspected—where samples are sent—do you think the parties sending in the samples should be at hand? No doubt of it.

697. Do you know what the practice is at present in such cases? I rather think that at present it is not the practice to send in samples—it is done, but very rarely; the general practice is that tenders are called for in accordance with a sample deposited at the Colonial Store, and the person tendering has to inspect the sample before he sends in his tender; if he had not the particular description of goods, they would not be accepted.

698. By Mr. Morris: You do not send samples? Not as a general rule. Sometimes, when tenders for oil have been called for, samples have been required. A great improvement might be made in the mode of calling for tenders. It was at my suggestion that the oil tender was altered. At one time the oil tender used to be mixed up with the provision tenders, which were generally taken by a person named Johnson. I pointed out to the Colonial Treasurer, then Mr. Campbell, that the oil for light-houses could be tendered for cheaper if separated from the provision tenders. That was done, and we had the tender for one or two years for the light-houses alone. But there yet remains room for improvement in this respect. I think that in drawing out the tenders they might be still more simplified, by separating many articles from the rest, instead of mixing them up with these long provision tenders. Several items might be taken out for particular departments, and supplied direct to the storekeeper.

699. By the Chairman: I believe you have had considerable acquaintance with the oil trade? Yes, a good many of my years have been spent in it.

700. Do you recollect inspecting some oil which was tendered by Mr. Harbottle some time ago? Yes, a few months ago—some Chinese oil. He asked me to come and look at it with Mr. Stuart. We tried the samples—there were three jars—by argand lamps and by common lamps, and we found it was very good oil. I remember we gave a certificate.

701. Were you acquainted with the oil accepted instead of Mr. Harbottle's? No, I was not, but I have heard complaints of it; some of it is at the Colonial Store now, I believe, and it is very much complained of. J. Williamson,
Esq.
702. By the Government? By the light-house keepers. It was some oil that was purchased by Captain Browne, so I understood. There was a complaint about it only the other day by the keeper of the lower light-house, so I was informed by the merest accident. I asked what oil it was, and was told it was this oil which Captain Browne had bought, and which turned out very bad. I bought some of Mr. Harbottle's oil after having inspected it, and it was very good. 27 Feb., 1861.
703. In such a matter as that of tendering for oil for the light-houses, who were the proper persons to constitute the Board? I think you might have one Board for all stores. I differ from the Report of the Board on the Colonial Storekeeper's Department, recommending that the different departments should purchase their own stores. I think that would make a very biggledy-piggledy affair of it. Instead of that, I would confine them still more to the Storekeeper's Department than they have been hitherto. Everything in the way of stores should go through the Colonial Storekeeper, and by that means they can be checked by persons having some knowledge of the business. When we tendered, we had infinitely less trouble with that department than with any other. We used to have tenders for the Surveyor General's Department, for tents and things of that kind, and for the Colonial Architect's Department and several others; and we always had a great deal of trouble with them; but with the Colonial Storekeeper's Department, when the goods were delivered, we had no more trouble with them. For instance, in the case of oils, our storekeeper went in when the oil was delivered, and he was told at once whether it would do; what was accepted was taken over, and what was thought to be bad (generally on account of bad packages), was replaced at once; we had no further trouble. I think that there should be a Board to consider tenders for stores of all descriptions, of which the heads of the different departments chiefly interested should be members; for instance, the Colonial Architect, the Colonial Storekeeper, the Under Secretary for Works, and you might have the Engineer for Harbours or not as might be thought proper. A great many things come through him now as his establishment is carried on. Then, if with these gentlemen you were to associate an old mercantile man who had no interest either one way or other in the tenders, I think the public would have confidence in such a Board. If the tenders were decided upon (either accepted or declined within a reasonable time) it would likewise be a great convenience. In many cases now the tenderer has no answer for months. For instance, some few months ago there were tenders called for, for a steam tug for the dredge at the Hunter by the Board of Works, in the Engineer's Department; I tendered my little steamer, and I did not get an answer for three months afterwards; whether it was by accident or not I do not know, but I only got the answer just before Captain Martindale went away, declining her, though she had been employed all the time at the same place. It is merely the loose way of doing business that I complain of.
704. Do you know whether that is a matter complained of by business people? Yes; I have felt it often with many things. We have been left to guess whether our tenders were accepted or not.
705. Are you aware of the plan pursued in Melbourne with regard to publishing the tenders? No.
706. Do you think it would be advisable to publish the tenders? I do not think it would do any harm. I remember we once used to have the tenders published here.
707. By Mr. Morris: The prices? Yes; I do not think there can be too much publicity in these things. It would rather do good than harm, if the tenders were published, so far as the public service is concerned. It would shew those who held goods at what rate the Government was supplied, and perhaps when tenders were called for again, they might be induced to tender at a less price. I remember here, a few years ago, they used to be advertised very frequently—the tenders accepted, and the prices.
708. It would be more satisfactory to the competing tenderers? No doubt of it.

William Madderson Alderson, Esq., called in and examined:—

709. By the Chairman: You have been engaged in business for some years in Sydney? Yes. W. M.
Alderson, Esq.
710. In the leather trade chiefly? Yes. 27 Feb., 1861.
711. This Committee has been appointed for the purpose of examining into the present system of tendering for the public service, with power to inquire generally into the expenditure of money voted by Parliament for specific objects. Have you, in the course of your business had occasion to come into connection with the present system? Yes, very often; I have some Government contracts at present.
712. Do you think the system as now carried out commands the confidence of those who are in the habit of tendering for the public service? It does not command my confidence. There is one thing I do not approve of, and it is this, their being bound to take the lowest tender; I think the Government often loses money by that.
713. You think they sometimes get an inferior article? Yes. My idea is—in our line at least—that parties tendering should send in a sample of the goods they intend to supply, and that competent people should be on the Board that understand these things, to judge which is the cheapest. It is not because an article is low priced that it is really the cheapest. I think they would get a much better article if they were not bound down—if they were to have some discretionary power—the same as all other business is done. But what I can learn from

W. M.
Alderson, Esq.
27 Feb., 1861.

from my experience is, that they are afraid to take any but the lowest tender, for fear they might be pulled over the coals in the House. That is my impression from what I could learn from conversations with parties.

714. Have you ever had occasion to complain of the length of time which elapsed before you have been informed whether your tender was accepted or not? I cannot say I have, excepting in the case of our last tender to the Railway Department. There is another bad system there. They advertise for a large list of goods, and you have to tender for either part or all. Each contractor picks out the things he is able to supply. Now I looked out as many things as I was able to supply, and I never heard a word about my tender being accepted or declined, as is customary in other departments, until I got a requisition sent in for two or three articles. I naturally supposed that I had got the contract for all I had tendered for; but when I went to the Railway Department to sign the bond I found that these were the only three articles I had got to supply. Now if I had known that, I would have thrown it up, but then I had committed myself by supplying some of the articles. It was their fault; they ought to have sent me notice at once of the articles they had accepted. It does not pay me to supply these three petty articles; it is not worth the trouble of going and signing the bond.

715. Do I understand you to complain of too many articles being included in one list? I complain of their not sending the notice at once to state what articles they had accepted, then I would have known what to have done, because I need not have taken the contract without I liked. It makes it too petty—too small for any one to bother himself with. My impression is, that if they follow out that rule tradespeople will not be at the trouble to look after their contracts. It is like a retail business compared to a wholesale business—pettifoggery.

716. Do you think the persons that compose the Boards that have to judge of the articles supplied by you are competent judges of the articles sent in? No, I do not, if the Boards are composed of the parties I have heard named. I have understood that Captain Browne is generally a member, and I did hear that Mr. Crook, the Harbour Master, was on the Board, but it puzzled me how he could know whether a saddle was a good one or a bad one, or Captain Browne either. I believe Captain M'Lerie was on the last Board; now he is a judge of such things.

717. Would you recommend that for all the different stores the Government requires, the Board should be composed of the same persons, or of different persons, according to the description of articles required? That is hard to say. There are men that have a general knowledge of most kinds of merchandize, but they are not many, I would recommend that they should be men that have this sort of knowledge as near as possible.

718. What do you think of the propriety of putting on these Boards some person not connected with any Government department—some merchant retired from business in whom the public would have confidence? I think it would be a very good thing, if they could not get parties that have a general knowledge of these things out of or from the Government offices.

719. By Mr. Parkes: Why do you think it would be a good thing to introduce a retired merchant—would he have the general knowledge you speak of? I think he ought to have a general knowledge of merchandize. Merchants import all sorts of things, although there certainly are some of them who do not understand the things they deal in. It is a difficult question to answer. There is one thing I would recommend with regard to saddlery, boots and shoes, and such things, that they should always have a man like Captain M'Lerie on the Board, because it is in his department, and he ought to have a thorough knowledge of what he wants. But I think it is not in Captain Browne's or Mr. Crook's department to choose saddles and boots and shoes for Captain M'Lerie. I know Captain M'Lerie to be a good judge, because he has called in at our place of business and found fault with points in the saddles which other people could not pick out; and he has suggested many improvements too, which I suppose he had found to be necessary by having to use them.

720. By the Chairman: Is there anything else you could suggest to the Committee? There is another thing I am very much opposed to, and I think the country loses a great deal of money by it, that is, importing so many goods that can be made here. I will guarantee that if you were to see the shoes that were imported when George A. Lloyd and Co. were agents for the Government, and compare them with the shoes we make, you would say one pair of our shoes is worth three of theirs. I do not know the price they pay for the English ones—I never could learn that—but I know the quality of them, because I have seen them; they are made of the greatest rubbish of leather that could be found in England, and the workmanship is appropriate to the material.

721. How long ago is it since they imported any? Two or three years. I recollect I got Mr. George Thornton to ask a question about it in the House, and Mr. Charles Cowper admitted that they did. I think it is a very foolish thing to do when there are so many men here that want work, particularly when we can prove that it is cheaper to get them made here.

722. By Mr. Parkes: Do we understand from your evidence that the lowest tender is always taken? Yes, I have always understood that to be the case. The way it was brought so forcibly before my notice was during the time the gold excitement was raging here; I had the contract for boots that year; I was supplying the Government at 11s. a pair, and at the same time I was selling the same sort of boots at 14s. Well, I might have given them three months' notice, and have got rid of the contract, but I said, I will not throw it up, because they will bear this in mind next year; and next year I was thrown out of the contract by some twelve or thirteen shillings in the aggregate after adding up the whole of the items, and when I inquired about it they told me they were bound to take the lowest tender.

723. Could you state from your own knowledge whether the goods supplied were as good as

as those you supplied? I am sure to think mine the best. There is another thing, the samples at the Colonial Store are our samples—we made them for the store—and I have every reason to believe that the parties that get the contract are not kept up to the samples. My foreman said that some of the parties remarked they had accepted saddles for a few shillings of difference—perhaps 5s. on each—and there was from £1 to £2 difference in the quality. You know that makes a wonderful difference if it could be proved. I recollect the first time I got the contract they were very particular with me; they would not receive any rubbish from me.

W. M.
Alderson, Esq.
27 Feb., 1861.

724. How long have you been in the habit of tendering for Government supplies? Five or six years, or more. I know I had a great deal of trouble to get into it at first. Binnie had the contract for years—it was a sort of sinecure to him. I applied to Sir Charles Fitz Roy by letter, and to the Colonial Secretary, and everybody; but, however, Sir Charles choked me off at last; he sent letters which were as much as to say, “it’s no use trying here any more.” I merely wanted the thing to be done openly so that all in the trade could have a chance of tendering; I was asking no favour.

725. I was going to ask whether you were of opinion that tenders had been accepted through favouritism or any other reason of that kind? I could not say that—never since I had anything to do with it. Many a time Mr. Buchanan, when he was Colonial Storekeeper, has told me he never had so much pleasure in receiving goods as from our house, they were so satisfactory, no fault to be found, after we got over the first difficulty. I certainly at first thought he was rather too particular with our goods, oftentimes unnecessarily so, but subsequent experience shewed me that he was merely discharging his duty, by endeavouring to secure articles of the requisite quality for the public service. It was no wonder they should be particular with our goods at first, after they had been receiving Mr. Binnie’s goods for so many years.

726. By the Chairman: Do you not think that persons sending in samples should always be present when the tenders are opened? Yes, we are always waiting there to be called in, but I was never called to be asked any question.

727. By Mr. Parkes: Did you ever hear of tenderers previously sending presents to the head of the department? No, I never heard anything. I can only say I never sent a present.

728. Did you ever hear of any other person doing so? I have heard people talk about these things, but I could not give you any facts. It might be all lies. I know, when Mr. Buchanan was in the Colonial Store, I used to say many a time to my foreman and my partner, that I would not like to offer him anything; there was something about him that seemed to say “keep your distance.”

729. You never heard any tradesman who had tendered acknowledge that he had made presents to the head of the department? Never.

730. By the Chairman: Do you not think it would be well that all the tenders should be advertised when sent in? I think the accepted tenders are advertised. I do not think it would be fair to expose a man’s prices to the public. Still I do not think there would be much harm in it. The principal objection that I see is taking the lowest price without reference to quality. I think it is better to carry on the business of the Government the same as a private individual carries on his business, by sometimes giving 10s. more for an article, to gain £1 by it in the quality.

THURSDAY, 4 APRIL, 1861.

Present:—

Mr. ARNOLD, | Mr. DANIEL,
Mr. PARKES.

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Henry William Johnson called in and examined:—

731. By the Chairman: This Committee has been appointed “to examine into the present system of tendering for the public service, with power to inquire generally into the mode of expending money voted by Parliament for specific objects.” I believe you have at various times contracted rather largely with the Government? Yes, for the last twenty-eight years I have done nothing else.

Mr. H. W.
Johnson.
4 April, 1861.

732. For what departments have you tendered? I have tendered for the provision and forage contracts for the district of Sydney. In former times I have had, collectively, contracts for half the districts in the Colony; but of late I have contracted chiefly for Sydney and Parramatta.

733. Before the introduction of Responsible Government were the contracts of the same nature as they have been since? Of the same nature. I have had contracts with both the Colonial Government and the Commissariat for provisions.

734. By “provisions” do I understand you to mean articles of food? Articles of food, forage for horses, and other incidental things that come under the head of contingencies, such as fuel and light required for the Government establishments.

735. Then I understand that you have almost devoted yourself to this as a matter of business? I have done nothing else since 1834—before any Colonial contracts were in existence.

736.

- Mr. H. W. Johnson.
4 April, 1861.
736. Since the time when you first tendered, has there been any change in the system of carrying on the tendering? Yes, there have been a great number of changes.
737. Can you state any facts to the Committee which may be useful to them in forming an opinion as to the advisability of continuing or of amending the present system? In the first instance, when the charges were made upon the Colony direct for gaols and the police, the whole of the supplies were tendered for to the Commissariat Department, and the contractors were paid by that department, which afterwards made the charge upon the Colonial revenue. Afterwards a Colonial engineer's department was formed under Colonel Barney, and the contracts then became so extensive that it was considered by the Colonial Government desirable that they should enter into their own contracts, and they accordingly adopted in a great measure the conditions and mode of the tenders in the Commissariat Department. The Government appointed a Board to receive and consider these contracts, and it was a Board which I consider to have been impartial in every respect. It was composed of the head of the Government, the Colonial Secretary—to whom all tenders were addressed—the Auditor General, as the person having charge of the finances, and until the Colonial Storekeeper's Department was formed a third party was selected; such a person for instance as Captain Nicholson, who was in charge of the Mounted Police, or the Sheriff, or some other person whose duty it was to see that the department under him was properly supplied. These formed the Board. The party who put in a tender, or his agent, used to be in attendance when the tenders were opened, to be called in if necessary; but this very seldom took place, unless there were something technically wrong as to the way of filling up the tender, or bearing on a point of a similar nature. When the contracts had been considered, and the calculations made at the office, the tenderer got his answer.
738. This Board was afterwards changed, was it not? When the Colonial Storekeeper's Department was established, I had several conversations with Mr. Lithgow, the late Auditor General, about the accounts, and pointed out that there were too many vouchers required. In the Commissariat they pay all under one account, and give a detailed list afterwards; Mr. Lithgow was thinking of forming an establishment of that kind. When the Colonial Storekeeper's Department was established, the Board consisted of three persons, the Colonial Secretary, who was Chairman, the Auditor General, and the Colonial Storekeeper, who was present for reference. At the time I am speaking of, the Honorable E. Deas Thomson was Colonial Secretary, Mr. Merewether, Auditor General, and Mr. Buchanan, Storekeeper. That Board sat up to the introduction of Responsible Government; and from that time there have been more than one change, that I have not been able to learn the precise nature of. The system at present, as I understand it, is for the Under Secretary of Finance, and a number of the heads of departments to meet together and open the tenders for the articles required; they then make their calculations, and the tenderer receives his answer from the Under Secretary for Finance.
739. What is your opinion of the present system of tendering, generally speaking? I do not think it at all so good as the old one; but it might be modified, so that the Under Secretary for Finance, and the Auditor General, always to form a portion of the Board, and to be joined by the heads of the departments to whom the tenders particularly refer, and the calling for divided contracts be abolished. I think the Auditor General ought in all cases to be on the Board, as the accounts must finally pass before him.
740. Do you think enough publicity is given in the way of advertising for, or the acceptance of tenders? It never was advertised at all for the Colonial service till lately, in any other paper than the Government Gazette, and I think, although saying it against myself, that the provision contracts might be published a little oftener, to draw people's attention to them. At the same time I would not publish the whole of the conditions of the contracts, as these might be learned by application at the Treasury, and the various Police Benches in the country districts.
741. When tenders are accepted, do you think it would be well to publish ———? The prices.
742. Yes? They are published in the Government Gazette.
743. But the names of the parties whose tenders have been rejected are not? No.
744. Do you think it advisable they should be? No, I do not; without it is a case of this kind, where the tender rejected was lower than that accepted; which I consider a thing that ought not to be countenanced in any way whatever.
745. I believe your tenders have been pretty generally accepted? Yes, till lately; the last I put in were not. A person does not want to be throwing away money; if other people like to put their hands into their pockets and make a present to the Government of £60 or £70 a month, I cannot do it. I may be grateful for what I have received from the Government, but I cannot carry my gratitude to that extent.
746. Up to what time were your tenders generally accepted? Till within the last two or three years. A change has been adopted, partly at my own suggestion. Tenders used to go in for an entire district, which I consider the best mode—one contractor to supply everything—but from private hints thrown out through various channels, that although there was a great deal of competition for the supply of the departments in the district of Parramatta, nearly always one person got the contract, and the prices were very high. The Board wanted to see how it could be put down, should there be any foundation for the rumours, and at first did not accept the tenders put in, but called for others. In the meantime they communicated with me relative to the supply of the Lunatic Asylum at Tarban Creek, which was at that time attached to the Parramatta district, and I gave my consent that, if they did not accept the tender, and called for fresh ones—if they did not then receive one they thought they ought to accept, I would supply the Asylum from Sydney. It was not till the 29th March, that I was applied to again on the subject, which was too late for me to make my arrangements before 1st of April; and they were obliged to accept the tender from the same person, the tender being higher than that he had previously sent in, which was considered too high. The next year I was prepared; I tendered for the supply of the establishment, obtained it, and incorporated it with the contract for the Sydney district. To prevent these proceedings, it was thought desirable to alter the system, and instead of advertising for tenders for the supply of the various establishments, to advertise for the various articles according to trades; that is to have a butcher, a baker, a grocer, and so on, to supply the various articles they dealt in; but I believe when the trouble of keeping and examining several different sets of vouchers, the expense of sending messengers, running from one end of the town to the other about providing the next day's supply, it would be found that the system of giving the contract to one person is the most economical.
to

Mr. H. W.
Johnson.

4 April, 1861.

747. You think it most advisable that all these articles should be tendered for by one person? Yes, at so much per ration, or per head.

748. May I ask what tenderer was in the habit of receiving the tenders for Parramatta? Mr. Harvey, or Messrs. Byrnes. Mr. Harvey has been generally accepted. Mr. Patrick Hayes, or, as he was generally called, Paddy Hayes, was the first who got into any particular way with these separate tenders. I may mention an incident that occurred not two months ago about tenders, even in that shape, i. e., trade divisions. I merely mention it to shew what might be done in the tendering line; whether it is a fact or not, I cannot tell, but things similar have occurred a great many years back. A stranger from Parramatta came to me with a paper, and said, "Will you read this—you may copy it if you like—only give me back the paper?" It was explaining how this man—meaning Mr. P. Hayes, and his name was mentioned—had said he used to get the contracts. He always, as he called it, "shaved" the other tenderers. He put in one tender for each allotment in the regular way, and gave another tender to somebody else who made the calculations. There was an item left blank in the latter one, and if any one's tender was lower than his, this blank was filled up at the price, without reference to the cost of the article—that would bring the tender, in the aggregate, a trifle under the other which was lowest. The tender that had the price put in was substituted for the one that had been handed from the Board to be calculated, and the initials of the Board must naturally have been copied off. This might have been all braggadocio of the man, but this is what was stated.

749. Do opportunities exist under the present system for such malpractices? Yes.

750. Have no amendments been made to prevent this? Not that I am aware of.

751. What would you suggest to remedy it? That tenders should be given in duplicate, and, as the tenders were opened they should be signed, and one of them should be locked up; or, if in originals only, previous to sending them from the room, for the calculations to be made, the gentlemen who constituted the Board should copy the prices. It might also be expedient to call in the parties who were in attendance.

752. The tenderers? The tenderers; but they might be called in one by one, and the question might be asked, "Have you put in a tender for so-and-so, at such prices?" On his acknowledging it, a note should be made of it, and it would stop such proceedings as the man who came from Parramatta informed me of, if attempted. I should have sent in the paper to the Government, but, having to put in tenders myself, I did not like the appearance of doing so just then.

753. Were you ever asked to be present, when the tenders were opened, in order to give any explanation? There is a clause in the present conditions, requiring the tenderer to be present, but we are not often called upon.

754. How often have you been asked to give any explanation? Twice.

755. Twice in twenty-four years? Yes; or, at the most, three times. On one occasion I was tendering for the district of Queanbeyan, when the mounted police were stationed there, at the beginning of the gold diggings, and I had forgotten to fill in the name of the district, although I knew what district it was; it was a tender for flour and all other supplies. At another time, I was called in relative to the affair of the Lunatic Asylum at Parramatta. The third time was to explain respecting a person of the name of George Seymour, of Windsor. He had tendered for the district of Penrith, at the time the Blackheath Stockade was included in that district, and they asked me a question relative to the complaints that were made when they were acting under the Commissariat. They wished to know whether he was an eligible person.

756. He was a tenderer at that time? Yes.

757. And you were also? Yes.

758. How long is that ago? Twelve or fourteen years. I have never been called in since 1852 or 1853.

759. Are you acquainted with the system of tendering in Victoria? I believe it is as nearly as possible the same as here. I do not know what Board is appointed.

760. What is the practice when the tenders are opened—are the parties required to attend? I do not know as relates to Victoria.

761. Do you think it advisable, as a general rule, that they should always attend? Yes; the contractors here, according to the conditions, are required to attend; but they seldom do so, because they are never asked any questions with reference to their tenders.

762. Have you ever known instances where the interests of the public service have not been promoted so well as they might, by the tenderers not being present, or not being called upon to give explanations as to the qualities or descriptions of goods or samples supplied? Yes, frequently trouble, and sometimes loss to the public service, arises in that way.

763. Have you known instances? Yes, where they have been supplied with improper articles. If samples were called for, it would save a great deal of trouble and annoyance to the public service.

- Mr. H. W. Johnson.
- 4 April, 1861.
764. You think, in all instances, samples should be called for? Yes, when the articles were not of a perishable nature samples should be kept in the office, in order to test these disputes.
765. Have you known where samples have been sent in, that they have not been tested as they ought to have been? I have not. I know goods have been received by heads of departments and accepted—perhaps not so formally accepted as would be necessary for the Supreme Court, but still morally accepted—and after that, either the parties who have supplied them have been put to the trouble and expense of taking them back, or the Government have been put to the inconvenience of retaining an article they did not want.
766. There is not a business-like acceptance or refusal? There are conditions, but the conditions are not virtually carried into effect on the part of the Government.
767. The goods are not accepted or refused in a sufficiently business-like way? No, the contractor is left to the whim or caprice of the party receiving. For instance, in furnishing supplies to Cockatoo Island, if a man, a confidant called a delegate, comes down to the boat and says, "I will not take such a thing," it is of no use for the Superintendent to say, "You must take it." If he were to do so, there would be a disturbance. They do not carry out the principle of receiving according to the conditions, so as to give fair play to the contractor.
768. In what way do you mean? You contract to supply articles of a certain quality, and the head of the department is responsible for receiving them; but instead of the head of the department at Cockatoo being asked whether a thing is good, bad, or indifferent, there is what is called a delegate; perhaps a man like Swan disapproves of them, and after that it would not do for the Superintendent to take upon himself the responsibility of accepting them, or perhaps the men would refuse to work.
769. What would you advise with reference to this matter? That the power of these men called delegates should be clearly defined; the contractor does not contract to supply according to the whims and manœuvres of these men. It seems strange if Government cannot decide whether what they receive is good or bad, without calling in their opinion.
770. I understand what you mean to be this, that the heads of departments should be the only persons to decide whether the particular articles under the contract should be received or not? Yes, that the conditions should be strictly carried out.
771. Have you found that the contractors have been subject to inconvenience from the length of time that elapses from the receipt of the tenders to the acceptance or rejection of them? Yes, great inconvenience, and in former years it was attended with great loss to the public service. In the Commissariat contracts it was made a stipulation that no tender should be withdrawn or altered, but that notice of those accepted should be given within three days of the receipt of the tenders.
772. Used that to be done? Yes.
773. Then if things were managed as they ought to be, there is no reason why the intimation should not be given as quickly now? It might be given in about three hours. In Mr. Miller's time, when the convict system was in full play, and there were twelve or fourteen large establishments to be supplied, and the Sydney contracts used to come to £10,000 a month, there were a number of papers prepared, with lists of some forty or fifty articles to be supplied, and columns for the different contracts; and when the contracts were sent in these were given to a clerk to be entered in the several columns, and to be added up. The clerk would then go to Mr. Miller, and say there are so many tenders in, and the result, and he would tell the parties likely to be successful that they would shortly receive an official notice of the acceptance of their tenders if they were approved. Because in these extensive contracts it was most important that speedy notice should be given. Perhaps Mr. John Eales, for instance, might make you an offer of 6,000 or 7,000 bushels of maize, at 5s. or 6s. a bushel, and say it may remain open till twelve o'clock the next day, but if the offer were not at once accepted, in a few days the price might rise fifty per cent.
774. By Mr. Daniel: Did the tenderers for the public service, prior to Responsible Government, appear to give general satisfaction in the mode and manner in which tenders were accepted? Yes.
775. Will you state if there is an increase in the amount of the contracts; if, since Responsible Government, they have been for larger amounts than formerly? No; they are smaller, if anything.
776. Do you think the Government have been benefited by the recent change in the mode of accepting tenders for the public service, since Responsible Government? The changes as to the divisions of the contracts were in existence previous to Responsible Government.
777. My question is general, whether you think the public service has been benefited by the changes that you say have taken place since Responsible Government? The change has been only in the formation of the Board. This system was in vogue before Responsible Government.
778. By Mr. Parkes: Has the public been better supplied since Responsible Government, more economically, with better provisions? No.
779. By the Chairman: Has it been as well supplied? Yes; it has been supplied in just the same manner; but I would say this, that, had the system been continued, of one general contract for each district, I think it would have been more economical for the public service.
780. By Mr. Daniel: Have you any cause to complain of the present mode of tendering? Not of tendering, because I give the tenders in.
781. If there were tenders invited by the Commissariat and by the Colonial Government, which would you be inclined to tender for first—is there any difference in tendering for the two? No.
782. Does the Commissariat pay more quickly than the Colonial Government? The Commissariat pay quicker.
- 783.

783. Therefore, would you tender at a less price for the Commissariat than for the Colonial Government? No.

Mr. H. W.
Johnson.

784. You think you would derive more benefit from a tender for the Colonial Government? I should have more fair play from the Colonial Government, even under the present conditions, than I should from the Commissariat, and that would be a greater advantage than any quicker payment I might receive. I would sooner supply the Colonial Government than the Commissariat.

4 April, 1861.

785. Are we to understand that the prices you would submit to the Colonial Government would be higher than those you would tender to the Commissariat? I would tender lower to the Colony.

786. By the Chairman: Why, if you would tender lower to the Colony, and are paid quicker by the Commissariat, would you prefer to take a contract for the Colonial Government? Because the conditions of the Commissariat contracts leave you in the power of people, which I know to my own cost, who have an opportunity of carrying out their personal feeling.

787. In the Commissariat? Yes.

788. Is that at the present time? At the present time. What I find fault with principally in the Colonial Government is that the heads of departments have the power to make payments direct. Here is an instance that occurred with myself about a fortnight since when the rations were delivered at Cockatoo Island. One of the men of the class I have spoken of had objected to the bread. It was sent to Captain Mann, and he could see nothing the matter with it; he then applied to the medical officer on the island, who said it was good, wholesome, according to the contract, and fit to be received and eaten by anybody. The consequence was that my boat came away from the island, the men were dismissed, and everything was done for the day. About half-past eleven a boat came over from the island. Capt Scott, the Visiting Magistrate, had made a casual visit to the island, and his attention was directed to this bread, I believe in the cook-house, or by the man acting as delegate; and, without any inquiry, a note came over to me, signed by Captain Scott, that the bread was rejected, and that if I did not send another article before one o'clock, it would be purchased at my cost. I considered that I had fulfilled the terms of my contract, as if there were any objection it was for the recipient to make it. However, I did not give them the trouble of buying other bread, but I sent a substitute under protest, and informed the Treasury of the matter. Now the monthly account is made up, and I could get no cheque, if I wanted the money, unless I consented to the deduction of this amount, supposing bread had been purchased by the authorities at Cockatoo. If the matter were arranged as it was formerly, and no payments were made till they had been examined at the Treasury, the thing might have then been inquired into, and whoever was considered to be in fault would suffer for it. On another occasion, after the bread had been accepted, I got about half of it back cut up into little pieces of no use excepting for fowls. Out of about 300 lbs. of bread I got 140 lbs. or 150 lbs. Because I did not find another article in lieu of it, it was purchased, and I had to deduct the cost. The same thing has happened with maize meal after it was cooked and spoiled.

789. You say the changes you have before mentioned took place before the introduction of Responsible Government—do you think, taking into consideration what you have said about the length of time that elapses between the reception of tenders and intimation being given to the tenderers that they are accepted, that, upon the whole, the tendering system has been as well administered since the introduction of Responsible Government as before? No, I think it was better under the old system. I mean as regards the time that elapses from sending in the tender till you receive notice.

790. Do you think the Boards now are as well qualified to judge of the qualities of the articles supplied as they were under the old system? As far as I understand they are able to judge of these things.

791. A suggestion has been made by some of the witnesses before this Committee, that, in addition to the official members of the Board, Government should have the power to cull in some gentlemen who had been in business to take part in the deliberations of the Board for accepting tenders—do you think that would be an improvement? I think that would be very just towards those who tender.

792. From your acquaintance with the tendering system, and as a man of business, do you think the public service would be benefited by Government getting tenders for articles in some cases where they now purchase direct themselves? In many instances that course must be resorted to—where an article has not been named in a contract.

793. Have you ever known articles to be obtained for the public service by direct purchase where they might have been obtained more advantageously by tender? No; but if tenders were called at the time the articles were required, I do not think you could purchase privately so cheaply as if the supply were open to competition.

794. Provided answers were given immediately to persons tendering? Yes. With reference to the last tenders that went in, they were delivered on the 23rd of February, and answers were received on the 8th of March. During the time these tenders were in, the article of maize rose about 3s. a bushel. What was to hinder the person, as the contract commenced the 1st of April, from going and withdrawing his tender for the item of forage, and fresh tenders to be called for? In such a case, the price that would have to be given would be far higher; whereas if the person had got his notice, he would have been bound by it.

795. By Mr. Daniel: You have spoken of Cockatoo Island; your complaint, as I understand, refers chiefly to that. You say that some bread which had been left by you was rejected by Captain Scott—are you not aware that, as Visiting Magistrate, it would be part of his duty to examine the food? That is not in my contract.

- Mr. H. W. Johnson.
- 4 April, 1861.
796. Are you not aware that Captain Scott, the Visiting Justice, does examine the food used by the prisoners? Yes, but it is not in my conditions.
797. You know that as a fact? Yes.
798. You say that you received a note from Captain Scott, that the food was to be taken back and other substituted? Yes, after having been received by Captain Mann, the Superintendent of the Island, and Captain Mann having referred the thing to the medical officer resident there.
799. By Mr. Parkes: It appears to me that in your evidence you have regarded the whole arrangements as affecting the convenience and benefit of the tenderer; but the real question is, how far the public may be benefited by any change in the system—how far better goods, or at a cheaper price, might be supplied. Do you think any of the recent changes have had the effect of economising the public money, and of supplying better articles for the public? I do not, upon the whole. I believe it has lot in people who have not had the means of carrying out the contracts so well. I believe there have been more complaints of the articles supplied since the system was adopted of calling for several tenders for one establishment instead of one for the permanent supply, like provisions and allowances.
800. The change you complain of is this, that, instead of taking contracts for all the supplies required by a district, they now take contracts for the supply of a particular establishment, or for the performance of a particular work? They do not take it for a particular establishment, that would amount to the same thing; but each establishment may have four or five contracts to supply it with various articles at the same time; and looking to the multiplicity of work and clerical labour to which this division gives rise, I think the old system was the more economical.
801. Take Cockatoo Island or Darlinghurst Gaol,—do not you think a baker, a butcher, or provision dealer could supply respectively bread, meat, and other provisions more economically, and would be more likely to have good provisions, than some person who was merely a contractor and who had to purchase these articles for fulfilling the terms of his contract? No; I could supply them for less in bulk than in division; I should tender for less.
802. Could you supply bread, butcher's meat, and the other provisions required better and more economically than a butcher could supply meat, or a baker bread, direct from his establishment? In bulk I could, for I should have to make only one delivery; and in the other case there would be four deliveries; each of the parties would have to send his man or cart with the articles he supplied.
803. Would you not have to get them from four different sources? Many of the articles I should get from my own sources. For instance, I bake my own bread, kill my own meat, and sometimes make my own flour and maize meal, so that I get the profits that arise from these various occupations.
804. When you object to the change do you take into consideration the growth of the Colony, that instead of being a penal establishment of 100,000 or 150,000, it is now a Colony of some 400,000 inhabitants? I took that into consideration in this way: When I come here there were not above 78,000, prisoners and all. At that time half the number were supplied by Government, and contracts that then came to £10,000 a month do not now come to £150. I beg to add in reference to a former question put to me about deliveries to Cockatoo and the Gaol at Darlinghurst:—On Cockatoo Island they found the inconvenience of having three or four contractors, so they did also at Tarban Creek, and they are now supplied by one contractor; whereas at the gaol in Sydney the contracts are cut up into four or five divisions. One man has a contract that comes to £38 a month, and he has to retail goods every day. The advantage of having one large contract is, that if one item goes up in price another comes down, and thus the general contractor is enabled to carry out his contract without giving notice of discontinuance.
805. Have you ever known any peculiar favouritism in the acceptance of tenders? No.
806. Have you known any presents to be made to the officers who have the duty of examining them? No, I have not. We can only judge by their actions; and persons frequently think that although from their own calculations their tenders ought to have been the lowest, yet they have not obtained the contracts. But then they might not have had the right number to multiply by; i. e., the estimated probable quantities the Government themselves think would be required for the period the tender would run over.

ADDENDUM.

The Board I recommend in my answer on this subject to the Committee would consist of the following officers of the Government, and would represent the whole of the interest connected with provision and forage contracts, and other articles, or fixed allowances:—

Under Secretary of Finance,
Auditor General,
Inspector General of Police,
Sheriff,
Chief Superintendent of Penal Establishments,
The Head of either of the Medical Establishments at Parramatta or Tarban Creek.

These, assisted by a non-official gentleman, as suggested by other witnesses, to guide as to the value of the articles for which samples are sent in, or on other points—(the best person, in my opinion, would be one of the large auctioneers, whose trade might run principally in sales for provisions, &c.)—would give every satisfaction.

H. W. JOHNSON.

John Buchanan, Esq., called in and examined:—

807. By the Chairman: You were some time Colonial Storekeeper? Several years. J. Buchanan, Esq.
808. For how long? I think upwards of fifteen years.
809. This Committee has been appointed "to examine into the present system of tendering for the public service, with power to inquire generally into the mode of expending money voted by Parliament for specific objects." In your capacity of Colonial Storekeeper, you have had opportunities of judging of the present system? Very extensively, of course. 4 April, 1861.
810. I believe whilst acting in that capacity you were member of a Board for considering tenders? I was member of a Board for considering tenders for those articles in which my own department was interested, but not* for provisions in which my own department was not immediately interested.
811. Were you in the Storekeeper's Department before you became its head? Yes, for some years.
812. How many years have you been there altogether? Twenty-one.
813. During the whole of that time you have had opportunity of observing the working of the system? Yes; perhaps I might also be permitted to remark that I had some experience in England previous to that.
814. In a Government department? Yes.
815. In what department? The Ordnance.
816. Since you have been engaged in this way in the public service, has any change taken place in the mode of carrying on this system? The rule by which Government has always been guided has been to obtain supplies for the public service by public contract.
817. In the mode of carrying out the system, have there been changes? There have been changes, but not of any great moment. There are two classes of contracts—those connected with stores, and those connected with provisions. The remarks which will apply to one, will not, in all cases, apply to the other. In the case of stores, latterly, there has been an endeavour to introduce a system of tendering for a specific quantity of articles, and of obtaining them to one pattern. The practice is now reviving of calling for a long list of articles of different qualities; and the Government hamper themselves with these prices so that the whole thing becomes a mere lottery, as it is not in the power of any Board, such as I have seen appointed by the Government, to determine which is the better tender. If you call for a tender for a specific item, and set up a standard by which to judge of its quality, the question is a very simple one; the contractor has merely to supply a certain quantity according to that specific pattern, and the Board has simply to determine who can supply at the lowest price. Where the quality is not defined, it is difficult, if not impossible in many cases, to decide which is the best or cheapest article.
818. What plan would you recommend? Simply the plan I adopted latterly. In the first place I determined what the Government required; I then obtained a standard according to the requirements of the particular department, and called for tenders accordingly, so that I did not hamper the question of price with the question of quality.
819. You would do away with the present system of the tenderers sending in samples? Yes; it is a most fallacious system. I would wish for no better means of deceiving any Government Board. Do not misunderstand me, I do not mean to say that I would do away with all samples; but what I recommend is, that Government should fix its own standard. But if, as I saw lately in the Gazette, they advertise for two or three hundred items in one contract, there may be twenty different qualities and prices for some of the articles.
820. By Mr. Parkes: How could you set up a specific standard for any articles in a long list of general goods—take a pair of boots for instance—what strikes me as the difficulty is how the gentlemen who decide those questions are to determine as to the quality of a pair of boots? That is the difficulty I wish to meet; I say no Board is competent to decide upon that question, and therefore the Government, as a preliminary step, should determine upon their sample—upon what quality they really required, and then call for tenders. The determination of the quality does not now lie with the Board, but with the party who makes the requisition; there is the defect in the present system, and the Government do not make provision to meet it. They do not see by independent and competent officers that the goods supplied strictly correspond with the pattern fixed by Government; there is a link wanting in the chain there.
821. At this stage I do not see how this link is to be supplied—how it is to be ascertained that the goods supplied are to be equal to the standard; for example, taking a pair of boots—supposing Government wanted 200 pairs of boots, of a quality worth 10s. a pair, I am sure of my own personal knowledge, that a pair might be supplied by one tradesman of the full value of 10s., and another pair might be supplied by a second tradesman, who possessed the ability to make an inferior look like a good article, having the appearance of being worth 10s., and yet not worth more than 7s. 6d.? I quite agree with you—I perceive what you mean exactly. No doubt the difficulty exists, but —
822. Take another illustration—a pair of scissors or a knife. After you get to a certain degree of finish, if the article be of superior finish, its value is perhaps doubled; now ninety-nine persons out of a hundred would not be able to fix the value of the superior finish, although they might discover the difference in the rougher work; it would be appreciable only by a first-rate tradesman? I think your views meet mine exactly. I say that no Board I have ever seen assemble are able to detect these differences.
823. How then do you propose to decide the question? By a system of examiners.
824. In the respective trades? Yes. Under the British Government a Board of Officers, heads of departments, assemble and receive the tenders, but their duty ends there; they have

* NOTE (corrected by witness on revision):—And also.

J. Buchanan, Esq.
4 April, 1861.

have no voice when the supplies are delivered. What we need is a Board of Examiners, and even in this limited community it is possible to obtain examiners conversant with the respective trades. We could not extend it to every branch, for the requirements of the Colony are not sufficiently great to bear that expense; but for the main items, as boots and shoes, clothing, and soft goods generally, we could get examiners.

825. What are the heaviest items received by the Government? Clothing and woollen goods.

826. Blankets? Blankets and soft goods generally; for these it is quite possible to get competent persons as examiners, but for the smaller items you must depend upon the judgment of the head of the department for whose use the articles were required.

827. By the Chairman: You said just now that you would not have samples sent in by the tenderer—do I understand that the plan you recommend is this: that the Government should have an article made, or should find an article of the kind they required, as a sample, and that the Board should simply decide as to the tender which should be accepted, and that the protection the Government should have as to the quality of the article supplied should rest with the head of the department, or with the head of the establishment receiving the goods from time to time? Yes. (Vide Appendix A.)

828. For instance, the Board having decided whose tender should be accepted for supplying their provisions at Cockatoo, the head officer on that island should decide as to the quality of the provisions supplied? That opens a different question. You are now entering upon the provisions contracts, which are quite different from those for stores. The provisions contracts, it appears to me, from pretty long experience, divide themselves into two classes. All those services around Sydney and Parramatta, where the tenders should be for specific kindred items; and those for the country, where the contracts should embrace every item of provisions, properly so called, for the public service.

829. Leaving the matter of provisions; I understand that the Board, having decided whose tender should be accepted, say for oil required by the Pilot Board, the head of the Pilot Board should decide that the oil was according to the sample supplied to the Government? I do not think the head of the Pilot Board would be the person to judge. Taking your illustration of oil; I think the test should be the absolute burning of the oil in the lights; it should be a practical test, and should not depend upon the experience of a man whose previous habits of life would not enable him to judge. When tenders are called for, the test to be applied should be provided for and mentioned clearly in the conditions of the contract. In the case of oil the Government could not set up a standard of its own, but nothing could be more simple than the test of burning. Samples might be sent in by different parties, and upon the test of burning the best might be selected. When I said that Government should set up a standard, I did not mean to imply that that should be done in every case; but that, as a general rule, where it was possible, it should be adopted; and it is possible in most things.

830. But taking the system as it exists; do you think the present arrangement has been always acted up to or carried out as far as it might? As far as I know.

831. For instance, in the article of oil; has oil been taken by the Government without having been tested in the way you suggest? I could not speak of the matter to which I think you refer, of my own knowledge. I know something of it from rumour, but it did not come under my personal knowledge.

832. Were you not a member of any Board which approved of oil? Yes, I was.

833. Do you remember an instance in which tenders for the supply of oil was sent in by Mr. Harbottle, an oil merchant in the City of Sydney; and by Messrs. Griffiths, Fanning & Co.? Yes.

834. And Messrs. Griffiths, Fanning's, was accepted? Yes, and Mr. Harbottle's also; both were accepted, because the supply that the Government required could not be obtained from either one of them. We took all that Mr. Harbottle had to offer us of better quality, and took the remainder of Messrs. Griffiths, Fanning's.

835. Are you certain of that? Yes.

836. Are you sure that the contract was not divided between them? That was the division; I took all that Mr. Harbottle had to supply.

837. By Mr. Daniel: Was that prior to June, 1860? It must have been in the early part of 1859.

838. By the Chairman: Are you sure that Mr. Harbottle did not tender on this occasion, and that his tender was declined? I am quite certain Mr. Harbottle's oil was taken.

839. By Mr. Parkes: Do you remember any tenders in last year? I had nothing to do with the contracts last year—since the 31st of January, 1860.

840. By the Chairman: Do you know of instances where the test you have mentioned was not applied? It was applied in the case of all oil bought by myself. It is very recently that contracts have been called for for large supplies of oil in that way. The system was commenced by myself in an attempt to introduce China oil in lieu of sperm oil for the lights of the Colony, and I made a purchase of some of this oil privately of Messrs. Griffiths, Fanning. It was an experiment.

841. Was that oil bought by private contract? Yes; it was the first purchase that was made.

842. What was the amount? I cannot say. I know I bought it at sixpence a gallon less than oil has ever been bought since.

843. How did it turn out? Of course I am dependent upon the reports sent from the lights, and those reports were very favourable. It was stated to be both cheaper, better, and cleaner.

844. Have you ever heard people complain of the length of time that has elapsed between tenders tenders being sent in, and their being accepted? I have heard the contractors complain J. Buchanan, Esq. repeatedly, and very justly.

845. By Mr. Parkes: What is the cause of this delay? The delay is at head quarters.

846. What is the cause? I simply state the fact that of late years you can get nothing settled by the principal officers of Government. You can get no decision upon any one point if there is the slightest responsibility involved. 4 April, 1861.

847. Has not that defect been remedied since the introduction of Responsible Government? I really think the evil has grown since, and very considerably grown.

848. By the Chairman: Then there is no just cause, so far as you know, why this delay should take place? None whatever.

849. Do you know, having been a long time in the service of Government, whether, before the establishment of Responsible Government, contracts were more quickly decided? Much more quickly and satisfactorily.

850. Have complaints increased since the introduction of Responsible Government? Yes, certainly.

851. By Mr. Parkes: Responsible Government has had the effect of frightening persons from incurring responsibility? There is an attempt to cast the responsibility upon mere executive officers, irresponsible men.

852. As an old officer of Government, do you state that there is less vigour and decision in the heads of Government since the introduction of Responsible Government? Much less. I give that as my deliberate opinion; much less vigour, and much less desire to carry out the public business than I saw before.

853. The public service really suffers from the want of decisive action, lest parliamentary responsibility should be incurred? Yes; and the whole of the ministerial departments seem to be passing out of the hands of the Government into the hands of the Under Secretaries.

854. We are dealing now with Responsible Ministers of the Crown when we talk of heads of departments—and you think that the Government, as conducted by Ministers responsible to Parliament, is less vigorous and less decisive, when vigour and decision are necessary for the public service, than formerly? Yes.

855. From your observation, you think the powers of government are not exercised by the Responsible Ministers of the Crown, but by the permanent Under Secretaries? Yes; and that has been my opinion for some time.

856. By the Chairman: You have said that you have held that opinion for some time? I have, and by turning to my letter-book, you will find that I have recorded it in writing to the Government.

857. By Mr. Parkes: That opinion has not changed from greater length of experience? It has not.

858. With regard to the establishment in the community of a class of persons as contractors who make it their business to buy up goods for the supply of government establishments—do you think the public would be benefited by being supplied by such persons as these, more than they would if they were supplied in each department of the service directly by tradesmen? I scarcely know any one who takes into hand the fulfilment of government contracts as a pursuit per se.

859. Did not Mr. Johnson? Mr. Johnson did so with provisions contracts; he followed that as a pursuit, and as far as my knowledge goes, he did nothing else for some years. The result was, as far as I could perceive, that Mr. Johnson had a monopoly of these contracts, from the way in which they were framed.

860. Speaking generally, suppose a class of contractors arose in the country, would it be better for the public service? I think it would be advantageous on the whole if we had a class who did take matters of that kind into their hands; there is such a class in London, who are well known as government contractors—large houses are engaged in this particular business.

861. With the growth of the Colony, you think it would be as well if men of capital employed their capital in this way, and thus created this particular business? I think so, and that opinion I have expressed in my letters.

862. Will you be kind enough to inform the Committee the grounds upon which you have formed that opinion? The principal ground upon which I have formed this opinion is, that the supplies usually required by the Government are of a particular description; they differ from those required in private life; therefore people in the town engaged in ordinary mercantile business are seldom supplied with the goods required by Government, and thus the Government is frequently left to make a choice between taking what they do not exactly need or going without; they must take what the market supplies. If, however, we had this class of men, they, in anticipation of the wants of Government, would lay in a stock of the description of articles likely to be required, and if Government set up a standard of their own for the various articles these men would feel some degree of certainty that the tenders would appear periodically. At present it is dangerous to import goods which would be exactly suitable for Government, because they could not be sold to any one else.

863. Do you think an advantage would arise from Government dealing with persons who would be better known to them? I do not think that is of any moment. I think the only question should be, who would supply the goods of the settled pattern, at the cheapest rate.

864. Would there not be cases where the Government would have to depend upon the integrity and uprightness of the contractor? I think not.

865. Have you known cases, which occur to you at the present time, where serious loss has occurred through Government having had to take goods they have not required, and which they have afterwards found to be useless? I cannot call to mind an instance of that kind, but I have known many cases where they have had to use articles of a different kind from what

- J. Buchanan,
Esq.
4 April, 1861.
- what they have required. For instance, take the item of blankets for the aborigines. You cannot, in any one of the large warehouses in town, purchase a sufficient number of blankets of one quality and pattern, you must therefore purchase of several houses, and the result is a considerable difference in the blankets supplied. Now, I think it desirable that these should be as near as possible all alike, and not of various qualities; as otherwise discontent may arise among those to whom they are distributed. They should be of a specific size, weight, and quality; but if you were to shackle tradesmen in town in this way, you would not be able to get the number you required. If, however, there were Government contractors, of the class to which you advert, they would import a sufficient number in anticipation of the contract.
866. There were some revolvers required by the Government a short time ago for New Zealand? That has occurred since I left the public service.
867. Suppose two hundred revolvers were wanted to-morrow, or next week,—and if wanted at all they would be likely to be required suddenly, in consequence of some disturbance, would it be possible to collect them all at any one place in Sydney, all of one pattern? Must assuredly not; and that is one of the evils I wanted to point out. You could not gather two hundred of one settled pattern, and by one maker; consequently you would be forced into the market, and have to buy them of all shapes, sizes, and bores.
868. Did you hear of any supply of revolvers last year? Yes; there was one in which I was particularly concerned.
869. Was there a tender required for revolvers? Yes.
870. Do you remember that there were some supplied by a solicitor of the Supreme Court? Yes, perfectly well. That transaction occurred in my own time, and with myself.
871. Do you remember the particulars of it? Quite well. Tenders were required for revolvers for the Southern patrol.
872. How many? I cannot say.
873. Fifty or a hundred? I do not think above twenty, but we had been previously calling for tenders; there had been a general demand for revolvers. On the day when the tender box was to be opened for examining the tenders, I was present at the Treasury, and there was found to be no tenders. The next day a tender was sent to me from the Treasury, under blank cover; and, contrary to the usual practice, there was not even a marginal note on the paper sent, mentioning why or with what intent it had been so enclosed to me. Fortunately, however, on the sheet of paper there was the Treasury stamp—a stamp similar to that used in all the public offices for stamping papers when they are received. There was no marginal note, as is customary, and not even the initials of the Under Secretary. I went up to the Treasury to know what to do in the matter. I saw the Under Secretary, and said, "This tender was not in the box." He said, "No." I then asked, "Where did you get it from?" and said, "I cannot read it. I cannot decipher the writing." He said, "Don't you know it, that is Mr. Rodd's." I replied, to use my own phrase, which was perhaps improper, "What, that mad fellow—what has he to do with revolvers." "Oh!" said he. (The witness here pointed with his thumb over his shoulder.)
874. The Under Secretary made a gesture? A gesture with his thumb over his shoulder towards the Treasurer's room. My reply was, "He wants a good price for them, but I must have the revolvers for the Gold Fields." He said, "You had better accept the tender—do you need all." I replied, "Yes, I need all for the service. If Mr. Weekes settles that the price is a fair one I am willing to take them." "Yes," he said, "he approves of it." The tender accordingly was approved by Mr. Weekes, and £9 each was paid for the revolvers.
875. How many were there? Thirteen as well as my memory serves me—I never saw Mr. Rodd upon the matter, and I doubt if he knows me at all. He obtained the money and proffered a further supply, which I declined.
876. Did he tender for a further supply? No.
877. The whole proceeding was irregular? Perfectly irregular.
878. It is irregular, on the face of it? Yes, the tender never passed through the box. I noted in the tender book when the box was opened, that no tender was received.
879. On account of this irregularity you went up to the Treasurer's office, and pointed out the irregularity to the Under Secretary? Yes. I did so in consequence of the irregularity.
880. By the Chairman: Did you ever see any letter from Mr. Rodd saying that he had a large assortment of these valuable revolvers, which he could put in? I should scarcely like to answer that question positively, for it is so long ago, and I have not been able to refresh my memory; but I have an impression that there is a letter in my late office addressed to me stating that fact.
881. Do you know anything connected with a tender for the supply of handcuffs? Yes; of course there were several tenders for the supply of handcuffs, and among others there were two from Mr. Weekes himself, who tendered one through the medium of Mr. Audsley, who was his shopman, and another through the medium of his son, who was in partnership with him. As I was curious to trace the matter to its conclusion, I found that the cheques, which were issued from my department in payment for the goods, went to Mr. Weekes' own account at the Bank of New South Wales; also, that neither Mr. Audsley nor Mr. Weekes, junior, had an account at that bank.
882. Did you see Mr. Rayment Audsley, or young Mr. Weekes, about this? Neither; I did not know either. I was not aware till long after the supply was delivered, who Mr. Rayment Audsley was.
883. Not knowing Mr. Rayment Audsley, your attention was not in any way directed to the fact that your answer was to be sent to the Post Office? It was, for on the foot of the tender were the words, "Address—Post Office."
884. Did that in any way attract your attention? It was nothing unusual. We replied to him him at the Post Office. I sent an order. I doubt whether I sent a written notification that his tender was accepted; for it was a very common practice to omit that, and send the order instead. I sent an order for the goods, and probably the following day we got them.

J. Buchanan,
Esq.

885. Have you any suggestions you can make as to any improvements that might be made in carrying out the system of tendering? I think one very great improvement would be made by the contractors being present when the tenders were opened. My experience of boards—of tender boards, or any other boards—is very much that of Jeremy Bentham, that they are “fit only for screens.” I think it is a mere sham keeping them up—it would be more satisfactory to the contractors, more beneficial to the public, if the contractors were present when the tenders were opened. I would have them assembled in a room; the head of the department should then open the tenders, and call out the prices and the names of the parties, who might submit offers in the presence of the tenderers themselves. This, I think, would prevent jealousy, and give satisfaction to every one. That is the course adopted in England with the immense money contracts at the Treasury. When the loans are decided upon, the parties who make the offers are invariably present, and I think the system might be extended with advantage to contracts in this Colony. I do not see that any evil could arise from it.

4 April, 1861.

886. Had you any instructions as to the amount to which you might make direct purchases? None whatever.

887. You had no instructions to guide you? None.

888. By Mr. Parkes: How long have you been removed from office? I was removed at the latter end of October, 1860. I was under suspension from the 1st February to the latter end of October, before the Government could come to a decision.

889. Have you any objection to state the alleged grounds? Not the slightest. The allegation was that I was cognizant of, or participated in some tender sent in by Mr. John Weston, chief clerk in my department. The evidence is before the Committee.

890. Since then you have not been in the public service? I have had nothing whatever to do with the service since the 1st of February, 1860.

891. Could you state to the Committee in what way, and to what extent, the Ministers control the system of tendering—I ask that question, because we can infer from the degree of control they exercise there what control they exercise generally? Unless they are interested, I do not think they attempt to exercise any control, unless they become personally interested in these matters.

892. With reference to this system of tendering I would like to ask what is the course of action in initiating anything that is new—do the Ministers set the ball rolling, or do the Under Secretaries do it—what I wish to arrive at is, who is the first moving cause of any change or alteration in the public service? Generally, I think, the Under Secretaries.

893. Ministers generally act upon the suggestions of the permanent Secretaries? Yes. There have been changes I can call to mind which have been initiated by the Ministers of the day. For instance, there was one by Mr. Donaldson, the great change of the Colonial Agency, and a most injudicious one I have always thought it. But in that case I do not hesitate to say that Mr. Donaldson was not free from personal motives.

894. At all events, you think, so far as the system of tendering for a supply of goods to the public service is concerned it is pretty well controlled by the Under Secretaries of the respective departments? Yes.

895. If any alterations took place they would probably be on their own suggestions? Yes.

896. Suppose from various complaints, from a motion made in Parliament, or from any of those various elements which conspire to produce change, it should be considered necessary that an alteration should be made, can you state how it would be effected—would the Ministers ask the advice of the Under Secretaries, or would they be likely to determine upon some course themselves? I have seen but one Minister at the Treasury who would be likely to take questions of that kind and determine them upon his own responsibility, and that was Mr. Jones. All the others would be likely to be guided by the opinion of the Under Secretary. They have had no opinions of their own, perhaps from incompetency, to see what the effect of a change would be.

897. The only Responsible Minister who was not afraid to incur responsibility was Mr. Richard Jones? Yes.

898. By the Chairman: Do you think from this system, which does to a certain extent exist, of the Government, in certain instances, getting articles without tenders has had a prejudicial influence on the public service? I do not think it. The Government are sometimes compelled to go to the open market instead of resorting to competition. As a rule, it is the practice to obtain everything by competition, and I think it is a wholesome way.

899. Do you know anything of the circumstances of the supply of a quantity of iron and wire work for the aviary in the Government Gardens? It is a matter in which I was not personally interested; I have heard the reports.

900. By Mr. Daniel: Do you think the tendering system has been so satisfactorily carried out to the public since the establishment of Responsible Government as it was formerly? I perhaps can scarcely judge of the feeling of the public. So far as the contractors are concerned, I know they are not so well satisfied. While I was in office, of course people had a delicacy in stating their views; but, in my present position, I am more likely to obtain information upon that head.

901. Perhaps you will favour the Committee by stating what you have heard since you have left the Government service? I can only repeat, that, to the contractors as a body, it has not been so satisfactory since, as previously.

902. By the Chairman: Do you think it is more or less beneficial, or as beneficial to the public interest? I do not think it has been as beneficial. I may take a case that did not occur

- J. Buchanan, Esq.
4 April, 1861.
- occur in my own department, and, therefore, I cannot speak so confidently. Twelve or eighteen months ago there was a contract advertised for, in connection with the Public Works Department, before Mr. Arnold was in office. It was a bold advertisement, covering a page of two column foolscap, for a year's supply, and drawn up in such a way that no business man could tender. Samples were to be sent in of the various articles, and, from the description I heard, I imagine the scene must have been most ludicrous. There was a room full of samples, and every person connected with the Works Department passed his individual opinion upon the brooms, mops, tools, and other articles. There was so much confusion that it was impossible to decide which was the best tender, and I think it might as well have been decided by putting the tenders in a hat and drawing them haphazard. Great complaint is made by the contractors of the delay in coming to a decision, and this arises from the erroneous system in existence. I can say that, when I was Colonial Storekeeper, a week never elapsed from the time an application was made to me before I gave an answer, and I generally gave it the following day.
903. Do you consider that there is any difference between the Commissariat tenders and the tenders for the Colonial Government—that contractors would rather supply the Commissariat than the Colonial Government? I believe that the few persons who have had experience under both prefer the system of the former.
904. Upon what grounds? They are more prompt in their decision, and more prompt in their payment. There is less trouble and difficulty in the system. Of course the Commissariat system applies merely to provisions, and not to stores.

APPENDIX.

A.

Answer furnished on revision.

Through some cause that I cannot explain, I did not catch the purport of this question of the Chairman. The more affirmative expressed is really no answer. Had I caught its drift my reply ought to have been to the following effect:—

Knowing that rigid inspection is the only safeguard against abuse of the contract system, I am of opinion that the Government ought, in justice to the fair trader, and as a protection for the general public, on whose behalf they act, to provide means for holding useful and effective surveys upon every supply they purchase. To assemble a Board of departmental heads for such a purpose is worse than a folly—it is a deception. On the other hand, the duty ought not (as is the case at times) to be suffered to devolve, without superior control, upon persons filling inferior posts.

It would facilitate improvement were fixed Government patterns adopted; but the want of these need be no obstacle to the introduction of a better system of survey.

I do not think it is to the heads of departments that the Government should solely look for protection as to the quality of supplies. That is the fiction under shelter of which matters are conducted in several departments at present; and an extension of it I understand is contemplated. So retrograde a step would effectually bar improvement.

It will be obvious that a proper staff of examiners could not, by reason of the expense, be maintained in every department; ergo, the supplies should be procured through the instrumentality of that department, be it what it may, where competent examiners exist.

Briefly—the main principles upon which I conceive action ought to be founded, are these,—

To separate from each other (not necessarily in separate departments, but in separate and independent branches of one department):—1st, the custody of stores; 2nd, the inspection of stores; 3rd, the payment for stores; and 4th, the framing of contracts, and deciding on tenders for stores.

Niggardliness caused the Government to cast on my shoulders the whole of these functions, some of them in the highest degree antagonistic. The danger of the position I never fully felt, because of its gradual growth; its evil and inexpediency was often the subject of unavailing remonstrance.

WEDNESDAY, 24 APRIL, 1861.

Present:—

MR. DANIEL,
MR. GRAY,

MR. MORRIS,
MR. PARKES.

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, ESQ., IN THE CHAIR.

Henry Lane, Esq., called in and examined:—

- Henry Lane, Esq.
24 April, 1861.
905. By the Chairman: This Committee has been appointed to inquire into the present system of tendering for the public service. You are Under Secretary for Finance and Trade, and a member of the Tender Board, are you not? Yes.
906. And you wrote a letter to me, as Chairman of this Committee, expressing a desire to be examined? Yes.
907. Have you any instructions given to you as a member of the Tender Board, and which are also general instructions to the Tender Board? I have, and I now beg to place copies of those instructions before the Committee. (Copies handed in. Vide Appendix A and A 2.)
908. Since the promulgation of those rules have any other instructions been given? I am not aware that any other instructions have been given.
909. And those are the rules which are now in force? Those are the rules which guide us in our group of departments—the Treasury group.
910. Is the Board now constituted in the way indicated in this report? Those rules are strictly adhered to.

911. Have you known any cases where the rule with regard to tenders not sent in a regular way has been departed from? I am not aware of any case of the kind.
912. I mean where tenders have not come in at the proper time? There may have been an instance of this kind. If an article were urgently required, and if, five or ten minutes after the Board had assembled, a person came with a tender, and we knew we could not receive the article otherwise, the tender might then be received.
913. By Mr. Daniel: You were a member of the Tender Board previous to Responsible Government in this Colony, were you not? No, I was clerk in the Audit Office.
914. But you had to do with tenders for the public service? I had to deal with them as Chief Clerk in the Audit Department.
915. And you have been a member of the Tender Board since the inauguration of Responsible Government here? Yes.
916. From your relationship to that Board, generally speaking, has the system of supplying the public service, with regard to tenders, undergone much alteration, or are the same forms observed now as those which formerly prevailed? We have been more stringent in the forms since the inauguration of Responsible Government.
917. In what way? Formerly there was no stringency in reference to the opening of tenders. They were then opened in the Colonial Secretary's Office. Letters were sent in loosely, and the Colonial Secretary could deal with them just as he would. He used generally to have the Auditor General with him. I know that there was a laxity then which does not prevail now.
918. Since Responsible Government that has been corrected, you think? Yes, I think so.
919. By Mr. Morris: Formerly there were no such boxes as are described in those instructions, (Appendix A)? There was a box with one key, the key of which was kept by the Colonial Secretary of the day. I am positive about that, because as Chief Clerk in the Audit Department I used occasionally to act for the Auditor General.
920. By Mr. Daniel: Supposing any particular article is required for the public service, and there is not sufficient time to invite a tender, what mode do you adopt to supply yourself with the article so required? The Colonial Storekeeper sees the Treasurer, or perhaps myself, and he explains the urgency of the case. But then we do not lose sight of the principle of competition, which is the great principle to which we adhere. If there is no time to call for tenders, the Colonial Storekeeper goes round to the various houses or storekeepers in the town.
921. Who supply the article? Yes. If, for instance, it be an article of ironmongery he goes to all the ironmongers. That is the principle upon which we insist.
922. But after it has been found that the article can be obtained, who gives the authority for it to be purchased? We leave that to the Colonial Storekeeper.
923. That is, the Colonial Storekeeper himself? Yes.
924. It is not submitted to the Minister of the day—there is no fiat under his hand necessary? No, not after that. These I refer to are all small articles. The principle is that everything must be open to public competition.
925. For instance, supposing twenty revolvers were required? We should call for them by tenders.
926. Have you any limit as to the price you intend to give, or how do you manage in reference to that matter? That depends upon the competition.
927. Supposing the price was exorbitant, would you receive it? I will give you an instance. In order to get certain supplies requisite for New Zealand we had to apply over and over again. The notifications appeared not only in the Government Gazette, but also in the newspapers of the day. If these tenders be sent in we ourselves are obliged to exercise a sort of control.
928. You exercise a discretion yourselves? Yes.
929. That hardly arrives at the answer I was anxious to get from you—who is the proper person that finally gives consent to the article being purchased and paid for? As regards stores, the Treasurer is.
930. But in reference to these particular things you have mentioned—revolvers? The Treasurer would finally approve of them.
931. The Treasurer—the head of the department? Yes.
932. By the Chairman: Do you know anything of a case where a number of revolvers were accepted and where Mr. Rodd was the tenderer? Yes.
933. What do you know about that matter? I have the papers with me. I submit the tender book. We received from the Colonial Storekeeper a requisition, initialed "John Buchanan," that twelve revolvers should be purchased.
934. By Mr. Morris: For what service? For the service of the Western Gold Escort. On the 25th August we advertised for them; under instructions (Appendix A) Mr. Buchanan and I met, and I now read you an extract from our minute book, dated 30th August, 1859:—"The tender box was opened this day in the presence of the undersigned, and no tenders for revolvers found therein. It is, therefore, recommended that the notice "be republished for Tuesday the 6th proximo." This is in the handwriting of Mr. John Buchanan, and is signed by Mr. Buchanan and myself. In accordance with that recommendation (leaving all these things to the Colonial Storekeeper, I not being supposed to deal with revolvers or stores), on the 30th August, tenders were invited "till noon of Tuesday the 6th proximo."
935. You advertised again? Yes.
936. And tenders were received up to the 6th? Yes.
937. And at noon none were received? None were received. I find that on the 7th there was a letter received from a Mr. Rodd (so far as I can read the name); he offered to supply

- Henry Lane, Esq.
24 April, 1861.
- the revolvers, and I will read this (Minute) in the handwriting of Mr. Buchanan, the Colonial Storekeeper.
938. By the Chairman: It is a minute on the back of it? Yes; I sent the letter to him first. I correct myself in reference to a previous question, and say that on the second day (the 6th) we received an offer of four revolvers from Mr. Harbottle.
939. How did you receive that from Mr. Buchanan? We received it from Mr. Rodd.
940. Who received it? We received it at the Treasury, and then sent it in the usual course to the storekeeper. Mr. Rodd sends a sample of revolvers, and says the price is £9 each. (Letter read. Vide Appendix B.) I sent it to the Colonial Storekeeper, and he reports, in a minute on the letter:—"Twelve revolvers are wanted for the service of the escorts, and of these four only have been obtained in answer to public advertisement repeated several times in the Gazette and newspapers, I consider that further publication of the notice will serve no good end, and therefore recommend the acceptance of this offer. The pistols would of course be subject to approval of their quality by the armourer of the department."
941. What is the date of that? The 7th September I think, or between the 7th and the 9th. It was approved by the Treasurer on the 9th, and on the 14th September it appears that the Storekeeper sent to us an account as paid, with this certificate, in reference to the thirteen revolvers supplied by B. C. Rodd:—"I certify that the quantities of the above-mentioned articles were duly supplied by the above-named individual, and that they are conformable to the samples stipulated for. I further certify that they were required for the public service, and that the prices charged were the most reasonable for which the same could be procured at the time of purchase; and furthermore that they were ordered upon approved requisitions."
942. That is the usual certificate, I suppose? Yes. They were thus signed for by Mr. Buchanan, and by Mr. Jenkins, subject to the approval of their quality by the armourer.
943. By Mr. Morris: That is the armourer referred to in Mr. Buchanan's minute? Yes.
944. Is that all? That is all in reference to the pistols.
945. By the Chairman: And you say that this letter was received at the Treasury? Yes.
946. How did it come, do you know? It must have come through the post.
947. How do you know that? I can imagine that, because it is dated the 7th September, and stamped.
948. But I suppose you stamp all letters that come into your hands? Yes.
949. But supposing I brought a letter to the Treasurer, would you stamp it? Yes.
950. And the reason you have given for judging that this came through the post is because there is a stamp on it? Yes.
951. Then if you stamp all letters that is not conclusive that this letter came through the post? If I were in the office I could be able to give information in reference to the matter which I cannot afford just now.
952. Do you recollect when you first saw this letter? I do not recollect, but I must have seen it, perhaps the same day.
953. The same day that it came? Yes.
954. Do you recollect who gave it to you? That I do not recollect.
955. You have no recollection whatever of the matter? No.
956. After you received this you say you sent it to Mr. Buchanan? Yes, that is the ordinary course.
957. Did you afterwards see him? It is very likely that after receiving it I would have seen him, but I am not sure. I am satisfied that I sent it down to him.
958. After you sent it down to him did you see him? I do not recollect. The usual course is to put it under cover. The head of a department always returns such documents under cover; but the Colonial Storekeeper may perhaps have come up with it.
959. When you sent it down did you send any letter with it, or how did you send it? I cannot think of that. The number of the papers is 5600, and I cannot possibly recollect how I disposed of each.
960. Then you do not recollect whether you saw Mr. Buchanan about it or not? I do not recollect. I do not know that I saw him personally, if that be what you mean.
961. Yes, I mean did you see him personally? I do not recollect.
962. You may have done so and forgotten it? Of course, he may have come up with it.
963. By Mr. Morris: Is it not more than probable that he did come up with it, it being out of the usual course? That is not the usual way. He may have come up. I would not say to the contrary, but it is unusual.
964. Do you recollect distinctly whether that letter did come through the post or whether you received it from anybody in the Treasury? That I cannot recollect. If I had access to the books in the Treasury, where we keep a record of these things, I might tell you more positively, but I really cannot tell you now.
965. Is not the price (£9) a high price—is it not £2 higher than you paid for those you got from somewhere else? Sometimes in cases of emergency we have to buy things like that at any price.
966. But is it not a high price? I do not know.
967. But what did you pay to Mr. Harbottle? Seven pounds fifteen shillings.
968. Did you know who the person tendering was when you got the letter? Mr. Rodd.
969. But did you know who he was? No. We always leave that to the Colonial Storekeeper; we hold him responsible.
970. The Board do? Yes.
971. Do you recollect whether Mr. Buchanan asked you anything about that gentleman in particular tendering? No.
972. You do not recollect? No; I recollect nothing of that.

973. You will not say he did not, I suppose, considering the number of documents of the kind which are brought under your notice? I cannot be positive. He may have done so. Henry Lane, Esq.
974. Have you since ascertained who Mr. Rodd is? I heard on Saturday. I saw Captain M'Levie on the subject, and he told me that Mr. Rodd is related to one of the Ministers. 24 April, 1861.
975. By Mr. Parkes: What did he say—do you remember exactly what he said? He said he was a brother-in-law of Mr. Robertson. I asked Captain M'Levie who Mr. Rodd was, having heard that there was something respecting myself in connection with this special case—the revolvers.
976. By the Chairman: Then Mr. Buchanan being the person responsible for the party tendering being a responsible person, would be more likely to recollect such a matter than yourself? Yes, it is more likely.
977. By Mr. Parkes: When Mr. Buchanan waited upon you at the Treasury, did he raise any objection to Mr. Rodd's tender being accepted on account of its irregularity? I do not recollect that he did wait on me, but I am quite satisfied it would have left an impression on my mind if he had made any such objection.
978. You do not then of course remember making any motion over your shoulder with your thumb towards the Treasurer's door? No.
979. By the Chairman: You do not recollect it? No; and I positively deny that such a gesture was made as that referred to.
980. By Mr. Parkes: Did you ever, on any occasion, make a motion of that kind? Never, in the course of official business.
981. By the Chairman: Not recollecting anything about this letter, one way or the other, you cannot say that you did not get it from the Treasury? Well, I cannot say that positively, unless I have access to my books. This is a question I am not prepared to meet. I have got all the papers, but at this moment I cannot say where they came from. They would come, I apprehend, through the post.
982. But you cannot state that it was not given to you by the Treasurer? I am almost sure that it was not, but I could not state positively. I could tell you to-morrow, because we keep a record of everything which comes through the post and everything which comes by hand.
983. Do you recollect the occasion of Mr. Harbottle tendering for some oil? Yes.
984. And some oil of Messrs. Griffiths, Fanning, and Co. being received instead? Yes.
985. How did that happen? It happened in this way:—We sent for Captain Ward, who is supposed to be a judge of the nature of oils, but he sent Mr. Trickett in his stead. Mr. Trickett, Mr. Browne, and the Acting Colonial Storekeeper decided.
986. You do not know anything about this yourself? I do not. I believe my position as a member of the Board is to see what they call "fair play,"—to see that the keys are produced, the tenders opened, entries made, and so on.
987. You do not know whether the oil was tried by burning? That I do not know. I believe not, but I am not sure.
988. Have you the samples now? Yes.
989. Of both? Yes; I have four samples. I keep all samples submitted, unless they are too bulky.

APPENDIX.

A 1.

*Colonial Secretary's Office,
Sydney, 6 February, 1857.*

Sir,

I am directed to request that you will bring under the notice of the Colonial Treasurer the accompanying copy of a Report made by a Board appointed to consider the arrangements and proceedings which it may be desirable to adopt in receiving tenders and making contracts for supplies and services required for the several groups of departments under the respective Ministers, and that you will at the same time state that the distribution of the business proposed by the Board appears to be suitable, and has been approved of by the Government. With respect, however, to the suggestions contained in the report referring to the details required for giving effect to the arrangements proposed, these may, perhaps, be best decided on by the Ministerial Departments concerned, and adopted so far as may be considered desirable and applicable.

2. With reference to the sixth paragraph of the report, I am, however, directed to suggest that the tenders should not be returned in the manner therein proposed, but that, instead, the informalities or defects should be noted on them, and the parties apprised of the nature of these, and that they can see the tenders at the office in which they are deposited, which should of course be stated.

3. I am further directed to transmit the accompanying copy of the notice published in former years for contracts for provisions, as the conditions inserted therein may be useful to refer to in framing future notices, as well as some copies of forms of tender, &c.; and I am desired to invite particular attention to the memorandum annexed to the tender, providing for the due observance of a contract, and containing an engagement to enter into bond for its proper performance.

The Secretary to the Treasury.

I have, &c.,
W. ELYARD.

A 2.

THE Board appointed to take into consideration, and to make a general report upon, the subject of contracts for the public service, having met and considered the matters involved in the reference to them, submit the following as embodying the principles which, in their opinion, should be recognized and acted on in the arrangements and proceedings of the several groups of departments under the respective Ministers in connection with contracts:—

1. That, so far as practicable and expedient, all works to be carried out, all services to be rendered, and all supplies to be furnished, which are procurable, and intended to be procured in the Colony, shall be carried out, rendered, or furnished under contracts.

2. That all contracts shall be obtained by tenders called for by public notices, and that such notices shall have the utmost publicity and the widest circulation and diffusion given to them, by being inserted not only in the Government Gazette, but also (though involving expense) in the general and local papers, and shall in remote localities be posted up in a conspicuous place at the several Police and Post Offices of the districts adjacent to those to which the contracts may apply.

The

Henry Lane,
Esq.

24 April, 1861.

The Board are of opinion that the notices calling for tenders should set forth considerably more in detail than has hitherto been the practice, the nature of the particular work or service to be performed.

3. That, to secure the confidence of the community, to protect the interests of the public, and to guard those of the parties tendering, effectual means be taken, not merely to prevent, but even to negative suspicion of any tampering with tenders; that, to this end, proper receiving boxes, having each not less than two locks differing in construction (the keys of which shall be in different hands), shall be supplied and used solely for the purpose intended; that in these boxes all tenders shall immediately on receipt be deposited unopened; and that the boxes shall be opened only in the presence of a Board.

4. That no tender, unless sealed or otherwise properly secured, correctly addressed, and having legibly marked on its outside, "Tender for ———" [specifying the work, service, or supply], shall be entertained.

5. That the whole of the tenders received within the time fixed by the notice, and meeting the requirements of the preceding paragraph, shall be opened in presence of the Board charged with the duty, and shall be numbered, dated, and initialed by the members.

6. That tenders delivered after the hour named in the notice calling for them, tenders defective in any material points, or otherwise informal, shall not be entertained, but shall be returned to the persons making them, with the nature of the defects or informality indorsed on the tender, or on the cover if the defect be in the superscription or securing.

7. That a schedule of the several tenders to be entertained shall, after they have been numbered, dated, and initialed, be without delay prepared for the Board, which will reassemble on the earliest day possible, to decide on the tenders to be recommended for acceptance, or on the other steps to be taken. The Board consider this the proper place to record their opinion that it should be an instruction to all Boards charged with the opening of tenders that it is not the lowest tender, but that which under all considerations is the most eligible for the public that should be recommended for acceptance.

Having reference to this, the Board would suggest that, in the notices calling for tenders, it shall be intimated that the Government do not bind themselves to accept the lowest or any tender.

8. That intimation of the acceptance and rejection of tenders shall, under the authority of the Minister charged with the control of the departments concerned, be as early as possible conveyed to the several persons tendering; and that a notification of the accepted tenders shall be published in the Government Gazette.

9. That the accepted tenders shall be forwarded in original to the Civil Crown Solicitor, whose duty it will be to obtain from the persons tendering, and their sureties, without delay, the proper bonds duly executed; which, with the tenders, he will transmit to the Minister from whom he received these last, who will notify to the departments concerned, the execution of the bonds, and will forward these and the tenders to the Auditor General.

10. That the bonds from persons resident in or near Sydney shall be executed at the office of the Civil Crown Solicitor; those from persons not so resident, at the nearest or most convenient Police Office, as has hitherto been the practice.

11. That no payments whatever shall be made to a contractor until the bonds for the due performance of his contract have been perfected.

12. That all contractors shall prepare their own accounts in the prescribed form, and shall deliver them to the officer or other person, whose certificate is required, by whom they will be transmitted to the officers respectively charged with the disbursements on account of the contracts.

13. That no officer in the public service shall, under any circumstances, be admitted as a contractor. Having set forth the general principles which should, in their opinion, rule the arrangements connected with contracts, the Board proceed to state the distribution which they consider suited to the receipts "Administrative Arrangements":—

1. Dividing contracts for the public service into three branches.

(1.) Provisions, stores, and general services;

(2.) Works and buildings; and

(3.) Conveyance of mails, and conveyance of gold under escort.

The Board recommend that the arrangements shall devolve respectively on—

(1.)—The Minister for Finance and Trade;

(2.)—The Minister for Lands and Public Works; and

(3.)—The Principal Secretary.

2. That the Board for dealing with contracts for "Provisions, Stores, and General Services," shall consist of the Secretary to the Treasury, the Colonial Storekeeper, and the Heads of the several Departments to which, or to the branches of which, the supplies are to be furnished, or the services rendered; in the case of contracts for boats and marine supplies and services generally, the Pilot Board or Marine Board, when appointed, taking the place of the Heads of Departments.

3. That the Board, for dealing with contracts for works and buildings shall be "the Board of Works." As the supply of furniture to the whole of the public service will be under the control of the Board of Works, this appears the proper place to state the opinion of the Board, that the general principle of obtaining everything by contract should apply to furniture, and that to this end it will be necessary that rules should be framed by the proper authority to determine beforehand the character and consequent probable expense of the furniture to be authorized for the various grades in the public service. It is from a conviction that the want of such rules has led to some extravagance in this particular that the Board consider it their duty to draw attention to the point.

Having reference to cases in which repairs to public works and buildings of a minor character, and involving but limited expense, are immediately required, the Board recommend that where the cost shall not exceed, say £50, the Colonial Architect or other officer should himself be at liberty to call for tenders, by advertisements in the public papers, or other available means, and on his own responsibility to accept or reject the tenders made—it being imperative on the officer in every such case, to submit the whole of the tenders, for confirmation, to the Minister of Lands and Public Works.

4. That the Board for dealing with contracts for "the conveyance of Mails and other Postal services," shall consist of the Postmaster General, the Under Secretary to the Government, and the Colonial Storekeeper; and that the Board for dealing with contracts for "the conveyance of Gold under Escort," shall consist of the Postmaster General, the Under Secretary to the Government, and the Inspector General of Police.

Sir,

I send you a sample revolver. The price is £9 each. I imported them, and that is what they cost in London. I know them to be genuine. There are about fifteen in all. Some are nine-inch.

CATTLE DRIVING ACT.

(RAYMOND TERRACE.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 26 March, 1861.

To the Honorable the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR HONORABLE HOUSE:—

We, the undersigned Householders, Landowners, and Residents of Raymond Terrace and its suburbs, approach your Honorable House, praying you may rescind the operations of the Cattle Driving Act at this place, it having been put in force contrary to the wishes of, and unknown to the majority of the inhabitants of this town and district. We beg most respectfully to call your attention to the utter inapplicability of the Act to this town, and from the past experience we have had since it has been in force, for the last twelve months, find it most detrimental and prejudicial to the interests of the inhabitants.

Raymond Terrace being situated on the banks of the River Hunter, and distant from Maitland about sixteen miles, the Raymond Terrace and district butchers and cattle dealers resort to the Maitland markets for the purchase and sale of cattle; and there being no Government accommodation on either side of the river for the confinement of cattle during the prescribed hours, must either unwillingly break the law or lose their cattle. The only outlet to the Sydney markets is by steamers, which vessels mostly call at their wharves between the hours of Nine A.M. and Four P.M., thus rendering the Act a prohibition to the shipping of cattle. We beg to inform your Honorable House that a Petition, praying the rescinding of the Act, and signed by four hundred and ninety-five house and land owners, was presented to His Excellency Sir William Denison immediately on learning through the Government Gazette that the Act had been extended to this town.

We therefore pray your Honorable House will take into consideration the prayer of your Petitioners, and they, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

GLEBE ISLAND AND ABATTOIRS.
(REPORT FROM INSPECTOR AND ASSISTANT INSPECTOR.)

Ordered by the Legislative Assembly to be Printed, 27 March, 1861.

INSPECTOR to ENGINEER-IN-CHIEF FOR HARBOURS AND RIVER NAVIGATION.

Glebe Island Abattoirs,
27 February, 1861.

SIR, I have the honor, in pursuance of your request to me, to make the following report in reference to the Glebe Island.

During the week days I am almost constantly upon the island in the discharge of my duties, and I have never witnessed any scenes of vice and immorality there, nor do I believe any such ever existed, as far as I can ascertain; my assistant (Mr. Driver) resides upon the island, and he also with me bears testimony to the quiet and orderly character of the island.

I have made inquiries from various persons who are in the daily habit of passing through the island, and they all assert that they have never witnessed at any time the slightest breach of propriety.

An inspector of police and a constable attend upon Sunday, and they have never had occasion to interfere with any person or persons for any impropriety of language or conduct. They are witnesses to the very orderly demeanour of the people who frequent the island upon the Sabbath.

I have instituted inquiry amongst all persons from whom information was likely to be obtained, but I have failed to discover any one who has seen anything to support the charges of "vice and profligacy" brought against the island in question.

I have, &c.,
FREDK. OATLEY,
Inspector of Glebe Island.

ASSISTANT INSPECTOR to ENGINEER-IN-CHIEF FOR HARBOURS AND RIVER NAVIGATION.

Glebe Island,
25 February, 1861.

SIR, I have the honor to inform you, that, for some weeks past, the state of this place has been perfectly orderly. When the punts commenced running on the Sabbath Day, for a few weeks persons of improper character were in the habit of coming here by the punts, and reports having been made to me of indecent conduct on the island, I asked for the attendance of a policeman on Sabbath afternoons; one attended for some time, which caused the class of persons referred to to cease coming to the island. There is no improper conduct at present, except some persons remaining on the island after the business of the place is over for the day. I am constantly on the island, except of Saturday night and part of Sunday, therefore have every opportunity of hearing any disturbance or noise, should any take place.

I have, &c.,
RICHARD DRIVER,
Assistant Inspector of Abattoirs.
