7339. Of whom do you ask permission? I tell the nurse to tell them. There are two patients of mine in the hospital now who are wearing their own clothes.
7340. Have not the nurses complained to you of that? I have two women there; Miss Moule complained of it.
7341. Have you allowed those patients to violate this rule? I have, by writing it on the card.
7342. Do you know that other medical men will not allow this rule to be violated? It is very cruel of them if they do not.*
7343. Have you ever represented to the committee that the rule is a cruel one? I have not, but on these cold nights I think it would be so.
7344. Are you aware that you are the only surgeon who violates the rules of the institution in this respect? I do not know.†
7345. Do you not think that it is calculated to destroy the discipline of the place if one surgeon violates a rule which the other surgeons enforce? I say that in that respect—in respect of the clothing—I often order a man a —
7346. Answer my question, please. Do you or do you not think that if one surgeon violates a rule which is enforced by others, the discipline of the place is likely to be destroyed? I say that as far as the clothing is concerned—‡

* NOTE (on revision) :—They do allow it, and have done so for years.

† NOTE (on revision) :—I am not.

‡ NOTE (on revision) :—Mr. Nathan, Mr. Roberts, and Dr. Jones allowed their patients to wear their warm clothes.

7347. Answer my question—Is it not calculated to provoke a feeling of injustice if one patient violates a rule with impunity, while in the case of other patients the rule is enforced? I look upon it as part and parcel of my duty to order certain clothing, as I would order a certain diet; whether it violates a rule or not I do not care. There is as much treatment in clothing a man properly as in giving him good food.

C. McKay,
Esq., M.D.

5 June, 1873.

7348. Then you do not think that it is calculated to provoke a feeling of injustice? I do not understand you. If other medical men would take the trouble to do as I do they would do the same thing—do it medically. I have very often, when a man has complained to me that he was shivering and shaking with the cold, ordered him to get a flannel shirt. Men in the habit of wearing flannel don't like to get a cold shirt.

7349. Are not violations of this rule allowed chiefly in the case of female patients? I think so.

7350. Are you aware that there is a rule of the Infirmary against smoking? I am.

7351. It is posted up about the wards? I do not know. I have seen it posted up outside.

7352. Have not complaints been made to you as to the violation of that rule? I do not think so. I often smell the men's breath and find that they have been smoking. I do not see any harm in it, if they smoke in the lavatories—it does good I think.

7353. Do you know of a case of a patient smoking in the eye-ward? I do not. I would have reprimanded him.

7354. Is it not a rule that a patient should be discharged who offends in that way? I would not discharge him; I would punish him by putting him on low-diet for a day or two.

7355. Would that be to counteract the effects of the smoking? No, it would be as a punishment.

7356. It is not for the benefit of the man's constitution? No; it would not do it any harm.

7357. It has been said that you allow this rule to be violated with impunity, whereas other medical men have discharged patients for violating it? Whoever said that, said what was not true. I have never known them smoke that I did not reprove them.

7358. You have known smoking in the place then? Yes. That is by smelling the breath, and the tobacco-smoke in the ward.

7359. And you have simply reprov'd them for it? Yes.

7360. But is it not the rule that they should be discharged for it? I do not think they should be, and I do not know that it is the rule. If I sent a man out for such a thing and he lost his life, I should never forgive myself.

7361. Do you not think that rules which are made for the benefit of the patients should be observed and upheld? So they are, but I do not suppose that in any institution the rules are all carried out in their entirety.

7362. Do you ever smell smoking in the wards? I do, but I never saw a man smoking there.

7363. You have been contented with reprimanding the offender? Yes.

7364. Do you not think that it is calculated to provoke a feeling of injustice, if one medical man discharges patients for smoking, while another one tolerates it? I do not think that they should be discharged.*

7365. Then you think that the good government of an institution is not affected by this kind of partiality? The good government of the institution will not be disorganized by allowing a man to have a smoke.

7366. Then you think that every medical man should do what is right in his own eyes, notwithstanding the rules of the institution? Yes; I do not allow them to smoke in the wards, but in the lavatories it does not do any harm.

7367. Mr. Goold.] Did the nurse ever bring up a man to you with a pipe of tobacco? I really do not know; she has told me that a man was smoking, and I have told him that the next complaint I had I would turn him out.

7368. Did you ever go into a ward and smell smoking, and remark that there was a smell of smoking? Very often in the men's lock ward.

7369. You do not remember a nurse's bringing a patient to you with a pipe of tobacco? No.

7370. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you say that the clothing which is allowed to the women is not sufficiently warm? No, in some instances it is not.

7371. Can they not get extra clothing if they require it? I dare say that they could; but if they got clothes belonging to the hospital the other patients would be discontented; they would say—"Look at her; she has got extra clothing."

7372. President.] But you make out that some patients require it more? So they do require it.

7373. Then why should others who do not require it complain of its being supplied to those who do? But you are pretty well aware that there are some poor people there who have been brought up in a different style from others—people who have been well clothed and well fed. If these people were put into common clothing they might become rheumatic, and I think that it is justice to allow them to wear their own clothes which they bring in with them.

7374. Mr. Ellis.] Then you would allow all of them to wear their own clothes if they liked? No, not all of their clothes—merely a warm petticoat and a warm jacket.

7375. Mr. Metcalfe.] But should not the hospital give them a warm jacket and so on? Of course it should.

7376. President.] Have you ever reported that to the committee? I have not.

7377. Would that not be better than to allow patients to violate the rules by wearing their own clothes? I am not the manager or the matron.

7378. But they say that you interfere with their business, and when they complain of these violations of the rules, you do not support them? I do not interfere with them. When I do interfere, it is because I have reason to do so. I have taken notes of the interferences that I have met with.

7379. From the nurses? And the directors too.

7380. In what respect? Many directors interfere in going through the wards. For instance, many of the nurses are excellent writers, and as the cards for porter, brandy, and wine, have to be filled up and signed by the medical men, we used to get the nurses to fill them up, and we used to sign them. It is a great tax upon us to have to fill them up, and I think it was Dr. Alleyne started it; he ordered porter or wine for a patient for thirty days, and I did the same, to save ourselves the trouble of making out a card every week. We had no objection to ordering it every week, if the nurses filled up the cards and left us to sign them, but it is a tax upon us to have to write out a dozen cards every day. I complained to the Board, who ordered that the doctors should fill the cards up and sign them. The nurses said that they could not get the wine, &c., unless the cards were written out by the doctors, and they refused to fill them up.

* NOTE (on revision) :—I do not know that any patient has been discharged for smoking.

- C. McKay,
Esq., M.D.
- 5 June, 1873.
7381. Do you not know that they refused because there was a suspicion of their ordering more stimulants than were required? In what way?
7382. Do you not know that it was said the nurses drank the wine themselves? No, they could not. If I prescribe six ounces of wine I look at the card every day, and if it is necessary to knock off a patient's wine I do so.
7383. Are you not aware that the nurses objected to doing this, because they were accused of making away with the wine and filling up the cards to suit their own purposes? I never accused a nurse of any such thing, and I do not know that any one else ever did.
7384. Mr. Goold.] Have you ever had complaints of patients not getting their wine? Yes, sometimes, when the stock gets low, but not at other times—I have not known instances of it.
7385. President.] Do you think that there is any ground for saying that patients are so accustomed to stimulants while they are in the Infirmary that they are rendered unfit for the ordinary duties of life when they leave it? That is not true.
7386. Do you believe that any more stimulants are given to patients in the Infirmary than are given by doctors in their private practice? No, nor so much—not such good stuff.
7387. Mr. Ellis.] One of the members of the Board has told us that, to obviate the necessity of seeing their patients as frequently as they should do, the medical men prescribe for thirty days, including wines, beer, and spirits? That is a falsehood, whoever said it—a charge against the honor of the medical men.
7388. It is said that you are one of those who do it? Look at the presence-book of the Infirmary, and you will see that I am there almost every day.
7389. But it is stated against you, that you have prescribed in this way for thirty days at a time? Tell him from me that it is not true, whoever said so.
7390. Mr. Cowper.] Did you ever sign blank orders and leave them for the nurses to fill up? I did not.
7391. President.] You see that in refusing to fill up these orders, the nurses may simply have wished to protect themselves? As far as the diet-scale is concerned, I have a student there, and on one or two occasions when a patient on a particular diet has had an attack of diarrhœa, I might go away without altering the diet, and tell them to give the patient a little gruel or arrowroot until the next day; and then perhaps the diarrhœa has gone off and there is no alteration in the diet-scale; but I cannot call to mind any nurse having had authority from me to write anything on the diet-scale.
7392. Mr. Goold.] It is a fact that you did prescribe wine and porter for thirty days? I did, to obviate the difficulties that the directors threw in our way. They would not supply the wine, and I saw that the patients required it. I fill up the cards now, and I think it is a great hardship for medical men to do such things.
7393. Mr. Ellis.] I would still like to have some information about the nursing—Do you complain of it as it now is—have you any particular complaints? The nurse we had in the men's lock ward was an old syphilitic patient, and he was sent into the operation-room to arrange sponges for men with green wounds, and I say that that was not right.
7394. You have a fear of these patients getting the disease that he had been suffering from? Yes, and it is his duty in the lock ward to dress the wounds of people with chancres.
7395. Do you think that the clothes of a person who had died from venereal disease would communicate the disease to another person? Yes, they would, if they were not washed well.
7396. Do you know that the clothes of patients who have died are given to patients going out of the hospital? Yes. I think that is wrong.
7397. President.] You said something about the directors having interfered with you? Yes; some over-religious people have objected to the doctors operating on Sunday. There are some instances when it is much better to perform an operation upon a Sunday. At present, the rooms we have can scarcely be called operating-rooms at all. In the male operating-room there is very little light at all, and in the women's operating-room there is very little light. Until the sun goes round to the west, you cannot see to do anything. Another thing is, that there is no room for the gentlemen who are invited to come and witness an operation; and strangers generally push in so that the operators can scarcely see or do what they should do. I have often asked the gentlemen if they could give me a little more light; and when I have any particular operation upon the eye, or upon the uterus, or the vagina, where it requires little attendance, I prefer operating on the Sunday.
7398. Why is there more light on a Sunday than on any other day? Because there are fewer people there.
7399. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are strangers allowed to attend these operations? Yes.
7400. President.] Who are allowed to attend? Any one who chooses to ask the house surgeon.
7401. Would it not be right to prevent these persons attending? There is nobody comes except medical men.
7402. Did you not say that anybody could come? Well, any strangers who are medical men. If a surgeon comes down to Sydney from the country and wishes to be present at an operation, all he has to do is to write to the house surgeon, and then they have to send him notice when to come. I have often had to complain of the thing.
7403. Mr. Ellis.] Is that the case in the hospitals at Home? No; because there is a proper operating-theatre there, with a barrier to prevent the spectators getting too close to the operators.
7404. President.] Have you complained to the directors about the number of these permissions which are granted to people? Yes, I have. At the last committee day I complained of it.
7405. Is that the first time that you ever complained? I think so.
7406. Would not the obvious remedy for the inconvenience you speak of be to exclude all those persons who are not obliged to be present at the operation? Yes.
7407. Mr. Metcalfe.] Of course you would allow your own pupils to attend? Of course.
7408. Mr. Goold.] Whom did you mean when you spoke of "over-religious people"? I think a man who asserts that you should not operate on a Sunday should remember what Christ said at one time.
7409. Do you think that it is needful then that the operations should be performed on Sunday—does it enable you to perform the operation better, or is it better for the patient? Both. We do it on Sunday that the operation may be better done, and also to afford relief to the patient.
7410. Do you not think that there should be some consideration given to those who are employed in the institution on the Sabbath? Well, as far as the officers are concerned, I seldom or never employ one, except one of the nurses.
- 7411.

7411. President.] Does not an operation involve a good deal of cleaning and washing up? What of that. You have to wash dishes for dinner on a Sunday. C. McKay,
Esq., M.D.
7412. But why should this washing up be caused in this case? I have often asked the nurses if they objected to it, and they never did object. 5 June, 1878.
7413. Mr. Ellis.] There is one man in the institution who says that for thirteen years he has never enjoyed a quiet Sabbath there? That must be the janitor.
7414. Yes, the porter? There is nothing at all to say to that. If the directors order that cases are to be taken in on Sunday, it is not the business of the doctors to say that they shall not be taken in.
7415. Has the man been for thirteen years there without having a Sunday to himself? I do not know. I know that he has been drunk for about half that time. Until Miss Osburn came here, and there was a row kicked up about it, he was drunk every day of his life.
7416. President.] Who kicked up a row about it? There was a fight. I cannot tell you all the particulars; some of the other officers can tell you. I know that I heard it talked about, that he had a fight with the night porter.
7417. Mr. Ellis.] He has been better since Miss Osburn came? Yes; but whether it is since Mr. Blackstone came or not I do not know. I think that Mr. Blackstone keeps him in check.
7418. About the nursing—the females nurses generally: are you satisfied with the nursing? The women who are there now are pretty fair.
7419. Are they as good as you can get in a hospital, generally speaking? Yes; the women who are in the hospital now are attentive, and a fair class of nurses.
7420. Mr. Goold.] Have you ever been in the Melbourne Hospital? Never.
7421. Mr. Ellis.] You said that you did not think Miss Osburn was competent? No.
7422. Why—because she brought out uninstructed nurses with her? Yes.
7423. But from your personal experience of Miss Osburn since she came here, do you think that she is competent or not? I do not think she can do things herself, or teach anybody else.
7424. Suppose that she cannot do the things that you have spoken of, is she therefore to be considered incompetent? I think that she wishes to domineer, and to take too much upon herself.
7425. But do you think she is competent? I do not think she is if she domineers.
7426. President.] In what respects does she attempt to do that? I do not know it personally myself so much as by hearsay. I seldom or never see her in the wards, but we were on very good terms until one day we had some words.
7427. About the patients wearing their own clothes? Yes, it was about the clothes. And there was an occasion on which I had an amputation, and I sent the nurse to Miss Osburn for some oiled silk. Instead of giving me a proper piece, she doled out a piece no bigger than this book—about that size. I sent it back, and told her to send me a proper piece, and Miss Osburn came back and said it was very expensive stuff. I said—“I do not want you to tell me whether it is expensive or not; it is enough that I require it.” She did not say any more.
7428. You gave her a setting down? Rather. She did not interfere with me again.
7429. Can you tell us now wherein she is incompetent: has she a bad temper? I think I am as good-tempered as she is; but if I had been in Miss Nightingale's place I would never have selected her as a fit matron for the Sydney Infirmary.
7430. Why? Because she is not able to examine a woman.
7431. How do you know that? Because she has never done it in the hospital, and the nurses have said that she never taught them.
7432. Mr. Ellis.] Do you think that Miss Nightingale would select an incompetent person? That is a question we will not go into.
7433. But the fault must rest with her? I do not know whether it is Miss Nightingale's fault or not, but I know that all these nurses could do was to pass a catheter, and they could not do that without uncovering the woman.
7434. You have only given us one reason for saying that she was incompetent: have you ever entered into conversation with her for the purpose of ascertaining what she did know? I never did; but I know the dirty state that the beds were in.
7435. But you give as your reason for her incompetency, the fact that the nurses who came out from England were not up to the standard they should have been? Yes; and the dirty state of the beds.
7436. Mr. Cowper.] Then she may be able to perform these operations without your knowing? I should like to see her do it.
7437. Mr. Goold.] What do you say about the dirty state of the beds? I say that she should have kept them clean.
7438. Have you complained about them? Very often. I have taken off splints, and found where the vermin had got into the broken bones of the patient.
7439. President.] Have you ever complained to the Board about this? Yes, but not in writing. I have told the visitors of it when they have been in the wards.
7440. Mr. Ellis.] And what did they say? I really cannot tell you. There was an old Jew in there who used to amuse himself by crushing them on the walls.
7441. You called the visitors' attention to it? Yes.
7442. Did they do anything in consequence? I do not know what they did.
7443. Did they give you any satisfaction when you spoke to them? They have frequently ordered the rooms to be scrubbed. There is any quantity of bugs in that old house.
7444. Do you think that it is possible to get rid of them? You would have to pull all the plaster off, and put in new floors, to do it.
7445. Some objection has been made to the use of light literature by the patients, who, it is said, should be found on Sundays reading the Scriptures? I think when a man is sick he should get some light literature to amuse his mind, and keep him from thinking he is worse. If it does not prevent him reading his Bible or attending church I do not see any harm in it.
7446. You would not force a man to read religious books all day long? No.
7447. Mr. Goold.] From your experience of nursing, do you think that it is sufficiently practical—is that your view.—We are told by one of the witnesses—“As regards the nursing, the head nurses here I consider superior intellectually, and in their knowledge of diseases, to any nurses in Melbourne; but some of

- C. McKay, Esq., M.D.
5 June, 1873.
- of the nurses there are quite equal to the nurses here in the practical details of nursing."—Taking the practical details, what is your view of the nursing here? I think that the practical part of it is very good. There are some nurses here now, than whom I do not think you can get better anywhere.
7448. In this Infirmary? Yes.
7449. That is the best part of the thing, after all, is it not? Yes; but I do not refer to the English nurses.
7450. But you refer to those who are now in the Infirmary? Yes. Take them as a whole, they are very good nurses.
7451. Mr. Ellis.] You were in the Infirmary when the male system of nursing was in vogue? I was.
7452. Would you rather have male than female nursing? I think that men should nurse men, because there are many things which a female nurse has to do that do not seem very nice in the case of men.
7453. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not think if there was a man to attend on the various wards and assist at operations, it would be an improvement? I do not know that it would meet the difficulty. You could scarcely have more than one male nurse for four wards, and if he had to attend four men all at once who required the night-pans, there would be a difficulty in his doing it.
7454. Do you not think that the nurses could carry the night-pans to them? They might, but if the man has to apply them and remove them, and all that kind of thing, there would be a difficulty. I think it would be better to have a man in the men's wards, and women in the women's wards. I know that in private practice I would sooner have men than women to nurse men.
7455. Is it so generally throughout the World? I do not know.
7456. Are there not many more female nurses than male nurses? I think there are.
7457. Mr. Goold.] Do you know what the practice is in the hospitals in England or on the Continent? No. I have not been at Home for the last twenty years.*

* NOTE (on revision):—I think the directors should all retire annually, and be elected by the Government and the subscribers. As it is, the directors nominate themselves and friends in the Board-room, and they are seldom objected to at the annual meeting.

THURSDAY, 3 JULY, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.
SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.
CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

Mr. John Blackstone, manager, Sydney Infirmary, called in and further examined:—

Mr. J.
Blackstone.
3 July, 1873.

7458. Mr. Ellis.] With reference to the money found upon patients admitted into the institution—I wish to know what is done with it? It is brought to me.
7459. What do you do with it? I keep it in the safe.
7460. Do you enter it in a book? Yes.
7461. Have you got that book? Yes.
7462. Be good enough to let us see it? Yes. I suppose you would like to see the butts too. (Book and papers produced.) These things are brought up to me by the bath-man and entered in this book.
7463. Then you copy the slips into the book and take the money? Yes.
7464. Do you pay the money into the bank? No; I keep it in the safe.
7465. You merely keep it in the safe until the patient goes out? I can show you how I keep it. I put it into a drawer in the safe, and I never disturb it until the patient goes out. I keep it intact.
7466. Just as it is handed to you? Yes. I put it into the safe.
7467. Suppose a patient wants to draw money on account, how do you manage? It is very seldom more than 2d. or 3d. for a letter, and I enter it at once in the book.
7468. Here is an item of £2 15s., which sum has been received on the admission of a patient? I think you will find that there is an order to pay a tailor's bill. The man bought a suit of clothes, and they came to me for the money. I kept the account against the man, and he has gone out.
7469. Mr. Metcalfe.] If a man dies what do you do with the money? Hand it over to the treasurer. You will see entries in the book where it has been paid over to the Samaritan Fund and into the Savings' Bank every six months.
7470. Mr. Ellis.] Supposing that a man went out without his money, would it remain in the drawer for ever? No. If such a case could occur, the money would be paid into the Savings' Bank.
7471. Do the men give receipts when they get their money? They sign the case-book.
7472. I see that there are sums here varying from £11 down to 1s.? Down to 2d. or 3d.
7473. Does the patient give a receipt for his money in every case, however small the amount may be? Generally. He signs the case-book if the amount is over a penny. But some cannot sign at all. There was a man went out to-day and got his money (10s.), and it was as much as he could do to walk, so I got the clerk to write it off.
7474. Where are the receipts kept? In the case-book.
7475. How do you mean? Every Monday morning I call the names over to Mr. Russell, and he enters the amounts in the case-book to the credit of the patients.
7476. Does the patient sign a receipt for the money given back to him? Yes, in the case-book he does; but there are many who cannot write. I keep the money in this drawer (drawer produced, containing money in separate packets).
7477. President.] Can any person get into the hospital now if he chooses to pay—supposing that a person is here without friends, and wishes to be nursed in the Infirmary, can he get in by paying so much a week? Yes.
7478. Have you had such people here? Oh yes; there are some who pay 30s. and some two guineas a week.

7479. How is it that a difference is made? It is according to the means of the parties. Many persons come in here with a good deal of money, people possessed of farms and other property, and I make inquiries about them and lay the information before the committee.

7480. How many paying patients have you in the hospital now? Not many.

7481. How many? I cannot say without going through the case-book.

7482. Are there twenty? No, not more than ten. My cash will show that. I am obliged to report to the committee every Monday what money there is in.

7483. I am not asking you these questions because I suspect that there is anything wrong; I am asking for information? I think there are two or three paying patients. One man paid me two guineas this morning, and I have to give a return of that to the committee.

7484. Does that man go on paying? No. He had about £3 or £4 altogether, from what I could see, and he could not be expected to pay two guineas a week out of that.

7485. In what position of life is he? In just the same position as the others.

7486. Do you know what he is at all? He said he was a labourer when I asked him. I am bound to make these inquiries by the rules.

7487. Mr. Ellis.] If the indiscriminate order system were done away with, do you not think that many more patients would pay for their admission here? I have no doubt that they would, but it would not pay the institution so well.

7488. But it would save the Government? —

7489. Mr. Gould.] As to the time when you were instructed not to interfere with the wards—what time was that? That was in Mr. Manning's time.

7490. Was there any resolution passed by the committee about it? No. Mr. Manning told me verbally. He was honorary secretary then. But I recollect the case very well, and how it occurred.

7491. How long had Miss Osburn been here then? About twelve or eighteen months.

7492. You were told you were not to interfere with the wards in any way? No, I had nothing to do with the nursing at all.

7493. Nor with the cleaning of the floors? No.

7494. You do not know whether any resolution was passed? No, I do not think there was. Dr. Beer—I dare say you have heard of him—came in and asked me to show him through the wards. I said—“Certainly, I will go through the wards with you.” I went through the wards with him, and under one of the beds I saw a great heap of clothes, and I spoke to one of the nurses about it, and said it should not be so; and she went down and told Miss Osburn that I abused her, although that was all I said, that it ought not to be so—that the current of air under the beds should not be interrupted.

7495. Mr. Ellis.] How long ago did this occur? I should say about four years ago. Mr. Manning then said that I was not to interfere with the nurses at all.

7496. Mr. Gould.] Previous to that did you consider it your duty to see the wards clean? Yes, I always did.

7497. But was it your duty previous to that to see to the cleanliness of the wards? No, not to the cleanliness; but if I saw anything going wrong, I thought it was my duty to speak of it.

7498. Mr. Ellis.] But you thought your looking after the servants ceased when Miss Osburn came? I believe it was so. She had charge of the wards.

7499. That was your impression? Yes.

7500. But there were no specific orders given by the committee, either to yourself or to Miss Osburn, on the subject? No, I do not think so.

7501. Mr. Cowper.] What would you do with a cheque found on a patient and handed to you? I would keep it in the drawer.

7503. Mr. Ellis.] Would it not be better for all these moneys to be paid into the bank? We have tried it, and it will not answer. We have devised a book for every man to sign his name that the money is his; but there are many who can't write—some are too ill to write. I have never had a dispute with a man going out from here but once.

7504. President.] If a cheque is found among a man's money, it is kept until he goes out? Yes.

7505. But it may be a good cheque when he comes in, and a bad one when he goes out? I cannot say as to that.

7506. You cannot say that it would be good? It might be good or bad; I cannot say.

7507. Mr. Ellis.] Suppose that all the money was paid into the bank, and kept for a time, and then suppose the honorary treasurer had a petty cash account out of which to pay all sums due to patients; would not that be a business-like way of doing it? If a man were going out, and were going to the country by train, he would have to go down to the treasurer for a cheque, and then there would be delay in getting the money out of the bank.

Miss Lucy Osburn, Lady Superintendent, Sydney Infirmary, called in and further examined:—

7508. President.] Have you anything to do with the care of the clothing of patients who come in? No, it has been taken entirely out of my hands. At first I had a little control, as the man who had charge of them was a clever, active, man and more under my control, and I always told him when I thought that the clothes required washing; but since then the manager has given me distinctly to understand that they have been put into his hands, though I have applied to the committee to get leave to have them washed.

7510. They get, when they are going out, their clothes in the same state as they put them off on coming in? Yes, unless when the nurses get them in the morning and wash them out, which they often do.

7511. Have you represented this to the committee? Yes; I have told them of the extremely dirty state of the clothes that go out.

Miss
3 July, 1873.

7512. Has any change taken place? None at all. I represented the matter to the committee some time ago, and they ordered that the clothes should be washed, but the order has never been carried out. The committee said that the manager was to be written to, and I do not know what the result has been, any more than that.
7513. What order do you refer to? An order that the dirty clothes should be sent to the charwoman of the institution. I got the committee to grant that.
7514. Do you write to them on the subject? No, I recommended it in my report book.
7515. Mr. Metcalfe.] How long ago? About two years ago.
7516. Have you got your report book? Yes.
7517. President.] Have you brought this matter before the committee more than once? Yes; I have mentioned it several times, but I have only written about it twice—once about two years ago, and once a month or two ago.
7518. The man that you speak of as having managed the clothes well, and whom you had control of, is not the bath-man Harris? No; a man named Bennett.
7519. Mr. Metcalfe.] When did you first report this? (Miss Osburn's report-book produced.) On the 20th March, 1871. I find, by my report-book, that on the 20th March, 1871, I asked that, "in the case of patients coming in in very dirty clothes and likely to require them again, are we authorized to send such clothes to the laundress who washes for the institution?" That is approved by Mr. George Allen.
7520. President.] Then the manager was instructed in the matter? Yes, I complained about it to the committee. Then, on the 2nd June, 1873, I said that "the clothes of diseased patients were often in a very dirty condition, and that, though the committee had given permission to have them washed, nothing had been done to remedy the evil."
7521. That is the last reference? Yes.
7522. Mr. Metcalfe.] In the hospitals in London what do they do with the patients' clothes? In the hospitals I have been in, the patients all wear their own clothes, which are sent out to be washed as soon as the patient comes in. Their friends take their clothes and wash them, and bring them back again.
7523. The clothes are taken out, washed, and brought back again? Yes, by the patients' friends—not by the institution; the institution does not take charge of the clothes there; but, on the Continent, the patients' clothes are all washed and fumigated and hung up in rooms set apart for them.
7524. Mr. Cowper.] What is done in London in cases in which the patient has no friends? In such a case the clothes would be sent out by the institution. If a man was picked up in the street his clothes would be sent. But there are not so many people there without any one belonging to them as in Sydney.
7525. Mr. Metcalfe.] They would be washed in any case? Yes.
7526. President.] Such a thing as takes place here could not take place there? No, it could not; I never saw such a thing before.
7528. That was your first written report? Yes.
7529. Mr. Goold.] What is the date? 13th February, 1871. Then, on the 1st May, 1871, I again reminded the committee that “nothing has been done about cleaning the walls of the wards. They are extremely dirty, and the bugs very troublesome.” Then I was reprovved for bringing this matter so often before the committee, and one of the members got up and said that they had nothing to do with the state of the wards, nor with the vermin—that there was going to be some very extensive repairs, or rebuilding of the place, and that I must manage as I could; that the nurses must clean the wards; and they would not hear any more of it.
7530. Mr. Metcalfe.] Who was in the chair on that occasion? I do not remember. The gentleman I speak of was very angry about it.
7531. President.] Who was very angry? Mr. Alderson, I think it was. I think Mr. Russell was present at the time. It was more than two years ago.
- [Mr. H. D. Russell called in.]
- Miss Osburn:* Do you remember, Mr. Russell, Mr. Alderson reproving me for mentioning so often before the committee about the bugs being in the walls? Mr. Russell: I recollect Mr. Alderson making a remark about it; as far as I can recollect, it was not a reproof to you, but a kind of reproof to the committee. At this time he was rather sore about the Prince Alfred Hospital question, and he said something about letting it stand over until the Prince Alfred Hospital was finished. He pooh-poohed it—would not hear of it. I recollect the occasion well, and why he said it.
- Miss Osburn:* Do you remember whether it occurred once when I gave in a written report on the subject of the vermin, or was it when I only mentioned it? Mr. Russell: I recollect on one occasion your bringing the matter before the committee, and it was postponed until another meeting, but I do not know that it was ever taken up again.
- Miss Osburn:* This is marked “Postponed” in the margin? — 7532. Mr. Goold.] Does the minute-book show that? Mr. Russell: It does not. I recollect Miss Osburn mentioning about the bugs in the wards, and her wanting the place cleaned, but it was just about the time that the committee were breaking up, and it was postponed for consideration, and Miss Osburn was asked to mention the matter the next week, but I do not think that anything was done in it.
- Miss Osburn:* No, I do not think that anything was done. It was once stated that it must be brought before the building committee, but I had made no report then? Mr. Russell: I do not recollect its being brought before the building committee.
- [Mr. Russell withdrew.]
7533. President.] Did you mention the matter to the committee again? Yes. I thought they would not allow me any men to clean the walls, and so I proposed this:—On the 9th October, 1871, I say that “the nurses are anxious to try to wash the walls with gas-water to destroy the vermin. They will apply it themselves if the committee will order the gas-water to be brought here.” Mr. Allen puts—“Try other means.” So the next day I say—“Washed the walls with chloride of mercury, and, the patients say, somewhat successfully.”

7535. Besides these occasions on which you reported the matter in your report-book, you also frequently brought it before the committee? Frequently, and the last time was just before this last Christmas.

7536. Christmas 1872? Yes, I said Christmas is coming, and the walls are dirty, and the dry weather is setting in, when the bugs were becoming frightful; and on that occasion I know that the building committee had something to do with the matter, and were asked to look into it.

7537. Did they do anything? Never. They never came near me. If they had, I would have gone round and shown them where the bugs were.

7538. Did you endeavour to get the men about the place to do anything? Yes, I did. That was in 1870, towards the end of the year; we had some wardsmen left then—one of the name of Points—I got some one to take his place and took him to clean the walls, and he cleaned No. 3 ward, which was one of the worst, and I was giving him some orders about going on with the work, when Mr. Manning came and told me that the manager felt hurt about my cleaning the place—that he considered it part of his duty, and that I must never do anything about the cleaning of the place again.

7539. Did you then desist? I did. I had to send the man back to the ward at once.

7540. Mr. Gould.] Who gave you that order? Mr. Manning, who was then honorary secretary.

7541. President.] It has been stated that you are in the habit of being away from the place frequently for days together, without the committee knowing where you are—is that correct? No, it is not. I have never been away without asking leave of the committee, excepting the last time, when I was away for four nights, by leave of Mr. Stephen. I did intend to ask leave of the committee on the Monday—

7542. What occasion was this? This was in last February, I think.

7543. On the occasion of Messrs. Pearce and Paxton coming here to look through the wards? Yes, it was. I intended to ask leave of the committee on the Monday, but on that Monday there was a great discussion about these bugs, and I was interested in it and quite forgot that I wanted to go away. So on the Tuesday morning I went to Mr. Stephen and asked him if there was any objection to my going to Mrs. Dumaresq's for four nights, as I had quite forgotten to ask leave of the committee. He said he was sure that there would be no objection, and I went. I was away Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday evenings.

7545. On how many occasions have you been away from the place for any length of time during the whole time you have been here? The longest time I was away was three weeks in Bathurst, about three years and a half ago, and then I had been ill and was ordered away by the doctors. Since then I have been one week in Mudgee to take a nurse to the hospital there, and one week in the Hunter River district to see the hospitals there, and ten days at Camden Park, when I was ill fifteen months ago.

7546. On all occasions you were away with the knowledge and approbation of the committee? Yes, I always asked them. I think I have twice besides, within the last three years, been away from Saturday until Monday at Camden Park.

7547. Having on all occasions asked leave to go? Yes.

7548. Mr. Metcalfe.] And you were sometimes at Throsby Park also, were you not? Yes, but that is more than three years ago. I was there from Saturday to Monday—just short visits.

7550. Is that the Barnes who has written several works on the subject? Yes, he has written many works.

7551. Was it known in the hospital that you were coming out here for a position of this sort? Oh yes, they all knew of it. I knew some of the doctors personally, Mr. Solly and Mr. Geo. Clarke, and they always sent for me whenever any operations were to be performed, so that I had special opportunities of study in the operation-room. They would put me close to the operator, and I would attend to them personally at the operations. They would show me everything, point out parts and organs of the body to me, and draw special attention to important matters, as they thought that such instruction would be useful to me.

7552. Was this teaching which you got of an exceptional kind—more than other people got? Yes, more than other people. Of course all who were in the wards had opportunities of gaining information, but they were not sent for, as I was, whenever there was a capital operation going on. Mrs. Wardropper allowed me to be sent for, and Mr. Solly always allowed me to be present.

7553. He is a leading London surgeon? Yes, he was; he is now dead, I am sorry to say. Did these witnesses mean that I could not teach the nurses to do things?

7554. Yes; never having seen you handle the patients, they seemed to doubt whether you could do so? I do not go into the wards with the doctors, but if a doctor orders anything to be done and the nurses do not understand how to do it, I always go and instruct them; and with the uterine cases especially I have taken great pains.

7555. Some witnesses have complained to us of what they thought an extravagance in the diets, one witness complaining particularly of what he thought was an extravagant use of champagne: has there been such extravagance, do you think? I do not think there has. I only recollect one case in which champagne was ordered. There may have been more, but I only recollect one, and that was the case of a poor creature almost exhausted with pain and suffering. I thought it was a right thing to be ordered for her. It would be given in any other hospital, both in England and on the Continent, and I thought it only right that the woman should have it. There are some cases where the patient can only be kept alive by delicacies of that kind.

7556. Apropos of extravagance, some gentleman has said that the cost of the Nightingale wing is one-third of the whole expenses of the institution: is there any foundation for such a statement? I should think not the least. The only thing we were praised for in the last report was our economy. We are very economical.

Miss

7557.

Miss
L. Osburn.

3 July, 1873.

7557. That was in the last year's report of the institution? Yes; they say that it has been most economically conducted.

7558. What is the cost per head per year? In 1871 I calculated that the cost of the Nightingale wing per head per year was £13 18s. 6d.

7559. Mr. Metcalfe.] Including the servants? Servants, nurses, and myself; and the extras are also included in that—the wine, beer, and everything. In 1872 there were thirty-two people in the house, and the cost per head per year was £13 Os. 8d. That is exactly 5s. per week per head.

7560. That is the cost of maintenance? Yes. Coal is not included in that, but there is everything that we eat or drink.

7561. Mr. Cowper.] Including wines and spirits? Yes, the wine and the beer.

7562. President.] One gentleman has said that you are in the habit of ordering things in without the committee knowing anything about it, and he has mentioned an instance of your ordering a number of boxes for containing refuse from the wards? Yes.

7563. Did you order them without authority? No, not without authority. On the 16th December, 1872, I say in my report-book—"There is much required for the use of the wards, twelve boxes with lids for the rubbish and things thrown out. At present open boxes are used, and the flies and smell are very disagreeable." That report is signed by Mr. George Allen, the chairman.

7564. As an authority for you to get these things? Yes. I asked Mr. Street to come over and see the boxes which I had made for the Nightingale Wing before, which they had granted me. He came over and suggested some improvements. On the 10th February, 1873, I say in my report-book—"The boxes ordered from Corben & Nichols, as piece and dust boxes, were delivered here on Wednesday, 5th February." That is signed by Mr. Coveny as chairman.

7565. Then you asked leave to get these boxes, consulted the treasurer as to their construction, and reported to the committee that you had got them, afterwards? Yes, and I produce my written reports showing that such is the case.

7566. Mr. Josephson has stated that he "can swear that you ordered those boxes without any authority from the committee" at all—that "no one was asked, and that you got them without authority"—that he was present at every meeting, and can "take his oath" you never asked for them? Mr. Josephson should not have said that, because he was present when the matter came up, and said that they had been ordered without authority, and Mr. Lewers said he remembered the authority being given, and then the report-book was turned to, and it was found that I had authority to order them. Mr. Josephson was present then, and saw the proof that I had the authority. He should not have said that.

7567. If Mr. Josephson has said—"I can take my oath she never asked for those boxes"? He is very wrong indeed.

7568. And before making that statement to us, he was reminded of the matter in the committee, and the authority shown him? Yes.

7569. The minute was referred to, pointing out where you had asked for these boxes? Yes.

7570. Another gentleman has told us that you used to buy things on your own account and sell them to the nurses: is that correct? It is correct so far, that when I first came here it was understood that the nurses were to have uniform, and I was asked to get suitable materials for their uniforms. I went into the town and ordered a number of things which I thought suitable, and the committee paid the bill; and they were always asking me where that money was. Some of it was in stock, and some the nurses had not yet paid up. Perhaps a nurse would not be able to pay the whole account at once, and then she would pay so much a month—give so much out of her salary towards her uniform. This made a great deal of accounts between me and the finance committee, so it was proposed that I should pay for the whole of the uniform myself, paid £37 and some shillings, bills in the town, and I paid them the £37 down, and since then I have paid for everything myself.

7571. Out of your own money? Yes.

7572. But do you ever sell the goods to your own advantage with a view of making a profit? No, not at all. It is far from an advantage to me—it is a great trouble and a great loss.

7573. How do you mean? We are obliged to give short lengths as required by the nurses, and of course the whole quantity will not measure enough to allow of a little piece over for each.

7574. You find that it does not measure enough to enable you to give good measure to the nurses when you cut off pieces for them? Yes. There is of course a certain quantity, and, when a nurse takes a few yards, in measuring it you are sure to give just a little over the exact measure, so that in cutting many small lengths there is a loss. I have been to Prince, Ogg's, and told them so.

7575. Have you been out of pocket by this means? I have indeed.

7576. You are out of pocket by having first to pay for the stuff yourself? Yes.

7577. And then by finding that the stuff does not run as much as it is supposed to run? Yes.

7578. Have you ever sold in this way anything else except things required for the uniforms of the nurses? Yes, if they come and ask me—a few of them together—I get for them perhaps a whole piece of calico, or stockings, or anything that they want for themselves. If they say, a number of them, that they will take a whole piece of stuff, I go and get some patterns, and I get the warehouse to let me have the goods at wholesale prices.

7579. That is done as a favour to the nurses? Yes; in that way they get the things cheaper.

7580. Then they pay for them themselves? Yes, they divide it among themselves, and each pays their share.

7581. Is there any ground for saying that you go round as saleswoman and ask these people to buy things as a matter of favour? No, not the least. I do not look upon it as buying things for them, but the people of the warehouse were kind enough to say that they would supply them.

7583. Do you find that that plan answers better? No, I do not. I was glad at first when I heard of it, for I thought that it would save a great deal of trouble, but I find that it does not answer at all.

7584. In what way? We get things much dearer and of much worse quality. We have shirts in wear that have been but one year in wear, which have, what we call "melted" away; they are not good for anything; thing; and I have others which we put in wear two years ago, bought by myself more than two years ago; that are quite worth putting new collars and wristbands on; but then I dare say that my calico may have cost a penny or so more than the other; yet when one goes to the trouble of making a shirt, it is worth the difference to have good material in it.

Miss

7585. You said that some of the things bought by the committee cost more? Yes. I have now on the counter some unbleached linen that has been bought by Mr. Paxton for pillow-cases in the wards, and it is too narrow to make a proper sized pillow-case; it cost half-a-crown a yard, and I bought some proper stuff at Moore's for 1s. a yard.

7586. Do you mean to say that you bought stuff for a shilling a yard, and that Mr. Paxton bought unsuitable stuff for half-a-crown a yard? Yes. They are both there now in the store; most of Mr. Paxton's purchase with the bill, and I have Moore's bill. It is the same with serge that we wanted for the little boys' clothing. I bought some serge, which was coarse but strong, for 1s. 9d. per yard, and I gave some of it to the committee as a pattern, telling them the retail price, and they went to a wholesale shop and got serge not a bit better and gave 2s. a yard for it.

7587. Then you think that women can purchase things of this kind better than men? I think so really. I think there are some things that they can do better than men.

7588. And do they buy all sorts of things like this? Yes.

7589. Who buys the dusters and floor-cloths? They buy them all. The purchasing committee bought me a quantity last year, £26 worth of ponchos, and they are so unsuitable that we cannot use them; they come to pieces, and make fluff on the floor. It seems as if the committee, in doing these things, would save us a great deal of trouble, but really that is not the case. Their buying such unsuitable things keeps me back so much; I have been waiting for these pillow-cases for the last four weeks, and wanting to make them up.

7590. A witness has given us to understand that, some time ago, as I should judge from the tenor of the evidence, that through some remissness of yours there was a paucity of linen in the wards—soon after you came I think? When we first came there was a terrible paucity of linen—two ragged sheets on each bed. We had only about thirty sheets to send to the wash. They were washed and given to another ward, and then the sheets from that ward were washed and given to another, and so on. That was all we had to go on with.

7591. Was there not a complete change of linen throughout? No, certainly not—a very long way off that. To make a complete change there should be three sheets for each bed, but there was nothing like three. We could only muster about thirty sheets or thirty-five, besides those on the beds.

7592. Mr. Metcalfe.] And sometimes the sheets require to be changed every day? Yes.

7593. President.] Here is a case. Mrs. Blundell says—"I asked for sheets for an amputation case, and it was really a very bad case. The patient had an excessive discharge of pus from the stump, and was supposed to have frequent changes of linen. A man with such frequent discharges required to be changed frequently; and after using one sheet until it was quite saturated, I went down to the linen store and asked for more sheets, and was very uncivilly treated, being refused the necessary sheets. I did not complain of it, but I continued to go on with the dirty linen, and I think I lost the respect and esteem of one of the medical officers, but I would not complain—I went on disobeying his orders. Did you get the linen? I did not. Was it Ann Parker who refused to give it you? It was her sister, Eliza. Did you complain of it? I did complain. To whom? To Miss Osburn. What did she say? She made no answer." I do not remember the particular case, but I know that there were many cases in which sheets should have been changed in those days, but which could not be changed.

7594. Because you had not the linen? No. I have marked as many as 200 sheets a day when we got the sheets.

7595. It took some time, I suppose, to get the hospital properly furnished with linen? Yes, I think it took two years to get it made up all round. Shirts take a long time making up, and they want 500 shirts to keep them going.

7597. One witness has given evidence as if he thought the money of the institution was wasted in buying books of light literature for the Infirmary—Has any money been spent in that way? No. If I want to buy anything to give to a patient, I must go and buy it myself.

7598. Have you ever done so? Yes, I have. When they have wanted Bibles in foreign languages, I have hunted about for Bibles for them in Dutch, and Gaelic, and other languages, when they could not read English.

7599. Do they ask for them? Yes; and when they do I always get them, though the committee would not give me a penny for it.

7600. Mr. Metcalfe.] Have you observed any levity on the part of the nurses—seen them dancing in the corridors or about the patients' beds? Seen them dancing—oh dear no. They do dance in the Nightingale wing, but not in the wards.

7601. They do not dance among the patients? No; they never do so that I know of.

7602. Mr. Gould.] You have said, in the course of your evidence, that Mr. Manning gave you orders not to interfere with the cleaning of the wards? Yes, he did.

7603. Did he tell you whose duty it was to clean the wards? He said that the manager was hurt, and had appealed to him, because I had taken upon myself to have the walls cleaned, and he said—"It will be better for you never to do that again; better leave it to him."

7604. When was that? It was before Mr. Manning left; he was secretary at the time.

7605. We have it in evidence that Mr. Manning gave the same instructions about not interfering in the cleaning of the wards, to the manager—that the manager was told not to interfere. He has said that on one occasion he found a heap of dirty clothes under a bed, and that he complained, and was told by Mr. Manning not to interfere again? Yes; he scolded a nurse in the ward before all the patients—roared at at her, and this upset her dignity. I went up into the ward and found her crying, and she told me what had happened. I spoke to Mr. Manning, and asked him to tell the manager not to do that again, because it destroys the influence of the nurses over the patients if you roar at them in that way.

7606. The manager said that Mr. Manning said he had nothing to do with the cleaning of the wards? I have always thought that it was his business, and that that was the reason I was always put down for mentioning it—that it was not considered a part of my duty. They could not have considered that the cleaning of the wards was my department, because I was so specially told that he was responsible. And when the building was cleaned in March last, they told me then I might henceforth take it into my own hands. The nurses, however, could not clean the walls; but suppose that the cleaning of the walls was my duty, what more could I do than ask the committee to let us have men to whitewash them?

7607. Mr. Stephen, in answer to a question [4359] as to where the blame lay that the hospital should get into such a dirty state, says—"That it should have got into the state it was in lately—I mean the excessively bad state—is the fault of the nursing staff, and partly of the committee perhaps, who having had these matters to a certain extent reported to them, may not have taken the steps that they should have taken. I do not want to throw all the blame on the nursing staff, but one would suppose that absolute vigilance would prevent the vermin attacking the patients, though nothing could keep them from the walls. While I do not acquit the committee of all blame, I do think that the chief blame rests on the nursing department"? I cannot help Mr. Stephen's opinion.

7608. It is evident that Mr. Stephen thinks it is the fault of the nurses? Yes; but could I have done whitewashing myself?

7609. Then again, Mr. Stephen says that the committee never heard that the wards were in so bad a state with the vermin. When asked about your statement with reference to the vermin crawling over a dying patient, he says—"Well, I do say, as far as I am personally concerned, that I never heard any account, written or verbal, from Miss Osburn, such as that, until lately. I do not remember it"? That I can well believe, because Mr. Stephen is here not perhaps more than three or four times a year. I might report it forty times and he would not hear of it. He has been here very seldom lately.

7610. I wish to know why it is that the sisters do not keep the book which is referred to in the instructions by Miss Nightingale; it is said that it would be a great advantage to keep such a book? That is, with the marks as to the probationers, "good," "bad," "indifferent," and so on. That we never began, because when we first came here we had all probationers and no nurses, and we had to train them as we could get them; and another thing is, that I have scarcely had a sufficient staff of sisters. I have not a sister or head nurse in each set of wards. I could do that now, however, but when we first came I could not do it. Only three of the nurses we found here remained, and the others were quite new; and those who were not, knew of no system of nursing—they were mere probationers. You were obliged to treat them exactly like probationers, and put them through all the wards in the same way as probationers.

7611. Mr. Cowper.] If the recommendation of the committee, that some of the nurses should be discharged and some scrubbers appointed, had been carried out, would it have rendered your department inefficient? Oh yes. We could not do with less nurses. That would never do. There were scrubbers here when we first came, and they did not answer at all.

7612. Do you not require more servants of that kind in the institution now? No, not women as scrubbers. We want men to sweep the walls and clean outside the walls, but there are always convalescent patients to scrub the floors of the wards.

7613. Is scrubbing a work that nurses could do themselves and still keep up a respectable appearance? All cleaning is done by 9 in the morning.

7614. But the scrubbing—is that work which the nurses could do and yet keep themselves clean? Some do it, but it is for their own pleasure. There is nurse Ann Brannigan, she takes a pride in her ward, and goes all over it with a brush after the convalescent patients have cleaned it, which they are quite able to do.

7615. The convalescent patients? Yes; and very willing. We never have any trouble in getting them. There used to be some trouble with them—a good deal more than there is now.

7616. Are the friends of patients who are dying admitted to see them? When we first came here it was disliked very much that they should remain in the hospital, and that is one of the subjects on which I and the manager have always disagreed. He does not like any visitor to be in the ward with a patient who is dying, but I was always accustomed to it at Home. It looks so cruel to turn them out. I was always begging for them to remain, and the manager would go and order them out.

7617. When their friends were dying? Yes. He does not do it so much now, because he does not come into the wards. I always give them leave to stay (if there is a wife or mother) with a dying patient. It does not disturb the ward at all, because we put a screen round, so that the other patients are not disturbed.

7618. Mr. Ellis.] Who selected the English sisters who came with you? The Nightingale Council, I believe. They would of course apply to Mrs. Wardropper, and ask whether they were suitable.

7619. Had you anything to do with the selection? No, I had not. I objected to two of them.

7620. Because it has been stated to us, as a proof of your incompetency, that you selected incompetent sisters? No, I did not select them at all, nor had I anything to do with their training.

7621. It has been complained that you refused to give some of them characters when they left this institution? No, I never did refuse.

7622. It was made the subject of a complaint to the committee, we have heard, that you refused to give characters to some nurses leaving the institution? No, I have never refused to give any one a character, but I have had complaints as to the kind of character I gave.

7623. Mr. Metcalfe.] You gave them a simple discharge? Yes; I have said that they were respectable and trustworthy, but I have not given them a first class trained nurse's character, and they consider that they have all a claim to it. Of course I should lose all claim to regard with the public if I gave every one a character.

7624. That was what you refused to do—you refused to certify that they were thoroughly trained nurses? That is it. I would not give a first-rate trained nurse's character to a person who was not a first-rate trained nurse.

7625. Mr. Ellis.] It has been complained of you also, by some of the medical gentlemen, that you are in the habit of removing the nurses too frequently from ward to ward? I am obliged to change them more or less every three months, for I find that three months is as long as they can remain on night duty. I put a set of night nurses on duty every three months, and when they come off night duty I must take six more nurses from the wards and put them on night duty, and put those who come off into the wards. I remove as few as possible.

7626. What was stated was, that the nurse was generally removed from the ward just about the time that she got to understand the ways of the doctor and become useful? She should be able to understand as much as that in less than three months.

7627. It was said that they were removed suddenly and without intimation? Everybody knows that the change is made every three months—in March, June, September, and December.

7628. Is it an established rule to remove them periodically? Not every one. I have to take some off night duty and put others on. It necessitates six people being changed, but I always change as few as possible. Of course it is scarcely fair not to give a nurse an opportunity of learning in the surgical wards.

7629. Is it true that you change nurses every three days as a mere matter of caprice? I certainly never did such a thing; I have never done it.

7630. You change them according to some rule? Yes. They are never changed unless somebody leaves, or is sick; otherwise I never change a nurse except once in three months.

7631. Dr. Markey, in a note to his evidence, says—"I forgot to mention that Miss Osburn refused to send a nurse to attend a man in the tent when requested by me to do so?" I think that refers to a case which has been mentioned in the "house." A case was brought into the tent, and Mr. Markey sent me word that Mr. Roberts wanted an attendant for this man. It was pouring wet weather, and I came over to the manager and told him to get an attendant for the patient, as I was not empowered to do it, and he said he would do so, and in the meantime I got a nurse to take charge of the man, but I told Mr. Roberts that I could not undertake to nurse a tent case in the pouring rain.

7632. President.] It was a tent case? Yes, and at that time the tent was put a long way off down the green, and I had a nurse laid up from attending the tent. She was in bed with bronchitis.

7633. Did it involve attendance at night? Yes. I could not put a nurse all alone with a man half way down the green, so I said there must be a male attendant got. I think, with regard to the cleaning, it is most important that there should be a rule that the wards should be cleared out before the cleaning commences, and that should be done every year. It is impossible, as we have found during the late cleaning, to have the work thoroughly well done if the sick remain in the wards. There are forty patients in a ward to attend to, baths to be given, and the whole work of the institution carried on at the same time that we are trying to get the cleaning done. At Home a set of wards is always cleared completely of patients and then the cleaning begins, things were sent to the wash, and stock taken of everything.

7634. Mrs. Blundell seems to complain very much of your having on one occasion brought a doctor a piece of oiled silk—What were the circumstances connected with that case? I always take the oiled silk myself; I keep it locked up, and I take it up myself, to see how much the doctor wants; it is an expensive article—costs 12s. 6d. a yard; I keep it under lock and key; and if any is wanted, unless they send me down the size that they want, I take it up with me and cut off what is wanted in the ward myself always.

7635. Then you did not treat Mrs. Blundell in an exceptional way? Not at all.

7637. Is that the stuff recommended by Dr. Renwick—oiled paper? Yes. It is of little expense, and very good stuff. I thought it would do, and I suggested it to Dr. McKay, but he would not hear of it. We dressed the patient with the oiled silk for a day or two, and then we used the other, and said nothing about it, and it did quite as well. It was a mere whim of Dr. McKay's, and in these cases I think that it is wrong to give such expensive things.

7638. On the score of economy, you think that it is better to look after a matter of that sort than to make a fuss about a bottle of champagne? Indeed I do.

7639. Mr. Ellis.] Did Dr. Roberts give lectures in the Infirmary? Yes; two I think.

7640. We have heard it said that you gave up lecturing because Dr. Roberts began to do it? I never thought of such a thing. I was extremely obliged to Dr. Roberts or to any one who would give instruction to the nurses.

7641. President.] One gentleman here is anxious to know whether you are a member of a religious house in England, known as St. John's House? No.

7642. In this German Hospital that you attended, were the people Protestants or Catholics? Protestants; Lutherans; very evangelical indeed.

7643. We have been told that at one time you were styled "lady superior"? Yes.

7644. We wish to know how you came to have that title? Of course in my agreement I am called "lady superintendent"—that was my title; but I found that there was a superintendent here. Mr. Blackstone, the manager, was then called the superintendent, that was his official title, and it made so much confusion and was so unpleasant in many ways, that I had to give up my title. I spoke to Mr. Stephen and Mr. Manning about it, and said it was too unpleasant to go on, and that I must be called either "matron" or "superior." I never dreamt about there being any religious feeling about it. It was felt that "matron" was not a title, and so I was called "lady superior." It was begun in the hospital. I used to get Mr. Blackstone's bills and letters, and I thought people would think I was some connection of his. I did not like it at all; I was exceedingly annoyed at that time.

7645. Mr. Gould.] Did Mr. Roberts ever speak to you about it, and recommend you not to take the title of "lady superior"? Yes; Mr. Roberts told me, I remember, that people would attach a religious idea to it, and that they would object to it. I told him that there was not the slightest religious feeling about it in my mind. The moment the manager's title was changed to what it now is, I took back my own. No one ever asked me to take it back.

7646. Mr. Metcalfe.] Have you ever asked the nurses to call you "lady superior"? Never; I never asked them to call me anything in any way.

7647. President.] One gentleman has charged you with being unfairly partial to Roman Catholics. As a matter of fact, how many out of the total number of people in the Nightingale Wing are Protestants? There are thirty-three people in the Nightingale Wing. There is a housekeeper, a Roman Catholic. Nurse Ann Brannigan, nurse Rafter, and nurse Schofield, are Roman Catholics. There are twenty-nine Protestants and four Roman Catholics; the three servants are Protestants; and the young woman in the linen-room is a Protestant; and the sisters are Protestants; there are only the three nurses and the housekeeper who are Roman Catholics.

3 July, 1873.

7648. Mr. Goold.] Is not, in all the hospitals you have known in London, the title "matron" used instead of "lady superintendent"? Well, it depends on the hospital. In some the title "matron" is used. In St. Thomas's, which is an old hospital, the title "matron" is used in the hospital; but the same person is the "lady superintendent" of the Nightingale Training School, and is generally addressed as "lady superintendent."

7649. Is there any hospital in London in which the title of "lady superior" is adopted? Oh yes; there is a lady superior in the University College Hospital; a lady superior in King's College Hospital; in Charing Cross Hospital there is a sister superior; and in the Great Northern Hospital there is a superior.

7650. Are these institutions marked by any particular attachment to ritualistic views: we have been told that there is one hospital conducted strictly upon —? Well, the St. Margaret sisters are rather High Church, and they nurse the University College Hospital.

7651. Where this title is used, the tendency is to ritualism? No, I do not think so, for in the Great Northern Hospital they are Lutherans and Evangelical.

7652. President.] Low Church? Yes, very Evangelical indeed. At Aldersgate there is a superintendent; at St. George's there is a matron; at Bartholomew's there is a matron.

7653. You were prepared to take either title? Yes, I was.

George John Pattieson, Esq., M.D., called in and examined, at his own request:—

G. J.
Pattieson,
Esq., M.D.

3 July, 1873.

7654. President.] You are one of the out-surgeons of the Sydney Infirmary? I was; but I am not now.

7655. How long did you act? For about two years.

7656. How long is it since you ceased to act? About twelve months.

7657. I believe that you have some suggestions to make to the Commission as to the mode of working this portion of the arrangements of the Infirmary? I think that the out-door surgeons should be entirely honorary, and should be made assistant-surgeons to the staff here. They should do the work as honorary assistant surgeons, without any pay whatever; and I think the best men in Sydney could be got to take the positions. That is the system in other hospitals. This Infirmary is a terribly managed place altogether—it was in my time, at any rate. If you wrote to the committee you could not even get a reply. The out-door surgeons were ignored.

7658. Is not the system of paying the out-door surgeons in force in the English hospitals? No. The position should be quite honorary—the out-door surgeons should be the assistant honorary surgeons of the hospital.

7659. Have you made any suggestions to the committee on this subject? Yes, frequently. I have talked to the manager and to the honorary surgeons—Dr. Fortescue and others—on the subject. It would save the hospital a good deal of money in the way of fees to out-door men, and you would get the best men in Sydney to take the office.

7660. The inducement being, that they could come here as honorary assistant surgeons? Yes; and afterwards come in as honorary surgeons; that is, supposing I was assistant honorary surgeon to Dr. Fortescue, and he were not at home on some occasion when he would be required, then I would be sent for, and afterwards if a vacancy occurred I would have a chance of becoming an honorary surgeon.

7661. Is that system in force in England? Yes, in London and in the provincial hospitals too.

7662. You think that it is desirable that these men should hold office for some definite time? Yes; I think that at a certain time they should go out, let it be eight or ten years, but at any rate the time should be limited, and other men should be allowed to come in. Let the honorary surgeons be chosen from the honorary assistant surgeons. Let there be no elections for the honorary surgeons, but let the honorary assistant surgeons be elected, and then let vacancies on the honorary staff be filled from the honorary assistant staff. Suppose an honorary surgeon dies or retires, then his place could be filled up from the honorary assistant staff.

7663. You think that that would be a sufficient inducement to get the best men to take the office and do the work faithfully? Yes.

7664. Do you think that the charity of this place is abused by people who have no right to look for assistance from it? Yes, very much so indeed.

7665. In consequence of the committee not taking any notice of representations made to it, did you come to any conclusion as to its being too large or unwieldy? I really gave the place up in disgust. I did make one suggestion that was acted upon, and that was with reference to the division of the districts. The districts were unfairly divided. Dr. Eichler, for instance, saw sixteen patients a month, while I would have 200. I suggested that the surgeons should change their districts every month; but the committee would not hear of it—they ignored me; but I thought that would be a fair way of equalizing the work—to let a man have light work some months and heavy work in others.

7667. Was that the fault of the manager or of the committee? I do not know. I never got any reply from the manager. I spoke to him, and he said that he never got any reply from the committee. I made another suggestion with a view of economizing the time here of both the dispensers and the surgeons. At present each out-patient hands his paper over to the dispenser, who puts it into a book, and when that patient comes again for medicine or advice, you have to search through the book for his original order. A great deal of time is wasted in this way. I suggested that it would be simpler for the patient to keep his paper, and hand it in with his bottle every time he came. There would then be no loss of time in hunting patients' orders. This is not done. There is so much obstruction in the place that no improvements can be effected, and there were four of us resigned all about the same time, Dr. Spencer, Dr. Eichler, and, I think, Dr. Fyffe, and myself, because it was impossible to get any suggestions attended to. It would be far better to let a patient keep his paper, and when he goes to get his physic, hand it in; then you would see at once what the man has been getting, instead of having to fish all through a book for it. The management of this institution altogether is a long way behind the time.

G. J.
Pattieson,
Esq., M.D.

3 July, 1873.

7668. It is old-fashioned? I never saw such an institution in my life.
7669. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you ever attend hospitals as a surgeon? Yes, I did.
7670. Have you done so in the Old Country? Yes.
7672. The patient brings a recommendation from a subscriber, and the doctor examines that? Yes.
7673. The patient then takes the doctor's prescription to the dispensary? Yes, and the dispenser keeps that and puts it into a book; and it takes a long time for the dispenser to put up these papers and insert them in the different doctors' books.
7674. You think that every patient should retain his own prescription? Yes.
7675. Mr. Goold.] But suppose that he lost the paper, what course would be pursued? That would be his own fault, and he should not have another one.
7676. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you not think that the majority of the patients who get out-door relief would cheerfully pay a shilling or two and sixpence a week? A great many would. Another suggestion which I made was, that all the men who come to the dispensary with gonorrhœa and syphilis should be made to pay something, and it was acted upon for some time. There are a great many men who come suffering from gonorrhœa and syphilis; and I said if they could afford to get it, they could afford to pay for the cure of it. I used to refuse such cases unless they paid some time, and then things got bad. The Rev. Mr. O'Reilly would send them down, and I would send them back to him stating the disease, and the same with Dr. Lang, who wrote to me and said that I did quite right. These rules should be enforced strictly. There are so many cases come here for out-door relief, cases of gonorrhœa and syphilis.
7677. President.] Do you see any advantage in having a dispensary in Regent-street, in preference to having it in any other part of the town? Do you mean at Redfern?
7678. Yes—do you think that there is more poverty in that part of the town? No, I do not think there is so much there as there is about Cumberland-street.
7679. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you think that the best surgeons in the town would undertake the duties of honorary assistant surgeons? We would compete for the position—all the best men would compete, if we had a chance of becoming honorary surgeons when vacancies occurred. We should be the assistant surgeons, each attached to honorary surgeons; and should be present when needed, and have the same interest in the hospital that the honoraries have, although we should be merely subordinates to them.
7680. Mr. Ellis.] And you think that this would be an acceptable change to the members of the profession? I think so. All the best men in Sydney would compete for the office, with the chance of afterwards being made honorary surgeons.
7681. Mr. Goold.] They would be made honorary surgeons when vacancies occurred? Yes. Let the election take place for assistant honorary surgeon, and those who were elected to that position would then have one foot in, and afterwards the staff could elect from the assistants their own man when a vacancy occurred.
7682. Mr. Metcalfe.] The assistant honorary surgeon would, as a matter of course, take the position of honorary surgeon in case of a vacancy occurring? Yes.
7683. Mr. Ellis.] Is this the practice at Home? Yes.
7684. President.] The assistant surgeons would be attached each to a particular surgeon? Yes, each surgeon would have his honorary assistant surgeon.
7685. Suppose that a vacancy occurred in the honorary staff, would the surgeon retiring be succeeded, as a matter of course, by the man who is his assistant? I would not like to give an opinion as to that. That could be decided by the committee or by the honorary medical staff. I should think, if you were an honorary surgeon and I were your honorary assistant surgeon, and you retired, it would follow that I should step into your shoes.
7686. But in that way the best men might not always be got? If you make the election for the assistant honorary surgeons on this plan, you will get the best medical men in Sydney to go in for the position; and I would leave it to the honorary staff and the committee to use their own judgment in electing the honorary surgeons.
7687. Elect them from the whole? Yes, I would not object to that. I would not object, if I were an honorary assistant surgeon, to one of my colleagues being made honorary surgeon instead of me, as I would know that my turn was coming sooner or later.
7688. Would you propose to secure to the honorary assistant surgeon the right to succeed to the surgeonship if a vacancy occurred? I would secure it to one of them; but supposing that you were an honorary surgeon and I were your assistant, I would not propose to secure to myself the right to succeed you by any means.
7689. Would you confine the choice of a successor to the retiring honorary? No, to the staff and the committee. I would not permit you to appoint your successor.
7690. Suppose that an honorary died, how would you appoint a successor? From the assistant surgeons or physicians.
7691. But there might be able men willing to take the office who were not assistant surgeons or physicians? You mean outsiders?
7692. Yes? I would have nothing to do with them.
7693. Then the best men might be excluded? Not at all. They would come in as honorary assistants.
7694. But a man might not choose to be an assistant surgeon—probably an old man who had had considerable experience in the profession would not like to come in as an assistant? It would be a position of honor, and an old man would like to come in just as much as a young one.
7695. Would a medical man in first-class practice come in and take the position? Yes, I think so. I would stand myself to-morrow.
7696. But suppose that when the position of honorary surgeon were vacant, there were better men outside willing to fill it? That is not likely, because amongst the assistants you might depend on having the best men. That is the case in London, in Edinburgh, and in Paris. The system is the same in all these places, and there the best men are attached to the hospitals all the World over.

G. J. Pattieson, Esq., M.D.

3 July, 1873.

7697. Mr. Ellis.] Do you not think that professional jealousy would prevent a large class of men from coming in and being assistant surgeons to men who were their inferiors? I believe that if a man is an educated man, and has intelligence, he will not object to being an assistant surgeon, even to an inferior, if he has a chance of himself becoming an honorary surgeon.

7698. Mr. Goold.] You have said that there are abuses connected with the out-door dispensary—will you say what they are? You mean outside?

7699. Yes? There is one as to the way in which the papers are given to the patients, and another is as to the class of patients who come there. There are many who should not come. There is another as to a class of patients we are overrun with—I mean the syphilis and gonorrhœa cases; and another is—I do not know whether to call it an abuse of the out-door department, but I know that I never had any replies to any letters which I wrote to the manager of the institution. I think I got one reply, that is all; and when I asked the manager about it, he said that the committee never took any notice of any correspondence with reference to the out-door relief.

7700. Can you, from your experience, suggest any remedies for the abuses that have come under your notice? One is, that any letter sent to the committee by an out-door surgeon should be answered in some way or other—that the surgeon should at least be treated with courtesy. Another suggestion I would make is, that the patients should retain their prescriptions; and another is, that patients who come with certain special diseases should pay a small fee to the institution. I think that is all.

7701. What is your view with regard to the Government giving orders for the admission of patients into the Infirmary—would you recommend the abolition of these Government orders? No, I would not. I have frequently found that it is the only way in which a patient can be got into the Infirmary.

7702. President.] Would it not be better to abolish the system of orders altogether, and throw the hospital open to every one who needed assistance? Certainly; but who is to discriminate as to the urgent cases?

7703. Who discriminates now? Are you to have one person in authority who shall say whether a case shall be admitted or refused?

7704. Suppose the house physician and surgeon should have the power of admitting patients? Yes, I would agree to that.

7705. And the abolition of orders? Yes, under such circumstances I would, but only under such circumstances, because I frequently had to send down myself to the Colonial Secretary's Office when I could not get a patient in, and the order has been given, and the man taken in.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.

CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

Alfred Roberts, Esq., called in and further examined:—

A. Roberts, Esq.

9 July, 1873.

Mr. Roberts: Permit me to hand in two Parliamentary papers of mine. One is a Report upon Country Hospitals, and the other is a Report on the Victoria Barracks at Paddington. (See Appendix L.2.)

7706. President.] We have thought it expedient to recall you in order to have your evidence on some few points that have arisen. Will you tell us, please, what are the essential features of the Nightingale system? Perhaps its essential features are very similar to those carried out here. That is to say, at St. Thomas's Hospital there is a matron, and there are sisters, and there are nurses, and there are probationers, and there are cleaners.

7707. Then, in all essential respects, the system carried out in the Infirmary is the Nightingale system? In form it is similar—quite similar.

7708. What difference, if any, is there between it and the Nightingale system? The difference arises in minor matters of detail. I may mention one for instance—the way in which the sisters here were changed frequently from ward to ward, which is contrary to the system adopted at St. Thomas's; another is, that at St. Thomas's the sisters reside entirely in their rooms off the wards. That could not be carried out here except in the south wing, but it could be carried out there, and there is every facility for its being done—quite as great facilities as there are at St. Thomas's Hospital.

7709. Is there anything else? It is a difficult matter to explain, and I should say that there is a difference, perhaps, and a very material one, and that is the very much greater assumption of dignity on the part of the staff that came up from St. Thomas's to that which occurs at St. Thomas's.

7710. In what way? It is a very difficult thing to explain to a non-professional gentleman, except perhaps by an instance, and—well, I may mention one instance which will show you the principle of what I mean. I remember being called to a consultation there at 12 o'clock at night, to assist my colleague, with the rest of the medical staff, to perform the operation of tracheotomy upon a child, to save its life. It was between 11 and 12 o'clock at night; and the surgeon considered, and we concurred with him, that a nurse should sit up with the child for the rest of the night, to apply sponges and warm water. We sent a message to the Nightingale wing with a request that a nurse should be supplied, and Miss Osburn declined to do so. She was responsible for the nursing of the patients, and she declined it. That would have been impossible at St. Thomas's Hospital. And I need not say any more, because that is the temper and disposition in which the main difference lies.

7711. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are the surgeon's orders imperative on a nurse? The discipline of all the nurses rests with the lady superintendent; but all directions as to what is to be done for each patient must come from the medical attendant, and the nurse must carry them out. The surgeon's request to the matron for any nurse would be complied with instantly.

7712. President.] Though it might disorganize the whole staff? That is quite out of the question. When you have twenty or thirty nurses, any one of whom would have been delighted to get up and sit with the child, there could be no difficulty; but why, in a great emergency, is a nurse not to be put out of a night's rest, when a medical man is liable to be called up any night and lose his night's rest?—

7713. I do not mean that? You used an expression which seemed to imply that.

7714. I meant to what extent was the staff to be disorganized? It could not be disorganized to any extent; but, undoubtedly, to any extent that would be necessary. You see that "though it might disorganize the whole staff," is an outré mode of speech. Disorganization could not exist in the slightest degree.

degree. For instance, the greatest number of accidents I ever saw come into the hospital at any one time was from the breaking of a balcony in King-street. There were six or seven cases brought in, and two or three of them were badly hurt. That might have taken two or three extra nurses during the night, and I never saw any one the worse for it out of the whole staff.

7715. Mr. Ellis.] That was before the present nursing staff came to the Colony? It was.

7716. President.] Were you in the Colony when the English sisters left the Infirmary? Yes, I was. I was a member of the committee which examined into the subject at the time.

7717. You recommended their going, I believe? Yes, I did.

7718. What was the reason of that recommendation? I sat at the Board, at the greatest inconvenience, for many years, with an earnest desire to support Miss Osburn as the chief of her department. Knowing her weak points from the commencement, knowing also her good qualities, and thinking and hoping always that, by tendering her advice when I could; and by supporting her temperately and kindly when I could, as an officer—in point of fact, always having the feeling that, as long as she retained the office she should obtain the full support of the Board, but feeling that a spirit had risen up between some of the sisters who came out with her and herself, I felt that there was only one thing to be done, and that was for the sisters to go. Moreover, I considered that one sister (I do not think that more than one was actually discharged at the time), I considered her conduct to have been extremely insubordinate.

7719. Which one is that? The one who is now in the Benevolent Asylum—Mrs. Blundell—the thin one—the fly-away one. I consider that her conduct was extremely bad. I do not know that we discharged any others, or put it in the form of a dismissal. She was practically dismissed.

7720. Then they were not got rid of upon the ipse dixit of Miss Osburn? Certainly not. A committee sat and took evidence, and came to conclusions upon that evidence.

7721. Were the other sisters of a different class to Mrs. Blundell and the one now remaining in the Infirmary—persons of more education? The one now at Melbourne, and who has been doing fairly well there ever since, was a better educated person, and Sister Bessie, now married to a railway station-master, was of about the same class. The one remaining in the Infirmary is the least educated of the entire staff. The matron at Netley informed me that the one at Melbourne had written Home to have her sister trained, so that she might come and join her, so that I presume she is satisfied.

7722. Mr. Cowper.] Have you known any instances in which nurses have been taken out of the institution to nurse private patients? I only know of one instance, in which the present sister went out to nurse Mrs. Lambton. There was another case of a nurse who went to attend Mrs. Macgregor. They were both cases of ovariectomy.

7723. Have you known of any cases in which medical men have made applications for nurses, and been refused? I do not quite understand.

7724. Have you known any instances of medical men connected with the institution applying for nurses, and being refused? I have an impression on my mind that there were such cases, but I cannot call them individually to my mind.

7725. Was it ever intended that the trained nurses of the Infirmary should go out and nurse private patients? The intention undoubtedly was—and the Nightingale wing was built with that intention—to have an educational staff to work the Infirmary and train nurses, to be supplied out as experienced nurses to country hospitals. That was the original idea; and then there was a secondary one, less clearly marked out, that the nurses were to be let out to private patients in cases of very severe illness. The original design was to supply from the Sydney Infirmary trained nurses to the country hospitals. You asked me just now, Mr. President, the difference between the two systems. I perhaps may say that that which struck me very much, and which I found was deeply impressed on Miss Nightingale's mind, was the absence of a sufficient spirit of concord in the Sydney Infirmary—a sort of breaking up of the family—which distressed her extremely. She seemed to think that the nursing staff should be as much as possible not heard of—or hardly heard of at all—known and loved by the patients, and esteemed by the doctors and the directors; and the excitement that arose, and all this religious turmoil, was most distressing to Miss Nightingale.

7726. Mr. Ellis.] Does she assume that nurses, then, are exempt from the ordinary foibles of ladies? Oh no, but it is the duty of the head of the nursing staff to consider their work of nursing a quiet, tranquil operation, and one from which these disputes must be excluded as much as possible.

7727. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you not think that the committee were chargeable with exciting that feeling, rather than the nurses themselves—some of them disliked her, because, they said, she was a Roman Catholic, and they took the part of some of the nurses against Miss Osburn, was not that it—that is my recollection of it? Yes, I think so.

7728. President.] Were you here during the investigation into that religious matter? Yes, I was.

7729. Did not a great deal of the disorganization of the staff arise from that sort of interference on the part of the committee, of which you complained in your evidence the other day, by which means the sisters got out of their depth and cockered up? I think that the first mistake was made by the lady superintendent assuming the title of lady superior.

7730. Do you know whether she did so under advice? I do not know.

7731. If she did it under advice, do you think that she is to blame? I know that it is contrary to the principles of the Nightingale system. I know that she came out as the lady superintendent, sent out by the Nightingale fund. I know that such a title is contrary to their spirit, and that she did not receive any advice to adopt that name from Mrs. Wardropper or from Miss Nightingale; that is to say, that Miss Nightingale was surprised to hear of it. She had not that title when she arrived here. No doubt she thought she had good reasons for assuming it; but it was a great mistake.

7732. Do you know the circumstances under which she did it? No, I do not pretend to know.

7733. Mr. Ellis.] What was it that led Miss Nightingale to express her deep regret,* as you have stated in your communication to us, at the failure of the nursing staff sent out here? Well, it is impossible for me to give you a definite answer to that question. I did not ask Miss Nightingale what opinion she had formed; but, in conversation with me, she seemed to be aware of the circumstances of the nursing staff of the Sydney Infirmary—she had seen papers and heard of the religious dissensions. 7734.

* NOTE.—Mr. Roberts sent in the following memo. :—

“I wish to add the following to my former evidence upon the nursing department of the Infirmary :—During my investigations in London, I satisfied myself, by practical observation, that the system introduced and carried out by Miss Osburn differs in some material features from the Nightingale system, and in such difference is, in my opinion, much inferior to it. I have the authority of Miss Florence Nightingale for stating that I found her impressed with a feeling of the deepest disappointment in the results attained by the staff sent to Sydney, which she appeared to consider as the nearest approach to failure which their establishment had received.”

- A. Roberts, Esq.
7734. Yes, I can understand that, but I want to know whether she gave you to understand that she knew of anything particularly as to the nursing here being a failure, because I do not regard the squabbling of some ladies as anything affecting the character of the nursing? I can tell you nothing nearer than that—that I found Miss Nightingale impressed with a feeling of regret that there should be such a want of concord among the nurses here. She asked me to go and see her, and upon my going to her I found her to be impressed with the fact mentioned in the memorandum which I have sent to you.
7735. What fact? She was, as I have said, “impressed with a feeling of the deepest disappointment in the results attained by the staff sent to Sydney, which she appeared to consider as the nearest approach to failure which their establishment had received.” I presume that she had sufficient information to satisfy her mind on the fact,—that she was not satisfied, as I have said, with the results here.
7736. Have you any idea why she was not satisfied? That would lead me into a personal discussion—too personal a discussion.
7737. Was it because the nursing of the patients was not fairly attended to? She considered that the whole thing was in the highest degree unsatisfactory.
7738. Did she give any reason for it—How long were you in conversation with her? About two hours.
7739. You were talking to her for two hours, and surely she would have given some reason for the belief she expressed? Yes, I— Well—
7740. Mr. Metcalfe.] Upon what evidence did she say that she came to this conclusion? —
7741. Mr. Ellis.] That is just what I want to know, or that is what I want to get out. It appears that Miss Nightingale, lying sick in bed, stated this, and I want to know did she say why she stated it. She might have been misinformed for anything we know to the contrary? I remember one expression of hers, which was —; well, I do not like to mention one thing without another.
7742. We may as well have all the facts that you can give us. Did you give her any impression as to the state of matters? I gave her my own impressions afterwards undoubtedly.
7743. Were your impressions for or against the nursing staff? They were decidedly against Miss Osburn’s tact and judgment.
7744. What did you complain of—did you complain of the assumption of dignity shown by her not allowing you a nurse—which after all is not much of an assumption? It is an extremely difficult thing to deal with in this way. You ask me “what did I complain of”—immediately making the assumption that I complained. I complained of nothing to Miss Nightingale. My conversation with Miss Nightingale was a conversation between two persons who were deeply interested in the development of good nursing; and, for my own part, I am certainly one of the parties who more than any one else have sacrificed time and everything else to helping that end; and in conversation with her—it was a question of, as it were, interchanges of thought and opinions, regrets in some cases, pitying others in others, and I think with the kindest spirit in all; but certainly not any complaint.
7745. What were her reasons for saying that you had her authority for stating that she was “impressed with a feeling of the deepest disappointment in the results attained by the staff sent to Sydney, which she appeared to consider as the nearest approach to failure their establishment had received”? She did not give any reasons. Her authority came in this way:—As I was going away I said—“Now, Miss Nightingale, a good deal that I have seen at St. Thomas’s, and some things I have heard even from you, have astonished me a good deal. I cannot say, I am sure, what I may find in Sydney; but I should like to know, if it is necessary—if at any time circumstances should arise that make it appear to me desirable to mention any part of your conversation—should you have any objection to my doing so?” Her words were—“Anything and everything are at your command.”
7746. That is what I want you to tell us—what was it she said? Quite so; but it is difficult for me to give you points of a conversation of that character that extended over several hours.
7747. But you have made a general statement without giving any reasons for it—you say that Miss Nightingale expressed deep regret at the failure of her system here. Now, I want to know in what respect it was a failure; because even the opinion of Miss Nightingale herself, if it were unsupported by any facts, I would receive with a lawyer-like reserve? Well, I take it differently, because I think she was simply anxious for success, and it was to her simply a matter of disappointment. One question which was discussed between us was the title of “lady superior,” which she strongly objected to. Another point I was alluding to just now, which I cannot recollect her words upon, because I did not fully understand her feeling. She said—“What grieves me so much is that Miss Osburn should have allowed her staff to fall away.” She did not use the term that “she did not mother them”; but the impression on my mind was that they went away under her, and that she should have managed at all risks to have held them together.
7748. By their “falling away,” do you mean that they fell off in skill, or simply separated? That, in the first place, a want of care had crept in, and, as I gathered, she thought that there was some mismanagement from that. I did not go into a discussion as to what her reasons were, but that was one of the things mentioned.
7749. But she could scarcely look upon a little disagreement among ladies as the downfall of her system? But some of those terrible papers went Home to her, you know.
7750. Mr. Cowper.] It is possible that she was prejudiced then? I can tell you that Miss Nightingale said that Miss Osburn worked under her very industriously to learn the practical duties of a nurse.
7751. Mr. Ellis.] Do I understand you generally that this expression of regret had reference rather to disagreements between these ladies than to any intrinsic failure? That is just what I wish to avoid. By trying to recollect one or two points in a two hours’ conversation I have led you to suppose that these are the reasons, whereas we did not go into actual reasons at all.
7752. But give us the facts, and let us judge for ourselves? Quite so: but does it not occur to you that Miss Nightingale would not give an opinion that was not well founded—that she would not judge loosely of her own system?
7753. But you give us the result of her judgment, which is highly unfavourable? But she does not sit as you do, as judges.
7754. But she gives an opinion which will bear rather hardly upon a lady when it goes into print, and I would urge you to give the reasons for that opinion if you can? I cannot, but I really feel rather vexed that I have attempted to mention any of her supposed reasons.
7755. That can’t be helped. If you say you cannot give any reasons, there is an end of the matter? I cannot, and I strongly object to the one or two reasons I have given being taken as the only ones.
7756. Then you cannot give any reasons? No, I cannot.

7757. You say that Miss Nightingale's opinion is that it is the nearest approach to a failure that her system has yet received? Yes.

7758. And that in the course of a two hours' conversation with you, she gave no reasons for coming to that opinion? My two hours' conversation, if you please, was of a strictly conversational character—a conversation in which I did not ask for any reasons—it was strictly conversation.

7759. But then I understand that you asked her permission to make use of any statement of hers, if you thought it desirable to do so? Exactly.

7760. And then you give us a statement that she disapproved of the conduct of the nursing staff here, and you give no reasons why she did? I said that she regretted the state of things here.

7761. Ladies are often subject to regrets without much reason in them? If you write to Miss Nightingale I have no doubt that she will give you her reasons, but I really cannot give them.

7762. Well, I only want to get at the facts—I do not want to get any evidence either in favour of, or against Miss Osburn;—I never saw the lady until she was examined here, but I am anxious to get the full truth in reference to any statement of this kind? I do not think you will get the full truth by taking down any points that I can call to mind.

7763. Mr. Metcalfe.] I am afraid that all we have taken down will, without explanation, be very damaging to Miss Osburn? My reason for writing that memo. was, that I thought it much better that it should be stated, rather than that the character of modern nursing should suffer.

7764. Mr. Ellis.] In what respect is the nursing defective then? If you ask for my reasons for thinking so, you will get them directly.

7765. We want Miss Nightingale's reasons? I cannot give them.

7766. You give her opinions then in the interests of nursing, but you do not give us any information that we can make use of in the interests of nursing, that is what we want? It would be utterly impossible for me to do so.

7767. I think, with all due respect for a lady of Miss Nightingale's high position, it is a good deal to say that she disapproves of a system, but gives no reason for such disapproval—that is an assumption of dignity which is much greater than that of a nurse refusing to attend a patient? If she were here, she would doubtless give them to you.

7768. President.] Why, may I ask, having been examined twice before the Commission, and asked many questions relating to the nursing here, and taking the interest you have always done in the nursing system, did you not state all this before? If you will look at my evidence, I think that you will see that I have been actuated by a desire to convey a similar opinion, without saying anything more distressing to Miss Osburn than I could avoid saying.

7769. Mr. Ellis.] Your opinion was so very favourable that I was rather staggered when that memorandum came in? When I came to read over my evidence carefully, and consider the question, I came to the conclusion that I had hardly fulfilled my duty, and I felt therefore that it was but right to make the addendum which I did make.

7770. Mr. Goold.] Looking at the importance of this inquiry, in regard to an important institution, ought any feeling, such as you allude to, have actuated you;—should we not have the fullest information with regard to all the officers, high or low? Certainly.

7771. President.] I want to know why it was that you did not state all this before, because it is of the utmost importance? I think if you will refer to those remarks upon nursing which I read —

7772. Mr. Ellis.] They set out certain amiabilities that you thought should characterize nurses, but they did not point out any defects? No, not to those who are not aware that defects exist.

7773. Mr. Goold.] I was going to ask Dr. Roberts to give us his view of the general system of nursing as it is now carried on in the Infirmary? I have not seen sufficient of it within the last twelve months. I cannot speak of it.

7774. So far as you have seen it, then? I cannot speak of it. To be able to speak of nursing, you must be frequently in the wards.

7775. Mr. Ellis.] In answer to a question from me, you said that the present nursing system had done a great deal of good, and was a great improvement? Yes, I quite think so. If you go on further, you will find in another answer to the question—"Do you approve of the Nightingale system?"—I said, "Yes, if it is faithfully carried out."

7776. There was a question put by Mr. Goold—"Is it true that, as a rule, the Nightingale system has failed in England?" and you say—"No, upon the whole, it has been a success. You will find medical men in London, and in the country, who will object to it, and that has arisen from the fact that there are some lady superintendents who have taken too much upon themselves."? Yes, in some cases.

7777. In fact, it would be hard for doctors and lady superintendents who take too much upon themselves to go on together, as, from evidence we have had, the doctors seem to think that there should be no authority but theirs in the institution? You are merely speaking of the evidence of certain doctors?

7778. Yes? —

7779. Mr. Goold.] You were connected with the Infirmary before you went to England? Yes, for nearly twenty years.

7780. And from your knowledge of the nursing system since Miss Osburn has been there, what opinion have you formed of the working of the system? I do not think that in some respects her system has differed from the Nightingale system, as I found it carried out in St. Thomas's Hospital. It has been a great improvement on the system which was adopted here before, and conducted by a lady who I am sure is very talented and highly conscientious, but who has views of her own, with regard to nursing, beyond those of the Nightingale system, and has endeavoured to carry out those views, and not been always judicious in carrying them out.

7781. President.] What are those views? The assumption of a position which is not taken under the Nightingale system by any officers.

7782. Is that the difference to which you have alluded as existing here, as compared with the system in England? Yes, to a certain extent.

7783. What other differences are there? The changing of the sisters I have referred to. The others are—I should like to be very explicit indeed, but it is so very difficult, and it is a question of a matter of detail—when they first arrived, there was a great assumption of power by the lady superintendent.

A. Roberts,
Esq.

9 July, 1873.

A. Roberts, Esq. 7785. Mr. Metcalfe.] Was it not necessary, from the state in which she found things? No, not in the slightest degree; I think it depends entirely on her temperament.

7786. Mr. Goold.] You said just now that you would like to be explicit? I did.

9 July, 1873.

7787. I think that it is necessary you should. I regard this as a most important inquiry, and I do not think that private individuals should be considered when the interests of the Infirmary are at stake; and if there is anything in regard to Miss Osburn's management that you can tell us, we ought to know it? —

7788. President.] I am sure that it is the wish of the Commission that every inquiry should be made, and that no one should be shielded, but if there is a charge to be made it should be made clearly and distinctly? Well then—but I do not wish this taken down —

7789. Pardon me; I think it should go down? It is not with reference to Miss Osburn.

7790. It should go down, no matter to whom it has reference? I should prefer to give my opinion, and if it is of no value there let it rest; it is not my part to attempt to rake up old matters—little matters of detail—which is the only way of proving things—and it does not seem to me to be required. For instance, the only way in which I could prove it would be by mentioning a host of little matters, each comparatively small in itself, and the exact circumstances of which I may have forgotten, and which it would be very unpleasant to rake up.

7791. Mr. Ellis.] I understand that what Mr. Goold asks for, and what I would certainly like to have, are some specific charges against the management of the institution. If you have none to make, of course we have no wish to bother you; and I pressed you so hard, I tell you candidly, under the impression that you had in your own mind certain facts which you would disclose if you were pressed to do so; therefore I tried so hard to get an answer about Miss Nightingale's reasons? I cannot say any more about Miss Nightingale's conversation with me. I am sure that she would be happy to communicate with you; but with respect to the fault—if I may speak of it as a fault—I look upon the failure of Miss Osburn to arise from the natural disqualifications of mind that she possesses, which unfit her for the peculiar duties of a lady superintendent in these Colonies.

7792. What are those disqualifications? She is extremely talented and conscientious, but ambitious.

7793. Ambitious of what? Well, ambitious—that is the best term.

7794. She must have a rather small ambition to stop where she is, I think? No one can be more anxious for the success of the nursing system, but she has a natural ambition, a spirit which has led her to make small hot water for herself, if I may use the term.

7795. In what way? A great many ways.

7796. Tell us some of them. Do you mean in the way of disagreements with the doctors or the patients—there are many doctors who are rather queer-tempered? I have no doubt there are other people too who have queer tempers.

7797. Then we come back again to the question of her peculiarities, and we should like to know what they are? Ambition, I think. That is shown in her assumption of the title of lady superior.

7798. But she has divested herself of that title? Yes. Another was, that when she first arrived, I remember quite well that the sisters did not always go round with the surgeons, and at that time (and for many years afterwards) I for one took the deepest interest in them, and spoke to Miss Osburn about the sisters going round with the surgeons, and it was not considered necessary, and she mentioned it as unnecessary in the hospitals.

7799. What was unnecessary? The sisters going round with the surgeons—that is one of the first duties of a sister, according to the Nightingale system.

7800. What has that to do with ambition? It has this to do with it. Hers is not a selfish ambition; she is a most self-sacrificing woman; it was an ambition for the sisters to take a position above that which exists in St. Thomas's Hospital, and which is a desirable position.

7801. I think that you were one of the principal gentlemen who brought up a report after the sisters' arrival, in which you entirely approved of the system here? Yes. You will find that during the whole time I was at the hospital I was the warm supporter and friend of the system and (not blindly) of Miss Osburn. I was always telling her where I thought she could make improvements —

7802. You call Miss Osburn "lady superintendent" in that report? I think I have always called her "lady superintendent."

7803. Assuming that she is ambitious, what are the other defects of character which unfit her for her position? Well, you will allow me to say that —

7804. I want to put you in the position of an accuser? Well, I am not an accuser.

7805. President.] And I want to put you in the position of a witness, and get from you facts upon which we may judge of her fitness? Exactly. Well, for instance, when I used the term "ambition," it was ambition for her sisters as much as for herself. She has the same ambition for her nurses, and it carries her to excesses; but I am quite sure that she conceives that in doing this she is carrying out a better scheme—that her modification, such as she has adopted, is better than the Nightingale system.

7806. Do you mean to say that the sisters do not go round with the doctors now? I have not hinted at such a thing.

7807. Then what are the modifications of the system that she has introduced? I say that there were modifications.

7808. And you said something about the sisters not going round with the surgeons? It was altered, of course, at once.

7809. Then what are the modifications? Whatever are Miss Osburn's faults, I think she possesses a too ambitious mind (not using the term in a bad sense); still, the kind of ambition that she possesses has tended to injure the nursing staff in its practical bearings, and has not led to a proper economy.

7810. Mr. Ellis.] I suppose you mean that there was a certain kind of feminine rising-up against the doctors? Well, it is a strange thing for me to be placed in this position. Here have I been working for Miss Osburn and this confounded staff for many years, and here am I now placed in the position of an accuser.

7811. Your memorandum places you in that position. We thought that you had something to say to us from Miss Nightingale as to the system being a failure; of course, if you have not, we do not wish to misunderstand you? I have nothing to say unkind of Miss Osburn, of whom I have a very high opinion; but nevertheless I think she has failed.

7812. President.] Were you of that opinion before you went to England? I was.

7813. What then was the reason that you retained her in the institution and dismissed the sisters, the alternative being that one or the other must go? That was some time before.

7814. Did not these disagreements you spoke of take place before the sisters left? Yes. 7815.

7815. And was not Miss Nightingale's regret mentioned with regard to this want of concord amongst the staff? I have no doubt, very often.

7816. Was not that the failure that she spoke of? That who spoke of?

7817. That you and Miss Nightingale spoke of? I do not quite —

7818. Was not the want of concord that of which Miss Nightingale complained, and which led her to speak of the failure of the system? I cannot say.

7819. Was not that the only reason she mentioned? That is what I object to—I have not pretended to give Miss Nightingale's reasons.

7820. But if we are to condemn Miss Osburn upon her opinion, we want her reasons for that opinion? I cannot give them.

7821. Then do you think that the opinion is of any value? It is of high value, in my opinion.

7822. Though Miss Nightingale may have been totally misinformed when she gave it? I think it of value—my opinion of her is so high.

7823. Do you not think that a person should ascertain the facts before giving any opinion? When I entertain an opinion of a person so high as I do of Miss Nightingale, I have no doubt that that person has satisfied herself before forming a judgment.

7824. Mr. Ellis.] You are a great friend of Miss Osburn's, and you consider that she has failed? I do.

7825. Tell us in what respect, putting aside her ambition? I may tell you that, in my opinion, I consider that a lady with more quiet tact —

7826. Is she noisy? Pardon me. A lady with more quiet tact would not have had the same amount of discord in her original staff. At the same time, I am quite certain—for I know it for a fact—that the members of her staff behaved ultimately most abominably to her. My impression, however, is that with more quiet tact on her part the discord would not have crept in; but the result was the abominable behaviour on the part of one or two sisters, and those I recommended should not be re-engaged.

7827. President.] One of them was Mrs. Blundell? Yes.

7828. Mr. Ellis.] You stated one disqualification of Miss Osburn's to be a want of quiet tact? Yes.

7829. Give us the others, if you please? In the next place, I think that she has not been judicious—I use the word in its kindest sense; I am not here to speak harshly—I do not think she has been judicious. It is from her natural character—no fault that she can remedy—in her general management of the place; in her management of the medical officers—when I say management—there is a good deal to manage —

7830. I should say that it was very hard to manage them? Or in the management of her subordinates generally; but I do not wish any further meaning attached to my words. I simply mean that she has not been at all times judicious as some women might be. I do not wish to say anything more than that. I would like to have perfection, as nearly as possible, in the place, and was very anxious for the success of the system.

7831. There are two defects, then,—want of tact and want of judiciousness? Then a want of general tidiness. I am not speaking of personal tidiness, but about the hospital.

7832. To what time does that apply? I am speaking of it during my residence there; and in my walks through the hospital now to consultations I see the same want of general tidiness there.

7833. Could you say in what this was apparent? I saw clothes lying about, piles of brooms in corners; the sort of things you do not see in a well-organized hospital.

7834. Brooms in corners—how many? Four or five brooms, and some boxes and other things which collect dust; clothes hanging on the back verandahs, and beds lying about.

7835. Where would the beds be lying about? On the verandahs.

7836. Were they not put out there to air? Most likely.

7837. Would that be injudicious? In the middle of the day.

7838. Where would you put them? I would probably have a place put up to air them in properly—not have them in the verandah.

7839. President.] And you think that the responsibility of not having a building put up rests with her? I think that any reasonable request of that kind made to the committee would be acceded to.

7840. Mr. Ellis.] Of what other defects do you complain? You still have put your question rather unfavourably to me.

7841. I really mean it? Then I cannot answer it.

7842. I want to be frank? And I want to be frank, and I have not a complaint to make.

7843. Then I will not press you any more? I am willing to say everything I can, but I am not here to say things more unkindly than I can possibly help. You ask me what other unsatisfactory points I have noticed. I can remember instances in which we have had—(and this only shows the spirit, and I do not trace this to Miss Osburn directly, it shows the spirit that existed)—I have seen the surgeons wait from 3 until half-past 3, before a sister came and had the operating theatre got ready; and when the reason was asked, it was said that it had not been reported to the sister officially. There was no doubt at all about her knowing it, but because the fact was not mentioned in the proper formal way the room was not got ready.

7844. Would it not be proper that a formal notice should be given? Three or four surgeons had to wait half an hour because the room was not ready.

7845. Would it not be right to give notice? Yes; but I cannot conceive any spirit worse than that, or a spirit more antagonistic to that of a well-nursed hospital at Home. If such a spirit as that creeps in, you can never have peace. It is one of those things which show that the arrow has flown a little wrong.

7846. Mr. Ellis.] Suppose that the doctors go in there and find the nurse not ready to attend them, which is very probable, for they appear to tumble in there just when it suits themselves,—they are most irregular in their attendance? I am speaking of a time when their attendance was regular.

7847. We do not want references to the past? You were asking me what was wrong in the management of the place.

7848. Yes, we want to remedy what is wrong in the present state of affairs? We were going back to Miss Osburn, if you please.

7849. President.] With reference to Miss Osburn's having been the moving spirit that brought about this discord in the place? I cannot allow such words to be put into my mouth, and I strongly object to it. I did not say anything of the kind.

7850. I understood you to say that if Miss Osburn had had more quiet tact, this spirit of disorder and disagreement might not have grown up? Yes, I did.

7851. Supposing that the evidence before us from all the sisters in the Infirmary, and all the nurses, is to the effect that they are all working harmoniously together, and that it is only in consequence of the spirit of unity that animates them that they could get on in the place, considering its bad management in other respects, does that not show that the disorder which arose in the first instance must have originated with those people who came from England—the nursing staff who came out with Miss Osburn—or that Miss Osburn has changed her disposition since you formed your opinion? It is quite likely. One of the sisters who came out with Miss Osburn, and who she was most anxious to have, Mrs. Wardropper cautioned her against her (I am speaking on information received from Miss Nightingale, and I believe it was Mrs. Wardropper who cautioned her against this one). The sisters were generally selected, and Miss Osburn was consulted about them, and there was one she was particularly anxious to have. That was sister Haldane—the one who went to Melbourne. Miss Osburn thought she could manage her, and brought her out; and she was the very one, I am inclined to think, who led the van of antagonism to Miss Osburn. That shows the difficulties she had to contend with.

7852. Do you think that we should judge by the state of things now, rather than by what we hear of a state of things that has passed away? I should like to judge rather of things as they are at present.

7853. And if the medical men who are in attendance at the Infirmary speak favourably of her, and if the nursing staff act harmoniously together, we should judge of that rather than things of years ago? Yes, undoubtedly, and I should feel that Miss Osburn was one of those persons who, having made some mistakes, yet by reason of her great energy of mind was enabled to use her experiences and become a most valuable officer.

7854. Mr. Goold.] You spoke of the abominable conduct of those who have left the institution. Some of those persons are occupying positions in the Colony, and unless there is some explanation of what you have said, it may be injurious to them? That is just one of the evils of an examination like this.

7855. From what you have said, I gather that there was blame on both sides? I do not believe that anything would justify what occurred with one or two of those sisters. I do not think anything would justify such behaviour from a subordinate to a superior. I speak of abominable conduct as the conduct of a subordinate to a superior.

7856. If there has been an assumption of power on the part of Miss Osburn (which from your statements we are led to conclude there has been), may not that have had something to do with it? When I used the word "assumption," I meant a sort of passive general influence in her character. I do not mean that she said disagreeable things to any one sister; I cannot say; I think not; she is too much of a lady to do it; but I say that, in regard to the sisters, it was more a want of that quiet tact which some women possess in a greater degree, in my judgment, than she does.

7857. On the whole, from what you have seen, are you satisfied with the state of things as they exist now in the Infirmary? I have not examined them sufficiently, but I have asked one or two persons; one, a very intelligent surgeon, recently appointed, Dr. Mackellar, said the nursing was very good indeed, and I quite accept his judgment, as that of a gentleman who has just gone in, and it will be one of my greatest pleasures to write to Miss Nightingale informing her of the fact; but there has been a great amount of change in the hospital, and I think that there has been a very great amount of annoyance, and so on; but all that has passed away, and the experience that has been gained will help all parties—the directors want it quite as much as any one else—and it will help all parties to lead a more tranquil life.

7858. President.] Do you think that the manager is fitted for his position—has he been a success? I heard something the other day—I should not have given a favourable answer if you had asked me that question a few days ago; but I hear from a gentleman who lived in the house some time, and whom I know to be an observant man, that he was much misjudged, and a very honest, hard-working man.

7859. No one has impugned his honesty or said that he was lazy? No.

7860. Have you not formed any opinion about him—you have expressed yourself freely about Miss Osburn? My opinion of Mr. Blackstone was that he was an amiable, kind-hearted gentleman, unfitted by education for his position—utterly unfitted by education and training, for the position he was called upon to fulfil.

7861. Mr. Cowper.] Do you know of any person in the Colony more fitted than Miss Osburn for the position that she holds? Oh no.

7862. Do you not think that if we sent to England for a person, we should get one with as many or more faults than she has? If you have evidence such as the President tells me you have, I strongly advise you to keep her. She is extremely talented, extremely ambitious for the welfare of her staff, and her ambition will now carry her true to the mark. She is a lady of great zeal.

7864. That would alter the state of things, because there is collision now between the two officers? There must be one head. There has been a great deal of talk and some little misunderstanding, but if the Commission could go up to Gladesville, and walk into the matron's department there—she is a little, thin, quiet woman, who manages 250 lunatics and their attendants, and has a much greater responsibility—you would see the absolute quiet way in which everything is managed there. You hardly hear this woman's voice; as for thinking of discharging a nurse, she would shrink from such a thing, but none the less report her for disobedience. That would show what I mean.

7865. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not think that she is relieved from responsibility by having such a man as Dr. Manning over her? No; she was there before him, and her management was just as good. No doubt he definitely understands his position, and she understands hers; but she is not relieved, because he keeps her up to her responsibility.

7866. President.] You lent us a pamphlet on pauperism in New South Wales, in which you say that the proportion of persons receiving relief in England is 1 in 187, and in New South Wales 1 in 176? Yes.

7867. Those figures you verified yourself? Yes; I took them from the Census.

7868. Mr. Goold.] In that pamphlet you do not particularly allude to intemperance as one of the causes of pauperism? No, I did not; I was wrong in that.

7869. President.] Is there any other suggestion you wish to make with regard to the Infirmary? No, I think not.

THURSDAY, 31 JULY, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.
MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.
CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

Henry Halloran, Esq., Principal Under Secretary, called in and examined:—

7870. President.] You are the Principal Under Secretary? Yes.

7871. You have occupied that position for many years, and you were in office in 1866? Yes.

7872. Do you remember, some time in the course of the year 1866, the case of a man named Gibson coming under the notice of the public, with reference to some complaints which were then made as to the nursing system in the Sydney Infirmary? Yes, perfectly well. The complaint was made by Mr. Flood to the Colonial Secretary.

7873. Who was in office at the time? The Martin-Parkes Administration.

7874. Sir James Martin was Premier and Mr. Parkes was Colonial Secretary? Yes.

7875. Are you sufficiently acquainted with the facts to tell us whether this complaint did not originate a correspondence which took place between the Colonial Secretary and the authorities of the Sydney Infirmary which resulted in the Government sending Home to Miss Nightingale for a nursing staff to carry on her system of nursing here? It did. A communication was made to Mr. E. Deas Thomson, by the Colonial Secretary.

7876. In consequence of the complaints which were made? Yes.

7877. The public complaints? Yes.

H. Halloran,
Esq., P.U.S.

31 July, 1873.

Miss Lucy Osburn, Lady Superintendent, Sydney Infirmary, called in and further examined:—

7879. His first statement was that the system differed "materially"—Do you concur in that? Certainly not. Certainly the sisters have been changed here, because we have no old settled sisters as they have in St. Thomas's Hospital. There, in several cases—I think in three cases—the sisters were people who had been in their wards for twenty or five and twenty years, and I do not know that they had ever been in any other wards; but the idea was, when I first came here, that I was to train people to undertake any kind of nursing at all, and so I found that it was absolutely necessary to put them in the male medical wards, and the female medical wards, and the male surgical wards, and the female surgical wards. They must know all the four kinds of nursing, or they cannot properly undertake the control of a hospital, however small, for they are sure to have in it cases of all kinds.

7880. Then, so far as your practice here has been a departure from the practice at St. Thomas's Hospital, it has been so from a desire on your part to meet the requirements of the Colony? Yes; and I may add, it is the same with the newer sisters in St. Thomas's Hospital—they are changed in the same way. The old ones were there before Miss Nightingale went to the East—before she was heard of in connection with nursing—and I suppose they were people picked out for their experience or good qualities to take charge of certain wards, and were never changed again so long as they did their duty; but Miss Nightingale's idea was that every sister should know how to nurse every case, and so her new people were—changed about sufficiently to give them an insight into all the work.

7881. Do you think it would be ever possible to get people to remain so long in one ward here? I do not think so. They are always glad of a little change. I generally keep a sister at least a year in one set of wards, but usually they are very glad when there is a change coming, to give them practice in another department.

7882. One of the witnesses has said that those sisters who came out with you from England had no knowledge in some branches of nursing: would that be at all accounted for by their being kept in one ward in St. Thomas's? They were not sisters at all in St. Thomas's—they were only probationers, and some were scarcely long enough in some of the departments. In female surgical nursing they were very deficient, with one exception.

7883. With respect to the changing of the nurses, did I understand from your evidence that all the nurses were changed once in three months, or that only a portion of them were changed? Only a portion—five or six are taken off for night duty. In St. Thomas's there is no necessity for that change, because there they have permanent night nurses, who are generally old women unfit for any other duty,—women who are willing to devote their lives to it, and who are always on night duty.

7884. Do they do nothing but night nursing? Yes. I think the oldest of them there—"old Nighty" we called her—told me that she had been eighteen years a night nurse.

7885. A night nurse for eighteen years—always asleep in the day-time and up at night? Yes.

7886. Would it be possible, do you think, to get people to do that here? No; I tried it, and found that it was impossible to get them.

7887. Labour is too valuable here for people to devote themselves to labour of that kind? Yes; they tire of it. They cannot get out in the day-time, and they have no pleasure in life, and I think that three months is quite as long as a woman can do night duty and do her work well.

7888. Then the fact is that you cannot get night nurses, and therefore you are obliged to take day nurses to do night work occasionally, and this arises from the difficulty of obtaining all sorts of labour here? Yes, I cannot obtain permanent night nurses here at all.

Miss L.

7889. Is it part of your idea of the system that there should be a night sister here as well as day sisters? Yes; that Miss Nightingale recommended herself—either that I should have an experienced nurse over the nurses at night, or a night sister; and it has always been my aim and wish to have a sister to superintend the whole of the hospital at night; I have one of the old nurses at present.

7890. Another charge that is made is that in St. Thomas's Hospital the sisters reside entirely in the wards, while here they do not. Mr. Roberts says that it could not be done in the old building, but that there is every facility for doing it in the south wing,—that the facilities there are as great as they are in St. Thomas's Hospital: is that so? That certainly is not the case. I think that you have seen the rooms in the south wing. They are about fourteen feet square, and look upon a dead blank wall; and if I were to put beds and chests of drawers in them I do not see where the doctors could operate. The lower ones are for eye cases—the eye cases are all examined there, both male and female.

7891. These rooms then are used as operation-rooms as well? Yes; one is fitted up with blinds and so on, for the eye cases; and in the upper room there is a proper operating-table; and of course the surgeons need a great many bottles and instruments which have to be kept in the room, and we have cupboards for them, there being no other operating-room for female cases.

7892. Are the sisters' rooms in St. Thomas's used for such purposes? Oh no, they have beautiful large rooms. The life of a sister is a dull, lonely life, but they have there fine large rooms with a pretty look out upon the Surrey Gardens and the Lake; but these rooms look out upon a dead blank wall, a few feet off.

7893. Then you do not agree with Mr. Roberts, that the facilities for providing the nurses with sleeping accommodation, in the south wing here, are quite as great as are the facilities in St. Thomas's Hospital? Most certainly not. The rooms there are very large, high, handsome rooms.

7894. Can you give us an idea as to how large they were? Quite as large as this room—wider I think—they are octagon-shaped rooms, so that it is difficult to compare the dimensions.

7895. In the main building here there are no facilities at all, so that it could not be done there? There are no rooms at all; so that however it was managed, there would be only two sisters living in the wards.

7896. And you would not have a uniformity of system? No; it would be impossible.

7897. If you had a night sister, according to your own idea, would there be any necessity to have a day sister living in the south wing? No. I spoke to Miss Nightingale on the subject, and she said it would be a better plan to have all the nurses in the Nightingale wing; that they would be more under my control, and that they would be more united if I had them in a building with myself.

7898. As you have them now? Yes.

7899. Your idea being to have a night sister? Yes.

7900. In point of fact, what has been done here has been done after consultation with Miss Nightingale on that point? Yes. I consulted with her several times about it, because I understood that there were no facilities here for accommodating the nurses, and that this house (the Nightingale wing) was then being built for them; and then it became a question whether the sisters should inhabit the Nightingale wing or not, and Miss Nightingale quite approved of their doing so; but it did not alter the system in the least that I know of.

7901. As an instance of the difference between the system here as carried out by you and that existing in St. Thomas's Hospital, Mr. Roberts has mentioned a case of tracheotomy, in which he says that you declined to supply a nurse on one occasion when he had been called up between 11 and 12 at night, to attend to a child; that it was necessary that a nurse should sit up with the child, and that you declined to supply one. I will read you the evidence he gives on the point. He says: "I remember being called to a consultation there at 12 o'clock at night, to assist my colleague, with the rest of the medical staff, to perform the operation of tracheotomy upon a child to save its life. It was between 11 and 12 o'clock at night, and the surgeon considered, and we concurred with him, that a nurse should sit up with the child for the rest of the night, to apply sponges and warm water. We sent a message to the Nightingale wing, with a request that a nurse should be supplied, and Miss Osburn declined to do so. She was responsible for the nursing of the patients, and she declined it. That would have been impossible at St. Thomas's Hospital." Do you remember that case? I remember the case quite well. It happened soon after we came here. They asked for a day nurse, and there was an extra night nurse on at the time. The night sister came over to me and said that Dr. Roberts wished a day nurse to be sent to this case. I told her that she had better take the extra night nurse and put her on the case; because it is always refused at Home to allow a day nurse to get up and do night nursing. I have been myself very severely reprimanded for offering to sit up and do night duty, being on day duty at the time.

7902. By whom? By Mrs. Wardropper. You see that I was very short of nurses at the time, and could only just get the day work done (we were very little known then, and there were very few applicants, and thus we had great difficulty in getting through the work), and if I took a woman who had been at work all day and put her on at night, and then expected her to do day work the next day, that would be altogether too much—it would be impossible.

7903. There was an extra night nurse on at the time this application was made to you? Yes, there was. I told sister Annie how to arrange it—she was the sister who was on duty at the time. She came to my room, and I was putting on my things to go and see the case, and she said—"Oh, you need not trouble now—the child is all right; I will do as you tell me." She went away, and I did not go across to see what took place, but I think it is probable that she may have said, when she got across, to Mr. Roberts, "Oh, the lady superintendent will not send you a nurse—you must manage without one." The sisters were not very good or loyal then.

7904. Had this want of harmony in the hospital sprung up then? Oh yes. They were extremely jealous of each other. Sister Annie thought that I had behaved badly in not suspending another sister because they had quarrelled. She blamed me very much; but I told her that I could not enter into their quarrels—they must make them up in some way; and she was much offended at that.

7905. Did anything take place between you and Mr. Roberts about this afterwards? Yes, I heard from Mr. Manning that Mr. Roberts had mentioned it, and was very much displeased about it; so, as soon as I had an opportunity, I told Mr. Roberts exactly the arrangement I made, and he told me afterwards that he had inquired and found out that it was a perfectly right arrangement, and he was quite satisfied. I did not expect that he would bring up that case again.

Miss L.
Osburn.

7906. Then you do not concur with this statement of Dr. Roberts—that such a thing would be impossible at St. Thomas's Hospital? It is quite untrue to say so, because it would certainly be refused. They are not permitted there to ask for day nurses to do night duty. If that were allowed, whenever a doctor had an interesting case he would say "I must have a day nurse to sit up with this case"; and if it were allowed to one it would have to be allowed to all. 31 July, 1873.

7907. If you allowed the privilege to one you must to another? Yes.

7908. You say that you have yourself been reprimanded for having offered to do such a thing? I have been; and in that case Mrs. Wardropper herself arranged with the night nurses to take charge of the case without any extra assistance.

7909. Mr. Roberts has given us to understand that you have objected to the sisters going round the wards with the medical men—that you seemed to think their doing so a matter of no importance? Does he mean with the honoraries, or with the resident medical men?

7910. I understood him to mean with the honoraries, but he did not draw any distinction—say with any doctor who came in and went round to look at his patients? I have never heard of such a complaint. It is not the case at all. I am most particular that not only the sister but the nurse should be in attendance with every doctor when he goes round the wards.

7911. You think that it is necessary then? Most decidedly I do. The sister would be of no use unless she did so.

7912. Do you recollect anything having occurred which might give him the impression under which he appears to have made this statement? I recollect his complaining about the sisters not going to him directly he went into the wards, and I made inquiries and found that the sister was with another surgeon at the time, and would have had to leave him if she had attended Dr. Roberts. I explained the matter to him, and he seemed to think that the sister should go to him, no matter whom she was with. I said then that I was very sorry, but we were obliged to treat them all on an equality, and that whoever came in first must be attended to first.

7913. Is that the regulation—do you instruct the nurses not to show favouritism to the doctors? Yes. They are never allowed to pick and choose a doctor in any way. I should think it a breach of discipline if they did.

7914. But he seemed to think that he should be attended, and that other doctors should be left in order that the sister might attend him? Yes, I thought so at the time.

7915. That is the only thing you can recollect as having occurred which could have given him the impression that the sisters did not go round with the doctors? I am sure that it is the only thing that he could have taken that opinion from, because I have been so particular about the matter. The nurses have got a little lazy sometimes, and when they have had work to do they have been disinclined to leave it to go round with the doctors; but whenever I have seen such a disposition I have corrected it. I have spoken about it frequently. It is their most important duty of the whole day to go round with the doctors—both of them—so that there may be two witnesses in case any verbal instructions are given.

7916. Mr. Roberts has also told us that the surgeons when going to the hospital for the purpose of performing operations are kept waiting improperly. He says "I have seen the surgeons wait from 3 until half-past 3 before a sister came and had the operating-theatre got ready; and when the reason was asked, it was said that it had not been reported to the sister officially * * * I cannot conceive any spirit worse than that, or a spirit more antagonistic to that of a well-nursed hospital at Home"; and he attributes this to the sisters standing upon matters of form,—neglecting to get the operating-theatre ready because they did not receive official intimation that it was wanted? Then we should have only got the place ready twice, for we have only got the official intimation twice since we have been there.

7917. Do you know to what he alludes—are you conscious of anything to which he may be referring in this evidence? No, certainly, we never did such a thing; but when we first came here, the resident surgeon seemed particularly anxious that we should know nothing about the cases in the wards.

7918. Is that the reason why the patients' diseases were not marked upon the cards? That is the reason. Before that the names of the diseases were marked on the cards. They wished us to know nothing about the cases; and if there was a consultation about a patient, or a discussion about the time of an operation, it would be carried on in a whisper, so that nobody could hear anything about it. The only intimation we could get about a patient being about to be operated upon was the fact of castor oil being ordered, and then we guessed that the operation-room would be wanted, and that there was going to be an operation, but whether it was to be the first or second or third we did not know. Sometimes castor oil was ordered for some other reason perhaps, and then we were not sure as to there being an operation; and if the sister did not happen to imagine that that was the reason, she would not get the operating-room ready. It has sometimes happened that the room has not been ready because we did not know there was an operation to be performed; and I have gone myself, when we have found out that there was to be an operation performed, and assisted to put the room in order, and got the things from the linen-room to have it ready as quickly as we could; but of course we would not know until 3 o'clock that the room was wanted at all.

7919. Then you deny this statement which has been made by Dr. Roberts? Certainly. The delays have happened from our not knowing when an operation was to be performed—not having the smallest intimation of the matter. If the doctor did not order castor oil we could not know at all.

7920. On this occasion to which Mr. Roberts refers, you cannot tell what he may have been told by the sister? I do not know at all.

7921. It is possible that she may on that occasion have said ill-natured things of you? I quite think so now—I am afraid so.

7922. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is it customary in London not to inform the nurses when an operation is to take place? No; they are informed on the subject just the same as the doctors. They need to be told in order to have time to prepare the theatre.

7923. President.] There is another matter that Mr. Roberts has mentioned, and that is, that there is great untidiness in the place—that he sees brooms standing in corners and beds lying on the verandahs—Have you any accommodation for things of that sort? We have none at all. It is a great eye-sore to me to see these things about, and I quite agree with Mr. Roberts that it is wrong; but we have no place in which to put such necessary things. Beds must be aired and dried, and we have to put them out sometimes.

7924. And you have no place but the verandah to put them? No, unless it is dry and warm enough to put them out on the grass.

- Miss. L. Osburn.
31 July, 1873.
7925. May I ask, Miss Osburn, whether you have ever come into collision with Mr. Roberts at all? In former days I think, a good deal.
7926. In what way? When we first arrived here he was exceedingly interfering, I thought, in my work in many ways. I thought when I first arrived that he was the representative of the medical staff, of the Board, and of the Government too, so that I stood in great awe of him for a time.
7927. Did he so represent himself to you? He did in the way he acted, and seemed to think that he was the authority that I had to obey. When he came and saw me the first day, he said he hoped that I had come out to do my duty, and that so and so was my duty—even to interfering in my choice of a bed-room. I objected to sleep in the old building at first, as it looked very dirty indeed, and provision had been made for us to sleep in the place now occupied by the resident medical officers. I had asked to have one of the doctor's rooms, and Mr. Roberts said no, my place was by the linen-room, and that I must do my duty. Until Mr. Parkes came to see me, I really thought that Mr. Roberts was a person with authority from the Government.
7928. Did you ever have this sort of trouble with any other medical man? No, never. Mr. Roberts interfered about the nurses—where I should put this person or that. If I placed a nurse in a ward, he would want her out, and order some favourite nurse of his to take the ward and attend to his cases.
7929. He would order them from one ward to another? Yes; I was quite bewildered by the way in which he moved them about.
7930. Mr. Metcalfe.] Still, I suppose that some of the suggestions he gave were very valuable? Yes, I was going to say that there were many things which we could pick up from him.
7931. President.] Was all this done in a dictatorial sort of way? Yes, he would come in and order me about as if I was a servant. I was never so spoken to before as I was spoken to by Mr. Roberts.
7932. Then this idea of his that he was to be attended by the sisters before all the other doctors is simply a sample of the position that he wished to take up? Yes. There were other patients in the wards besides his, and they needed nursing just as much as his patients; and if he came and ordered nurses out of the wards, I could not be responsible for the nursing of all the patients.
7933. You have told him this? I have told him so. It was about such matters that we often got into collision.
7934. Is not this interference with the nurses on the part of the doctors one of the things that Miss Nightingale is strongly opposed to, as being detrimental to the discipline of the hospital? Yes. I did complain of it to Miss Nightingale when I first came here, and said that I was puzzled what to do; as Dr. Roberts appeared to be such a great authority here, I did not like to disobey him; but she decidedly said that, in these matters, I must carry out my own rules, and not be interfered with in that way.
7935. Has Mr. Roberts ever applied to you for nurses for his private patients that you have had to refuse him? Yes, he has applied to me since his return from Europe.
7936. For a nurse to attend his private patients? Yes, to attend a patient of his at Ashfield.
7937. Did any unpleasantness occur then? I was obliged to tell him that I was short of nurses and really could not spare one. He wanted one particular nurse,* and I did ask the nurse if she would go, and she said she would not; and he seemed to consider that it was my fault entirely that the nurse did not go. He said that he would write to the committee about it.
7938. Was he angry with you? I think so.
7939. How did he speak to you? He seemed to order that this nurse must be got—that he must have one. He proposed by name several nurses—three I think—but they none of them would go.
7940. Mr. Metcalfe.] That is his usual manner—he has rather a dictatorial manner? Yes, I suppose it is so; the nurses did not like it. I did send a nurse at last. The gentleman whose wife he was going to operate upon came and asked me as a personal favour that somebody should go, and I sent sister Mary for the case; but I think that Mr. Roberts was not at all pleased about it.
7941. President.] He seemed annoyed? Yes, and he said that it was my fault.
7942. And he said that he would report it to the committee? He said that he would write to the committee.
7943. What did you say to that? I said that of course he could write to the committee, but that I did not think that they would compel me to send the nurse.
7944. Has he ever since that applied to you for nurses? No, I do not think so. No; I think that was the last occasion that he applied to me; but he got one of my nurses after that.
7945. Through you? No; it was one that had left and married, and he wrote to her himself, and she came to ask me about going. No other medical man has ever asked for one of our staff to nurse a private patient; they have sometimes got one for an hour or two to assist at an operation or in a case of emergency.
7946. And you say that no other medical man has ever attempted this sort of interference with you? Never at all.
7947. You have not had the unpleasantnesses with other medical men that you have had with him? No; something was sure to be wrong with his cases. We had more trouble about a case of his than about all the others put together, and yet we were always wrong.
7948. Mr. Gould.] Have you communicated these facts to Miss Nightingale? I did when I first came here, about Mr. Roberts's interferences.
7949. How long is it since you communicated with her? Do you mean the last time?
7950. Yes? I wrote to her about three mails ago—I think it was; I can have an answer by the next mail.
7951. Has she communicated to you her views with regard to the working of the system in Sydney? Well, she has given me advice and has told me how things were getting on at Home, but I do not think that she has ever given me her views as to the system here. She has given me advice upon any particular point that I have asked her about.

* NOTE (on revision):—This and the other nurses asked for were about the best nurses in the hospital, and at the time in charge of wards, and consequently those whose absence from the hospital would have been most detrimental to the patients. I therefore felt it my duty to refuse Mr. Roberts when he came the first time; but on his coming several times and explaining it was a matter of life and death, I at last consented to ask the nurses he had mentioned if they would go. The nurses are always most willing to give any assistance in a case of emergency outside the hospital, and frequently do so, although it is no part of their agreement with me on engaging them; and therefore, I think they have a right to be asked if they would like to undertake the case. In this instance they declined to go, on account of Mr. Roberts's known overbearing manner to subordinates.

Miss L.
Osburn.

31 July, 1873.

7953. She referred then to those who had left, and not to yourself? Not to myself. If she referred to myself, I would go Home to England directly.

7954. She has not then referred to you as being the cause of the failure? No, not once,—nor has she ever given the smallest hint of such a thing.

7955. President.] Mr. Roberts has said:—"During my investigations in London, I satisfied myself, by practical observation, that the system introduced and carried out by Miss Osburn differs in some material features from the Nightingale system, and in such difference is, in my opinion, much inferior to it. I have the authority of Miss Florence Nightingale for stating that I found her impressed with a feeling of the deepest disappointment in the results attained by the staff sent to Sydney, which she appeared to consider as the nearest approach to failure which their establishment had received." I wish to know whether you have had any communication from Miss Nightingale which shows that you have lost her confidence as an administrator of a nursing staff? Not at all. I have never dreamt of such a thing as that. I do not think that it is the case.

7957. Mr. Gould.] You have no reason to conclude that she has ceased to correspond with you? No. She does not write very often—she has an immense correspondence all over the world—and I could not expect that she would write to me very often; but I have no reason to think that she has ceased to correspond with me. I have not written to her myself until lately. It is only now and then that I write to her, and I cannot tell her all the details.

7958. President.] With reference to what you said just now—that if you thought Miss Nightingale could have expressed such an opinion you would not retain your position here, may I, if it is not an impertinent question, ask you whether your taking such a position as you now hold was a necessity, or did you come from a love of the work? I undertook nursing because I liked it—not because I was obliged to do it. I am extremely fond of nursing and surgical work, and have been so almost from childhood. I had no necessity to do it—if you mean that—I had a home and income of my own.

7959. You have a home and income of your own? Yes. I think the difference between my position here and the position that Mrs. Wardropper holds in St. Thomas's makes a very great difference in the nursing here. Mrs. Wardropper is absolute—her word is law, and the smallest thing she orders must be done; but here I have a great difficulty in getting things done, because, if the nurses do not like to do a thing which I order, they can appeal to the committee, or to some member of the committee, against me. They have the power of making trouble for me, if I give them orders that they do not like. Mrs. Wardropper has power to discharge a nurse at once—at a moment's notice; and she can give or withhold a character as she likes.

7960. Is Mrs. Wardropper a lady of education—we have been informed that she is not? Oh yes, she is decidedly a lady. I do not think that any one who saw her and knew her could think otherwise.

7961. Then she is not a person who has worked her way up from the servant class? Oh dear no—not at all. She was appointed to the position. She is the widow of a medical man.

Laurence J. Halket, Esq., M.D., Resident Surgeon, Sydney Infirmary, called in and further examined:—

7964. President.] Information has been given to us that on visitors' days the wards of the Infirmary are very much crowded with visitors who come to see patients—have you found that to be the case? I have.

7965. To what extent does this occur? There seems to be no discipline among the visitors—they are allowed to go all over the hospital, and they come in any number they like.

7966. To see individual patients? Yes.

7967. We have been told that the crowd is so great you can sometimes hardly elbow your way through them? Yes; I have seen nine or ten sitting on one bed, and talking to one patient.

7968. Do you think that this is a desirable state of things? No, I do not.

7969. What is the practice in the London hospitals with regard to this? They admit a certain number of friends to see patients on visiting days. There is a list containing the names of all patients furnished to the porter at the gate, and he checks off each visitor who comes in; and as soon as three, or two visitors (in some hospitals only two are allowed to visit each patient each day)—as soon as the allotted number, whether two or three, have gone in, the others are turned away.

7970. Is there any rule existing here as to the number of visitors to be admitted to see each patient? Yes, I believe it is two; but I am not aware that it is carried out.

7971. Do you know how it is that the rule has come to be relaxed to such an extent as you describe? I do not. I have nothing to do with it.

7972. It is not a matter that comes under your cognizance at all? No, it is not in my department at all.

7973. Mr. Metcalfe.] You have nothing to do with it—you have not complained of it? No, I have nothing to do with it at all.

7974. But you find it a great inconvenience? Yes.

7975. President.] The wards must be dirty with so many people walking about them? Yes, on a wet day the wards are in a filthy condition. I should say there are between 300 and 400 people there together.

7976. Three or four hundred? Yes, quite that.

7977. What are the days on which they come? Tuesdays, Fridays, and Sundays.

7978. During what hours? From 3 to 4.

7979. Then is not this crowd partially caused by their all being brought there on stated days? Well, I hardly know that. If you were to throw it open every day you would have the same number. It is a great deal used as a lounge.

7980. Visitors come not only to see patients, but to roam all over the building? Yes, they wish to see what a hospital is like.

7981. I have been told that sometimes when a screen is put round a dying patient, they will go and look over it? Yes, I have seen them do that.

L. J. Halket,
Esq., M.D.

31 July, 1873.

- L. J. Halket, Esq., M.D. 7932. Mr. Metcalfe.] In whose department are the arrangements with regard to visitors? I cannot say. I do not know.
- 31 July, 1873. 7983. You have not applied to the lady superintendent about it? Never to the lady superintendent, but I have to the manager.
7984. What did the manager say? He said something about its being very bad, but what could he do—something of that kind.
7985. These visitors occasionally bring food and fruit to give to the patients? Yes; spirits and fruit. We had a patient the other day ill with dysentery, and a visitor brought him some colonial wine.
7984. President.] Are there searchers at the gates of the hospitals at Home? Yes; always. There they always ask—"Who are you going to see?"—and you have to give the name of the patient you have come to visit; but here you need not give any name, or if you do, it may be any name you please, for they have no means of knowing whether such a person is in the hospital or not.
7985. The gatekeeper at Home checks off the visitors? Yes; he has the list of names of the patients, and he puts a simple dash opposite the name when a visitor goes in; and when there are two or three dashes, as the case may be, opposite that name, he stops the rest of the visitors. When a man comes to the gate, the porter asks whom he is going to visit, and the man says "Smith." The gatekeeper then puts a dash to Smith's name. Then perhaps another visitor comes to see Smith, and he passes him and puts another dash; then perhaps another may come in the course of half an hour for Smith, and if three are admitted to each patient he passes that man and puts another dash; but supposing a fourth man comes to see Smith, he would turn him back. Then the man may say "Oh, it is Jones I want to see"; and the porter would say—"That won't do"; because that would be a proof that the man did not want to see any one, but merely to get into the hospital.
7986. Mr. Cowper.] Some go in who do not want to see a friend at all? Yes, many do.
7987. President.] I have heard that a man was turned out of the hospital the other day who had £600 in his possession? I do not know whether it was £600 he had; but I know that he had a large sum of money to his credit in the Bank of New South Wales.
7988. Was he made to pay? No, he was turned out.
7989. Mr. Goold.] How was he admitted? On a Colonial Secretary's order.

METHOD OF IMPROVING THE NURSING SERVICE OF HOSPITALS.

I. METHOD OF TRAINING NURSES AT ST. THOMAS'S AND KING'S COLLEGE* HOSPITALS.

(Under the Nightingale Fund.)

In the process of training the following are the steps :

Every woman applying for admission is required to fill up the Form of Application (Appendix No. 1), which is supplied to her by the Matron of St. Thomas's Hospital, on application.

Appendix No. 2 are the Regulations under which the Probationer is admitted to training.

After being received on a month's trial and trained for a month, if the woman shows sufficient aptitude and character, and is herself desirous to complete her training, she is required to come under the obligation (Appendix No. 2a), which is printed on the back of No. 2, binding her to enter into hospital service for at least four years. This is the only recompense the Committee exact for the costs and advantages of training.

The list of "Duties" (Appendix No. 3) is put into the hands of every Probationer on entering the service, as a general instruction for her guidance, and she is checked off by the Matron and "Sisters" (Head Nurses) in the same duties, as will be mentioned immediately.

Appendix No. 4 is the Day and Night Time Table, to which all Probationers are required generally to conform.

It prescribes the time of rising, the ward hours, time of meals, time of exercise, hours of rest.

From the nature of midwifery training it is not practicable to exact the same system at King's College Hospital Midwifery ward as in the regulated wards of St. Thomas's Hospital.

The class of duties required of Midwifery nurses is also different, but the principles and methods of selection and of training are much the same, as also the conditions of admission and of service.

For these trained Midwifery Nurses, who are exclusively for the poor, we find there is now a demand by ladies' committees and other institutions (chiefly benevolent), which pay them a salary.

Once admitted to St. Thomas's Hospital, the Probationer is placed under a Head Nurse (Ward "Sister") having charge of a ward. In addition to her salary received from the Hospital, the Ward "Sister" is paid by the "Fund" for training these Probationers. The number of Probationers she can adequately train of course depends on the size and arrangement of her ward and its number of beds.

The Ward "Sisters" are all under an able Matron, who superintends the training of the Probationers, in addition to her other duties, for which the "Fund" pays her a salary, irrespective of her salary as Matron to St. Thomas's Hospital.

The ward training of the Probationers is thus carried out under the Ward "Sisters" and Matron. [The Probationers are, whether on or off duty, entirely under the moral control of the Matron.]

To ensure efficiency, each Ward "Sister" is supplied with a Book in the Form Appendix No. 5, which corresponds generally with the List of Duties, Appendix No. 3, given to the Probationer on her entrance.

The columns in the Ward "Sister's" Book are filled up by suitable marks once a week.

Besides the ward training properly so called, there are a number of duties of a medical and surgical character, in which the Probationers have to be practically instructed. And this instruction is given by the Resident Medical Officer at the bedside or otherwise, for which he is remunerated by the "Fund," independently, of course, of his salary as Permanent Medical Officer of the Hospital.

St. Thomas's Hospital is the seat of a well-known Medical School, several of the Professors attached to which, voluntarily and without remuneration, give lectures to the Probationers on subjects connected with their special duties, such as elementary instruction in chemistry, with reference to air, water, food, &c.; physiology, with reference to a knowledge of the leading functions of the body, and general instruction on medical and surgical topics.

At King's College Hospital instructions are given in midwifery and matters connected with the diseases of women and children, during the time of the special training in midwifery.

While the Ward "Sisters" are required to keep a weekly record of the progress of the "Probationers," the Probationers themselves are required to keep a diary of their ward work, in which they write day by day an account of their duties. They are also required to record special cases of disease, injury, or operation, with the daily changes in the case, and the daily alterations in management, such as a Nurse requires to know.

Besides these books, each Probationer keeps notes of the lectures.

All these records kept by the Probationers are carefully examined, and are found to afford important indications of the capabilities of the Probationer.

A Register, Appendix No. 6, is kept by the Matron of St. Thomas's. It will be seen that it corresponds with the Ward "Sister's" Book, No. 5, and has space for monthly entries during the entire year of training.

At the end of the year all the documents are carefully examined by the Committee of the "Nightingale Fund," and the character the Nurse receives is made to correspond as nearly as may be with the results of the training.

We do not give the woman a printed certificate, but simply enter the names of all certificated Nurses in the Register as such. This was done to prevent them, in the event of misconduct, from using their certificates improperly. When a Nurse has satisfactorily earned the gratuity attached to her certificate the Committee, through the Secretary, communicate with her and forward the money. The

* The nursing of King's College Hospital and of Charing Cross Hospital is carried on by the Society of St. John's House, which is a Protestant religious house, a sisterhood having for its main object the care and nursing of the sick in hospitals, among the poor in their own dwellings, and in private families of the higher classes, besides the training and education of Nurses for this work.

The sisters are gentlewomen trained (for two years or more) in all that relates to the nursing of the sick, the routine management of hospitals, wards, &c.

Some of these sisters have charge of wards in hospital, and the training and instruction of Probationers, the oversight and direction of nurses, &c., both in wards and when off duty. Each sister has definite duty, either in wards or teaching Probationers, otherwise attending to the sick poor, or control of housekeeping matters, and oversight of domestic servants—the system being to guide and encourage those engaged in the paid labour of the Society by the aid of others (the sisters) who are unpaid, more intelligent, educated, with a view to raising the whole tone and character of the nursing attendants of the sick.

Each Probationer passes one year in special training for her future duties, by instruction in the manual work of a Nurse, attending classes for various instruction by sisters, lectures given by the medical men on physiology, &c., &c., before ranking as Nurse, being then drafted off for either hospital work, nursing in private families, or among the poor, but continuing in the service of St. John's House.

The elements required for working such a system of training are:—

- a. A good Hospital or Infirmary.
- b. A competent Training Matron (by such a Matron we do not mean a woman whose business is limited to looking after the linen and housekeeping of the Hospital either wholly or mostly, but a woman who, whatever may be her duties as head of the Establishment, performs chiefly and above all others the duty of superintending the nursing of the sick). The number she could train would depend mainly on the construction of the Hospital, and on the capabilities of the "Head Nurses" or "Ward Sisters" under her.
- c. Competent "Head Nurses."

If such Head Nurses are or can be appointed, they should be responsible to the Training Matron. There should, of course, be but one Infirmary Matron,* with a Housekeeper subordinate to her.

The Head Nurses must be competent trainers.

Of course the training Matron, if she is to be herself her only Head Nurse, can only train such a number of Probationers as a Head Nurse could train.

Our period of training is one year for a Nurse, but we should much prefer giving two years to train those who have to train others in their turn.

The Training and Nursing Matron should be responsible to the Governing authorities of the Infirmary, or to any Committee appointed by them for the purpose.

It is taken for granted that the Medical Officers of Hospitals where training is to be carried on are willing to render every assistance in their power in aiding the training by oral instruction and bedside work.

Sufficient has been said on the subject of training to show that the success of any system must primarily depend upon obtaining Trained Nurses, themselves capable of training others.

If it should so happen that a good Training Matron cannot be found, the best way would be to select a competent woman, and send her for training.

It is hardly necessary to state that no women but of unblemished character can ever be admitted as Nurses. Infirmaries are the worst places to employ penitents in.

It is perhaps thought, 1, that my requirements for a good Nurse involve that she should be perfect, both as a woman and as a nurse; that a search for any such is a search for a roe's egg; 2, that women above twenty-five years of age, with such characters as are required, are either settled in good situations, or, at all events, that their prospects are such that they would not be likely to go into Hospital service.

I reply, 1, that my requirements refer to women as they are, and that they exclude the obviously unfit, without aiming at an imaginary or too high standard.

2. On this I humbly suggest that the point is not that women who have to earn their bread will not be likely, after 25 years of age, to embrace an occupation which cannot be exercised under that age; on the contrary, not a newspaper but contains advertisements for women "not under 25" or "30 years of age" to fill situations of trust, both in Institutions and in domestic service, to be children's nurses, matrons, "confidential" servants of all kinds. The real point is, that women who have to earn their bread cannot, after 25 years of age, seek situations which require a year's previous training; this, which is often overlooked, is so important that one sine qua non for all Institutions which train Nurses is, that the Probationers, if really good subjects are to be obtained, should receive wages during their year's training.

There is another experiment which might be tried.

This is, whether, among the large Union Schools, a number of girls might not be found willing and suitable to be trained as Nurses.

These girls are usually put out to service between the ages of 14 and 16.

This is quite too young to put them at once into any kind of infirmary or hospital to take their chance altogether with the other Probationers, especially in the men's wards.

But it is not at all too young, where arrangements and provision can be made under a proper female head, for them to learn sick cookery, cleaning, needle-work, orderly habits, all that is learnt in a servants' training-school, and to take their turn in doing what they can be taught to do in children's sick wards, and in female sick wards, till the full-blown hospital Nurse is developed out of them.

Girls of from 14 to 16 years of age are not at all too young to choose between domestic service or hospital nursing, under the restrictions mentioned above.

To a Training School for Nurses it would not be difficult to attach an Industrial School for Girls, as suggested.

The Infirmary Training Matron must be the head of all; under her, one good capable woman, to take special charge of the girls, as in a "Home," and to apportion them their duties.

Of course the expense might be an objection. It is certainly easier to get rid of the girls altogether and at once into service.

On the other hand, there is at present a great dearth of the material for good nurses. Here it might be found. These girls, if trained into good hospital Nurses, would earn higher wages than girls who enter domestic service at 14 or 15 years of age ever would do. And they would be far less likely to fall into temptation (which fall so often brings back to the Workhouse girls sent out to service too early). Besides, the labour of these girls while in training would not be valueless.

II. RELATION OF HOSPITAL MANAGEMENT TO EFFICIENT NURSING.

Equal in importance to the provision of Trained Nurses is the nature, of the hospital authority under which these Nurses are to perform their duties. For, unless an understanding is come to on this point, the very existence of good nursing is an impossibility.

In dealing with this question, I may state at once that to turn any number of trained Nurses into any infirmary to act under the superintendence or instructions of any Master, or Matron, or Medical Officer would be sheer waste of good money.

This is not matter of opinion, but of fact and experience.

The "original sin" of this part of the infirmary system, or no system, has been,—

1. The nature of the authority.
2. The nature of the nursing material on which the authority has been exercised.

Experienced administrators will scarcely suppose that I mean to imply an independence, and to ask for uncontrolled hospital authority, for the nursing staff, in what I have said.

On the contrary:—Vest the charge of financial matters and general supervision and the whole administration of the infirmary in the board or committee; i.e., in the officer who is responsible to that board or committee. Vest the whole responsibility for nursing, internal management, for discipline, and training (if there be a Training School) of Nurses in the one female head of the nursing staff, whatever she is called.

The necessity of this, again, is not matter of opinion, but of fact and experience. I will enter a little more fully into this, viz., the relation which the nursing establishment ought to bear to the Government of the hospital.

The Matron or Nursing Superintendent must be held responsible for her own efficiency, and the efficiency of all her Nurses and servants. As regards the Medical Officers, she must be responsible that their orders about the treatment of the sick are strictly carried out.

To

* It is understood that the Superintendent (Training Matron) resides there where is her chief business, viz.: in the Training School for her Nurses, which must be in the Hospital;—and this even where there is a Nurses' Home attached. It is a very great mistake to put the Superintendent in the Home, and to put the Nurses, whilst in the Hospital, under a Matron not their own. There where the Nurses are at work must the Superintendent be. It follows that she must be also Matron of the Hospital.

Answers to Training Girls from Union

Schools.

To the governing body of the hospital she shall be held responsible for the conduct, discipline, and duties of her Nurses, for the discipline of her sick wards, for their cleanliness, for the care and cleanliness of sick, for proper ventilation and warming of wards, for the administration of diets and medicines, of enemas, &c. the performance of minor dressings, and the like, for the care of linen and bedding, &c., and probably of patients' clothing.

The duties which each grade has to perform should be laid down by Regulation, and all that the Medical Department or the Governing Body of the Hospital has a right to require is that the Regulation duties shall be faithfully performed.

Any remissness or neglect of duty is a breach of discipline, as well as drunkenness or other bad conduct, and can only be dealt with to any good purpose by report to the Superintendent of Nurses of the Infirmary.

I may perhaps again point out that the Superintendent should herself be responsible to the constituted Hospital authorities, and that all her Nurses and servants should, in the performance of these duties, be responsible to the Superintendent only.

No good ever comes of the constituted authorities placing themselves in the office which they have sanctioned her occupying.

No good ever comes of any-one interfering between the head of the nursing establishment and her Nurses. It is fatal to discipline.

All complaints on any subject should be made directly to the Superintendent, and not to any Nurse or servant.

She should be made responsible, too, for her results and not for her methods.

Of course, if she does not exercise the authority entrusted to her with judgment and discretion, it is then the legitimate province of the governing body to interfere, and to remove her.

It is necessary to dwell strongly on this point, because there has been not unfrequently a disposition shown to make the nursing establishment responsible on the side of discipline to the Medical Officer, or the Governor of a Hospital.

Any attempt to introduce such a system would be merely to try anew and fail anew in an attempt which has frequently been made. In disciplinary matters a woman only can understand a woman.

It is the duty of the Medical Officer to give what orders, in regard to the sick, he thinks fit to the Nurses. And it is unquestionably the duty of the Nurses to obey or to see his orders carried out.

Simplicity of rules, placing the Nurses in all matters regarding management of sick absolutely under the orders of the medical men, and in all disciplinary matters absolutely under the female Superintendent (Matron), to whom the Medical Officers should report all cases of neglect, is very important. At the outset there must be a clear and recorded definition of the limits of these two classes of jurisdiction.

But neither the Medical Officer nor any other male head should ever have power to punish for disobedience. His duty should end with reporting the case to the female head who, as already stated, is responsible to the governing authority of the hospital.

III. STRUCTURAL ARRANGEMENTS IN HOSPITALS REQUIRED FOR EFFICIENT NURSING.

One essential condition of good infirmary discipline is that the matron and her nursing staff should have their own special quarters within the precincts of the hospital building. No woman, be she Superintendent, Head Nurse, Nurse, night Nurse, or Scrubber, employed about the patients should be boarded or lodged elsewhere than in the building.

The night Nurses should sleep where they will be undisturbed by day. Every Nurse ought to have, if not a small room, a compartment to herself. The Matron's authority, for obvious reasons, must be supreme in these quarters.

A good nursing staff will perform their duties more or less satisfactorily, under every disadvantage. But while doing so, their head will always try to improve their surroundings in such a way as to liberate them from subsidiary work, and to enable them to devote their time more exclusively to the care of the sick. This is, after all, the real purpose of their being there at all; not to act as lifts, water-carriers, beasts of burden, or steam-engines—articles whose labour can be had at vastly less cost than that of educated human beings.

Hence certain ward conveniences form absolutely essential parts of the machinery required to economize the time of good Nurses. These have been or are being provided in all the more recent hospitals and asylums, both at Home and abroad, in pauper lunatic asylums, in asylums for the infirm and aged, in nearly every civilized country; in countries, too, where labour has a much lower market value than in our own.

The general object of these conveniences is to simplify and facilitate work, and to enable the Superintendent to systematize and economize the labour of her staff, by knowing the conditions under which it has to be performed.

[E. g., lifts and the laying of hot and cold water all over a building will economize the labour of at least one attendant to every 30 patients; this is but a small instance.]

It would be a great mistake to turn an efficient nursing corps into a building unprovided with reasonable means for performing their duty. A Head Nurse cannot always be in her ward. She must have a small room, with fire and furniture, where she sleeps at night (for a Head Nurse must command her ward day and night), takes her meals, inspects her ward through a small inspection window, keeps her ward records, &c. Each ward should have, besides, a small scullery with sink, and hot and cold water laid on; with small range for making poultices, preparing fomentations, warming diets and drinks, &c., &c.

This scullery ought to be made sufficiently comfortable for the Ward Nurses to take their meals in. It is a great advantage, in preventing gossip, &c., when each separate Ward Staff has its own separate dining and sleeping accommodation, so that the Ward "Sister" may always know where her Nurses are. Where there is a Training School the Probationers will, however, probably have a dining room of their own; and it may be better in that case that the nurses should all, also, dine together, though in two detachments. But, whatever the arrangements, they must all be under the moral control of the Matron. She must be responsible for the government of her Nurses, both on and off duty.

The ward sink is intended for washing up small ward equipments, e.g., cups, saucers, mugs, spoons, and the like.

A separate sink must be provided close to the ward W.C., into which the nurse can empty bed-pans, slops, expectoration cups, and the like.

Each ward must be provided with its own crockery, wash-hand basins, cups and saucers, &c.

A very essential part of nursing is the care of the linen; and this must always be committed to the Matron (Superintendent). This duty requires a linen and mending room, conveniently situated, from which clean linen can be given out for the daily use of the wards, and into which clean linen should be received from the wash to be mended and stored.

Probably patients' clothing will have to be included.

In large Hospitals the Matron may possibly require a Linen Nurse to assist her in addition to her House-keeper.

Of course each ward will have its proper W.C.s and Lavatories, with hot and cold water laid on, and a fixed bath—conveniences which are as necessary for the due treatment of the sick as for their nursing.

Till the last few years in England, though not so in France, it has been very little considered how much the cost of efficient nursing varies according to the size and distribution of wards.

A Head Nurse can efficiently supervise, a night Nurse can carefully watch, 32 beds in one ward, whereas, with 32 beds in four wards, it is quite impossible.

Again,

Number of beds
per Ward.

Again, distribution of duties is so important, if you wish for efficiency, that it is difficult to believe that such a rule as this once existed—one Nurse to be responsible for the sole charge of, say, 10 patients. Was she to do everything for them day and night? Of course this was impossible. If she were a Head Nurse, it was wasting her, because she might as well have had the charge of 32, or even 64 patients, if these were in two wards on the same floor. [The same may be said of the night Nurse.] If she were an under Nurse there was no supervision over her, and she was utterly incapable really to take charge. If she were a Head Nurse, again, she was called upon to perform duties which are just so much lost time for her to do.

It is extremely important, therefore, to consider what is the greatest number of beds per ward which will effect the least cost in nursing staff.

This appears now to have been fixed by European hospital experience at between 24 and 32 beds per ward. I prefer the larger number.

Superficial area
efficient nursing.

It is now generally admitted by authorities on hospitals that the superficial area allowed per bed is practically an element of more importance than the mere cubic space, at least as regards healthiness; but it has been overlooked, or at all events not sufficiently recognized, that a nursing staff requires room for work, just as much as any other staff. It is of no use supplying an infirmary with the most efficient nursing establishment if there is not room for them to turn round in for the due exercise of their functions. Of course there is a difference in the amount of care required in the nursing of different patients; but wherever there is a Nurse, there must be room for her; space must be given for the Nurse to pass easily between the beds, and for more Nurses than one, besides the Medical Officers and (may be) Probationers.

Although there has been no distinctly recognized rule in this matter, the practice of all the best hospitals shows that the question of working area has tacitly received a solution.

In some cases the solution has no doubt been arrived at while endeavouring to improve the healthiness of the wards; and, in doing so, the area required for good nursing has also been decided.

In this matter we ought to be guided by what are manifestly the lessons of experience; and these I will now proceed to state by reference to some of the general hospitals into which systematic nursing has been introduced.

The Royal Commission on the Sanitary State of the Army, 1857, directed its attention to this subject, and obtained certain data from the leading hospitals in the metropolis, from which the following superficial areas per bed have been calculated:—

	Sq. ft. per bed.
Royal Free Hospital	105
London	104
Guy's	138 max.
Middlesex	88
St. Thomas's (old)	101 max.
St. Bartholomew's	79
St. George's... ..	69

It will be seen that there is some diversity in these allotments of space; and a similar difference exists in provincial hospitals, in certain of which the superficial space is from 110 to 120 square feet, while in others it ranges between 70 and 80.

The space allowed in some of the Naval Hospitals, where there are Nurses, is as follows:—

	Sq. ft. per bed.
Haslar	77
Plymouth	79

In Military Hospitals:—

	Sq. ft. per bed.
Herbert Hospital, Woolwich	99
Netley (a hospital not intended for sick, but for invalids in transitu , only a fourth of whom are confined to bed)	103

In the more recent great Paris hospitals, nursed by Sisterhoods:—

	Sq. ft. per bed.
Lariboisière	104
Vincennes (Military)	90

In the new Hotel Dieu, now being built:—

	Sq. ft. per bed.
In the 26-bed Wards	110
In the 6-bed wards... ..	104

(The same as at Lariboisière.)

In addition to this experience, I have made special inquiry as to the superficial area found to be required for efficient nursing in those hospitals where Nurses are trained under the "Nightingale Fund."

At King's College Hospital it is found that 105 square feet is sufficient for good nursing and ward administration, except in the lying-in wards, where the superficial area is much more.

I have already given the space in old St. Thomas's at 101 square feet.

When the plans of the new St. Thomas's were under consideration it was at one time proposed to give as much as 126 sq. ft. per bed; but the exigencies of the site rendered it necessary to reduce this amount to 112 square feet, which, I am informed, will be sufficient.

All these superficial areas are intended for general hospitals, but it is in the highest degree doubtful whether any of them would be enough for a lying-in or special hospital.

In fever hospitals there is a great and constant sacrifice of life in the establishment itself. Scarcely a year passes in which some most valuable lives, both among medical and nursing attendants, are not lost, in consequence of defective structural arrangements and bad sanitary conditions, under which they have to do their work. One of the most obvious of these defective conditions is want of sufficient area. If large fever hospitals must exist, then the superficial area per bed must be increased, not only for nursing, but to give increased security for the health and life of the Nurses.*

It may be said that you must fit your nursing arrangements to your sick, and not your sick to your nursing arrangements, and that Nurses must take their chance of fevers.

Perfectly true as far as the sick are concerned; but most untrue as far as the hospital arrangements are concerned.

Every employer of labour is bound to provide for the health of the workers. And any society which professes to provide for sick, and so provides for them that the lives of Nurses and of Medical Officers have to be sacrificed in the discharge of their duty, gives sufficient proof that providing for the care of sick is not its calling.

For, as it happens, the arrangements required for the welfare of sick are the very same which are required for the health of Nurses, Nurses, that is, who are really discharging their duty in constant attendance on sick.

But

* Of course the very large area required for safety where a considerable number of fever cases are treated under one roof may be reduced, if the sick are subdivided into small numbers in separate buildings, e.g., in huts.

But in dealing with the question of superficial area required for nursing it is said that the special class of cases to be nursed must be considered; that we must also take into consideration the fact that many hospitals have large medical schools attached to them; that in a ward where all the cases are of a severe character a larger nursing staff, and, in consequence, more area will be required than where all the cases are of a comparatively slight character.

Whatever apparent truth there may be in such a statement, we must not lose sight of the fact that Nurses are there because patients are there, and not because case A. is severe and case B. is not severe. The prior question is, whether there should be an infirmary with patients in it at all; and if this be decided in the affirmative, then a nursing staff, with the required conditions for good nursing, must be provided. If heavy cases occur, a good Superintendent or a good Head Nurse will always economize her staff so as to provide attendance for the sick, except, e.g., in a severe epidemic outbreak, as of cholera, when temporary assistance may be required. But nothing shows the want of a good nursing system more than where an "extra" Nurse has to be engaged for every operation.

As to the argument drawn from the existence of medical schools, this is a matter apart from nursing, and it will be found, on reference to the practice of a number of hospitals, both in this country and abroad, that a sufficient area per bed for nursing is often given where there is no medical school.

But the extent of surface area necessary will depend on the structure of the ward. In this, as in other matters, bad construction is always the most costly. A ward with windows improperly placed, so as to give deficient light, or where the beds are so placed that the Nurse must necessarily obstruct the light in attending to her patient, must have the bed space so arranged and of such dimensions as to allow of sufficient light falling on the bed. In well-constructed wards with opposite windows the greatest economy of surface area can be effected, because the area can be best allotted with reference both to light and room for work. An infirmary ward should be constructed with a window for every two beds and 8 feet of bed space along the walls. In really good Hospitals there should be not less than 100 square feet per bed for average cases of sickness, excluding zymotic diseases and lying-in cases. As already stated, this space is much too small for fever or lying-in wards.

I may state with reference to two great hospitals at present under construction, St. Thomas's and the Hotel Dieu, that the ward width is 28 feet in the former, and 29 feet in the latter.

Summary.

I have entered into considerable detail in the preceding remarks, because it is absolutely indispensable that the relation of efficient infirmary nursing to training, organization, infirmary management, and infirmary construction should be thoroughly understood if infirmary nursing is to be made efficient. And I shall conclude with a recapitulation of those requirements, without which any attempt, not at ostensibly improving (for that is to "keep the word of promise to our ear, and break it to our hope") but at really improving the nursing of the sick poor, at present admitted into infirmaries, would be attended with results not worth the trouble and outlay.

1. Hired Nurses, unless they are also trained Nurses, are not worth their hire, unless by accident.

There must be trained Matrons (Superintendents) to superintend trained Nurses.

2. Every trained and organized nursing staff should, as one of its duties, undertake the training of Nurses for infirmary work, on some such plan as that the details of which have been given above.

3. The Matron (Superintendent) should be responsible to the government of the infirmary alone for the efficient discharge of her duties; and the Nurses should be responsible to the Matron alone for the discharge of their duties.

4. It has been proved by experience that the efficiency of nursing is to a considerable extent dependent on hospital construction, and on the kind of accommodation provided for the nursing service. The following structural arrangements are among the most necessary for this object:—

a. The larger the sick wards, up to (say) 32 beds, the less expense is necessary for nursing staff, because supervision is so much easier with a given staff where the wards are large than where they are small.

b. The Matron and the whole of her Nurses must be lodged within the hospital buildings.

c. The Matron should have sole charge and responsibility of mending, storing, and issuing linen. Hence a linen store and mending room close to the Matron's quarters are required. [Patients' clothing and bedding, &c., will probably also come under the Matron.]

d. Each ward should have a small room for the Head Nurse, suitably furnished.

e. Each ward should have a small scullery, with hot and cold water supply, besides the usual lavatory, bath, and water-closet accommodation.

f. The superficial area per bed required for good nursing and good ward administration will depend on the form of the ward. More is required where the ward is badly shaped and insufficiently lighted than where the floor and window space are properly arranged. With well-proportioned wards and windows on opposite sides, with the beds between the windows, the floor space per bed should be at least 100 square feet, with 8 feet of wall space per bed.

REGULATIONS as to the TRAINING of HOSPITAL NURSES under the NIGHTINGALE FUND.

1. The Committee of the Nightingale Fund have made arrangements with the authorities of St. Thomas's Hospital for giving a year's training to women desirous of working as Hospital Nurses.

2. Women desirous of receiving this course of training should apply to Mrs. Wardroper, the Matron, at St. Thomas's Hospital, subject to whose selection they will be received into the Hospital as Probationers. The age considered desirable for Probationers is from 25 to 35; a certificate of age and testimonial of character, according to a form which will be supplied by Mrs. Wardroper, will be required, also the name and address of Medical Attendant.

3. The Probationers will be under the authority of the Matron of the Hospital, and will be subject to the rules of the Hospital.

4. They will be supplied, at the cost of the Nightingale Fund, each with a separate bedroom in or near the Hospital, and with board, including tea and sugar, and washing; and they will be furnished with a certain quantity of outer clothing, of a uniform character, which they will always be required to wear when in the Hospital. They will serve as Assistant-Nurses in the wards of the Hospital.

5. They will receive instructions from the Sisters and the Resident Medical Officer. They will receive (in addition to the clothing, costing about £4 4s.) at the end of the 1st quarter, a sum of £2; at the end of the 2nd quarter, £2 10s.; at the end of the 3rd quarter, £2 10s.; and at the end of the 4th quarter, £3.

6. The term of the Probationer's service is a complete year, and they will be received on the distinct understanding that they will remain for that length of time. They may, however, be allowed to withdraw upon grounds to be approved by the Committee. They will be subject to be discharged at any time by the Matron, in case of misconduct, or should she consider them inefficient or negligent of their duties. The Probationers will be eligible, upon proof of competency, during their year of training, or at its close, to permanent appointments as extra Nurses in St. Thomas's Hospital.

The Committee have hitherto found immediate employment for their certified Nurses, either in St. Thomas's or some other Hospital or Infirmary, at salaries commencing at not less than £20, with board, including the usual extras and washing. Those Probationers, who by education and otherwise are properly qualified, may become Matrons or Superintendents.

7. At the close of a year, their training will be considered complete, and they will be required to enter into service as Hospital Nurses in such situations as may from time to time be offered to them by the Committee.

8. The names of the Probationers will be entered in a Register, in which a record will be kept of their conduct and qualifications. This will be submitted at the end of every month to the Committee of the Nightingale Fund. At the end of a year those whom the Committee find to have passed satisfactorily through the course of instruction and training will be entered in the Register as certified Nurses, and will be recommended for employment accordingly.

9. Nurses are not allowed to make engagements except through the Committee or with their approval, and are not to leave any situation without a month's notice to the Committee. The Committee do not exercise any control over the Nurse while in service.

10. The Committee will allow gratuities of £6 and £4, according to two classes of efficiency, to all their certified Nurses, to be paid half at the end of the 2nd and half at the end of the 4th complete year of service succeeding the year of training, provided that evidence be given that the Nurse has served the whole period satisfactorily. The first gratuity will not be paid if the Committee have reason to suppose that the Nurse intends to discontinue her employment, and if paid will be forfeited, and must be repaid to the Committee in case she leaves service before the end of the 4th year.

The time for admission is at Midsummer and Christmas. Application should be made to Mrs. Wardroper, St. Thomas's Hospital, Newington, Surrey, S.,—if possible, personally, between 10 and 11 a.m.

No. 2a.

OBLIGATION.

At the expiration of one month from the date of entry, every Probationer will be required to write a letter to the following effect:—

To the CHAIRMAN of the COMMITTEE of the NIGHTINGALE FUND.

SIR,

Having now become practically acquainted with the duties required of an Hospital Nurse, I am satisfied that I shall be able and willing, on the completion of my year's training, to enter into service in a public Hospital or Infirmary, and I engage to continue in such service for the space of at least four years, in whatever situations the Committee shall think suitable to my abilities, it being my intention from henceforth to devote myself to Hospital employment. I further agree not to enter into any engagement without having first obtained the approval of the Committee, and not to leave any situation without having given due notice to the Committee.

I am, Sir, &c., &c.,

 To the Manager. _____ Governor.
 _____ Residence.

Governors are particularly requested to state their places of residence.
 Presented on _____ 187 . Admitted _____ 187 .

The following cases are inadmissible:—Such as are, upon due examination, deemed incurable; chronic cases, &c., such as inveterate ulcers of the legs; pregnant women, or persons suffering under mental derangement; persons having small-pox, itch, or other infectious diseases, or who are in a state of confirmed consumption. But such of these as are proper objects may receive advice and medicine as out-patients.

Governors will receive notice should there be no room when application is made.

“The friends of patients are allowed to visit them on Tuesdays, Fridays, and Sundays, between the hours of 3 and 4 p.m., and at no other time, except by special order of one of the medical officers; and only two friends of each patient can be admitted on one day, unless by order of the same authority. An exception can be made to this rule if it be shown to the satisfaction of the Manager, or Lady Superintendent, in the absence of the Medical Officer, that the friends applying to see a patient have come from a distance for that purpose, or if a patient be dangerously ill.”

No spirits or provisions are to be introduced, on pain of the patient's dismissal.

Presents of old linen, large quantities of which are used for dressings and bandages, will be thankfully received.

All communications, complaints, &c., to be addressed to the Manager.

Accidents and Urgent Cases are received at any hour of the day or night. Persons recommended as In-patients must attend at the Infirmary at 10 o'clock a.m.

Extracts from Rules.

9. Governors contributing £2 annually, and Life Governors, shall have the privilege of recommending one patient to the Hospital during the year.

10. Governors subscribing £5 annually shall have the power of recommending three patients to the Hospital during the same period. Governors subscribing £10 may recommend six patients.

11. Governors subscribing £20 or upwards annually shall have the privilege of having one patient always in the Hospital, provided there be a vacant bed.

12. Governors and Life Governors shall also have the privilege of recommending six patients to the Dispensary annually.

13. Subscribers of £1 shall have the power of annually recommending six patients, those of 10s. three patients, and those of 5s. one patient, to the Dispensary only.

General By-laws.

7. No officer, servant, or other person belonging to this Institution, shall take, on any pretence, directly or indirectly, a fee, reward, or gratuity from any patient whatever, nor from any tradesman or other person supplying or desirous of supplying the Institution; and any person by an infringement of this law shall forfeit his or her office or place.

The House Governor and Secretary of the London Hospital to Mr. S. Leoni.

London Hospital,
Whitechapel Road, E., May 1, 1871.

Sir,

The results produced by your patent gas cooking arrangements in the kitchen of the London Hospital are so satisfactory that the Committee have authorized me to send you a report thereon, which you are at liberty to use in any way you please.

In the six months ended 31st December last the large roaster was in use 125 days, being about six days short of a full half year's work. The waste of meat during this period averaged about 14½ per cent., as against 33½ under the old system of roasting; while the consumption of gas was also reduced from a daily average of 610 to 250 cubic feet. The actual saving to the hospital in 125 days was, in meat 4,579 lbs., and in gas 44,525 cubic feet, or, for a full year's working of 261 roasting days, very nearly 10,000 lbs. of meat, worth at present prices £296, and about 88,000 cubic feet of gas, costing £17 12s., and representing together an annual saving in money of £313 12s. The baking ovens are also extremely satisfactory; and looking to what has been already accomplished, the Committee expect from the entire arrangements of the kitchen, when completed, results as economical as those quoted above.

With regard to cleanliness and saving of labour and trouble, it is difficult to exaggerate the advantages derived from the adoption of your patent.

I am further instructed to state that your gas apparatus for disinfecting clothes and bedding, and for destruction of vermin by dry heat, works exceedingly well. The chamber can be heated to 270 degrees (the temperature required for disinfecting purposes) in about three hours, at a cost of 10d., the consumption of gas being about 200 cubic feet.

House Governor and Secretary.

REPORT ON THE SYDNEY INFIRMARY.

165, Pitt-street,
Sydney, 17 June, 1872.

To the Building Committee of the Sydney Infirmary,—
Gentlemen,

I have the honor to submit for your consideration the following report upon the Sydney Infirmary, its present condition and defects, the means of remedying or amending them, and some proposed new additions and reconstructions, which are illustrated by the plans now laid before you.

In entering upon the preparation of this report, I found it necessary, for purposes of calculation and reference, to have before me complete plans of the premises as they now exist.

These plans, of which you authorized the construction at your last meeting, are now produced for your inspection. Their preparation, involving very numerous measurements and plottings, has occupied some considerable time, and has delayed the completion of my report.

I have found it necessary, too, to make a special study of hospital requirements and hospital construction and fitting, as approved by the best authorities of the day; and the opinions hereafter expressed and the recommendations made, are for the most part based upon the authority of Florence Nightingale, of Dr. Oppert, and of Captain Douglass Galton, architect of the "Herbert Hospital," Woolwich.

I have had before me, too, the plans of many of the most esteemed hospitals of modern construction, and have availed myself freely of the information they afford.

Amongst others I have carefully noted the arrangement of,—

St. Thomas's Hospital, London—Curry.
The Leeds New Infirmary—Scott.
The Herbert Hospital, Woolwich—Galton.
The Lariboisiere—Paris.
The Macclesfield Infirmary—James Stevens.
The North Staffordshire New Infirmary—Nichols and Lynam; and many others.

I propose to divide my remarks into two principal sections, viz. :—

- 1st. The present main building, its defects, and the proposed remedies.
- 2nd. The new additions and reconstructions.

THE PRESENT BUILDING.

1. Ventilation.

In this respect the existing arrangements show but one really important defect, namely, that the windows do not extend sufficiently near to the ceiling, there being a space of no less than four feet (4 ft.) between the top of the windows and the ceiling.

Here, then, there exists a stratum of vitiated air, which there is no means of expelling or changing, except by its gradual admixture with the comparatively purer air beneath.

I propose to cut away the masonry above the windows, and to extend the openings to within one foot (1 ft.) of the ceiling (or less). It will then be necessary to replace the old and worn-out sashes and frames with new ones of improved construction.

The form most approved, and which commends itself to my judgment, is that shown in the annexed sketch. The opening, which is to be eleven feet (11 ft.) in height, is to be fitted to a height of eight feet (8 ft.) with a pair of double-hung sliding sashes, and above that point with a pivot hung sash, worked by a cord and pulley. At the upper part of the sash is to be fixed, on the outer side, a strip of wire gauze or perforated zinc, about 9 inches wide, so that air may be admitted gently, by slightly lowering the upper sash, without creating a draught.

Had I been designing entirely new openings, I would have preferred to make them at least 6 inches wider than the present windows, but this is not indispensable, and it would add so greatly to the expense of the alteration that I do not recommend it.

The window openings, on the western side at all events, should be fitted with Venetian blinds.

The windows as thus altered would give an amount of light approaching that laid down as desirable for hospital purposes, viz., 1 square foot of light space to every 62 feet cubic of ward space.

Galton gives 1 to 50 to 55 as the proper proportion; but in this climate, where the light is more powerful than in England, it is probable that a smaller proportion will be equally effective.

I propose to enlarge the doorways leading to the wards, in order that beds may be carried through them with ease, and to fit them with new double doors, with a transom, and a large louvred space above, for the admission of fresh air from the lobbies.

These enlarged doors and windows, in conjunction with open fire-places, would alone, I think, suffice to ensure an abundant supply of pure air, and all needful facility for changing the air of the wards.

The

The weight of modern opinion is decidedly against artificial systems of ventilation, as opposed to what for distinction is called "natural ventilation," viz., that afforded by the doors and windows and by open fire-places. A valuable aid to these however will be found in the use of the double tube ventilators, extending from the ceiling to the open air outside the roof, and affording both an inlet for fresh air and an outlet for the heated and vitiated air.

These can only be applied conveniently to the upper wards.

Before quitting this subject, I may remark that the cubic air space of the wards is fairly satisfactory, averaging over 1,050 feet,—and in one ward (M) amounting to 1,555 feet per bed.

There is much need of some reform in the ventilation of the water-closets and urinal lobbies. The most convenient and effective way of improving this, and at comparatively small expense, will be the introduction of iron air tubes and collecting canopies or hoods, heated by a small gas jet with Bunsen's burner, to create a constantly ascending draught. The same gas may be used at night with an ordinary burner, to light the closets.

2. Condition of Walls, Ceilings, and Floors.

The walls and ceilings are at present plastered in the style of ordinary rooms, and coloured or whitewashed.

At all times this mode of coating hospital walls is open to the objection of absorbing impure exhalations, and becoming a source of disease; but in the present case it has the additional evil of being a harbour for insects, which have entered through crevices and nail-holes, and have apparently established colonies in the walls, whence they issue at night and infest the wards.

I would recommend that the whole of the walls and ceilings be stripped of the plaster, and that the walls be freshly coated with cement, finished with a surface of plaster or of Keene's cement,—the latter giving a polished and smooth surface nearly impervious to gases, and non-absorbent.

I must call your attention, however, to the fact that the authorities are not unanimous in the unreserved approval of non-absorbent wall surfaces, to which the objections urged are twofold:—

1st. The difficulty of making a cement surface which is altogether free from stains and blotches.

2nd. Their tendency to condense moisture.

I mention this merely to remind you that such objections have been raised,—but the vast majority of opinions are in favour of impervious walls. Even these, however, should be occasionally washed with soap and water and dried with cloths. This may be done in small portions at a time, without interfering with the occupation of the wards.

In dealing with the walls, I propose to remove all the internal wooden fittings of the windows, as linings, architraves, &c., and to plaster the jambs and sills of the openings, thereby getting rid of a great number of corners and chinks, which form nests for vermin.

For the ceilings I would recommend the use of zinc lining, laid upon thin pine boards, and secured by strips of cedar at the edges, screwed up to the wooden lining, and arranged so as to divide the ceilings into panels. These wooden slips to be bedded in putty before they are screwed up tight, so as to leave no crevice to harbour insects. The whole to be painted with white zinc paint.

After very careful consideration, I am of opinion that a ceiling of this construction will meet every possible requirement, and be an improvement upon any hitherto used. It will be impervious, free from harbours for vermin, durable, of pleasing appearance, and free from liability to crack or fall from the elasticity of the floors above. The only objection to it is the cost, which is three times that of lath and plaster.

The floors generally are in pretty fair condition. In most of the wards a few boards will have to be replaced, and it would be advisable to make some experiments in the way of stopping the joints of the boards with composition, with a view of rendering the floor non-absorbent.

As the execution of the works above enumerated would of course render it necessary to vacate the wards during their progress, it would be needful to undertake the renovation of one ward at a time, and to complete it before commencing another.

3. Verandahs and Balconies.

The stone pavement of the verandahs is much sunken and worn, and in many parts forms hollows, which retain the water in wet weather.

In undertaking a renovation of the building, it will become necessary to take up the old pavement and replace it for the most part with new material. I assume that not more than one-third of the old flagging will be found fit for relaying.

The woodwork of the balconies too is much decayed and worn. On the eastern side the floorboards are entirely worn out, and must be replaced by new ones; those on the west are in better condition, and as there is little or no traffic there, may, perhaps, last a few years longer.

The whole of the lining of the front plate of balconies, all round, must be stripped off and replaced with new material, also the lining of the underside of balcony floors.

In doing this, it will be necessary to make a careful examination of the condition of the joists and timbers supporting the structure, and to make good any that are found to be defective. As these are all concealed at present by the linings, it is impossible to hazard a conjecture as to their condition, but the probabilities are that a good deal of repair will be found necessary.

The guard railing of the balconies should be entirely renewed,—that on the back balcony, especially, being in a dangerous condition. On the front it would be desirable to replace the old wooden balusters by a neat cast-iron railing.

The pillars of verandah and balcony are on the whole tolerably sound; the stone bases of some exhibit signs of decay, which require attention; these should be cleaned over and dressed with linseed oil, to arrest the fretting away of their surface.

The question of altering the appearance of the front balcony will be treated under the head of "New Works" and reconstruction.

The probable cost of executing the various works above referred to will be given in the estimate appended to this report.

NEW BUILDINGS AND RE-CONSTRUCTION.

These require but few remarks, as the plans almost explain themselves.

It will be seen that I have designed a block of buildings in the centre of the front elevation.

To introduce something here is almost indispensable, if any attempt is to be made to impart architectural effect to the building. The necessity of relieving and breaking-up the long monotonous façade now presented to the eye, and of introducing some central feature is, I think, too apparent to admit of argument. One defect too, in the present elevation is a want of expression of purpose,—it seems, in fact, destitute of any entrance,—the two doors in front being so obscure as hardly to attract the attention, and having at most the appearance of subordinate entrances.

This I propose to amend by putting a bonâ fide and prominent entrance doorway in the central block, leading to a spacious hall, to the right and left of which are situated the Board-room and the manager's offices.

I have thought it best to remove these to a position in the main building, leaving the old Board-room and offices to be appropriated to the use of the medical staff or of the other officers and servants of the institution, in whose accommodation, I understand, there is now a great deficiency.

Between the new building and the old, I propose on the ground floor to leave an open corridor, forming a continuation of the front verandah, to ensure free ventilation and circulation of air.

Opposite the main entrance hall I propose to form a hall 12 feet wide, through the main building, to lead to the back verandah and to the offices behind, and containing the stairs which give access to the new ward above.

By this arrangement, Wards H and J will be slightly reduced in length, say 6 feet, or to the extent of two (2) beds each.

Over the Board-room and offices will be obtained a new ward 49 feet long and 28 feet wide, with a height of 14 or 15 feet, capable of accommodating eighteen (18) beds, with an air space of 1,140 cubic feet per bed.

Double ceilings and sound-proof floors will be introduced between the new ward and the offices beneath.

Over the lower corridor are placed the water-closets, lavatory, and nurses' room.

This

This latter is a convenience which seems to be regarded as an essential in nearly all the modern hospital plans, but of which the Infirmary wards are now entirely destitute.

In four of the Wards, viz., G, K, M, and R, I propose to provide nurses' rooms at the front angles of the building, as shown on plan, and to carry up the structure in the style of small towers, which will give a good architectural effect and finish to the elevation, combined with utility of purpose.

The exact treatment of the old front verandah and balcony must depend entirely upon the amount which the directors are able to expend upon its renovation. In any case it will be necessary to renew and modernize the cornices of verandah and balcony, and to put new balusters and railings.

One mode of treatment is illustrated in the accompanying sketch elevation.

The new back buildings comprise on the ground floor a new kitchen on an enlarged and improved plan, with steam cooking apparatus, and with scullery and larder attached, new store-room, wardsmen's room and three bed-rooms, besides boiler-house and coal store.

Over a part of these offices is planned a new ward, 61 feet long, 24 feet wide, and 15 feet high, to contain 20 beds, with an air space of 1,120 cubic feet per bed.

This ward will have a balcony on the east side, and will be approached by two balconies, extending from the present back balcony, and running one on each side of the new operating-theatre, which occupies a central and convenient position.

Next to the operating room is provided a small surgeon's room, for instruments, &c.

The new ward is fitted with water-closets, lavatory, and nurses' room.

It will be seen upon a study of the plan, that each of the new wards is more completely separated from any other ward than any of the old ones now are from each other; and that for purposes of classification, or separation of infectious diseases, they present great advantages.

Other new buildings, which are urgently needed, are mortuary and offices connected therewith.

A separate plan for these is submitted, comprising a lofty and well lighted room for the reception of bodies, and a surgeon's ante-room and lavatory, &c., opening out of it.

These are placed on the upper floor, approached by a wide and very easy staircase, and beneath them are situated a storeroom for lumber, a straw-house, and a shed for the hearse.

The position suggested for these buildings is marked with pencil on the plan of existing premises.

Laundry.

It will be seen that the plans of proposed new buildings contain no provision for a laundry or wash-house.

On this subject I have conferred with Drs. Alleyne and Bedford, as representing the medical staff; and although I have not been favoured with any written opinion from these gentlemen, I am authorized by them to state, that while they see no objection to the system of drying clothes by hot air, they are entirely opposed to the principle of having the laundry work done on the premises.

In this opinion, after careful study of the subject, I fully concur.

The following are, I think, the chief objections which present themselves:—

1st. The increase in the number of servants in the establishment, and correspondingly increased necessity of supervision and administration.

2nd. The occupation, with additional buildings, of space which seems already to be sufficiently limited in extent.

3rd. The difficulty of ensuring the entire freedom of the other buildings from the steam and vapour generated in the process of washing and drying.

4th. In seeking to overcome the last objection by the removal of the laundry buildings to the further extremity of the premises, that is to say, to the eastern boundary, a new difficulty is met with, viz., that of obtaining effectual drainage from the wash-house,—a condition, above all others, indispensable.

5th. Without expressing a very decided opinion on the point, it seems to me to be a question whether the cost of laundry work done on the premises would not be greater than if done by contract.

Taking into consideration the cost of buildings, of the improved apparatus which would be needed, and of the staff to be employed and supervised, I cannot think that any economy would be effected by "doing the washing at home."

Water Supply.

One of the first matters which arrests attention in considering the present state of the establishment is, the very unsatisfactory condition of the water supply.

Water is procurable in sufficient quantity only during a part of the day, and at certain times there is no supply at all.

The remedy will not, I think, be difficult, and in preparing my plan I have kept it in view.

At the corners of the new ward at back, I propose to carry up two small towers, containing on the ward level the lavatories, water-closets, &c.

In the basement of one of these is situated the boiler, to which I propose to attach a small donkey-engine and force-pump.

Near the foot of this tower an underground tank is proposed to be formed, to contain (say) 12,000 to 15,000 gallons, and the pipes from the city supply to lead direct to this, of as large a bore as the Corporation will permit, and allowed to flow into it at all hours, with a ball-tap to cut off the supply when full.

From this reservoir the water would be pumped by the donkey-engine (worked at little or no expense by the same steam which does the cooking) into large tanks formed in the top of the two towers above referred to, each containing about 4,000 gallons, and placed at such a level that pipes from them will give an uninterrupted water service to every part of the establishment.

These two upper tanks alone would give more than a full day's supply for 300 people at 25 gallons per day each.

Attached to the donkey engine and pump should be a separate section-pipe and stop-cock leading to the present reservoir, to enable the upper tanks to be filled from this source in the event of any temporary cessation of the town supply. This old reservoir should be cleaned out and covered with a brick arch.

The above means would, I believe, ensure a constant and abundant supply; admittedly one of the first and most important of hospital requirements.

In conclusion, I must remark that this report is by no means exhaustive, nor is it intended to be so.

There are numerous subjects to which I might refer, that are not even alluded to, but I have thought it better to confine my attention for the present to those most urgently demanding notice, and to leave for future consideration other reforms which, though desirable, are not of such pressing necessity, and which would perhaps only serve to complicate my report.

This, it will be noted, is confined entirely to the old main building, and does not attempt to deal with the southern wing or with the offices on the Macquarie-street frontage; nor does it refer to the laying out and improvement of the grounds and roads, or to the formation of a new enclosure on the east side, in lieu of the old wall now separating it from the Domain. These are all subjects which it may be more convenient to consider at another time.

Appended are estimates in detail of the various works referred to in this report.

SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT.

To the Building Committee of the Sydney Infirmary,—
Gentlemen,

In accordance with the instructions given at your last meeting, I have the honor to submit for your approval two finished designs for the elevation of the main building as added to and altered.

The elevation marked A is that of the building as proposed in my report of the 17th instant, greater prominence being given to the new features than in the rough sketch which accompanied that report, and adding about two hundred and fifty pounds (£250) to the cost of the additions as stated therein.

The elevation marked B shows an additional story over the centre block of building, available for use, either as one ward of the same size as that on the floor below it, or as smaller wards for special purposes.

The cost of this additional story, assuming it at 12 feet high, will be about one thousand pounds (£1,000).

I cannot, however, see my way clear to recommend the erection of this additional story, unless some special necessity exists for it. Its height would probably render it inconvenient of working; and having in view the amended design A for a two-storied building, the extra story does not seem wanted to give importance to the elevation.

Mortuary.

I have the honor, also, to submit an improved design for the mortuary and offices connected therewith, prepared in view of its being a prominent object from the Domain.

A lift is provided for raising bodies to the upper floor.

The extra cost of this design, as compared with that of original rough sketch, will not exceed one hundred pounds (£100).

Wall and railing on east boundary.

A plan is submitted for a dwarf stone wall and iron railing on the Domain boundary, or rather of two such walls separated by a space fifteen feet (15 ft.) wide for trees and shrubs.

The outer wall is terminated by a stone pier at each end, and the inner wall is provided with two iron gates for admission of gardeners.

The cost of this double wall and railing will be about six hundred and eighty pounds (£680).

To meet the objection which may be urged as to the want of seclusion during the time that the trees and shrubs are growing, I would suggest that the inner railings be lined temporarily with $\frac{3}{4}$ deal boards to the height of the rails, being six feet six inches (6 ft. 6 in.) above the ground level.

This will entirely obstruct the view, and will render communication far more difficult than it is at present across the old wall.

The cost of such wooden lining will be about twenty-five pounds (£25).

Additional stories to front buildings.

Sketch plans are submitted for additional stories to the buildings now occupied,—on the north by the manager and medical staff, on the south by the dispensing department and out-door patients; also, elevations of the same.

The cost of these additional stories will be,—

For the north building, about eight hundred pounds (£800).

For the south building, about one thousand pounds (£1,000).

I have, &c.,
G. ALLEN MANSFIELD,
Architect.

COMMENTARY.

THE subject of hospital expenditure is undoubtedly one of great public importance. Vast sums of money are annually subscribed for the maintenance of our hospitals, and crowds of deserving cases are almost daily turned away from the doors of these institutions, owing to a want of room. It therefore, I think, becomes a duty towards those who so liberally contribute to the necessities of their suffering fellow-creatures, as well as to those for whose benefit this money is subscribed, to ascertain, by inquiry and investigation, whether the funds placed at the disposal of our different hospitals are disbursed in such a manner as to insure the largest amount of relief being obtained for the outlay incurred.

In prosecuting an investigation of this nature, the most conclusive mode of arriving at a result would naturally be, in the first place, to ascertain what the cost of each bed and patient ought to be, and then to see how far this agreed with the statistics of our different hospitals; but unfortunately, the views entertained in regard to the requirements of the sick differ so greatly, that such a conclusion could not be arrived at with any probability of its meeting all cases; and consequently, the only course left is, by comparing the actual cost of our different hospitals, to ascertain what may be considered a fair average expenditure, and so form an opinion of the manner in which the different institutions are conducted.

With this view, some statistics of hospitals were prepared by me during 1868, under the authority of the weekly Board of St. Mary's Hospital, and having been printed, were circulated to some extent; but being limited almost exclusively to London Hospitals, and being open to objection as showing the result of one year's working only (that for 1867), I thought that by preparing a similar table of statistics for the following year, and adding to it the statistics of our different provincial hospitals for the same period, some interesting information might be obtained, whereby the subject of hospital expenditure might be profitably considered.

The suggestion having met with the approval and sanction of the weekly Board of St. Mary's, I applied to sixty-two different hospitals for statistical information, which in a large number of instances was most readily and kindly supplied, and with the means thus furnished, and the aid of annual reports, and other sources, I was enabled to compile the accompanying tables, showing the working expenses of forty-six institutions for the year 1868*.

A consideration of these tables will, I think, prove the desirability of having our hospital expenditure fully investigated, it being impossible satisfactorily to reconcile the varying results shown, especially when it is borne in mind that such items as pensions, collector's commission, and building and extraordinary repairs, have, as far as possible, been carefully excluded from the expenditure given, as being calculated to operate unfairly when comparing the working expenses of different institutions.

With regard to the London General Hospitals, it may be remarked that much of the variation of cost observable in 1867, has disappeared in 1868, the cost of each occupied bed in the following hospitals for the latter year being as follows:—

St. George's	£56 18 9
St. Mary's	57 11 1
St. Bartholomew's	58 0 4
London	58 13 8
King's College	59 6 4
Charing Cross	59 14 9

When

* The following Hospitals were applied to; but did not supply any information:—
London: Guy's, St. Bartholomew's, St. Thomas's, Great Northern, Metropolitan Free, Royal Free, Small-pox.
Provincial: Bath Royal United Hospital, Royal Berkshire Hospital, Bristol Royal Infirmary, Devon and Exeter Hospital, Derbyshire Infirmary, Liverpool Northern Hospital, Liverpool Southern Hospital, Manchester Royal Infirmary, Portsmouth Hospital, Salop Infirmary.
Scotland: Greenock Hospital.

When we consider that economy, as far as practicable, is exercised by most of our governing bodies, and find that six of the London Hospitals are worked so closely as these figures show, it may, I think, be almost inferred that under present circumstances a bed in a metropolitan hospital can hardly be maintained at a less cost than about £58, some slight variation being naturally due to a difference in arrangement, and other local causes. It is true that we find the beds at the Westminster Hospital do not cost quite £40, and at Guy's they are maintained for less than £48, while at University College Hospital £77 is required for the maintenance of each bed. Such variations as these I confess are somewhat puzzling, and are not easily explained, even by a reference to the different items of which the total cost of each institution is composed.

The average cost of each in-patient treated in our London Hospitals bears a very unequal proportion to that of the beds, and is of course due to the duration of the residence of the patients in the wards. At Guy's, where the beds are maintained for £47 18s. 7d., each in-patient costs £4 18s. 9d., while at St. Mary's, where the beds average £57 11s. 1d., the cost of each in-patient is only £4 10s. 11d. Any one acquainted with the working of the latter institution will not, I think, accuse the medical officers of discharging their patients too quickly; and the discrepancy must therefore, I suppose, be due to the greater proportion of chronic cases treated in the larger hospital.

The statistics of special hospitals, which I have been able to obtain, furnish fair specimens of the working of those institutions, the most remarkable being the Cancer Hospital, where the beds cost £123 each, and every in-patient, on an average, £22.

On referring to the provincial hospitals, we find some very strange results, the beds in some costing nearly, and in some instances quite, as much as in the average London Hospitals; while others are maintained at an expenditure of under £30 per bed. There are many causes which should lead to a provincial hospital being maintained for less than a London one; the cases in the latter are, as a rule, more serious, and it is well known that the treatment of disease in a large city is more expensive than in the country; but making allowances for these circumstances, we find a large difference unaccounted for. On referring to the items of expenditure for an explanation, it is at once apparent that one great source of economy is in the nursing, which is most disproportionately small, as compared with this item of expense in our metropolitan institutions; it therefore, I think, follows as a matter of course, either that our London Hospitals are over-nursed, or that in the provincial ones sufficient provision is not made for this important aid to medical skill. That the former is not the case is, I fancy, quite evident to any one conversant with the wards of the London Hospitals; and hence it would seem that the nursing in many of the country hospitals cannot be efficiently conducted. The salaries and wages form another source of economy in the country hospitals, and the adoption of a simpler and cheaper diet than that usually given in London, and the less need for stimulants, naturally leads to a smaller annual expenditure. These points, however, ought to affect all country hospitals alike; and yet we find the cost varying in some instances as much as 40 and even 50 per cent. Surely such a disparity as this ought not to exist.

Unfortunately, we have no means of ascertaining with accuracy the precise cause of this disparity; the sum returned under the head of provisions generally includes not only the patients' food but also the board of the nurses, that of the household, and probably part of that of the laundry people. The proportion which ought to be debited under each of these heads not being shown, we are not only ignorant of what it has cost to feed the patients, but are equally at a loss to know how much the nursing has cost, what expense has been incurred for officers and servants, and the cost of washing; the last item being not only mixed up with the provisions, but adding to the confusion by forming part also of the wages and fuel. With such a system, if system indeed it can be called, how can we ever expect to have our hospital statistics brought into an intelligible shape; and how difficult it must be for the governing bodies themselves to judge of the working of their respective institutions. In the endeavour to check expenditure, inquiries are frequently made as to the number of eggs consumed in different hospitals, or of the quantity of beef-tea, milk, or other articles ordered. These inquiries are doubtless useful in their way, but the chief point to ascertain ought, I think, to be the total cost at which the patients are fed; for if this amount proved a moderate one, it would matter but little of what the different articles of diet consisted. Were all hospitals to supply this information, we should be able to judge of the expenditure under that head, of any particular institution, and to institute inquiry when we found our own exceeding the average. The same would apply to other important items, such as nursing, salaries, wages, and washing, all of which are now, for the reasons named, more or less enveloped in mystery. The only reason that I can imagine for any objection being raised to a reform in rendering our hospital accounts is, that it would entail a little extra trouble; but surely for so important an end this ought to be cheerfully undertaken. I can answer for it, that at St. Mary's we find no difficulty in separating our different items of expenditure, and it would of course prove equally easy elsewhere.

It will be seen that, in calculating the cost of the out-patients, I have adhered to my former plan of allowing a uniform rate of 1s. per head, as representing the expense incurred in administering this mode of relief; I have however made exceptions in such cases as the Cancer and Consumption Hospitals, and the Margate Infirmary, as their out-patients either attend for long periods, or receive more expensive medicines than those given to the ordinary class of cases; but, with these exceptions, I have seen no reason to depart from the rule laid down.

In conclusion, I would submit that the necessity for adopting a more intelligible system of accounts is shown by the statistics now collected. We are all working with the same object in view, economy and efficiency is the aim of all, and this can best be obtained by a comparison of our respective efforts. To enable us to do this, however, with any chance of a really practical result, we must be able to show the different important items of expenditure under clear and distinct heads. That this can be easily accomplished I am in a position, from long personal experience, to affirm; and it needs but the approval and sanction of our different governing bodies to gain this desirable object, and to render the study of hospital expenditure at once easy and instructive.

[To Evidence of Arthur Renwick, Esq., M.D.]

K.

Dr. Renwick to The Secretary of the Public Charities Commission.

295, Elizabeth-street,
Hyde Park, 30 May, 1873.

Sir,

With reference to yours of yesterday, inquiring whether I am willing to give evidence before the Public Charities Commission, I beg to reply that I have not the slightest objection to do so, if any information I can afford will be of service.

In regard to the state of the Infirmary, the most important matter that just now strikes me is the neglected condition of the building and its out-offices; the walls are so old and so badly repaired that they serve as a habitation for vermin; the ventilation is wretched; the mortuary and out-houses a disgrace to the city; and worst of all, in some cases, as honorary physician, I have found that patients under treatment for other diseases have occasionally been attacked by pneumonia and bronchitis, &c., &c., the consequence, in my opinion, of the causes above stated and others of similar character.

The third point referred to in your note has reference to any suggestions that I can make in regard to the improvement of the management of the institution.

I have now been connected with several public institutions for many years; and the result of my experience is that the Managing Boards and Committees of all of them are excessively and injuriously large. Sometimes the business of an institution under these circumstances is managed by a few active members—the others obtaining the honor without any of the labour: at other times, moved, it is to be hoped, by a sense of duty or by some benevolent impulse, a large number of the members of the Board take a share for a time in the active business, and the greatest confusion, with elaborate displays of eloquence, follows. I have often known one Board meeting upset the conclusions arrived at at the last previously held meeting.

I believe that it is a great mistake to have clergymen of any religious denomination on the Boards of Public Institutions. These matters are of vital importance in regard to the Sydney Infirmary. And I should like to add, that it is my decided opinion—which was more fully expressed at a public meeting of the subscribers to the Sydney Infirmary held recently to determine certain changes in the Board and other matters—that the Government, as representing the public and principally supporting the institution, should be represented on the Board.

I have confidence that if the Government appointed two or three men of repute, skilled in hospital arrangements, and the subscribers elected four or five members, half of whom should retire annually, the management would be more creditable than it is at present.

Further, I believe that ultimately the plan adopted in similar institutions in the Mother Country and elsewhere must be carried out in the Sydney Infirmary. I mean that, instead of having as superintendent a person not versed in hospital affairs, a medical gentleman of experience shall hold that office, and with the house physicians and surgeons (under the direction of the honorary medical officers), will be enabled more correctly and satisfactorily to carry on the business of the hospital.

Lastly and briefly: the management of the dispensary is not satisfactory; and this is not to be wondered at when it is considered that, for a miserable pittance, medical gentlemen are expected to perform the laborious but important work of that branch of the Infirmary.

It would raise the position of the Dispensary medical officers if they were permitted to be more closely connected with the institution than they are at present. I would make them assistants or associates to the honorary medical staff of the hospital, and in rotation would permit them to take the offices of the seniors as their time of service expired. They also could fulfil the duties of the hospital physicians and surgeons when ill or otherwise absent. Similarly, the honorary medical officers could occasionally give advice to the out-door patients. I need not expatiate on the advantages that would accrue by the plan, further than to state that increased hospital experience would be given to each medical officer, before entering fully on the onerous and very responsible offices of honorary surgeon and physician.

I know, as a fact, that in some of the largest hospitals in the Mother Country, the surgeons and physicians thus gradually work their way into the hospital.

Excuse the haste with which these few hints have been composed, and believe me to be,—

Yours truly,
ARTHUR RENWICK, M.D.

L 1.

Alfred Roberts, Esq., to The Colonial Secretary.

117, Castlereagh-street, Sydney,
25 July, 1870.

Sir,

In compliance with your request made during an interview with which you favoured me on the 19th instant, I have the honor to submit for your consideration certain facts and suggestions bearing upon the desirability of converting the Victoria Barracks at Paddington into a Hospital, after the removal of the British troops from the Colony.

In the year 1863, the Government, acting upon the Report of a Committee of the Legislative Assembly, undertook the care and support of aged and infirm paupers. In that year the daily average of such persons was 624, and in June, 1869, it had increased to 1,041. It is right to add, that these numbers include a certain proportion of persons suffering from incurable and confirmed chronic disease, many of whom however are always of the true pauper type.

This rapid increase of pauperism has of late years pressed so heavily upon the Government Central Asylums that it has been found necessary to increase them largely year by year.

The absence of suitable and sufficient accommodation in the Benevolent Asylums, for the treatment of those suffering from incurable and confirmed chronic disease, has hitherto necessitated their admission into the Sydney Infirmary, in which institution many of the beds are occupied by them to the exclusion of cases of acute disease.

The Sydney Infirmary is devoted, by the rules, "to the reception of cases of acute disease, and accident," and being conducted upon the principle of doing justice to this class, its management is proportionately expensive; thus the cost per bed is £46 per annum.

The annual cost per bed at the Liverpool Asylum is about £13.

As most of the chronic cases alluded to only require rest, simple treatment, plain wholesome diet, with cleanliness and fresh air, it is clear that a manifest injustice is done to the public purse by their maintenance in an institution the management of which is necessarily expensive.

Allowing that the treatment of such cases requires some modification in the routine of a Benevolent Asylum, necessitating a slightly increased expenditure, it is also evident that their removal from such an institution should simplify and economize its management.

That the accommodation afforded by a benevolent asylum is nearly sufficient to meet the requirement of such cases, is proved by the fact that no material suffering or inconvenience has arisen, from the removal of those who have been transferred from the Sydney Infirmary to the Liverpool Asylum during the last few years.

I will only further add, that the Government has found it necessary to subscribe largely towards the support of the Sydney hospitals; that it pays at the rate of about £40 (forty pounds) per bed, per annum, for the numerous patients admitted into the Sydney Infirmary, upon the recommendation of the Chief Secretary, and that many of these suffer from chronic and incurable disease.

Reflecting upon these and other facts, I am induced to submit for your consideration, whether it will not be advisable to convert the Victoria Barracks into a Hospital for the reception of chronic and incurable cases of disease, &c.

The character of the site and buildings is admirably suited for this purpose; while the extent of the latter would afford all the relief to the Government Asylums and Sydney Hospitals which they will require for many years to come.

In addition to this important relief to existing institutions, I am of opinion that the Barracks will also afford excellent accommodation for the reception of convalescing patients; and that there is a detached and well separated building, which might advantageously be appropriated to the purposes of Magdalen Wards.

The annual cost per bed, in such a Hospital would, I conceive, range between £16 and £20.

I have, &c.,
ALFRED ROBERTS.

The Principal Under Secretary to The Joint Honorary Secretaries, Sydney Infirmary.

Sydney, 19 August, 1870.

Gentlemen,

Attention having been called to the subject of the now unavoidable admission to the Sydney Infirmary of persons suffering from incurable and confirmed chronic disease, to the exclusion of others suffering from acute diseases, contrary to the intention of the institution, and at greater cost to the public, I am directed to invite the attendance of a deputation of gentlemen to confer with the Colonial Secretary on matters connected with the subject indicated, on Monday, the 22nd instant, at 11 a.m.

I have, &c.,
HENRY HALLORAN.

M. H. Stephen, Esq., to The Principal Under Secretary.

Sydney Infirmary,
22 August, 1870.

Sir,

I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, and to inform you that the same was not opened till after 12 o'clock this morning; therefore, the Directors have not been able to avail themselves of the Colonial Secretary's kind invitation to a conference on a matter of such importance to the institution.

The Directors have requested me to ask you to be good enough to arrange with the Colonial Secretary for a conference, at as early a date as may suit his convenience, and to send me timely notice, in order that I may summon the deputation appointed.

I remain, &c.,
M. H. STEPHEN,
Joint Hon. Secretary.

The Principal Under Secretary to The Joint Honorary Secretaries, Sydney Infirmary.

Sydney, 26 August, 1870.

Gentlemen,

Referring to your letter of the 22nd instant, I am directed by the Colonial Secretary to transmit the accompanying letter from Alfred Roberts, Esquire, containing suggestions with reference to the conversion of the Victoria Barracks into a hospital, and to request that the same may be laid before the Board of Directors of the Sydney Infirmary, for any observations they may be disposed to make for Mr. Cowper's information.

I have, &c.,
HENRY HALLORAN.

M. H. Stephen, Esq., to The Principal Under Secretary.

Sydney Infirmary,
7 September, 1870.

Sir,

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th ultimo, enclosing a communication from Alfred Roberts, Esquire, containing suggestions with reference to the conversion of the Victoria Barracks into a hospital, and inviting any observations that the Board of Directors may be disposed to offer for Mr. Cowper's consideration.

The Directors have requested me to inform you that, in consequence of the unusually large amount of business brought under their consideration at their meeting of Tuesday last, it was deemed that the important matter referred to in your letter required their most careful deliberation, and was therefore postponed to be more fully discussed at their next meeting.

I remain, &c.,
M. H. STEPHEN,
Joint Hon. Secretary.

J. E. Manning, Esq., to The Colonial Secretary.

Sydney Infirmary,
12 October, 1870.

Sir,

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 26th August, enclosing a copy of one from Mr. Alfred Roberts, and inviting the observations of the Board of Directors of this institution, on the subject of the proposed conversion of the Victoria Barracks or Cockatoo Island buildings into a hospital for chronic or convalescent patients, &c., and to inform you that it was brought under the consideration of the Board at their meeting held yesterday, and a resolution was passed of which the following is a copy:—

“Resolved, that the absence of any system of Poor Law medical relief and suitable accommodation in the Government Asylums, has for many years past rendered it necessary for this institution to receive a large number of cases of confirmed chronic and incurable disease; that such cases of chronic and incurable disease being unfitted to occupy the beds of a hospital arranged for the treatment of acute disease and accident, and nearly allied to the true pauper class, are, of all invalids, those which can most appropriately be accommodated in a Government benevolent institution; and that the Board would therefore thankfully accept any arrangement which the Government might be pleased to make for the accommodation and treatment of patients of the description referred to.”

JOHN E. MANNING,
Joint Hon. Secretary.

The Medical Adviser to the Government to The Principal Under Secretary.

Medical Adviser's Office,
23 March, 1870.

Sir,

I have the honor to forward, for the information of the Honorable the Colonial Secretary, a letter I have received from Mr. Roberts.

The facts mentioned as to the state of the hospitals might be inquired into by the Inspector of Public Charities, and the suggestions of Mr. Roberts are of interest; but as each hospital is under the management of its own committee, the action of the Government can only be indirect, by advice, and the conditions on which the aid of public money is granted.

I have, &c.,
E. S. P. BEDFORD.

[Enclosure.]

A. Roberts, Esq., to The Medical Adviser to the Government.

Castlereagh-street,
21 March, 1870.

Dear Sir,

During November last I was induced to make an overland tour from Sydney to Brisbane, and availed myself of the opportunity to visit most of the hospitals in the country through which I passed.

I beg now to submit to you, for the information of the Government, some of the facts which have thus and otherwise come under my observation, together with certain impressions arising therefrom, which have suggested themselves to my mind.

Without entering upon a description of individual institutions, I would remark upon—

- 1st.—The unfitness of the buildings generally, whether old or new, for the purposes of a hospital.
- 2nd.—The absence of means for securing efficient ventilation, and the frequent neglect in fully utilizing such as existed.
- 3rd.—The general absence of necessary medical and surgical appliances.
- 4th.—The frequent want of attendants qualified for the duties of wardsmen and nurses.
- 5th.—The use, in every instance, as far as I can recollect, of the hospital for the double purpose of hospital and benevolent asylum, without classification.

I beg to express my firm conviction that the system of receiving infirm paupers (many of whom are especially dirty and loathsome in their habits) into hospitals lies at the root of these evils, and that any attempt to remedy the latter without in the first instance removing the former will be of no avail. The existence of this pernicious custom appears to keep down the character of the hospital to that of the benevolent asylum; its depressing and injurious influence being equally apparent in the subscription lists, and upon the subdued energies of the committee, the medical officers, and the attendants; but the combined evils of the system tell with painful force upon the patients.

I am aware of the unavoidable circumstances which, in the early stages of the Colony, induced the Government and local authorities to utilize the country hospitals for the double purpose alluded to, but I also feel that the time has arrived when a system so pernicious to the recovery of the suffering patients should be modified, to meet the true interests of humanity and further the advancement of medical science.

It is but repeating an established fact to affirm that no serious case of illness or accident can be efficiently treated in the rooms of a small hospital which are also appropriated to the uses of a poor-house.

I have, &c.,
ALFRED ROBERTS.

L 2.

SINCE my former interview with the Commission, I have reflected upon question 6398, which indicated a possible wish of the Government to resume the site of the Infirmary. Retaining my opinion of the excellence of this site for a hospital, I can but feel that there are material drawbacks to the expenditure upon it of any large sum of money, now that a large general hospital is to be immediately built at Grose Farm. There can be no doubt that the central hospital for the reception of accidents and of cases that will not bear a mile or so of carriage, should be as small as possible, and I consider that one of from twenty to thirty beds would be large enough. If therefore, the Government contemplates the advisability of resuming the land in Macquarie-street, I would beg earnestly to recommend the Commission to consider whether it would not be desirable to remodel the general hospital accommodation. In such case I would beg to recommend the erection of a hospital on the Flagstaff Hill, to contain not more than thirty beds, and the immediate development of the Prince Alfred Hospital into the main general hospital.

The reasons which suggest themselves in support of this proposal are as follows:—

- 1st. The site of the Prince Alfred Hospital is already granted, and is amply sufficient for a hospital to contain 350 beds. It is also dedicated by Act of Parliament to the purposes of a hospital for the sick poor, and to the establishment of a medical school in connection with the University. Upon the latter point it should be borne in mind that, in the event of the Infirmary being retained as a hospital with say 150 or 200 beds, it will from its position command a large proportion of the cases of disease most adapted to clinical instruction; the attendance of the students at two hospitals, one at two miles distance from the medical school, are too obvious to be more than alluded to.
- 2nd. The original outlay would not be greater, and might probably be less; the whole of the money being expended in the erection of institutions of modern and improved construction, and complete in themselves.
- 3rd. If the extravagant system of occupying the beds of a general hospital, organized for the treatment of acute and serious cases, with persons suffering from incurable and confirmed chronic disease, be put aside, the plan proposed will undoubtedly afford ample accommodation for very many years to come.
- 4th. As the Prince Alfred Hospital is to be commenced at once, the patients could be removed direct from the Infirmary without the necessity of providing temporary accommodation.

I WISH to add the following to my former evidence upon the nursing department of the Infirmary:—

During my investigations in London, I satisfied myself, by practical observation, that the system introduced and carried out by Miss Osburn, differs in some material features from the Nightingale system, and in such difference is, in my opinion, much inferior to it.

I have the authority of Miss Florence Nightingale for stating that I found her impressed with a feeling of the deepest disappointment in the results attained by the staff sent to Sydney, which she appeared to consider as the nearest approach to failure which their establishment had received.

ALFRED ROBERTS.

[To Evidence of Mr. T. Park.]

M.

Mr. Thomas Park to The President of the Public Charities Commission.

Lower Forbes-street, Woolloomooloo,
11 June, 1873.

Sir,

As I may not have another opportunity of appearing before you, I think it only right and proper, and in the interests of the body to which I belong, that you should be made acquainted with the following facts relating to the Dispensing Department of the Infirmary, the importance of which in a hospital appears to have been overlooked by the House Committee.

After entering upon my duties as dispenser in September, 1869, I found that the salary had been reduced from £160 (that of my predecessor) to £120 per annum; but owing to the great increase of work caused by the formation of two new wards of twenty or twenty-five beds each, I applied for an increase, and after some time it was raised to £140.

At the commencement of the year 1872 there was a general increase of salaries and wages throughout the institution, noticed in the Report as follows:—"The salaries and wages of the officers and servants have been justly raised according to merit, &c."

I do not consider that any employé of the institution is overpaid; on the contrary, there are some decidedly underpaid, and, at the same time, overworked; but I do consider that the increase was most unfairly apportioned; for instance, the manager and resident medical officers had an increase of £50 a year each; the exact amount of the clerk and collector's I do not know; the house steward, whose office is one of trust certainly, but not requiring any great amount of ability or education to fill, £24; and the dispenser £10,—making it appear, according to the report, that he was the least meritorious of all the officers, notwithstanding that his duties are perhaps the most laborious of any.

I have already stated in my evidence that the dispensary is short-handed; this has been especially the case since November last, when the late assistant-dispenser, Mr. Harris, resigned his situation, disgusted (as I believe) with the work, remuneration, and diet, and who embraced an opportunity which then offered of going into business on his own account. Shortly after he left, the present assistant was appointed—a young man who had never filled a situation as dispenser before, and who at that time was certainly quite incompetent to perform the duties required of him, so much so that I reported it to the House Committee, who referred the matter to the resident medical staff.

Those gentlemen, feeling the disagreeableness of deciding against the young man, requested me to give him a further trial, which, from motives of generosity, he being a stranger in the Colony, and married, I foolishly agreed to do, as it gave me a great deal of extra work and responsibility, for which I have never been so much as thanked.

I must, however, do him the justice to say that he has since greatly improved; still, what he does know of dispensing he has learnt at the Infirmary. Some idea of the hard work I have had during the past six or seven months may be given, when I state that it was as much as the late assistant dispenser (who is perhaps one of the quickest in Sydney) and myself could do to keep the dispensing department in anything like efficient working order; at the present time a regular hand-to-mouth system prevails.

In November, 1871, I received instructions from the late honorary secretary, the Rev. R. Lewers, to meet three or four of the directors at Regent-street, to advise as to the fitting up of the branch dispensary, which I accordingly did, and gave them the necessary dimensions of the shelving, dispensing counter, drawers, &c., and promised to have the place fitted up and stocked with medicines, ready to open on the 1st December following, which, with the assistance of Mr. Harris, I did. For this service I have as yet received no remuneration whatever.

Until

Until lately the diet of the dispensers was so inferior that I, jointly with the present assistant dispenser, Mr. Hinvest, was compelled to write to the House Committee, complaining of it, and received the enclosed reply from the late honorary secretary, and it has since been much better, but no beer or wine has ever been allowed at dinner to the dispensers. In addition to the ordinary work of the dispensary, there are five medical pupils who, according to the rules, are entitled to receive instruction in pharmacy from the dispenser, for which no fee is allowed. The dispenser also makes out all the indents of medicines, &c., required from England for the use of the institution, amounting to upwards of £1,000 a year. All the ordinary tinctures and other preparations required are also made in the dispensary, and under difficulties from want of space, &c.

In conclusion, I beg to say you are at liberty to make what use you think proper of this communication, as I think it only fair that the public should know where some of the real grievances and mismanagement exist.

I have, &c.,

THOMAS PARK,
Dispenser, Sydney Infirmary.

[To Evidence of G. A. Mansfield, Esq.]

N.

165, Pitt-street, Sydney,
31 July, 1873.

IN reply to an inquiry made by the President, I may state that, if the central block of new buildings in front of the old premises be omitted, a saving would be effected on the amount of my estimate of the cost of new buildings to the amount of about £3,000 (three thousand pounds), this being the estimated cost of the two-storied design. The cost of the three-storied design would be £1,000 more. This calculation is made at the same rates as those given in my report.

The whole of the calculations will need revision to adapt them to the present prices for building, which are from 15 to 20 per cent. in excess of the rates ruling at the date of the report.

SYDNEY INFIRMARY BUILDINGS.

(Correspondence respecting Application for Grant of Site of).

The Under Secretary to The Deputation from the Sydney Infirmary.

Colonial Secretary's Office,
Sydney, 22 September, 1868.

Gentlemen,

With reference to the interview which you recently had with the Colonial Secretary, in regard to the Infirmary buildings, I am directed by the Attorney General to inform you that the Government have had under their consideration the application made on behalf of the committee of the Sydney Infirmary for a grant of the land in Macquarie-street on which the Infirmary buildings stand. Previously to 1848 the committee of the Infirmary occupied, with the permission of the Government, the building now used as a Branch of the Royal Mint. In September in that year, that building being required for military purposes, the committee gave it up to the Government, and were then let into possession of the adjacent building, which down to that time had been used as a Convict Hospital. The committee have continued to occupy that Hospital as an Infirmary to the present time.

2. The Government, in 1847, intimated to the committee their willingness (if the Home Government approved) to grant to them the buildings then used as an Infirmary, with half the ground between those buildings and the Domain; and on the committee taking possession of the present buildings, the Government in like manner expressed their willingness to grant to them the land on which these last-mentioned buildings are erected. Since that time, no further correspondence has taken place between the committee and the Government in reference to this matter.

3. From 1848 to the present time the Infirmary has been supported chiefly by funds voted by the Legislature; the amount of such votes in the twenty years, independently of many thousands of pounds voted for building purposes, being £66,832—the private voluntary contributions not exceeding, it is believed, £24,000.

4. Under these circumstances, I am instructed to state that the Government cannot regard the Infirmary otherwise than as a public institution, partially aided by private contributions, and they therefore do not think that they would be justified in complying with the request which has been made. They are of opinion that the committee have no just claim upon the Government for the grant which they ask for, and further, that the public interests will be best promoted by retaining the land in question in the hands and under the control of the Government as public property.

5. In making this communication, I am desired to add that the Government have no intention to propose any change in the management of the institution, which, so far as they are concerned, will be carried on as heretofore.

I have, &c.,

W. GOODMAN,
(For the Under Secretary).

The President of the Sydney Infirmary to The Honorable the Attorney General.

Sydney Infirmary and Dispensary,
1 October, 1868.

Sir,

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Goodman's letter of 22nd ult., written by your direction, on the subject of the grant claimed by the Board of the Sydney Infirmary of the land and premises in its present occupation, informing them "that they have no just claims upon the Government for the grant which they ask for, and that the Infirmary cannot be regarded by it otherwise than as a public institution."

On receipt of this letter, I lost no time in summoning a special meeting of the Board of Directors of the Infirmary, to consider the very important questions which it has raised on the points referred to; and I am requested by them to bring under your notice a succinct narrative of the circumstances under which the buildings and land now occupied by the Sydney Infirmary, and of which undisputed and undisturbed possession has been held during the last twenty years, were delivered over to their predecessors—the Board feeling assured, from the terms of the letter under reply, that many of the particulars connected therewith must have escaped the notice of the Government when they arrived at the conclusions above referred to.

As early as the year 1839, application was made by the committee of the Sydney Dispensary for a grant of the South Wing of the General Hospital, for the purposes of the Dispensary; and on the 23rd April, 1843, formal delivery of the building was given to the committee, who, in their Report for 1845, observe—"A long correspondence for a suitable site has terminated, through the kind support of His Excellency, in the grant, by the Home Government, of the south wing of the Hospital."

On

On the 2nd February, 1847, on application being made to the Government for funds for effecting some necessary repairs to these premises, the Colonial Secretary wrote to the Rev. J. M'Garvie, the Secretary of the Sydney Infirmary and Dispensary, refusing such application, but adding—

"The Governor has, however, been pleased to sanction the issue of an absolute grant for the extent of land proposed by Sir George Gipps, namely, the boundary line being drawn midway between the rear of the building and the wall of the Domain; subject, however, to a question which has arisen as to the propriety of reserving a portion of the ground around the Infirmary, for the purpose of securing free admission to the buildings of Hyde Park.

"After this preliminary has been arranged, and the land measured, the deeds of grant will issue under the Act of Council 7 Victoria, No. 23."

On the same day (2nd February, 1847) a Board Meeting was held for consideration of this letter, and a sub-committee was appointed "to prepare a Memorial to His Excellency Sir Charles A. Fitz Roy, regarding the ground at the back of the Infirmary."

In that Memorial (a copy whereof is annexed), the Board aver that they understood, from the correspondence with the Home and Colonial Governments on this subject, that the grant solicited by them included the whole of the premises and grounds attached to the south wing of the General Hospital; and that the usefulness, as well as the healthfulness, of the place, would be greatly impaired by the suggested curtailment, &c., &c.

To this Memorial an answer was received from the Colonial Secretary, on the 30th July, 1847, couched in the following language:—

"Having submitted this Memorial for the consideration of the Governor, I am directed to inform you that His Excellency thinks that sufficient reasons have been given by the Directors for the extension of the grant to the boundary of the Domain; the deeds will therefore be prepared, to include the whole of the ground attached to the buildings of the Infirmary, with the exception of a small space of 26 feet 7 inches in a line with the north wall of Hyde Park Barracks, to be reserved for the purpose of ensuring the free circulation of air, and access to the latter establishment."

It will be seen, from this correspondence, that a distinct promise (without reservation of any kind) was made by the Government, of an absolute grant of the south wing of the General Hospital, being the premises now occupied by the Mint.

On the 3rd August, 1847, the Board of Directors passed the following Minute on the subject, viz.:—

"That the thanks of the Directors be tendered to His Excellency Sir Charles A. Fitz Roy, Patron of the Infirmary, for his kind and liberal compliance with the request of the Directors, by granting the land applied for in the Memorial, and for his humane consideration for the best interests of diseased destitute poor persons in Sydney and neighbourhood, for whose benefit this grant is made; and that the Secretary be requested to communicate the same to His Excellency, through the Honorable the Colonial Secretary."

Early in the year 1848, the Government became desirous of breaking up the Convict Hospital in Sydney, established in the buildings at present in the occupation of the Sydney Infirmary; and a letter was accordingly written by the Colonial Secretary, under date 17th February, 1848, to the Board of the Sydney Infirmary, requesting to be informed whether that institution could accommodate twenty five patients of the class of free paupers then under treatment in the Convict Hospital, at the expense of the Colonial Government; and further, whether the Board would be prepared to make some permanent arrangement for the future treatment of patients of the above class, and upon what terms.

To this letter a reply was sent by the Secretary of the Sydney Infirmary, on the 24th February, 1848, stating that the Board regretted that, solely from want of room in the house, it was not in their power to receive twenty-five additional patients; and he enclosed resolutions upon the subject, the third of which set forth—

"That in the event of the Convict Hospital being made over to the Sydney Infirmary and Dispensary, the Directors were prepared to receive free paupers, upon certain conditions; these being that the rate should vary from time to time, but should not exceed the actual expense incurred by the patient while in the house."

To this letter the Colonial Secretary replied, on the 13th March, 1848, approving of the terms upon which pauper patients were to be received, and stating "that His Excellency approves of the Convict Hospital being, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State, placed at your disposal as a Dispensary and Infirmary, on the wing of the Hospital buildings at present in your possession being given up."

On the 1st July, 1848, the Secretary of the Sydney Infirmary wrote to the Colonial Secretary, asking him when possession of the whole or any portion of the Convict Hospital could be obtained for the use of the Infirmary and Dispensary, and under what conditions His Excellency would be enabled to make a permanent grant of the same.

To this letter the Colonial Secretary replied, on the 19th July, 1848, that possession of the Convict Hospital could be given when it should be no longer required by the Medical Department; but that, as the arrangement must be subject to the approval of the Home Government, a permanent grant could not at present be promised by His Excellency, and that it must be understood that pauper patients and convicts were, as previously stipulated, to be treated in the Infirmary.

On the 18th August, 1848, the Board of Directors of the Sydney Infirmary accepted the conditional surrender of the Hospital, upon the understanding that "in the event of the grant of the Hospital and premises not being confirmed by Her Majesty's Home Government, the Directors will be at liberty to re-enter into possession of the premises they now occupy"; and on the 6th September, 1848, the Colonial Secretary, repeating the above words, writes—"and in reply, I am directed to inform you that His Excellency has approved of the transfer being made, on the understanding mentioned."

Accordingly, on the 13th September, 1848, the Infirmary entered into possession of the premises it now occupies, for the twofold consideration of giving up the premises of which it had the promise of an absolute grant, and of undertaking to maintain pauper patients upon certain conditions, and upon the distinct understanding that, in the event of the grant of the Hospital and premises not being confirmed by the Home Government, the Directors had a right of re-entry into the south wing of the Hospital, being the premises now occupied by the Mint.

No notice has ever been received by the Directors of the non-confirmation by the Home Government of this grant, while, by the Constitution Act, and by the Act of the Imperial Parliament 18 & 19 Vic., cap. 55, the power to fulfil the promises made by the Government of 1848 became vested, in 1855, in the Colonial Government.

Since 1848, the right of the Infirmary to the land and premises it now occupies has never been called in question; on the contrary, it has been admitted in correspondence with the Government, who being desirous, in March, 1855, of removing a boundary wall between the Mint and the Infirmary, and of giving some small portion of land to the Mint, wrote as follows:—"You will have the goodness to inform me whether the Trustees of the Infirmary are willing to appropriate the ground which is necessary for this arrangement, and have any objection to the removal of the wall, and the erection of another as proposed"; and, if any link were wanting to show the absolute right of the Infirmary to a grant of the land which it now occupies, it will be found in the fact that the local Government, in 1855, made over to the Sydney Branch of the Royal Mint the land which it now occupies, and to which, if the present decision of the Government be tenable, the Board of the Infirmary have an undoubted right, under the absolute promise made to them by order of Sir Charles Fitz Roy, as communicated in the letters of the Colonial Secretary of 2nd February and 30th July, 1847, such right having been preserved to them by the letter of the Colonial Secretary, dated 6th September, 1848, previously quoted.

In support of the decision of the Government, you further state that, from 1848 to the present time, the Infirmary has been supported chiefly by funds voted by the Legislature—the amounts of such votes in twenty years being £66,832, the private voluntary contributions not exceeding, it is believed, £24,000.

A careful examination of the accounts for that period shows that the Government have left entirely out of sight the arrangement entered into, and stipulated for, in the correspondence of March and September, 1848, previously alluded to, and which made it incumbent upon the Infirmary Authorities to receive pauper patients, upon condition of being reimbursed by the Government the actual cost of the maintenance of such patients.

It can be shown indisputably that, for the twenty years I have alluded to, the Government have sent to the Infirmary pauper patients the cost of whose maintenance has amounted to £47,885 17s. 10d., and that, while the receipts from private sources have amounted to £45,167 10s. 7d., the total annual grants voted by Parliament in augmentation of private contributions, and in actual support of the Infirmary, do not exceed the sum of £21,950 9s. 8d., for the twenty years referred to. The latter amount is exclusive of grants for building purposes availed of, during the same period, to the extent of £8,432.

The additional accommodation which was then provided was chiefly rendered necessary by the increased number of pauper patients admitted by order of the Government (under the stipulations made with the Authorities of the Infirmary when the present premises were handed over to them), and which freed the Government of the day from the cost of maintaining a separate hospital for their treatment. In other words, the subscriptions of private individuals and other receipt have amounted to £45,167 10s. 7d., instead of £24,000, and the votes of the Legislature in aid of such contributions to £21,950 9s. 8d., instead of £66,832, as alleged. These

These votes had their origin in 1837, when it was thought desirable to supplement the subscription of private individuals to this and kindred institutions, by voting from the public purse a sum equal to such subscriptions. This rule, however, was frequently departed from, as will be evident from the Government aid to this institution having, during the twenty years referred to, not quite amounted to one-half of the contributions from private sources. I desire, however, not to be misunderstood on this point. The Directors of the institution have been ever ready to acknowledge the munificence of the Government and the Legislature in appropriating these sums in aid of the private subscriptions at the disposal of the Board, and have regarded with the greatest satisfaction and thankfulness this wise liberality of the Parliament, as offering at once an acknowledgment of and a stimulant to the more liberal support of the general subscribers, who have devoted such large sums to the relief of the sick and needy.

I have been induced to quote the above figures, to show that the Government have fallen into an error which completely alters the complexion and the nature of the aid afforded by the Legislature, and which has doubtless influenced them in arriving at the conclusion set out in the fourth paragraph of your letter, viz.—“that the Government cannot regard the Infirmary otherwise than as a public institution partially aided by private contributions.”

In reference to this subject, I desire to state that the Sydney Dispensary was established in 1826 entirely by private charity; that it received no aid whatever from the public funds up to the year 1837; that in the year 1839 it was considered by the late Sir George Gipps in the light of a private Charity, as appears from the annexed extract of his letter, written on his acceptance of the office of Patron; that in the year 1843, the Legislature of the Colony, in passing the Act 7 Vict. No. 23, “to enable the Members of a certain Institution in the Colony of New South Wales denominated the Sydney Dispensary to sue and be sued &c.” confirmed this character; that the annual election of the office-bearers by the subscribers, and the undisputed control of the management by such office-bearers, retains to it a character which the Directors would be neither willing nor justified in ceding. They consider that, whatever fault there may have been in their management of the institution, it nevertheless has been such as to have proved eminently useful to thousands of their poor and needy fellow-colonists; and they feel that, in justice to those who originated this Charity, and to those who have for years contributed so largely and so liberally to its support, they are bound to uphold the character of the institution as one entirely founded and mainly supported by private charity.

Entertaining these views, it appears unnecessary for me to make any reference to the concluding paragraph of your letter, in which you intimate that the Government have no intention to propose any change in the management of the institution, which, so far as they are concerned, will be carried on as heretofore.

Under the circumstances detailed in this letter, the Board venture to hope that, on reconsideration of the subject, the Government will see no objection to an immediate issue of the grant of the land and buildings now in the occupation of the Sydney Infirmary.

I have, &c.,
E. DEAS THOMSON,
President of the Sydney Infirmary and Dispensary.

P.S.—It seems scarcely necessary to add, that the large amount voted and expended for the treatment of pauper patients admitted into the Infirmary by order of the Government, cannot be regarded in the light of a subsidy or endowment chargeable against the institution. On the contrary, it is in reimbursement of a service rendered by it to the Government and the public, and it is believed, quite as efficiently as it could be provided for in any public establishment, and at a much cheaper rate.

The patients treated in the Infirmary, moreover, enjoy the benefit, free of any charge, of the highest medical and surgical skill afforded by its honorary staff of physicians and surgeons.—E.D.T.

[Enclosure No. 1.]

To His Excellency Sir Charles A. Fitz Roy, Knight, Governor, &c., &c., &c.

The Memorial of the Board of Directors of the Sydney Infirmary and Dispensary,— Sheweth:—

That Memorialists beg to address your Excellency in reference to the issue of an absolute grant for the extent of land between Macquarie-street and the wall of the Domain, which they consider indispensable for the benefit of that institution.

That Memorialists, in their correspondence with the Home and Colonial Governments on this subject, understood that the grant solicited by them included the whole of the premises and grounds attached to the south wing of the General Hospital; nor do they observe that any reservation of any portion of the back premises is made by the Right Honorable the Secretary of State or the Lords of the Treasury.

That Memorialists would observe that, if such reservation is made, and a line of building towards the Domain erected, whose back premises may abut on the Infirmary grounds, the usefulness, as well as the healthfulness, of the place will be greatly impaired, as the remaining space would not leave room for exercise to the convalescent patients, or for airing or drying clothing and bedding.

That Memorialists are apprehensive that the establishment would fail of success by a diminution of that public support which has attended the united institutions of the Sydney Infirmary and Dispensary; and that, probably, the maintenance of the afflicted poor would again fall upon the Government.

Memorialists would further observe that their wards are generally full, sixty-three patients being now in the house; that they intend to build an operating-room, with an apartment for a surgical and medical museum; and also to extend the Infirmary to meet the wants of the town population, to classify the inmates, particularly syphilitic, deranged, and female patients.

That Memorialists have always had it in view to make these united institutions the nucleus of a Medical School for educating young persons in the Colony to the medical profession, but should this reservation be made, they fear this purpose must be abandoned.

Your Memorialists would therefore pray that your Excellency would include in the contemplated grant, the whole of the ground at present attached to the building occupied by the Sydney Infirmary.

[Enclosure No. 2.]

Extract of a letter from His Excellency Sir George Gipps to the Board of Directors of the Sydney Dispensary.

Few things are of more importance to a young community than an early attention to institutions of benevolence, and to the principles on which they ought to be conducted. As a general rule, nothing can, I believe, be laid down more safely than that they are best managed by committees elected by the subscribers out of their own body; a rule which I am happy to find you have adopted, and which certainly is well justified by the rapid progress which your successive annual reports prove your institution to be making.

Expensive endowments, whether given by the State or derived from the munificence of individuals, are rarely managed with economy; and an indifference to waste is but too prevalent, even where the entire funds, for any purpose whatsoever, are annually supplied from the public purse. In an economical point of view even, it is therefore desirable that the support and management of such institutions should principally devolve on the inhabitants of the districts for whose benefit they are intended; but how much more so is it, when we regard them in a higher point of view, or in relation to their influence on the hearts and affections of men? for all, I think, will allow, that charity, when dispensed by the officers of Government, can never be of that doubly blessed nature which, like mercy, blesseth him who gives no less than him who takes.

The Attorney General to The President of the Sydney Infirmary.

Attorney General's Office,
3 October, 1868.

Sir,

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, and to state in reply, that I am unable to see any reason to justify the Government in arriving at a different conclusion from that which has been already communicated to the committee of the Infirmary, in reference to the application for a grant of the Infirmary buildings in Macquarie-street.

The Government were aware, when they sent that communication, of the promise which a former Government had made to the committee of such a grant as that now asked for; but notwithstanding such promise, they could not then, and they do not now, recognize the propriety of issuing it. They regard the promise, not only of the grant now claimed, but also the previous promise of the grant of the building used as a Branch of the Royal Mint, as having been made improvidently and without any consideration. The subscribers to the "Sydney Dispensary" never, so far as the Government are aware, either raised, or bound themselves to raise, any fund which could be made available for the purpose of enforcing the performance of the condition in reference to free paupers on which the second grant was promised; nor had the Government any tangible guarantee, when the first grant was promised, that the Infirmary would continue to be kept up. From the commencement of the institution its members have been merely voluntary subscribers, who might at any moment withdraw their support.

A "Society" such as this, without permanent funds, without fixed members, without any provision for compulsory contributions, dependent altogether, except as to a few legacies and donations, upon casual subscriptions and such aid as Parliament might from time to time grant,—liable at any moment to be extinguished for want of funds,—is not, in the opinion of the present Government, a Society of such a character as to make it right or expedient that a valuable public building should be granted to it in the manner contemplated. Neither can the Government see that a promise to a Society, which itself is either under no obligation, or not in a position to guarantee the performance of any obligation, is in any way binding, or can be regarded as anything but nudum pactum. The power conceded to the Society to use the buildings in question for the purposes for which they were handed over, so long as they have funds at their disposal, is one thing—the grant in fee of these buildings to the Society is another. With the use of the buildings for the purposes of an Infirmary the Government have no desire or intention to interfere, but they do object to granting them in perpetuity to a body which may at any time cease to be able, from want of means, to afford the "medical and surgical relief to poor and destitute persons" for which they were organized, and for which the buildings were entrusted to them. It is the interest of the public that the Infirmary should be kept up, but it is also the interest of the public that the land on which the buildings stand should remain public property. It seems to the Government that you are altogether in error in your estimate of the amount of aid afforded by Parliament to the Infirmary. The sum stated in the communication to which your letter is a reply was taken from the Appropriation Acts for the years referred to. There is no reason for drawing any distinction between the sums voted as contributions and those voted for the maintenance of pauper patients. In either case, the money was contributed for the maintenance and treatment of the persons for whom the Infirmary was kept up. In the preamble of the Act to which you have referred, the object of the Society is stated to be "to afford medical and surgical relief to poor and destitute persons," and there can be no doubt that pauper patients are included under these designations. Moreover, it was stipulated when the buildings were handed over, that pauper patients should be received in it. Such being the uses to which, in the contemplation of the Society, the Government, and the Legislature, these buildings were to be and have been all along applied, it cannot be contended that the funds granted in aid of pauper patients are not granted in aid of the institution. The institution affords relief to a variety of patients, some of whom are paupers some of whom are not, but all whom are regularly there; and the cost of their maintenance and treatment amounts to a total sum, the greater part of which has, in each year for the last twenty years, been provided by the Legislature. Without this aid, the Infirmary would not be able to provide for more than a third of the patients now under its care, and the buildings would be too large for its requirements.

The Government are still of opinion that the Infirmary, although in its inception and its management a private, is in substance a public institution; but not a public institution such as that they can interfere with in the same manner as with a public department. The medical treatment of "poor and destitute persons" was originally undertaken by those who thought fit to subscribe to the Infirmary; but in order that a greater number of persons might be relieved than private subscriptions would allow, the Government were asked to give the use of a costly building, and the Legislature to afford a large annual vote. The Government and the Legislature, by complying with these requests, have become, and for twenty years have been the chief maintainers of the institution; and consequently, the Infirmary, whatever its origin and management, cannot be regarded otherwise than as a public institution, and one in the maintenance of which the Government and Parliament are at all times likely to take the deepest interest.

The gentlemen who founded this excellent institution, those who manage it, and those who have for so many years given to it their time, thought, money, and professional skill, are well entitled to the gratitude of the public. The assistance which has heretofore been given, the Government are willing, so far as they are concerned, to continue. The buildings which the committee occupy they have no intention of withdrawing from them, but the grant of the land on which those buildings are erected they feel themselves compelled to refuse.

I have, &c.,
JAMES MARTIN.

The President of the Sydney Infirmary to The Hon. the Attorney General.

Sydney Infirmary,
19 October, 1868.

Sir,

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3rd instant, stating that you are "unable to see any reason to justify the Government in arriving at any other conclusion from that which has already been communicated to the committee in reference to the application for a grant of the Infirmary Buildings in Macquarie-street."

Having submitted your letter to the Board of Directors of the Infirmary, I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of the minutes of proceedings, unanimously adopted this day by the Board, protesting against the decision of the Government in refusing to issue a deed of grant for the land now occupied by the Sydney Infirmary, and stating the reasons which have induced the Board to make this protest.

I have, &c.,
E. DEAS THOMSON,
President of the Sydney Infirmary.

THE President laid before the Board a letter from the Honorable the Attorney General, bearing date the 3rd October, 1868, and stating that he "is unable to see any reason to justify the Government in arriving at any other conclusion from that which has already been communicated to the committee in reference to the application for a grant of the Infirmary Buildings in Macquarie-street."

The

The Board having maturely considered this decision and the grounds upon which it is based, deem it their duty, in the interests of the important and valuable institution which they represent, to make the following observations.

The Attorney General states that "the Government were aware, when they sent that communication, of a promise which a former Government had made to the committee of such a grant as that now asked for; but, notwithstanding such promise, they could not then and they do not now recognize the propriety of issuing it. They regard not only the promise of the grant now claimed, but also of the previous promise of the building used as a Branch of the Royal Mint, as having been made improvidently and without any consideration."

The Board feel constrained to observe that they have received this intimation of the decision of the Government with the utmost surprise. They conscientiously believe that no precedent can be found of any Government under the British Crown having refused to fulfil a solemn promise made for a lawful purpose under lawful authority, nor can they admit that the grounds of the refusal can be sustained by the plain facts of the case.

It cannot be said with truth that the promise was made improvidently and without consideration, when it can be shown that several thousand pauper patients, admitted by order of the Government, have been annually treated in the Infirmary, in conformity with the stipulation made with the Directors when the grant was promised to them; and that upwards of £45,000 has, during the last twenty years, been raised by voluntary donations and subscriptions for the support of patients admitted by order of the subscribers. The Attorney General proceeds to observe "that the subscribers to the Sydney Dispensary never, so far as Government are aware, either raised, or bound themselves to raise, any fund which could be made available for the purpose of enforcing performance of the conditions in reference to free paupers on which the second grant was promised; nor had the Government any tangible guarantee, when the first grant was promised, that the Infirmary would continue to be kept up. From the commencement of the institution, its members have been merely voluntary subscribers, who might at any moment withdraw their support."

In answer to these objections, the Board deem it sufficient to observe that, during the twenty years which have elapsed since the promise was made, no less a sum than £45,167 10s. 7d. has been raised by voluntary donations and contributions, and that there can be no reason to doubt that an institution which has thus been nobly supported during so long a period will continue to receive, as heretofore, the like pecuniary aid from the public.

To urge such a reason as that advanced by the Government in refusing the grant, appears to the Board to be calculated to affect the interests, not only of this institution, but of every other Charity in the Colony, not one of which, it is believed, is supported otherwise than by voluntary donations and subscriptions, supplemented, in certain cases, it is admitted, by Parliamentary grants. It further appears to the Board that the very best guarantee which it could give to the Government for the performance of the condition in reference to free paupers has been its punctual and honorable fulfilment of it for a period of upwards of twenty years; and they are at a loss to conceive why the Government should raise a doubt as to their ability to continue to discharge the obligations under which they were promised the grant.

The Attorney General further states that "a Society such as this, without permanent funds, without fixed members, without any provision for compulsory contribution, dependent altogether (except as to a few legacies and donations) upon casual subscriptions, and such as Parliament might from time to time grant, liable at any moment to be extinguished for want of funds, is not, in the opinion of the present Government, a society of such a character as to make it right or expedient that a valuable public building should be granted to it in the manner contemplated."

It appears to the Board that, in making these observations, the Government have entirely overlooked the fact that the Sydney Dispensary obtained a legislative recognition and status under the provisions of the Act of the Government and Council 7th Victoria, No. 23—that by clauses of that statute the same were extended to the Society at all times during its continuance, whether composed of the same or any other members—and that by clause 5 the provisions of the Act were made applicable to the institution if it should establish a General Hospital for the reception and relief of sick patients. The Board assert, without fear of contradiction, that no such plea for refusing to issue a deed of grant to a charitable institution, has ever before been urged in this or any other British Possession. On the contrary, it will be found, as far as this Colony is concerned, that the Benevolent Society and Society for the Relief of Destitute Children, which are supported by such subscriptions and Parliamentary grants, precisely in the same manner as the Sydney Infirmary, have each received valuable grants of land from the Crown, as well as large sums from the public funds, for the erection of buildings. The Board consider it peculiarly hard that the Institution which they represent, and which, perhaps more than any other, has for many long years rendered such valuable services to the Government, in the medical and surgical care and treatment of their pauper patients, should be singled out for the establishment of so objectionable and impolitic a precedent.

The Attorney General goes on to say—"Neither can the Government see that a promise to a Society which itself is either under no obligation or not in a position to guarantee the performance of any obligation, is in any way binding, or anything but a nudum factum."

The Board must be allowed respectfully to state that they cannot for a moment admit the justice or propriety of refusing to fulfil an engagement solemnly entered into upon such grounds as are here urged. On the contrary, as the institution has faithfully performed the condition upon which the promise was made, it is no more than justice to require that the Government, on their part, should at once recognize their claim.

The Attorney General further observes that "It seems to the Government that the President was in error in his estimate of the amount of aid afforded by Parliament to the Infirmary." The sum stated in the communication to which his letter is a reply was taken from the Appropriation Acts for the years referred to. "There is no reason," the Attorney General further observes, "for drawing any distinction between the sums voted as contributions and those voted for pauper patients. In either case the money was contributed for the maintenance and treatment of the persons for whom the Infirmary was kept up."

The Board do not admit that there was any error in the President's statement. The figures quoted by him were carefully abstracted from the accounts kept by the Infirmary. They show the following result, namely, that while the private contributions towards the support of the Infirmary amounted in the last twenty years to £45,167 10s. 7d., the votes of the Legislature in aid of such contributions amounted only to £21,950 9s. 8d. It is not denied that the further sum of £47,885 17s. 10d. was voted by Parliament for the maintenance and treatment of pauper patients admitted into the Infirmary by order of the Government; but, as already stated in the President's letter of the 1st instant, this amount cannot with any show of justice be made chargeable against the institution, but is simply as reimbursement of a service rendered in conformity with the stipulation made with the Board when the deed of grant was promised. This service the Board confidently asserts has been performed quite as efficiently as it could have been provided for in any public establishment, and at a very much cheaper rate.

The Board considers that they are fully justified in asserting that the valuable services thus rendered to the Government and the public give a strength to their claim which cannot in justice be ignored.

The Board do not consider it necessary to make any reply to the other portions of the Attorney General's letter. They are in fact substantially answered in the foregoing observations.

The Board cannot conclude this minute without most respectfully, but firmly, protesting against the refusal of the Government to fulfil the promise made to their predecessors in 1848, and upon the faith of which they have held undisputed and undisturbed possession for the last twenty years of the land on which the present Infirmary buildings stand.

The Attorney General to The President of the Sydney Infirmary.

Attorney General's Office,
20 October, 1868.

Sir,

I do myself the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date. I have nothing to add to the reasons already given for the decision arrived at in reference to the grant asked for by the committee of the Sydney Infirmary.

SPECIAL

SPECIAL APPENDIX.

James C. Taylor, Esq., to the President of the Public Charities Commission.

131, Pitt-street, Sydney,
16 June, 1873.

Sir,

In compliance with the instructions contained in your letter of 5th instant, I have carefully investigated the mode in which the books of the Sydney Infirmary are kept, with regard to the receipt and issue of the stores, &c., of that institution, and have now the honor to inform you there is no check at present upon the storekeeper's accounts; he appears to receive and issue everything without his books being looked into.

There are a great number of stock books kept in which entries are made of the several articles received and issued, but no one checks these entries. This state of things ought not to exist, and I would suggest as a remedy—

1. That the nurses send to the storekeeper daily their requisitions for the number of the several diets, &c., required in their respective wards, with particulars of wines and spirits ordered by the medical officers.
2. That some party from the office department went through the wards, and took from the patients' cards, the diets, &c., ordered, and made a calculation of what stores ought to have been issued by the storekeeper, and check the storekeeper's books every day.
3. That the nurses should daily send to the office a memorandum of what diets they have received from the kitchen; this would be another check upon the cook's and storekeeper's departments.

I consider all stores except medical should pass through the storekeeper's hands, and a check upon what he issues be kept in the office, whether such issues of stores be required by the patients or any other department of the institution.

The stock books kept by the storekeeper at present are altogether too numerous, and might easily be condensed into two, or at most three.

I do not think any books could be kept to check the dispenser's department.

The plan on which the office books are kept I do not consider satisfactory, and should recommend their being brought under a system of double-entry.

I am, &c.,
JAMES C. TAYLOR,
Accountant.

VICTORIA, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, and so forth,—

To our trusty and well-beloved—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esquire, Master of Arts and Barrister-at-Law;
JOSEPH WEARNE, Esquire, a Member of our Legislative Assembly of our Colony of New South Wales;
MICHAEL METCALFE, Esquire, one of our Justices of the Peace of our said Colony;
SAMUEL GOOLD, Esquire, one of our Justices of the Peace of our said Colony;
RICHARD DRIVER, Esquire, a Member of our said Legislative Assembly;
EYRE GOULBURN ELLIS, Esquire; and CHARLES COWPEE, Junior, Esquire, Water Police Magistrate;

Greeting:

KNOW ye that we, reposing great trust and confidence in your ability, zeal, industry, discretion, and integrity, have authorized and appointed, and do by these presents authorize and appoint you to be our Commissioners to inquire into and report upon the working and management of the Public Charities, more particularly the Sydney Infirmary and the Orphan Schools; the inquiry to be directed to the sanitary condition, dietary scales, dormitory accommodation, systems of superintendence, medical treatment, and all other matters of a cognate nature; and, in the cases of the Schools and Benevolent Asylums, to the methods of teaching and other educational agencies, and the extent to which the available labour of adults and children is turned to a productive account; and to make such recommendations as may be considered advisable, based upon the results of the inquiry, for the improved management of the institutions inquired into: And, for the better discovery of the truth in the premises, we do, by these presents, give and grant to you, or any three or more of you, full power and authority to call before you, or any three or more of you, all such persons as you shall judge necessary for the purpose of this our Commission: And we do also give and grant unto you, or any three or more of you, full power and authority to call for and have access to all such official books, documents, papers, and records as you may deem expedient, and to inquire of and concerning the premises by all other lawful ways and means whatsoever: And we do give you power, at your discretion, to procure such clerical and other assistance as you may deem necessary for enabling you duly to execute this our Commission: And our further will and pleasure is that you do, within four months after the date of this our Commission, or as soon as the same can conveniently be done (using all diligence) certify to us, in the Office of our Colonial Secretary, under your hands, or under the hands of any five or more of you, what you shall find touching the premises: And we further will and command, and by these presents, ordain that this our Commission shall continue in full force and virtue, and that you, our said Commissioners, or any three or more of you, shall and may, from time to time, proceed in the execution thereof, and of every matter and thing therein contained, although the same be not continued, from time to time by adjournment: And we hereby command all Government Officers, and other persons whomsoever, within our said Colony, that they be assistant to you, and each of you, in the execution of these presents: And we appoint you, the said William Charles Windeyer, Esquire, to be President of this our Commission.

In testimony whereof, we have caused these our Letters to be made Patent and the Great Seal of our said Colony to be hereunto affixed.

Witness SIR HERCULES GEORGE ROBERT ROBINSON, Knight Commander of our Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George, our Governor and Commander-in-Chief of our Colony of New South Wales and its Dependencies, at Government House, Sydney, in New South Wales aforesaid, this eighth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, and in the thirty-sixth year of our Reign.

(L.S.) HERCULES ROBINSON.

By His Excellency's Command,

HENRY PARKES.

Entered on record by me, in Register of Patents, No. 10, page 136, this eighth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three.

HENRY HALLORAN,
Under Secretary.

THE PRINCIPAL UNDER SECRETARY TO THE PRESIDENT AND MEMBERS OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON PUBLIC CHARITIES.

Colonial Secretary's Office,
Sydney, 17 April, 1873.

GENTLEMEN,

I am directed by the Colonial Secretary to explain that any expense which may be found necessary in the conduct of the inquiry entrusted to you will be met by the Government, on the presentation of vouchers, duly signed by the President.

2. The Commission can hold its meetings in the large room at the Colonial Secretary's Office; and it will be necessary to engage the services of a shorthand writer, who very probably may also be prepared to perform the duties of secretary.

Whether the two offices can be combined or not, the necessary precautions must be taken to see that the duties of the two offices are efficiently performed, as regular minutes of the proceedings of the Commission must be accurately kept, and it is important that all correspondence should be conducted with uniform attention and courtesy.

3. Travelling and any other expenses rendered necessary in the performance of your duties will be allowed.

4. The Members of the Commission who are not Members of Parliament will be paid by fees for their attendances; and the Colonial Secretary proposes that the same scale of fees as was fixed for the Water Supply Commission in 1867 should, in the present case, be acted upon, namely:—

Non-official members	£3	3	0

5. Mr. Parkes considers that the terms of your appointment are sufficiently wide to enable you to direct your inquiry to any matter within the general scope and objects of a Public Charity, although the matter itself may not be expressly named in your Commission. It is particularly desired that defects of management in every instance should be clearly pointed out, with the view to improvement; and any recommendations arising from the special knowledge acquired by you in the course of your inquiry will be carefully considered by the Government. In the case of the Sydney Infirmary, it appears to Mr. Parkes that it will be desirable to keep in view the principles of modern hospital management which have been of late years accepted by those who have devoted their attention most beneficially to this object in England. The object of the Government is to place this, the principal hospital of the Colony, under the most improved system of management.

6. With regard to the Orphanages and Industrial Schools, the introduction of new methods of industrial training, which would—among other results—turn the labour of the inmates to more profitable account, would be regarded with much satisfaction by the Government.

I have, &c.,
HENRY HALLORAN.

Public Charities Commission.

MINUTES of the PROCEEDINGS of the Royal Commission, appointed on the 8th April, 1873, to inquire into and report upon the working and management of the Public Charities, more particularly the Sydney Infirmary and Orphan Schools.

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

M. Metcalfe, Esq.
Samuel Goold, Esq.

Eyre G. Ellis, Esq.
Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

The Commission was read.

Mr. Walter H. Cooper was appointed Secretary and Shorthand Writer.

The Commission deliberated as to the mode in which the inquiry should be conducted; and, in consequence of some Members being unable to attend during the sittings of the Parliament, it was decided to adjourn until the 1st day of May next ensuing.

THURSDAY, 1 MAY, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Richard Driver, Esq., M.P.
Samuel Goold, Esq.
Eyre G. Ellis, Esq.

Joseph Wearne, Esq., M.P.
Michael Metcalfe, Esq.
Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

Letter read from the Principal Under Secretary explaining the scope and objects of the Commission and stating the scale of fees allowed to the Commissioners. (See Appendix.)

Mr. J. R. Street, Honorary Treasurer of the Sydney Infirmary, called in and examined.

Witness handed in copies of the "Rules and Regulations of the Sydney Infirmary," and By-laws of the Sydney Infirmary."

The witness withdrew.

The Commission deliberated.

Moved by Mr. Driver, seconded by Mr. Wearne, and carried:—

That the President be requested to wait upon the Colonial Secretary, to ascertain if it is proposed to issue any grant of the site of the Sydney Infirmary; and if so, to request that the issue of such grant may be postponed until the Commission shall have brought up their Report.

The Secretary was directed to communicate with the Honorary Secretaries of the Sydney Infirmary, and request that the Commission might be allowed to meet in the Board-room of that institution, for the purpose of examining witnesses.

MONDAY, 5 MAY, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Joseph Wearne, Esq., M.L.A.
Samuel Goold, Esq.

Eyre G. Ellis, Esq.
Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

The President announced that, in pursuance of the resolution passed at the preceding meeting of the Commission, he had waited upon the Colonial Secretary, who had informed him that no grant of the site of the Sydney Infirmary would be issued, nor any change made in respect of the Public Charities, until after the Commission had brought up their Report.

Correspondence with reference to meetings of the Commission to be held at the Sydney Infirmary was read.

Mr. John Blackstone, Manager, and Miss Lucy Osburn, Lady Superintendent of the Sydney Infirmary, were called in severally and examined.

Miss Osburn handed in—

1. Miss Nightingale's Memo. on the Method of improving the Nursing Service of Hospitals.

Mr. Joseph Jones, a witness examined by the Commission on the 22nd May, having made the following memo. on his evidence of that date sent to him for revision, viz.—

“The questions and answers in this day's evidence are transposed and alters the context materially, and several questions and answers are omitted.”

He

He was called in and examined with reference to the alleged transpositions and omissions.

The witness assented that questions 4112 to 4117 inclusive, were wrongly placed in the middle of his examination, and should have followed question 4204; but he admitted that such transposition did not materially affect the substance of his evidence. He also said that a question as to whether he was "a brother of Mr. Jones of the Custom House," and a question as to whether he "received an allowance of wine from the Infirmary," had been omitted, but that he did not desire to have his answers to those questions appended to his evidence.

The President stated that, with regard to the first part of his complaint, Mr. Jones was entirely wrong, as he (the President) had asked both sets of questions himself, and that he had asked the second set of questions some time after putting the first set, in consequence of a communication which had taken place between himself and a gentleman who was present at the time.

Mr. Cowper confirmed the President's statement.

The Shorthand-writer said he had referred to his notes of the evidence given on the 22nd May, and found it to be utterly impossible that the alleged transposition could have taken place. The questions referred to as having been omitted were not intended for insertion in the evidence.

The Commission decided that Mr. Jones' evidence of the 22nd May was correctly taken, and should be printed as transcribed by the Shorthand-writer.

Miss Gertrude Moule, Head Nurse, Sydney Infirmary, called in and examined.

G. A. Mansfield, Esq., Architect, Sydney Infirmary, called in and examined.

Witness handed in—

1. Report on Infirmary Buildings and on Plans showing alterations and improvements. (Appendix G.)
2. Plans adopted by the Board of the Infirmary, showing proposed alterations and improvements in elevation, ground floor, upper story, and out-offices. (Separate Appendix.)

Mrs. Jessie Whitelaw, Head Nurse, Sydney Infirmary, called in and examined.

Alfred Roberts, Esq., called in and examined.

Witness handed in—

Statement of Hospital Expenditure in London and the Provinces. (Appendix H.)

The Commission resolved that an Accountant should be employed to examine the books of the Infirmary, and report as to whether there was a sufficient check upon the receipt and issue of the stores of the institution.

Charles Cowper, junr.		Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

The following letters were read:—

From Mr. J. R. Kemp, late a patient in the Sydney Infirmary, requesting to be examined.

From Mr. Thomas Park, Dispenser, Sydney Infirmary, stating certain grievances with regard to his treatment by the authorities of the institution. (See Appendix M.)

From Mr. J. C. Taylor, Accountant, reporting that he had examined the books of account of the Sydney Infirmary, and stating the result of his investigation. (See Special Appendix.)

It was ordered that Mr. Park's letter be appended to his evidence given before the Commission, and that the Accountant's report be printed and form a portion of the evidence.

Dr. Morgan, Dr. Fyffe, and Dr. Patterson, three witnesses summoned at their own request, failing to attend, no evidence was taken.

The Right Reverend Dr. Quinn, R.C. Bishop of Bathurst, having intimated his desire to be examined by the Commission on matters connected with the Orphan Schools, the Secretary was directed to write to that gentleman and inquire when it would be convenient for him to attend for the purpose of giving evidence.

The Secretary having reported that Mr. Kemp could not be found, and that gentleman not having stated the matters on which he desired to give evidence, the Commission did not deem it expedient to take any further trouble in the matter.

Eyre G. Ellis, Esq.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

Samuel Goold, Esq.

Joseph Wearne, Esq., M.P.

On the minutes of the preceding meeting been read, Mr. Goold having reconsidered the matter of the closing of the evidence on the Infirmary and the bringing up of the Report, desired to have the division on Mr. Metcalfe's motion to that effect placed on record, and requested that the minutes might be amended by the insertion of the division list.

The minutes were thereupon amended.

The Commission having under consideration correspondence and reports in reference to the meagre diets and insufficiency of the bread supplied to the inmates of the Government Asylum, at Parramatta,—it was decided that a letter should be addressed to the Colonial Secretary, pointing out that the Board of Government Asylums had not dealt with the matter complained of in the letter dated 24 June, transmitted by the President of the Commission to the Government, the complaint being, not that the dietary scale of the Asylum was too small, but that the inmates did not receive their proper allowance.

Mrs. Rowland, House Matron, Industrial School, Biloela, called in and further examined.

Mrs. Dunn, sub-matron, Industrial School, Biloela, called in and examined.

Mrs. Rowland, House Matron, Industrial School, Biloela, called in and further examined at her own request.

Mr. Goold gave notice that he would move on the next day of meeting,—

1. That no Report be presented to the Government by this Commission until it has in its possession fuller information regarding the modern improvements, both in structure and management, of Hospitals in Great Britain and other Countries, and that the President be requested to take steps to procure the same.
2. That this Commission proceed to no further business until it has defined the scope and object of its inquiry and laid down a programme for its guidance.

Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

Eyre G. Ellis, Esq.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

Samuel Goold, Esq.

The President stated that he had not been able to complete his Draft Report on the Sydney Infirmary, but thought it would be ready to be laid before the Commission on Monday the 11th instant.

Mr. Goold moved, and Mr. Ellis seconded,—

That this Commission proceed to no further business until it has defined the scope and object of its inquiry and laid down a programme for its guidance.

The Commission deliberated.

Mr. Goold, by consent, withdrew his motion, and substituted for it the following :—

That in addition to the institutions now under examination, the inquiry be directed to the Deaf and Dumb and Blind Institution, and the Temperance Alliance, and that letters be written to the Country Hospitals, receiving aid from the Government, requesting particulars as to their management, the mode of admitting patients, revenue and expenditure, and such other information as may be desired.

Mr. Ellis seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

The Secretary was directed to write to the Superintendent of the Industrial and Reformatory Schools for Girls, Biloela, desiring him to forward, for the use of the Commission,—

1. Copy of letter from Colonial Secretary, authorizing Mr. Cowper to assist in the management of the institution.
2. Copy of any letter authorizing the Superintendent to inflict corporal punishment upon the inmates of the Industrial School.
3. The Journal of daily occurrences.

Mr.

Mr. Goold, by consent, postponed the motion No. 1, of which he had given notice at the preceding meeting.

Moved by Mr. Ellis, seconded by Mr. Cooper, and resolved,—

That a statement of the effect of the evidence with respect to each of the principal points to be reported upon be prepared by the Secretary, with a view to its being embodied in the Report, if such embodiment be deemed desirable.

Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.		Samuel Goold, Esq.
Michael Metcalfe, Esq.		Eyre G. Ellis, Esq.

The President laid before the Commission a letter written by himself to the Colonial Secretary's Department, requesting definite information as to the scope of the Commission's inquiry; with the answer thereto.

The Commission deliberated.

On the motion of Mr. Ellis, seconded by Mr. Goold, it was resolved that the consideration of the two letters now read be postponed until the next meeting.

WEDNESDAY, 27 AUGUST, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.		Samuel Goold, Esq.
Michael Metcalfe, Esq.		Eyre G. Ellis, Esq.
Joseph Wearne, Esq., M.P.

The President brought up an Amendment upon his original Draft Report.

Mr. Metcalfe moved,—“That the President's Report, as amended, be now adopted.”

The Commission deliberated.

The Motion was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Ellis moved,—“That this Commission decline to receive the correspondence between the President and the Colonial Secretary, such correspondence not having arisen out of any action on the part of the Commission.”

Mr. Goold seconded the resolution.

The Commission deliberated.

The further consideration of the resolution was postponed until the next meeting.

MONDAY, 1 SEPTEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.		Samuel Goold, Esq.
Michael Metcalfe, Esq.		Joseph Wearne, Esq., M.P.

Richard Driver, Esq., M.P.

The following correspondence was read:—

(1.) Letter from the Principal Under Secretary, dated 26 August, requesting the Commission to close their labours within one month if possible, and to furnish at once a Report as to the state of the Sydney Infirmary.

(2.) Letter from Mr. George Lucas, Superintendent, Industrial School, Biloela, requesting that Mrs. Lucas and himself might be re-examined, in order to rebut any charges made against them.

The Commission deliberated.

The

The Secretary was instructed to write to the Principal Under Secretary, and inform him that the Commission would bring their labours to a close as expeditiously as possible.

The President stated that, in compliance with the wish of some members of the Commission, he had withdrawn the correspondence between himself and the Colonial Secretary's Département, with respect to the scope of the Commission's inquiry, and that he should treat the correspondence as private.

The President's amended Report was then brought up, and considered paragraph by paragraph.

Introduction, paragraphs 1, 2, and 3, agreed to as read.

Paragraph 4 verbally amended and agreed to.

Paragraph 5 agreed to as read.

Summary of Evidence agreed to as read.

Paragraph 1 section 1, verbally amended and agreed to.

Paragraphs 2 and 3 agreed to as read.

Paragraph 4 verbally amended.

Motion made (Mr. Driver), and Question put,—“That the paragraph be amended by the omission of the following words—‘If the present site be resumed, the Flag-staff Hill would, it has been suggested, be a good position for a small casualty and receiving hospital; and, in the opinion of some persons, the Victoria Barracks might be transformed into a large general institution to answer all purposes.’”—Agreed to.

Paragraph 4, as amended, agreed to.

Paragraph 5 verbally amended and agreed to.

Paragraph 6 agreed to as read.

Motion made (President), and Question put,—“That the following new paragraph be inserted, to stand paragraph 7 of the section:—‘Though the question of erecting a new hospital on the site of the present old building seems to have been decided in the negative by the Committee of the Legislative Assembly before alluded to, we do not think that we should be doing justice to ourselves if we did not, with all respect for the opposing opinion of the Committee, record our conviction that it would be better if the building fronting Macquarie-street were pulled down, and a new hospital, complete in all modern improvements, erected in its place, believing as we do that the adoption of this course would be cheaper to the Country in the end than patching up the present defective structure.’”

The Commission divided.

Ayes, 3.	No, 1.
Mr. Metcalfe, Mr. Driver, Mr. Cowper.	Mr. Goold.

Paragraph inserted.

Paragraph 8 (printed 7), verbally amended, and agreed to.

Mr. Metcalfe, Mr. Cowper, Mr. Driver.	Mr. Goold.

Section 2, Summary of Evidence, agreed to as read.

Paragraph 1 read and considered.

Motion made (Mr. Goold), and Question put,—“That the paragraph be amended by the omission of the following words—‘Though the principle on which retirement is provided for seems sound in theory, yet it may be questioned whether in practice its tendency in this institution is not to get rid of the most able, business-like men.’”

The Commission divided.

Aye, 1.	Noes, 3.
Mr. Goold.	Mr. Metcalfe, Mr. Cowper, Mr. Driver.

Motion made (Mr. Goold), and Question put,—“That the paragraph be amended by the omission of the following words—‘owing to the large number on the Committee.’”

The Commission divided.

Aye, 1.	Noes, 3.
Mr. Goold.	Mr. Metcalfe, Mr. Cowper, Mr. Driver.

Paragraph agreed to as read.

Paragraphs 2, 3, 4, and, agreed to as read.

Paragraph 6 read and considered.

Motion made (Mr. Cowper), and Question put,—“That the paragraph be amended by the omission of the words—‘At times by giving uncalled for and erroneous orders, by scolding members of the nursing staff in the presence of patients, by ignoring officers and dealing in preference with servants, and by instigating them to protest against the action of the head of the nursing staff in reporting their conduct or recommending their discharge.’”

The Commission divided.

Ayes, 2.	No, 1.
Mr. Cowper, Mr. Goold.	Mr. Metcalfe.

The words were omitted, and the paragraph, as amended, agreed to.

TUESDAY, 2 SEPTEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.
Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

Mrs. Dunn, Sub-Matron, Industrial School, Biloela, called in and further examined.

Mrs. Lucas, Matron, Industrial School, Biloela, called in and further examined.

Motion made (Mr. Metcalfe), and Question put,—“That the Report upon the Sydney Infirmary be re-considered, with a view of re-inserting certain words omitted from paragraph 6, section II.

Agreed to.

Motion made (Mr. Metcalfe), and Question put,—“That the words, ‘at times, by giving uncalled for and erroneous orders, by personally scolding members of the nursing staff in the presence of patients, by ignoring officers and dealing in preference with servants, and by instigating them to protest against the action of the head of the nursing staff in reporting their conduct or recommending their discharge,’ be re-inserted in paragraph 6, after the word ‘injudiciously.’”

Commission divided.

Aye, 1. | No, 1.
Mr. Metcalfe. | Mr. Goold.

The President gave his casting vote with the Ayes.

The words were therefore re-inserted.

THURSDAY, 4 SEPTEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.
Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

Minutes of preceding meeting read. Mr. Goold stated that the minutes were incorrect, inasmuch as they stated that the question for the re-consideration of the Report on the Sydney Infirmary had been put and agreed to.

Question put,—“That the minutes be confirmed.”

Commission divided.

Ayes, 2. | No, 1.
Mr. Cowper, | Mr. Goold.
Mr. Metcalfe.

The minutes were confirmed.

Mr. Goold handed in the following memorandum:—

“I regret my inability to vote for the confirmation of the minutes that have just been read, for the following reasons, which I desire may be recorded:—

- “1. At the meeting held on September 1st, when five members of the Commission were present, it was resolved to omit certain words from the Report then under consideration, viz.,—all the words on page 14, line 26, after ‘injudiciously’ to the end of the sentence, and the Report was adopted by the majority of the meeting, upon the understanding that the words were to be omitted.
- “2. At the next meeting of the Commission, when four Members were present, one of them declining to vote, the President, without having given notice of his intention, urged the re-insertion of expunged words, and without re-committing the adopted Report, caused the objectionable words to be restored by his casting vote.
- “3. I hold it to be contrary to all rule, and a very objectionable precedent, that a Report once adopted should be altered in the slightest particular without being re-committed, and notice of the intended alterations given to all the Members.

“SAMUEL GOOLD,

“Member of the Commission.”

“4 Sept., 1873.

Mr. George Lucas, Superintendent, Industrial School, Biloela, called in and further examined.

Witness handed in a statement as to the condition of the institution when he first took charge of it at Newcastle. (Appendix.)

 Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

Letters laid before the Commission and approved :—

Circular to Directors, Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum, inviting suggestions, &c.
 Reply to Principal Under Secretary's communication of the 26th August, respecting Report on Sydney Infirmary and the Commission's labours being brought to a close.
 Mr. Edward Ramsay called in and examined.
 Charles Cowper, junr., Esq., further examined in his place.

MONDAY, 8 SEPTEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.
 Michael Metcalfe, Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.
 Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

Mr. Arthur Whittling, Master, Protestant Orphan School, called in and examined.
 Witness produced several books of account.
 Mrs. Martha Betts, Matron, Protestant Orphan School, called in and examined :—
 The witness handed in,—
 1. A list of clothing and bedding made by the girls. (Appendix P.)
 2. A letter addressed to the Principal Under Secretary, suggesting that some alteration be made in the law relating to apprenticing of children. (Appendix P 1.)
 Correspondence respecting Mr. Prior's removal from Parramatta Lunatic Asylum and from the Asylum for Imbeciles at Newcastle, was laid before the Commission.
 The Commission deliberated.

TUESDAY, 9 SEPTEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.
 Samuel Goold, Esq. | Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.
 Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

Letter read from Mr. Wilkins, a witness summoned to give evidence, stating that he could not attend on this day.
 James Cavill called in and examined.
 Emile Morris, shoemaker, called in and examined.
 The Commission deliberated.
 Mr. Metcalfe gave notice of his intention to move, on the next day of meeting, "that the amended Report upon the Sydney Infirmary, now submitted, be substituted for the Report which has been agreed to by the Commission."
 Mr. Goold gave notice that he would, on the next day of meeting, ask the following question :—
 The Report upon the Sydney Infirmary having been adopted by the majority of the Members present at a duly summoned meeting, and the same having been signed by Mr. Windeyer as the President of the Commission, and also Mr. Metcalfe, can it now be either altered or laid aside?

WEDNESDAY, 10 SEPTEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.
 Charles Cowper, junr., Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.
 Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

Mr. Goold, in pursuance of amended notice, asked the President—"If the Report upon the Sydney Infirmary, having been adopted by a majority of the Members present at a duly summoned meeting, and the same having been signed by Mr. Windeyer as the President of the Commission, and also by Mr. Metcalfe, can it now be either laid aside or altered without the unanimous consent of the Members?"

Mr. Windeyer said—"I am of opinion that, under the circumstances of the case, the Report can be altered or laid aside and a new one substituted, if the majority who adopted the Report either choose to alter it or substitute a new one.

"At the meeting when the consideration of the Report came on, six Members were present. One,
 Mr. Wearne, on the business being commenced, said he would take no part in the matter, and left the room. Five members remained—Messrs. Goold, Metcalfe, Driver, Cowper, and Windeyer. Before the Report was adopted, Mr. Goold, on his failing to carry certain amendments which he proposed, said that he would have nothing further to do with the Report; and at a subsequent meeting, stated in answer to a question put by me, that he would not sign it, though I suggested that he should do so, and state in a minute appended to the Report how far he dissented from it. I signed the Report, as I believe Mr. Metcalfe also did, under the impression that in the form in which it was carried it would meet with the approval of three other Members—Messrs. Driver, Cowper, and Ellis,—one of whom (Mr. Driver) voted for its adoption.

Mr. Cowper and Mr. Ellis afterwards informed me that they both wished that certain passages in the Report—not, in my opinion, affecting its general tenor—should be omitted, and Mr. Driver and Mr. Metcalfe having assented to such omission, I caused the Report thus altered by the omission of the passages objected to, to be re-printed for the consideration of the Commission. Notice of motion for the substitution of such amended Report having been duly given by Mr. Metcalfe, it appears to me competent for the Commission to adopt it or further amend it if they think fit.

Those who wish to sign a Report can surely frame it as they think desirable.

Mrs. Martha Malbon, Matron, Sydney Female Refuge, called in and examined.

Witness handed in the Twenty-fourth Report of the Sydney Female Refuge.

Reverend George Sutherland called in and examined.

The Commission deliberated.

Motion made (Mr. Metcalfe), and Question put,—“That the amended Report upon the Sydney Infirmary now submitted be substituted for the Report which has been agreed to by the Commission.”—Agreed to, Mr. Goold declining to vote.

Motion made (Mr. Metcalfe), and Question put,—“That this Report be now adopted as the Report of the Commission on the Sydney Infirmary.”—Agreed to, Mr. Goold declining to vote.

Mr. Goold handed in the following Protest:—

“I, the undersigned Member of the Commission, protest against the Report on the Sydney Infirmary now adopted, for the following reasons, and desire the same to be recorded upon the Minutes:—

“1st. Because the course which has been pursued in the preparation of such Report has been altogether informal, and contrary to precedents usually followed; no steps having been taken to secure unanimity of opinion, so necessary to give value to a Report of the kind. For example,—

“(a) When the evidence was closed, the President took no steps to ascertain the views of the Members of the Commission upon it; submitted no general resolutions suggested by the evidence according to which a Report might be drafted, but, at a meeting held on 19th August, brought up a draft Report prepared without general consultation, and which was so objectionable to some of the Members that it was withdrawn without being put to the vote.

“(b) At a subsequent meeting, held on the 27th August, one Member of the Commission, by agreement, brought up a draft Report to be substituted for the original one prepared by the President; but the President at the same meeting also brought up another draft Report. An attempt was made to amalgamate the two, but it failed, and the meeting broke up without arriving at any definite conclusion.

“(c) At the meeting held 1st September, the President laid upon the Table another draft Report, which appeared to have been amended in private consultation with the gentleman who had submitted a draft to the former meeting, and, after the omission of certain words on a motion of a Member of the Commission was duly proposed, seconded, and carried, the Report so amended was adopted.

“(d) At the next meeting, held 2nd September, the President, without having given any notice of his intention, procured the re-insertion of the words that had been expunged, and by his casting vote,—a proceeding I have already protested against as informal, and highly objectionable as a precedent.

“(e) The loss of time and fruitless negotiations which have ensued might, I believe, have been prevented, had the President taken the usual course of calling the Members together after the evidence had been closed, and obtained their assent to the general principles and specific recommendations which the Report should embody.

“2nd. Because I have reason to believe that the Report, though adopted, does not really represent the views of a majority of the Commission.

“3rd. I protest against the Report now adopted, generally, because it is not in accordance with the impressions conveyed to my mind by the evidence, and because it is vague and inconclusive, and therefore comparatively of little value to Her Majesty's Government, and discreditable to the Commission, from whose investigations the Government and the Public have a right to expect results of greater practical value; and further, I protest against the Report for the following amongst other reasons in particular:—

“(a) The evidence does not appear to me to justify the conclusion that the system of nursing is the best that is known. To decide on such a matter, it would be indispensable to have evidence from some of the leading Hospitals in England and the Continent.

“(b) The conclusions arrived at in the Report touching the character of the officials and the Board of management are open to grave doubts; a portion of the evidence supports them, but other equally reliable testimony is directly opposed to the statement of the Report.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

Mr. Goold gave notice that he would move, on the next day of meeting:—“That the Report on the Sydney Infirmary, adopted by the Commission on the 10th September, be laid aside.”

W. Wilkins, Esq., Secretary to Council of Education, called in and examined.

TUESDAY,

TUESDAY, 16 SEPTEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Charles Cowper, junr., Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.
Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

The President stated that he had received a communication from the Colonial Secretary's Department, announcing that Mr. Ellis, a Member of the Commission, had sent in his resignation, which had been accepted.

The President read the following memo., which was ordered to be entered upon the Minutes :—

“ With reference to the protest recorded by Mr. Goold, against the Report on the Infirmary, adopted by the Commission, we, the undersigned Members of the Commission, in justice to ourselves, record our opinion as follows :—

“ The statement that the course pursued, with reference to the preparation of the Report, has been altogether informal and contrary to precedents usually followed, is, in our opinion, unfounded, as the course taken was that usually adopted in Select Committees of the Legislative Assembly, and every reasonable effort has been made to secure unanimity.

“ Though no resolutions were discussed embodying the recommendations contained in the Report, the subjects to be treated of in it were constantly the subject of discussion during the two months that the Infirmary was the subject of investigation. Mr. Goold never proposed any resolutions, as he might have done had he thought such a course necessary ; and the President only brought up his draft Report in accordance with a resolution unanimously carried, requesting him to do so.

“ As to the statement that the draft Report was so objectionable that the President withdrew it without putting it to the vote, the fact is that, of the five Members ultimately signing the Report, three—Messrs. Metcalfe, Driver, and Windeyer—have always thought and still think that both in substance and form, the Report originally prepared by the President was preferable to that now adopted, though, with a view of inducing other Members of the Commission to join in a Report, they have not insisted in adhering to it.

“ All the recommendations contained in the Report signed by us, with the exception of those in section I, relative to the site and buildings, are taken from the President's original draft, which, to a very large extent is embodied in the Report adopted. The real reason for the President's original Report being withdrawn was his desire to carry out the wish of another Member that the Report should embody a synopsis of the evidence. This suggestion was only found practicable to a certain extent, and was further abandoned in the endeavour to please Mr. Goold, who wished portions of the synopsis omitted.

“ If the Report is on some points vague and inconclusive, as Mr. Goold complains, such vagueness and inconclusiveness has originated in the desire to conciliate that Member of the Commission, who has always seemed anxious to avoid any definite expression of opinion.

“ W. C. WINDEYER.

“ RD. DRIVER.

“ M. METCALFE.”

Mr. Goold declined to make the Motion of which he had given notice, and read a memo. explaining his reasons for adopting that course.

The Commission deliberated.

Motion made (Mr. Goold), and Question put :—“ That the written statement just read be inserted upon the Minutes.”

Commission divided.

MONDAY, 22 SEPTEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.
 Michael Metcalfe, Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.
 Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

The President stated that he had received from Mr. Goold, a Member of the Commission, a letter enclosing a document which that gentleman desired him to transmit to the Government. As, however, he (the President) was merely the medium of communication between the Commission in their collective capacity and the Government, and as objection had been taken by Mr. Goold and others to his having addressed the Government without the authority of the Commission, he could not make himself the medium of communication between an individual Member of the Commission and the Government. Mr. Goold could address any letter to the Government that he thought proper, and that course having already been adopted, intervention on his (the President's) part seemed to be unnecessary.

Robert C. Rutter, Esq., M.D., called in and examined.

Joseph Wearne, Esq., M.L.A.

The Commission proceeded on a visit of inspection to Biloela. On arriving at the Industrial School it was found that a number of windows had been broken in a riotous disturbance which had taken place some few days before, and that a number of the girls engaged in the disturbance were still locked up in two of the dormitories.

One of the girls having requested permission to make a statement to the Commission, was called in and examined. She complained of ill-treatment on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Lucas, stating that both these officers had beaten her, and ill-treated other girls named, by knocking them down, striking them with the fist, a cane, and a broom-stick; and by knocking their heads against a wall on which some caricatures of Mr. and Mrs. Lucas had been drawn. She exhibited the marks of blows recently inflicted, in support of her statement. The other girls named by her were called in and examined—every precaution being taken to prevent collusion between them. Every one of these girls bore marks of violence, and corroborated the account given by the first witness of the ill-usage to which they had been subjected.

One girl was found with discoloured bruises on her arms, shoulder, and bosom, and asserted, as did the other girls, that they were the effects of blows inflicted by Mr. Lucas.

These girls, who were from fourteen to eighteen years of age, though closely cross-examined by members of the Commission, were consistent in their account of the proceedings connected with the treatment they had received, and the Commission saw no reason for disbelieving their statements. They complained of having been beaten, kicked, dragged by the hair, caught by the throat, and having had their heads struck and rubbed against a wall, apparently in a rough effort to make them rub out a caricature on the wall with their hair. Two witnesses were then examined at the request of Mr. Lucas, but were found to know nothing of the proceedings complained of by the former witnesses, as they were in another part of the institution at the time of their occurrence.

The former witnesses having complained of being locked up in a dark room, which was so oppressive and foul from its closeness that they were unable to sleep, the Commission repaired to No. 3 dormitory, the room spoken of. On opening the door of this dormitory, eight girls, from fourteen to seventeen years of age, were found in a half-naked condition, and all without shoes or stockings. The room had a stone floor, was without a chimney, had every window closely boarded up, was without an article of furniture, and had a foul and sickly smell, every call of nature being there answered by its inmates. On the door being closed upon the Members of the Commission, it was impossible for them to see each other, till accustomed to the darkness. Into this room, when still damp from a recent scrubbing, it appeared that eight girls had been put, and kept in the dark from Friday morning till the visit of the Commission on Tuesday night, in the semi-nude condition in which they were found. Fed on bread and water, they drank, as they said, like dogs, from a bucket placed in the room, no utensil being allowed. Three were so hoarse from the effects of their confinement in the closed up room and sleeping on the flags, no bedding having been allowed them but blankets, that they were almost unable to speak, and the Commission deemed it advisable to recommend their immediate release from confinement, as well as a supply of clothing and mattresses to those still locked up.

The Commission regretted to witness a most unseemly display of temper on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Lucas in the presence of the girls, on a suggestion being privately made to them by the Commission as to the advisability of opening one of the windows for the admission of light and air, and of adopting some more judicious method of dealing with the girls incarcerated in the darkened dormitory.

 Michael Metcalfe, Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.
 Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

It having been intimated to the Commission that the witness summoned for this day, Miss Florence Hill, was unable from illness to attend at the Colonial Secretary's Office, the Commission assembled at Petty's Hotel, and examined the witness, who laid before the Commission a number of publications on the management of pauper children and the boarding-out system. The President informed the Commission that he had thought it his duty inform the Colonial Secretary of the state of things at Biloela, as disclosed in their minutes of the 25th instant, and that the Colonial Secretary had requested the Commission to forward him a copy of the same. Minutes of the 25th instant ordered to be forwarded.

SATURDAY, 29 NOVEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

 Charles Cowper, junr., Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.

The Commission proceeded to Parramatta, and inspected the Protestant Orphan School and the Asylum for the Infirm and Destitute at that place.

They afterwards proceeded to Liverpool, and inspected the Asylum for the Infirm and Destitute there.

TUESDAY, 2 DECEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.
 Michael Metcalfe, Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.
 Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

Minutes of the 22nd, 27th, and 29th November, read and confirmed.

Sergeant John Dawson, Metropolitan Police, called in and examined.

Constable Henry Harpur, Metropolitan Police, called in and examined.

The President laid before the Commission the following resolutions:—

“Having regard to the number of institutions to be dealt with in the final Report of the Commission, and the numerous topics to be treated of therein, the President thinks it desirable to submit for the consideration of the Commission resolutions, the substance of which should be embodied in their Report. The urgent necessity for their immediate removal to another site induces him to begin with”—

BILOELA INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL AND REFORMATORY.

1. That Biloela is unsuited for the site of an Industrial School, from its proximity to the dock, its prison associations, and inaccessibility from Sydney.
2. That the buildings are unsuitable, from their prison-like character, defective accommodation, and want of compactness and arrangement.
3. That the management under Mr. and Mrs. Lucas has been defective and injudicious.
4. That this Commission feels bound to express its conviction that the unsatisfactory state of the institution, disclosed in the evidence, is in a great measure owing to such a want of judgment, method, discipline and culture, on the part of Mr. Lucas, as unfitted him for a position of authority amongst those who can only be controlled by that combination of kindness, firmness,

- firmness, and moral power, which is associated with education ; whilst the frequent infirmity of temper exhibited by the Matron rendered it impossible that she could restrain others whose untrained dispositions and tempers especially require the teaching which is instilled by example.
5. That corporal punishment has been too frequently resorted to, and that this Commission cannot too strongly condemn and deplore such treatment of the girls by the Master as is disclosed in the minutes of the 24th November, as calculated to provoke a well-grounded feeling of injustice, and to degrade the character of those subjected to it.
 6. That the instruction of the children in domestic duties has been neglected, as is well illustrated by the fact that but three or four of them have been taught to milk, though numbers are old enough to learn.
 7. That the Storekeeper's duties are inefficiently discharged, and the system of book-keeping imperfect ; and that this Commission is of opinion that the office should be abolished, and its duties discharged by the head of the institution.
 8. That the charges made by Mr. Prior, the Storekeeper, affecting the character of Mrs. Kelly, are, in the opinion of this Commission, untrue ; and that, inasmuch as Mr. Prior was on a former occasion called upon to show cause why he should not be dismissed for making unfounded charges against a brother official, and was only removed to another post in consideration of his family, his now repeated misconduct of the same kind proves him to be an officer who ought no longer to be allowed to remain in the Public Service.
 9. That the duties of Schoolmistress are efficiently discharged by Mrs. Kelly, the discipline and order maintained by her amongst the girls, when in the department under her control, being in singular contrast with the turbulence and violence too frequently displayed by them when under the supervision of the Master and Matron, and remarkably illustrative of the moral power and effect of superior education and more judicious management.
 10. That though the charges made against Mrs. Rowland, Mrs. Brackenregg, and Mrs. Dunn, are not, in the opinion of the Commission, proved, yet it would be desirable, in re-organizing the institution, that a new staff should be employed of officers who have no children ; suitable situations being found elsewhere for the officers above mentioned.
 11. That the management of the Reformatory by Mrs. King is fairly efficient, though the premises are inconvenient, deficient in accommodation, and unsuited for the purpose.
 12. That both the Industrial School and the Reformatory should, as soon as possible, be removed from Biloela to some situation easily accessible from Sydney.
 13. That the office of Master in the Industrial School for Girls should be abolished, and the institution placed entirely under the control of a woman.
 14. That unless the officers have been previously proved to be efficient, or the circumstances are otherwise exceptional, it is undesirable that husband and wife should be appointed to the offices of Master and Matron in the same institution, as proved by experience in the Industrial School.
 15. That, in removing the school, it would be well if a locality could be chosen near enough to Protestant and Catholic churches to allow of the children attending divine service on Sunday, their association in church with orderly and respectable congregations being calculated, in the opinion of this Commission, to develop in the minds of the children a sense of propriety, and a reverence for religion far greater than is likely to arise from attendance at any service within the institution.
 16. That in the erection of new buildings for an industrial School, provision should be made for the association of the children together for domestic life, in small bodies, under what is known as the family system, with accommodation for the meeting of all the children together for the purpose of
 17. That in the classification of a new institution, care should be taken that the older and more vicious girls are isolated from the younger and more innocent.
 18. That the constant employment and supervision of the children are essential conditions of success in attempting their reformation, this Commission being of opinion that the utter neglect of the children during their evening hours, before bed time, and the absence of supervision when in their dormitories, has had a most pernicious effect at the Industrial School.
 19. That in this and all other institutions for the training of children it is highly important that their domestic work should, as far as possible, be performed by the children themselves ; the substitution for their labour of elaborate machinery in kitchens and laundries being, in the opinion of this Commission, calculated to unfit the children for employment in homes unprovided with steam machinery and mechanical contrivances for saving labour.
 20. That the Reformatory and Industrial Schools Act should be amended by providing for the apprenticing of the children from both these institutions.
 21. That the original intention of the Legislature should be carried out by the establishment of a Reformatory for Boys ; the present system of associating the criminal class with those who are simply homeless and neglected being, in the opinion of this Commission, highly unsatisfactory.
 22. That the visits to all such institutions of ladies taking a kindly interest in the children should be encouraged, as experience shows that the intercourse arising from such visits has an ameliorating influence on the young.
 23. That it is highly important that some provision should be made for the supervision of the children after they have left our Reformatory, Industrial, and other Schools for the destitute ; and that either some officer should be charged with the duty of such inspection, or the assistance invited of persons of character and education, who would undertake the duty in a philanthropic spirit.

The Commission deliberated, and postponed the consideration of the above resolutions until Friday, the 5th instant.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

Samuel Goold, Esq.

Charles Cowper, jun., Esq.

Minutes of the 2nd instant read and confirmed.

Mr. Cowper informed the Commission that he had been summoned to appear as a witness before a Board of Inquiry, sitting at Biloela, on the state of the institution, consisting of Dr. Manning, the Sheriff, and Mr. King.

The Commission deliberated, and Mr. Goold moved,—“That the President do wait upon the Colonial Secretary and inquire from him the object of such investigation, and whether it is intended in the matter of Biloela to interfere with the duties of this Commission.”—Carried.

The President accordingly waited on the Colonial Secretary, and on his return reported that the Colonial Secretary desired him to inform the Commission that the Board had been appointed from no want of confidence in this Commission, nor was he desirous to interfere with its duties, but that charges having been directly made to him affecting the conduct of an officer in the institution, which rendered an immediate determination necessary whether such officer should be retained, he thought it his duty to determine such question at once.

The Commission then proceeded to consider the Resolutions brought forward by the President at the previous meeting.

After deliberating, the Resolutions, from 1 to 10, were adopted without amendment.

On the motion of the President, Resolution 11 was amended by the additional words, “but this Commission is of opinion that the office of Superintendent should be abolished.”

Resolutions 12 to 19 were passed without amendment.

On the motion of the President, Resolution 20 was amended by adding the words “and by more clearly defining the class of children who may be dealt with under the provisions of the latter, as well as by more effectually providing for the recovery of payments to be made by parents for the support of their children when placed in an Industrial School.”

Resolutions 21 to 23 passed without amendment.

MONDAY, 8 DECEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

Samuel Goold, Esq.

Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

Sister Mary Benedict called in and examined.

Commission deliberated.

Moved by Mr. Metcalfe, seconded by Mr. Goold,—

That inasmuch as it is necessary that the Government should be informed of the views of the Commission respecting the Industrial School and the Reformatory at Biloela, with a view to their removal from their present site, and their reform, the President be requested to forward a copy of Resolutions, passed on the 5th instant, respecting the same, to the Honorable the Colonial Secretary.

Carried.

The Commission proceeded to Biloela, and inspected the Protestant and Roman Catholic libraries. Mrs. Margaret Kelly, Schoolmistress, Industrial School, called in and further examined.

MONDAY, 15 DECEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

Samuel Goold, Esq.

Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

Miss Probert, Matron, Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum, called in and examined.

The President brought up certain Resolutions, and gave notice of his intention to move their adoption at the next meeting.

The Commission deliberated on the same, and their further consideration was postponed till the next meeting.

THURSDAY,

THURSDAY, 18 DECEMBER, 1873.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq.

Samuel Goold, Esq.

Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

Letter read from George F. Wise, Esq., forwarding copy of Will of the late A. Cuthill, containing bequest to Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum.

William Charles Windeyer Esq., President of Commission, examined in his place.

The President's Resolutions, as follows, were then considered.

RESOLUTIONS.

I. That this Commission is of opinion that the congregation of children together in large numbers in charitable institutions, where individuality of disposition is lost sight of, home feelings uncultivated, and self-reliance stunted by the system of mechanical routine necessary for the management of numbers, is prejudicial to a healthy development of character, and the rearing of children as good and useful men and women.

II. That the home life provided under the boarding-out system is the best mode of escaping the dangers to which children are exposed by their being massed in large institutions.

III. That the success of the boarding-out system in the Mother Country, as well as in the Colony of New South Wales, warrants the Commission in advising the introduction of the system here to relieve our overcrowded and increasing institutions.

IV. That in carrying out the system, the following are the principal matters to be provided for:—

1. That due care be exercised in selecting foster-parents of character and respectability, and professing the same religion as the children boarded with them.
2. That, except under very exceptional circumstances, not more than two children be placed under the care of one person.
3. That the children be boarded out in localities where they can attend public worship, and schools under the Council of Education, at which they should be admitted without the payment of school fees.
4. That reports of their attendance should be returned by schoolmasters to the Inspector of Charities.
5. That on being boarded out, the children be provided with an outfit, and the foster-parent allowed £10 per annum for its maintenance and clothing.
6. That an officer be charged with the duty of inspecting the children in their homes from time to time, and the co-operation obtained of persons of character and education in the selection of suitable foster-parents, and in visiting and reporting upon the condition of the children out in their neighbourhood.

V. That when the character and age of the children render it necessary that they should be massed in large establishments, such institutions should be managed under what is known as the "family" system, the children being classified in small bodies not exceeding fifty for domestic life, but meeting together for the purposes of labour and secular instruction.

VI. That in all institutions for the training of the young, governed by a committee, ladies should be associated with gentlemen in the management; and that inasmuch as experience in the Mother Country has proved that the assistance of ladies is most valuable in supervising the children when they are boarded out or apprenticed, that the co-operation of the ladies of the Colony should be secured, as in South Australia and Victoria, by the formation of a ladies' visiting committee recognized by and in official communication with the Government.

VII. That the Public Charities of the Colony require a more complete system of supervision and a more prompt administration than the present departmental arrangements afford.

VIII. That the general control of Reformatory and Industrial Schools, as well as the management of all business relative to the boarding out or apprenticing of children, should be vested in an Inspector of Public Charities.

IX. That the Board of Management of the Asylums for the Infirm and Destitute be abolished, and its duties performed by the Inspector before mentioned, some more suitable office being found for Mr. King, whose much to be regretted infirmity of speech would unfit him for the efficient discharge of its duties.

X. That the office where the business of the Inspector of Public Charities is transacted should be in a central position in the city, easily accessible to the general public.

XI. That in all institutions it is desirable that the managing committee be composed entirely of laymen.

XII. That intercolonial legislation is necessary to prevent parents throwing their children on the Country, by deserting them and escaping to a neighbouring Colony.

RANDWICK ASYLUM.

1. That the governing body, which may be indefinitely increased by the admission of life governors, is far too large, and should be greatly reduced.

2. That the Committee should not exceed fifteen in number, of whom five—three ladies and two gentlemen—should be appointed by the Government, eight gentlemen and two ladies being elected by the subscribers.

3. That the system of apprenticing children to the institution should be abandoned, and all boys apprenticed out, as soon as sufficiently instructed as to induce tradesmen to take them.

4. That in the absence of any complete system of supervision over the children after they have left the institution, there is no accurate and trustworthy means of finding out how far the children reared in the institution have turned out well.

5. That some system of supervision over the children after they have left the Asylum should be established.

6. That the By-law providing that children who are eligible for admission into the Protestant and Roman Catholic Orphan Schools shall not be admissible into the Randwick Asylum should be repealed, there being, in the opinion of this Commission, no valid reason for its retention.

7. That, apparently to this Commission, there is in practice no guiding rule which determines whether children are to be sent to the Industrial School at Biloela, the Benevolent Asylum, the Orphan Schools at Parramatta, or Randwick, and that it would be better if the very young children at Biloela, as well as the children at the Benevolent Asylum, were, if not boarded out, at once received at Randwick.

8. That the schools should be regularly inspected and reported on by the Inspectors under the Council of Education.

9. That though the introduction of steam machinery has done much to relieve officers of trouble in the supervision of the children when doing the work of the institution, yet, as the object of the Charity is to fit the children for after-life, and exists for their benefit rather than for the advantage of the officers and servants employed, this Commission is of opinion that its use is injurious to the welfare of the children, by rendering them less fit for life in homes unprovided with such machinery.

10. That, as far as methodical arrangement and mechanical precision in the management of the children are matters of satisfaction, the arrangements are good and the management efficient; but that this Commission cannot regard these as the highest objects to be attained in an institution for the training of the young.

11. That though the labour of the children is to a considerable extent reproductive, and it is calculated that the value of its production last year reached some thousands of pounds, yet it is not so economically managed as some of our other institutions, and is steadily getting into debt, although two-thirds of its income are contributed by the Government.

12. That witnesses are of opinion that the Charity is abused by the improper admission of children, and there is too much reason for supposing that this opinion is well founded.

PROTESTANT AND ROMAN CATHOLIC ORPHAN SCHOOLS.

1. That while this Commission would never recommend the establishment of sectarian Charities of this character, yet, in the face of the evidence taken on the subject, it cannot advise the immediate abolition of these institutions, or their present fusion into one, for the following reasons:—

- (a.) Because the children in them appear to be as well and as economically managed as in any other of our Public Charities.
- (b.) Because the massing of the united body of children in them in one institution would involve the immediate outlay in buildings of £12,000.
- (c.) Because the expenditure of so great a sum of money in the erection of large buildings would tend to perpetuate the evil system of massing children together, of which this Commission disapproves, as in opposition to the family plan ordained by Nature.

2. That the boarding-out system is specially applicable to children of the orphan class, and that its application to the younger children of these schools and others of the same class would so quickly diminish the number of children in both as to allow of their amalgamation in a short time, without any great outlay in new buildings or any sudden and violent change.

3. That with a view to preventing the extension of these institutions and the abuse of their charity, that the rule be established of allowing the admission of only one child in a family of three or more, unless both parents be dead.

4. That no child once taken out by a parent be readmitted unless that parent be dead.

5. That the management of the Protestant Orphan School is efficient, though the Commission is of opinion that the children should be more continuously employed in the laundry and garden, and that the office of Master should be abolished.

6. That the management of the Roman Catholic Orphan School is able and most economical. The dormitory accommodation is, however, defective, and the rooms much over-crowded, the Matron's quarters also being extremely inconvenient and confined. The Commission would, however, suggest that instruction in the use of the needle should commence at an earlier age than is the case at present.

ASYLUMS.

1. That the Asylums at Hyde Park, Parramatta-street, and Liverpool are efficiently managed, but that the management at Parramatta is not so efficient as could be desired.

2. That the Asylum at Hyde Park is much over-crowded, and the out-buildings, formerly used as Volunteer quarters, so dilapidated as to be unsafe and almost useless.

3. That the children at the Parramatta-street Asylum should be boarded out or removed to the more healthy locality of Randwick.

4. That if any children are kept at the Parramatta-street Asylum, the two small Denominational Schools should be formed into one, conducted on the Public School system.

5. That authority should be given to the Master of the Parramatta-street Asylum to receive at once infants whose cases urgently require admission.

THE "VERNON."

1. That the management of the "Vernon" is efficient, and that its expense per head would be much diminished if the provisions of the Industrial Schools Act were enforced with more effective stringency, by Magistrates sending on board the ship boys whose life of idleness and vice makes it impolitic to the Country and unkind to the boys themselves that they should not be rescued from a career of evil too often ending in crime and misery.

2. That the ship should be moored in the neighbourhood of Farm Cove, or some spot in sight of Her Majesty's ships frequenting the port.

3. That the boys desiring to follow a seafaring life should be apprenticed on board Her Majesty's ships on the Australian station, the Commission being of opinion that, whilst it would give them the best opportunity of learning a seaman's calling, their services would be in no more danger of being lost to the Colony than those of an English lad are lost to England who takes to the sea when young.

4. That unless the boys are intended for the sea, it is questionable how far a ship is fitted to train boys for shore life, and that they should at all events be partially employed on shore, in some suitable locality where they might make a garden and supply the ship with vegetables, while some might be advantageously employed in the Botanic Gardens.

5. That all the boys should be taught to swim.

BILOELA INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

1. That greater care should be taken in the selection of books for the use of the children, this Commission being of opinion that some of them sent to the school are altogether improper and unsuitable for the place.

Clauses 1 to 3 inclusive, agreed to as read.

Sub-clause 5 of clause 4 amended by the omission of the words "£10 per annum," and the insertion of the words "a sum not exceeding £13,"—and agreed to.

Clauses 5, 6, 7 agreed to as read.

Clauses 8, 9, and 10 verbally amended and agreed to.

The remaining clauses passed with some verbal amendments.

Motion made (Mr. Metcalfe) and Question put:—That the evidence be considered closed, and the President be requested to prepare his final Report. Agreed to.

FRIDAY, 6 FEBRUARY, 1874.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.

Charles Cowper, junr., Esq.

Minutes of preceding meeting read and confirmed.

Mr. Cowper handed in a letter from Mr. May, Superintendent, Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum, respecting books of account of that institution.

It was decided that notice be given to Mr. May that Messrs. Cowper and Cooper would examine the books on a certain day.

Frederic Norton Manning, Esq., M.D., Superintendent of the Gladesville Hospital for the Insane, &c., called in and examined.

Captain D. C. F. Scott, Police Magistrate, called in and examined.

Mr. Wise, Honorary Secretary, Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum, having refused to allow the Commission to have a certain report respecting the Queen's Orphanage, Tasmania, it was decided that he be summoned before the Commission and directed to produce the document referred to.

Joseph Coulter, Collector, Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum, called in and examined.

The President called attention to note to question 9522. It was decided that the note should be expunged.

MONDAY, 10 FEBRUARY, 1874.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.

Charles Cowper, jun., Esq.

Minutes of the preceding meeting read and confirmed.

The Revd. W. J. Gunther, President, Parramatta District Hospital, called in and examined.

Mr. Richard Harper, Vice-President, Parramatta District Hospital, called in and examined.

Charles Moore, Esq., Director, Botanic Garden, called in and examined.

George F. Wise, Honorary Secretary, Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum, called in and examined.

TUESDAY, 26 MAY, 1874.

MEMBERS PRESENT:—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.

Charles Cowper, jun., Esq.

The President laid before the Commission various returns from Randwick Asylum; also a letter from Captain McLerie, Inspector General of Police, which the Commission directed to be printed.

The President then brought up his Draft Report, and the Commission proceeded with the consideration of the same.

WEDNESDAY,

WEDNESDAY, 27 MAY, 1874.

MEMBERS PRESENT :—

William Charles Windeyer, Esq., President.

Michael Metcalfe, Esq. | Samuel Goold, Esq.
Charles Cowper, jun., Esq.

The consideration of the Report was continued and concluded.

Mr. Metcalfe stated that he had received a letter from Mr. Driver, stating that he cordially approved of the Report, and thought that the President was entitled to some remuneration.

It was then moved by Mr. Metcalfe and seconded by Mr. Goold,—that the Report now read be adopted as the Report of this Commission. Carried.

Mr. Metcalfe moved and Mr. Goold seconded,—That the services of the President in drawing up the Report are deserving of special recognition.

That this Commission recommend to the Colonial Secretary that the sum of £100 be awarded to Mr. Windeyer.

That the Honorary Secretary do communicate this resolution to the Government. Carried.

The Commission requested the President to forward the Proceedings to the Honorable the Colonial Secretary.

PUBLIC CHARITIES COMMISSION.

SECOND REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

To His Excellency SIR HERCULES GEORGE ROBERT ROBINSON, K.C.M.G., Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Colony of New South Wales and its Dependencies.

We, the undersigned Commissioners, appointed by Letters Patent, dated the 8th day of April, 1873, to inquire into and report upon the working and management of the Public Charities of the Colony, have now the honor to submit to your Excellency our Second and Final Report :—

In bringing the labours of our Commission to a close, by presenting to your Excellency this our Second and Final Report on the Public Charities of the Colony, we desire to say that, though we have exceeded the time nominally fixed in the Letters Patent under which we were appointed for the conduct of the inquiry entrusted to us, we have never lost sight of the importance of concluding the business of the Commission at the earliest period consistent with a thorough examination of the institutions into the management and working of which it was our duty to inquire. Though our Commission bears date the 8th day of April, 1873, we did not begin the actual work of the Commission by the examination of witnesses till the 1st of May, as at the time of our appointment Parliament was in Session, and we were anxious to secure the presence of two members of our body whose Parliamentary duties precluded their attendance till after the prorogation. After commencing the business of the Commission, we conducted the inquiry as rapidly as possible. We have held eighty-eight meetings and examined one hundred and seventy-nine witnesses. Our sittings have often lasted four or five hours, and we have besides devoted considerable time to the inspection of all the metropolitan institutions supported or assisted by the Government, as well as those situated at Parramatta and Liverpool. We have also further endeavoured to fit ourselves for the formation of a discriminating judgment upon the working of our Charitable Institutions by perusing a large number of publications having reference to the management and education by the State of destitute and neglected children, the organization of reformatory and industrial schools, and the care of aged and infirm paupers.

Whilst conducting our inquiry, some time was necessarily occupied in the investigation of charges made by officers employed in the management of institutions against fellow officials; and as these charges imposed upon us the responsibility of deciding upon the truth of the accusations and the fitness of the parties concerned in them for the posts which they occupied, we could not refuse to hear evidence which may seem to have little reference to the general objects of our inquiry, though absolutely necessary for the determination of matters affecting the characters of individuals. Some further delay has taken place in bringing our labours to a close from the time (in two instances more than a month) allowed by some of the witnesses to elapse before returning their evidence when sent to them for revision, and the consequent delay in all printing of further evidence. Having however already sent in our Report on the Sydney Infirmity, the institution first named in our Commission as requiring investigation into its affairs, we trust that no practical inconvenience has arisen from the unavoidable delay which has taken place in bringing to a conclusion an inquiry extending over so wide a range of subjects, and which to be of any use required to be thorough.

Result of.

On making the first methodical and critical examination of our Public Charities, so liberally endowed or aided by votes of the Legislature, it is not surprising to find that the mistakes of the Mother Country have been repeated in a Colony which commenced the foundation of its charitable institutions on the models and systems which prevailed in England fifty years ago, but which have since either been entirely abandoned or greatly modified, as experience has shown them to be unsound in theory or defective in working.

In no department of social science have greater advances been made in England than in that relating to the management and organization of public charity, whether it be exhibited in the care and training of pauper children, or in the methods adopted for the relief of the needy and the destitute.

Systems formerly approved.

Systems for the management and care of paupers and pauper children which fifty years ago passed unchallenged, under the closer examination and the more earnest attention devoted of late years to social questions, have fallen into disrepute. None more so than that of congregating large numbers of children in charitable institutions.

Large institutions undesirable.

The facility with which children may be managed in large establishments adapted for the purpose has, no doubt, led to the erection of the huge workhouses, district and separate schools, the very existence of which has created in England a vested interest in their maintenance, which the most earnest and advanced thinkers at Home find the greatest obstacle to the introduction of sounder views as to the training of pauper children. Those who founded the barrack system for the management of children thought less, it is to be feared, of its probable effects on the children than of the ease with which officers could manage them. The working of the system as apparent to the sight has moreover a fascination that doubtless has contributed to its popularity with superficial observers. The ease and precision with which 700 or 800 children in a well-drilled institution fall into their places in the schoolroom, take their seats at table, or retire to rest, is as taking to the eye as the working of a well-fitting piece of noiseless machinery. Fatal experience in the Mother Country has however proved that this mechanical routine, though necessary for the management of numbers, is prejudicial to a healthy development of character, and to the rearing of children as good and useful men and women. The one fatal and all-sufficient objection to the massing of children together under the necessary conditions of barrack life is, its utter variance from the family system recognized by nature in the constitution of human society as the best fitted for the training of the young.

Bad effects of.

In all such large institutions that individuality of character which is the foundation of a healthy and vigorous nature must be entirely ignored. The same treatment is meted out to the bold and the timid, to the shy and the forward, to the self-sacrificing and the selfish, to the ingenuous and the cunning. The result is a dead level of apathetic stolidity. In the atmosphere of an asylum a child does not, as in a family, draw in with every breath the home feelings which develop develop the sentiments of generosity and forbearance, and all the kindly feelings which are evoked by the give and take of family life. The affection and gratitude which spring up in the mind of the young, from close personal intercourse with those who protect and cherish them, must be utterly wanting in the mind of a little pauper reared amidst 800 children, half of whose names are unknown to the official whose perfunctory care of them passes for kindness, if she is not actually harsh. It is proverbially true that charity children are characterized by a total absence of gratitude and affection.

Self-reliance too, that essential element of success in after-life, must be altogether stunted under the influence of a system of mechanical routine, which allows no emergencies, and presents no opportunities for prompt and independent action.

“ Admit that the workhouse is conducted in the best possible manner, that every care that can be taken is taken to keep these children from admixture with the adult paupers, that the schoolmaster and mistresses are kind, zealous persons, anxious to do their best towards those placed under their care. Admit all this, and yet what must be the state of a child’s mind, who has been for thirteen years, or even for eight or ten years incessantly immured within the walls of a workhouse? And remember, this is not at a time when the faculties, both physical and mental, are formed, but in the early spring of youth, when the mind is in a plastic state, ready to receive and retain any impression that is made upon it; when pure air, freedom of thought and action, variety of impressions, something in the shape of childish joyousness, are necessary to bring the mind, as well as the body, into a healthy state. What, we repeat, must be the state of that child, mentally and physically, to whom, after the age of two years, it has been incessant schooling for a certain number of hours daily? The two recesses of six weeks that a boy at school gets allow his mind to lie fallow, and throw him into fresh scenes and ideas, so that he returns with renewed vigour to his studies; but in the workhouse there are no holidays, no break in the endless monotony of existence, no variety, nothing to divert the thoughts into other channels. We do not mean by this that the children are in school all day. We know that the girls work and knit, and in some workhouses are taught some house duties, and the boys are taught the trades of shoemaking and tailoring, whilst others work in the garden; but what we mean is this, that they go through all these operations as mere machines, that there is no break in it, nothing from year’s end to year’s end to relieve the mind from this incessant mechanical routine, and that, although a variety of useful knowledge is imparted to them, the practical application of it to every day life is wanting.¹”

The introduction of machinery, with a view to the economizing of labour and the saving of trouble to officers and servants, still further unfits children for after-life in homes unprovided with labour-saving contrivances. From what we saw of the work done in the kitchens of our chief institutions for the training of the young, we very much question if any girl of the age of twelve reared in them would know how to prepare and boil a dish of potatoes or cook the simplest food. The instance given by Miss Florence Hill, in her very thoughtful and suggestive work,² of the girl who actually cried because she was required to carry water upstairs—hot and cold water having, she said, been laid on all over the institution in which she had grown up, is, we fear, an illustration of feelings not unlikely to spring up in the mind of a child reared

reared amidst the steam machinery of the Randwick Asylum's laundry and kitchen. As the same writer observes :—

“The farther the life of these young people differs from that of the work-a-day world, the more difficult will they find it to accommodate themselves to its demands when they go forth into it to earn their living; and an establishment where food and every other necessary of life presents itself as a matter of course, where accomplished servants perform the difficult work, and where, above all, the children engross the care and attention of a large staff of officers to whom they have no natural duties to render in return—an establishment such as this cannot, we aver, duly prepare its inmates to take and hold their place among our working classes.”

Miss Rosamond Hill, a lady who has been engaged for the last twenty-five years as a volunteer in the good work of organizing reformatory and industrial schools, informed us, in her evidence, that so much importance is attached in England to the assimilation of their domestic work to that of an ordinary home, that preference is given to their establishment in ordinary residences, unprovided with the elaborate appliances for saving labour too often found in training institutions for the young. The plainest utensils are preferred; and in some Dublin schools, established under the supervision of Archbishop Whately, the children were taught, in turn, to cook with a pot at an open peat fire.

Observations
to Asylums.

The objection which we are here putting forward to the use of machinery, of course does not apply to its employment in such institutions as hospitals or asylums for the infirm and destitute, where no instruction in household duties is to be given, and where every effort should be made to economize labour and reduce the number of paid officers and servants to a minimum.

Bad influence
on girls.

The unhappy experience of the Mother Country has proved that the effects of the barrack system, bad in its influence on boys, are more disastrous still in the case of girls, who especially require to be reared amidst the associations of a home. What has been well described as the “deadening influence of unexercised affections,” must, in the early blight of all feminine instincts to which girls are exposed when massed together in large institutions, have a hardening effect upon their characters, destructive to the purest and noblest of womanly feelings.

On this subject, one of the most earnest and vigorous of thinkers on social subjects, and whose remarks are founded upon personal observation, writes as follows:—

The case of the girls is far worse than the boys, as all the conditions of workhouse management fall with peculiar evil on their natures. To mass boys together in large numbers, with no home influence or habits, and no attempt to draw out their affections, is dangerous; to do the same to girls is fatal. Among the endless paradoxes of female treatment, one of the worst and most absurd is that which, while eternally proclaiming “home” to be the only sphere of a woman, systematically educates all the female children of the State without attempting to give them even an idea of what a home might be. Girls want affection, want personal care, want household duties, want everything which can train them to honor the bodies and keep pure the souls which God has given them. To effect this, we mass them by hundreds where they have no affection, no personal care, nay, hardly a personal existence at all, save as units in a herd, no household duties, and as much degradation as hideous uniform and cropped hair, and shoes which change the natural lightness of the step of youth to the shuffle of age, can possibly achieve. The result is becoming at last so palpable that none may shut their eyes. The poor girls, so trained, go out into the humbler class of service, where their ignorance of the simplest household duties, their want of self-control, and hopeless stupidity, too often provoke the harshness of their employers. In their errands in the streets at all hours, the secret of another and all too easy livelihood is revealed to them. No mother or friendly teacher is there to save them; no house to which to go when dismissed from service, save the weary workhouse again. Before they return thither they try that dread alternative. Out of a single workhouse in London, inquiry was instituted two years ago concerning eighty girls who had left it and gone to service. It was found that every one of them was on the streets.¹

Again, we find that “an officer, connected with the large separate pauper school at Swinton, in Lancashire, on being asked what proportion of the girls sent forth forth from that establishment, as compared with the daughters of artisans, had taken to bad courses, answered,—“Do not ask me; it is so painful that I can hardly tell you the extent to which evil will predominate in those proceeding from our institution.” And a similar statement was made by the corresponding officer for Kirkdale separate school, who said,—“The number of girls who come to grief who went out from that institution was painful to think of, it was so large.”¹ The testimony thus borne to the pernicious effects of massing girls in large institutions, comes from all quarters, and points to the conclusion that segregation, and not congregation, must be the system on which their training must be pursued. From the authorities and evidence before us we might cite numerous opinions to the same effect, but we think sufficient has been quoted to show how strongly both thinkers and workers are convinced in England that the system of rearing children in large barrack institutions is unsound in principle and pernicious in its results.²

The conclusion arrived at by us upon the most earnest consideration of all the authorities and evidence before us is that, inasmuch as the congregation of children in large institutions, where individuality of disposition is lost sight of, home feelings uncultivated, and self-reliance stunted by the system of mechanical routine necessary for the management of numbers, is prejudicial to a healthy development of character and the rearing of children as good and useful men and women, we cannot advise any further expenditure by the Colony in extending a system calculated to promote the growth of the worst characteristics amongst those whom misfortune throws upon the care of the public, and who may be too easily degraded into a class of hereditary paupers.

THE BOARDING-OUT SYSTEM.

The system of boarding out destitute children has for some time been in extensive operation in the Mother Country, and it would appear that Scotland and Ireland anticipated England in the adoption of the scheme as an escape from the evils of massing children together in large pauper schools.

The general principles of the system are simple.

The children are placed with respectable families in their own rank of life, and a certain annual sum is allowed for their maintenance.

The advantages which the system presents have commended it to the approval of all interested in the management of neglected and destitute children; and where tried under the conditions essential to its success, it has been invariably found to work well.

Its advantages are numerous. It is found to be more economical than the barrack system of rearing children, inasmuch as it does not necessitate a large expenditure in buildings and repairs, and in a great measure gets rid of the expense of the supervising staff required in every separate institution.

The moral gain to the children reared under it is incalculable. It is free from the dangers inseparable from the barrack system already dwelt upon by us, and is the only method by which that individual knowledge of the children can be obtained by their protectors without which the real education of the child, morally and socially, is impossible. Above all, it is the nearest approach to the home life which can be devised for the homeless, and best affords the protecting care and guiding influence which, in the divine economy of the world, are provided for the young, through the agency of the family system. Government of Victoria to inquire into the Penal and Prison discipline of that Colony, remark, when recommending the introduction of the boarding out system :—

Children placed with respectable families in their own rank of life, where they are cared for as if they were members of the household, lose that feeling of homelessness, isolation, and pauperism, which is inseparable from the routine and constraint of a pauper school. Their intelligence is stimulated by fresh objects and interests of their new life ; the natural affections are called into healthy play ; the sentiment of individual responsibility is quickened, and thus the foundations are laid of sound mental education and moral character.

Between the children and the persons with whom they are placed, commonly known in the Mother Country as the “ foster-parents,” it appears from the evidence before us that feelings of the warmest attachment frequently arise, supplying that bond of sympathy utterly wanting in the barrack system, but which, once evoked between the foster-parent and the child, goes far to supply the place of the parental care of which the orphaned and the destitute have been unhappily deprived.

In recommending this scheme, we would here point out that it bears no similarity whatever to the old parish apprentice system, at one time existing in the Mother Country. Mr. Mathew Davenport Hill, the celebrated Prison Reformer, speaking of the apprentice and boarding-out system, says :—

Prejudice against boarding out has been excited in some quarters from its being confounded with the old practices of parish apprenticeship and of farming-out children—so admirably exposed by Mr. Dickens in “ Oliver Twist ”—to which practices, indeed, at first sight, it bears a superficial resemblance ; but a little examination will show that, in essentials, it differs entirely from those modes of disposing of children. The parish apprentice was forced upon his master, and thus was naturally regarded by him with dislike ; and the relation began after the apprentice had passed the time up to which a child excites parental feelings in those who have charge of him. Young children were farmed out to persons, who took them in large numbers, as a matter of trade profit. Where boarding out is adopted, the homes are carefully selected with a view to the character of the foster-parents ; and generally one or two only, and never more than three, are placed in one cottage ; and, in most instances, the child comes there at an age when his helplessness and infantine attractions cause his foster-parents soon to begin to look upon him as a son.

It might so happen that the parish apprentice, or farmed-out child, would never have an opportunity of leaving the premises where he was placed ; but in boarding-out, his attendance at school is always made an indispensable condition. If a child were ill-treated in his home, therefore, he would certainly communicate the fact to his school-fellows, from whom it would reach the schoolmaster—the neighbours generally, and thence the Union authorities.

Miss Florence Hill, whose philanthropic efforts in promoting the movement in England have identified her name with its success, sums up the points of difference, between baby-farming and boarding out, as follows :—

I will now summarise the points of difference, or rather of absolute antagonism, between baby-farming and boarding out :—

The former plan crowds many infants under the care of a single nurse. Boarding-out places one infant only in the care of one foster-mother.

Boarding out seeks before all things to preserve life. Baby-farming rarely cares to save—often it actually desires to destroy ; babies being farmed out, much (as has been shrewdly observed) as fully insured ships are sent to sea, in the hope that they may founder.

Baby-farming assembles many infants under one roof—in itself a prolific source of disease.

Boarding out distributes them singly in families, according to the law of nature, which is synonymous with the law of health.

Baby-farming is undertaken for the sake of profit alone. In boarding-out, the foster-parent is invited to share in a benevolent action ; profit, if considered at all, is a minor object, and the payment offered is so regulated as to prevent the children being taken as a source of gain.

Baby-farming strives for all possible secrecy. Boarding-out challenges the utmost publicity.

Baby-farming is in the hands of those whose character is rarely even doubtful—often abominable.

Boarding out is entrusted to those alone whose characters are above suspicion.

Baby-farming withdraws itself from inspection. Boarding-out involves, as an essential feature, close and constant supervision.¹

Finally,

¹ The Boarding-out System, distinguished from Baby-farming and Parish Apprenticeship : a Paper read before the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science. By Florence Hill, 1869.

Finally, Mr. Charles Dickens himself, in an article commending boarding out, denies that it has any resemblance to the parish apprentice system which he formerly denounced. He says,—

Having some authority to speak in the name of Oliver Twist, we here record on his behalf that he suffered from no system, but suffered from an utter absence of system, and that it was his misfortune to be a pauper child in days when pauper children were out of sight and out of mind.¹

The evidence before us as to the success of the system in England, Ireland, and Scotland, is conclusive, and it appears from that of Miss F. Hill, that the plan has been adopted in about seventy Unions, and is making rapid progress throughout England.² Testimony is borne to its success, and to its superiority over the system of congregating children in large institutions, not only by social thinkers and reformers, but by guardians and other Poor Law administrators, who, by their practical acquaintance with the management of pauper children, are eminently qualified to form a correct opinion on the subject. From amongst the mass of favourable opinions before us, we select the following, as showing the working of the system and the spirit of its administration :—

Testimony in favour of.

The first paper which we will quote on this subject is a passage from a report from Sir John M'Neil, head of the Scottish Poor Law authorities, to the Home Secretary, dated July 22nd, 1862, and which is so forcible and expressive, and, coming from such an authority, has such a claim on our attention as to well deserve being transcribed. It is as follows :—

“The practice of boarding out pauper children is liable to be misunderstood, and may be supposed to be the same as what has been called farming out; it is therefore right to explain it.

“The system of boarding out pauper orphans and deserted children, as well, as the children of immoral or greatly dissipated parents from whom it is desirable to separate them, or of parents who utterly neglect their children and allow them to go about the streets begging, has for a considerable number of years been adopted in most of the large urban parishes in Scotland, and its beneficial results have led to its being gradually extended.

“The children are boarded out singly, or two or three together, with persons of the working classes residing in healthy localities, and selected by an officer of the Parochial Board, who is specially charged with the duty of superintending these children and visiting them periodically, or whenever there may be any particular reason for doing so.

“The cost of the board and lodging, and of the clothing, &c., provided by the parish, exceeds what it would be if they were collected together in the poor-house or other such establishment; but the results, both physical and moral, have made the additional outlay an ultimate gain, not only to the children, but to the parish.

“The health of the children is greatly improved, they become more robust and active, mutual attachment generally grows up between them and the nurse or family with whom they reside, their domestic feelings are awakened or quickened, they see the struggle maintained by all around them to preserve their independence, and they learn how highly it is prized; in short, they acquire to a great extent the habits and feelings of the persons amongst whom they are brought up, and for the most part they melt into the mass of the population, with a somewhat similar love of independence, and readiness to work for it, and with little disposition or tendency to revert to pauperism. On the other hand, children brought up in a poor-house, and knowing hardly any other mode of life than pauperism, are prone to revert to it, and to regard the poor-house as their natural home. The system of boarding out the pauper children of the classes referred to is thus pursued with a view to the benefit of the children of the parish and of the community, and with considerable success.³

“The Governor of the Edinburgh Union, Mr. Daniel Kemp, writes, in February, 1869 :—

“We have no separate building here for the children who are inmates, nor is there such in any workhouse in Scotland, to my knowledge; all attempts to separate children in the larger workhouses have been given up long long ago. We, and all the larger parishes in Scotland, board our children with cottagers,—a plan which long experience has tested, and which we find to work well. By this arrangement, the really destitute child is, as far as possible, brought back to the family circle, and entirely separated from pauper scenes and associations; in fact, depauperized. We very seldom indeed have any of our children brought back to the workhouse, or falling into pauper habits; the orphan and the outcast are especially saved from these results. We have at this moment 330 boys and girls boarded in the country.’”

Mr. Kemp, who was for twelve years Master of Wrexham Union, and has been a like period Master of the Edinburgh Workhouse, and has therefore had great experience both in England and Scotland, writes again, on the 23rd March, 1869 after describing a workhouse school to which a farm was attached, where the boys learnt field labour, and in which he took great interest:—

“When I went to Scotland I was disappointed that the children were not reared in the house, but were boarded in the country. I looked upon the plan at first with no great favour, but having been requested by the house committee to accompany the inspector on his rounds, which I did, and looked into the practical working of the scheme, visiting the children at their homes and schools—the result being a conviction strongly forced upon my mind that the plan of boarding out children with the cottagers around the country was the best mode of rearing orphan children I had yet seen; and to this hour I have not changed my opinion. . . . By this plan all connection with the workhouse is cut off, the family circle and influence are as far as possible restored, the domestic affections are to a large extent revived, creating an influence which, often for the good of both child and foster-parent, extends through life.”

Such testimony as this from one who had been for twelve years master of an English workhouse, and who, when he went to Scotland looked with little favour on the boarding-out scheme, which he did not then understand, but who, after inquiry into and personal inspection of the system has become one of its warmest advocates, is very striking and conclusive.¹

D. Archer, Esq., a Magistrate for Wilts, and Chairman of the Highworth and Swindon Board of Guardians, writes, on the 24th March, 1869²:—

“I am happy to say that the Highworth and Swindon Board of Guardians, of which I am Chairman and an ex-officio member, still board out all the orphan children they possibly can. We are convinced from experience that proper home-training for girls is most essential for their future well-being; we therefore do our best to place out all such children with respectable cottagers, and are satisfied with the result.

“The orphans attend the National School, and we expect the cottagers to bring them up religiously, and in habits of industry and cleanliness, and to give them proper notions of economy. . . . The Relieving Officer keeps a constant supervision over the orphans; the cost of each child boarded out in our Union does not exceed the cost of a child in the workhouse. . . . I hope the Bath Union may be induced to board out as many of their children as they can, for if we would check pauperism we must not let the workhouse be their home, . . . and I much question whether a separate school would be much better than the workhouse, as to nurturing a spirit of proper independence and self-reliance in a child.” This system has now been in operation for seven or eight years in the Swindon Union.

Mr. G. Greig, Inspector of Poor for the city parish of Edinburgh, writes:—

“I assure you nothing would have given me more pleasure than attendance at such a meeting, but I regret that special duties detain me here at present. I have held the office of Inspector of poor in this city for the last fifteen years, and during all that period have had about 300 children boarded out in villages and districts some distance from town. The system has been in operation in this parish for about thirty years, and has, therefore, been thoroughly tested. I have taken great interest in it throughout, and have watched its results, and I cannot recollect a single case where the child has been sent out in infancy in after years returning as a pauper on the parish. Now and again we have parties applying (I had two such this year) who had been sent to board at nine or ten years of age. The two cases this year I investigated, and found their parents had been vagrants, and the children must have acquired bad habits before we got them. I have heard it objected in England that suitable cottages could not be got; but I cannot for a moment imagine that the cottages in England are inferior to those in Scotland. When we first send children to a village

village or district, we find that people have a feeling of distrust in regard to them, and this you would likely meet with at the first; but after the children are a short time in the village they are treated the same as the ordinary village children, and the most respectable of the working people in the village apply for children to board."¹

The Governor of Liverpool Workhouse says:—

"I beg leave to express my sincere desire that your meeting be a very successful one, and that the merits of the boarding-out system may be brought before the public in a manner worthy of its claims. It is a movement in which I am deeply interested, and the success of which I have very much at heart. It courts investigation, and from many years' intimate and personal knowledge of its working in Scotland, I feel that it only requires to be fully known to be adopted in England. A great deal of its success throughout the country will depend upon proper supervision being exercised wherever it is introduced; and if your Society, in addition to giving a stimulus to the movement by this meeting, be able to improve and perfect this feature of the scheme, it will do a work that will be salutary in its influence and successful in its results."²

Mr. W. D'Esterre Parker, Guardian of Cork Union, writes:—

"As one of the Guardians of the poor of the Cork Union, I have had an experience of ten years in the boarding-out of the orphan and deserted children of the district in the cottages of well-conducted labourers. The children are periodically examined by the Guardians, educated at the National School adjoining their residence, with the advantage, in case of illness, of having our dispensary medical officer, who resides in their locality, to visit them. The result of rearing children in the families of the peasantry, instead of the workhouses, is shown in the healthy, humanizing appearance of the children, their love for their foster-parents, and in many instances, their adoption by them; so that ultimately the children being now permitted by the recent Act of Parliament to remain out until ten years of age, will become members of the family, and, in all probability, not return to the workhouse. A similar plan is also adopted by the several Orphan Protestant Societies with marked success."³

Charles Herford, Esq., of Manchester, a gentleman who has taken the greatest interest in this movement, and was the means of its being adopted by the Chorlton Union, writes thus:—

"I am very glad to send you the result of our very short experience of the boarding-out plan—it was adopted by our Board about Christmas; and although we have entirely confined ourselves to private inquiry for discovering suitable persons, and for explaining the objects of the Guardians, and the opportunity open to respectable working people, either childless, or desirous from kindly motives of taking an orphan into their homes,—yet by this slow and quiet process we have nineteen children already provided for, some with the very élite of the working classes, and some with parties in a little higher station, but in all cases they form part of the family; and I believe that the instructions, of which I send you a copy, are carried out most thoroughly in spirit and in the letter, if I may judge by visitations made with the greatest irregularity, 'parents taken to the children and children to the parents far better than we could have expected—and learning to be useful, as children like to be if properly managed.' We have ten ladies who have undertaken to look after the children, and we attach great value to this part of the plan—to its providing for every child sent out, besides foster-parents, a friend in a higher station, able and willing to advise and help when they have gone out into service. Hitherto we have had no difficulty about the allowance; 3s. is a pretty fair weekly allowance for food in a cottage home—and we don't wish anything to be made out of the children, except that they shall be useful in the house, just as their own would have been. We believe that the earlier the tie is formed, the stronger it will be." The above letter contains a great deal of valuable and encouraging information.⁴

The plan has been recommended by the Board of State Charities in Massachusetts. Mr. Sanborn, late Secretary of the Board, and now Editor of the Springfield Republican, in a notice of the plan, uses this language, in his issue of February 6th, 1869:—

"The experiment now going on at the State primary school in Monson, of separating the poor children who come upon the State for support from the adult paupers, is sure to be successful in giving the children a better training, moral and mental, than they would otherwise receive. But it is only a step toward the true policy for the State to pursue, namely, to board these children, from their earliest years in private families, paying, when necessary, a small sum for their maintenance. This is the course which nature and common sense recommend for the care of such children, instead of the unnatural aggregation of them in great establishments. The home, the family, are the best nursery for all children, and a poor home is almost always better than a good almshouse. We understand that the Legislature will be called upon this winter to sanction the introduction of this system of boarding out, and that Gov. Clafin, whose interest in humane enterprises is well known, has expressed himself warmly in favour of it."

Miss Florence Hill, in her evidence, states the advantages of the boarding-out over the barrack system in the following words:—

It is better, I believe, from many causes. The child placed in a family is under parental care—it becomes familiar with the duties and pleasures of family life—and it receives insensibly that training of the temper and affections which comes from living with persons of different ages and standing in different relations to it, as father and mother, elder and younger brothers and sisters, &c. Then, in the cottage-home it sees frugality and economy exercised, which it never sees in large institutions, where food is given to it as if it fell from Heaven without effort on its part. No effort of its own, for the sake of others, is ever called forth in its daily life, nor does it see any one foregoing anything for it. No one exercises that generosity and forbearance in its behalf which is habitual in a good parent, especially among the poor, and which have a most wholesome effect upon the child, who thus learns by example to be generous and forbearing in its turn. All that is absent from large schools, where each teacher may have as many as fifty children in her charge. Again, children require constant change—they are not able to fix their attention long on one thing; but in the schools they pass their lives in their schoolrooms and a very monotonous playground, rarely going out into the roads and lanes to see fresh faces, fresh objects, and a variety of animals, all of which have a good effect upon them. The extreme monotony of these large schools has a most deadening effect, physically and mentally. A highly important advantage of the boarding-out system, and one wholly wanting in schools, is that it weaves fresh home ties about the child, and creates an interest in his welfare among his foster relatives, and a desire on his part not to lose their good opinion, which, in his after-life, are probably the most efficient safeguards from going astray with which he could be surrounded.¹

The English Poor Law Board, in their Report for 1869–70, state that numerous applications having been made to them by Boards of Guardians to sanction the partial adoption of the system, they had, after much deliberation, come to the conclusion that a fair trial ought to be given to it. Accordingly, an order was issued on the 25th November, 1870, empowering Boards of Guardians to board out pauper children, even beyond the limits of their parishes or Unions, wherever this might be deemed desirable. To the end of May, 1871, the number of Boards that had acted upon the order was thirty. In each locality a Boarding-out Committee co-operates with the local Board of Guardians in the disposal and supervision of the children. The system is spreading rapidly in England, and is likely to become general. It had been in partial operation in a few Unions prior to the issuing of the order, but proper places for boarding out the children could not be found in the large towns, and without a specific order of the Poor Law Board they could not be boarded out in the country. This difficulty is now removed. It may be added, that the regulations framed by the Poor Law Board for the disposal and supervision of the children are of an extremely minute and elaborate kind, and might serve as the model of a similar code of regulations for this Country.²

Before issuing the order just referred to, the English Poor Law Board directed their Inspectors to inquire into and report upon the working of the boarding-out system in Scotland and in those parts of England where it had been partially adopted. The Board state that the results of these inquiries, which were conducted in considerable detail, and were embodied in a Report printed by order of the House of Commons, on the 12th April, 1870, tended clearly to confirm the representations advanced by the advocates of the system, although, as might be expected, its success was found to vary with the nature of the locality in which the children were boarded out, and the the care exercised by the different Boards of Guardians in watchfully superintending its administration¹. In his report one of the Inspectors states :—

“The physical appearance of the children was, as a whole, very satisfactory. Certainly, as a class there was a marked superiority over ordinary workhouse children, and they looked cheerful and contented. The clothing of the children, with trifling exceptions, was quite sufficient, and the bedding clean and good.”²

Another Inspector states :—

“On personally inspecting the residences, I found all the children in a satisfactory state, as regards cleanliness, clothing, and general appearance, and the condition and character of the foster-parents appeared highly respectable.”³

A third Inspector says :—

“The Guardians report very favourably of their general appearance, state of clothing, and personal cleanliness.”⁴

The exceptional instances noted are only such as involve minor details : as regards the excellence and superiority of the system, the testimony of the Inspectors is uniform.⁵

The Inspector for Scotland reports that the system has been practised in that The system in Scotland. Country for many years—in Glasgow for more than a century. Sir John McNeill, the late Chairman of the Board of Supervision for Scotland, in his evidence before the House of Commons Committee in 1869, describes it in these striking words :—

“What happens is this : The children are boarded out in the country, one, perhaps two, rarely more than three, in a family. They grow up with the family, they are treated as members of the family, they acquire the habits and feelings of the persons amongst whom they are brought up ; they see the struggles of the family to maintain their own independence ; they see the kind of feeling that is entertained in reference to paupers ; they acquire a sort of domestic attachment to the father and mother, or to the old woman with whom they are boarding ; and they are well educated, and ultimately they melt into the population, so that you cannot find a trace of them, and they are not distinguishable from the people who are brought up in independence. Anything more satisfactory than the working of that system I have not to boast of in the administration of the Poor Law.”—Evidence taken before the Select Committee on Poor Laws, Scotland. Answers 1780–81.

Additional testimony to the same effect is given in the Report of the Parochial Board of Glasgow City Parish for 1864 :—

“Great care is taken in the selection of the families in which the children are placed ; and when so placed a constant supervision is kept, and if an unsatisfactory arrangement is made the child is immediately removed. But this is seldom necessary, as the committee have always on their list applications from numerous good families, and can make a suitable selection. The children look upon the heads of the family as their parents, and the younger branches as brothers and sisters : the best feelings of the heart are engaged, the affections are cherished and drawn out, not smothered in the child’s breast as if amongst strangers. The endearing terms ‘father’ and ‘mother’ are used and believed in by the younger ones ; and though, as they grow older, this relationship is better understood, yet the attachment is formed and has a beneficial effect in after-life. The children often return to this family home for counsel in difficulties and sympathy in distress. The holiday excursion, or any more joyous occasion, furnishes an opportunity eagerly embraced to visit their foster-parents. The committee recommend all those who really wish to obtain information as to how these children are brought up, to accompany the committee in their visits, and see their homes and the schools they attend. They do not certainly come in from school or play with the precise, demure, and well-disciplined appearance that you find in a well-managed orphanage : but, what pleases the committee more, they appear with a buoyancy of spirit, a confidence of manner, and happiness of countenance, which show that they are at home, are happy and well cared for.”—Report on Boarding-out Pauper Children, p. 10–11.

⁵ “We believe that children brought up in public institutions, when at length turned out into the world, are as a general rule feeble in body and mind, and less able to fight their way through life than those who come from the common walks of society. At present the children are living amidst, and already form part of the labouring community in which their after-life is to be spent ; and with the privation, not less than with the enjoyments and duties of which, they cannot too soon become familiar. They are free from the enervating and depressing presence of pauperism. At home, in school, and in the playground, their ordinary routine of life is the same as that of other children, and the fact of their dependent condition, of which, in a workhouse, they would be reminded at every turn, will seldom be presented to them in any form more offensive than the friendly periodical visits of the Managers and Inspector. As at present situated, we believe that the suffering arising from the loss of their parent is reduced to a minimum.”—Report of the Paisley Board of Guardians for 1866.

The number of children thus boarded out is estimated by the Inspector at about 5,000. They are of all ages, from infants at the breast upwards. As to their general condition the Inspector testifies:—

“As a whole, the boarded-out children were cleanly, creditable, and healthy in appearance, and their clothing was even better than that of others in the school with them.”—Ibid., p. 21.

The conclusions drawn by the Inspector from his investigations were as follows:—

1. “That the system, as conducted by the large city parochial Boards generally, tends to improve the children physically and mentally, and effectually breaks their connection with the poor-house.

2. “That, if properly carried out, it is preferable to the present system of the poor-house provision for children in Scotland.

3. “That the education of the children is carefully attended to.

4. “That the medical attendance and extras are sufficient.”—Ibid., p. 34-5.

There are some other points included in the Inspector's summing up, but they refer exclusively to matters of purely local interest and minor details.¹

In fine so thoroughly are the people of Scotland convinced of the excellence of the system that in the new workhouse lately erected in Edinburgh, at a cost of £40,000 irrespective of the site, no provision whatever has been made for the reception of children.

In Ireland.

In Ireland the system has not yet been introduced, except in one Dublin poor-house, but it has been in most successful operation in some private charitable institutions. The Dublin Protestant Orphan Society, for example, was commenced in 1828 with twenty-four destitute orphans, who were sent into the country to board with respectable families, chiefly of the small farming class. In 1866, the number of children boarded out had increased to 2,208, and the Society had placed out in the world 5,376. Out of 1,817 orphans taken in charge by the Society at its principal establishment, no fewer than 428 had been subsequently restored to their friends, whose circumstances had sufficiently improved to warrant their restoration. In the fourteenth annual report of the Society it is stated:—

“The Society is so simple in its moral constitution that all its resources are expended on its legitimate objects, and not wasted on cumbrous and unprofitable machinery. Every shilling tells, and the connection is immediate and palpable between the outlay and the gain. It is the best substitute in existence for parental kindness; and sometimes excels in this respect the provisions of nature, because even where affection fails, other feelings come in to supply its place; and most of the virtues and the faults of common life work together for the orphan's good.”—Quoted in “Children of the State,” by Florence Hill, p. 134: London, 1868.

A similar orphanage was established nine years ago by some Roman Catholics in Dublin:—

“Within seven years of the commencement 500 children had been taken in charge, of whom only three or four had turned out ill, while 200 were already working for themselves at trades, in service, or growing up in the families and as the sons and daughters of their foster-parents.”²

Dr. Quinn, who in his evidence speaks strongly in favour of the boarding-out as superior to the barrack system of rearing children, on the ground that the latter destroys all individuality of character, describes this as one of the most successful organizations in Ireland.³

In other Countries.

In Prussia, a Society for boarding out abandoned and neglected children was instituted in 1845, and is working very satisfactorily. In Berlin half the pauper children children are boarded out. In Hamburg the same system is pursued. In Russia there exists a public institution with a similar object. In France the plan has been followed for several centuries, and with the best effect. An orphanage was founded in Paris in 1856 by the Prince Imperial, and is conducted entirely on this plan, with like satisfactory results.¹ We may add that, in Massachusetts and some of the other American States, the system either exists already or is rapidly coming into operation, both in regard to private charitable establishments and public reformatory schools and cognate institutions.²

² “Children of the State,” p. 135.

With this amount of evidence in its favour, we would most earnestly recommend the adoption of the system in this Country, as the best way of escape from the dangers to which children are exposed by being massed in large institutions.

The only objection of any weight which can possibly be urged against the introduction of the system is that the project is not applicable to the circumstances of this young Country, and that suitable foster-parents are not to be found here. It is a remarkable fact that, even in England, the same objection was raised, and had to be combated by the first advocates of boarding out.³

Objections answered.

The experience of South Australia and of Victoria, in both of which Colonies the system has been successfully established, is the best answer to this objection. Miss Clarke, the Secretary of the Boarding-out Society of South Australia, a most intelligent witness, conversant with the circumstances of Colonial life, states in her evidence that in South Australia there is no difficulty whatever in getting suitable people to take the children as soon as they are ready to go out;⁴ adding, "I believe any number of children could be placed out at 5s. a week; but the Board are beginning to find that they can place them out almost as readily for nothing at all, and they are consequently not willing to place out fresh children with payment, so long as they can find good homes for them without paying. She states, moreover, the remarkable fact that two-fifths of the children placed out have been adopted, and altogether ceased to be a burden upon the public."⁵

In Victoria between 400 and 500 children have already been boarded out, and the Inspector of Industrial Schools speaks favourably of the system.

Under these circumstances of success in younger Colonies, we see no reason why the project should not prosper in New South Wales, where an older and more settled population is more likely to furnish suitable foster-parents. Human nature is the same all the world over, and we have every confidence that amongst the working classes which have, from time to time, so nobly responded to appeals made to their sympathy on behalf of the sufferers in the Irish Famine, the Widows and Orphans of the Crimean War, and the Distressed Operatives of Lancashire, numbers will be found, when the system becomes known, ready to receive and glad to protect the orphaned and the destitute. No one with any knowledge of our working classes can fail to be aware of instances within his own knowledge where families, without any hope of fee or reward, have taken in, and reared as their own, children left without a home and deprived of parental support.

Though one or two witnesses have expressed doubts as to the possibility of finding persons of sufficient respectability and character to be entrusted with the care of these children, others well acquainted with the Colony are of a different opinion;⁶ and we think there is no ground for an aspersion upon the character of the humbler classes of our population, which would stamp them as inferior in morality to to similar classes in the Mother Country, with which, in the anxiety displayed for the education of their children, they most favourably compare. To say that those who would be chosen as foster-parents are unfit to have the control of children so entrusted to them, would be simply to say that they are as parents unfit to bring up their own offspring.

Another objection which has been raised is, that the domestic accommodation of the families in our country districts is too limited to allow boarded-out children to be properly cared for. To those accustomed to town life and to the surroundings of children reared in an institution provided with steam machinery, hot and cold baths, dinner lifts, and hot-water tables, the furnishing and accommodation of a bush home amongst the farming class, may indeed seem scant; but when sufficient for the honest, industrious, and independent poor, there is no reason why destitute children, thrown upon the public bounty, should be maintained in a style far superior to that of others in their own rank, brought up in parental homes. Children boarded-out in our country districts might not, when visited in the houses of their foster-parents, present so trim an appearance as the well-drilled inmates of an institution; but the home life which they would enjoy, and the daily experience gained by them, would certainly far better fit them for their encounter with the world, than an artificial system of training, under conditions utterly dissimilar to the circumstances in which their after-life will be pursued.

Conditions
necessary.

In carrying out the scheme, the following are the principal matters to which attention should be directed:—

1. That due care be exercised in selecting foster-parents of character and respectability, professing the same religion as the children boarded with them.
2. That, except under very exceptional circumstances, not more than two children be placed under the care of one person.
3. That the children be boarded out in localities where they can attend public worship, and schools under the Council of Education, at which they should be admitted without the payment of school fees.
4. That reports of their attendance should be returned by schoolmasters to the Comptroller of Charities.
5. That on being boarded out, the child be provided with an outfit, and the foster-parent be allowed an annual sum not exceeding £13 for its maintenance and clothing.
6. That in case of sickness the child, as the necessity of the case requires, be admitted to, or attended as an out patient of, any hospital aided by the Government.
7. That an officer be charged with the duty of inspecting the children in their homes from time to time, and the co-operation be obtained of persons of character and education in the selection of suitable foster-parents, and in visiting and reporting upon the condition of the children boarded out in their neighbourhood.

The system is best adapted for orphaned and deserted children, as in their case no interference on the part of parents is likely to disturb or unsettle them in the homes of their foster-parents. So important is the selection of proper foster-parents and on it the success of the scheme so much depends, that we would earnestly impress upon those inaugurating its practical working in the Colony, not to be in a hurry to get the children out, but to weigh well the merits of applicants before entrusting children to their care.

In

In attempting the introduction of boarding-out, it must never be forgotten that an effective supervision of the children in their homes is a condition of its success. ^{Supervision indispensable.} In Scotland this supervision is almost entirely carried out by official Inspectors, who from time to time visit the children in the houses of their foster-parents. In England the most effective supervision is found to be obtained in the voluntary exertions of persons of character and education, chiefly ladies, who form themselves into committees for the selection of suitable foster-parents, and undertake the charitable duty of watching over the children when boarded out.

In this Colony we are of opinion that it would be desirable to take advantage of both methods. In South Australia a Boarding-out Society has been formed, the members of which assist the Destitute Board of that Colony by visiting the children and seeing that they are properly treated and cared for; and as it was found that when the children were sent out, they were so much scattered through the country that it was impossible that the members themselves could visit them, the plan was adopted of appointing corresponding members in the different localities to which the children were sent, to look after those placed out in their neighbourhood, each corresponding member undertaking to see to the children in a particular district.¹ This Society is recognized by and is in constant communication with the Government authorities, who inform it of the places to which children are sent, that visitors may be found for them. Whenever a fresh child is sent out, the Board is informed of the fact, and a request is sent to the member resident in that district to report to the Board upon the condition of the child.² ^{Method of supervision.}

In Victoria there exists a similar Society, known as "The Ladies' Visiting Committee," which is in official communication with the Government. This Society, in addition to its watch over boarded-out children, maintains a voluntary supervision over Public Industrial Schools; members of the Society taking it in turns to visit the various institutions, observe their working, and interest themselves in the children. The Inspector of Industrial Schools in Victoria speaks in high terms of the Society as a most useful auxiliary in the management of the schools. ^{In Victoria.}

We are of opinion that in this Colony there should not only be an official system of inspection, but that, inasmuch as experience in the Mother Country has proved that the assistance of ladies is most valuable in supervising the children when they are boarded out or apprenticed, the co-operation of the ladies of the Colony should be secured, as in South Australia and Victoria, by the formation of a visiting committee, recognized by and in official communication with the Government. ^{Plan recommended.}

Had such an organization as this existed in the Colony, the utter mismanagement of the Biloela Industrial School, arising from the incompetency of its Superintendent, would never have been allowed to pass so long without exposure.

We cannot approve of a suggestion that has been made, that the agency of the police should be employed in looking after the children; as we think such a mode of supervision calculated to degrade them, and cause them to be looked upon with suspicion.

The boarding-out system has been applied in England with equal success in the case of the aged and infirm inmates of Greenwich Hospital, who have all been boarded out and with much satisfaction to themselves. Were this plan adopted with reference to the infirm and destitute of the Colony, we think it would be far preferable to the present system of massing them in large asylums. Instead of thus collecting them from all quarters of the Colony, and bringing them down from the country country at considerable expense, they might be boarded out in the districts where they have always lived. We have, no doubt, numbers of persons in the rank of life from which they originally sprung, who would be glad to afford them a home for a small remuneration in consideration of the slight services which most of such people are able to render. The kind of life thus provided for our aged poor would, we believe, be far happier for them and more economical to the Country.

THE FAMILY SYSTEM.

Whilst we are strongly of opinion that the boarding-out system should be carried out as far as circumstances will allow, we have not lost sight of the fact that there will always be a class of children whom, from their character and age, it will be found necessary to bring together for the purposes of training and reformation in institutions affording the means of enforcing a more complete system of discipline than can be otherwise resorted to.

Character of family system.

When such massing of the children together becomes necessary, the evils upon which we have already dwelt may in a large measure be overcome by the adoption of what is known as "the family system." Under it the children are divided into small bodies, not exceeding fifty, occupying distinct buildings, for the purposes of domestic life, but meeting together for the purposes of labour and secular instruction. This plan affords the head of each house or family a better opportunity of learning the individual character of each boy or girl, and a closer and more affectionate relationship grows up between pupil and teacher. A more home-like feeling naturally arises, and the members of each household learn to feel for each other somewhat of that sympathy which is kept warm in family life by the sense of mutual help, and that human interest which all associated workers have in each other.

Carried out in Europe.

This system has been followed with the most admirable results in the great Reformatories of Europe, the Rauhe Haus in Germany, Mettray in France, and Red Hill in England. In the most able and complete account of Mettray extant, written by Miss Florence Hill, at the request of the Prison Association of New York, the opinion of M. Demetz, the illustrious founder of Mettray, in favour of the family system, is recorded as follows:—

Division into families, he remarks, renders superintendence at once easy, direct and kindly: easy, because it extends over only a small number; direct, because it brings responsibility home to one person, the head of the family; kindly, because, actuated by this very sense of responsibility, and yet living in common with the objects of his care, the superintendent acquires for them a feeling of sympathy and even of affection. Upon the children themselves its influence is no less salutary. The authority to which they have to submit is paternal; they become attached to their chief; and in this mutual affection is found a moral lever of incalculable power. An innocent and healthy emulation arises when the families are multiplied. In a large edifice, containing a numerous population, common interests are so much diffused as to be feebly felt, unless indeed a general spirit of insubordination should arise, when the combination of numbers becomes an element of great danger; but in small groups, internal sympathy is intensified by external rivalry, which, if carefully directed, may always be rendered powerful for good.

This subdivision, moreover, facilitates the individual treatment of each child; indeed, where large numbers are massed together, such treatment becomes impossible, and this fact alone suffices to invalidate the agglomerative system. Individualization is an indispensable element in reformatory treatment, which renders it, in the opinion of M. Demetz, a fatal error to economize in the number of teachers. Moral influence can only be created by bringing them into the closest contact, heart to heart and mind to mind, with those whom they seek to win from evil. It is, he says, "a sort of single combat," in which they have to engage, and failures in reformatory undertakings are too often to be attributed to the substitution of collective for individual action, resulting from the employment of too small a staff of officers. One may manœuvre a regiment by the word of command, or a ship's crew by the boatswain's whistle, but moral government is to be attained by far other means.

The

The following description of the buildings and domestic arrangements of Mettray illustrates the manner in which the system is there pursued :—

The houses (which, with the other buildings, surround a large oblong court) are all detached; each is twelve mètres (thirty-nine feet) long, by six mètres, sixty-six centimètres (21 feet) wide, and consists of a ground floor, and over that a first and second floor. The ground floor, where the colons* are employed, when not occupied out of doors, is divided into four workshops, by a partition, sufficiently low to enable the superintendent, placed in the middle, to overlook every compartment, without, however, it being possible for the boys in one to communicate with those in another, or indeed to see each other when seated; while the upper part of the room being left free, the temperature of the whole remains the same, however unequal in number may be the lads at work in the different divisions.

“On the first floor is a dormitory for twenty children. The hammocks in which they sleep are so arranged that surveillance at night is easy, while, in the day-time, they are lying up against the wall, and the room is available for other purposes. They are suspended at night parallel with each other, but so that the heads and feet of the occupants shall come alternately side by side, by which means conversation, even in a whisper, is prevented, and it is made possible to place them very near together, without any evil consequence.

“Planks fixed to posts by means of hinges, and which can be lowered at pleasure, form a table, extending the whole length of the room, which may thus be used as a refectory, and, when the tables are raised parallel with the posts and the hammocks are hung up against the wall, a long, clear space is obtained, where, in rainy weather, the boys can be employed in various occupations, and at the same time be continually overlooked. A little room is partitioned off from the larger apartment, and having the side which commands a view of the latter, furnished with venetian blinds, the occupant can see, without being seen; in this post of observation the chef de famille has his bed, and, as no one knows whether he is asleep or not, there is not a moment when the boys can feel sure his eye is not upon them.

“The second floor is arranged on the same plan, and is also adapted to receive twenty colons.

“Two contre-mâtres keep watch at night in each dormitory, taking the duty alternately till morning.

“Each house thus accommodates forty children, divided into two sections, forming one family, presided over by a chef de famille, aided by two contre-mâtres. In addition to these, a colon is chosen monthly in each section, who, with the title of elder brother, assists the superintendents in the management of the household.”

The number of children thus grouped together has been objected to as far exceeding, even in its subdivision, that of the natural family; on the other hand, Mettray has always been liable to reproach for its costliness (as compared with other continental reformatories) by those who do not take into account its greater success. While M. Demetz is not of opinion that it is expedient to reduce the number to that of a real family, because, as it is unreasonable to expect that the affection felt by each member for companions arbitrarily associated with him can approach the warmth of an affection inspired by nature, it is necessary to raise the number of those members sufficiently high to create among them a public spirit, which shall strengthen the imitative family bond, yet he believes it would be well to fix it at twenty-five. But to have constructed the families at Mettray upon this scale would have necessitated an increase in the staff of officers, which the financial prospects of the colony unhappily have never authorized.¹

The success or failure of the scheme, as of all others for the training of children, will, it must be remembered, depend upon the care with which proper persons are selected for the superintendence of the several families. At one time the difficulty of finding suitable people appears to have led to the abandonment of the family system at Redhill. The effect of the change, as described by the Rev. Sydney Turner, is remarkably illustrative of the superiority of the family over the barrack system. He says,—

We had commenced with an imitation of the family system of the Continent, but we have been obliged to depart from it in consequence of the difficulty of finding masters who would work it satisfactorily. He adds, ‘we have been driven from that collective system, and compelled to resort to the family system again, and to cope with all the difficulties that we may meet with in finding masters, by the

evidently unfavourable results which the collective system began to yield.' After speaking of 'the lessened moral influence which has been exercised upon the boys by the abandonment of the family system,' he goes on to say, 'the principal reasons that have induced me to recommend the return to the family system are that I saw a deterioration of the moral improvement in the boys generally. They were more mechanical, and their voluntary action and moral conduct were decidedly inferior to what they had been. Petty dishonesty, evasions, and acts of cunning became common among them, and the boys themselves became restless and seemed to lose the affection they used to have, and a great many more endeavoured to escape.'

The difficulty in finding suitable persons to take charge of each household, seems to have arisen from adopting a standard of educational qualification higher than was necessary for such officers. Upon this point the evidence of Mr. Frederick Hill, late Inspector of Prisons for Scotland, given before the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1853, on Criminal and Destitute Children, appears to us to convey correct views with reference to the organization of institutions for the reception of children that cannot be dealt with under the boarding-out system.

'I think it desirable,' he says, 'that the buildings should be placed in rural districts, and be very simple in construction; that there should be a few large rooms for instruction and public worship, and that the rest of the building should consist chiefly of clusters of cottages, where the children may be treated very much as in families, and where the domestic influences may be brought to bear upon them; where too, the girls may be taught the management of a well ordered house, such as they may hope to be eventually mistresses of. I believe that intelligent right-minded married couples, fond of children, and properly qualified for the charge of such groups of children, might be obtained at a very moderate expense, and that the husband, by working with the children, would do much towards paying his salary. It is essential that there should be one or two directing minds, but with few exceptions, it is desirable that the officers should themselves be working men, not only for the sake of economy, but in order that they may not be prevented, by being accustomed to a much higher degree of refinement, from associating with the children; from working with them, eating with them, and being much in their society.' These are essentially the conditions upon which M. Demetz insists at Mettray. His own life at the school is an example of the simplicity and self-denial that he desires to impress upon the officers, and through them, upon the children.

The advantage of the system in such institutions as industrial schools and reformatories is obvious, from the facilities which it affords for the classification of the children.

Mr. Tuffnell, one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools under the Poor Law Board, speaking of the class of abandoned children usually to be found in refuges and reformatories, says, in a report to the Committee of Council of Education in 1856-7, "in order to reform a child of that description you must have the family system."

All the new institutions lately founded in England are conducted on this principle; amongst them, the Princess Mary Village for the children of female convicts, and the Alexandra Village for boys. Few industrial schools, according to the evidence of Miss Rosamond and Miss Florence Hill, appear to number more than twenty-five, unless the family system is adopted, which, in their opinion, is an absolute condition of success.

Though the introduction of the plan into England is comparatively of late date, it has been known on the Continent since 1746, when it may be said to have originated with Pestalozzi. Since that time Farm Schools conducted on the family system have been successfully established in Germany, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, and France; and in a paper read some twenty years ago before the Statistical Society, by Joseph Fletcher, Esq., one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools, upon the Farm School system of the Continent, he expressed "his surprise that the Continental experience of Farm Schools should have heretofore been viewed as an encouragement to our throwing our pauper children together in vast masses, each with its palace of brick or stone, and its comparatively mechanical system."

A Farm School on this system would, we think, be the best mode of conducting an Industrial School for Boys, in the event of the "Vernon" being devoted to the purposes of a Reformatory for Boys, the want of which is being so constantly experienced.

In conclusion, we would most earnestly recommend that when the character and age of the children render it necessary that they should be massed in large establishments, such institutions should be managed under what is known as the "family" system, the children being classified in small bodies not exceeding forty, for domestic life, but meeting together for the purposes of labour and secular instruction. ^{Recommendation.}

Whatever reforms may be effected in our Reformatory, Industrial, and other Schools for the orphaned and the destitute, we feel convinced that their machinery for restoring the children to the ranks of honest labour, and securing their welfare in after-life, will be far from complete if some provision is not made for their supervision after they have left our institutions. ^{After-supervision.} The evidence of all experienced in reformatory work strongly urges the necessity of such after-supervision. The real difficulties and temptations of life only commence with the young after they have left our institutions, and then, just at the time when they most require counsel and moral support, they have none to whom they can turn and on whom they can rely for advice and assistance. Though it would appear desirable that some officer should be officially charged with the duty of such supervision, and the task of keeping up a regular system of communication with the children after they have been sent out into the world, the experience of the Mother Country goes to show that this kind of work is best performed by volunteer agency and the assistance of persons of character and education who will undertake the duty in a kindly and philanthropic spirit.

In the absence of any such supervision, it is impossible to say how far our institutions have been successful in the objects for which they were established—the turning out of useful men and women—experience having shown that, in the absence of any such trustworthy source of information, many of the reports issuing from public institutions as to the success of their pupils in after-life are quite illusory. There is, of course, always an amiable desire to hope for the best, and it is too often supposed that because nothing is heard of a child it is turning out well, whilst a more accurate investigation has proved that those untraced and unwatched cases are often lamentable failures. Can we be surprised if the labour and expense incurred by the State in training its children are all thrown away when, after immuring them for years in institutions where they can acquire little power of self-control and no knowledge of the world, it turns them adrift at thirteen to shift for themselves? With strange inconsistency, the State declares the friendless pauper orphan, the abandoned and neglected, competent for the task of self-government at an age when, without experience of the world, it has yet to undergo the fiery ordeal of passions just beginning to awake, though it refuses to entrust it till the age of twenty-one to those who usually are still surrounded by relatives able to counsel and willing to protect. What parent would willingly lose control over his children at the most critical period of their lives?

In England the Managers of Industrial Schools are required to report upon the conduct of the children for three years after they have left the institution. In foreign schools of a similar character the utmost importance is attached to keeping up direct communication with the children who have been placed out. It is the business business of a central Bureau in Paris to keep the authorities of Mettray informed of the whereabouts, condition, and conduct of every child who has left the institution. In several Countries of Europe Societies exist whose work is to befriend persons when they leave prisons or reformatories, by obtaining them work and giving them advice in difficulty and trouble. In France these Associations are called Sociétés de patronage. "In England," Miss Hill, in her evidence, says, "the Government obliges us to send in yearly reports upon the conduct of the children for three years after they quit the school; and even if it did not, we should hardly be inclined to leave the girls entirely to themselves after having laboured for years in their reformation, at a period too when they are not old enough to be left completely to their own resources. The visiting is an essential part of the training, and often prevents falling back into evil courses."¹

Daily, it appears, is it becoming more clearly recognized that in all the works of charity—above all, in the attempt to reform our neglected and criminal classes—voluntary effort by the citizen individually must supplement the official provision made by the State for their reclamation. By no system of vicarious benevolence can we altogether delegate to others duties which if only perfunctorily performed are useless for good. Wisely has it been ordained that the bonds of human sympathy for our fellow-man shall not be broken with impunity by the allowance of our leaving to others duties that should be discharged by ourselves. The fatal estrangement between rich and poor too often seen in the histories of great nations is the penalty paid for such national selfishness. The great heart of national charity and human brotherhood can only be kept pulsating by the vigorous current of kindly sympathy throbbing through the veins of every member of the State. Violate the law by individually forgetting to assuage the physical suffering and ameliorate the moral condition of the poor that we shall always have with us, and the national heart must become diseased by the pauperism which enfeebles and the selfish indifference which corrupts. No system of dealing with our neglected and criminal classes which does not give scope and opportunity for private and voluntary effort to assist can be perfect or successful. "As one of the framers of the English Poor Law has remarked," says Miss Cobbe, "those laws were designed to form a mere bony skeleton indicating the form and affording a basis for the flesh of voluntaryism, to make a living body of national charity. By a fatal result of jealousy and routine, the voluntary element has been too often excluded, and we have only a fearful spectre haunting with death-like image all the lower vaults of our social fabric."²

So strongly is this felt in the Mother Country that every effort is now being made to secure the co-operation of the public in working reformatory institutions. The necessity of so doing is recognized as well by politicians as by philanthropic reformers. Lord Carnarvon, speaking in the House of Lords on Provincial Workhouses, says,—“In any steps that might be taken for the reform of these institutions, he should be glad to see the co-operation of private benevolence secured as far as possible—a co-operation which experience had shown to be of the utmost service in those institutions.”

In England the voluntary principle in the working of reformatory institutions is so far relied on, that there, all Industrial Schools are by the English Act presumed to originate in the exertions of private individuals, who start them in the manner described by Miss Hill in her evidence, and none seem to have been established by the Government.³

No

No doubt the circumstances of the Colony are so widely different that we could hardly have trusted to voluntary private benevolence for the first establishment of such institutions; but in making provision in our Industrial Schools Act for the establishment of private Industrial Schools, the Legislature evidently and wisely contemplated assistance being rendered to the State by voluntary efforts in this direction. The only attempt in the Colony to establish an Industrial School of this sort seems to have been made by Bishop Quinn, at Bathurst; but the insufficiency of the buildings provided appears to have caused the Government to refuse the school a certificate.¹

Though, as a body, we are adverse to the increase of Denominational Schools and approve of the Public School system of the Country, we think that denominational energy may be most beneficially exerted in the working of private Industrial Schools, as contemplated by the Act. Under proper Government inspection, and with power given to Benches of Magistrates to commit to them, we believe that they would be most useful auxiliaries to the public institutions, and we think every encouragement should be given, promoting the success of private efforts to establish them. If started in our country districts, they would have the beneficial tendency of preventing the congregation of children of the pauper class in the metropolis, whilst from their proximity to country life, they would have great advantages in the facility with which their inmates could be apprenticed out. The local interest attaching to them would still further stimulate the exertions of private benevolence, and prove of assistance to the children in procuring them a start in life. The suggestion made by Dr. Quinn in his evidence, that where possible the children in such institutions should be allowed to attend some of the ordinary public or certified schools of the Colony,² is also worthy of attention, as tending to depauperize and assimilate the children to others mixing with the world and influenced by home feelings. The plan has, we believe, been tried successfully in the Protestant Orphan School at Emerald Hill, Melbourne, as well as in several English institutions.³

For reasons given by several witnesses,⁴ we are of opinion that in all institutions, the gentlemen composing managing committees should be laymen.

We also think that in all establishments for the training of the young, governed by a committee, ladies should be associated with gentlemen in the management. We found this recommendation upon the experience of the Mother Country, where mixed committees of ladies and gentlemen are found to work well.⁵ This combination we consider better than having two committees, one of ladies and the other of gentlemen, as there is not so great a chance of disagreement in opinion when both meet on equal terms and are mutually open to be convinced by argument. As to women naturally belong the management of the household and the supervision of the nursery and the sick room, to shut them out from all participation in the control of establishments for the training of the young, is to deprive the public of the benefit of their counsel upon matters upon which they are more competent to decide than men, and with reference to which, in all our Charitable Institutions under their control, they have proved themselves to be the best of administrators. Speaking in favour of lady visitors to workhouses, Sir Walter Crofton, the celebrated prison reformer of Ireland, says—"It is no slight confirmation of this opinion to state, as I most emphatically do state, that the attendance of lady visitors at the large female convict prison in Dublin has been productive, not of irregularity or interference with the strict regulations of the establishment, as some may suppose, but of the best best and most beneficial results, both to the public and to the criminals themselves." Miss Twining, a lady well known for her philanthropic exertions amongst the destitute children of England, in her evidence before a Parliamentary Committee, urged the appointment of female inspectors for workhouses, or the election of two or three ladies to Boards of Guardians. In either capacity she believed they would be an aid and support to every rightly disposed matron in the discharge of her duties, and a potent check upon those inclined to do wrong, who are "able to deceive a body of gentlemen in a way they could not do if ladies had the inspection as well."¹

Methods of industrial training.

In accordance with the intimation conveyed in the letter of instructions accompanying our Commission, that the introduction of new methods of industrial training would be regarded with much satisfaction by the Government, we have endeavoured to gain such information as we could upon the subject. As far as we could learn from the sources of information open to us, the methods of industrial training attempted in the Colony are similar to those pursued in England, though there are some modes of employing the labor of children in the Mother Country, which have not been as yet adopted or tried here. Amongst these are brickmaking, brush-making, printing, and paper bag-making. It would appear from an examination of the Report of the Inspector of English Reformatory and Industrial Schools for 1873, that the most remunerative institutions are Farm Schools. In one of them, the Bedford Reformatory, comprising fifty acres of land and numbering thirty-four inmates, the industrial earnings amounted to £11 per head, the net cost of maintenance per head being only £11 2s. 6d. In Girls Schools the highest rate of industrial earnings attained was £6 per head, this being at the Liverpool Reformatory for Girls. The average cost per head of Reformatories for Boys in England is £18 19s. 10d., for girls £17 16s. 4d., and it would appear from an examination of the English Institutions that the small ones are not more expensive than the large, of which the Bedford Reformatory is a notable instance.²

Defective administration.

Our examination of the Public Charities of the Colony has shown us that they require a more complete system of supervision and a more prompt and vigorous administration than the present departmental arrangements afford; and the evidence taken by us, as well as the information which we have gained whilst inspecting the various institutions, convinces us that our Industrial and Reformatory Schools will never be efficiently worked unless some one officer is made responsible for their management. Such establishments constantly require inspection, and matters are frequently arising with reference to their daily working which demand immediate attention and a prompt decision. All this is impossible under the present indirect mode of communication through an Under Secretary, with a Minister who has little or no time to attend to details of administrative arrangements, which in the conduct of such institutions are often of vital importance to their well-being. In the event of the boarding-out system being established, the amount of business to be transacted with reference to our destitute children will be largely increased, and will involve the institution of inquiries respecting the persons chosen as foster-parents, which could in no way be carried out under present arrangements.

Remedy.

We are therefore of opinion that the general and immediate control of the Industrial and Reformatory Schools of the Colony, as well as the management of all business relative to the boarding-out or apprenticing of children from any institution aided by the Government, should be vested in an officer to be styled the Comptroller of Public Charities.

² Report of the Inspector for English Reformatories and Industrial Schools for 1873.

This officer should be empowered to exercise all the functions of the Inspector ^{Comptroller.} of Public Charities under the Public Institutions Inspection Act of 1866, and have authority to decide upon all matters respecting the discipline and administrative arrangements of all Charitable Institutions maintained or aided by the Government. He should be responsible for the selection of all officers, except masters and matrons, ^{Duties.} employed in Reformatories and Public Industrial Schools, and have full power to dismiss them, if, in his opinion, they are inefficient. The delay which reference to a Minister in such matters involves, is, we think, one of the greatest obstacles to the success of our present institutions; the presence of a suspended officer being, in our opinion, eminently calculated to destroy the morale of any institution, and to cause those feelings of partisanship and antagonism to arise which have worked so disastrous an influence at Biloela. In Victoria, where a similar office has been created, and found to add materially to the efficient management of the institutions placed under its supervision, Mr. Duncan, the Inspector of Charities, states that the necessity of communicating with a Minister with regard to every question of discipline, and on matters requiring instant determination, is very much calculated to interfere with the success of such institutions.¹

On the creation of the office of Comptroller of Public Charities the present ^{Asylum Board.} Board of Management of the Asylums for the Infirm and Destitute should be abolished, and its duties performed by the Comptroller. This Board, the members of which give their services gratuitously, is composed of the Auditor General, the Inspector General of Police, the Health Officer, and the Sheriff, all of whom have their time fully occupied in attending to their several departments, and consequently can devote little to the transaction of the additional work thus thrown upon them. Indeed, so much do the Sheriff and the Inspector General of Police find attendance at the Board interfere with their regular official duties, that they have for some time past entirely ceased attempting to attend.²

They both, however, state that if the work of the Board were properly done, that it would have a considerable amount of business to get through, and are of opinion that no gentlemen with important functions to discharge could satisfactorily attend to the additional duties which would devolve upon them by their taking a seat at the Board.³

In consequence of the inability of the members to attend to the discharge of their duties, it appears that they have very largely delegated their powers to the Secretary, Mr. King, who now exercises all the powers of the Board with reference to the admission of inmates to the Asylums, has the entire control of the funds, and gives security to the amount of £1,000 for the due performance of his duties.⁴

This state of things still further illustrates the necessity of appointing an ^{Absence of system.} officer directly responsible to the Government for the management of our Charitable Institutions. Were such an office in existence, we should not find a baby in arms at Biloela, juvenile prostitutes fresh from a Chinese den in our orphanages, and sturdy vagrants discharged for insubordination from our Asylums for the Infirm and Destitute, where they are maintained at the cost of £13 a year, immediately coming to the Sydney Infirmery, and there obtaining admittance, to be nursed at an annual expense to the Country of £42. The want of system disclosed in a subsequent portion of our Report, with reference to the management of the various classes of our destitute and neglected children, would be put an end to; and, by bringing into into one focus the administrative arrangements of the poor relief system of the Colony, we should establish a most efficient check upon imposition, and that too easy obtainment of admission to our Charitable Institutions which is so fatally conducive to the growth of a pauper spirit in the community.

Office of Comptroller.

The office where the business of the Comptroller is transacted should be in a central position in the city, easily accessible to the general public, like the Stamp Office, rather than a portion of one of our chief departments.

The difficulty which at present exists in communicating with the Government, with reference to the children under its care, is very great to the class of persons who are frequently interested in them, and who, though respectable, are often in so humble a sphere of life as to shrink from any attempt to obtain apprentices, or otherwise interest themselves in the children, when they have to communicate with an Under Secretary or a Minister.

Advantages of.

The opening of an office where full and immediate information could be obtained by all classes of the public, with reference to the children under the care of the Government, would, we are convinced, be of the greatest benefit to those whom it is the duty of society to rescue from misery and vice, by interesting the mass of the community in their welfare, and affording them an opportunity of giving such information to the Comptroller as would better enable him to discharge the duties of his office. Apprentices at present are obtained from our various institutions by application to the authorities of each, and an impression appears to prevail, that the success of such applications depends rather upon favouritism than on the advantages which the applicant holds out for the benefit of the apprentice. Whether this impression is well-founded or not, it undoubtedly exists, and the general public appear to be in ignorance as to how and where they are to apply, if willing to take a child as an apprentice from any of our public institutions. If such a central office were established, communicating with the public by advertisement whenever apprentices were ready to be sent out, we are convinced that it would be for the advantage of the children in the greater choice of employers that would be presented to the Government. At present, it appears from the evidence that application may be made for apprentices and be refused on the ground that there are no boys ready to be sent out to the trade for which they are sought; and yet within a few days of the application, boys who have been trained for that trade will be sent out as general servants, or to occupations in the pursuit of which their previous training will be entirely thrown away.¹

Cost.

The transfer of the clerical staff of the Board for the Infirm and Destitute to the office of the Comptroller would render much additional expense unnecessary in its establishment, and we believe something would be saved on the present expenditure in the better management of our institutions. We have already pointed out, in our Report upon the Sydney Infirmary, that through the want of a proper system of inquiry into the position of persons seeking admission into that institution, the Government is constantly paying for the maintenance of people in that hospital who have no claim upon the public for eleemosynary assistance. All this imposition upon the public would be prevented by the inquiries which it would be the duty of such an officer as the Comptroller to institute, and we are convinced that the creation of the office would, for all these reasons, be highly beneficial.

On

On the re-organization of the office as proposed, some suitable post in it should be found for the present Inspector of Charities, whose long connection with the Board for the Management of the Asylums for the Infirm and Destitute would enable him to render valuable assistance to the Comptroller, though his much to be regretted infirmity of speech would unfit him for the efficient discharge of the duties of that office. Inspector of Charities.

This officer in addition to his duties as Inspector of Charities has also to discharge those of Secretary to the Board, and consequently cannot have sufficient time at his disposal for performing the duties of Inspector. It would appear moreover from the evidence that he has little freedom of action in his capacity as Inspector, and has for some time past only reported upon such institutions as he has been directed by the Colonial Secretary to visit.¹ These are additional reasons for the separation of the offices, and for vesting more power in the Comptroller; as the efficacy of inspection in our opinion largely depends upon the power of the officer to visit and inspect institutions whenever he thinks fit, without waiting for complaints as to their maladministration.

It is clearly apparent from the evidence before us, that Intercolonial legislation is necessary to prevent parents throwing their wives and children on the country by deserting them and escaping to one of the neighbouring Colonies. The evidence given upon this point, by Mr. Fosbery, Secretary and Superintendent of Police, is very strong. He says:— Intercolonial legislation necessary.

In the present state of the law, deserted wives and children have no redress as against husbands in another Colony. A husband has merely to cross the Murray, or step into a Brisbane steamer, and he is as safe from pursuit as if he were in Europe. But the law is different as regards New South Wales and the other Colonies. For the desertion of a child (which is an indictable misdemeanour) the law here permits the remand of a parent charged, on a warrant, to another Colony. The consequence is, that not only do parents desert their children and leave them in Sydney, but they bring them here from other Colonies, and return to their own homes, leaving their children behind them. A case occurred of a man in a respectable sphere of life bringing four young children from Melbourne, giving a lodging-house keeper here £4, and taking the first steamer to Melbourne, leaving the children behind him. Those children would have been a burden upon the public here, but I took upon myself to send them back to Melbourne.²

Again he says:—

I think that the facilities are at present too ready to hand for people who wish to dispose of their relatives. I can instance a case where a high official came from a neighbouring Colony with two idiotic children and obtained an order for their admission into the Asylum, intending to leave them here and return to his position in the other Colony.³

As complaints are also made in Victoria of a similar character, and as the Royal Commission of that Colony upon the subject of penal and prison discipline has recommended "that arrangements should be made with the Governments of neighbouring Colonies for backing warrants to apprehend offenders who desert their families, or abscond in order to avoid paying orders made for their support so that they may be brought back to Victoria in default of making satisfactory arrangements for payment," we think no difficulty would be found in taking the necessary steps to put a stop to such practices.

We have not found it possible to make such an inquiry into the state of our country hospitals as the importance of the subject demands, as without inspection and inquiries into their management made upon the spot, any information that we could gain would, in our opinion, be of little value. We have therefore, contented ourselves Country Hospitals.

ourselves with collecting certain statistical information concerning them, which will be found in an Appendix to the evidence, and which may be of use if further inquiry is thought desirable. As a means, however, of checking unnecessary expenditure in the erection of small hospitals, we would strongly recommend that aid should not be granted to hospitals within twenty-five miles of each other, as the money which is frittered away in keeping up two establishments would, we conceive, be spent to the greater advantage of the sick-poor who resort to them, in maintaining one larger and more perfect institution. From the evidence before us it appears that this rule has been adopted in Victoria on the suggestion of a Commission appointed by the Government of that Colony.

necessary.

In the event of a Comptroller of Public Charities being appointed, we think it would be desirable that he should make an inspection of all the country hospitals as we have sufficient evidence before us to show that some of them are in a state of neglect and mismanagement.

Maladminis-
tration of.

In one a patient was recently poisoned through the ignorance of the person employed as a wardsman¹; in another, the victuals are served on the table upon which operations are performed²; in another, at Wagga Wagga, all the windows on one side of the principal ward are constructed so as not to open at the top; patients appeared to smoke amongst the sick as they liked, and there were no rules enforcing discipline, the person in charge complaining that none of the patients would obey him or render any assistance in cleaning the place.

The application of the boarding out system to the aged and infirm destitute class, as already recommended by us, would greatly benefit country hospitals by relieving them of a number of persons, whose presence in them interferes with their efficiency as hospitals, and causes them to work down to the level of mere asylums.

Local contributions.

As our Commission simply directed us to inquire into the working and management of our charitable institutions, we have not thought it within the scope of our investigation to enter into the question of the advisability of compelling the various districts of the Colony to contribute towards the maintenance of the infirm and destitute coming from them upon the public charities of the Country; but in the present scattered state of our population, and in the absence of a complete subdivision of the Colony into municipalities, we think it would be extremely difficult to carry out such a system as exists in the more compact and more thickly populated Colony of Victoria, where each district contributes to the maintenance of its own neglected children and its own poor.

pauperism.

We have already in our first Report called attention to the rapid growth of pauperism in the Colony, as illustrated by the fact that 4 per cent. of our population are in receipt of charitable support. We cannot, therefore, too strongly urge that all Poor Law Relief amongst us should be founded on actual necessity, and that no one can be a proper object of relief by the Government unless he is unable to earn his own living. Our institutions for the reception of the Infirm and Destitute appear to be rapidly increasing in size, and, unless watched over with a resolute determination that their doors shall only be opened to those absolutely without means of support, they must inevitably tend to the development of a pauper spirit in the community.

Relief must be
necessity.

The

The evidence before us shows that in all these institutions there are to be found persons, both young and old, who ought to be supported by their parents or near relatives; and we are therefore of opinion that the father, grandfather, mother, and grandmother, and the children and grandchildren, of every person unable to support himself and in receipt of charitable relief from the Government, either in an asylum or a hospital, should be compelled by law to contribute to his or their support. Such a provision exists in the Destitute Persons Relief and Industrial and Reformatory School Act of South Australia, and should be introduced on the passing of any measure for the consolidation and amendment of our law respecting destitute persons and neglected children. We would strongly urge the advisability of passing such an Act of consolidation and amendment on the creation of the office of Comptroller of Public Charities.

Compulsory support of destitute relatives.

We now proceed to make our special reports upon the institutions visited by us.

BILOELA INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

THE Industrial School for Girls now conducted at Biloele was established in 1867, under the provisions of The Industrial Schools Act of 1866. It was first opened at Newcastle in the old Military Barracks, the buildings of which, though in some respects suitable, were under the great disadvantage of being completely overlooked from the streets of the adjoining town, thus giving the idle and the vicious facilities for communicating with the inmates fatal to the discipline and well-being of the institution.

Early history of School.

The difficulty which always exists in finding officers capable of managing such institutions as Industrial and Reformatory Schools is well known to all taking an interest in philanthropic attempts to reform the vicious and the criminal. So great has it proved at Mettray, the most successful Reformatory in the world, that it was found necessary by M. De Metz to establish in connection with it a training school for officers, and only those marked out by nature and character as fit for the required work are allowed to complete their term of instruction, whatever their intellectual and other qualifications may be.

Difficulties of management.

“If,” says Miss Florence Hill,¹ “we inquire into the history of those Reformatories which already exist amongst us, of all the difficulties that beset them, will not their supporters at once admit that the greatest has been to procure efficient officers; that though zeal does not lack, the want of knowledge and experience in the possessor to turn it to account renders it sometimes even pernicious instead of beneficial; and that the advantage is incalculable which would accrue from the creation of a reserve fund, so to speak, such as the Ecole préparatoire, at Mettray, affords to all France, of officers inured to the hardships of their arduous profession, practised in its duties, imbued with a profound love for it, and, above all, actuated by the purest motives in its selection? That the Ecole préparatoire sifts the wheat from the chaff, and retains only the former, may be inferred by those even who have never visited Mettray, from the stringent rules, in virtue of which not only is a pupil at once dismissed who, in the course of training is guilty of any immorality, but if, as occasionally must happen, the superior education which a young man receives in this school expands the germs of self-conceit, or calls out a display of exceptionable motives, he receives an intimation that he has mistaken his mission, and is requested to withdraw.”

¹ “Mettray, from its commencement to the present time,” by Miss Florence Hill, Corresponding Member of the Prison Association of New York.

The directors of this noble institution, instead of building lofty walls for the restraint of their future wards, educated the guardians who were to control them, substituting moral power for material resistance. "We did not disguise from ourselves," says M. De Metz, "that the task of changing bad boys into good ones was not one to be confided to the first comers. It is a serious charge, demanding minds thoroughly prepared, entire self-devotion, and morality above suspicion."

The difficulties surrounding all attempts at the reformation of girls particularly are recorded by every writer on the subject. Miss Rosamond Hill, in her evidence, says :—

I cannot tell why, but I know it is a fact that, when a member of my own sex falls into evil courses, she seems to be worse and more degraded than a man does ; it is therefore a more difficult task to reinstate her in a virtuous life. One of our early child-reformers, and a very remarkable person, said it was more easy to reform ten boys than one girl ; but that when you had reformed one girl you had done as much as if you had reformed ten boys. It is a fact that if the mother of a family be respectable and industrious she will in all probability bring up her children to be the same, let the father be dissolute and drunken ; but if also her character be bad, the respectability of the father has but small power to counteract her evil influence.

Again, Miss Mary Carpenter writes :—

A school for boys is necessarily different in many respects from one for girls. They are to be fitted for independent active life, and when the tone of the institution is once established, le clef des champs, as De Metz calls it, should be the only one employed. But girls are to be fitted for home, and while the same preparation for an independent life is not required for them, a far greater degree of neatness, order, and propriety of demeanour is desirable.

The requirements of convicted children of the female sex have been hitherto overlooked ; nor would it appear to be generally understood how many of these exist, and how dangerous is their position both with regard to themselves and the community. The fact that girls of the criminal class are far more degraded, dangerous to society, and difficult to control than boys, is well known to those whose experience has enabled them to compare the two sexes. The proofs and causes of this state of things cannot be here entered on ; the fact is in part referable to the greater natural delicacy and susceptibility of the nature of girls, which renders them open to a deeper impress of good and evil. They have also been more directly exposed to the evil influences of bad homes, and the affections, which are very strong in these girls, are therefore in close sympathy with vice. Their desire for excitement of every kind is strong, as also for the gratification of their senses. They are generally devoid of any good principles of conduct, particularly addicted to deceit, both in words and actions, of fine but misdirected powers, of violent passions, extremely sensitive to imagined injury and equally sensitive to kindness.¹

Our young Colony, in its first attempt to found reformatory institutions, did not escape the difficulties besetting similar efforts in older Countries. Unfortunately the Superintendents first chosen did not prove themselves possessed of that combination of qualities which is required to lead and control the class of girls expected to be found in a school established for the reception of the neglected and the vicious, and their injudicious management caused the institution rapidly to fall into a complete state of disorganisation.² The inmates broke out in a series of riotous disturbances of the most disgraceful character, and the Government of the day, believing that the situation of the School largely contributed to the difficulty of quelling these disorders, determined on removing the institution to its present site at Biloela.

Site.

The reasons for choosing this spot appear to have been that the immediate removal of the School was considered absolutely necessary, that no other buildings were available for the purpose, and that its isolated position would afford great facilities for controlling the inmates. It appears to have been felt at the time that that the new site was not the best that could be chosen, and the opinion originally entertained of its unsuitability has been more than justified by the difficulties which have since arisen in its management.

The proximity of the School to a dock frequented by numbers of sailors, of itself, in our opinion, renders Biloela most unsuitable for the site of an Industrial School for Girls, whilst its prison associations and inaccessibility from Sydney are further disadvantages which we think have militated against the success of the institution. Though some of the witnesses seem to think that the proximity of the dock is not likely to be injurious to the School, the great bulk of the evidence on the point goes to show that it is highly prejudicial to its success. In one instance part of the crew of a foreign ship of war broke into the premises; and there are repeated allusions made by witnesses to communications taking place between the girls and the sailors about the dock, and the difficulty of preventing them in consequence of a portion of the School premises overlooking the dock-yard. Their disturbing influence on the girls, many of whom had commenced a life of prostitution before they became inmates of the School, need not be dwelt upon; and were there no other reasons for the removal of the School from the island, this alone, would in our opinion, be sufficient.

The prison associations of the place, arising from the fact that Cockatoo Island was for many years the chief penal establishment of the Colony, appear to have been recognized from the first as highly objectionable; but it was thought that by calling the place Biloela, the aboriginal name for the island, these associations would be got rid of,¹ and the girls saved in after-life from the possible stigma of "having been at Cockatoo." The mere change of name, however, did not alter the character of the place.

Constructed for prison purposes, the buildings still retain all the character- Buildings.
istics of a prison. The dormitories are essentially gaol-like and cheerless. Stone floors hewn from the solid rock, all worn away by the tread of the countless criminals who for years occupied the island,—grated iron doors, with massive locks and heavy bolts; instead of windows, grated apertures high in the blank walls, allowing no outlook upon the scene beyond,—all must constantly impress upon the minds of the children the prison-like character of their life. Nothing could be more fatal to the character of the girls, whom the State has taken upon itself to reclaim from misery and vice, to win from the rude freedom of the vagrant's life, and to cultivate in whose minds a love for the decencies and refinements of society, is the object to be aimed at in all the surroundings of their home. How much we are the creatures of association, how often characters are moulded by the circumstances of early life, is known to all taking interest in education and the training of youth. Pauperism itself is now regarded by social reformers and politicians alike, as an entail handed down from parent to child, only to be cut off by rescuing the child from the surrounding circumstances that pauperize. To treat our young unfortunates as criminals and prisoners is simply to perpetuate in their minds the idea, already too strongly implanted, that they and Society are natural enemies to each other, that law and order exist not for the protection of all, but for their coercion and their restraint. By those who see in a policeman not a guardian but an enemy, a place which is substantially the same as when it was a prison for the worst class of felons in the Country can scarcely be regarded with with the affection of a home, nor the Country which provides it as paternal in its care. The history of reformatory institutions throughout the world clearly establishes the gospel truth that only by winning the confidence of the social prodigal, and by re-establishing the bonds of sympathy between Society and its vagrant children, can success be attained in reclaiming those whom ignorance and neglect have allowed to grow up with the feeling that they and the law-abiding portion of the community are hostile in their interests. To act like a prisoner and a criminal is the natural sequence to being treated like a prisoner and a criminal. The power to coerce and punish must doubtless exist, but it should be kept in reserve as an ultimate appeal, and the sense of degradation should attach to it in the minds of the children when its exercise becomes necessary. Moral influence, firmness, and the kindness of compassionate sympathy must, however, be the powers on which the authorities in all reformatory institutions must mainly rely.

Not only is the prison architecture of the buildings most objectionable, but their want of compactness and arrangement, by precluding the possibility of proper supervision of the children by the officers, renders them still further unfit for the purposes to which they have been applied. The officers' quarters, instead of being close to the children's dormitories, as they should be in a properly constructed building, are situated some distance outside the quadrangle of which the dormitories form three sides, and are so remote from it as to prevent the possibility of the sub-matrons in charge of the children knowing anything that is going on amongst them when they are locked up in their dormitories for the night.

Grounds.

The external appearance of the grounds, no less than the internal arrangement of the buildings, are little calculated to have a beneficial effect upon the children, there being a neglected and dilapidated look about the whole island which strikes the eye immediately on landing. Indeed, it is quite surprising, considering the length of time that the place has been occupied as a penal establishment, with abundance of labour at the command of its authorities, that so little should have been done towards softening its bleak and ragged aspect.

Sanatory state.

The sanatory arrangements of the establishment have been utterly neglected. It appears from the evidence that the closets are in the same state as when the prisoners were on the island, and their drainage is abominably defective. The foul and neglected condition of this portion of the premises has been very properly represented to the Government on repeated occasions by the visiting medical officer, Dr. Evans, but no attention appears to have been paid to his reports. So serious and dangerous to health has the nuisance become that Dr. Evans has represented to the Government the propriety of fixing the responsibility of the neglect in attending to the matter on the proper officer, as in the event of a death caused by illness arising from the stench, he should consider that officer guilty of manslaughter, and think it necessary to hold an inquest.¹ Notwithstanding these very urgent complaints nothing has been done, and the closets remain in the same disgusting state, polluting the air of the children's workroom.² We are of opinion that no time should be lost in remedying this state of things. Scarlet fever has already shown itself amongst the children; and the worst consequences may follow if the nuisance is not abated.

Water Supply.

Another serious deficiency in the place is the want of a proper supply of water. Strange as it may seem, after the occupation of the island for so many years as a penal establishment, no system has been adopted for collecting and storing storing the rain-water. Tanks have certainly been constructed, but in the absence of proper spouting and guttering they are useless, and it is given in evidence that in former times the island has often been so short of water as to require the expenditure of hundreds of pounds in bringing it to the place.¹

Though the insular position of the school, in the opinion of some of the witnesses, is advantageous, from the difficulties surrounding attempts to escape, yet its consequent inaccessibility from Sydney is, in our opinion, a serious disadvantage.

Experience in the management of reformatory institutions shows that the intercourse which arises from the visits of educated persons taking a kindly interest in the children has a most ameliorating influence on their characters. The children learn to feel that they are no longer regarded as the pariahs of Society, feelings of sympathy and affection are aroused, a desire to win the esteem of those who take interest in them naturally arises, and acquaintances are formed which enable them to obtain respectable situations, and the counsel and moral support in after-life which is so valuable to those who have been homeless and neglected in early youth. Miss Hill, with twenty-five years' experience in the work of reformation, says in her evidence "Voluntary assistance, is a condition essential to its success. The volunteer can obtain an influence over the person to be reformed, be it woman, man, or child, to which the mere paid official never attains. The cause of this influence is the conviction in the mind of the person to be reformed that the volunteer is performing a labour of love."²

The isolated position of the institution, however, cuts off its inmates from this source of beneficial influence, except so far as it is supplied through the praiseworthy efforts of philanthropic ladies, like Mrs. Foot³ and the Sisters of the House of the Good Shepherd, whom no obstacles seem to deter from their charitable labours. Were the school situated in a place more accessible from Sydney, we believe that it would receive much invaluable assistance of this sort from many who in other institutions have shown themselves not unwilling to give that voluntary help without which the labour of officials, however zealous in the performance of their duties, can do but a portion of the work of preparing the children for their encounter with the world.

For the reasons adduced, we are of opinion that steps should be immediately taken for the removal of the Industrial School from Biloela, and for its re-establishment in some healthy locality more accessible from Sydney, and yet not so close to town as to expose it to annoyance from the idle and the dissolute. We are also of opinion that, in re-establishing the School, it would be well if a site could be obtained near enough to Protestant and Catholic churches to enable the children to attend divine service on Sunday; their association in Church with orderly and respectable congregations being calculated, in our opinion, to develop in their minds a sense of propriety and a reverence for religion far greater than is likely to arise from attendance at any service within the institution.

We have not thought it our duty, nor indeed desirable, that we should select the exact locality where the school should be re-established, as, in the event of no public land being available for the purpose, a site might have to be purchased; and, in view of the many considerations by which the Government would have to be guided in its selection, we have thought it sufficient simply to indicate the character of the spot that should be chosen.

In

buildings.

In the erection of new buildings we would most strongly urge that special care should be taken that the architectural arrangements provide for the complete and constant supervision of the children, and we would most earnestly recommend the adoption of the Family system before alluded to in our Report as so beneficial in counteracting the bad effects of massing children together in large institutions.

Management.

Having thus dealt with the question of the expediency of removing the School from Biloela, we now proceed to report upon its management and working as there conducted.

Shortly before the removal of the School from Newcastle, Mr. George Lucas, the Superintendent in charge at the time of our inquiry, was appointed, and though he has since resigned, on being called upon to show cause why he should not be dismissed on account of the proceedings disclosed in our minutes of the 25th November, we cannot avoid pronouncing an opinion on his management, inasmuch as public interests require that your Excellency should be fully informed of the causes contributing to the comparative failure of an institution established by the Legislature in furtherance of a philanthropic scheme of social reform worthy of the Country.

Previous to his appointment, Mr. Lucas appears to have been known as a citizen of Sydney taking considerable interest in the destitute classes of the city. Of a kindly disposition, he devoted a considerable portion of his time to the management of a night refuge for the homeless poor, and enjoyed the consequent popularity arising from his charitable conduct. On the removal of Mr. Clarke from the office of Superintendent, the Government of the day, in consequence of representations from numerous persons that Mr. Lucas was, by his disposition suited for the office, appointed him to the vacant post, at the same time giving the office of Matron to his wife.¹ Mere kindness of disposition, however, does not necessarily imply the possession of abilities requisite in the efficient administrator of an Industrial School. Beyond the possession of good intentions, Mr. Lucas appears to have possessed no qualifications for a post requiring a singular combination of natural and acquired attainments for the successful discharge of its duties, and it was soon discovered that a mistake had been made in his appointment. At the time of his nomination to the office no one seems to have been aware of the fact that Mr. Lucas was unable to write the simplest report in grammatical English, and, since his first attempt, all his official documents seem to have been drawn up by the clerk and storekeeper of the institution.² Besides his deficiency of education, there was soon exhibited a disregard of appearance, and a slovenliness of attire very much calculated to destroy the respect of young people,³ quick in associating roughness of manner and appearance with want of culture and refinement. Experience seems to prove that probably no class so absolutely require for their successful management persons placed over them as instructors whom they at once distinctly recognize as their superiors, intellectually, morally, and socially, as the children to be found in a female Industrial School.

With reference to this point, Miss Florence Hill, in a brief notice of an Industrial School started in Dublin for the purpose of rescuing some of the female arabs of that city from destitution, writes as follows, in her work, "The Children of the State":—"A curious fact revealed itself in the history of this little institution. During its early period a matron of the social position such an officer usually holds was found competent to its management; but when the workhouse girls were admitted, her efficiency ceased; and it was not until a woman of education and refinement—in other words, a lady—undertook the post, that these poor, undisciplined, and stupidified creatures could be successfully treated."

Again,

Again, we find :—“ Not many years ago the young women in the Dublin Union were known only for their lawless behaviour and utter insubordination. They exhausted every means of control within the workhouse, were frequently before the Magistrates, and occasionally were consigned even to the convict prison. ‘ I have heard a Guardian say,’ we are informed by a writer on Irish workhouses, ‘ that during one of the frequent outbreaks in the Union, he has seen all the ward-masters, the street police, and the whole body of Guardians assembled on Board-day, standing at fault before a yard full of these desperate girls, and succeeded only, after a long delay, and the use of the rudest physical force, in securing and carrying off to prison the ringleaders of the tumult.’ It is the members of this same class—in some instances the very individuals themselves—who, by the influence of Christian gentlemen, have been converted into self-respecting, docile, and industrious citizens, free, it is to be hoped, for ever from the workhouse, and absorbed into the respectable labouring population.”

The ease with which Mrs. Foot, Mrs. Kelly the schoolmistress, and the Sisters of the House of the Good Shepherd, managed the children when brought into contact with them, proves how great was the influence that persons of superior culture had over the girls;¹ and that, to use the words of Mr. F. Cane, who for three years in his position as clerk and storekeeper, had ample opportunity for observing the working of the school—“ a person cannot be too highly educated or refined for them.” This witness, indeed, entirely attributes the disorganization of the school to a want of “ deportment” and refinement on the part of the superintendent, coupled with the consequent absence of all moral influence over the girls.²

Unfortunately the matron was no helpmate to the superintendent in discharging the duties of his office, as the evidence discloses the frequent exhibition by her of an infirmity of temper which rendered it quite impossible that she could restrain others whose untrained dispositions and tempers especially required the teaching which is instilled by example. It would even seem that this violence of disposition injuriously extended its influence to Mr. Lucas himself. The evidence shows that the most pitiable exhibitions of temper on the part of both officers constantly took place before the children;³ and though the truthfulness of some of the evidence on this point was denied by Mr. and Mrs. Lucas, we saw enough, personally, to convince us that the charge was too likely to be true. The violence of language and demeanour displayed by both officers before members of the Commission on the occasion of their visit to the institution, recorded in the minutes of the 25th November, clearly indicated what was likely to occur when their sense of absolute power was untrammelled by the presence of any one exercising a restraining influence.

The superintendent and matron are assisted in the management of the institution by three sub-matrons, who are widows, having children of their own living with them in the institution. The evidence shows that the most unfortunate want of confidence has existed for some time between these officers and the Superintendent and his wife. The sub-matrons assert that the superintendent has entirely destroyed all their power to influence the children for good by personally degrading them in their presence. They complain that he has publicly mimicked their peculiarities,⁴ has spoken sneeringly of their former occupations,⁵ has openly found fault with and abused them,⁶ has allowed the girls to treat them with disrespect and insult, and told them he would not believe them,⁷—and all this before the children. The Superintendent and his wife, on the other hand, though denying some of these allegations, admit others, and retort that the sub-matrons have either been guilty of unbecoming conduct or remiss in their duties in giving them the support in the management of the school to which they were entitled. In a conflict of testimony such as exists on some of these matters, it is of course difficult to see who is most in the wrong, but as some of the charges are admitted by Mr. Lucas, it appears to us, both parties being primâ facie equally entitled to credit, that it is more likely that Mr. Lucas has forgotten things said and done in moments of anger and excitement, than that the specific cases of ill treatment mentioned by the witnesses in which they corroborate each other should have been maliciously invented by them. It can hardly be expected, when officers are subject to insults of the sort described, that there can exist much loyalty of feeling or cordiality towards their superiors. But whatever the remissness of the sub-matrons in the discharge of their duties may have been, and whatever their want of cordiality in co-operating with the Superintendent, the fact remains that he never seems to have thought himself called upon to report any misconduct on their part.

The evidence, however, shows that it is undesirable that the sub-matrons should have children residing with them in the institution;¹ and though we are of opinion that the charges of misconduct made against Mrs. Rowland, Mrs. Brackenregg, and Mrs. Dunn are not proved, yet we think it would be advisable, in reorganizing the institution, that a new staff should be employed of officers without children. We would, at the same time, recommend the officers named for employment in suitable situations elsewhere.

Disorganized
state of School.

This want of unanimity amongst the officers of institution, together with the absence of method, judgment, culture, and self-control exhibited by the Superintendent and the Matron could not be otherwise than fatal to the discipline of the school. All moral power over the girls soon vanished, and they repeatedly broke out in a state of riotous insubordination. Windows were broken, property destroyed, and an attempt even made to set fire to the place.²

Control of the institution having been entirely lost by the Superintendent, the assistance of the police had to be called in to quell disturbances and arrest the ringleaders. Things were at their worst about September, 1871, when Mr. C. Cowper, junior, on going to reside at Cockatoo Island as Water Police Magistrate, was authorized by the Government to assist Mr. Lucas as far as he could in the restoration of order. The institution at the time was in a state of riot, a number of girls were locked up in one of the dormitories, and the place was in charge of a sergeant and a body of police. Its domestic state he describes as follows:—

I found when I went there that the porridge was cooked over night, and only warmed up in the morning for the girls; that they had no knives and forks; that they seldom or never wore shoes and stockings; that they went to their meals and left them whenever they liked; that they seldom obeyed any orders given to them; that one girl stole from another, and cut out the marks of the brands upon the articles of clothing in order to escape detection; and that they used very often to go on the beach and bathe in the day-time, and they ran about the island without there being apparently any control over them. I told Mr. Lucas from the very first that he must insist upon implicit obedience, and after a time I thought that the girls appeared to me much improved in that way. One instance I can particularly remember, and that was with reference to the girls going to the beach. Mr. Lucas told me that he could not stop it. I said that he must stop it; that the public outside were complaining about it, and that I was there to prevent any indecency that would offend the public; or at any rate that the police were. He then took the matter up in a determined manner, and, except upon very extraordinary occasions, I never heard of any offence of that kind afterwards. I felt that the only means of reforming the girls was by moral influence, and that by bringing moral influence to bear upon them would be the only way to bring them to a proper sense of their position, and make them behave in such a manner as would allow of their being restored to society.³

Carrying out this view, Mr. Cowper caused the police to be removed, and with praiseworthy zeal endeavoured to enlist the sympathies of the public in the school by finding employers willing to take the worst-behaved of the girls, and by procuring the visits of Mrs. Foot and the Sisters of the House of the Good Shepherd, which undoubtedly have had a most beneficial effect.¹ A room was opened at night where the children might amuse themselves by reading, writing, and playing innocent games, under the supervision of some of the officers, and forty of the worst girls were sent to different employers in the country. All the witnesses speak of the change in the tone of the school after these reforms, and the improvement in the behaviour of the girls was marked.

Mr. Cowper says:—

When I first went into the school the girls told me plainly that they would not take situations—that they would return to their former associates and bad practices. Within two months there was hardly a girl who was not anxious for a situation; and several of the worst, whom their mothers wished to take home again, begged me to interfere and prevent the Colonial Secretary giving his consent, as they knew the temptations of city life would be too much for them.²

We have thought it right to give this account of the part taken by Mr. Cowper in dealing with the School, not only because that gentleman has been accused by Mr. Lucas of destroying his influence, and so injuring the School, but because it is desirable to show what may be done with these unfortunate girls under more judicious management, as they have at times been alluded to as incorrigible, and as if all attempts at their reformation were hopeless. We see, however, no reason for supposing that the hearts of neglected children are more obdurate in Sydney than elsewhere, nor can we understand why the kindly, but firm and judicious treatment which has proved successful at Mettray, as well as at Redhill and many other Reformatories and Industrial Schools in the Mother Country should here fail in its effects. As it has been truly said, the only method of success is “to believe firmly that a child has been born with a heart and feelings like other people, and seek out these buried treasures at any cost. One gets into deep soundings, but the search is seldom altogether in vain.”

Though Mr. Cowper seems to have used due caution in initiating reforms in the management of the school only with the concurrence of Mr. Lucas, and to have impressed the importance of so doing upon the officers, it is to be regretted that his efforts were not met in a cordial spirit by the Superintendent and his wife. A feeling of jealousy seems to have arisen against him, and Mr. Cowper finding that he could not usefully interfere further, was to a great extent obliged to discontinue his efforts to assist. Soon after this, things seemed to have relapsed very much into their former state, the girls again breaking out in rioting and violence immediately prior to the resignation of Mr. Lucas in December last year.

In default of moral influence, the evidence would appear to show that the measures resorted to with the view of controlling the girls were not only most injudicious, but so harsh and violent as in some instances rightly deserving to be called cruel. Though the rules of the School strictly forbid the infliction of corporal punishment by the Superintendent, and only allow it at the hands of the female officers, the evidence shows that the rule has been constantly violated in the most reprehensible way by the late Superintendent, and that corporal punishment has altogether been too frequently resorted to. Remembering the character for kindness which Mr. Lucas bore before his appointment to the office of Superintendent, we were slow in believing the evidence given by several witnesses as to the manner in which some of the girls had been treated. The facts, however, which came to our knowledge on the 25th November left no doubt on our minds as to the substantial truth of these allegations. They conclusively prove how dangerous it is to trust well-meaning but weak and ignorant people with uncontrolled power over the helpless and defenceless, and how quickly the best of such natures drift into a course of action which when unspoil by the exercise of absolute authority they would shudder at adopting. Though we believe that the power to inflict corporal punishment should be allowed in the institution, it should only be exercised by a woman, as the infliction of the punishment by a man must necessarily degrade the character of young women subjected to such an outrage, whilst it must inevitably lower the dignity and blunt the moral sense of the man allowing himself to violate one of the first instincts of a manly nature.

It would appear from the evidence given by several witnesses as to the violence used towards the girls, that the treatment to which they were subjected was little calculated to impress them with a reverence for authority, but rather to perpetuate in their minds familiarity with scenes of domestic quarrel and violence, frequent indeed amongst the classes from which neglected vagrant children spring, and which furnish the wife-beaters of our Police Courts, but hardly to be expected in a reformatory home provided by the State for the children whom it seeks to reclaim from misery and neglect. Black eyes, the result of blows inflicted by the Superintendent and his wife, appear to have been exhibited by several of the girls,¹ and canings by the Superintendent leaving black marks for days on tall grown girls with the physique of women, are spoken of as matters of common occurrence.² One witness describes a girl with the blood streaming from her nose, and handfuls of hair torn out in a violent struggle that took place on her resisting a caning by the Superintendent³; others speak of the use of gags, and the putting on of strait-waist-coats by the police,⁴ in one instance when a young woman was so little clothed as to make the scene indecent.⁵

We believe that the power to give solitary confinement, under proper restrictions, is indispensable, but the practice disclosed in the evidence of shutting up a number of girls together, without occupation, in a dormitory for days and even weeks, cannot be otherwise than pernicious in its effect. The close confinement of young people for periods of fourteen and twenty-eight days with no food but bread and water we must also strongly condemn as detrimental to health.

In November last, having been given to understand that the school was in a state of insurrection, we thought it desirable that we should visit the institution, and, if possible, ascertain for ourselves the cause of the disturbance and observe the method of dealing with it adopted by the Superintendent. On the 25th of that month we proceeded to Biloela. On arriving at the Industrial School it was found that many of the windows had been broken in a riotous disturbance which had taken place some few days before, and that a number of the girls engaged in the outbreak were still locked up in two of the dormitories. One of the girls having requested permission to make a statement to the Commission, was called in and examined. She complained of ill-treatment on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Lucas, stating that both these officers had beaten her, and ill-treated other girls named, by knocking them down, striking them with the fist, a cane, and a broomstick; and by knocking their heads against a wall on which some caricatures of Mr. and Mrs. Lucas had been drawn. She exhibited the marks of blows recently inflicted, in support of her statement. The other girls named by her were called in and examined, every precaution being taken to prevent collusion between them.

them. Every one of these girls bore marks of violence, and corroborated the account given by the first witness of the ill-usage to which they had been subjected. One girl was found with discoloured bruises on her arms, shoulder and bosom, and asserted, as did the other girls, that they were the effects of blows inflicted by Mr. Lucas. All these girls, who were from fourteen to eighteen years of age, though closely cross-examined by us, were consistent in their account of the proceedings connected with the treatment they had received, and we saw no reason for disbelieving their statements. They complained of having been beaten, kicked, dragged by the hair, caught by the throat, and of having had their heads struck and rubbed against a wall, apparently in a rough effort to make them rub out a rude attempt at a caricature with their hair. Two witnesses were then examined at the request of Mr. Lucas, but were found to know nothing of the proceedings complained of by the former witnesses, as they were in another part of the institution at the time of their occurrence. The former witnesses having complained of being locked up in a dark room which was so oppressive and foul from its closeness that they were unable to sleep, we repaired to the room spoken of. On opening the door, eight girls from fourteen to seventeen years of age were found, four of them in a half-naked condition, and all without shoes or stockings. Their wild glare and half-crazed appearance as the light of the opened door fell upon them struck us with horror. The room had a stone floor, was without a chimney, had every window closely boarded up, was without an article of furniture, and had a foul and sickly stench, every call of nature being there answered by its inmates. On the door being closed upon the members of the Commission, it was impossible for us to see each other till accustomed to the darkness. Into this room, when still damp from a recent scrubbing, it appears that eight girls had been put and kept in the dark from Friday morning till the visit of the Commission on Tuesday night, in the semi-nude condition in which they were found. Fed on bread and water, they drank, as they said, like dogs, from a bucket placed in the room, no utensil being allowed them. Three were so hoarse from the effects of their confinement in the closed-up room and sleeping on the flags, no bedding having been allowed them but blankets, that they were almost unable to speak, and we deemed it advisable to recommend their immediate release from confinement, as well as a supply of clothing and mattresses to those still locked up.

We regretted to witness a most unseemly display of temper on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Lucas in the presence of the girls, on a suggestion being privately made to them by us as to the advisability of opening one of the windows for the admission of light and air, and of adopting some more judicious method of dealing with the girls incarcerated in the darkened dormitory.¹

Mr. Lucas, on being called upon to answer the charges made against him, but faintly denied them, admitted that he had "quarrelled" with the girls about the caricatures, had rubbed their heads against the wall, and could only say that he did not think he had knocked a girl down and stood upon her.² Strongly condemning and deploring such treatment of the girls by the Superintendent, as calculated to provoke a well-founded sense of injustice and to degrade the character of those subjected to it, we thought it our duty immediately to communicate the results of this visit of inspection to the Colonial Secretary. On being called upon to show cause why he should not be dismissed on the ground of the circumstances disclosed in our minute, Mr. Lucas resigned.

The general management and domestic economy of the institution we found to be in keeping with its system of discipline. General

It appears from the evidence that the girls have been under little or no control, and have roamed about the island very much as they liked. They seldom or never wore shoes or stockings, and the use of combs and brushes, from their personal appearance, would seem unknown. In the morning we are told, they often run about the institution half-naked, and might be seen "cleaning-up about the place" without their dresses, which in the case of the elder girls were often worn indecently short, in consequence of their tearing the skirts for the purpose of displaying their limbs.¹ For this indecency it would seem that they have never been punished or even seriously admonished and the practice checked. Their appearance is rough and wild, and they either run away at the sight of strangers, or utter rude and coarse language before them, unrestrained by their presence. There is no proper roll call, and no bell to summon them to meals or to work, and much time and labour is often wasted by the officers in hunting the children up amongst the rocks and about the grounds of the island.² On one occasion of our Secretary and some members of the Commission visiting the school, when the children assembled for dinner, twenty-nine were absent and nine never came in at all. Neither water nor mugs were upon the table, and the girls might be seen after leaving the room drinking from a horse trough. The excuse made for the absence of mugs was, that if supplied the children would be running out for water all dinner-time.³ Many of the children left the table without finishing their meal, carrying off their dinner in their pinafores, and eating it outside, and it was admitted that this had always been the practice.⁴ They were for months without knives and forks, tearing their victuals with their hands.⁵ They have no night-dresses and sleep in their chemises, sometimes altogether in their clothes.⁶

training.

The industrial training of the children has been neglected. The best illustration of this is the fact that but three or four of them have been taught to milk, though numbers of them are old enough to learn. Whilst on this subject we may remark that we are disposed to think that not only in this but in all our charitable institutions for children too much time is spent in school instruction. With the exception of the time absolutely necessary for their being taught reading, writing, and the first four rules of arithmetic, the time of the children should be devoted to making them proficient in domestic work. Whilst saying this, we of course, do not mean to imply that no time should be allowed the children for play and recreation, which are necessary both for their physical and their mental health. From the nature, however, of their start in life, their prospects of success, more than is the case with other children, must largely depend on acquaintance with the duties of domestic servants, and only by constant practice in the routine of such duties can children learn them. If a child is in a laundry only once in three weeks, as a lady witness pointed out to us, she naturally forgets what she has been taught to a certain extent a month before, but has not practised in the interim. Industrial training, moreover, by gradually developing the dormant mental faculties, is of the highest importance as a means of education amongst city arabs, as they will often be found restless and uninterested in the schoolroom, but active and industrious in doing household work, by which they will be gradually trained and inclined to give attention to books and lessons. In English Industrial Schools the time allotted to school teaching appears to be three hours, and this we are of opinion is amply sufficient.

In the present disorganized state of the school it seems to us impossible that its industrial arrangements can be reproductive, but under better management we think think that the labour of the girls might be made remunerative by taking in the washing of ships in the port, the boats of the "Vernon" being the means of communication between the shipping and the school.

The cost of maintenance per head is £37 4s. 4d. In England it appears that the average net cost per head in Industrial Schools for girls is £14 14s. 11d.; and in Scotland £12 12s. 10d.; the rates varying from above £20 at the Girls' Home in London to under £11 at the Perth Girls' School in Scotland, and under £10 at some of the English Roman Catholic Schools. It would also appear from statistics that the labour of girls is not so reproductive as that of boys.

In this and all similar institutions of a reformatory character we believe that constant employment and the supervision of the children by some officer are essential conditions of success, and we are of opinion that the utter neglect of the children during their evening hours before bed-time and the absence of all supervision when in their dormitories has had a most disastrous influence at Biloela. For a short time the occupation of the girls during the evening was attempted, at the suggestion of Mr. Cowper, as before related, but the Superintendent and the Matron apparently attaching little importance to it, the plan was soon abandoned.¹

From the evidence before us it appears that the girls are locked up in their dormitories about 6 o'clock.² These dormitories are the old prison rooms which we have before described, and contain twenty-four beds each. In one of the smaller rooms a candle has been allowed. In the others the unfortunate children are locked up without tables, chairs, books, or any means of amusement, being almost in the dark, with the exception of such light as is given by a lamp placed in the passage between the two dormitories. Witnesses describe them as crowding like little caged animals about the iron-barred gate of their prison rooms, trying to amuse themselves by the glimmering lamp which gives a faint light about the door but leaves the rest of the rooms in darkness.³ No one goes near them till 9 o'clock, when the light in the passage is taken away and the girls are supposed to go to bed. We say supposed, because no one sees whether they go to bed or not.⁴ Taking away the candle and leaving them to themselves appears, in fact, to be considered the only means of enforcing their retirement to rest.⁵

With the exception of the public prayers before retiring to the dormitories, devotion there is none. If indeed some little child, true to the better training of the wretched home from which it has been rescued by the State, is seen kneeling by its bed, it is from no teaching of the School. Save for the perfunctory reading of some prayer by an officer, there is no opportunity afforded the most ignorant of learning to take the first tottering step towards entering the portals of spiritual life, by lifting the soul in prayer towards God. Morning baths and private prayers by the children's bedside seemed to the mind of the Superintendent incompatible.⁶

The duties which the paternal care of the institution saw neglected with indifference, were, it is told to the praise of Catherine Walker, one of the girls in the School, as long as she was there, reverently observed. Since she left, a witness states that she has not known the girls to say their prayers.⁷ Who can wonder that thus utterly neglected, when locked up in their dark and gloomy dormitories during the sultry nights of summer or the long and chilling hours of winter, their thoughts went back to the rude freedom of their lazzaroni life; and that in revolt at the odious system of prison treatment provided by a paternal Government, they broke out in the ribald songs of the well-lit saloons in the garish glare of which they had found some amusement, amusement, and all the excitement of an abandoned life, only now to be revived in the wild uproar of riotous rebellion. Who can wonder that little children innocent on entering the institution, became quickly initiated in all the vicious mysteries of a dissolute life, and that witnesses more than hint at the existence of disgusting sexual practices amongst them.¹

classification.

In the course of our inquiry, we were much struck by the absence of any guiding principle which seemed to determine whether a child was sent to Biloela Industrial School, the Benevolent Asylum, Randwick Asylum, or the Parramatta Orphan Schools, there being at all these institutions children which might have been sent to any of the others. At the Benevolent Asylum we found a number of very little children cooped up in the narrow yards and close old-fashioned rooms of that institution, who would be much better brought up in the fresh country air of Randwick. They were either foundlings reared there, children sent in by Benches of Magistrates for protection, or found by the police in circumstances of destitution. At Biloela we found prostitutes from the precocious age of twelve to the young woman of seventeen, the mother of a child, associated with children of the most innocent and tender age. Indeed, as if to secure for it the earliest initiation in vice, and insure its lipping in the language of sin, we found a baby in arms had been dealt with under the Industrial Schools Act, and sent to Biloela, to associate from its infancy with the culls of our streets.

If such very young children are not boarded out, as recommended by us in a previous section of our Report, we are of opinion that they should be sent anywhere rather than to an Industrial School of this character, where even under the best management they must run the risk of contamination by those who form a considerable portion of its inmates. We are further of opinion that in the organization of a new institution, care should be taken that the older and more vicious girls are as far as possible separated from the younger and more innocent. The adoption of the family system recommended by us would afford the greatest facilities for this most necessary classification.

A suggestion having been made, in the course of our inquiry, that it might be possible to make arrangements for the reception of the juvenile prostitutes at the Roman Catholic and Protestant Refuges in the city for fallen women, we examined witnesses upon the point, but found the scheme impracticable.²

mistress.

We find that the duties of Schoolmistress are efficiently discharged by Mrs. Kelly, the discipline and order maintained by her amongst the girls, when in the department under her control, being in singular contrast with the turbulence and violence so frequently displayed by them when under the supervision of the Master and Matron, and remarkably illustrative of the moral power and effect of superior education and more judicious management.³ Mrs. Kelly, who has been a teacher under the Council of Education, states that though some of the girls are grossly ignorant on coming to the school, they evince a desire for instruction, quickness, and general intelligence, enabling them fairly to bear comparison with the ordinary class of children in our Public Schools. Though the quiet enforced and the control exercised in school hours would appear most irksome in their restraint over girls whom other officers seem to think can only be governed by the rod, the cane is seldom found to be required, and not more frequently than in ordinary schools.⁴

Charges of feminine imprudence on the part of Mrs. Kelly having been made against her by Mr. Prior, the storekeeper, it became our duty to inquire into them.

After a careful investigation, we arrived at the conclusion that these charges were untrue, and that Mrs. Kelly had done nothing to forfeit the esteem in which she appears to have been deservedly held by all who knew her. We find, moreover, that Mr. Prior, formerly an officer in the Lunatic Asylum at Newcastle, was, on a previous occasion, found guilty of making unfounded charges against a brother official, and called upon to show cause why he should not be dismissed.¹ In consideration, however, of his family, the extreme penalty of dismissal was not inflicted, and he was simply removed from his office to an inferior post. Taking this and all the circumstances of his charge against Mrs. Kelly into consideration, we are of opinion that his now repeated misconduct of the same kind proves him to be a person who ought no longer to be allowed to remain in the Public Service, and we advise that he should be dismissed accordingly. We are also of opinion that the services of Mrs. Austen should be dispensed with, as she appeared to us untruthful, and a person whose influence in the school was not for good.

We find that the Storekeeper's duties have been inefficiently discharged. The system of book-keeping is imperfect, and no proper account has been kept of articles issued from the store, which are apparently given out to the girls without any due precaution against fraud or waste. In so small an establishment it appears to us that the office is unnecessary, and we are of opinion that it should be abolished, and its duties performed by the head of the institution. This we find is the case in the much larger establishment of the Asylum for the Infirm and Destitute at Liverpool, and we see no reason why the same plan should not be followed with success in the Industrial School for Girls.

Greater care should be taken in the selection of the books admitted to the school for the use of the children, as, on an examination of the library, we found some of a character rendering them quite unfit to be placed in the hands of young people.² It would be the duty of the Comptroller of Public Charities, whose appointment we have recommended, to pass all books intended for the use of the school.

In reorganizing the institution, we are of opinion that the office of Superintendent should be abolished, and the School placed entirely under the control of a woman. There appears to us something strangely anomalous in subjecting to the control of a man a number of young women who can only be reformed by winning their entire trust, and by establishing the confidential relationship which can only exist between people of the same sex. All this appears especially difficult where the abandoned life formerly led by many of the girls, and the nature of the character and feelings to be re-established in their minds, require, above all things, the teaching and example of feminine purity. As Miss Nightingale has observed, "in disciplinary matters a woman only can understand a woman." Our examination of the Charitable Institutions of the Colony has moreover proved beyond all doubt that, as administrators of large establishments, women are in every way equal to men, the highest results being indeed attained in institutions under the control of women.

In a school for the domestic and industrial training of girls, what are the qualifications of a man, compared to those of a woman, for directing their employment in needlework, judging their skill in cutting, fitting, or mending, the regularity of their darning or knitting, the style of their washing and getting-up of linen, and their performance of any household, kitchen, or nursery services? No degree, diploma, or experience that a man may possess can he appeal to, making him an authority in dealing with such work. Only a woman experienced in such matters can do justice to the requirements of these important duties.

Unless

¹ The Board that investigated these charges found as follows:—"Mr. Prior has utterly failed to prove in the slightest degree any of the very serious charges he has made, and we are unable to see that he has exonerated himself from the blame and responsibility of bringing unfounded and unjustifiable if not malicious accusations." ² Benedict, 9548.

Unless the officers have been previously proved to be efficient, or the circumstances are otherwise exceptional, it appears to us undesirable that husband and wife should be appointed to the office of Master and Matron in the same institution. If either be inefficient, there is always the difficulty of getting rid of one without the other, or the alternative of keeping a thoroughly inefficient officer. The absurdity of supposing that a married head of an institution will complain of the inefficiency of his official partner is obvious. The difficulties arising at Biloela from this cause, and pointed out by the witnesses, are numerous and apparent enough.

We are of opinion that the Industrial Schools Act should be amended by more clearly defining the circumstances under which children may be dealt with under its provisions. The Act at present provides that—

Every child whose age in the opinion of the person apprehending or ordering the apprehension as hereinafter mentioned shall not exceed sixteen years who shall be found lodging living residing, or wandering about in company with reputed thieves or with persons who have no visible lawful means of support or with common prostitutes whether such reputed thieves persons or prostitutes be the parents or guardians of such child or not or who shall have no visible lawful means of support or who shall have no fixed place of abode or who shall be found begging about any street highway court passage or other public place or who shall be found habitually wandering or loitering about the streets highways or public places in no ostensible lawful occupation or who shall be found sleeping in the open air may be apprehended by any constable or peace officer or by any other person and taken before any two Justices of the Peace to be dealt with as hereinafter is directed.

The object of the Legislature was evidently to rescue children from a life of vagrancy and neglect. As the Act stands at present, any sort of frivolous pretence of an occupation ostensibly carried on by a child is made an excuse for an evasion of the law, and too often accepted by Magistrates who, apparently forgetful that the object of the Act is the reformation and not the punishment of the child, shrink from putting it in force, as if desirous of avoiding the imputation of harshness and severity. If the Act were amended by providing, as in the English Act, that the selling or offering anything for sale in the street should be simply regarded as a pretext and a cloak for begging, the law could not thus be defeated by well-meant but erroneous decisions upon it.¹ In consequence of the mistaken view of their duty taken by some Magistrates, witnesses most competent to form an opinion inform us that the Industrial Schools Act, though for some time most beneficial in its operation, has in a large degree ceased to be effective for good.² When first enforced parents became alive to the necessity of looking after their children, kept them better clad, and made at all events, says Mr. Fosbery, an outward show of caring for them, to prevent their being seized by the police.³ These good effects have unfortunately disappeared since negligent and bad parents have come to learn that Magistrates play into their hands, by refusing to send children to an Industrial School unless they feel themselves compelled on the strictest interpretation of the letter of the law. The mere following of certain street occupations by a child who ought to be at school should of itself bring it within the provisions of the law, instead of being accepted as an excuse for its evasion. What is sometimes spoken of in such cases as giving the child another chance simply means, in nine cases out of ten, another chance of getting into mischief and falling into crime. Whatever doubts there may be in the minds of some as to the policy of introducing a compulsory system of education, there surely can be none as to the propriety of rescuing from their fate those who prima facie by their occupation are entering upon the career of paupers and vagrants, perhaps to end in criminality, still more expensive and injurious to the Country.

The

The provisions of the Act as to the management of the children after they have been apprenticed are very incomplete, as they give the master no power to return a child to the school for misbehaviour, but are simply to the effect that, when apprenticed, the children shall be subject to the ordinary apprentice law of the Colony. Under these circumstances masters have little control over the children, and, in the event of finding them unmanageable, they sometimes have the indentures cancelled and turn the children adrift upon the world. This is a defect that should be immediately remedied, as we believe that the dread of being returned to the school for misconduct would have a most beneficial and restraining influence upon the children when apprenticed; whilst the present system enables them to return to their evil courses whenever they choose, by worrying their employers into a cancellation of the indentures.

Once in the Industrial School, we are of opinion that no child should be released until the expiration of its term of detention. The evidence before us shows that the practice of releasing children at the instance of their parents has become too frequent,¹ and that much mischief has been done by the restoration of children to parents whose neglect of their offspring entitles them to no such indulgence.² In some instances the children so released have soon come before the Bench, charged with crimes the opportunity for committing which has been afforded by their ill-advised discharge from the Industrial School.

The well-meaning but not very judicious people who, on the strength of representations, frequently unfounded, are too often induced to sign requisitions to the Government for the release of children, cannot be aware of the consequence of their support of these petitions, or they would hardly be prevailed upon to sign them.

It appears from the evidence that many of the parents whose neglect of duty allows their children to roam untaught about the streets are in a position to pay for their maintenance and education. We can conceive nothing more strongly tending to promote a pauper spirit and create a vagrant class of larrikins, than allowing well-to-do parents with impunity to turn their children into the streets to be educated and cared for at the public expense. Whilst the unavoidable destitution following upon sickness or misfortune is rightly deserving of sympathy and pity, the spirit of voluntary pauperism implied in such neglect of parental duty should bear the stigma of disgrace and be held up to public odium and reprobation. Though our Act provides for the payment by parents of the maintenance of their children in Industrial Schools, the provisions for the recovery of these contributions are defective, and require amendment, making them more stringent and effective. In Victoria a list of defaulting parents is regularly published in the Gazette, and has a beneficial effect in promoting regularity of payment, and we think the same course might be adopted here with advantage.

BILOELA REFORMATORY FOR GIRLS.

THE Reformatory for Girls now conducted at Biloela formerly existed at Newcastle in a portion of the Military Barracks, and was removed to Biloela at the same time as the Industrial School. It was established in 1869, under the provisions of the Reformatory Schools Act of 1866, for the reception of girls under the age of 16, convicted of crime, who, but for the existence of the institution would either have to go to the ordinary gaols of the Colony or escape punishment.

It

Site.

It is situated within the inclosure cutting off the Industrial School premises from the rest of the island, being itself separated from those premises by a partition of galvanized iron. The buildings in which it is carried on consist of a small cottage of four rooms and an out-house, both wholly inadequate and unsuitable for the purposes of such an establishment. Though not so prison-like in their character as the buildings of the Industrial School, the objections which have been made to the latter institution, on the ground of its inaccessibility and the prison associations of the island, hold good with regard to the Reformatory, and we therefore are of opinion that this institution also should be removed to some site of the character indicated by us as suitable for an Industrial School.

We think, however, that it should not be established so close to the Industrial School as it is at present, as we consider the proximity of the two institutions to each other injurious to both. Any noise in one is calculated to disturb the order and discipline of the other, by exciting the inmates and rendering them difficult of control. Feelings of jealousy may also arise between the officers of the two institutions injurious to the interests of the establishments under their charge. This, we are afraid, has to a certain extent taken place at Biloela, and its cause should be avoided in re-establishing the two institutions.

Management.

Though at the time of our visit there were only eight children in the Reformatory, it was inconveniently crowded, and some of the girls were sleeping in the dining-room. The small number of children in the institution is no disadvantage to its working as a Reformatory, as the life of the inmates is more home-like, and the opportunity afforded for acquiring a thorough knowledge of their individual characters proportionately great. Miss Florence Hill, in her evidence, says :—

“The most successful Reformatory I ever visited was the Protestant Reformatory for Girls in Dublin, where there were only fifteen or sixteen inmates. The small number has no doubt much to do with the success of the institution. The children were divided into classes, and each class had its privileges. Those who entered the school were placed in the lowest class, and from that they worked their way gradually up. I think there are six classes altogether, and each class had some privileges attached to it until the highest was reached, and that was almost like freedom. For instance, they went out of school to do errands and shopping for the institution. After that they passed into service. When I visited this institution it had been in existence for seven or eight years, I think, or longer perhaps, and no child had failed to do well. A few had been placed out, and all were doing well. I have always considered that a model of what such an institution should be.”¹

Again, Mr. Sydney Turner, Inspector of English Reformatory and Industrial Schools, writes :—

“It cannot be too carefully remembered that in the work of reforming and training the depraved and disorderly quality is of more importance than quantity, and that little is gained by sweeping scores or hundreds of children into an institution, unless the state of the school, the efficiency and sufficiency of the staff, premises, &c., &c., are fully cared for.”²

The management by Mrs. King, the Matron, is, we consider, fairly efficient. Though she is the only officer in the institution actually engaged in its management, Mr. Lucas received, as Superintendent of the Reformatory, an addition to his salary as head of the Industrial School. We consider this office unnecessary, and are of opinion that the institution should be placed entirely under the control of the Matron. Mrs. King, who shows a kind and maternal interest in the girls, complained of the confined area of the ground attached to the Reformatory, as being injurious to their health, especially as the insular position of the institution prevented vented their going out and taking a walk.¹ This is a further objection to the present position of both the Industrial School and the Reformatory. All writers on the principles of Reformatory management insist on the necessity of allowing children beyond the boundaries of their institutions, not only for the sake of health and recreation, but to familiarize them with the outer world in which they will afterwards move, and to give them greater powers of self-government than they can learn within the walls of their barrack homes. In all successful Reformatories at home and abroad, the children, as they become more capable of being trusted, are sent out, generally in couples, on errands for the household. To permit this it becomes more imperative that these institutions, on their re-establishment, should not be in such close proximity to town as to expose the girls, on going out, to the unavoidable necessity of meeting their old associates in vice.

The smallness of the number of girls in the institution to some extent arises, we believe, from the indisposition, before alluded to, on the part of some Justices, to deal with children under the provisions of the Industrial Schools and Reformatory Acts, as well as the ignorance still prevailing as to the provisions of the law respecting juvenile criminals. Notwithstanding the time which has elapsed since the Acts came into operation, it is strange to what an extent misapprehension still exists with regard to the difference between Industrial Schools and Reformatories. Whilst we were conducting our inquiry, a boy was convicted of theft and committed by a Justice of the Peace to an Industrial School, apparently in ignorance that Industrial Schools are intended, not for convicted criminals, but for the homeless and neglected. These mistakes however, it must be admitted, may to some extent have arisen from the unfortunate circumstance that there has been no Reformatory for boys established by the Government under the provisions of the Act.² This we consider a serious deficiency in the Reformatory system of the Colony, and we are of opinion that no time should be lost in carrying out the original intention of the Legislature by the establishment of a Reformatory for boys. Their number far exceeds that of the offending girls, and is we fear annually increasing. In the absence of such an institution, a number of lads are constantly escaping punishment, or they are sent to gaol to consort with expert and professional criminals, to be further instructed in crime and hardened by the degradation of gaol confinement. The alternative adopted by some Justices of sending boys brought before them for crime to an Industrial School on an information prepared for the purpose is, we consider, injurious to the School, compelling, as it does, those who are simply homeless and neglected to consort with the vicious and the criminal.

Though it may be said that many of the boys sent to an Industrial School, not convicted of offences, are as vicious as those convicted, yet to make no distinction between the two classes tends, in the minds of the young, to obliterate the distinction between misfortune and crime, and to destroy an incentive for maintaining a character for honesty. On the other hand, many of the boys are so young as to be necessarily innocent of vice, and to compel them to associate with companions initiated in crime is simply to provide for their corruption en masse.

The evidence given by Captain Scott, the Police Magistrate of Sydney, affords ^{Ignorance of the law.} a remarkable illustration of the ignorance of the law existing amongst those whose duty it is to enforce the provisions of the Industrial Schools and Reformatory Acts.

This

This gentleman, who seems to have conceived some unfounded prejudice against carrying out the intentions of the Legislature as disclosed in these enactments, has never sent a girl to the Biloela Reformatory since it was established, and appeared to us ignorant of the very existence of such an institution.¹ Though the returns laid before us show that 493 children have been dealt with in the Central Police Office since the passing of the Acts in 1866, Captain Scott was evidently quite unacquainted with the course to be pursued on the conviction of a juvenile offender for larceny.² Such ignorance and want of interest in the Reformatory and Industrial School system established in the Colony by Act of Parliament is greatly to be regretted when exhibited by a stipendiary Magistrate whose almost daily duty it must be to deal with juvenile offenders; and our reformatory institutions will be in a large degree maintained at a useless expense if an officer, whose position as chief Magistrate of the metropolis brings before him the largest number of children to be dealt with, fails from ignorance or prejudice to carry out the law which it is his duty to administer.

Amendment of the law
required.

In any attempt made to amend our Reformatory system by legislation, provision should be made for apprenticing the children on their leaving the institution. Of the two systems—apprenticing the children after they have finished the term for which they were sent to the Reformatory, and apprenticing them after they have completed a portion of their term of detention—we think the latter is the better. It has the great advantage of enabling the institution to maintain a control and supervision over the child for a longer period, and of gradually accustoming it to withstand the temptations of liberty and to govern itself, instead of turning it suddenly loose upon the world with no fear of losing by its misconduct the liberty which it enjoys. As we consider the absence of such a power in connection with our Reformatories a defect highly adverse to their success, we would strongly urge the advisability of amending the law in this regard. That the Industrial School for Girls at Biloela has not been altogether a failure, and that its inmates have not entirely, notwithstanding the utter mismanagement disclosed, relapsed into vice and gone to ruin, is almost entirely attributable to the fact that efforts have always been made, principally by Mr. Cowper, for securing them places in the country. In connection with this subject, we would also point out that the terms for which children are often sent to our Reformatory and Industrial Schools are so short as to be inadequate for the purposes of reformation, unless some further control is exercised over the child after it has left the institution.

As we were much struck in the course of our inquiry with the want of knowledge displayed by some of the officers employed in our reformatory institutions, respecting the principles upon which such establishments are conducted where the greatest amount of success is achieved, we give in full an admirable summary of the principles of reformatory treatment, drawn up by Miss Rosamond Hill, for the information of the Commission. Though it has especial reference to girls, yet mutatis mutandis it is equally applicable to the management of boys. We would especially draw attention to the mark system, as it appears to be utterly unknown in any of our institutions.

A Summary of the Principles of Reformatory Treatment, with especial reference to Girls.

It is the lack of good home influence which, in the great majority of cases, brings girls into the condition necessitating reformatory training. In order to change them into respectable members of society, i.e., to re-form them, we must as far as possible supply to them that wholesome family life which they have not before enjoyed; therefore, a prison with its bolts and bars should never be used for their dwelling-place.

The numbers of girls in a Reformatory or Industrial School must be small, or they must be subdivided into distinct groups, each group resembling a real family as nearly as possible, and occupying a dwelling to itself. This arrangement would facilitate the separation of Catholics from Protestants, and the placing them under the care of persons of their respective faiths. But a number of these groups living in small houses near each other might unite for purposes of secular instruction in a common school-room.

It is, above all, essential to imbue the children with a love of work. Therefore, care must be taken to prevent their labour from being either beyond their strength or too monotonous, creating in them in either case a distaste for work.

A sufficient amount of recreation must be allowed—it must never be forgotten that we are dealing with children.

The members of each group or family should as far as possible do the whole work of their own house—baking, washing, and ironing, and the making of their own clothes, household linen, mattresses and pillows, inclusive. It is also essential that the children should frequently go beyond the boundaries of the institution, especially that they should go to a place of public worship.

The girls should also be employed—as it is found they can be trusted—to do errands for the household; they should be trained gradually to market and to shop, in order that when they leave the school and go to service, they should know how to purchase for their employers and to buy their own clothes—in fact, how to manage their wages with economy.

It must always be borne in mind that the training the girls receive in the institution is a means to an end—not an end in itself; and that therefore, however perfect the order and discipline of the school may be, unless the girls are allowed a certain amount of voluntary action and power of self-government, it will not prepare them for life after they have quitted its roof.

When the girls enter the school, they are idle, dirty, and very probably untruthful and dishonest. The aim of the managers is to render them industrious, cleanly, and honest. As the training gradually improves them, they will require less supervision, which should diminish by degrees as they become more and more able to govern themselves, until, when the time comes for their quitting the institution, they shall be able to fight the battle of life successfully for themselves.

Rewards and punishments, indispensable in Reformatory and Industrial Schools, should be, whenever possible, the natural consequence of the girls' conduct,—not on the one side an indulgence, or on the other an infliction of pain arbitrarily awarded by the managers. Good conduct should better the position of the girls in the school; and, on the other hand, bad conduct should worsen it.

This end will be most easily attained by allowing the girls to earn their privileges by their own efforts, and to lose them by bad conduct.

The best means of registering their behaviour is by the use of the mark system.

A certain number of marks gained by industry and good conduct should raise the girls in rank in the school. Bad conduct and idleness should take away their marks, and deprive them of the privileges they had earned, with the power of re-earning the marks and of regaining their position by their subsequent good conduct.

Thus, on entering the school a girl would necessarily possess no marks, and would therefore be at its bottom. A certain number of marks earned would raise her a stage, and would entitle her to certain privileges; a further number of marks would raise her to a second stage and entitle her to more privileges, and so on until she has reached the highest stage of all. In the course of climbing to the highest stage, the girl would gradually acquire that perseverance and self-control essential to her well-doing when she quits the school. The strict discipline under which she has been placed on admission would slacken by degrees until, as the time of her departure approached, she would almost govern herself.

By this time she would have become trustworthy, and would be accorded a certain degree of liberty. For instance, she might be permitted to go out on errands with a companion of similar rank in the school, and might have an allowance for the purchase of some part at least of her clothing.

Great care must be taken to prevent the ascent from being too difficult, and it must be made more easy to rise in the lower stages than in the higher, because the first efforts at self-control are always the hardest. The girl must not on the one side be disheartened by the too great steepness of the ascent, nor on the other must the privileges lose in value by the too great facility of their attainment. The advance from stage to stage should be so arranged that the girls should be able to reach the highest at least six months before the term of her detention expires.

The foregoing remarks are founded on practical experience, and no plan is suggested which has not been in successful operation.

They

They apply specially to schools in which girls enter at an early age, and where they remain for some years. Those committed above twelve years old should be dealt with in separate institutions, and for these of course the plan described would require modification. For instance, the shorter term of detention would probably necessitate either fewer stages or a more rapid transition from one to another. There would be less school instruction and more industrial work, and the privileges would be different—adapted to the more advanced ages of the girls.

In order that the management of Reformatory and Industrial Schools should be successful, it is essential to secure voluntary, i.e., unpaid assistance.

In England the voluntary managers of these schools attest their interest in them by subscribing towards their funds; but as the power of legally detaining the pupils, and pecuniary aid from the State, are indispensable, justice demands that the managers should submit to Government inspection.

A committee of ladies and gentlemen should be formed to direct the management, which should be carried on under their auspices by paid officials. The volunteer manager acquires an influence over the inmates of these schools distinct in character from that of the paid official, and very beneficial to the children. The leisure class, from which necessarily the volunteers must be drawn, possess the mental culture and training necessary for surmounting the difficulties inherent in the application of reformatory science—under their guidance the hard-working, conscientious, paid official will be able to carry the undertaking to a successful issue.

But the work of the managers is not complete when their pupils quit the Industrial School. They will require, when put out into the world, friendly supervision, which may be found necessary for some years.

THE “VERNON.”

Anchorage.

THIS ship was proclaimed as an Industrial School in 1867, under the provisions of the Act of 1866. It contained at the time of our inspection ninety-nine boys, but possesses accommodation for 260. When first opened as a school the vessel was moored in the neighbourhood of Farm Cove, but was afterwards stationed near Cockatoo Island. The reason for the change in the position of the ship appears to have been that it was thought desirable that the boys should have some instruction in garden-work, facilities for which were afforded in the old gardens existing on the island. Whilst we quite concur in the opinion that the boys should be partially employed on shore and trained to this kind of work, we think that the change in the position of the vessel was disadvantageous to the School. When stationed at Farm Cove the boys had constantly before them examples of smartness in the ships of Her Majesty's service stationed in the port, and a standard of excellence to work up to in the discharge of their nautical duties; but when removed to Cockatoo Island they had no opportunity of seeing ships, either of the Royal Navy or of the Mercantile Marine. The stimulus thus afforded them being withdrawn, the evidence shows that its absence prejudicially affected the boys, by destroying in a large measure their interest in their work. Captain Mein, in his evidence says—¹“The boys were in better spirits when they saw the ships exercising down there; they were smarter in every way when they were in sight of the men-of-war, and they did not want driving. You had only to say ‘Come along,’ and they did whatever you wanted, and now you have to talk to them a dozen times over.”

If, as we presume was the case, the object of the Government in establishing the School on board a ship, was to train a number of lads to a seafaring life, no opportunity should be lost of creating in their minds a love for their future calling, and, by the constant sight of ships arriving from and sailing to all parts of the world, stimulating that love of enterprise and adventure which takes thousands of England's boys to sea.

Not only are the boys depressed by the out of the way position of the ship, but it would appear that from the same cause they lose opportunities of going to sea of which they would otherwise have the benefit. When in sight of merchant ships in the harbour, their captains, taking an interest in the boys, used to visit the School and make application for them as apprentices. Since her removal, however, the ship has been lost sight of, and the applications for the boys are fewer. It, moreover, appears, since the removal of the ship up the Parramatta River, that even after situations in vessels have been obtained for boys, the ships for which they were intended have sometimes, in the hurry of departure, sailed away without them, and the boys have thus lost the opportunity of going to sea¹. The health of the boys, moreover, appears to have been far better when the ship was at her former anchorage than when she was removed to the vicinity of Cockatoo. For all these reasons, we are of opinion that the ship should always be moored in the neighbourhood of Farm Cove, or at some spot in sight of Her Majesty's ships frequenting the port.

The industrial training provided is in carpentering, tailoring, shoemaking, and sailmaking, besides the usual routine of ship work, instruction being given in the use of the compass and the lead line, in sail drill, reefing, splicing, and pulling. Strange to say, none of the boys are taught to swim, an omission that should be rectified at once. As difficulties have arisen in finding a suitable place for bathing, we would suggest that arrangements should be made for the accommodation of the boys at the public baths of the Corporation in the Domain. Industrial training.

Though about one-half of the boys are trained as seamen, and most of them would prefer that occupation, only a very small proportion of them ultimately follow that calling. The number of boys apprenticed to the sea since the establishment of the school is only thirty-one. The numbers apprenticed to different occupations last year were as follows :—4 mariners, 17 farmers, 31 general servants, 1 tailor, 2 shoemakers, and 1 stonemason. The smallness of the proportion of seamen has arisen partly from the loss of opportunities of going to sea arising from the out of the way position of the ship before alluded to, and partly from the rule established by the Government that the boys shall only be apprenticed on board colonial-owned ships, and as the number of such ships sailing out of Sydney is small, the opportunities offered for the sea are still further restricted. This rule has been pushed to the extent of refusing to apprentice the boys on board Her Majesty's ships on the Australian station. This we think is to be regretted, as to use the words of Captain Mein, the officer commanding the ship, "it would be the making of a lot of overgrown boys that you cannot handle in any way, but who could be kept in order on board a man-of-war²."

Some time ago, when the Commodore on the station wanted boys, a great many volunteered to go, but the Government refused to apprentice them³. Whether the cause of this refusal was that doubts were entertained as to the power of the Government to apprentice them to the service, or whether because it was thought that if so apprenticed their services would be lost to the Colony, does not clearly appear. If the former was the cause, we think that the law should be amended, in order that boys desirous of following a seafaring life should, if willing, be apprenticed on board Her Majesty's ships on the Australian station, as we are of opinion that, whilst entering the Royal Navy would give them a most excellent start in life, their services would be in no more danger of being lost to the Colony than those of an English boy are lost to England who takes to the sea when young. Home instincts would always bring them back to Sydney at the expiration of their term of apprenticeship.

Results.

In the absence of any organized system of supervision over the boys after they have left the ship, it is impossible to say what is the percentage of those turning out well, especially of the boys returning to shore life.

The following Table furnished by the Superintendent gives in a rough way the results attained, but the fact of there being thirty out of apprenticeship whose whereabouts are unknown, and forty-one of whom there is no report, shows the necessity of some system of after-supervision, and how utterly impossible it is to speak of the institution as a success or a failure in its results, in the absence of more definite information.

Of those taking to the sea more seems to be known, as they come frequently under the eye of the Captain, and often report themselves. As a general rule they have turned out well, some exceedingly so, one having a short time since risen to the post of second mate in a ship sailing out of Sydney. We are of opinion that every facility should be afforded for carrying out the wishes of boys anxious to go to sea, otherwise the advantages of the training which they have received are in a great measure lost, and it is questionable how far a ship life is calculated to train boys for employment on shore. The trim sailor costume and smartness of drill when mustered for inspection are pleasing to the eye, but we entertain considerable doubt whether a ship is well adapted for the purposes of an Industrial School, unless the boys are intended for the sea. We find that the same opinion is entertained by Mr. Duncan, the Inspector of Industrial Schools and Reformatories in Victoria, who, in his report of 1871 to the Government, says: "The boys acquire on board ship unsettled notions, which, to a considerable extent, unfit them for that steady application to work necessary to ensure success in life at shore occupations."

Shore work.

In any event, it is most desirable that the boys should be partially employed on shore in some locality where they might be taught garden work and employed in raising vegetables for the ship. When the ship was stationed at Cockatoo Island, we are informed by Mr. Moore, of the Botanic Gardens, that they made considerable progress in learning gardening, and we much regret to find that since the late removal of the ship from the neighbourhood of the island to her old anchorage the work of cultivation has been altogether given up. The proximity of the ship to the Botanic Gardens affords the greatest facilities for their continuing on shore work of this kind under the supervision of Mr. Moore, and we think no time should be lost in carrying out the suggestions of that gentleman contained in the evidence as to their employment under his direction.¹ The instruction which they would receive could not fail to be of use to them in after-life, whilst the beneficial influence upon the character of such labour is recognized by all authorities on reformatory discipline. "Every successful Reformatory Institution of which I have any knowledge," says Mr. Hill, the Recorder of Birmingham, "has made the cultivation of land a leading object of attention, and much of each day has been spent by the pupil in the garden or the field, to his great improvement in body, mind, and spirit. The handicrafts ancillary to

to the cultivation of the land offer themselves as an excellent variety of occupation, whether in regard to the exhilaration which attends a change of employment, or for engaging the willing industry of those to whom out-of-door labour is, for any reason, unfit, or to whom it is unwelcome. Every lad ought to be able to mend his clothes and his shoes, not necessarily that he may become either a tailor or a shoemaker, but that he may always be able to keep himself in a state of neatness, and thus to preserve under the most adverse circumstances a decent appearance."

In the opinion of M. De Metz, the spade is as powerful an instrument to reform the character as it is to subdue the soil.

The management of the "Vernon" by the Superintendent, Captain Mein, ^{Management.} appears to us efficient, but in the event of any increase in the number of boys additional hands will be required, as even at the present time there are not sufficient for the proper supervision of the school.

Captain Mein in his evidence says:—"I think we should have at the very least another two hands. We have not got enough to look after the boys properly. We are obliged to trust to these boys to keep watches, and that is not right. There is a man to look after the lower deck, and if anything is wanted on the upper deck he has to come up."¹

We regret to find from the reports of the Inspectors under the Council of ^{Teaching efficiency.} Education that "the usefulness of the school in an educational point of view is extremely low." This they ascribe to its defective organization for teaching purposes, the school being taught in four divisions, and the result of the arrangement being that each boy receives about six hours instruction per week. To derive reasonable advantages from the school, they advise that the whole of the boys should be taught in two divisions, and the school conducted on the half-time system. They suggest that a supply of diagrams and additional school books should also be furnished. In all these recommendations we concur, as the insufficiency of the teaching power of the school, coupled with the questionable influence of the ship-board life upon the boys, makes it extremely doubtful to us whether the vessel can be regarded as a success as an industrial school.

The cost of each boy is about £32 per annum. This is the same as the cost ^{Cost.} per head of the boys on board the Victorian training-ship "Nelson," whilst on board the "Akbar," a reformatory under the direction of the Liverpool Juvenile Reformatory Association, the cost, deducting profits on industrial account, appears to be from £22 to £23, and on board the "Cornwall" from £23 to £24 per head.² The average on board the "Vernon" would however be considerably reduced if the provisions of the Industrial Schools Act were more stringently enforced, by sending boys on board the ship whose life of idleness and vice is too likely to end in misery and crime, far more expensive to the Country. In the Mother Country it is estimated that every convict costs the State on the average from £100 to £150, and that this by no means covers the necessary loss. "In Liverpool alone" says Mr. T. J. Murray, Director of Convict Prisons and Registrar of Habitual Criminals in Ireland, "it is estimated that the value of property lost by crime is £700,000, and I should think this greatly under-estimated. The public are therefore much interested in correcting the vicious. As a mere money question, it is clearly better to reclaim the vicious than punish the criminal, and no doubt a penny spent in teaching will save a pound in punishing * * * I am sure I do not exaggerate when I estimate the saving to the community, upon every boy rescued from evil courses, at from £200 to £300."³ In

In this Colony, where the cost of police and gaol supervision is necessarily far greater than in England, the expense of the criminal class to the Country must be proportionately greater.

THE PARRAMATTA ORPHAN SCHOOLS.

Organization of. THESE institutions, which are the oldest of our Public Charities, differ from all others in being the only schools of a sectarian character under the control of the Government. The Protestant Orphan School was founded as far back as 1814, in the time of Governor Macquarie, and receives children of all Protestant denominations. The Roman Catholic Orphan School was established in 1836, during the administration of Sir Richard Bourke. Under the provisions of the Act 5th Will. IV. No. 3 certain gentlemen have been from time to time appointed to act in connection with both institutions, but by law they have no control over the management, and their business is simply to bind the children as apprentices on their leaving the schools. The appointment of officers and teachers, and the whole control of the schools, rest entirely with the Government.

Some time ago it appears that the gentlemen acting in connection with the Roman Catholic School attempted to exercise an authority in its management that was not given them under the law. This was resisted by the Government of which Sir James Martin was Premier and Mr. Parkes Colonial Secretary, and the apprenticing committee was instructed that its action must be confined to the province by law assigned it. Subsequently, on the accession to office of Mr. Robertson, they were informed, in a letter appended to the evidence,¹ that they might resume whatever functions they had formerly exercised. They do not seem, however, to have availed themselves of this permission, and beyond visiting the school and seeing that everything is in proper order, they do not appear to have attempted any control over it. But they seem to think, that if the management of the school were handed over to them as it is at Randwick, that it would be more economically carried on than it is by the Government, and they are anxious to take charge of it altogether. We do not think, however, that it would be advisable to lose Government control over the institution, and the school could scarcely be conducted at less expense than it is. No such clashing of authority seems to have arisen in the Protestant School, which has always been directly under the control of the Government, the Committee (we use the word simply for convenience) confining themselves strictly to the apprenticing of the children.

Having at an early period after our appointment formed an opinion that the existence of these institutions was an anomaly in the school system of the Country, by reason of their sectarian character, we were impressed with the desirability of either amalgamating them or abolishing them altogether, by making provision for the reception of their inmates at Randwick Asylum. Before determining on the course which we should advise, we proceeded to examine their actual condition. The following are the results of our inquiry :—

THE PROTESTANT ORPHAN SCHOOL.

Site. The site of this school, on the banks of the Parramatta River, is elevated and healthy, and the grounds surrounding it comprise about 106 acres of land, some of it yet uncleared.

Buildings. The buildings, though in the main old, are substantial, and on the whole tolerably complete. The schoolrooms, on which £3,000 have lately been expended are new, handsome, and commodious. The institution has accommodation for 250 children, and contained at the time of our visit 239, of whom 100 were girls : they vary in age from between two and three to thirteen, at which age they are apprenticed.

No trades are taught, but the children do all the housework of the establishment, and seem very efficient in the discharge of their domestic duties. The girls make nearly all their own clothes and are expert in the use of the needle. They are not, however, so continuously employed in the laundry as they might be; the remarks which we made in a previous part of our Report as to the excess of time devoted to school teaching as compared with industrial training, applying to this institution as well as to all others. The boys work in the garden, but hardly to the extent that is desirable, though sufficient vegetables are raised for the supply of the School. The institution appears remarkably healthy; the only children in the hospital, a very complete establishment, being a few suffering from constitutional weakness. Both boys and girls seemed extremely happy, and their appearance presented none of that dejected and stolid look so often seen in children massed in large institutions. The teaching in the school is fair, as appears by the Report of the Inspector under the Council of Education, appended to the evidence.

The management, which is vested in the Matron, Mrs. Betts, is, we consider, efficient. The supervision of the children is remarkably good; some officer of the institution being always with them, by day and night, and whether they are at work or at play. There is, however, no organization by which any supervision is exercised over the children after they have left the school, nor is any communication kept up with them, except such as arises from the children writing to the institution from their feelings of interest in the place where they were reared. No accurate estimate can therefore be made of the number of children who have turned out well, but the accounts given of those heard of are highly satisfactory, some of them having obtained very respectable situations, others being in possession of farms of their own.¹ The kindly and motherly interest in the girls exhibited by Mrs. Betts seems to have been repaid by a large measure of success. Out of the whole number of girls trained in the institution during the twenty-two years that she has been Matron, Mrs. Betts only knows of ten cases where they have gone astray, and four of these ten girls have entirely retrieved their character and become respectable women.² Bearing out the observation which we have previously made as to there being no principle determining to which of our various institutions a child is sent, we regret to find that one or two instances have occurred where girls of improper character have been sent to this institution. This we consider highly objectionable, as, amongst girls so young and innocent as the unfortunates of an orphanage, their presence is extremely dangerous and improper. The arrangements in the school for the occupation and amusement of the elder children in their evening hours are extremely good. The boys have a room well supplied with books and with the means of amusing themselves, such as draughts and similar games.³ The elder girls pass the evenings in a like manner, or in doing such needlework as interests them.⁴

There seems to be no difficulty in finding places for the children. They are apprenticed as rapidly as their age will allow, and a very laudable desire seems manifested on the part of the committee to consult as far as possible the wishes of the boys in the selection of a trade. It would appear from the evidence that the children generally turn out better when apprenticed to a trade than when bound as domestic servants.⁵ The Act 5 William IV No. 3 provides that the children shall be apprenticed for the period of seven years, but this is justly thought too long, and in practice they are only bound for five.⁶ The rate of pay which they are entitled to receive is also too low. Both boys and girls are obliged to work two years for nothing, nothing, the boys for the last three years being entitled under the Act to receive £2 a year, and the girls £1 10s. The children soon come to learn the value of their labour, and the temptation to abscond from their employment is great. This, we think, should be immediately remedied, and the children put on the same footing as at Randwick, where the apprentices earn £21 during the period of their apprenticeship. The provisions of the Act for securing the payment of the apprentices' wages are also defective and require amendment.

The office of Master in the school we consider unnecessary and should be abolished. The duties attaching to it are little more than those of store and book keeper, and should be discharged by the Matron, as they are in the Roman Catholic School.

The gross average cost of each child, irrespective of the reproductiveness of its labour, is £15 0s. 2d.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC ORPHAN SCHOOL.

Buildings.

This School, at the time of our inspection, contained 296 children, varying in age from two to thirteen, at which age they are apprenticed. 120 were girls. The buildings do not appear to have been originally well adapted for the purposes to which they have been applied, and though since added to from time to time, are very badly arranged and defective in accommodation. The Matron's quarters are extremely inconvenient and confined, all the lady officers of the institution sleeping in one room, the Matron herself, with an admirable spirit of accommodation to circumstances, sleeping in her sitting-room on a stretcher.¹ The arrangements for the servants are still worse, their bedroom being over the laundry, the steam from which at times wets all their clothes and renders it impossible to sleep there. The dormitories of the children are much overcrowded, the beds in some being within a foot of each other. The rooms themselves are quite unsuited for sleeping apartments, being far too low and extremely hot. The laundry is in a wretched ill-found state, and the condition of the lavatory is still worse. The latter is entirely without baths or even basins, and great inconvenience is necessarily experienced. Repeated applications have been made to the Government for these articles during the last five years, but no attention has been paid to them. The Matron complained, and apparently with justice, of the great delay experienced in getting any necessary repairs done about the place.² Some time ago the sum of £1,000 was voted by Parliament for repairs, but none were effected. The year before last a sum of £500 was voted for the same purpose, but in consequence of the late period of the year when the money was voted no contracts could be taken, and the money reverted to the Treasury under the provisions of the Audit Act.

The school is deficient in desks, and there are no seats for the children in the covered way connecting the different portions of the building, those which formerly existed having been taken away with the view of replacing them with others, an object, however, never carried out. The infirmary is most injuriously affected by a foul stench rising within it from the main sewer running from the Lunatic Asylum and Gaol.³ This nuisance, so dangerous to health, has been reported to the Colonial Architect, but no effectual steps have been taken for getting rid of it.⁴ Indeed, we cannot avoid expressing an opinion that the delays which are proved to us to have taken place in attending to all such matters in the institutions immediately under the control of the Government are not very creditable to the department responsible for them, and it appears to us that this institution has been singularly unfortunate in the neglect which has attended its well-founded requisitions.

The

The management of the school, which entirely rests with Mrs. Adamson, ^{Management.} the Matron, is, in our opinion, able and most economical. The officers assisting her are, with the exception of the schoolmaster, ladies of a religious house.

Mrs. Adamson attaches very great importance to learning the individual characters of the children, and we feel bound to say that in no institution that we have inspected did it appear to us that anything like the same amount of attention was paid to this most indispensable condition of success in the training of children. Mrs. Adamson, in her evidence, expressed her opinion that no school for the training of children could be successfully managed if it contained more than 300; as, if the number exceeded that, it would be altogether impossible to learn their characters and dispositions, and she declared herself unwilling to take charge of any school numbering 500. This opinion, coming from a lady who has shown such capacity for administration, we consider most valuable confirmatory evidence in support of the views now largely entertained by the most earnest thinkers on the subject of the management of children by the State.

Added to the efforts thus made to individualize the children, there appeared ^{Industrial training.} to us a vigour in the administration of the school which had a most beneficial effect upon the children, by whom all the work of the institution was carried on with an activity pleasing to witness. Three of the boys are apprenticed to the school: one as a baker, another as a gardener, and a third as a pupil teacher; a similar post being occupied by one of the girls. No trades are taught, but there is a farm attached to the school, where the elder boys work, and raise an ample supply of vegetables for the institution. We are disposed to think, however, that a larger number of the boys should be employed in gardening and field work. We would also suggest that instruction in the use of the needle should commence at an earlier age than is the case at present, as the girls in this respect are not so well advanced as they are in the Protestant Orphan School, nor do they produce so much clothing.

The school teaching appears efficient, as will be seen on a reference to ^{Teaching.} the Report of the Inspector under the Council of Education, appended to the evidence.

All the books and accounts of the establishment are kept by the Matron, ^{Book-keeping.} and on examination by us appeared in the most exemplary order.

In the economy of its management the school surpasses all our other ^{Cost.} Charitable Institutions of an educational character, the average cost of each child being only £13 17s. 9d.

Though there is no official supervision maintained over the children after ^{After-supervision.} they have left the school, the organization of the Roman Catholic Church in some degree supplies the deficiency. Upon a child being apprenticed, the committee communicate with the priest of the district where the child is placed, requesting him to look after it and report to the committee upon its condition. The knowledge thus gained of the children enables the Vicar-General of the Roman Catholic Church, who is chairman of the apprenticing committee, to state that not more than three per cent. of them turn out badly.¹ The great majority of the children are apprenticed in the country, and from the desire to obtain them which is shown by the fact that the applications are in excess of the supply, it would appear that the children are thought well of. In fine, though the appliances and arrangements are far more imperfect than in any other of our institutions that we have examined, we could not avoid coming to the conclusion that, apart from its sectarian character, the school was successful as far as the management of the children was concerned; concerned; the ability of its Matron, and the knowledge which she and all her officers possess of the children individually, going far to overcome all difficulties and compensate for the material deficiencies of the establishment.

FUTURE MANAGEMENT.

Upon the most earnest consideration of all the evidence before us relating to the general management of children by the State, and of that more especially referring to these institutions, we have, with every desire to do away with the anomaly which they present in the educational system of the Country, arrived at the conclusion that this object will be best attained rather by adopting measures for their gradual extinction than by their sudden abolition or immediate amalgamation.

With the exception of one,¹ every member of this Commission is opposed to the support by the State of any schools of a sectarian character, and we all are of opinion that only one class of schools should be maintained by it for the orphaned and the destitute. As a body, we have therefore only refrained from recommending the immediate abolition or amalgamation of the schools, because the evidence compels us, in advising on the course to be adopted, to consider the interests of the 600 children in them as of importance paramount to all considerations of the theoretical advantage of securing at once and at all hazards the perfect uniformity of an unsectarian system of training.

All the evidence before us points to the conclusion that the immediate abolition of the schools, by transferring the children elsewhere, or their amalgamation, could only be brought about by a sudden and violent change, injurious to the children, without any practical advantage of sufficient importance to the Country to justify the adoption of such a course. The alternative of placing the schools at once under one unsectarian system of management is surrounded by practical difficulties which, as we hope to see the schools closed altogether in a short time, it would be hardly desirable to encounter. If the plan were attempted, the difficulty would be in commencing to work the schools practically on the unsectarian system. Reciprocally to transfer half the children from one school to the other for the mere purpose of making each a mixed school, seems to us a change so abrupt in its character that it could not be conducive to the welfare of the children. If, on the other hand, the orphans from time to time coming upon the charity of the public are sent to the school the mass of children in which belong to a different faith, each school would be for years virtually denominational in its character, with a few children in it of another creed, requiring special officers to look after their religious instruction, as at Randwick.

Considered simply as schools, we do not find either of the institutions inferior in point of teaching efficiency to the ordinary unsectarian schools of the Colony; and, regularly visited as they are by Inspectors under the Council of Education, and subject to Government control, we see no reason for their abolition on account of any defects in them as educational establishments.

In the event of massing the united body of children from the two schools in one institution, the very large outlay of about £12,000 would have to be incurred, as the estimated cost of erecting buildings of the required character is £40 a child. Though we should not hesitate to advise this expenditure if the welfare of the children concerned and the interests of the Country appeared to render it desirable, we see no advantages to be attained commensurate with so great an outlay. The sum required to be expended in bringing about an amalgamation of these institutions would, we conceive, be far more beneficially devoted to the erection of Public Schools throughout the Colony in places at present enjoying none of their advantages.

It is not, however, the mere fact that the education given in these sectarian institutions is equal to that provided in our Public Schools, nor the consideration of the expense involved in their amalgamation, that restrains us from advising their abolition or immediate fusion into one.

These establishments are not merely schools, but they are, to a certain extent, homes, and the real matter for consideration is, whether, in amalgamating the two institutions, as good a home, in the moral sense of the word, will be provided for these 600 children as they at present enjoy.

As we are of opinion that the objections entertained by a large and highly intelligent body of thinkers in the Mother Country to the massing together of children in large numbers are sound, we cannot recommend the expenditure of so great a sum of money in the erection of a large institution, the creation of which would result in extending and perpetuating the vicious system of which we disapprove.

The Randwick Asylum is, in our opinion, already too large, and to mass the inmates of these schools with the children of that already overgrown establishment, would be only to intensify the evils of the barrack system there carried out. We feel convinced that the wider the departure from the family plan ordained by Nature for the training of the young, the greater is the injury to the child. Even those who think that children can be advantageously managed in large institutions, admit that the number of 300 should not be exceeded.

As far as we can form an opinion, the children in these schools are individually better known than the children at Randwick, the only large institution with which we can make a comparison. And, as we believe that this individual knowledge of the children is essential to the development of their character and moral nature, we cannot advise the destruction of the homes in which we see that knowledge may be in some degree acquired, for the purpose of placing them in barrack institutions, perfect perhaps in the mechanism of their drill, but useless as homes for the development of vigorous and independent characters. The responsibility of worsening the chances which these 600 children may have of becoming good and useful men and women must be taken by those who can see more clearly than we do that the experience of the Mother Country is worthless, and who are also ready to sacrifice if necessary these 600 characters for the sake of immediately getting rid of an anomaly in our educational system which may with safety be removed in the course of three or four years without any additional expenditure.

The application of the boarding-out system already recommended by us presents a solution of the difficulty surrounding the question.

As we have previously pointed out, the system is especially applicable to children of the orphan class. If put in force in the case of the younger children in the schools and applied to others who have hitherto found refuge in them, they would be so quickly diminished in number as to allow of their being entirely closed in a short time without any outlay in new buildings or any sudden and violent change. As the number of children annually apprenticed from the schools averages fifty,¹ the diminution in the number of children from this cause and the application of the boarding-out system combined would be very rapid.

Measures should, however, be taken for more narrowly scrutinizing the cases for which admission is sought, as we are of opinion that children are admitted from time to time whose relations and friends are in a position to maintain them. As long as the present unsatisfactory system exists of admission to the school being obtained through the Colonial Secretary's Office, these abuses will continue, as no means exist for a proper examination of individual cases. Until Mrs. Betts, the Matron of the Protestant Orphan School, called the attention of the Government to the fact, mothers were in the habit of placing only children in the institution without contributing to their support.¹ The Government, on the matter being pointed out, very properly held that a mother able to go to service as a single woman could afford to pay for the keep of one child, and established the rule that only children should be paid for. As a further check upon the growth of the schools, we would advise that the rule should be at once established of admitting no child free unless one of a family numbering not less than three, except both parents be dead. A similar but more stringent rule exists in the Protestant Orphan School at Emerald Hill, Melbourne,² and might, we think, have been applied here long ago with advantage. We are also of opinion that a child once taken out of either of the schools by a parent should not be re-admitted unless that parent be dead, as the evidence shows that the practice is too frequent.

The immediate application of these rules pending the introduction of the Boarding-out System will keep down the number of children, and be a wholesome check upon that too great facility of admission so conducive to the growth of a pauper spirit.

THE RANDWICK ASYLUM FOR DESTITUTE CHILDREN.

Origin.

THIS institution, which has become the largest of our establishments for the reception and training of destitute children, originated twenty-one years ago, in the private exertions of several philanthropic citizens of Sydney, who were anxious to make some provision for the care of children abandoned by their parents or left without friends and protection, and who in pursuance of this object founded the Society for the Relief of Destitute Children, incorporated in 1857 by the Act 20 Vic. No. 19.

Soon after the formation of the Society its resources were considerably augmented by a munificent bequest from Dr. Cuthill, who left the sum of £11,500 to be devoted to the purposes of the institution, without any limitation as to the precise manner in which the money was to be applied in carrying out its objects. Since it was founded the institution has also received from the Government altogether the sum of £15,250, which has been appropriated to its use from time to time by the Legislature, chiefly for building purposes, besides an annual grant, averaging during the last six years £8,320.

Grants of land have also been made to it, amounting in all to 100 acres. The institution, therefore, although partially aided by private contributions, and in its inception and its management a private, is in substance a public institution, in the proper management of which the Country must always take the deepest interest as long as Parliament approves of the system of massing children together, and the Government and the Legislature, by a large annual vote, continue to be the chief maintainers of the institution.

Site.

The locality in which the Asylum is situated is healthy, and easily accessible from Sydney. The grounds attached to it are ample for all purposes, and the buildings, buildings, which are all comparatively and some quite new, afford accommodation for 1,000 children. 900 have actually been in the Asylum at one time, and it contained at the time of our inquiry 816, of whom 270 were girls.

The governing body is a Board of Directors, of whom not less than sixteen nor more than twenty-eight are elected by the subscribers, and the remainder, numbering forty, are life Directors.¹ Eight of the elected members retire at the end of each year, being those members who have attended the meetings of the Board the least number of times. "That is to say, observes Mr. Deas Thomson, the President of the institution since its foundation in 1852, the minimum number of members is sixty-one, and the number might be increased to nearly the number of the present House of Assembly."² Indeed, as the privilege of becoming a life director is accorded to every one presenting the institution with a donation of £100, this numerous body may be indefinitely increased in number by persons possessing no particular qualifications for the office, however liberal they may be in the distribution of their wealth. A great portion of the executive business of the institution is however transacted by a house committee of thirteen, to whom the Board largely delegates its authority.³ The average attendance at the Board of directors is from fifteen to twenty⁴ and it is admitted that, if those charged with the responsibility of taking part in the management did not habitually neglect their duty by failing to attend, it would be an exceedingly unmanageable body.⁵

It appears that at one time there was also a committee of ladies. Of late, however, they do not seem to have taken an active part in the supervision of the Asylum. Their withdrawal from a participation in the management appears to have arisen from the circumstance that, having once complained of the inefficiency of the Matron, Miss Probert, that officer resigned, but was reappointed by the Directors. On this course being taken, several of the ladies resigned, and the committee seem to have ceased taking any interest in the supervision of the institution. This difference of opinion would probably not have arisen, had the ladies and the gentlemen met in the same Committee, as recommended by us.

On a question as to the fitness of a woman to have the control of a large number of children, many of them girls, it appears to us that women would more probably form a correct opinion than men, and be less likely to be talked over and imposed upon.

Mr. Deas Thomson, whose opportunities for coming to a sound conclusion on the point are most ample, from his long association with the institution, thinks that the Board of directors should be considerably reduced in number.⁶ In this opinion we entirely concur.

Mr. Deas Thomson, in his evidence, states that with so large a directory there is too great a division of responsibility, and that as two meetings are seldom composed of the same members, it is difficult to obtain agreement amongst them; one set of gentlemen attending one meeting and taking one course, and a different set attending the next and adopting another.⁷ Time is also wasted in useless discussion, a vice still further encouraged by the introduction to the meetings of reporters for the daily Press, whose presence tends to make people talk who would otherwise be silent.⁸ Captain McLerie, the Inspector General of Police, says that when the committee was

was only composed of six members there was none of that frivolous discussion which has since become too frequent, and which he in a large measure attributes to the size of the committee.¹

A number of witnesses strongly urge the expediency of composing the Board entirely of laymen, stating that the presence of the clerical element tends to provoke sectarian feeling and acrimonious discussion, and we have already in a previous portion of our Report advised the propriety of excluding clergymen from all such committees.²

In accordance with a recommendation already made by us, we are of opinion that in this, an institution for the training of children, many of them girls, ladies should be associated with gentlemen in the management.

We also concur in the opinion expressed by Mr. Deas Thomson, Captain McLerie, and other witnesses, that as the Government contribute three-fourths of the money annually spent in the institution, they should be represented at the Board.

It is of course impossible to fix upon any number as absolutely preferable, but we are disposed to advise that the number of the Board should not exceed fifteen, of whom five—three ladies and two gentlemen—should be appointed by the Government, eight gentlemen and two ladies being elected by the subscribers. The chairman, with a deliberative as well as a casting vote, should be one of the two gentlemen appointed by the Government.

We think the number recommended will be sufficiently large to enable all sections of the community to be represented at the Board, a consideration not to be lost sight of in the management of an institution of an unsectarian character for the training of children.

Objects of institution.

It would appear from the language of an appeal to the public on behalf of the institution which has been annually published by the committee for some years past, as showing the objects of the Asylum, that one is "to receive children found by the police, or others without protection, whose parents cannot be discovered, or whose parents have been convicted as vagrants, drunkards, or disorderly characters, unfit to have the care of their children; children abandoned by their parents and left without friends or protection."

The preamble of the Act incorporating the Randwick Asylum also clearly shows that the Society "had for its objects the protection, support, and moral and religious instruction of children deserted or left destitute by dissolute and abandoned parents, or from other causes neglected, or in a state of great privation and without adequate means of support." The By-law of the institution, approved by Parliament, defines the children eligible for reception as "children abandoned by their parents, or left without friends and protection; children the offspring of parents either or both of whom may, from profligate habits or conviction for felony, be unable to support and unfit to educate them, and who may voluntarily surrender them to the care of the Society; children who, coming within any of the classes above enumerated, may, according to any law in force for the time being, be compulsorily placed in the institution; children of any of the above classes, who may be received by order of the Government from any Benevolent Asylum or other public institution, and for whose support provision shall be made by the Legislature."

Notwithstanding

Notwithstanding the clear intention of the Legislature in passing the Act of Incorporation, and the avowed objects of the philanthropic founders of the Society, it appears that the institution, as now managed, is far from carrying out the objects of its benevolent founders, as set out in the appeal, or of the Legislature, as disclosed in the preamble of the Act. Any one reading the appeal would suppose that the Asylum was an immediate refuge for children found by the police, destitute in consequence either of the crimes or the desertion of their parents. This is so far from being the case that no homeless children can be taken there by the police. Mr. Wise, the Secretary of the Asylum, admits that the language of the appeal is no longer in accordance with the practice of the institution. He justifies the refusal of a child brought by the police in a state of destitution, from the desertion of its parents, in the following words:—“If a policeman brought a child to the institution to be admitted we should decline to receive it, because there is no one to surrender the child or to give us any information about it, to place us in loco parentis, as the father or mother would do. The policeman could not do that.”¹ If this were to be a valid reason for the refusal of a deserted child, no child deserted by its parents could ever be admitted to the Asylum, as the Act makes no provision for the surrender of such a child by anybody, whilst it was clearly the intention of the Act and by-law that such a child should be received.

The Act and by-law certainly do provide for the surrender of children by their parents, but it is only a surrender by parents—“either or both of whom may, from profligate habits or conviction for felony, be unable to support and unfit to educate them,” but they nowhere contemplate the surrender of a child simply on the ground of the poverty of the parent. A mother only has the power, when having in fact the sole care of a child, the father, from his habits of drunkenness, or his conviction for felony, or his long-continued absence, is unable or unwilling to maintain his child, to surrender it to the Asylum, with the sanction of a Justice of the Peace. In all other cases the unfitness of the parents to educate their children is an essential condition precedent to the admission of the children.

From the evidence taken by us and from cases within our own knowledge, it appears to us that this condition has been to a great extent lost sight of, and a safeguard thus lost, by which the institution would be protected from imposition. Mal-administration.

So far, in point of fact, from the institution being now primarily carried on for the benefit of deserted and destitute children, it has become apparently a place into which parents can get their children by simply making out a case for charitable relief. This, we have no hesitation in saying, was never the intention of the Legislature, as far as it can be discovered in the language of the Randwick Incorporation Act and the by-law; neither do we believe was it the intention of the founders of the Society to create an institution which so administered must inevitably tend to create a spirit of pauperism, founded upon gross neglect of parental duty.

Under the circumstances of the departure of the administration of the institution from the intentions of its founders, we are not surprised to find that the charity of the public has been from time to time grossly abused by the admission of large numbers of children who ought to have been maintained by their parents or friends;² nor is it astonishing that extraordinary dissensions and differences should arise in a committee, when the matter to determine is not simply whether a child is destitute or deserted or its parents unfit to have control of it, but whether a case has been made out for the charitable relief of some protégé to whom a director has extended his patronage, and whose admission he is committed to obtaining.

Captain McLerie, one of the original founders of the institution, states that his reason for withdrawing from it was that the original objects of the institution were not carried out, and that he found himself powerless to prevent the reception of children who ought not to be there.¹ It is to be regretted that the very proper view of the objects of the institution taken by this discriminating public officer should not have been also entertained by those who have from time to time taken upon themselves the management of the institution and extolled the excellence of its administration.

The evidence of Mr. S. H. Pearce, who has been a director for seventeen years and who has always taken a lively interest in the institution, is to the same effect. He says :—

There are children in the Randwick Asylum who ought not to be there. I speak without fear, favour, or affection; and, in my opinion, with all our exertions and precautions, there are children admitted into that institution who ought to have been provided for by their parents; and it is a positive fact that demands are often made to get children admitted there, and they have been in some cases admitted, who should not have been admitted at all. There are clergymen constantly giving recommendations to interested parties, sending recommendations which sometimes astonish me when I find the parties who send them; and, in my opinion, it is the same at the Benevolent Institution. It has been said that children have been made paupers for the express purpose of proselytism, the Country pauperized in consequence, and the people taught to depend on others instead of depending on their own exertions. Parents who should maintain their children see that they are better cared for in these institutions than they can care for them, and so they get them in when possible.²

Mr. May too, the Superintendent, in his evidence, states that the number of children now in the Asylum is not nearly as large as it was some few years ago, and this he partly attributes to the more searching inquiry now made by the directors in all cases of applications for admission.³ The inference to be drawn is, that in times past the laxness of the inquiry instituted allowed the institution to be imposed upon.

It is needless to dwell upon the pauperizing effects of such a system. They can only be escaped by the return of the directors of the institution to a rigorous administration of the Act incorporating the Society, and of the by-law defining the class of children eligible for admission.

When the Legislature passed an Act for the incorporation of a Society having for its object the protection of the deserted and destitute children of "dissolute and abandoned parents," it could scarcely have contemplated that the offspring of the drunkard and the profligate would be children in robust health, free from all the maladies springing from misery, neglect, and vice; yet, strange to say, the evidence discloses the fact that, though a large and commodious hospital, quite detached from the main building, and affording every facility for guarding against the introduction of disease into the Asylum, has been built at great expense, none but "prize children," as Dr. Renwick describes them, will be received by the directors.⁴

The rule against the admission of any but perfectly healthy children, free from any bodily blemish, has been pushed to the extent of refusing to admit a boy who can walk perfectly well, but has merely a deformity of the ancle.⁵ The consequence is, that this child has been kept at the Benevolent Asylum for years, without any opportunity afforded him of industrial training, till he is too old for admission at Randwick. The reason given by the secretary of the Asylum for the rejection of such a child is that the directors would find difficulty in apprenticing it. It appears to us that, even if the boy could not walk well, he should have been received and taught some sedentary trade, such as tailoring or shoemaking, which would have given him the means of earning a living in after-life.

We cannot believe that the Legislature, in its extremely liberal grants amounting to £110,500 to this Asylum for the neglected and "destitute children of dissolute and abandoned parents," ever intended that only those should be received whose robust health and vigorous frames would relieve the officers having care of the establishment of all responsibility and its servants of all trouble in attending to them. Such an illiberal construction of the intentions of the Country in supporting the Asylum contrasts disadvantageously with the management of similar institutions in the Mother Country.

In the Central London District School, capable of receiving 1,600 children, although the pupils were of the lowest and most diseased London type, none were refused admission even when suffering from the foulest or most contagious maladies, and yet the death rate was only 2 per cent.—the average mortality for London, calculated on children of all classes of corresponding age, amounting to 12 per cent. This singularly low death rate has been still further lessened, for in 1866 there were only six deaths in an average population of nearly 900, and no case of cholera occurred.¹

We see no reason why in the healthy locality of Randwick similar results should not be attained, even if the Asylum were as large-hearted in its charity as this London institution. A destitute child crippled from its infancy, or afflicted in health from misery and neglect, or the vice of its parents, we should have thought had a peculiar claim upon the humanity of the Country and the charity of an institution nobly endowed and publicly subsidized for its relief, though some trouble might be given by its presence to those whom duty would compel to care for its welfare.

Were there no hospital in connection with the institution, there would be some propriety in opposing the admission of sickly children. We find, however, that a handsome hospital has been built, at an expense of £3,000, capable of holding sixty-eight beds. Its well arranged wards afford every facility for the separate treatment of children suffering from skin and other diseases, from which the children of drunken and profligate parents might be expected to be suffering on their first rescue from misery. It appears to us that the money spent on this hospital has been to a large extent thrown away, and the management must be bad, if the directors are not able to receive direct from their surrounding circumstances of destitution the children for whose benefit the institution has been so liberally subsidized by Parliament.

A large number of children are sent to the Asylum by the Government, and the cost of their maintenance paid out of an annual vote. The average annual amount paid by the Government for the support of these children has been £4,322 for the last four years, in addition to the sum of £4,000 annually voted in aid of the institution.

Children paid for by Government.

Notwithstanding these large and liberal payments, the Government do not seem able to procure the admission of the children on their immediate rescue from the circumstances of destitution in which they are found, but are obliged, by the action of the directors in refusing to take any but sound, healthy children, to send them to the Benevolent Asylum, where they remain generally for months—perhaps for years—in the small, ill-ventilated rooms of that establishment, till they meet with the approval of the Randwick authorities. They are then sent off in drafts varying from forty to eighty at a time to Randwick.

This system of making the Benevolent Asylum a receiving-house for Randwick is, in our opinion, entirely wrong, however convenient it may be to the directors in relieving the Asylum of the trouble and responsibility of dealing with the children when first found suffering from the effects of the destitution from which they are rescued. When this system originated does not distinctly appear, but it would seem that it is comparatively of recent date, as it is clear from the testimony of Captain McLerie, that the benevolent founders of the institution, who projected the Asylum as a refuge for the really destitute children of “profligate and abandoned parents” in no way endeavoured to shirk the hard work and responsibility involved in assuming the management of such an institution, or intended to restrict the charity of the Asylum to “prize children.” As a matter of justice, we think it due to the memory of those who originated this institution, and some of whom are now passed away, to express our conviction that, though not alive to the mistake, in their day undiscovered, of massing large numbers of children together, they were actuated by a genuine spirit of charity, and were utterly incapable of attempting to gain a cheap popularity by affecting to provide for a number of children whose real rescue from misery had been achieved by the obscure but more troublesome and self-denying labour of others.

When the Legislature passed the Randwick Incorporation Act for the benefit of “children deserted or left destitute by dissolute and abandoned parents,” and afterwards voted £8,000 a year for its maintenance, we cannot believe that it was intended that another establishment should be kept up with far inferior advantages and appliances for the purpose of restoring to health the offspring of profligate parents, in order that they might be afterwards reared without trouble to a munificently endowed institution on which £14,000 has been spent in buildings, and towards which £8,000 a year is contributed by the Government.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the children sent by the Government to Randwick should, if of the required age, be taken there direct on their rescue, as intended by the founders of the Society in establishing the Asylum, and by the Legislature in supporting it. If the arrangements do not allow of their reception in whatever state of misery they may be found, the management must be altogether inefficient, from its failure to carry out the objects of the Legislature in so liberally contributing to the support of the institution.

The 7th section of the Randwick Asylum Incorporation Act, 20 Vic. No. 19, requires that a woman surrendering her child to the Society should obtain “the sanction of a Justice of the Peace under his hand” to her act. This should be amended by requiring the sanction of the Comptroller of Charities, whose approval would be a much greater safeguard against the surrender of children by parents able to support them.

Under

Under the by-laws of the institution, no children eligible for the Orphan Schools are admissible at Randwick, and whilst a child that has no mother may be admitted, one deprived of its father is inadmissible.

In the event of the closing of the Parramatta Orphan Schools by the application of the boarding-out system, the repeal of these by-laws will become necessary, in order to allow of the institution being used as a receiving house for orphaned children before they are boarded out.

We have had some trouble in arriving at a correct conclusion with reference to the sanitary state of the Asylum, as its officers are in remarkable conflict on the subject. Sanitary state.

Mr. Deas Thomson, in his evidence, states that he does not believe that there is any institution in the world in which the sanitary condition of the inmates is better.¹ The hospital, he says, is ordinarily much larger than is required,² and he adds that he sometimes goes there and does not find a single child in it that can be considered an invalid.³ Dr. Nott, the medical attendant of the Asylum, speaks in high terms of its sanitary condition,⁴ and admits that, as far as he is concerned, he advises the directors not to take in a child unless it is healthy.⁵ It would be indeed strange if an Asylum conducted on the principles of admission to which Dr. Renwick and Dr. Nott testify did not show the remarkable immunity from sickness claimed for it by its President. Whether it is as all-embracing in its charity as was contemplated by the Legislature which contributed £2,000 to a hospital spoken of by the President as complete in all its arrangements,⁶ and as sometimes without a single invalid in it, is another question.

The medical report of the hospital for the year 1872 concurs with the evidence given by Dr. Nott and Mr. Deas Thomson, stating that "during the first part of the year the health of the institution was all that could be desired, there being no diseases requiring special treatment. In July scarlatina broke out, and eighty-one children were under treatment in the hospital, all of whom recovered. During the latter months of the year bronchitis and pneumonia were rather prevalent, but at the end of the year the institution was free from sickness of any kind, the children being not only free from active disease and from every kind of cutaneous affection, but showing a well-nourished and robust appearance." In the face of this evidence, Mr. Wise, the secretary of the institution, whilst endeavouring to disprove the statement that the institution only admitted "prize children", and to show that the Asylum willingly received the weak and sickly, stated that the children were anything but healthy, inasmuch as 819 children were treated in the hospital during the year 1872.⁷ Notwithstanding the pains taken by Mr. Wise to prove the general unhealthiness of the institution, by statistics prepared by him, showing that there is constant⁸ and considerable sickness amongst⁹ the children, we are of opinion, on reviewing all the evidence, that largely owing to the care with which healthy children are selected for admission, the institution is remarkably free from disease. Certainly, the deaths amongst the picked children of Randwick were in 1872 equal in proportion to those taking place in 1866 amongst the diseased paupers of London in the Central District School, where none are refused admission even when suffering from the foulest and most contagious maladies; but this fact is not sufficient to prove the general unhealthiness of the Randwick children, as sought to be established by Mr. Wise.

Management.

As far as method and mechanical precision in the management of the children are matters of satisfaction, the arrangements of the institution are exact, and the management by Mr. May, the superintendent, efficient. In perfection of mechanical drill the children will perhaps compare with any trained under the barrack system; they eat and drink, work and play, say their prayers, and take their rest, in perfect obedience to the word of command, and apparently never forget the numbers by which they individually answer to the call of the muster roll. For the reasons, however, given by us in a previous section of our Report, we cannot regard these as the highest objects to be attained in an institution for the training of the young. In saying this we express no opinion to the disparagement of Mr. May, or Miss Probert, the Matron, both of whom appeared to us zealous in the discharge of their duties. They cannot, however, perform impossibilities, and we were, therefore, in no way surprised to find that neither of these officers knew anything like the whole of the children in the Asylum even by name. Miss Probert, on being questioned as to whether she knew the name of every child in the school, laughed at the idea, and replying in the negative, added that she knew the names "of a good many."¹ We arrived at our opinion as to Mr. May's acquaintance with the children individually by personal observation when inspecting the institution.

This inability, displayed by persons of great experience, to individualize the children in the simplest and most superficial manner, shows how utterly impossible it must be for officers having the control of 800 children, replenished from time to time by drafts of fifty or eighty strangers, to obtain that knowledge of their individual characters without which their moral feelings can never be properly developed, though the children may be drilled into perfect order as mere pieces in a machine.

Schools.

We found that the schools of the institution were not visited officially by Inspectors under the Council of Education, the directors having contented themselves with an examination of them from time to time by some members of their own body. There is, consequently, no satisfactory means of judging of the progress of the children or of the efficiency of the teaching; but we found that some of the teachers had been employed under the Council of Education; and a rule has lately been passed requiring all the teachers appointed in future to produce the Council's certificate.

We are of opinion that the schools should be officially visited by the Inspectors of the Council of Education, and their reports forwarded to the Comptroller of Public Charities.

Industrial training.

The industrial training of the children being one of the objects of the institution, a considerable number of them are employed in various ways about the establishment. The trades taught are shoemaking, tailoring, carpentering, and baking,² but, with the exception of a few on trial, none of the children are taught these trades till they are of an age to be apprenticed out, when they are instead apprenticed to the institution for six years to learn these callings.³ It appears from the evidence of the shoemaker instructor that the result of his eight years' work in the institution is that he has turned out four tradesmen.⁴ This system, with such a result, we cannot consider satisfactory. At the time of our inquiry there were only thirteen apprentices to the shoemaking,⁵ which appeared to us a very small number to be taught out of the large number of boys in the institution. As only two or three complete their term of apprenticeship every year, and the same number is taken

In the Industrial School at Sunbury, Victoria, thirty or forty children are taught by one instructor,¹ and we see no reason why, under proper arrangements, the same number should not be taught at Randwick. The system of apprenticing children to the institution for the period of six years should, in our opinion, be abolished, and the children sent out of the Asylum as soon as their trade education was sufficiently advanced to induce masters to take them for the remaining portion of the time for which the institution may apprentice them.

It appears from the evidence that there would be no difficulty in getting good tradesmen to take them after they had been instructed for three years, as the apprentice, in fact, only begins to be of use to his master during the last years of his service. Were the institution to give the instruction during the first years which are really of little value to the employer, we have no doubt the boys would be taken readily enough. The moral dangers, moreover, of keeping a number of young men and women living together in the institution after the age of fifteen are obvious.

We find that since we first instituted our inquiries as to the impolicy of the system of apprenticing the children to the institution, and pointed out how small was the number taught under it, the directors have determined on abolishing the trades altogether, or, at all events, only to give such instruction as the children can obtain before the age of thirteen, when they are apprenticed out. This we think an error in the opposite direction. The reason given for the proposed change by Mr. Pearce is that the directors think "that if there are to be hewers of wood and drawers of water, they should be taken from the class which is chiefly maintained by the State, and that they should not overstock the country with mechanics, because they want those positions for their own sons."²

Though some discretion in the matter has been given to the Board, still, he tells us, this is the feeling amongst the directors.

Whilst we fully agree in thinking that a large number of the children may find employment in agricultural pursuits, beneficially to themselves and to the Country, we cannot think it right that all these children, whatever their individual capacity may be, should on account of their destitution be stamped as a body members of the pauper class, and condemned for life, as hewers of wood and drawers of water, to the lowest place in the hierarchy of labour. Of overstocking a Colony constantly offering fresh fields for labour with mechanics sent out from the institution we think there is little danger, whilst the retention of the trades would not only give that diversity of occupation which is so beneficial in all establishments, but would afford the children showing exceptional abilities and aptitude, that opportunity of rising in life of which no organization in an institution largely maintained by the State should be permitted deliberately to deprive them. To take away from the children at Randwick the opportunities of improvement and self-advancement which are enjoyed by children in similar institutions all over the world, upon the grounds stated, would be to retrograde in the most odious spirit of class legislation, and to add to the manifold imperfections of the barrack system that worst obstacle to all progress, the creation of a caste feeling. The spirit of independence and the desire for improvement, which will make these unhappy children of the State struggle to help themselves and win their way as equals amongst the honest ranks of toil, will be best infused amongst them by constantly reminding them of the dignity of all labour, and of the increasing nobility of that requiring the most skill and intellect in its pursuit, rather than by teaching them to think that, bred as paupers by the Country, they have lost all chance, whatever their powers, of rising beyond the performance of the humblest and most menial of services. To suppose that any child reared under the barrack system should develop any aspiration of a more exalted nature than a desire to remember his number or perform his appointed part in the mechanical routine of the place is perhaps verging on the absurd; but on leaving the institution and the surrounding influences of the caste amongst whom he has moved, unless utterly broken in spirit and all manhood crushed out of him by the deadening weight of its influence, he will learn to resent the State treatment which has forbidden him to rise, and will look upon the paternal Government which could allow it with the feelings of those who are known as the dangerous classes of society.

In the event of the system recommended by us of apprenticing the children to the institution till they complete their fifteenth year being adopted, Mr. May is of opinion that far larger numbers than at present might receive trade instruction at the same time. As Mr. May thinks it quite possible that fifty or a hundred might be taught under such a system, we think it should at once be brought into operation.¹

machinery.

The arrangements for the industrial training of the children, though in a measure satisfactory from the variety of work in which the children are employed, are by no means complete, and are, from the extent to which labour-saving machinery is used, injurious to the children. The admission made by Mr. Pearce as to the real character of the institution, considered simply as a training school for children, very much coincides with our own.

He says—"Now, although the place is excellent in itself, still I think it does not give the children that opportunity of learning how to make themselves as useful in the world as they might be, by learning to cook, bake bread, wash their own clothes, and do all such things as those, without machinery. As it is now, these children are being made, to some extent, independent of manual labour. I think now that we have gone too far in procuring machinery, although I have been one of the parties who advocated making the institution a model to the world, and have done all that I could to make it so."²

Notwithstanding Mr. Pearce's pride in an institution which he appears to consider "a model to the world," he has been careful not to repeat the experiment of taking a second apprentice from its well-drilled ranks. The unsatisfactory character of the children appears to have been the reason for the caution which he has exercised.³

At the time of our inquiry none of the girls were taught to cook by any sort of employment in the kitchen, the reason given by the Matron for their exclusion from that work being, that as a man cook was employed, the assistance of the girls in that department of the establishment would be improper. She moreover thought that, on account of the machinery used, there was not much chance of the girls learning cookery. This answer fully corroborates the opinion formed by us, that, though the introduction of steam machinery has done much to relieve officers of trouble in the supervision of the children when doing the work of the institution, yet, as the object of the Charity is to fit the children for after-life, and as it exists for their benefit rather than for the advantage of the officers and servants employed, the use of such machinery is injurious to the welfare of the children, by unfitting them for life in homes unprovided with it.

An

² Pearce, 8555.

Id. 8559, 8560.

An institution that by its arrangements deprives the girls reared in it of the opportunity of learning how to use ordinary kitchen utensils or to cook the plainest food, can hardly be called successful in its management as an Industrial School, nor the girls sent out from it well fitted to encounter the practical difficulties of bush life.

We are disposed to think that the number of officers and servants employed in the institution is too large, though it is impossible for us, with the means at our command, to point out exactly where the excess lies and the over-expenditure is caused. In the hospital, however, we are clearly of opinion that the number of persons employed is excessive. In that department there is an officer in charge, with two untrained nurses and an attendant. The wages given are as high as, and in one instance higher than those paid to trained nurses in the Sydney Infirmary, though the work is far lighter, as there are seldom any accidents or acute cases requiring attendance day and night.

We are of opinion that one trained nurse and one attendant would be sufficient to look after the hospital at ordinary times.

In the event of an epidemic breaking out, additional assistance could be taken on for the time. Under such circumstances, indeed, as Mr. Deas Thomson remarks in his evidence, "the whole institution becomes one large hospital," and every attendant consequently a nurse.¹

We observe also that there are eight attendants or housemaids, whereas at the Protestant Orphan School there are none, and at the Roman Catholic Orphan School only one.

We would, moreover, in support of our opinion as to the over-expenditure in the institution, refer to the fact that, though the large number of children in it must greatly diminish the average cost in supervision, the expense of each child is, irrespective of the reduction in the cost of its maintenance by the reproductiveness of its labour, £16 per annum,²—a larger amount than the gross cost of each child in the Parramatta Orphan Schools. If the Asylum were supplied by contract to the same extent as the Orphan Schools, the cost of each child would be £24 10s., clearly showing that the expenditure at Randwick on account of officers and servants is excessive, as the cost of each child in the Protestant and Roman Catholic Orphan Schools is £15 0s. 2d. and £13 17s. 9d. respectively.

Doubtless the ultimate cost to the Society of each child is only £14 8s. 5d., by reason of the reproductiveness of its labour, but in forming an opinion whether the institution is economically managed or not, the gross cost of each child must be taken into consideration, the real question being, whether, considering the reproductiveness of the labour of the children, the Asylum could not be managed at less expense than it is. As the amount charged by the Society to the Government for each child sent from the Benevolent Asylum is £16 per annum, and not the £14 8s. 5d. which is said to be the cost of its maintenance, the Asylum is in fact more expensive to the Country than either of the Orphan Schools.

It appears moreover from the evidence that the institution is steadily getting into debt, and the conclusion formed by us is, that it is not managed so economically as it might be.

Though the last annual report of the institution speaks of the collector "having instructions not only to obtain subscriptions, but to visit and report upon the condition of the many apprentices in the several country districts," and states "that this occasional supervision of these apprentices in the homes of their employers has has produced many beneficial results," we find on investigation that no supervision worthy of the name really exists, and we think the paragraph quoted from the report calculated to mislead the public. Mr. Wise, the secretary to the institution, on being asked whether the collector had seen half the children apprenticed out, said, "no, he had only been to one part of the country as yet." On an examination of the collector, it turned out that his visit had been to the Western District of the Colony, and that the number of apprentices seen by him out of the 436 now in service was about a dozen.¹ If so "many beneficial results" followed from this single visit to twelve of the apprentices, how great must be the necessity of a system of after-supervision which would be worthy of report. Of the 698 children apprenticed since the foundation of the institution, there are no records giving an account of their after-career, and in the absence of any complete system of after-supervision there is no accurate and trustworthy means of finding out how far the children reared in the Asylum have turned out well. For the reasons given by us in another portion of our Report, we are of opinion that in this, in common with all other institutions of a similar character, some system of supervision over the children after they have left the Asylum should be established.

We cannot close our observations upon the Asylum without again recording our conviction that the maintenance of such institutions is a mistake, the effects of which, if persisted in, will become more clearly apparent as the Colony grows older and its population increases, when the fatal consequence of departing from the natural system of the family life will be developed in the creation of a pauper spirit ingrained from infancy in the minds of children reared under the barrack system.

Buildings.

HYDE PARK ASYLUM FOR AGED AND DESTITUTE WOMEN.

THIS institution at the time of our inspection contained 220 women, and was much overcrowded. The old main building is still sound and in good repair, but the out-buildings, formerly used as Volunteer quarters, were at the time of our visit so dilapidated as to be unsafe and almost useless. Their repair, which has since been commenced, will give the Asylum much greater accommodation, and to a certain extent relieve its overcrowded condition. We are of opinion, however, that the premises are altogether too confined for the purposes to which they are devoted, there being nothing but the smallest yard attached to the buildings, which are without any verandahs or sheds for the protection of the inmates in hot or inclement weather. Its position in the city is also quite unsuitable for such an Asylum. In the event of the Orphan Schools at Parramatta being ultimately closed as recommended by us, we are of opinion that the premises now occupied by the Catholic Orphan School might be devoted to the reception of the inmates of this institution; and we certainly cannot advise the expenditure of more money in buildings at Hyde Park, as seems to have been contemplated by the Government.

Management.

The management of the Asylum is entirely under the control of the Matron, Mrs. Hicks, and is, we consider, highly efficient and most economical. There are no officers besides the Matron, who herself issues all the stores and keeps all the books of the establishment.² The only paid servants employed, with the exception of a laundress, are a few of the strongest of the inmates, who receive from twopence to sixpence a day, two of the head wardswomen receiving a shilling.³ The inmates make everything they wear, with the exception of their boots and shoes, which are supplied by contract;⁴ and we may here remark that all the contracts for the supply of of this institution seem well carried out. Though no work is done by the inmates which is remunerative to the Government, we are of opinion that they render all the services to the Asylum of which they are capable, and the institution could not be more economically conducted, the average cost per head of the inmates being only £10 16s. 11½d.

The Matron points out that in the present confined premises she has no room for the reception of cancer cases, which are often sent there from the Infirmary as incurable, and the presence of which amongst the other inmates is very distressing. She also complains of the length of time lunatics are sometimes allowed to remain there, who by their noise and violence keep the inmates awake for nights together, and she also suggests that a number of imbeciles now kept there should be removed to Newcastle. These representations, we think, deserve the attention of the Government, as the presence of lunatics and imbeciles in such an institution is undesirable.

Alterations
required.

We see no reason for supposing that the charity of the institution is abused to any great extent by the admission of persons whose friends could provide for them. There are certainly a few such cases, which might be guarded against by legislation providing that children should be liable for the support of their parents in such institutions as we have recommended in a previous portion of our Report.

THE BENEVOLENT ASYLUM.

THIS institution was formerly the Asylum for the infirm and destitute class of persons now cared for in the Asylums at Liverpool, Parramatta, and Hyde Park. Since the removal of that class of inmates, it has been chiefly devoted to the purposes of a lying-in hospital for destitute women. It also serves as an Asylum for destitute children sent from all parts of the Colony,¹ and a system of out-door relief is also administered there. The buildings, some of which are very old, have been added to from time to time; and though originally very insufficient in accommodation, are said by Dr. Renwick, the visiting medical officer, to be suitable for the purpose to which they have been applied.² He suggests, however, that arrangements should be made for providing separate rooms for bad accouchement cases.³ In the event of the children in the Asylum being removed, as we recommend, the additional rooms at the disposal of the committee would doubtless allow of this suggestion being carried out without additional expense.

Objects.

Buildings.

Governing body.

The institution is managed by a committee of twenty-eight, not including the president, vice-presidents, honorary secretary, and treasurer, all of whom are ex officio members of the governing body.⁴

This committee we consider altogether too large. The evidence before us shows that its size might be considerably reduced with great advantage to the institution, as owing to its numbers the business before it is frequently obstructed.⁵ The members are elected by the subscribers to the institution, but it is stated in evidence that the elections are a perfect farce, as the subscribers never know of and take little interest in them, unless there is some particular object to be gained, or some purpose to be served, on some special occasion.⁶

Though the Government contribute nine-tenths of the annual amount expended by the committee, they have no voice in the management.⁷ The evidence as to the desirability of composing the Board entirely of lay persons is very strong.⁸

Considering the objects of the institution, we are of opinion that the committee should be composed of both ladies and gentlemen, as the former would be better able to supervise the work of the institution as a maternity hospital, whilst the latter would find scope for business qualities in managing its out-door relief and financial affairs. Two ladies and two gentlemen should be appointed by the Government, and the same number should be elected by the subscribers. A committee thus formed would, we think, be sufficiently large and much better qualified to manage the affairs of the Asylum than the present committee of twenty-eight, composed entirely of gentlemen.

Management.

The Asylum is under the immediate control of a Clerk, who is also Accountant, and a Matron. The former has the entire management of the out-door relief system, looks after the stores and attends to the external¹ affairs of the institution. The latter, who is directly responsible to the committee, has the entire management of its internal arrangements, including the control and discipline of the wards, the cooking and the clothing.² The duties of both these officers are, in our opinion, satisfactorily discharged, and there is no clashing between their respective authorities, both officers being directly responsible to the committee, and the limits of their several responsibilities clearly defined.

Maternity Hospital.

As a Maternity Hospital, the Asylum, under the able medical supervision of Dr. Renwick, has been most successful. From 1863 to 1872 it received 1,118 women, of whom 689 were single and 429 were married.³ Of these only three have died in child-birth, two of them of convulsions only a few hours after their admission. The success of the Asylum in this respect has been so great as to induce many women to apply for admission on condition of their paying.⁴ This, however, has been steadily refused by the committee, on the ground that, if the women are able to pay, they are able to do so outside.

We regret to find that the number of single women applying for admission annually is between ninety and one hundred,⁵ though it appears that the number of illegitimate births has decreased within the last two or three years, a fact which is hopefully ascribed to an improvement in the moral condition of the Country.⁶

The experience gained by Mrs. Blundell, the Matron, in her intercourse with the single women resorting to the hospital, causes her to express the opinion that the establishment of a foundling institution would not be desirable, either for the promotion of morality or for the sake of the young women themselves⁷, and in this opinion we entirely concur.

The conditions under which a woman is supposed to be eligible for admission, are that she is unfit for work, and without relatives, friends, or home,⁸ but the decision in each case is arbitrary⁹, in the sense of there being no settled rule guiding the committee in the reception or rejection of cases, their decision depending entirely on the members forming the committee of the day¹⁰, which, of itself, is an argument against the large size of that body.

When the women are strong enough to leave the hospital, steps are taken by the institution to find them employment, which they generally have no difficulty in obtaining at higher wages than the sum which, by the rules of the Asylum, they are bound to accept¹¹; that sum is half-a-crown a week. In the case of women coming to be confined, who have families, they are received on an order of the Colonial Secretary, and the children maintained in the institution whilst the mother is laid up¹². This system system we consider extremely open to imposition, as the departmental arrangements of the Colonial Secretary's Office supply no machinery for the investigation of such cases, which would, very properly, in the event of the appointment of a Comptroller of Public Charities, come under his consideration for approval.

The success of the institution in rearing foundlings has not been great; but it does not seem to be more unsuccessful in its efforts in this direction than similar institutions elsewhere. The children are always nursed by fit women in the house, but are often admitted in a dying state. The mortality amongst the infants born in the institution is very small.¹ We are of opinion, however, that authority should be given to the master to receive at once infants whose cases urgently require admission, as the evidence before us shows that, in the absence of such authority, the lives of children have been endangered by a refusal to receive them till the authority of the committee was obtained; and as the committee only sits once a week, fatal consequences may follow.

We were much surprised to find at the time of our visit so large a number as 165 children in the institution.²

From the evidence of Dr. Renwick, it appears that 778 have been prepared for and sent to Randwick between 1863 and 1872, besides those sent to Biloela and other institutions.³ In our Report upon Randwick, we have already protested against the system which has grown up of making this establishment do a large portion of the work for which Randwick is maintained, and we cannot too strongly condemn the practice of keeping so large a number of children in these confined premises in the heart of the city.

Still further increasing the expense of the children in the two establishments, we found in the Benevolent Asylum two denominational schools, one with an attendance of thirty-three, the other with fifty-four upon its roll.⁴ They are under no system of inspection, and the whole arrangements with regard to them are unsatisfactory.⁵ If the children in the institution were removed at the age of four, when they are admissible at Randwick, or boarded out, as we would most strongly recommend, there would be no necessity for keeping up these two schools at all.

From the evidence before us, it would appear that the system of out-door relief is more open to abuse than the charity offered in the maternity hospital. At the time of our investigation, there were 410 cases in which weekly assistance was given to people by the institution, and at the same time, in the year before, there were 515 cases on the books.⁶ The relief is in the form of bread or flour, meat and sugar.⁷ The rations are, six loaves of bread and six pounds of meat, four loaves of bread and four pounds of meat, three loaves and three pounds of meat, and two loaves and two pounds of meat a week. Two and two for a single person, three and three for a woman with one child, and four and four for a woman with three children, and six and six for larger families.⁸ Sickness and distress appear to be the grounds upon which the relief is given, and it is continued as long as the necessity of the case requires it, perhaps for years. There is no inquiry made into the circumstances of the case before relief is given, but one is instituted generally within a week.⁹ The imposition which is practised on the institution arises not so much from persons applying who are not entitled to relief, in the first instance, but chiefly in cases where a husband is sick in the Infirmary, and the family require relief and get it, and then the husband gets well and goes to work and the family still continue to receive the relief, and after a time the circumstances are discovered. The evidence is that, in such cases, there is scarcely one in a hundred who has the honesty to say, "I do not require the relief any longer."¹

system.

There is no system of communication between the Infirmary and the Asylum, as there should be, preventing this sort of imposition.² In the event of the office of Comptroller of Public Charities being created, it would be one of his duties to keep the Asylum informed of the discharge of all such cases from the Infirmary. Out of 269 cases specially inquired into, in consequence of information received, it appeared that 152 were cases in which the institution had been more or less imposed upon.³ One witness, with ample opportunities for observation, states that the charity of the institution is abused, in many cases, by persons seeking and obtaining assistance from it whose circumstances in no way entitle them to such relief. He gives instances within his own knowledge; one of a man earning £2 a week, and his son carrying out newspapers; another of a woman keeping cows, and her husband working on the wharfs; another of a woman who had £100 in the Savings' Bank; another of a man getting £1 a week from a Benefit Society, and keeping a green-grocer's shop; and others of a like character.⁴

These facts and figures show how great is the necessity of narrowly watching over a system of eleemosynary assistance, which is open to great abuse, and eminently calculated, if laxly administered, to the most pernicious development of a pauper spirit in the community. Mr. Oatley, a gentleman possessing great knowledge of the city and of the working classes, in his evidence says—"We find it difficult if a person has once received relief there to keep them away afterwards. When they are out of employment they at once apply to the institution—they have become paupers, and they never forget it."⁵ In the face of such evidence, it becomes a serious matter for reflection how far it is right for the State in this Country to give relief of this sort to able-bodied persons representing themselves to be out of employment. This is still done by the committee; and though they very properly insist on the recipients of such relief taking any work that is offered them, we question whether it is not a system tending to the creation of that class of able-bodied paupers, the existence of which is alike the disgrace and misfortune of the Mother Country, and which in this young Colony, constantly demanding fresh supplies of labour, can only be called into existence by bad legislation and mistaken views as to the obligations of true charity. Only when the necessity of giving such relief is terribly absolute and the evidence of its presence overwhelming should such assistance be given, and then only for the shortest possible time consistent with affording an opportunity to those in distress of helping themselves, by procuring any employment which will give them bread.

We find, on examining the financial state of the institution, that a sum has been accumulated by the Committee amounting to £16,921 18s. 6d.⁶ Of this £11,000 bears interest, a portion being on deposit in the Bank of New South Wales, the remainder invested in Government Debentures of this Colony and New Zealand. The interest, instead of being devoted to paying current expenses and carrying on the work of the institution, appears to be added to the principal and reinvested.⁷ It is questionable, in our opinion, how far this system which is growing up in several of our Charitable Institutions is consistent with their annually receiving a large portion of their income from the Government, and we think that it should not be countenanced.

THE LIVERPOOL ASYLUM.

THIS Asylum is the largest of our institutions for the care of the destitute, aged, and infirm, and contained at the time of our inspection 629 inmates.¹ It also serves as a hospital for chronic and incurable cases of disease, 200 of the inmates being persons thus afflicted.²

Some of the buildings are very old, and date from the time of Governor Buildings. Macquarie. These are not very suitable for hospital purposes, as the old structure is on the block plan, and the ventilation in consequence is very imperfect. The wings which have been added to the original building are designed on better principles, providing for thorough ventilation, though the space between the top of the windows and the ceiling is too great. The northern wing, we regretted to see, has not been faithfully built, several settlements having already taken place, and its construction comparing badly with that of the building fifty years older. The roof is also defective, the tiles of which it is constructed either not being of a good quality or not answering well for roofing purposes.

In consequence of the deficient accommodation, pending the erection of the new wing, a temporary wooden building has been erected on the premises, which holds 200 beds. In addition to this, a house has lately been rented in the town of Liverpool, which accommodates between twenty and thirty, but this will be given up on the completion of the new wing, which will hold 200 beds and take in all the inmates of the wooden structure. If that building is still retained for the purpose of affording extra accommodation, if needed, Dr. Strong is of opinion that it should be lined, as at present the rain drives into it very much and wets the beds.³

The grounds about the institution are rather confined, and on the erection of Grounds. the new wing will not afford space for any new buildings. For the purposes of recreation, a piece of land adjoining the Asylum has been rented from Sir Daniel Cooper. With the exception of a shed, it is at present devoid of all shelter, and should be planted with trees, to give the aged and infirm who resort to it further protection from the heat of the sun.

The management of the Asylum is in the hands of the Surgeon-Superin- Management. tendent Dr. Strong, and the Matron Mrs. Burnside. The former looks after the accounts, attends to the sick, directs the arrangements of the patients in the wards, and is the responsible head of the establishment.⁴ The latter is responsible for its internal economy, and manages the nursing, the cooking, the cleaning, the washing, and the stores,⁵ being in point of fact the only other paid officer in the Asylum. The duties of both these officers are discharged in the most efficient manner, and the perfect harmony with which they work the institution is highly creditable to both.

The whole of the manual work of the establishment is performed by the inmates themselves, 138 being employed in various ways about the place.⁶ For the services thus rendered, some get extra rations of bread and tobacco, others small allowances varying from twopence to a shilling a day, according to the amount of skill and labour required.⁷ Thus, the clerk, whose books are kept in excellent order, the head wardman and the dispenser, get a shilling;⁸ gardeners, carpenters, and cooks receive sixpence, and their assistants threepence; whilst wardmen and their assistants, who have to make the beds, and sweep and scour the rooms, get fourpence and twopence respectively.¹ Tailors and shoemakers are paid by the piece. A man gets a shilling for making a coat, and sixpence for a pair of trousers; but out of this he has to pay twopence to the cutter for each garment.

Gratuity
system.

This plan of giving small gratuities appears to answer remarkably well, and as the demand for work always exceeds the supply, it is put into other hands if badly done. Of the economy of the system there can be no doubt, as persons in the wards now earning fourpence a day perform the duties for which servants were paid £35 a year, and the whole cost of each inmate is now only £9 8s. 8¼d. In a moral point of view the system is excellent, as, amongst those who are still able to work, it keeps alive some feelings of self-respect, and tempers that sense of abject poverty which must embitter the thoughts of some, at all events, who are compelled to seek refuge in such an Asylum. They might all doubtless be compelled to give their services for their bread. "If any would not work neither should he eat" is doubtless good in theory, but we question whether it would be possible to carry this theory into practice in such an institution, without resorting to a system of coercion which, with such feeble old men, is revolting to our feelings of humanity. And in the case of the sick and infirm, who is to decide upon the limits of their incapacity? It is far better to attach such inducements to the work, and to apportion it out so wisely, that it is cheerfully undertaken and satisfactorily performed." Nearly all the clothes used in the Asylum, including boots and shoes, are made in the establishment, and all the vegetables except potatoes are grown in a garden, which appears excellently managed.² The vigour and energy displayed by the Surgeon-Superintendent and the Matron appear to have infused themselves into the very inmates; the tailors, shoemakers, and other workers, applying themselves with a cheerfulness and eagerness pleasant to witness. There is no restraint exercised preventing the inmates leaving the place, except in the case of very infirm old men, to whom the Superintendent sometimes refuses permission to go out, though they might all walk out in a body if they liked, and he could not prevent them. The discipline maintained by Dr. Strong, who has had considerable experience in the management of men, is at the same time excellent, and any insubordination is at once punished by expulsion. Dr. Strong is of opinion that power should be given him to refuse leave to those, who, either from blindness or other causes, are unfit to go out, as they simply wander about for a few days, get down to Sydney, and apply to the Board again for re-admission. This, though always granted to them, as they cannot be allowed to wander homeless and starving about the streets, is injurious to the discipline of the institution.

Additions and
quired.

Both Dr. Strong and Mrs. Burnside are of opinion that it would be more economical and more satisfactory if the bread required for the establishment were baked on the premises.³ In this opinion we concur. All the bread is at present sent up from Sydney in bags, and often getting very much tossed about in transit, is sometimes much broken and deteriorated.

If ovens were erected they would also serve for the purpose of roasting the meat at times for the inmates, all the meat at present being given to them boiled, which the Surgeon-Superintendent thinks undesirable.

We found the drying apparatus so much out of order that it could not be used, and that great inconvenience was experienced in consequence whenever the continuance of wet weather prevented the drying of the clothes in the sun. From the bad construction of the apparatus, an accident had occurred by which the whole place had nearly been set on fire.

We found the same complaint made here as in other institutions, of the great delay which takes place in getting all such matters attended to in the department having charge of them.¹

We saw no reason for supposing that the charity of the institution is imposed upon. An occasional malingerer may sometimes find his way in, but he is quickly detected by the Surgeon-Superintendent, and immediately expelled.

On the completion of the new wing, Dr. Strong is of opinion that if it is necessary to relieve the Infirmary of chronic incurable cases, they could be provided for at Liverpool to the number of about eighty or 100.²

A suggestion having been made that the labour of the inmates might be made reproductive by their employment in making up paper bags for the paper manufactory in the neighbourhood, we examined witnesses upon the subject, and it would appear from their evidence that the scheme was impracticable, as every inmate capable of doing anything was already fully engaged upon the work of the Asylum.³

We cannot however refrain from expressing our opinion that, as the labour required for this kind of work is very light, arrangements might be made for its being carried on. If the profits on the work were divided between the institution and the inmates, we have no doubt numbers would take interest in it, whilst the expense of the institution would be lessened. We are also of opinion that the adoption of this branch of industry in all our Charitable Institutions, where practicable, would be highly advantageous.

THE PARRAMATTA ASYLUM.

THIS Asylum for infirm destitute males is established in the old Military Barracks, Buildings. on the bank of the Parramatta River, and contained at the time of our inspection 265 inmates. The main building, which dates from the time of Governor Macquarie, is in a good state of preservation, but not very suitable for an Asylum, as the rooms are too low. They are however well ventilated, and the sanitary state of the institution, in the opinion of Dr. Rutter, the visiting medical officer, whose duties are efficiently discharged, is remarkably good. The out-buildings are not in such good repair, and the lavatory is altogether too small, and miserably found in the necessary appliances. We would recommend that a new range of outhouses be erected on the site of the present kitchen and lavatory. The supply of water to the institution is insufficient, and further provision should be made for storing it, as sometimes the supply has been so deficient that they have been compelled to bring it from the river above the dam. The extent of ground surrounding the Asylum is very small, and until lately there was none available for a garden. A small piece adjoining the institution has, however, lately been rented for the purpose, and the labour of the inmates should now supply the institution with vegetables.

The management by the Master, Mr. Dennis, is, we regret to say, not so Management. efficient as could be desired, and we find that this opinion is also entertained by the Board for the Control of the Government Asylums for the Infirm and Destitute, as well as by Mr. King, the present Inspector of Charities.⁴ The inmates are not as clean as they should be; and "the arrangements of the Asylum are not carried out in so orderly a manner as at Liverpool."⁵ The character of the building certainly will always always prevent the institution comparing favourably with the Liverpool Asylum, but this does not altogether account for the inferiority of its management, which must to some extent be attributed to the inefficiency of the Master.

Mr. Dennis, is assisted in the management of the Asylum by a Matron, the office being held by Mrs. Dennis. We did not find this officer in the institution on either of the occasions of our visiting it, and it would appear from the evidence that she is but little there. The unsatisfactory state of the Asylum may perhaps in some measure be attributed to this cause also.

All the work of the establishment is done by the inmates, the same gratuity system being in force here as at Liverpool, but there did not appear to us to be as much material made up for the use of the Asylum, nor the same amount of energy displayed by the working inmates as at that institution.

Rations.

On our visit of inspection several of the inmates complained that the ration of bread issued to them daily was deficient in weight. We therefore weighed some of the loaves, and on doing so found several of them under weight. A loaf is the ration of two men, being supposed to contain 2 lbs. In one instance we found a deficiency of 5 ounces. The master informed us that he had frequently had to find fault with the bread, and had reported on it to the Board, complaining both of its lightness and its quality.¹ We are disposed to think the system of allowing each inmate in the morning his full allowance of bread for the day bad, both on the score of economy and on the ground of its causing constant discontent and grumbling, as one man is not able to eat as much as another, and every one thinks he has less than his neighbour.

In the Benevolent Asylum at Melbourne the system has been abandoned for these reasons, and the bread in that institution is now put upon the table and every man helps himself to as much as he requires, but is allowed to carry none away.² It appears from the evidence that this system has proved in Melbourne far more economical than the one in force here, and we would therefore advise a trial of it, or the division of the men into messes.

Complaints by inmates.

A number of the men having made complaints to us respecting the management of the institution, it appears that they were afterwards turned out of the Asylum by Mr. Dennis for having done so.³ This conduct on his part we consider highly reprehensible, and indeed cruel, as one of the men was blind and utterly unable to earn a living.

Several charges affecting the Master's character for honesty having been made against him, it became our duty to inquire into them.

On investigation, it appeared to us that Mr. Dennis was, on the evidence given in support of the charges, entitled to an acquittal, though we think that the practice of receiving money from any of the inmates on any pretext by the Master of such an institution, one that should be altogether put a stop to, as open to great abuse. Whilst we acquit Mr. Dennis of the charge made against him, by a witness of the name of Harris, of fraudulently appropriating to his own use a sum of money belonging to one of the inmates who died in the institution, we must at the same time say that his explanation of the matter is unsatisfactory. Mr. Dennis admits that, a man having died in the Asylum in the possession of £22, he only forwarded £10 to the Board, without informing them that he had appropriated the sum of £12 to paying himself, as he now states, for medical comforts supplied by him to the inmate.⁴ On the most lenient view of the evidence given by the Master with respect to this transaction, it is impossible to avoid coming to the conclusion that he wished to mislead the Commission as to the manner in which the £12 really retained by him had been appropriated.

We observed several inmates who did not appear to us entitled to be maintained in such an institution, but we do not think that its charity is at present much abused.

The average cost of each inmate is £13 4s. 2½d.

THE INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB, AND THE BLIND.

THIS institution being to a small extent assisted by a Parliamentary vote, we made an inquiry into its management. We found it contained twenty-one deaf and dumb boys, and an equal number of girls of the same class, besides five blind boys and seven blind girls. The management appeared to us good, and we remarked nothing calling for particular notice. The institution is conducted on unsectarian principles, and, from its truly charitable character, is in every way deserving of public support.

CONCLUSION.

We cannot conclude our Report without acknowledging with thanks the assistance which has been afforded us by our able Shorthand Writer and Secretary. Nor can we sufficiently express our deep sense of the obligations which we are under for the valuable information and aid that has been rendered us in our investigations upon the subject of Reformatory and Industrial Schools and the Boarding-out System, by Miss Rosamond and Miss Florence Hill, whose opportune arrival in the Colony gave us the benefit of their evidence. Had we sent to England for the purpose of procuring witnesses practically acquainted with these subjects, we should have been unable to obtain any better able to give us the results of the latest experience in the Mother Country, and the matured judgment of the most earnest thinkers upon them. Miss Florence Hill, on account of her writings and her great practical acquaintance with the working of the Boarding-out System, is regarded at Home as an eminent authority on the question; and we congratulate ourselves that, in recommending the project to the thoughtful consideration of the Legislature and the Country, we have been able to do so upon the viva voce evidence of one who has devoted years to its promulgation, and whose name will be identified with its success.

We believe that none can render greater service than by laying the foundation of institutions by which the growth of pauperism in this young Country may be averted, and all the miseries of that terrible entail cut off without possibility of succession.

Whilst all honor is due to those who have assisted in bringing our Charitable Institutions to the degree of perfection in which we possess them, and who see reflected in them much time and labour, bestowed in the best and most generous spirit, it is the higher duty of those on whom is cast the responsibility of shaping the destinies of the Country and moulding its infant institutions, earnestly to inquire how far the efforts of the good are in harmony with the judgment of the wise, and to guide all charitable energies in accordance with the teachings of nature.

We

We have conducted our inquiry and made our recommendations in the earnest desire that our efforts may help to maintain the dignity of labour, and the preservation of that manly spirit of independence which itself refusing to accept charity, is ever ready to bestow it upon the wretched and the afflicted. We trust that the unhappy experiences of the Mother Country, in working out the most difficult of social problems presented in the spread of abject poverty side by side with the growth of great national prosperity, may long be spared us, and we believe that the adoption of such measures as are calculated to rescue our neglected children from misery and vice, and to rear them as helpful men and women, with individuality of character, and imbued with home feelings and independence of spirit, will most effectually tend to avert this danger and be blessed with success.

SUMMARY OF EVIDENCE.

ROMAN CATHOLIC ORPHAN SCHOOL, PARRAMATTA.

BUILDINGS.

MRS. ADAMSON states that the building is very inadequate, the dormitory accommodation for the children being insufficient—two more dormitories being required [234, 248, 267, 329]; that there is not sufficient accommodation for the officers, the matron having to sleep in her sitting-room [208]; that the water supply is good, but they have to pump it, the tanks being inadequate [140]; that the laundry and sleeping apartments are in a very bad state [215]; that she has been constantly sending requisitions for repairs to the Colonial Architect, which are never attended to [214]; that sixty-two boys sleep in a bed-room 82 x 18 [250], forty-four boys in a bed-room 52 x 19 [269], forty-three girls in a room 52 x 18, fifty-eight girls in a room 52 x 20, twenty-seven girls in a room 52 x 18, and thirty-three girls in a room 52 x 20 [329, 336]; that the drainage is bad [295]; and that though she has frequently applied for basins and baths for the girls' lavatory, none have been supplied [316-323]. THE VERY REV. S. J. A. SHEEHY says that the buildings are altogether too small for the number of children that are there [401]. MR. MULLENS thinks the accommodation should be increased; that the lavatory arrangements should be improved; that the sewerage is bad [518-524]; that the state of the buildings was a disgrace to the Government [553]; and that there is no proper bathing accommodation for the children [571]. MICHAEL O'SHEA, drill-master, says that the drainage is bad [825].

MANAGEMENT.

MRS. ADAMSON, Matron of the Roman Catholic Orphan School, states that she has the sole control of the establishment, but is responsible to the Government, never admitting or sending away a child without Government authority [2, 5]; that there is a Board, consisting of Mr. Hart, Mr. Curran, and the Vicar-General, appointed by the Government, who visit the institution, and to whom she furnishes reports [34-37]; but that she is directly responsible to the Government [33]; that she keeps her accounts in accordance with instructions she receives from the Inspector of Charities [20]; that returns are furnished to the Government monthly, and the books of account are subject to Government inspection [20, 43, 46]; that the Inspector of Charities had not visited the place for two years [64]; that the committee make visitations every three months and inspect the premises [65]; that there are under her in the institution a sub-matron, a teacher (a Sister of Charity), the infants' teacher, drill-master, a schoolmaster, two infirmary nurses, one nurse for the junior boys, two infant nurses, two laundresses, one housemaid, one cook, one seamstress, and a cook for the officers, also a baker, a woodcutter, and garden labourer; there is no storekeeper [129-136]; that one boy is employed as a messenger [153]; that the wearing apparel is supplied upon requisition to the Government storekeeper [38, 42, 52]; that the rations are supplied by contract [185]; that she is put to great inconvenience, being unable to get repairs done upon her own authority, and only upon requisition to the Colonial Architect [211]; that the institution is visited by Dr. Rutter [291]; and that the children's clothes are made in the Gaol, but cut out on the premises [339]. THE VERY REV. S. J. A. SHEEHY, Chairman of the committee for appointing children from the Roman Catholic Orphan School, states that the committee have no power to employ servants or anybody else, their functions being very limited, as they were defined some three or four years ago by the Colonial Secretary [370-373]; that the committee applied to the Government for leave to call for tenders for supplies, &c., believing that they could manage the institution more economically, but it was not allowed [411]; that the committee can neither refuse to admit children, but can only recommend [419]; that in the beginning the committee had the entire management of the place, but within the last four years the power was taken out of their hands by the Colonial Secretary, and that now they were in an anomalous position, visiting the place and having no control, simply exercising a general supervision [426-430 and App. C]; that the matron has charge of the place, and the committee has no power over the officers [432]; that the school was entirely supported by Government. MR. JAMES MULLENS, one of the committee of the Roman Catholic Orphan School, says that the committee hold meetings once a month, but have very little power; that they apprentice the children, but have no power of doing that without submitting their names to the Government; that they cannot admit a child, and have made applications for many things, but were not allowed to do anything [454-458]; that the matron in charge of the school takes a great interest in the children [469]; and that the whole of the officials do their duty [489]; that the committee exercises a supervision and inspects the institution, but cannot even engage or dismiss a servant, though they may report the matron to the Government if she refuses to send in a return [494-500]; that the committee had some powers at first, but they were taken away, and that though afterwards they were asked to resume their duties, those duties were never defined [501-504]; that the committee is appointed by the Government [511]; that the institution is very well managed, the matron having given her heart and soul to the good of the place [514-517]; that the success of the institution is owing to the care and diligence displayed by those in charge of it [539]; that the committee are a great assistance to the matron, and if they had more power could prevent many abuses [540]; that Mr. King, Inspector of Charities, immediately after his appointment, reported that the institution was dirty and badly managed, and that the children were dirty, but that afterwards the Governor,

Inmates.

MRS. ADAMSON says that the gold-diggings were the cause of many children entering the institution; that there are numbers of children whose fathers went away to the diggings and never returned [219]; that she cannot tell whether intemperance of parents has been a source of destitution to any great degree [223]; that there are some children in the institution whose mothers have re-married, but cannot be found; that there are few children there who have fathers, and the conduct of step-parents is often cruel; and that in some cases mothers who have re-married are immoral persons; that some mothers are quite unable to support their children, and many are unfit to control them [198-206]; that there are four inmates, Mary Murphy, aged 29, Elizabeth Flynn, aged 22, Margaret Gleeson, aged 19, and Michael Scofield, aged 18, who are retained because incapable of supporting themselves [119-127]; that sometimes children are taken out by parents and re-admitted [4, 16]; and that 300 is as many children as could be properly managed in any one institution, as it is necessary for the matron to know the character, &c., of each child [224]. SISTER MARY GERTRUDE, teacher, says that the children cannot be taught very much, as they leave the school very young [349]. THE VERY REV. S. J. A. SHEEHY says that he is not in favour of having a large number of children in one institution; that there are 300 in the Orphan School, and that is quite enough [399]; that if a mother is represented as able to support her child, he should hesitate to recommend its admission [418]; that in some cases women, though strong, might not be able to earn enough to support their children [422]; that though there might be some cases of imposition, as a general rule the parents were in distress and unable to support their children, and that every precaution was taken to ascertain that the cases were such as deserved relief [443]; that while he could not say whether intemperance was the cause of many parents' destitution, it mattered not what the cause of destitution was; that a small sum might be demanded from each parent for her child's support, but no one could collect the money but the police; and that no doubt some people were glad to get rid of their children, but the cases were not numerous [445-450]. MR. MULLEN says that children are sent to the school very young, and that they are well looked after [465-467]; that the successful bringing up of children depends on the domestic supervision [495]; that with more accommodation, 400 might be received into the school, but that 1,000 would be too many to have in one place [521-525]; that children should be admitted if there is room for them, whenever necessity arises [526]; and that he would limit the size of the institution, as the supervision could only be effective over a small number [529].

Admission and discharge of children.

MRS. ADAMSON states that she never admits or discharges a girl from the institution without Government authority; that the first thing is to get a notice from the parish priest that the child ought to be admitted, the certificate being sent down to the Vicar-General's Office, and thence to the Government; notice is sent to her, and then she admits the child; that the same course is pursued in discharging children; that sometimes mothers make complaints and get their children out on orders from the Colonial Secretary [5, 6]; that she keeps a registry of the children in the institution, which states the date of entry and where born, age, name of father, country to which he belongs, how long dead, &c.; that there is a separate entry for each child, and a record of all discharged [4]; that children taken out by their parents are sometimes re-admitted, and in one case a child was taken out twice and returned twice [7-16]; that such a course is injurious [16]; that sometimes children are apprenticed and returned to the institution again [19]; that she often traces the after-career of children who leave the institution, and is satisfied with the results attained, especially during the last seven years; that they are not apprenticed younger than twelve; that about thirty a year are apprenticed, and that not more than one in twenty have turned out badly [68-74]; that if the children are not comfortable when they are apprenticed, they apply to the committee, through the parish priest, and either the children are returned or differences are settled [81-84]; that they are in frequent communication with parties to whom children are apprenticed, and the reports are generally satisfactory [86]; that there is no difficulty in apprenticing the children, the supply not being equal to the demand; that persons who have taken children frequently apply for others; and that they prefer sending apprentices into the country rather than to Sydney [105-107]; that the accounts of the girls who have been apprenticed are more satisfactory than those of the boys [176]; that there is no rule requiring mothers when they have re-married to take their children, but as a general rule they do so [196]; that there is no method of finding out whether a mother is able to support her children or not [203]; that the children after they leave the institution get into good positions and do well [207]; that when a boy is apprenticed, notice is sent to the priest of the parish that the boy is under his care [246]; that when a child is apprenticed, the person to whom it is sent has to pay £3 a year during its apprenticeship, the money at the end of the term being given to the child; that some of the mothers had a great fancy for getting this money, and in order to prevent them from doing so it was put to the credit of the Vicar-General in the Savings Bank; that there are only five fathers of children in the institution living; that children are seldom apprenticed in Sydney, and that girls are seldom sent out under the age of fifteen [309-315]. SISTER MARY GERTRUDE says that she often gets letters from the girls after they leave the school, and is able to trace their after-career [352-355]. THE VERY REVEREND S. J. H. SHEEHY states that in many cases he has traced the career of children after they left the school, it being part of his duty to make inquiries respecting them; that when a child is apprenticed he always informs the priest of the district of the fact, and commits the child to his care, but that no official record is kept of what becomes of the child after it leaves its situation [360-363]; that it is hard to say whether they have been more successful with boys than with girls, but then under 3 per cent. of the children turn out badly [365]; that there are always more applications for children than can be complied with; that the majority are sent to the country; that those who are sent to Sydney are as far as possible apprenticed to tradespeople [369]; that only children over twelve years of age are apprenticed [375]; that those who receive children are bound by the Act to look after them closely, but children are not always well treated, and have sometimes made just complaints; that if a well-founded complaint is made by a child, the employer is cautioned or the child is removed; if the complaint is ill-founded the child is reprimanded; that children are sometimes returned for misbehaviour, but not often [385, 390]; that that they are apprenticed for seven years; that £3 a year is paid by the persons to whom they are apprenticed, who find the children in clothes besides; that on the termination of the apprenticeship the money is handed over to the children without any deduction, and the children have no more to do with them [392, 398]; that the committee do not admit or refuse, but simply recommend children; that all precautions are taken to ascertain that the children are such as should be admitted, the recommendation being given by a clergyman or some other person [443]; but that the clergymen are sometimes imposed upon by the representations of parents [444]. MR. MULLENS says that the committee apprentice the children, but have no power to do that without first submitting their names to the Government, nor can they admit a child [454]; that the children have been well provided for on the whole; that there are plenty of applications for them; that they are sent there young, and apprenticed out at twelve and thirteen years of age [464, 466]; that there is always somebody looking after them when they are apprenticed [471]; that £3 a year are paid by masters into the Savings Bank to the credit of the Chairman of the committee; that the money accumulates; that the money is paid to the children when they finish their apprenticeship, so that a boy who serves seven years gets £21 at the end of his term; that formerly the money was paid to the children's own credit, and a great many lost it, being induced by the mothers to draw it out; if a master falls in arrears with his fees he is written to and made to pay; that, when applications are made, the committee see that the applicants are proper persons to be entrusted with children, and if they decide in his favour they send him a copy of the rules, which he has to sign and return [577-584]; that two of the committee sign the indentures [585 & Appendix D]; that they apprentice the boys to good trades, but do not give the children any choice [586, 590]; that they do not like to send children to the bush, where they would not be able to go to church; that it is the system that the clergymen of the district should look after them [594-596 & Appendix D 1]; that if a boy does not suit one master they send him to another, and if he is improperly treated the committee interfere [596]. MICHAEL O'SHEA says that the children are sometimes sent away at twelve years of age to situations [850].

MRS. ADAMSON says that the children are not taught any trades on the place, except one boy apprenticed to the gardener and another to the baker, and one boy and one girl to the teachers [108-111]; that with the exception of an hour's religious teaching, the instruction they receive in the school is purely secular [116]; that the children go to prayers for a quarter of an hour in the morning [112]; receive religious instructions from 9 to 10 [115]; that at the beginning of school there are prayers, and after school the Rosary, and then the sisters instruct the children for half an hour [147]; that they say their prayers aloud in bed at night, but the form of prayer is not printed, but depends on the sister's choice [149-151]; that she has one boy employed as a messenger [153]; and the children assist in the work of the place—cutting up wood, &c. [160]; that the bigger boys all go to the farm to work [164]; that there is no means of teaching them trades, as they are for the most part so very ignorant when they enter the institution [167]; that nearly all the vegetables required for the institution are grown on the farm, and that there has been a great saving in milk and vegetables [169-173]; that there are children in the school every day but Saturday, which is a holiday [238]; that the children rise at 5 in the summer; that the bigger ones assist in the household work before breakfast; the prayer-bell rings at a quarter to 7; they breakfast at 7:30; at 9 they go into school; they are in school until 12; have dinner at 12:30; go into school again at 2; come out at 4, have tea at 5, and after prayers they go to bed at half-past 7 [275-283]; that there is an average of 111 girls attending school [310]. SISTER MARY GERTRUDE says that she has no one to assist in the school except the children of the higher classes, and she has been in charge of the school for four years; that she was not engaged in tuition before she became a nun; that she had not been in a training school—such a thing not being necessary; that she was acquainted with the mode of teaching adopted in the Public Schools; that the school was regularly inspected; that the children could not be taught very much, as they were apprenticed out young [344-349]. THE VERY REV. S. J. A. SHEEHY states that it was the desire of the committee to teach the children trades, but they had no power to appoint teachers, and had not been able to do it [370]; that great good would be effected if there were facilities for training the children in the institution; that there was a farm attached to the institution, but there was no means of teaching the children to cultivate it, though they worked there [402]; that they are engaged in school duties and cannot be taught much in trades, but if they were taught trades the expenses would be much lessened [423, 424]. MR. MULLENS says, that the children work on the farm, under the supervision of the gardener and the drill-master; that the boys cultivate the farm, cut wood, and are always doing something; that they cannot be taught trades, as they are sent out of the school when they are old enough [555, 559]; that if there were persons to instruct them the labour of the children might be turned to profitable account [563]; that he has seen the girls sewing in the institution [574]; that the boys are not taught to milk, as they are too young [602-605]. TIMOTHY BRYAN, gardener, states that the farm contains fifty-nine or sixty-nine acres, of which about five acres are under cultivation, and that the school is fully supplied with all kinds of vegetables except potatoes; that there are six cows, a bull, and a horse kept on the farm, and about eight quarts of milk are sent to the school daily; that the garden is manured with manure obtained in exchange for fire-wood [613-627, 646]; that one boy is employed constantly on the farm, and that four boys from the school attend daily—a different set being sent every week [628, 651]; that an interval of six weeks elapses before the turn of any set of boys recurs [652]; that there is not enough labour to keep the land in order [664]; that the boys come early in the morning, go back to breakfast and dinner, and return to school for the day at 5 in the afternoon [665]; that he would prefer to have some boys there constantly, but the matron objects, as they would lose their schooling [669]; that the employment of another farm labourer would be of great advantage to the institution [676]; that there are seven or eight pigs, which are killed from time to time for the use of the school [678]; that there is very little ploughing done, and the boys might be taught to plough, but not to stump the brush land [685, 691]; and that the boy who is apprenticed to him is allowed the usual ration [693]. MICHAEL O'SHEA, drill-master, says that the boys are regularly drilled daily, with the exception of Saturday; that he sees the boys rise at 6 o'clock in the morning, and supervises their performance of various household duties—some clean floors and scrub the tables, go for milk, &c.; that after breakfast they go to various works, and those not working are mustered and sent into school; that they are drilled at noon; that nine boys learn music under him; that he does not supervise the boys who work on the farm, except when sent there specially to cut wood; that all the big boys go to the farm in batches of four, turn and turn about; that he would not have time to supervise the digging, as he teaches music daily for an hour and three-quarters, and writes music for them, and has also to attend attend to the marking and sorting of the clothes and to go on errands [788-821]; that one boy is apprenticed to the gardener and one to the baker, but there is no tailoring or shoemaking taught on the premises [830]; that the fuel is supplied by contract, only a portion being got from the school land [837]; that in summer-time twelve boys go to the farm daily for two hours and a half [846]; that the boys could be taught shoemaking and carpentering, but that it would be unprofitable to the institution to instruct them in trades [853-871]; and that the children are in school for five hours a day.

Sanatory condition.

MRS. ADAMSON says the institution is so healthy that the doctor's position is almost a sinecure; that there were eight cases of scarlatina in the beginning of 1873; that there were only ten children in the infirmary, most of them with trifling hurts, on 14th June, 1873; that there is a bad smell in the hospital, from a sewer which drains the Lunatic Asylum and Gaol [289-296]; that some years ago there was much sickness, which was attributed to bad drainage, but there was none lately; that at the time of her examination (14 June, 1873) there had been no death since the previous November, in which month a delicate child died from decline; that the water is good [140-146]; that the dormitories are over-crowded [235-259-273-330]; and that there is not sufficient lavatory accommodation [323]. MR. MULLENS says that as far as baths go, there is no accommodation for the children, and it is a wonder they are so well [571]. MICHAEL O'SHEA speaks of the stench from the sewers, and says that though the Colonial Architect tried to remedy it, there was no improvement [825].

Diets.

The children, according to MRS. ADAMSON'S evidence, are allowed per day 8 ozs. meat, 13 ozs. flour, 4 ozs. vegetables, $\frac{1}{4}$ oz. tea, 1 oz. sugar, $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. soap, 1 gill milk, $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. butter, cheese, honey, or treacle, $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. rice, $\frac{1}{4}$ oz. suet, $\frac{1}{4}$ oz. rasins per child [177 and Appendix A]; that the children on Fridays get fish, rice, and potatoes, and sometimes dumplings and vegetables [80]; that the rations are on the same scale at the Protestant Orphan School [79]; that she sometimes, to give them a pudding, overdraws flour and underdraws meat; that the allowance stated is the quantity of raw meat; that the quality of the food supplied is good, though the meat has been occasionally inferior; that returns of the daily rations issued are sent in to the Government monthly; that the scale of rations for the officers is—16 ozs. meat, 19 ozs. flour, 16 ozs. vegetables, $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. tea, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ ozs. sugar, $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. salt, $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. soap, 1 gill milk; that the matron and female teachers and attendants only get 16 ozs. flour; that there is no stint of vegetables [177-192]; that the children have tea and bread and butter for breakfast, and that they did not like porridge or coffee [240]. TIMOTHY BRYAN says that the boy who is apprenticed to him is allowed the same ration as he receives himself [693].

Revenue and expenditure. System of accounts, &c.

THE VERY REV. S. J. A. SHEEHY says that the school is entirely supported by the Government, at a cost of little more than £13 per head per year; and that if the committee were allowed to call for tenders, &c., for supplies, the place might be less expensively managed [410-414]. MRS. ADAMSON states that the cost per head per year of the children is £13 17s. 9d., made up as follows in 1872:—Salaries, food, and contingencies for 308 children, £3,360 ls. 6d., or £10 18s. 2d. per head; clothing, &c., £918 4s., or £2 19s. 7d. per head; total, £13 17s. 9d. per head; that the expenses of the farm in 1872 were £69 18s., and the receipts therefrom equal to £150 5s. 2d. [Appendix A 2]; that she keeps registers in which are recorded all admissions and discharges, &c.; a medical comforts book, which is made up each month, showing wine biscuits, &c., on hand issued and received; daily issue book, showing the persons to whom food is issued each day; two ledgers, showing the state of the contract account; a monthly report book; a requisition book, showing the wearing apparel, &c., supplied, issued, and on hand [19-44]; that an account of everything used goes to the Government, and every bill passes through the Audit Office; that the returns furnished of the number of children check the issue of goods; that the books and stock are open to Government inspection [43-48]; that sometimes the requisitions are reduced [48-53]; that she keeps wearing apparel but not blankets in store; that the Government Inspector sometimes inspects the books, but had not been there for two years, but the committee visit the place every three months [57-65]; that formerly the supply of rations was insufficient and she had to overdraw, and they tried to make her pay £100 out of her own pocket [79]; that she herself is the storekeeper, and when she is engaged the submatron attends to it [131]; and that there was £500 voted for repairs in 1872, and the money went back into the Treasury because the Colonial Architect said he had not time to attend to the matter [214]. MR. MULLENS says that the committee have no funds at their disposal [458]; that at one time the committee had power to build, &c., and the accounts were sent in to the Government [490]; that the cost per head per year of the children is something like £13, and that the committee could manage the place for less than that if they had power to contract for the supplies [564-570].

Results of institution.

MRS. ADAMSON says that the after-career of children educated in the school has been in most cases satisfactory; that about thirty per year are apprenticed, not one in twenty of whom turn out ill; that numbers come to visit her after they have been placed out in the world [68-72]; that children are very seldom returned; that last year (1872) only one boy ran away from his place, which was not a nice place [82-85]; that she frequently hears from the apprentices and their employers, and the reports are generally satisfactory [86]; that there is no difficulty in finding places for the children [105]; that the accounts of the girls who have been apprenticed are more satisfactory than the accounts of the boys [176]; and that the children get into good positions, and become respectable, well-to-do men and women [207]. SISTER MARY GERTRUDE says that she often receives letters from children after they have left the school, and that most of them get on very well [352]. THE VERY REV. S. J. A. SHEEHY says that the results of the institution have been good, though some children have not turned out well; that he has traced their after-career in many cases [360-361]; that it is hard to say whether there has been more success with boys than with girls, but the proportion of those which have not done well has been under 3 per cent. [364]; that complaints have been made as to children not being properly cared for by their masters, and in some cases the child has been removed, and that some children have been returned on the ground of misbehaviour [385-390]; and that on the termination of a child's apprenticeship, the committee have no more to do with it [393]. MR. MULLENS says that, as far as his experience goes, the children had been well provided for, though some few had not turned out well [464]; that they do not like to send the children too far into the bush where they could not go to church; and that it is the duty of each clergyman to see how the children sent into his district get on, and to send in reports on the subject [592-594 and Appendix D 1.]

PROTESTANT

PROTESTANT ORPHAN SCHOOL.

BUILDINGS.

MR. E. M. BETTS, late master of the Protestant Orphan School, says that there have been three new buildings recently erected in connection with the institution, at a cost of about £3,300 [1000]; and that there is often great difficulty in getting requisitions for repairs attended to by the Colonial Architect's department [994]. MRS. BETTS, matron of the institution, says there is not room for more than 250 children without overcrowding; that the schoolrooms are new, and would hold a larger number [6780-6809]; that if there were increased dormitory accommodation the dining-rooms would have to be enlarged also, if the number of inmates were increased; that if 200 more children were taken into the school every part of the building would have to be enlarged, except the schoolrooms [6845], and that the site is good [6777].

GENERAL MANAGEMENT.

MR. E. M. BETTS says that the matron is at the head of the institution, and that he held the position of clerk and storekeeper (under the title of master) for nine years; that there was a schoolmaster and a drillmaster under his supervision [884-895]; that the schoolmaster has charge of the boys in the school, and selects those who work in the garden, while the drillmaster has charge of them out of school [907-926]; that the institution is under trustees, consisting of Mr. James Byrnes, Mr. Halloran, and the matron; that the trustees are appointed to apprentice the children according to law, and have no other powers, and never visit the establishment [970-978]; that the trustees have not met frequently of late years [1013]; that the Inspector of Charities was supposed to visit the place, but had not done so for eighteen months, and that the school was regularly inspected by an officer of the Council of Education [1023], and that the schoolmaster and mistress are as competent persons as could be obtained for the department, keeps the books, and sees to the out-door work generally [6627]; that the trustees, Mrs. Betts, small salaries they receive [1036]. MR. WHITLING, master, says that he issues stores, looks after the boys' Mr. Halloran, and Mr. Byrnes, meet when required at the institution [6740]; that the goods are supplied by contract, that Mrs. Betts checks all the accounts, which are sent in to the Government and paid [6743-6750]; and that an account is kept of all money contributed by parents to their children's support [6755]. MRS. BETTS says she has been matron of the institution for upwards of twenty-two years [6768]; that some parents are required to contribute to their children's support [6825]; and that formerly applications for apprentices were taken in rotation, but that was altered, as the trustees desired to have some discretion as to the disposal of the children [6843].

MR. E. M. BETTS says that he knows all the boys by name, and that if a mother applies for her children, they are given up to her unless she is a bad character [1020-1022]; that there is one young man in the institution who has weak eyes, and is not quite right in his head, and who cannot be apprenticed out [902]; that not more than one apprentice per year out of about twenty-five is returned; and that the school contains 250 children [986]. MR. WHITLING says there are 149 boys in the school [6650]; that some of the children are only three years old [6659]; that there is one child both of whose parents are living, but whose father is a cripple [6698]. MRS. BETTS says there are 239 children in the institution [6779]; that about 60 per cent. have mothers living, about 10 per cent. have fathers living, about 25 per cent. have neither father nor mother, and about 5 per cent. have both parents living [6813]; that mothers are not allowed to remove their elder children and leave the young ones in the institution [6815]; that there are twenty-one only children in the place, and of that number only one parent contributes to the child's support, that some of the parents are lunatics or in gaol, and that there is a good deal of imposition which is hard to trace [6819 and Note]; that she had recently taken in a family of five; that seeing the dress of some mothers who came to visit children, one would be surprised at their being the recipients of charity; that she believes many mothers are able to support their children, and that nine do contribute; that women who remarry generally take their children away; that some of the mothers are dress-makers, house-keepers, and so on, generally from Sydney, and there are not many illegitimate children [6820-6836]; that she had received one or two girls who were not virtuous, and had one sent in lately who had lived with a Chinaman, but who was tractable and easily managed, and had done no harm to the other girls [6871-6874].

MRS. BETTS states that the children are admitted and discharged upon the order of the Colonial Secretary [6836]; that sometimes children are taken out by their mothers [6830]; that she had suggested to the Government the expediency of altering the law under which the children were apprenticed, as the payments made to the apprentices were too small, as there is no means of securing payment, and as the Act is full of contradictions, but Mr. Byrnes did not approve of her suggestions; that one Act says female apprentices can be punished for three days, and another for three months; that the Roman Catholics have no better Act than the Protestants, but that the trustees of the R. C. Orphan School act on their own responsibility, get better pay for their apprentices and look after them more; that the applications for apprentices are not taken in rotation, but considered with reference to the welfare of the children; that, in 1857, the defects of the law were shown to the Government [6838-6860, and Appendix P 1]; that there is no supervision over the children after they quit the school, and if complaints are made the parties cannot be reached [6848]; that as a rule the children do well, often come back to see her, and in spite of the small pay they receive generally serve out their apprenticeship in one place; that they sometimes do not get their pay at all, though it should be paid into the Savings' Bank yearly; that sometimes the masters keep it until the end of the time, thus depriving the apprentice of the interest; that she has no control over the money when it is put into the Savings' Bank, and that the Act is silent on the subject [6851-6358]; and that in remote districts the police ought to look after the apprentices and see that they had proper clothing, &c. [6863].

MR. E. M. BETTS says that when he was master of the institution it was his business to see that the schoolmaster did his duty; that he used to examine his programmes and see that he kept his time-table, but did not test his efficiency, though he used to hold examinations and give prizes; that the Inspector of the Council of Education inspects the school twice a year; that the boys were not taught trades of any sort, but that two or three of them work in the garden, one regularly, and others selected from day to day by the schoolmaster; that they were not taught gardening [895-913]; that the drill-master sees that the boys rise early and bathe; that they make their beds, wash their dormitories, and are then taken to breakfast; that after breakfast they are sent into school at 9 o'clock; and at noon the drillmaster takes charge charge of them again and superintends any that may work in the "boys' garden"—a small garden set apart for the boys [915]; after seeing the boys into school the drillmaster is off duty until noon, but is not supposed to be idle, but does nothing between 9 and 12; is on duty between 12 and 2; takes the boys in to meals and works in the garden from 2 to 4; that the boys' garden is set apart for the amusement of the boys, and the drillmaster works there and not in the other garden; that the boys are drilled between 4 and 5; are allowed to go out and play until 8:30 p.m., when they go to bed; that the drillmaster is on duty until 9 p.m., when he locks up [918-933]; that the boys who are sent to work in the garden work for one day only, at intervals of about eight days, the class being taken in routine; that he directed the schoolmaster to send the strongest boys; that in wet weather there would be no boys in the garden; they are not taught any work but digging; that they used to chop wood, but it was found not to answer; that they clean their panikins; that there is a wood-cutter who pumps water, looks after the horses and cuts wood; that another man milks the cows; that the farm is not cultivated, but some green barley is grown in the garden for the cows; that there are 106 acres on the farm, but that most of it is useless; that the cows supply enough milk for the institution [934-968]; that the children are taught morning and evening prayers, and say them aloud in their dormitories; that school is opened and closed with prayer [1002-1007]; that the girls work in the kitchen, but are not taught cooking; that they are taught sewing and washing, and make their own clothes [1029-1032]; that the schoolmaster and mistress are quite as competent as can be got for the salaries which they receive [1036]; that the progress of the children fluctuated, and they sometimes got on better than at others [1040]; that he did not think it would be advisable to have some tradesmen to teach the boys trades, as in a small establishment there was no economy in such a system; and that the boots and shoes for the institution only cost about £180 per year, or from 3s. 6d. to 4s. 6d. per pair [1041-1046]. MR. WHITLING says that if the school were larger the children might be taught trades, but that such a system would not be advantageous at present; that they do as much gardening as is necessary; that the boys did not cut any wood, as there was a man employed for that purposes; that if the children were taken out of school and set to work they would learn nothing; that most of them are too small to work; that there is one boy who works regularly in the garden, but that no boys are apprenticed to the baker of the institution [6631-6645]; that the boots and shoes cost only £150 per year; that the boys clean their dormitories and do all the work on their side, and some of the big ones dig in the garden [6656]. MRS. BETTS says that she had suggested formerly that the school should be made a kind of nursery, from which the children should be removed when old enough to some place in which they could be taught trades [6771]; that the young children go to bed at 6 p.m. in the winter and 7:30 in the summer; that the elder boys sit up to read and the elder girls to sew; that the boys have a reading-room where they are under the supervision of the drillmaster; that there are separate libraries for boys and girls; that the girls make a great part of their own clothes; that neither girls nor boys are taught to milk, as they would spoil the cows; that the boys do not cut up wood; that the girls make part of the boys' clothing and part of their own, but not trousers, as there are so few old enough to work [6782-6812].

Diets.

Mr. E. M. BETTS says that the children are allowed for breakfast, bread, butter or treacle, and tea; bread and tea for supper; and for dinner, roast mutton four days a week, soups and boiled meat twice a week, and pies or Irish stew once a week—usually on Friday; that they are allowed 1 lb. of bread per day [1025]. MR. WHITLING says that children in the hospital are allowed a double ration of butter and treacle [6742]. MRS. BETTS says that the ration allowed to the children is large enough, but that the allowance to the attendants is too small—that the ration of tea, sugar, and meat should be increased [6877].

Sanatory condition.

MR. BETTS says the school is supposed to contain 250 children, which is about the limit fixed, for sanitary reasons, by Drs. Pringle and Bassett [990]. MRS. BETTS says that the institution would not hold more than 250, and contains 239; that the site is healthy for young children; that there has been no illness lately, and no death since February, 1870 [6,777].

Revenue and expenditure; system of accounts.

MR. BETTS says the institution is supported by the Government; that the new buildings recently erected there cost about £3,300; that the salaries of the teachers are too small; that the boots and shoes cost £180 per year, and could not be made more cheaply on the place [1,001, 1,036, 1042]. MR. WHITLING says that when the attendants require articles from the store they bring the worn out articles and he gives them new ones in exchange; that there is a stock book in which each issue is initiated by the person receiving the goods [6,628]; that there are 149 children in the school, who are maintained at a cost of £15 per head [6,650]; that money is received from some parents; that the Treasury pay so much to Mrs. Betts' account and she draws upon it; that the accounts are all approved by the Audit Office, where they are checked, and if any money extra is wanted for repairs, authority for it has to be got from the Colonial Secretary and forwarded to the Treasury; that every person signs for what they receive; that he uses his own judgment in the issue of fresh supplies; that soap is issued to the laundress every morning and the attendants every week, and that the allowance cannot be exceeded; that stock is taken every six months, but there is no stock ledger; that in sending in requisitions to Government, they give date of last supply, quantity on hand, and quantity required; that the Inspector of Charities had not inspected the books; that the quantity of flour issued to the baker is made up every month; that there is a medical comforts book showing the extras issued; that there is a daily ration book by which the contractor's account is checked; that copies of all the contractor's accounts are kept; that Mrs. Betts issues the clothing and soft goods, and the storekeeper the hardware; that Mrs. Betts checks the bills and then they are paid; that the amounts received from contributing parents are entered in a cash-book and paid over to the Government; that the regular contractor's accounts are sent to Mr. Brennan, who pays them out of the Stores and Stationery Vote, but the other accounts are paid out of the Vote for Salaries and Contingencies [6700-6706-6716-6731-6765]. MRS. BETTS says that the Government wholly supports the school [6777]; that the girls, in 1872, made 1,715 new articles of clothing, besides doing all the mending of the institution [6795 and Appendix P]; that there are nine mothers paying 2s. 6d. per week towards their children's support [6824]; that the money is paid to her, and she pays it into the Treasury; and that latterly mothers have executed a bond to secure payment of the contributions [6828].

RESULTS OF INSTITUTION.

MR. BETTS says that many of the boys have turned out well, but that those who go to private service never do so well as those who go to a trade; that the Acts under which the children are apprenticed are contradictory and want revising [979]; that he hears a good deal of the children after they leave the school, school, used to correspond with them, knows many who have done very well indeed, and of some girls having been married, but not many [1008-1012]; that the law as to the payment and supervision of apprentices needs alteration [1035]. MR. WHITLING says that they sometimes get letters from the children who have left the institution; that there is no control over them after they leave [6647-6649]. MRS. BETTS says that the trustees of the Roman Catholic Orphan School look after their children when apprenticed out better than the trustees of her school can do; that the children from the Roman Catholic School are placed under the care of the priests of the districts, while Protestant clergymen would not take the trouble to look after children [6860]; that the Roman Catholic children are well looked after [6861]; that many of the children have worked themselves up into respectable positions; that there is one now a surveyor attached to the Survey Department and getting a large salary; that many have property of their own, and are in respectable positions; that she had only reckoned up ten girls who had gone to the bad after leaving school, and of those ten four had retrieved themselves and turned out respectable women; that one girl who had been returned to the school for ill-behaviour had been since sent to the matron of the Female Refuge, where she gave great satisfaction, and that her wrong-doing in the first instance was the fault of her mistress, who allowed her to go out, and when she was not home in time locked her out all night; and that of the ten previously referred to, four had been led astray by members of their master's family [6865-6876].

RANDWICK DESTITUTE CHILDREN'S ASYLUM.

BUILDINGS.

MR. JOHN M. MAY, Superintendent of the Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum, said that he took charge of the institution in June, 1858, soon after it was removed from Paddington to Randwick [1582]; that the Government gave an amount equal to the Cuthill bequest of £12,000 towards the erection of the buildings, and a further sum of £10,000 towards the erection of the south wing, and about £2,000 towards the Catherine Hayes Hospital; that the land is a grant from the Crown, and is 100 acres in extent; that the Government gave £1,000 towards the master's residence, which cost altogether £1,400 [1593-1601]; that there have been erected steam machinery, cooking and washing apparatus; and that a large tank, holding 250,000 gallons of water, has been cut out of the solid rock [1607]; and that the apparatus for cooking by steam economizes labour and fuel [1845]. DR. NOTT says that the sanatory arrangements of the place are satisfactory, the accommodation being sufficient, the site healthy, the drainage good, and the hospital possessing every convenience [1463-1466-1470-1477]. MR. MONKLEY says that there is not room in the tailors' workshop for more than ten apprentices [2004]. MR. BARDON says that the shoemakers' shop is a very small place, and that more room is required [1984]. CAPTAIN McLERIE says that if there were another wing added to the buildings, there would be room there for 1,200 children [7574]. THE HON. E. DEAS THOMSON says the site is admirable, and the grounds well selected and well managed; and that the hospital is larger than is needed [7622-7623]. MRS. BRISCOE finds great fault with the buildings, which she describes as "incommodious," the children having to go from the top into the basement in order to bathe and wash themselves [8006].

GENERAL MANAGEMENT.

MR. MAY says that the institution is governed by a Board of directors, consisting of about thirty members (exclusive of life directors) from whom is elected a house committee of thirteen members; that the house committee meet weekly, except when the general committee meet, which they do monthly; that the Board delegate their powers largely to the house committee; that the Board is elected yearly by subscribers to the institution; that there are about forty life directors, so that the Board really consists of about seventy persons; that the average attendance of members is from fifteen to twenty, and at house committee meetings from eight to ten; that the Board would be unwieldly if all its members attended; that the Government is not in any way represented on the Board; that sub-committees are sometimes appointed for special services [1614-1640]; that as far as revenue is concerned the institution is practically a Government one, but that he could not give any opinion as to whether the Board should be reduced [1798]. DR. NOTT says that he sometimes goes to the committee meetings, but never knows what takes place there, and has nothing to do with the general discipline [1508]. CAPTAIN McLERIE says that he was one of the original founders of the institution, but had withdrawn from the committee some time ago, because the original objects were not carried out; that the size of the committee had been increased, and is now too large; that not a meeting occurs without some sectarian squabble taking place; that there is a tendency to waste time; that the committee should be composed wholly of laymen, that the Government should be represented, and that the chairman should be responsible to Government for the expenditure; that the representation on the Board should be apportioned between the Government and the subscribers pro rata according to the contributions; that formerly the committee consisted of Dr. Douglas, Dr. Ross, Archdeacon M'Encroe, Mr. Dowling, and himself, with Mr. Stephen as Secretary, and that not one of those gentlemen was now on the directory [7572-7582-7593]. THE HON. E. DEAS THOMSON says that it is a mistake to have so many persons on the Board; that under the rules the minimum number of members is sixty-one, and might be increased to nearly the number of the Legislative Assembly; that where a committee is so numerous, there are seldom two meetings composed of the same persons, and agreement is difficult [7624]; that there is too great a division of responsibility, and too much discussion [7626]; that no practical difficulty has arisen from the presence of clergymen [7628]; that the house committee attend to all matters of detail; that a reduction in the size of the Board would be likely to cause a falling off in the subscriptions, and that the Government should be represented [7630-7636]. MR. WYNNE says that the admission of clergymen to the directory is injurious to the institution, and makes it an arena for sectarian bickerings [7774]; that the Board is too large; that the management rests pretty well with the house committee, but that the Board has complained of the house committee having too much control [7784, 7785]. MR. G. F. WISE says he has been hon. secretary since January, 1872, was treasurer for four and a half years previously, and a director in 1866 [8067]; that the management has gone on well; that too many directors do not attend the meetings; that the governing body is the house committee; that the chief management rests in the hands of the house committee; that the Board is the governing body; that the Board consists of twenty-three directors, and that life directors, of which there are about forty, are permitted to vote but do not [8073-8079]; that there are some forty life directors who have a right to attend [8081]; that some some live in England and others out of the Colony, and others out of Sydney; that there are twenty-two life directors in Sydney; that they may attend meetings but it is not their duty to do so; that, in his opinion, the Board consists only of the directors chosen at the annual meeting; that the committee is not too large; that the presence of clergymen on the Board is undesirable and has caused disputes [8082-8097]; that the time is not wasted in squabbling, though people may form such an opinion; that he has heard business men complain of the time wasted in squabbles, and that these disputes drive them away from the meetings [8102-8106]. MISS PROBERT, matron, says that there are some lady visitors who visit the institution, but who have not been there for some time; that she wished to go round with these ladies when they made their visits, and appealed to the committee on the subject, thus offending the ladies; that she was dismissed in consequence, but re-appointed [9591-9605]. MR. COULTER says that in Bathurst when canvassing for subscriptions he met with some opposition, and he attributed it to a Roman Catholic Priest there saying that the institution was a sectarian establishment where children were prepared for gaol [10190].

Supervision.

MR. MAY says he has had charge of the institution since June, 1858, and receives a salary of £350 per year, with residence, fuel, light, and six rations for himself and family; that his family do not assist in the management; that there are under him a matron, three assistant matrons, schoolmistress, infant schoolmistress, three assistant schoolmistresses, two hospital nurses, three seamstresses, one hospital attendant, one head laundress, three laundresses, eight attendants, eleven apprentice girls, one assistant superintendent, one schoolmaster, one assistant schoolmaster, one bandmaster, one clerk and storekeeper, one engineer, one master bootmaker, one master carpenter, one master tailor, one officer in charge of hospital, one farm overseer, one farm servant, one gardener, one carter, one attendant, one herdsman, and thirty apprentice boys; that the other officers of the institution are—medical officer, accountant, two chaplains, clerk, and collector [1582-1589, and Appendix H]; that the institution is under the supervision of a house committee, chosen from a general Board of directors, and that the Inspector of Charities has visited the place once [1614-1640]; that only one of the school-teachers is certificated, but there is now a rule that any teacher appointed must produce a certificate [1642]; that the schools are not inspected by the Council of Education's inspectors, but the directors have appointed the chaplains and himself to examine the children [1647-1656]; that the matron supervises the domestic arrangements, but that he is responsible for the efficient discharge of duty by all the officers [1781-1783]; that the present matron was removed by the Board some years ago on account of a complaint made against her, but was restored to her situation within a fortnight [1786-1792]; and that the management at Randwick is superior to that of similar institutions in Victoria and Tasmania [1809-1813]. DR. NOTT, the visiting medical officer, says that he visits the place three times a week regularly, and is liable to be called there at any time [1461]. MR. BARDON, the master shoemaker, says he has thirteen apprentices under him [1891]. MR. MONKLEY, the master tailor, has four apprentices under him, and says five is the greatest number he ever had [1991]; and that he could teach ten nicely [2002]. MRS. BETTS says that at Randwick they give every boy a printed instruction book when he leaves the institution [6858]. THE HON. E. DEAS THOMSON says that the children are well taught, and brought up both as to ordinary education and trades [7621]; that the management is good, great kindness and consideration being shown to the children [7658]; that a good deal of attention is paid to the examination of the children in the schools, but that there could be no objection to their being inspected by officers of the Council of Education [7664]. MR. G. F. WISE says he does not think the institution over-officered [8142]; that the institution is cheaply managed [8155]; that the committee do not interfere with the doctors in their decisions as to whether children should be admitted [8164]; that the collector visits the children who are apprenticed out [8305]. MR. PEARCE says that there are not too many officers, and that they are not overpaid [8585]; that there are not many servants employed, and that there must be persons to supervise the children [8601]. MISS PROBERT, the matron, says that she has the supervision of the servants, the distribution of the children and the domestic arrangements, but is subordinate to the superintendent [9610-9612]; that the cooking, washing, and needlework, is under her control; that she goes round the institution frequently; that when the children are mustered in the morning, the superintendent distributes the boys to their various duties and she distributes the girls; that the office and store management is in the superintendent's hands [9613-9625]; that officers take charge of the bed-rooms, bath-rooms, &c., and are responsible to her, she being responsible to the superintendent [9630]; that there are no monitors, though the elder girls do assist [9632]; that the senior boy in each mess is held responsible for anything wrong that occurs at his table, and the elder girls assist in looking after the little children [9637]; that there are three laundresses and another is needed [9673]; that there are three persons in charge of the hospital [9742]; that Mr. May is responsible for the hospital management [9752]; that there are seven female servants, and two cooks [9772]; and that she fancies the institution to be nearly perfect [9792].

Admission and discharge of children: Apprentices, &c.

MR. MAY says that four years is the lowest age at which, in ordinary cases, children are received, but in special cases, children three years old are taken in; that there are regular forms of admission [Appendix H1] which must be filled up by the applicant, and countersigned by a clergyman or magistrate; that this form goes to the committee and is considered, the applicant being also compelled to appear personally [1673-1675]; that children who have lost both parents, or the father only, are ineligible for admission to the Randwick Asylum, being excluded by the by-laws [1676]; that there are orphan schools expressly intended for relieving such cases [1677]; that children abandoned by parents and left destitute, or the offspring of parents who are unable or unfit to support them, or children compulsorily placed in the institution, are received, as well as all children sent in by order of the Colonial Secretary, and paid for by Government [1679]; children who have lost both parents are not admitted [1680]; that some orphans are taken from the Benevolent Asylum by order of the Government; that none others in the institution are orphans [1682]; that a widower can get his children into the institution, but a widow cannot get hers taken in [1688]; that bastard children are considered eligible for admission [1691]; that applications from parents for restoration of children are always gone into, and the children restored if the parents are proper persons to have them, and will pay something towards their past maintenance [1702]; that a father wishing to take his child away is expected to pay something towards the past maintenance [1703]; that he considers the Benevolent Asylum as a sort of receiving-house for children picked up by the police; that they are brought to Randwick in drafts of forty or fifty; that they are taken into Randwick Asylum if they are healthy, free from cutaneous disease, if not the doctor will not pass them [1722-1726]; that all over four years, and free from contagious disease, are received [1728]; that applications for admission are diminishing, and that he attributes the decrease to the improved state of the times, and the searching inquiries made by the directors in all cases [1735]; that in some cases the directors seek for corroborative evidence as to the genuineness of an application; that the admissions in 1873 have been very few [1736]; that children are received into the institution between the ages of four and ten; that a child under three years of age would be a mere infant and require a mother's care [1804]; that there are between seventy and eighty boys apprenticed out every year; that no supervision is exercised over them after they have finished their terms of apprenticeship; that while they are in service a continuous communication is kept up with them, that the masters have to send down their money, and at the same time make reports as to the boys, and that a bad report is seldom received [1823-1827]; that he knew the girl who had been apprenticed to Mr. Teece of Twofold Bay, and considered her as promising a girl as ever left the institution, that she absconded, but the committee knew nothing of it until afterwards, and that he did not know what became of her [1828-1833]; that in his opinion, children should be kept in the institution until they are thirteen [1870]. DR. NOTT says that children cannot be admitted until he has examined them, for which purpose they are stripped; that he goes to the Benevolent Asylum once a year, and in company with the directors, selects children for Randwick; that he likes to take those who are not scrofulous; that they must be over four years old, except in certain special cases; that he knows of no reason why all the children at the Benevolent Asylum should not be taken into the Randwick institution; that he has never seen proper subjects for admission refused; that the Committee never refused any from the Benevolent Asylum except on his certificate; that the children from there are selected once a year [1493-1519]. MR. BARDON, master shoemaker, says that boys are apprenticed to him at thirteen years of age; that he could teach boys who were sent into his workshop for a few hours daily; that he would be sorry to send out a boy who had not learnt his trade perfectly, though a boy who had learnt something of the trade would probably be more useful to his master than one who had learnt nothing [1937-1949]. MR. MONKLEY, master tailor, says he has four apprentices and could teach ten, and does not know why more are not sent to him to teach [1991-2003]; that he teaches them from the beginning; that he does not teach them cutting out, which is a distinct branch; that he teaches some boys under ten years old, and has some probationers as well as apprentices [2011-2016]; and that there are few boys in this Country who are apprenticed to tailors [2074]. MR. FOSBERY says that there is too much facility given to parents to send their children into public institutions; that it is customary to send children into the Benevolent Asylum, whence they are drafted to Randwick, &c.; that the admission orders are obtained on certain recommendations; that the rule at Randwick that a child deserted by the father is ineligible, and deserted by the mother eligible for admission, is a queer one [2403-2415]; that something should be done to prevent masters taking their apprentices before a Bench and cancelling the indentures without informing the authorities of it [2462]. MRS. BERRS says that children apprenticed from Randwick get a set of printed instructions as to how they are to act [6858]. THE HON. E. DEAS THOMSON says that orphans are not admitted into the Randwick institution as children admissible into either the Protestant or Roman Catholic Orphan Schools are ineligible; that abandoned children, and those who are the offspring of dissolute persons, or felons, or persons unable to support them, and those sent into the Asylum by the Government, are alone admissible [7639]; that the children are apprenticed out at the age of thirteen, and are generally well spoken of, and that the demand for apprentices is in excess of the supply [7641]; that they are apprenticed for five years [7641]; and that many children are drafted from the Benevolent Asylum, and many are sent in from the streets or admitted on the application of subscribers and other persons [7657]. MR. WYNNÉ says that children have been admitted who should not be admitted [7777]; that he does not think only children are received; that orphans are not admitted, as they can go into other institutions; that neglected or deserted children are eligible [7781-7783]. MR. WISE says that the law does not allow children to be apprenticed until they are over twelve years of age; that in 1864 children were first apprenticed to the institution, but recently the committee have decided not to apprentice them to the institution but to send them out; that they are sent out between the ages of twelve and thirteen [8107-8110]; that orphans are not eligible for admission and are never admitted, as they can be sent into either of the Orphan Schools; that there is some good reason for keeping up the distinction; that cripples are not admitted, because the law compels the institution to apprentice out children when they reach the age of thirteen, and no person would take a cripple; that cripples cannot be kept in the institution; that when taking children from the Benevolent Asylum, they reject cripples, or diseased children, or children rejected by the doctor for reasons assigned; that they take children from the Benevolent Asylum whenever they are asked; that the doctor examines them, and those of whom he approves are taken; that the committee do not interfere with the doctors; that if the doctor passed a cripple the committee would refuse him, but if the doctor rejects a child the committee would not ask why; that the rule is to reject no children except those suffering from some infectious or contagious disease [8158-8166]; that though they professed to receive children abandoned by their parents, or the offspring of profligates, or felons, or persons unable to support them, yet there was no compulsion, and he knew of children being refused because the doctor declined to certify to their freedom from contagious disease, and they should decidedly refuse to receive a cripple [8167]; that a child perfectly healthy, except that it was crippled in one foot, might have been refused several times, as no person would take a crippled child as an apprentice [8168]; that in one case a child was admitted, and afterwards the father was found to be able to support it, when they made him pay £25 and take the child out [8173]; that applications for admission are made according to a printed form, the applicant answering certain questions in writing, and having the document signed by a magistrate or clergyman, and then being examined personally by the committee [8177]; that the applicant is asked what religion the child is to be brought up in; that no children are ever brought in by the police; that the "appeal," printed with the annual report, which states that the institution "receives children found by the police" was written twenty-one years ago; that that appeal was published in 1872 and 1873 as part of the report; that the appeal is put forward to show the objects of the institution; that the same class of children have been admitted all along; that he cannot say children found by the police would not be admitted; that they are not brought; that they are taken to the Benevolent Asylum; that children can only be admitted under the Incorporation Act of 1857; that if a policeman brought a child, they would decline to receive it, because there would be no one to surrender it; that he was not to answer for what had been written twenty-one years ago; that the public might gather from the report that such children would be admitted [8179, 8201]; that they do not receive children over ten years of age, and they should always refuse a cripple, or one that the doctor considered so; that he cannot say they are justified in such refusal; that if a child could walk well, though deformed, he should be admitted, and he has no recollection of any such child child being refused; that he cannot contradict the statement that there was such a refusal; that a child not deformed should be accepted; that a squint would not be a deformity, and that no child who could walk well should be refused because he had an ugly foot [8202-8223]; that the Legislature has authorized the admission of certain classes of children only; that they abide by the Act; that the Act does not preclude them from receiving children brought in by the police; that it may be wrong to publish the "appeal" [8226-8231]; that they decline to receive diseased children, though they are provided with all appliances for their care and treatment [8237]; that he can see no good reason for the continuance of the regulation rendering orphans ineligible; that they admit orphans from the Benevolent Asylum now by order of the Government; that that is not in defiance of their own by-law; that it is the fault of the Government if it is so [8250-8254]; that the admissions this year (1873) have been very few, in consequence of the care exercised by the committee [8265]; that the Cuthill Gratuity Fund was established in order to provide gratuities to apprentices on their completing their apprenticeship [8270]; that then apprentices did not often receive their wages, but as they received them now the committee intended to do away with the gratuity [8289]; that there has been no change in the rate paid to apprentices, but they are paid more regularly, as the terms of the indentures have been altered; that the children are apprenticed from thirteen to nineteen, and at the end of the term have £21 to start with; that there was a defect once in the supervision of children apprenticed out, but that it had been cured by subsequent arrangements; that employers could not now behave ill to their apprentices [8290-8303]; that if a girl ran away from her employer, he would be called on to issue a warrant, and would be held answerable for her [8316]; that 698 children (391 boys and 307 girls) have been apprenticed out since the establishment of the institution, 71 in 1872, and 63 in 1873 [8321]; that illegitimate children are received [8328]; and that undoubtedly when the institution was first formed all destitute children were admissible [8529]. MR. S. H. PEARCE said the committee had seen the danger of keeping apprentices on the premises up to the age of nineteen, and had decided not to keep them, but to re-apprentice those they had outside [8543]; that the Colonial Secretary would be pestered out of his life unless he granted admissions to many cases [8557]; that he had had a girl apprenticed to him and was pleased with her, but never had another, as many turn out badly [8559]; and that they are not apprenticed near Sydney [8566]. MISS PROBERT says the girls are apprenticed at thirteen years of age [9711]; that the apprenticing within the institution had been given up lately by order of the committee, and she thought it a pity [9716]; and that the committee would not refuse to receive a child that had been picked up in a state of starvation, even though it had a skin disease [9756]. MR. MANSFIELD says that children received into the Benevolent Asylum are drafted off to Randwick; that the Randwick authorities will only take children over four and under ten years old, and will not take children who are in any way deformed; that there is one child in the Benevolent Asylum who has been sent to Randwick twice and twice returned [Ben. Asy. Evi., 463-474]. DR. RENWICK says there are about eighty children waiting in the Benevolent Asylum to be removed to Randwick; that from 1863 to 1872 there were 778 children discharged to Randwick from the Benevolent Asylum; that the Randwick authorities come and pick the children; that some have been refused five or six times; that they will take none with any bodily defect—none but "prize" children; that he sees no reason why all the children should not go to Randwick [Ben. Asy. Evi., 2420-2429]; that this was a sore subject; that the children did not like to go to Randwick, and were in the habit of scratching themselves with a pin to avoid being sent [Ben. Asy. Evi., 2437-2439].

MR. MAY says that the average cost of the institution, including all charges, repairs to buildings, and so on, is £14 8s. 5d. per head per year; that the income in 1872 was £11,125, of which £8,183 was paid by the Government; £2,105 was received from private subscriptions, and there were, in addition, indenture fees, £68; parents' contributions, £590; interest on endowment fund and donations, £185, making a total of £2,940; that the Government had previously given a sum equal to the Cuthill bequest of £12,000, and also a further sum of £10,000; also £2,000 towards the Catherine Hayes Hospital, and £1,000 towards the master's residence; that the cost of the latter was £1,400; that no money was invested except the Cuthill Gratuity Fund and the Perpetual Subscribers' Fund; that the institution is in debt to the extent of £2,100, owing to increase of numbers and the carrying out of permanent works; that the debt has been accumulating during the last seven years, and is not likely to be reduced, as the income is less than the expenditure [1590-1613]; that in the annual balance sheet there is nothing put down for work done [1711]; that work done for other institutions and private persons is paid for, and the accounts are kept, but there is no statement in the balance sheet showing it, though there is a reference to it in the annual report; that the money so received is paid into a general fund, and reduces the expenditure [1712-1720]; that parents are sometimes made to contribute from 2s. 6d. to 7s. 6d. per week to their children's support [1745]; that the total amount of the subscriptions is yearly about £2,000, and that the Government pay about £8,000, the sources of revenue being unreliable [1793]; that similar institutions in Victoria and Tasmania are managed less cheaply [1811]; that, in his opinion, country districts and municipalities should be compelled to contribute in some way as in Victoria [1860]; that the value of the work done on the premises, in the year 1872, was: farm produce, £1,115 8s; boots, &c., £976 11s. 9d.; clothing, £514 9s. 5½d; needlework, £2,618 17s. 2½d.; bread, &c., £1,447 6s. 10½d.; laundry work, £1,300; total, £7,972 13s. 3¼d.; expenses for material, journeymen, supervision, &c., £4,708 16s. 2½d., leaving a net profit to the institution, from the work done on the premises, of £3,263 17s. 0¾d. for the year [1883, and Appendix H]. MR. COULTER says that he was at one time clerk and storekeeper, and kept the clothing, shoemaker's, coal, and provision store book, and had charge of the stores; that none of the farm produce was sold, but boots and shoes were; that he never had anything to do with the treasurer's accounts; that he had nothing to do with the prices; that the accounts were properly checked and stock taken [10078-10146]; that he collected during a ten weeks trip in the country £479 9s. 3d., and his expenses were about £70; that the money was obtained from new subscribers, except about £20 [10197]. MR. BARDON says that the apprentices employed on the institution get paid some trifling sum [1926]; that he and the apprentices make between 1,300 and 1,400 pairs of boots yearly for the Asylum, besides some £200 sold [1932]; that the material of which the boots and shoes are made could not be got for less than 4s. 6d. or 5s. per pair [1951]; that the cost of material to the institution is about 3s. per pair [1953]; that the saving to the institution is about 2s. 6d. per pair [1954]; that when a person gives an order for a pair of boots, he leaves it in the office and pays there for the goods; that the charge for boots worth 14s. is only 10s. [1957]; that he sends in requisitions for material [1961]; that the highest price charged for boots is 12s. per pair; that the boots made for the Refuge and Deaf and Dumb Asylum are not charged for so high as 10s. and are not worth so much [1976]. MR. MONKLEY says that there is a saving of nearly £500 per year from the tailoring department, and that over 1,000 suits per year are made [2053]. CAPT. McLEMBIE says the Government pay nearly the whole cost of Randwick Asylum [7573]; that the chairman of the Board should be responsible to the Government for the expenditure [7589]; and that the subscriptions every year would decrease [7593]. The HON. E. DEAS THOMSON says that the Government contribute about £8,000 per year to the institution; that parents should be made to pay towards their children's support when able to do so [7636]; that the cost of the institution was less per head in 1871 than it now is [7653], and that a great saving is effected by the industrial employment of the children [7661]. MR. WAILES says that he keeps the accounts, with the exception of the books which are kept at the institution itself; that he keeps an account of all the receipts and expenditure; that £40 a year is paid for the office of the institution in town; that he made out the balance sheet for 1872, which contains no details of the cost of material of articles made by the children, or profit realized therefrom; that the balance sheet does not show what is earned by the children; that the cost per head of the institution is £14 8s. 5d. per year; that he does not think it right to state in the balance sheet the amount received from the children's labour, as it would increase the expenses shown; that the £7,972, shown in Mr. May's returns as value of children's work does not appear in the balance sheet; that the balance shows the expenditure to a penny; that the actual expenditure is £11,000, and the cost per head £14; that the salaries of the tailor, shoemaker, &c., are charged in the clothing account; that if the labour of the children were taken into account the expenses would be greatly increased in appearance; that he would vouch for the accounts being correct, though there is no credit given for the children's labour, and if there were, the cost per head would seem much greater [7782-7771]. MR. WISE says that the sum of £2,340 4s. 9d., put down in the balance sheet of 1872 for clothing, was for raw material, wages, and cost of making; that no clothes are bought; that the details are in the ledger; that nothing is charged for labour; that in 1872 the cost per head was £14 5s. 7½d.; that some stock is kept and appears in the accounts; that the clothing account includes the wages of the tailor, &c., and the allowances to apprentices; that the account includes every expense, even repairs and improvements to buildings; that he doubts the statement that the children of the Roman Catholic Orphan School cost under £14 per head [8117-8134]; that he denies that the salaries at Randwick amount to £3,390 6s.; that they amount, without seamstresses, tailors, shoemakers' wages, &c., to £2,797 7s. 6d. [8139]; that the expenditure is over £11,000, of which the Government give £8,183, and the public over £3,000 [8152]; that the institution is economically managed, the cost for everything being 9d. per day per head [8155]; that out of Dr. Cuthill's bequest of £11,500 there had been £1,000 invested at interest, and the income given yearly to the three best children in the school [8269]; that apprentices used not to get their money regularly, but that since some improved regulations were made the masters paid punctually; that since January, 1870, £1,777 9s. had been paid by employers on apprentices' account, of which £510 12s. 4d. had been paid back to apprentices, leaving a balance of £1,266 17s. 8d., which was held for apprentices [8270]; that the Cuthill bequest was given unconditionally [8284]; that the cost per head is not more than that shown in the balance sheet; that there is no profit on the children's work; that he valued the articles made at the cost of material and making; that if the cost of maintenance was £11,000, and the children earned £11,000, he should say they cost nothing to the State; that in such a case he should say they cost so much and earned so much; that the cost per head would be the money expended; that if an institution cost £10,000 and the children earned £10,000, the cost would be, for 1,000 children, £10 per head; that if the children earned only £5,000, the cost would still be £10 per head [8329-8346]; that he denied there is any profit; that if the children cost £10,000 and earned £10,000, he should say the cost is £10,000; that at Randwick, if the £3,000 was not earned by the children they should not have it [8348-8358]; that but for the labour of the children being turned to proper account, the expenses would be larger [8359]; that he cannot see that they might go on making the establishment more expensive on the ground that the children's labour was more profitable and yet say that they were economical [8362]; that if the articles were purchased instead of being made on the premises the cost per head would be nothing like £25 [8369]; that the expenses would be increased if the children were idle [8375]; that Mr. May's statement as to the value of children's labour, &c., is perfectly incorrect; that it is an exaggerated statement; that the figures are fancy figures; that it is a great mistake to publish such a statement; that he has no doubt the amount of £4,708, stated as the cost of producing these goods, is correct, but the value set upon the goods is exaggerated; that he cannot say whether more than market price is put on the goods; that these things may have been produced at a loss [8378-8407]; that there is no profit and loss account under a separate heading in the ledger; that the children are credited in the report for their labour every year [8409]; that the institution is in debt over £2,500, and has been so for two or three years [8424]; that if the Randwick accounts were made up incorrectly the cost would be raised [8432]; that an institution may be self-supporting, and yet extravagantly managed [8450]; that he does not know how Mr. May's account was made out [8469]; that in December, 1866, the institution was in debt £275, and the debt had increased since to £2,500, but that it was caused by extensive outlay for repairs and permanent improvements, and the Colonial Secretary had been requested to propose a grant of £2,500 to cover it [8494]; that the cost per head of the children in the Roman Catholic Orphan School in 1872 was £15 7s. 7½d.; in the Protestant Orphan School, £15 10s. 5½d.; and in the Randwick Asylum, £14 8s. 5d. [Note on revision, page 274]. MR. S. H. PEARCE says that the clothing, &c., is provided more economically than it would be if purchased [8537]; that there is nothing sold, and consequently no profit on the children's labour [8538]; that, owing to the system adopted, the cost per head is little more than £14 per year [8568]; that there is a finance committee to examine the accounts, and they are examined every month [8570]; that the money received for goods sold should appear in the balance sheet [8581]; that he does not think money is frittered away by the employment of useless officers [8585]; and that there was a large expenditure for salaries, but the officers were considered necessary [8598]. MISS PROBERT says that great saving has been effected by the erection of the washing machinery, &c. [9668]. (Appendix H, a return furnished by Mr. May, shows that the salaries and allowances amount to £3,390; the value of work done by children, to £7,972 13s. 3½d.; and the trade expenses to £4,708 16s. 2½d., and a memo. by the Secretary to the Commission makes the cost per head £24 10s. per year.)

MR. MAY says that the Inspector of Public Charities visited the institution once three or four years ago [1640]; and that the Schools are not inspected by officers of the Council of Education, but that the children have been examined by persons appointed by the directory [1847-1857]. The HON. E. DEAS THOMSON says that he is not aware that the committee have ever objected to the schools being inspected by by officers of the Council of Education; that he thinks it would be desirable that they should be so inspected; and that an examination into the efficiency of the teaching would be satisfactory to the managers of the institution and to the public [7662].

INMATES.

General description, &c.

MR. MONKLEY says that he finds the boys on the average intelligent, submissive, and willing to work [2001]. MR. FOSBERY says that a great many children are allowed to become burdens on the public who should not be so [2403]; and that cases of the improper disposal of children, not as foundlings, but as being murdered, have become very numerous [2469]. CAPTAIN M'LERIE says that there are numbers of neglected children running about the streets now, but the police cannot legally go into houses and take them out [7606]. The HON. E. DEAS THOMSON says that children admitted into Randwick are often taken from the streets and rescued from infamy, while some are children of tradesmen who from misfortune are unable to support them [7640]; that the maximum number admissible is 1,000 [7648]; that more cheerful or merry faces he never saw, and that the children do not lose their individuality in the institution [7654]; that when a man becomes dissolute and deserts his family, or rushes away to the diggings, his children are generally taken to Randwick [7657]. MR. WYNNE says there is a feeling abroad that it is a good thing to get children into the Asylum, and it seems to be the ambition of people, who are not very scrupulous, to put them there [7780]; that there are many children who are left destitute from the desertion of the fathers [7783]. MR. WISE says that the admissions lately have been few, owing to the close cross-examination to which parents are subjected [8265]. MR. PEARCE says that the inmates are for the most part children of the lowest order of people—the offspring of deceased, drunken, and dissolute parents, and that there are few who have not imbibed their parents' bad habits [8560]; and that there are of all ages, from four to ten or even twelve, but that girls of the latter age are liable to contaminate younger children [8562]. MR. MAY says that some of the inmates are children of parents who in a certain sense are respectable—that a man having lost his wife may be unable to look after his children at home, and so sends them to the Asylum; that only 2 or 3 per cent. of the inmates are illegitimate; that in most cases the fathers of illegitimate children get off without being made to contribute to the children's support; that no orphans are admitted except from the Benevolent Asylum; that there are children from all parts of the country; that when first opened the institution sheltered 140; that there are now 816, and that there is room for 100 more [1670-1682-1701-1707-1734]; that there is a considerable decrease, owing to improved condition of people; that much of the destitution was caused by fathers going away to the Gold fields, and to some small extent by drunkenness [1736-1738]; that parents are allowed to see their children at the institution [1746]; that the children are known by their names, and when the roll is called each child in answering to his name gives his number [1800]; and that he thinks children should be kept in the institution up to the age of thirteen [1870].

Instruction, discipline, trades, and reproductive

MR. MAY says that the head teacher, but not the others, has a certificate, but that all teachers appointed in future must be certificated; that the system of instruction is the same as that pursued in the Public Schools, and is supplemented by industrial training; that the schools are not inspected by the Council of Education, but the children are examined yearly by persons appointed for the purpose; that the children are separated for the purposes of religious instruction only, but are taught together, mess together, and are associated together in every other way [1642-1657]; that the girls are taught needlework, commencing to learn it before they leave the infant school [1658]; that religious instruction is conducted on Friday afternoons; that for half an hour daily the children separate for religious instruction, and on Sunday attend their respective places of worship, those who are too young attending divine service in the institution; that there is Sunday-school in the institution; that the children are taught private prayers, which they repeat to themselves night and morning, and that there are public prayers read at opening and closing school [1661-1669]; that there are forty apprentices inmates of the Asylum [1671]; that all the clothes, &c., worn by the children are made on the premises, and that boots and shoes are made for the Female Refuge, the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, and for private persons [1708-1713]; that the boys are taught tailoring, shoemaking, carpentering, baking, &c., and the girls are taught to be domestic servants, and to do needlework; that sometimes if a boy has a taste for carpentering he is employed in the carpenter's shop without being apprenticed; that they get one week in school and one out, and those who are up to the standard in the school are variously employed, some in the garden or on the farm, one or two at tailoring, others shoemaking, others in the kitchen; that forty are employed daily in the garden and grounds; that some are taught to milk; that all the vegetables required, except potatoes, are grown on the farm at a trifling cost, there being a farm overseer only who receives £90 a year [1751-1778]; that in similar institutions in Melbourne and Tasmania the industrial training is not so extensive; that at Randwick they produce 700 quarts of milk per week; that the boots were made by the boys, who did the "closing" and all the fine work [1815-1822]; that the farm produces twenty-eight tons vegetables per year [1835]; that the washing is done by hand labour, but the boiling is done by steam [1849]; that he believes it to be inexpedient keeping apprentices on the premises until they are nineteen years old; that the labour of the boys is utilized as much as possible; that an attempt had been made at sericulture but failed, as the food for the worms could not be grown; and that the results of the children's labour were stated in a return he had furnished [1881 and Appendix H]. DR. NORR says that all but the apprentices are allowed to sleep two in a bed, and that he inspects the children twice a year, when they have all to strip [1475]. MR. BARDON, master shoemaker, says that he has under him thirteen apprentices [1891]; that in eight years he has sent out into the world four skilled workmen [1898]; that he could teach more if the workshop were larger [1901]; that he could not in three years teach boys to do good work [1905]; that they are generally worth their keep after the first twelve months, and much more than that in three years [1911]; that almost all the boots and shoes for the institution are made on the premises; that they work from 6 a.m. to 5.30 p.m., with an hour for breakfast and an hour for dinner; that they leave off work at 4 p.m. on Saturdays; that the apprentices go to the cricket ground on Saturdays and are sometimes allowed to go into the town [1921-1925]; that they make all the boots and shoes worn on the establishment to the extent of about 1,300 or 1,400 pairs per year; that there is £200 sold besides; that the thing more than pays for itself; that the boys are taught "closing" before they leave; that they could not be apprenticed before they are thirteen, as they would lose their schooling; that boys could be sent into the workshop half-time; but that he would be sorry to send out a boy who had not learnt his trade, as it is better to be a labourer than a bad tradesman; that that there is private work done on the premises and work for other institutions [1930-1958]; that a boy nine years old could not do much at a trade, and that a boy could not learn much before he is twelve years old [1965]. MR. MONKLEY, the master tailor, says that when he first went to Randwick two years and three months ago (in 1873), the boys did not know a needle from a pin; that he began the tailoring business there; that he has four apprentices, has had five, and has not sent any out into the world; that he had been at the trade all his life; that he had been accustomed to teach children [1989-1995]; that he could teach ten apprentices; that they make all the clothes worn upon the premises, nothing that the children wear being put out to be made; that the girls make shirts; that he teaches the apprentices his trade from the beginning, but does not teach them to cut out; that he is teaching some the trade who are under ten years of age; that he has besides the apprentices nine probationers to teach, who come to him week by week alternately; that it would be better to teach a boy for one whole day than for four half days; that no clothes are made for people outside the institution, the boys not being advanced enough to do it; that the boys apprenticed to him devote themselves entirely to the business; that boys younger than ten could not learn the trade; that girls can be taught to sew much younger, as they take to it naturally [2002-2030]; that there are about 1,000 pairs of trousers per year made in the institution, and there has been a saving to the institution by means of the tailoring branch of £780 for two years and a quarter [2048-2054]; and that there have been over 2,000 suits of clothes made in the two years and a quarter [2057]. CAPTAIN McLERIE says that he believes the labour of the children is utilized to a great extent, and that they do a large amount of work [7597]. The HON. E. DEAS THOMSON says that the children are exceedingly well taught and brought up, both in regard to the ordinary branches of education and to industries and trades [7621 and 7646]; that those who are apprentices on the premises have previously been instructed in the usual branches of primary education; that in December, 1871, there were twenty-seven boys and fourteen girls apprentices in the institution [7647]; that he does not think boys under thirteen could be taught trades; that there are besides the apprentices seventy-two boys employed in various industries; that they raised twenty-nine tons vegetables, and sixty tons forage for cows in 1871, in which year they made 1963, and repaired 5,940 pairs of boots, &c., &c. [7661]. MR. WISE says that in 1864 the committee began to apprentice boys to the institution, but have recently decided to discontinue the system; that it was not intended to give up making clothes, &c., on the premises, but that the younger boys would do it; that the boys would make boots and shoes, and the girls, who would still continue to be apprenticed, the other clothes [8109-8116]; that the estimated profits upon clothing, &c., the results of the children's labour, should not be regarded as an actual profit; that the children in making these articles and doing other work are training themselves for after life [8442]. MR. S. H. PEARCE says that the profit on the results of the children's labour is in the education of the children; that it has been decided no more private work shall be done; that the system of apprenticing boys to the institution is abolished, but there are boys assisting the shoemaker, engineer, carpenter, and tailor; that they think it best to supply the country with labourers rather than mechanics [8538-8549]; that he looks upon the institution as a large family, where the children are taught all occupations; that by the system of management the institution is maintained at small cost as compared with similar establishments elsewhere [8568]; that there are gangs of children told off daily, some to the bakery, some to other industries, the girls to clean and wash, and scrub floors, &c., while the rest who are not working have so many hours' school [8599]; and that they can learn to swim if they like, as there is a bath to swim in [8604]. MISS PROBERT says that the children are mustered before they go into school; that Mr. May distributes the boys, and she the girls, to various occupations, so many being sent to the laundry, so many to the dormitories, so many to the kitchen, &c., and the rest to school; that the gangs are changed week about; that senior girls assist in looking after the young ones, and the children assist each other in many ways; that though the washing is done by machinery, there is plenty of work for girls in the laundry; that seven boys and no girls are sent into the cook-house, daily; and that every practical means is taken to instruct the children in domestic duties [9623-9695-9700]; that she does not know the names of all the children, but of a good many [9727]; that she does not know whether she speaks to every child in the institution in the course of the year [9731]; that there is not a week in which she misses speaking to a girl; that no one reads stories to the children in the evenings; that the little children go to bed at 7 o'clock p.m. [9734]; that when the children go to bed they are told to kneel down, and then a prayer is dictated to them, which they repeat; that there is religious instruction in the school every day; that all the children say their prayers together [9761]; that the children wash-up plates and dishes, and do all the work they can do [9774].

MR. MAY says that they do not receive children from the Benevolent Asylum unless they are healthy, as the doctor will not pass them; that the children sleep two in a bed for want of accommodation; that there is plenty of space, there being room for 100 more inmates, but that the beds were made large by order of the Board [1725-1733]; and that very few are scrofulous [1739]. DR. NOTT says that the sanitary condition of the school was never better (July, 1873) since he has been attending it; that the site is healthy and not too much exposed; that a great number of children enter the institution ill, badly fed, and scrofulous, but rapidly improve; that at one time he thought the situation too bleak, but results have proved the reverse; that children who have been fearfully neglected are admitted, and being sent into the hospital for a short time, soon become cheerful and bonny; that he is quite satisfied with the sanitary arrangements of the place; that there is ample cubic space per bed; that the practice of allowing two children to sleep in one bed is not injurious to health; that there is every convenience in the hospital; that there was a great deal of ophthalmia when he first attended the institution, but there is very little now [1462-1483]; that he would like to refuse admission to scrofulous children, but cannot, and there are many scrofulous children there now [1497]; and that the institution is healthier than the Benevolent Asylum in George-street [1509]. The HON. E. DEAS THOMSON says that he does not believe there is any institution in the world in which the sanitary condition of the inmates is better; that the deaths are few; that he often finds there is not a single child in the hospital; that there are some with eye complaints; that the measles broke out once, and the deaths were very few; that the site is admirable in a sanitary and every other point of view [7621-7623]; and that he sees no objection to children sleeping two in a bed [7651]. MR. G. F. WISE says that the cause of the healthiness of the place does not arise from the committee declining to admit unhealthy children, but from the excellent management of the two medical officers, Dr. Nott and Dr. Brown, and the great care taken of them when ill [8232-8238]; that eighteen months ago (6 Nov., 1873) there were eighty-one with scarlet fever, and not one died [8247]; that the hospital was opened in May, 1870, and in the eight months of that first year there were 530 children treated in the hospital; that in 1871 there were 803 treated in the hospital; in 1872 there were 819 treated in the hospital; and in the ten months of 1873 there were 655 treated in the hospital; that there is a daily average of thirty children sent for treatment—weakly children—some who suffer from ophthalmia; that he cannot say whether these children were healthy when received into the Asylum; that they may have been sound then, and their diseases engendered in the institution; that ten deaths have taken place from May, 1870, to October 31st, 1873; that there is constant sickness in the institution, and that great advantage has resulted from having a hospital, as last year eighty-one cases of scarlet fever were treated without there being one death; that the medical officers' report, which states that in 1872 the institution was at the close of the year "free from sickness of any kind," is correct, but that he (Mr. Wise) gives the true facts, and that the two statements are not opposed to each other; and that his figures are right, as they are taken from the doctor's book [8495-8523]. Miss PROBERT says that there are three persons in charge of the hospital, who devote themselves entirely to its management and the nursing of the sick; that there is an average of from thirty to forty children per day in the hospital; that they are sent there for every trifling ailment; and that there is no skin disease in the institution, nor has there been for a long time [9742-9753].

Diets.

Mr. MAY says that the diet is very liberal, and that the ration scale is not strictly adhered to; that the meat is boiled and baked, the Roman Catholics having puddings on Fridays; that the meat is baked once a week, and on the other six days the meat is boiled, and there is soup which the children like; that the soup is excellent, and the food served up hot; that extra meat is used for hospital purposes only; that the meat is skewered in messes of sixteen, and divided by the servants; that the meat is not over-boiled, and that the children have plenty to eat; and that the allowance to each child is 14 ozs. bread and 6 ozs. meat per day [1836-1859].

ABUSES.

Mr. MAY says that he has reported several cases in which people were able to contribute to their children's maintenance, and they had been forced to pay the full cost [1742]. Captain M'LERIE says that in his opinion there are many children in the Asylum who ought not to be there [7577], and that that was his reason for seceding from the committee [7583]. The Hon. E. DEAS THOMSON says that complaints have been made that the effect of the institution was to induce parents to neglect their children, but he did not think it was so [7636]. Mr. WYNNE says that many children—he will not say hundreds—are admitted who should not be, and he accounts for it by attributing it to the large-heartedness of clergymen and their liability to be imposed upon; that there is a general impression abroad that it is a proper place in which to put children, and not at all degrading; that some time ago the widow of a gentleman who died, leaving a considerable amount of property, applied to have her three grandchildren admitted; that it seemed to be the ambition of not very scrupulous people to put their children there [7776-7780]. Mr. WISE says he is not aware that there are any inmates whose relations are in comfortable positions, and that the charity of the institution has not been abused in any case [8173-8175]; and that the greatest care is taken to prevent imposition [8264]. Mr. S. H. PEARCE says there are children in the Randwick Asylum who ought not to be there [8555].

RESULTS OF INSTITUTION.

Mr. MAY says that some boys who have left the institution are now earning between £2 and £3 per week; that between seventy and eighty are sent out yearly, among whom are two or three skilled shoemakers and tailors; that he has traced the after-career of several, and found that they have done well; that there is no supervision over a boy or girl after the apprenticeship is finished, when they are nineteen years old; that they seldom get a bad report of the apprentices; that a girl who was apprenticed to Mr. Teece, and ran away, was as promising a girl as ever left the institution [1822-1833]. Mr. BARDON says that there are three skilled shoemakers who have gone out since he has been in the institution, and they are all getting good wages; that he has sent out four in eight years [1896]; that when they go out they are fit to do any work [1913]; that their being brought up in the Asylum has not made them sluggish, but sharp [1919]; and that there will be two apprentices ready to go out this year, 1873 [1978]. Mr. MONKLEY says he had not turned out any tailors yet, as he has been in the institution only two years and three months [1993]. The Hon. E. DEAS THOMSON says that the institution takes children from the streets, and rescues them from infamy, and has been very successful in reclaiming them [7640]; and that the boys are kept well at work, and very beneficially so for making them useful members of society [7661]. Mr. WISE says that there is no guarantee that children, when sent out, will be well treated, but the collector visits them in the country and reports; that the committee constantly receive letters, and from the 436 children out receive few complaints; that the slightest hint of ill-usage induces the committee to take proceedings [8305-8308]; and that 300 children were sent out previous to 1869, and 698 altogether since the establishment of the system [8320]. Mr. PEARCE says that some of the children turn out badly, as they are the offspring of the lowest orders of the people [8560]; that the greater portion of them are taken from the city and suburbs of Sydney, and those apprenticed near Sydney are surrounded by their old evil companions, and led again into vice; that there are too many instances of girls turning out badly from that cause, and consequently children are not now apprenticed within 10 miles of Sydney [8565]; that it is a question whether they are well fitted for domestic servants [8568]; and that in his opinion they are taught too many things, and raised above their proper position [8555]. Miss PROBERT says that the accounts received of girls who have gone out are generally satisfactory, and many of them have done very well [9721]. Mr. COULTER, the collector of the institution, says that he recently visited part of the Southern and Western districts; saw several children who had been apprenticed out, and sent in to the Directors a report concerning each child; that he saw them in their homes at Yass, Adelong, Goulburn, Orange, Bathurst, Trunkey, and other places; that he cannot say how many he saw, but he thinks about twelve; that he saw these twelve children between May and July, 1873, and found them with respectable people [10008-10030]; that some were with landowners, some with small farmers, and some with independent gentlemen; that there were about an equal number of boys and girls; that he cannot remember the names of any [10032]; that he visited these children in order to report on their position; that they all seemed comfortable; that he inquired whether the employers were satisfied, but did not report the replies; that trifling complaints were made to him; that the children were comfortably dressed, like ordinary servants; that he did not see all he was instructed to see [10045-10067].

BILOELA

BILOELA INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

From the evidence of Mr. GEORGE LUCAS, the superintendent of these two institutions, it appears that they were first opened at Newcastle, but afterwards removed to Biloela, the buildings at the former place being unsuitable, and the institutions very much disorganized. At Newcastle the buildings used were the old military barracks, in which, as Mr. Lucas says, the dormitories were too large, and in which classification of the girls was impossible. There were fifteen or sixteen in a room, the buildings were dilapidated, and were in the centre of the town, situated in a hollow, so that ill-disposed people could come and converse with the girls. Mr. Lucas took charge of the institutions about ten weeks before their removal to Sydney [2496-2507]. Mr. Lucas says that the present situation and buildings are also unsuitable; that boats come round the place, and the school is only separated from the dry dock by an iron fence; that the grounds, &c., are very rugged; that it would be better if it had not been a prison, though only a prison could hold some of the girls; that the name of the place does not affect the morale, but the buildings are not in any way suitable; that there are none but old prison buildings, with iron bars, white-washed walls, &c.; that the dormitories are too big, and the officers' quarters are some distance from them [2509-2540]; that in the case of the big girls, there are too many in each dormitory, so that those who would reform are not allowed to by their companions [2588]; that the school is partitioned off from the rest of the island by an iron fence, the officers' quarters being between the gate and the dormitories, which are ranged about a quadrangle, the officers being at night about 25 yards distant from the nearest dormitory [2899]; that the place is without proper accommodation [2923]; that the buildings are all flagged, very cold, and unimprovable, and that the place might be managed more cheaply if it were more compact [2991-2994]; that he never thought the place suitable [3001]; and that there is no bell to ring the children to meals, &c. [6374]. Mrs. LUCAS, the matron of the Industrial School, says that the place and the buildings are both unsuitable, the latter having stone floors, and being damp, cold, and unsightly, the place being too much like a prison, and too near the dry dock [3256]; that there is a bell, but it cannot be rung, as it is out of repair [3325]. Mrs. KING, the matron of the Reformatory, says that the dormitory accommodation there is very insufficient, as some of the inmates have to sleep in the dining-room; that there was sufficient accommodation when she first came from Newcastle, as she had only three girls then; that she was anxious to get it enlarged, but Mr. Robertson had not complied with her request [3154]; that the buildings at Newcastle were badly situated; that she likes Biloela, as far as the site is concerned, but that the buildings are unsuitable [3169]; that if she had six more girls sent in she would have to put them on the floor of the dining-room to sleep, the sleeping accommodation is so deficient, but that otherwise the place is good [3177]. Mrs. DUNN says that there is no bell to call the Industrial School children together to meals, &c. [4334]. Mrs. AUSTIN also says that there is no bell; that the laundry, of which she has charge, is away from the main buildings of the institution [4541]; that all the water for the laundry has to be pumped by the girls, and there is often a trouble about it, but that when it rains there is plenty of water [4600]; that the laundry is away at the further end of the enclosure [9008]. Mrs. CONNELL says that the place is not very nice looking, and that one must feel when one is inside that it is a prison [5196]. Constable TURNER says the place would not strike him as being nothing but a prison had he not known it was previously, but that it looks like a prison, and that the girls cannot help feeling that it is one [5400]. Constable GLASSINGTON says that he thinks such an institution might be successfully established at Biloela if the dry dock were shut out by a wall, but that there certainly is a prison-like appearance about the whole place [5529]. Mr. F. CANE says that he very much regrets the girls leaving Newcastle, as he thought it the best place for them, and that Biloela was not a proper place, though it might be made so, as its associations would not matter much to girls who had been brought up in the most horrible places; that the place is not good, but might be made so; that its proximity to the dock was a most serious error [5641]. Sister MARY BENEDICT says that Biloela is a queer place for the girls; that the associations of the spot are enough to make them feel prisoners [5788]; that the site and buildings are altogether unsuitable, and there have been complaints about the proximity of the dock [5817]. Mrs. FOOT says that if the girls must be kept on the island, she would divide the buildings, classify the inmates, and have them in separate apartments [5885]. Dr. O. S. EVANS says that the premises are kept in as good a state as circumstances will admit of, but that he finds fault with the closets, and has applied vainly to the Government to have them altered; that the closets remain in the same state as when the prisoners were on the island, but the Principal Under Secretary has ordered them to be altered; that he has represented the matter five or six times in such strong terms as it would be desirable to find out the official on whom the responsibility rested, and if there were a death he would have an inquest and bring that official in guilty of manslaughter [5918]; that the place must be a prison or it will not fulfil its requirements, and he should hardly like to give an opinion as to whether it is desirable to put girls into such a place for the purpose of reclaiming them from vice; that the place is like a prison [5948]; that he does not think that there is any objection to the place on account of the dry dock being so close [5953]; that the iron bars and iron doors and everything about the place give one the idea of a prison of the rudest kind, and that the ground is wholly neglected [5962]; that the site is good, as the place is isolated [5976]. Mr. WALLACE says that he was employed in improving the grounds for some time [5988]. Mr. JOHN ROBERTSON, M.P., said the situation of the school at Newcastle was not good, as the buildings were overlooked by the townspeople, and were in the centre of a seaport town; that Biloela, though not highly suitable, was more suitable than Newcastle; that there was no other place but Biloela available for them, and he objected to the place on account of its prison-like character and associations; that if other buildings could have been got the girls would not have been sent to the island, but as it was, the name "Cockatoo" was changed to "Biloela"; that there were fine old buildings there and plenty of room, and as it would have been impossible to put up new buildings for the purpose of receiving the girls, they were sent to the island; that Biloela was the only place available; that the proximity of the dry dock is a disadvantage, but not a great one; that the buildings are clean, airy, light, and well cared for [6015-6018]. Mr. COWPER says that an institution might be placed in a more accessible position, but if it were on the main land it would be more difficult to keep away bad characters [6599]. M. F. KING says he thought the buildings required much alteration, although the site was good, as the institution was isolated, and in that respect better than the establishment at Newcastle [7519]. Captain McLERIE says that Biloela is not a proper place to which unfortunate children should be sent, as the very name of the place is enough to ruin them, though the old name of "Cockatoo" has been dropped; but he does not think much harm arises from the proximity of the dry dock [7568].

MANAGEMENT.

MANAGEMENT.

Condition at Newcastle.

From the evidence it appears that Mr. and Mrs. Lucas took charge of the institution on the 18th March, 1871, about ten weeks before the removal of the children from Newcastle, where the management was very defective owing to defects in the buildings. There was no classification; there were too many girls put together in the dormitories, and the intercourse of townspeople with the inmates injured the discipline [2489-2506.] MR. LUCAS says that for girls who are under ten years old the large dormitories would be suitable, but of bigger girls there should not be more than three in each room [2534]; that the subordination is better here than it was at Newcastle; that there are still about thirty-eight girls in the school who were at Newcastle, and who are generally the promoters of any insubordination that takes place [2621]; that at Newcastle the cook slept between the dormitories in one place and a sub-matron in the other, but that cannot be done here [2925]; and that he had been empowered by law to act as superintendent, but that Mr. Cowper had taken some power out of his hands [6301.] MRS. LUCAS, the matron, says that there has been a good deal of trouble with the girls, but not so much within the last twelve months, owing to the management; that great numbers of the troublesome girls have gone out; and that they were very disorderly at Newcastle [359]; that at Newcastle each of the officers had a girl from the institution as a servant [3307]; that when she and her husband took charge at Newcastle there were hardly any cups or plates, and their first business was to gather up knives and forks, &c., buried in the mud; that there was no order at all, the girls being like maniacs; and that having no clothing for the children when they came here, they had to wrap them in blankets and put them in their dormitories while their clothes were being washed [6244]; that they never had any night-dresses at Newcastle, when they were under the charge of Mrs. King or Capt. Clarke [6239]. MRS. KING says that at Newcastle the institution was too much overlooked by the townspeople, and the management there failed because of the need of there being a thorough division between the two classes of girls [3168]; that when she was matron superintendent of the Industrial School she had officers under her with families, who were allowed to have inmates as servants; that these servants were changed once a month, or sometimes weekly; that every Monday morning the girls were detailed, so many to each department, and were then marched away and put in charge of the officers; that she had tried to make the officers' servants dine at the general table, but found that they tattled too much; that the servant girls used to sleep with the others, but it would have been better had all the servants slept by themselves: that the cook and sub-matron slept in a room close by the girls, and that no officer sleeps with them now; that she could not sleep if she thought those little children were alone all night; that in Newcastle Mr. Parkes gave them the privilege of going to church; that each girl had a number, and all her clothing was branded with her number, the clean under-linen being given out every Saturday night; that she was very strict at muster in inspecting the girls; that they had three suits each; that there was great difficulty in making them wear hats or boots; that the girls attended muster pretty regularly, but would hide themselves sometimes; that she had a muster-roll which was called every morning, and a bed-roll which was called when the girls were in the dormitories; that Capt. Clarke did away with the roll-call and counted the girls, who used to double on him; and that it is necessary to call each girl's name and get an answer; that she had to lock the girls up at dusk because of their absconding, but they were under supervision; that they had books; that in the summer evenings they went out in the playground, under the care of the officers, and had a frolic; that she had a uniform way of dressing the girls' hair, and if a girl's hair was clean she never cut it off, but if it was not clean she had it cropped [3196-3237]. MR. F. CANE says that he held the appointment of clerk and storekeeper in the Industrial School, both at Newcastle and Biloea; that he was appointed in February, 1868, and left in March, 1871, in consequence of getting another appointment; that the institution, when he first went to Newcastle, was in a fair state, but there was a little irritation in consequence of some of the girls having their hair cut off [5535-5544]; that the first Report of the Inspector of Charities, Mr. Walker, would give an exact idea of the state of the institution at the time; that the state of things last about three months; that there were in the institution then—Mrs. King, the matron superintendent, Mrs. Rice, Mrs. Kelly, and himself, and about eighty children; that the discipline was very fair, and there was no trouble or disturbance; that the place was never more comfortable than when there were few officers, but with the increase of officers the efficiency of the school did not increase; that the punishments became more frequent, and greater notice was taken of small faults on the part of the girls, until at last the irritation culminated in a great disturbance; that it was more of a domestic institution previously; that the cutting off of the girls' hair and putting them in the cells first produced irritation, and those whose hair was cut lost all self-respect and never did any good; that the girls were not destructive at first, but afterwards became reckless; that the institution never recovered the effects of these punishments; that punishments became frequent and more severe than the offence deserved; that the Rev. Mr. Selwyn used to visit the institution at Newcastle; that Capt. Clarke became superintendent, and for a time the school was quiet, but punishments being again resorted to, the same results followed; that the school was for a time under the care of Mr. Jackson, and it was a pity he did not remain; that most of the officers were opposed to the punishments; that when Mr. Lucas took charge the place was in a deplorable state [5548-5572]. MR. ROBERTSON says that when he became Colonial Secretary in 1868, one of the first things he had to deal with was the outrageous insubordination of the school at Newcastle; that he visited the place with Mr. Forster, then a Member of the Ministry, and found things terribly disorganized; that there was a matron without a male superintendent, and the girls completely mastered her, and in consequence Mr. Clarke was appointed superintendent; that for some months afterwards the institution went on well, but from some harshness in the way of cutting the girls' hair Mr. Clarke lost control and was removed, and Mr. Lucas was then appointed; that then the conduct of the girls became worse than ever, and they were removed from Newcastle to Biloea [6015]. MR. R. C. WALKER, at one time Inspector of Charities, says that he visited Newcastle and held inquiries into the condition of School, and that upon his report the matron was removed and a superintendent appointed; that the first superintendent was Captain Jackson, then Mrs. King, and then Captain Clarke [7671-7680.] MR. F. KING, Inspector of Charities, says that Mrs. Kelly, the teacher, had much influence for good over the girls, but he always considered Mr. Lucas wanting in ability to control the girls, as he failed to inspire them with respect, had not the knack of controlling them, and was slovenly in his personal appearance; that Mrs. Kelly and Mrs. Rowland were good officers, and assisted much to restore order during the riots at Newcastle [7341-7353]; that Mr. Lucas had never represented to him that the officers were unfit for their duties; that he had recommended that the office of storekeeper should be abolished and one of the sub-matrons dispensed with [7354]; that he visited the School at Newcastle on the 7th April, 1870, on the the 13th April reporting that both Industrial School and Reformatory were in an unsatisfactory state; on the 14th June making a similar report; on the 10th October, recommending that the office of storekeeper should be done away with, and also the matron of the Reformatory; on the 14th January, 1871, reporting upon riots, and stating the superintendent had failed in administrative ability; on the 16th March reporting on riots; on 24th March reporting the removal of Mr. Clarke and the appointment of Mr. and Mrs. Lucas; on the 12th June, 1871, reporting the removal of the girls to Biloea [7457]. CAPTAIN D. F. SCOTT, Police Magistrate of Sydney, says he believes there is an Industrial School at Newcastle, and does not know that it has been transferred to Biloea [9869].

MR. LUCAS says that there is no place in the institution for the officers to sleep in near the children, which is very wrong, as they should be at hand to control the girls; that the girls are simply locked up at night and left to themselves, except that he or the matron walks round the building to see that all is right; that there is nobody in charge of them at night [2539-2542]; that there are in the institution, besides the matron and himself, a clerk and storekeeper, a house matron, two sub-matrons, a schoolmistress, a laundress, a gatekeeper, and the carter and messenger [2602]; that one of the worst features of the institution is the officers having inmates as servants; that each officer, Mrs. Kelly the teacher, Mrs. Rowland the house matron, and Mrs. Dunn and Mrs. Brackenregg, the sub-matrons, have each a girl to look after her quarters; that this system causes mischief; that the officers should all live together and have one servant appointed for them [2687]; that cooking utensils, &c., get taken down to the officers' quarters, the quarters being a lot of scattered huts; that there is confusion as to the officers' property and the property of the institution [2696]; that the officers stop and see that the girls behave themselves at meals, but dine at their own quarters [2703]; that the inmates who are officers' servants cannot dine with the other inmates, as they are at the officers' quarters, whither their meals are carried to them [2709-2712-2716]; that the officers have each got families living on the island, which is a great plague; that one matron stops in the kitchen to see the dinner properly served, and the other two stop in the dining-room [2719-2725]; that there is no one with the girls after they are locked up, the matrons being away from them, so that they can do as they like all night; that once girls broke out and went away in a boat and no one heard them [2730-2736]; that the matron is present with the girls when they rise in the morning, but he does not know whether she makes them say any prayers [2808]; that when locked up they are not made to go to bed, nor does the matron remain with them, but simply locks up the iron gates and does not see them until the gates are unlocked at 6 o'clock in the morning [2819-2822]; that he counts the children at 9 o'clock in the morning; that he and the matron count them at night in the dormitories; that the matron counts some and he the others; that he does not go into the dormitories to count them, but stands at the door [2824-2829]; that the house matron is responsible for the cleanliness of the school [2874]; that the supervision of the institution costs £12 6s. per head per year [2891]; that the matrons are not fenced off from the children, but their quarters are sixty yards away [2904-2908]; that there are no other persons besides the three sub-matrons and Mrs. Lucas to take charge of the children [2912]; that the matrons are away from them all night, except that at 9 o'clock the house matron goes through the wards, and that he goes round every night at 10 o'clock; that the matrons do not consider it their duty to sleep with the children; that he thinks they should do so, but that there is no accommodation, and it is not possible for them to be with the children in the present buildings; that the three matrons could not take charge of the six dormitories [2913-2933]; that he should be glad to see the girls out of the dormitories, and amusing themselves from 6 to 9, but that the matrons would not supervise them, as they were too tired; that they had tried it, but the matrons would not assist, and he did not think it was their duty to assist; that Mrs. Lucas, Mrs. Kelly, and himself tried it, but the girls soon got tired of it and tried to escape; that to keep them quiet would require a large staff, and that the matrons did not assist, though they were asked to do so [2950-2964]; that if the matrons were requested to assist, it would be an improvement; that the officers should all live together, but there is no place for them [2987-2990]; that the officers have not been sufficiently subordinate or attentive to their duties, or interested in their work [3003-3021]; that he should have the appointing of his own officers, as he has no control over them [3022]; that at Newcastle Mrs. King and Capt. Clarke had the power of dismissing servants, but it had been taken away from him [3039]; that Mrs. Kelly is the teacher, whose duties are confined to the schoolroom [3050]; that the officers' own families tend to take their attention from the children [3054]; that Mr. Cowper has taken some of his (the superintendent's) functions out of his hands [6301]; that there had been no pigs in the dining-room for over twelve months [6331]; that some of the officers refuse to obey his orders [6347]; that there is no muster-roll, as it got into confusion owing to children leaving the institution so fast, and one child answering for another; that they are all mustered, and he counts them himself, and prefers that to a muster-roll; that he gave up the muster-roll because it was more convenient to count the children [6377-6384]; that Mrs. Lucas was in the constant habit of attending the prayer-room, but that Mrs. Dunn and Mrs. Brackenregg sometimes attended also [6386]; that Mr. Cowper had advised him to set aside regulations and bring the girls into subjection; that Mr. Cowper had no authority there [6407]; that the sub-matrons are not suitable people to have charge of girls [6435]; that they are not moral people, to his idea, but he has only lately found them out, and there ought not to be such characters about the institution [6439-6443]; and that he has heard "Love among the Roses," regular bawdy song, sung in the schoolroom by the schoolmistress [6495]. MRS. LUCAS says that the improvement in the subordination of the place is due to good management [3260]; that there is no one with the children in their dormitories at night, but she does not consider that objectionable [3273]; that an attempt was made to amuse the children at night, but she had no assistance in carrying it out, as the sub-matrons refused to help, and so the scheme fell through [3266-3270]; that the fact of the sub-matrons having children on the premises interferes with the discipline; that the sub-matrons would not think of taking their meals with the children, though their doing so would have a good effect [3281-3286]; that she has not had that assistance from the officers under her that she should have, and that some of them are opposed to her altogether; and that the want of unanimity shows itself by their not complying with her orders [3291-3298]. MRS. KING says that the girls in the Reformatory are always under her supervision, and that at night she sleeps in a room next to them, so that if she hears any noise she can go to them [3153]; that there is not sufficient supervision over the girls when they attend religious instruction, and that one of the officers should be with them then [3242]. MRS. BRACKENEGG, sub-matron, says, that there is no system in the place, and the work allotted her is not such as she should be called upon to do [3455]; that she and the other sub-matrons see the girls into their dormitories at night; that girls have have got out at night and gone to town without being discovered; that then the girls were not counted in the dormitories, but now they are counted; that she counts the girls in her dormitory; that when the girls above referred to made their escape, they stayed out of the dormitory and were not locked up at all; that there is no muster-roll, and sometimes girls slip from one dormitory into another [3528-3541]; that there is no one in the dormitories with the girls at night [3553]; that the girls are not punished for stealing the officers' goods, and she thinks Mr. Lucas is afraid to punish them lest they should kick up a row; that when blankets are found torn, and she reports it, no notice is taken [3582]; that there is no cook, and the officers cannot perform the duties assigned by the regulations, but she is fully employed from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m. [3595]; that they sometimes go into the dormitories at night; that the girls may go to bed with their boots on, but she never saw them; that some sleep on their clothes; that if a child were taken ill in the night the officers could hear her [3762-3767]. MRS. ROWLAND, the house-matron, says, that she attends to the cleaning of the dormitories, &c., and has charge of the clothing, &c. [3801]; that there is no one in the dormitories with the children all night [3830]; that she goes down at 9 p.m. to put out the lights, but no one sees that the children go to bed or that they fold up their clothes; that they stay up afterwards sometimes, and may romp or do anything that suits their fancies; that they tear their clothes and blankets and are not punished for it [3860-3870]; that frequent altercations between Mr. and Mrs. Lucas and the sub-matrons take place in the presence of the girls [3878-3885-3888-3896]. See "Subordinate Officers"; that she is employed in the institution from 6 a.m. until nearly 7 p.m., with the exception of her meal hours; that she has never been asked to assist in amusing the children at night, but does not see how she could do it [3912]; that she thinks if an officer slept near the children at night certain evil practices could be prevented [3940]; that she is not aware that Mr. Cowper ever took the control of the institution out of Mr. Lucas's hands, but that when Mr. Cowper held out to the girls the hope of going to service there was a great change for the better in their behaviour; that until Mr. Cowper went there the Sunday was a dreadful day to the officers, the insubordination being so great [3986-3993]; that no officer would object to assist in supervising the girls at night, but that at present it could not be done [4065]. MRS. AUSTIN, laundress, says that she had said from the first there ought to be better officers over the girls, and that if there were, the institution would be more successful [4586]; that she has nothing to complain of in the management of the place, and knows nothing about it [4752]. MRS. CONNELL, gatekeeper, says that a visitor might go in and think the place perfection, and in a few hours afterwards it would be hardly safe for the officers to walk among the girls; that she has never heard of Mr. Cowper's having attempted to take any authority out of the superintendent's hands [5271-5275]. CONSTABLE TURNER says he has never heard Mrs. Austin complain of the management and say it was bad, nor has he heard her say she changed her mind and praised it [5326]. CONSTABLE GLASSINGTON says that when he reported to the superintendent the escape of a girl, the superintendent refused to believe that the girl was gone until search was made for her and she could not be found [5484]. MR. F. CANE says that when there were fewer officers the institution was better managed [5553]; that the style of management is bad, and the system has little to do with the condition of the place; that refinement, education, and proper deportment are essential requisites; that there was an utter want of moral control over the girls; that they did as they liked in every respect, and that there was a want of proper subordination to the officers generally; that the officers did not act harmoniously, and the girls delighted in setting one against the other; that there was not that mutual respect between the inferior and superior officers that there should have been [5579-5590]; that Mr. Cowper's influence produced a great change for the better, as there was an effort on his part to secure the interest of many persons in the children's welfare; that the officers were asked to confer with Mr. Cowper, and did so at a meeting called for the purpose; that Mr. Cowper was armed with authority from the Government, but refused to do anything without Mr. Lucas's full consent [5597-5608]; that the evening amusements were carried on successfully until Mrs. Lucas upset the arrangements [5621]; that Mr. Lucas at a time of riot seemed very ready to receive assistance, and nobody seemed to know how to prevent them [5697]; that when he left the institution the girls might have been managed without difficulty [5705]; that he believed Mr. Lucas had said Mr. Cowper acted without authority [5748]. SISTER MARY BENEDICT says that if the superiors were vigilant the young girls would not be corrupted by the elder ones, and that there should be some one in authority always with them; and that the superintendent and officers are not so much with the children as she would like them to be [5789-5807]. MRS. FOOT says she has not seen much of the management, but has remarked Mr. and Mrs. Lucas always looking about after the girls [5873]. DR. O. S. EVANS says that the system of management was not such as he would advise, the girls being allowed to do as they liked, and the rules for the guidance of the officers posted up for the girls to read, and that there was a want of firmness [5932]; that Mr. Lucas professed to be hampered by instructions, so that he could do nothing; that he appeared to be tied down by influences which he (Dr. Evans) could not make out [5966]. DR. W. G. WATSON thinks the management judicious as far as he can judge, but has not seen much of it [5981]. MR. WALLACE says he witnessed many disputes between the officers and Mrs. Lucas [6000]. MR. ROBERTSON says that it soon became apparent that Mr. and Mrs. Lucas were wanting in some of the qualifications necessary for the efficient discharge of their duties, and that being so, he induced Mr. Cowper to see what aid he could give; that Mr. Cowper succeeded in effecting an improvement, but owing to some want of temper on Mrs. Lucas's part matters had not since gone on so well [6015]. MRS. DUNN says that there have been altercations between Mr. Lucas and the subordinate officers in the presence of the girls [6137]. Mr. Charles Cowper, junior, Water Police Magistrate, that being provided with quarters at Cockatoo Island he was asked by the Colonial Secretary (Mr. Robertson) to render some assistance to Mr. and Mrs. Lucas in the management of Bilocla; that he complied with the request, visited the place frequently, induced some philanthropic people to visit the girls and afford them religious instruction, and succeeded by this means in improving the condition of the institution; that he instituted an evening school, at which Mrs. Lucas refused to assist; that Mrs. Lucas afterwards went into the evening school and upset all his arrangements, thus bringing about the failure of the scheme; that Mr. and Mrs. Lucas became jealous of his influence in the school, and he had therefore discontinued his exertions some time ago [6590]. MR. R. C. WALKER says that bad management was the cause of the original outbreak among the girls [7675]. MR. F. KING says that the children always looked discreditable, that Mrs. Kelly and Mrs. Rowland are good officers, and that the superintendent (Mr. Lucas) is wanting in ability to conduct the school successfully [7335-7344-7353].

MR.

MR. LUCAS says that he is the superintendent of the Industrial School, and also of the Reformatory for Girls, and has been so since 18th March, 1871; that he is allowed residence and rations, a salary of £135 as superintendent of the Industrial School, and of £65 as superintendent of the Reformatory; that Mrs. Lucas is the matron of the Industrial School, at a salary of £100 with rations [2488-2496]; that he has no power under the Act of punishing the girls, except for running away, when he can imprison them for fourteen days; that the Executive has given him power to punish them by fourteen days imprisonment on bread and water for rioting, but if only one girl is punished the Colonial Secretary has to be notified of it; that he does punish the girls first and reports to the Colonial Secretary afterwards [2628-2637]; that he has two of the inmates employed as his servants [2688]; that he thinks all the officers except the superintendent should live together in one building [2695]; that the matron attends when the children rise in the morning, and she has informed him that they say their prayers then; that the matron does not remain with the children in the dormitories from 6 to 9 p.m., but she sees them in the morning at 6 o'clock [2804-2821]; that he counts the children at 9 o'clock in the morning before they go into school, and again before evening prayers, and again before they are locked up; that he does not go into the dormitories to count them; that the matron counts some and he counts the others, and he thinks none can be absent without his knowledge [2824-2829]; that he has caned the girls two or three times with a small bamboo about the size of a pencil; that he canes the big ones, and the matron the little ones [2850-2855]; that when he locks up girls to punish them he sends a report to the Colonial Secretary [2864]; that he took charge of the school with a view of benefiting the children, and because he wished to reform them, as that has been his work for a quarter of a century, and that he is not supported by his subordinates as he should be; that he had no control over them, and that he should be allowed to select officers he could agree with, as was recommended by the Inspector of Charities [3013-3032]; that he has charge of the Reformatory, the matron Mrs. King having the immediate control of that institution [3057]; that the power of dismissing servants which was possessed by former officers in charge of the schools had been taken away from him [3039]; that Mrs. Lucas managed to carry on an evening school for the girls for a short time [3047]; that his duty in superintending the Reformatory is simply to visit it and see that it is properly carried on, and that Mrs. King does her duty; that Mrs. King looks after the children there and teaches them [3082]; that his salary received on account of the Reformatory ought not to be reckoned, as without it the salary he received as superintendent of the Industrial School would be inadequate [3106]; that the regulations of the Executive and the Act of Parliament empowering him to act as superintendent, Mr. Cowper (W.P.M.) came and took some functions out of his hands [6301]; that on a certain Saturday he [the witness] told Mrs. Rowland that if she had been a man he would have dealt with her differently; that he did not say he would give her "a lift in the ear," but felt he could almost strike her, for kicking his dog and cat [6319]; that when Mrs. Brackenregg went off in a huff and danced and capered, he mimicked her in the presence of the children; that she was so ridiculous he could not help it; that she refused to obey orders, but he had not reported her to the Colonial Secretary; that he told Mrs. Dunn that if he lost his place they should all go with him [6336-6348]; that he has no muster roll, as he prefers counting the children, to calling the roll [6377-6384]; that Mrs. Lucas has attended the prayer-room ever since she has been matron; that Mrs. Lucas had a disturbance there with Mrs. Brackenregg; that he told Mrs. Brackenregg to go out of the place; that he has struck the children with a cane to the extent of three or four stripes; that the regulations do not allow him to inflict corporal punishment on the girls; that he was aware the Colonial Secretary had forbid the superintendent to inflict corporal punishment, but he was recommended by Mr. Cowper and by Dr. Evans to set aside the rules; that according to the rules neither the cane nor the cells were to be used, but Mr. Cowper told him to set aside the rules; that Mr. Cowper had no authority there then; that Mr. Cowper got the Colonial Secretary to allow the matrons to use the cane; that Mr. Robertson's letter expressly forbid the superintendent using it; that he had never given any of the girls black eyes; that he boxed one girl's ears and his hand just blackened the corner of her eye; that he had caned a girl named Emma G— who showed the marks of the cane next day to Mr. King, the Inspector of Charities; that he caned Annie D— in the dining-room [6386-6427]; that he never put his clenched hand in Mrs. Rowland's face; that he would hang himself rather than say he was sorry to such a woman as her; that he has not reported any of his officers to the Colonial Secretary since he reported against Mr. Cane, on which occasion the report was not attended to [6428-6537]; that he and Mrs. Lucas had an altercation with the sub-matrons in the presence of the children one night, as described by Mrs. Rowland in her evidence [question 4094]; that the account given by Mrs. Rowland is not true, as he did not use the words imputed, though he may have used similar words; that he believes the greater part of the story to be an invention; that he is not the first superintendent who has been turned out of the institution by a clique; that he never appeals to the girls or believes them in preference to the matrons; that he does not scold the matrons for bringing him tales; that on the occasion of his birthday he gave the girls a treat, and sang a song; which he sang to amuse, and not considering whether it would improve the mind or not* [6465-6483, and note on page 198]; he thought it good amusement for the girls, would sing it anywhere, and has sung it often at wedding and birthday parties [6489]; that Mrs. Lucas had objected to the girls singing "Love among the Roses" a regular bawdy song, in the school [6495-6502]; that he did not tell Mrs. Dunn she had committed a theft, but that he ought to have suspended her for a breach of the rules [6509]; that he never had any quarrel with Mrs. Kelly, but that he did say to her "And pray who are you?—you must be Mrs. Somebody," in the presence of the girls [6518-6525]; that he used to sign the book for anything got out of the store; that nobody gets anything from the store but by his orders; that if children get things from the store without orders he is not aware of it; that he does not always check the issue of goods [6529-6540]; that there were no entries made in the daily journal for six weeks after he went to Newcastle, because he had no time to make them; that the reports are written by the storekeeper at his dictation [6542-6544]; that he sent in a letter from Newcastle to the Government expressing

* The following is a verse of the song in question:—

"It's true I fell in love with the cook,
I'll tell you the reason why—
She has plenty of mince-pies,
Plum-pudding, and roast beef;
And when poor belly is empty,
She can give it relief."

Superintendent and matron; their duties and powers: charges against them.

expressing his views (Appendix L 2); that the copy handed in is the substance of what he wrote; that the letter (Appendix M 3) was also written by him [6571-6574]; that he does not know how certain marks and bruises came upon the girls, but had slapped a few of them with his open hand; that he had touched Mary W— with the cane, but did not use it to Annie S— or Kate S—ns, though he struck the latter with his open hand [9328-9339]; that he does not remember whether he dragged the girl Kate S— up to the wall and endeavoured to rub out with the hair of her head a drawing upon it; that he might have done so, but cannot speak with more certainty; that he was put out of temper by the girls calling him an "Orange sod," and making indecent figures on the walls; that he asked them to rub it out, and they would not, and when they refused to obey his orders he tried to force two of them to do it, and they struggled; that it may be true he tried to rub the figures out with the girls' hair, as he was very excited; that he might have thrown Annie S— on the floor; that he struck Janet B—, like the others, with his open hand [9342, 9353]; that he imprisoned several girls and did not let some out until he found out who were the guilty ones, and that he found that out by hearing what they had to say; that he did not cane any of the girls, but Mrs. Lucas may have done so; that he struck one of the W— girls; that he does not remember caning Annie S—, or leaning down on Kate S—n's throat and chest with his knee until he nearly choked her, or standing on her back and bearing his whole weight on her; that he told the girls they need not trouble themselves to make statements to the Commissioners, as there was no likelihood that any one who knew what liars they were would believe a word they said unless it was corroborated; that he can tell what the girls are going to say beforehand; that the only way in which he gets information is by hearing the girls talk [9358-9374]; that everything done on the place goes to Mr. Cowper, who knows every little thing much better than he does; that he had never said anything to the girls about Fenianism until they began calling him an Orange everything, but when they called him Orange names he has said they were a pack of Fenians [9389-9391]; that he said to two Protestant girls who were calling out that they were Fenians—"If you two are Fenians, you are all Fenians; is that what it is, you are Fenians? but I will find out the head of this Fenian conspiracy" [note, page 310]; that he told the girls this was a Fenian affair, and he would expose the leaders of it; that he is not going to tell the Commission who the leaders are, but will appeal to those who can do him justice; that he has no confidence in the Commission, and does not think it will deal fairly with him; that he was not throwing stones at the girls when they were locked up, but he threw a stone against the dormitory to frighten them [9410-9420]; that he had not heard any of this talk about Orangeism before, but was not sure, as his memory was not good; that believing there are persons of influence and authority inciting the girls to insubordination, and that he can point those persons out, he declines to give the Commission any information on the subject; and that as far as his situation is concerned he should only be too glad to get out of it [9422-9429].

Mrs. MARY ANNE LUCAS, Matron of the Industrial School, says that she has been acting in that capacity ever since her husband's appointment, is supposed to superintend the domestic arrangements of the institution, and has sufficient assistance [325-3255]; that when the inmates are locked up in the dormitories, between 6 and 9 p.m., either she or Mr. Lucas is constantly in and out [3277]; that she has nothing to do with the appointment of subordinate officers, and that she is not supported by the subordinates; that she has borne a good deal of insult and annoyance [3292-3301]; that the evening school was carried on for some time by Mr. Cane and Mrs. Kelly, but that when she went into the room Mrs. Kelly gave up; that, as matron, she thought it her duty to be with the girls; that her husband was there sometimes, but she did not know whether he was enough to keep order in the place [3337-3344]; that from what she had seen of Mr. Cane and Mrs. Kelly she would not leave the girls with them, as they were trying to work her and her husband out; that Mr. Lucas was not present all the time; that wherever the girls were she felt it her duty to be; that she did not think so at first, but afterwards went in [3350-3358]; that she and her husband count the children, but do not call a roll; that there was a roll once, but they had adopted the plan of counting [3375]; that though the rules say that the superintendent shall endeavour to obtain needle-work, washing, &c., to be performed at the school, the profits to be divided amongst the girls monthly, in proportion to their good marks, nothing of the kind has been done, as there was no opportunity, except that some wool-work was done in the evening, sold, and the proceeds divided among the girls [3404]; that she thinks the superintendent should choose his own officers [3406]; that she has never reported their conduct to the Government [3427]; that Mr. Lucas made a regulation that no visitors should be admitted after 7 o'clock, or any person allowed out after 10 p.m.; that she has visitors as well as the subordinates [3435]; that she denies that she speaks roughly to the officers before the children; that she is but human, and has a right to defend herself when insulted; that she never stood by and allowed the girls to act improperly; that on an occasion when a girl assaulted her, and Mr. Lucas refused to put the girl in the cells, she did not throw the keys or cane at him; that she threw down the keys, and said she would retire and not be pulled about like that; that Mr. Lucas would not take the keys, and they dropped; that the girls were not present; that Mr. Cowper had said a good deal about her temper, but she had never shown temper to him but once, and she would do the same again; that she is well aware it is said she has a bad temper, but there was no other matron of an institution who had to put up with such insults as she had; that she and her husband stood alone, but of course the subordinates had Mr. Cowper at their back; that she believed Mr. Cowper was carrying out what he said eighteen months ago, that he would not leave a stone unturned until he got Mr. Lucas removed; that she goes through prayers with the Protestant children; that she ordered Mrs. Brackenregg out of the room for telling a girl to disobey her; that she could not stand there and be defied by an assistant; that she called Mr. Lucas in on that occasion, but he never goes to the prayer-room unless called in, and on that occasion he told Mrs. Brackenregg to go out, and she went; that she cannot say what Mr. Lucas said to her; that she did taunt Mrs. Brackenregg with having kept a public-house, but did not do so in the presence of the girls, and she herself had been told to go and serve soup out in the Soup Kitchen, and go to the wash-tub again, and that Mr. Lucas would have to get a cart and sell tripe; and when she first gave evidence she did not wish to bring this forward [6149-6175, and Note page 182]; that it is only lately she has taken the children's words rather than the officers', but never in the girls' presence; that she has no recollection of the circumstance stated in Mrs. Rowland's evidence (question 3876), but that it is a common thing for Mrs. Rowland to say that the dirty clothes have not been given in; that disputes about these things sometimes take place in the presence of the girls, and the girls may have said "Go it—give it them," when these disputes occurred, but that she is not a stone, to allow people to insult her; that she has, when a girl has been sent on a private errand by a matron, called the girl back and told her not to go; that she never told told Mrs. Rowland that she would run every Roman Catholic out of the place; that she did tell Rose O—— not to threaten her with the priests, and may have said "poor miserable things of priests," but cannot say whether she did or not, as it was so long ago; that the Roman Catholic children are as dear to her as the others; that the altercation described by Mrs. Rowland (question 4094) did take place before the girls, but was caused by Mrs. Rowland having insulted one of the girls; that Mr. Lucas was there and said it was Mrs. Rowland's fault, but she (Mrs. Lucas) did not say—"As true as there's a God in Heaven, Janey W—— and Sarah H—— I will make you suffer for this night"; and that she believes Sarah B—— did say—"Give it her—she wants it" [6176-6198]; that she did not on the occasion of Mrs. Brackenregg being sent out of the prayer-room call out to Mr. Lucas—"Come here and put this woman out"; that she does not recollect Mrs. Brackenregg saying it was time to stop quarrelling now they had come into the prayer-room; that this did not happen; that she complained once to Mr. Lucas about the sewing being badly done, but did not on that occasion abuse the matrons in the girls' presence; that she may have said to Mrs. Rowland, when a girl has been called up to make a statement—"Stop and let the girl speak"; that Mr. Lucas on that occasion told Mrs. Rowland to hold her tongue, and may have told her (Mrs. Lucas) also; that she remembers the circumstances of the dispute about clothes stated by Mrs. Rowland (question 4183), and that Mrs. Rowland was proved to have been in the wrong; that she did not hear Mr. Lucas on that occasion say—"You will go to the Royal Commission now and tell your lies, but I have seen the day when a woman who struck my dog or cat I would give her a lift in the ear"; that she left the room, Mr. Lucas remaining, and she can't say what he said; that she never told a little boy to come out of the corner when Mrs. Rowland put him there; that she does not remember laughing at Mrs. Rowland when she shook a girl for tearing her pinafore; that it may have happened; that once when Mrs. Rowland knocked a child's head against the wall, she looked at her and smiled, and said—"Your tender mercies are very great" [6199-6224]; that she may have punished a girl named Ellen St——, but never dragged her about by the hair of her head; that she has never tripped children up, and got them down and put her knee on their stomachs, as Mrs. Rowland has done [6225-6234]; that she recollected thrashing Bridget M'——, and has done many things, but nothing that she would not do to her own children; that she did not suppose there was any person between the superintendent and the Government, but that when Mr. Cowper went to the island one Sunday and ordered her to let some girls out of confinement she did so; that when Mr. Cowper ordered that some girls should be put into the cells she obeyed him without telling him any of them were sick; that she does not think she would know Emily W——'s writing, and does not believe that the letter (produced) expressing sorrow for behaving so badly on the day she was "put down the cells" and asking Mr. Cowper to get her a situation, as she was so miserable because "Mrs. Lucas was always scolding her, is Emily W——'s letter at all; that she does not say Mr. Cowper forged it, but she has known greater forgeries than that, and she thinks the letter has been got up for the purposes of the Commission [6254-6271]; that the superintendent and matron lost all influence over the girls, as they were led to believe that Mr. Cowper was over them [6279]; that the superintendent was the proper person to recommend girls for situations [6283]; that Mr. Cowper weakened the superintendent's influence; that she had no influence over the girls when they were riotous, but she had never run out of the place; that if anything had been said against her character she should like to be questioned about it; that she has had two and a half years of such worry as no salary would pay for; that she has done her duty as much as is in the power of a human being [6286-6291].

Mrs. KING says that she is the matron of the Reformatory at Biloele, and formerly held the office of matron superintendent of the Industrial School at Biloele [3131, 3196]; that practically the control of the Reformatory is in her hands, though Mr. Lucas is the superintendent [3140]; Mrs. BRACKENREGG says that she and Mr. Lucas do not get on at all comfortably, as his ideas are low and vulgar, and she does not think any one could get on with him; that he took it upon himself to mimic her walk before the girls at muster, and they clapped their hands and said "That's right, Mr. Lucas—give it them"; that he never complains to them privately, but abuses them at muster before the girls; that often when the officers said they would send in a memo. of their grievances, Mr. Lucas said it was no use, that with the large body of people he had to support him he did not care for either Mr. Parkes or Mr. Robertson; that he has said these things before the girls frequently and cares for nobody; that he does not know how to manage the institution, and puts down all mishaps to the officers; that when the officers talk together he thinks they are talking about him; that she was the other day talking to a girl in the dormitory and Mrs. Lucas rushed at her and said "Don't you be talking about me"; that when she is told of some act of insubordination Mrs. Lucas says "Tell me who did it"; that if she complains to Mrs. Lucas of a girl, she says "Oh, you are always trying to get up rows"; that on the occasion of a disturbance in the dormitories Mr. and Mrs. Lucas gave them a volley of abuse before the girls, and said the disturbance was all their work; that the girls pick up Mr. Lucas's spirit at once, as these vulgar-minded people do, and shout out to the officers [3475-3486]; that Mr. Lucas is suspicious, and says the very girls are put up to things by the matrons; that he was always accusing her of hearing tales from a girl whom she had five months in her quarters [3488]; that Mr. Lucas does not sit down with the children at meals [3492]; that Mr. Lucas's own girls do not attend the dining-room, and so the officers' girls do not; that if Mr. Lucas enforced the girls' attendance they would attend, but as he does not, they do as they like [3500]; that she makes the same complaint against Mrs. Lucas as against Mr. Lucas, because if he was not so much influenced by her he would be better than he is; that she represents things to him as she likes, and what the officers say is put down as nothing at all; that it is a decided oversight to have a superintendent's wife associated with him as matron of an institution, as the officers find it impossible to get justice done them; that Mr. Lucas says he knows his wife and has never known her to tell an untruth; that she countermands the sub-matron's orders and has done so in several instances; that if she (Mrs. Brackenregg) gives an order for anything to be done in a certain way Mrs. Lucas orders it to be done in another way; that Mrs. Lucas will not reason but flies into a temper [3511-3527]; that she attended the prayer-room until Mr. Lucas found out that it was Mrs. Lucas's duty to do so, when she came and then Mr. Lucas ordered her (Mrs. Brackenregg) out of the room; that once Mr. Lucas asked her to go to the evening school in his place and she went [3555-3559]; that Mrs. Lucas gets into a rage with Mr. Lucas and throws the keys at him and says—"Go and mind the institution yourself," and then he will coax her to go back; that she did so in the case of the dispute with Mary C——, when she insisted on the girl being put down the cells and Mr. Lucas did not want to do it, but did it at last to pacify her; that the girls were all about the place when this took place; that once Mrs. Lucas went into the sewing-room and abused her and Mrs. Dunn because a girl had used wrong cotton in sewing a dress, and Mr. Lucas came and helped her to scold them before the girls, and that then they both went over to Mrs. Rowland, Mrs. Lucas saying,—"We will go and give it to her now"; that all the rest of that that afternoon she (Mrs. Brackenregg), could not get on with her work, and Mr. Lucas said she was only an attendant there; that Mrs. Lucas told her once she had better go back and keep a public-house, and did it in the presence of the girls; that Mrs. Lucas is easily provoked; that when one of the girls told her, she (Mrs. Brackenregg), had heard her called "Betty Four-eyes," she abused her for standing by and hearing her abused, and said she had her friends and would not hear what she (Mrs. Brackenregg), had to say [3584-3594]; that when she reprimands the girls for irregularities they will say "Oh, Mr. Lucas won't say anything"; that the girls show them great disrespect, because of the way in which they are abused; that Mrs. Lucas thinks nothing of telling the matrons they do not speak the truth; that she says so before the girls, and in any case the girls, words are not taken except when it suits Mr. and Mrs. Lucas; that Mrs. Lucas gets into a towering rage, and says the most violent things [3622-3632]; that Mrs. Lucas is present at the children's meals sometimes, but takes no notice of irregularities there [3617]; that Mr. Lucas in punishing the girls uses a larger cane than that used by the sub-matrons [3645]; that Mrs. Lucas canes the girls pretty freely sometimes, using Mr. Lucas's cane, and giving them a sound beating [3656-3664]; that some time ago a girl showed to Mr. King the marks on her arm where Mr. Lucas beat her, and that Mr. Lucas said at muster he would cane the girls whenever he liked; that she has seen the marks of the cane on Annie D——'s back [3676]; that once when the matrons heard the girls making a disturbance they went down to assist Mr. and Mrs. Lucas, and got abused for it [3754]. Mrs. ROWLAND, house matron, says, that Mr. and Mrs. Lucas have seen the irregularities of the girls, and that when she has reported the tearing of clothes and blankets Mrs. Lucas takes no notice [3865]; that the girls' words are often taken in preference to the sub-matrons'; that she gets abused in every way; that Mr. Lucas has told all the matrons they are not to be believed, and that he knew his wife and would believe her better than all the matrons; that he has said this before the girls; that she does not remember Mrs. Lucas saying so; that Mrs. Lucas accused Mrs. Brackenregg of prompting a girl she had as a servant to tell tales; that Mr. Lucas has told her he would not believe her, on different occasions; that when the girls are mustered up, Mr. and Mrs. Lucas choose that time for abusing the matrons, and the girls make comments on what takes place; that all the affairs of the place are settled before the girls; that one night at tea the girls were riotous, and she asked Mrs. Dunn to go for Mr. Lucas, and she met Mrs. Lucas, who brought Mr. Lucas, who came in and abused her (Mrs. R.), and put his hand up into her face and said he would suspend her, and that next morning he went and asked her to make it up; that he thought her one of the best officers on the place, and would she shake hands with him; that when she makes a complaint to Mrs. Lucas, that lady says—"You can fight your own battles, we are not going to be bullies for you"; that when she gives an order Mrs. Lucas will give quite a different one, and orders the girls not to obey the sub-matrons but her; that Mrs. Lucas at Newcastle said she would run every Roman Catholic out of the place; that she said so to her (Mrs. R.); that on another occasion Mr. Lucas said to the girls at muster, that he would "just as soon cane Parkes as one of them"; that he "did not care two-pence for Parkes [3874-3898]; that she has been made to put strait-jackets on the girls when policemen were standing by, and that the matrons are constantly abused before the girls on these occasions [3903]; that when there are any charges made against the matrons, the girls are told of them [3961]; that the control of the place was not taken out of Mr. Lucas's hands by Mr. Cowper that she is aware of [3986]; that Mr. Lucas did abuse her, and put his hand into her face, and as she intended to report him to the Colonial Secretary he begged her pardon [4007]; that she has heard Mr. Lucas speak very disrespectfully of Mr. Cowper [4051]; that Mr. and Mrs. Lucas conducted the evening school for some time, but she did not know why they gave it up [4507]; that on the occasion of a disturbance, when she and the other matrons went down to assist in quelling it, Mr. and Mrs. Lucas accused them of being there to back the girls up, and when the girls called them names they were not prevented [4086]; that on this occasion Mrs. Lucas said "Here are your friends come to back you, Janey W—— and Sarah H——, and as true as there's a God in heaven I will make you suffer for this night"; and Mr. Lucas said to her (Mrs. R.) "This is all your fault, all this row and noise; it will be a good thing when you are out of the place"; and the girls said, "Give it her—she wants it, &c."; that on another occasion while she was reporting some irregularities to Mr. Lucas, she heard Mrs. Lucas call out "Come and put this woman out of the prayer-room," and he went over and put Mrs. Brackenregg out of the room; that on this same morning Mr. and Mrs. Lucas were at Mrs. Brackenregg at muster, and she also had a quarrel with Mrs. Lucas; that Mrs. Lucas only conducted prayers with the Protestant children ever since the quarrel but not before [4094-4105]; that she is willing to take her oath that all she has said to the Commission about Mr. Lucas is true; that on one occasion, in a dispute about some clothes, Mr. and Mrs. Lucas took the part of a girl against her, and Mr. Lucas said—"You will go to the Royal Commission now and tell your lies, but I have seen the day when a woman who struck my dog or cat I would give her a lift in the ear"; that there were two or three girls present; that Mr. Lucas said to Mrs. Dunn—"If I lose my place here, I will drag out every one of you with me"; that when she put a little boy in the corner, Mrs. Lucas called him out; that she has seen Mr. Lucas beat Henrietta M—— so that she had a black eye for three weeks afterwards; that Mrs. Lucas beat Lizzie L—— and gave her a black eye, and dragged Ellen S—— by the hair of the head, pulling out handfuls of hair, and took another girl by the hair and beat her until the blood streamed from the girl's nose; that when she (Mrs. Rowland) asked her to let the girl go, Mrs. Lucas turned upon her, and Mr. Lucas told her to hold her tongue [4182-4190]. Mrs. DUNN says that the officers do not agree with Mr. and Mrs. Lucas, as Mrs. Lucas does not feel pleased with what is done, and finds fault with the officers before the girls; that this has taken place in her own case several times; that in the sewing-room once some work was wrongly done, and Mrs. Lucas said unpleasant things to her before the girls, and then went and called in Mr. Lucas to abuse her; that Mrs. Lucas spoke to her most insultingly before the girls, and had done so frequently to Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Brackenregg; that the girls themselves say they will only obey Mrs. Lucas [4124-4136]; that the officers could get on much better with the children if the matron and superintendent were more strict; that Mr. Lucas is too good-natured, lets the girls have too much of their own way, does not attend to complaints made by the matrons, and would believe the girls rather than the matrons [4262]; that the girls who were servants to Mr. Lucas were the first to commit irregularities as to stopping away from dinner; that she has not been properly supported by the officers over her, as if she goes to Mr. Lucas and makes a complaint he will call up the girls, hear their tale, and believe them rather than her, and scold the officers for making complaints [4272-4277]; that on one occasion, when Mr. Lucas gave an entertainment in honor of his birthday, he sang a vulgar song, which she thought a very improper one to sing to the girls [4311, 4387]; that there have been disputes between Mr. and Mrs. Lucas before the children; that if a girl misbehaves herself and Mr. Lucas will not punish her, Mrs. Lucas insists upon it, and they have high words; that that she has twice seen Mrs. Lucas throw the keys at Mr. Lucas and tell him to manage the place himself; that this was done in a very excited way—her usual manner when she loses her temper, and that the children were present and saw it [4366-4373]; that she was told that Henrietta M—s black eye was caused by Mr. Lucas beating her; that she did not see the beating of Mary C— on the occasion when Mrs. Lucas threw down the keys, and does not know whether the girl was bleeding; that Lizzie L— was beaten and had a black eye, but she does not know whether Mr. and Mrs. Lucas beat her; that she heard Mrs. Rowland say Mrs. Lucas had knocked Ellen S— about, but did not know whether it was so [4447-4469]; that Mr. Lucas said to her on the 21st July, 1873—"If I lose my place I will drag every one of you out with me," the remark being made in the course of a dispute about a loaf of bread, on which occasion he said she had committed a theft, the dispute taking place in the presence of the girls; that she thinks it injudicious to have a superintendent and matron man and wife [4480-4489]. MRS. AUSTIN, laundress, says that Mr. Lucas often goes into the laundry, but Mrs. Lucas does not; that she sometimes gets on well with Mrs. Lucas, and the girls are getting on better with her lately; that Mrs. Lucas has sometimes shown temper to her [4573]; that she has never seen Mrs. Lucas thrashing the girls, and does not think she has ever beat them severely, as she is small and they are very quick, but has heard the girls say that she has beaten them [4589]; that she cannot say whether Mrs. Lucas was jealous of the laundry girls getting situations before the others, and that Mrs. Lucas did not complain to her of the laundry girls all getting situations through Mr. Cowper; that she was once going to complain to the Colonial Secretary about her, but did not do so [4595]; that once or twice she has had disputes with Mrs. Lucas about the girls taking water from the laundry [4637]; that Mr. Lucas has often told her that he punished the girls against his conscience and to please the matrons—that he has said to her—"How often I have punished those girls just for quietness' sake" [4645, 4682]. MR. PRIOR, clerk and storekeeper, says that he makes no entries in the journal except by the superintendent's order, and that the officers are not, as he thinks, acting harmoniously with the superintendent [4791]; that he has never witnessed any altercations between the superintendent and his wife, or between them and the sub-matrons, but that he has seen Mrs. Lucas out of temper with the children [4811]; that there was a girl who, having shown to Mr. King some marks of the cane upon her arm, said that they had been inflicted by Mr. Lucas [4928]. MRS. KELLY, teacher, says that she cannot say that the officers and the superintendent work harmoniously together; that she has come into collision with Mr. Lucas, and objects to the manner in which he speaks to her before the girls, and to his interference in the duties of the school; that on one occasion the messenger having brought her a letter which had gone down to the institution the day before, she asked how it was, and the messenger said he could not read the address, that in consequence of that the postmistress put the next letter that came for her in paper, and Mr. Lucas came up and asked how it was her letter came under cover, and in the course of a dispute which followed, said, in the presence of the girls—"And who pray are you? you must be Mrs. Somebody"; that this kind of thing has happened more than once; that she has often heard Mr. and Mrs. Lucas speaking to the other officers disrespectfully at muster [5020-5030]; that she has been accused by Mr. Lucas of not teaching properly [6106]; that on two occasions when the girls broke her crockery and stole her money, Mr. Lucas took no action when the matters were reported to him [6109]; that within the last few months Mrs. Lucas came to her crying, and said she had never been so abused in her life as she was by Mr. Prior; that she (Mrs. K.) had always tried to use moral influence with the girls until Mrs. Lucas insulted her for doing so; that Mr. Lucas will support whatever his wife says; that she and Mr. Cane assisted in starting the evening school, which Mrs. Lucas at first thought a perfect waste of time, but on the second evening Mrs. Lucas went in and upset all the arrangements and she (Mrs. K.) did not go any more, as she considered she had been insulted [6125]; that Mrs. Lucas had charge of the libraries; that Sister Mary Benedict made a list of books for the Catholic children and gave it to Mr. Lucas, who sent it to the Colonial Secretary's Office; that Mr. Lucas did not object to any of the books that were brought, though Sister Mary Benedict did, and that before issuing them Mr. Lucas covered them with calico [9570-9586]. MRS. CONNELL, gatekeeper, says that Mr. Lucas often goes backwards and forwards to Balmain, and that she waits for him until 10 or 11 o'clock [5064]; that Emma G— told her Mr. Lucas had caned her, and she had shown her arm to Mr. King; that she saw the girl show her arm to Mr. King, who made a remark as to its being rather hard; that Mr. Lucas is naturally kind, but when his temper gets up he gets a little harsh; that she has seen Henrietta M— and Ellen S— with marks of ill-usage upon them, but cannot say whether the injuries were inflicted by Mr. or Mrs. Lucas [5183-5192]; that Mr. Lucas had visitors in the evening, but has had none since he made the order excluding visitors after 7 p.m. [5213]; that as far as she knew, Mr. Cowper had never done anything but assist Mr. Lucas; that she does not think Mrs. Lucas has a good temper, but cannot say much about it, and that the officers consider her to be a bad temper [5275]. CONSTABLE TURNER says that he believes Mr. Cowper has supported Mr. Lucas in every possible way, and that he recalls Mr. Cowper saying that Mr. and Mrs. Lucas were jealous of him [5345]; that the matrons put strait-jackets on some of the girls, under Mrs. Lucas's orders [5389]. CONSTABLE GLASSINGTON says that he has seen the girls put into strait-jackets and gagged by the superintendent and matrons [5443]; that when he reported a girl's escape on one occasion the superintendent refused to believe that the girl was gone until search was made, and the girl could not be found [5484]; that he has heard Mrs. Austin complain of Mrs. Lucas, and say she is very bad-tempered [5508]. MR. F. CANE says that when Mr. Lucas took charge of the institution it was in a most deplorable state [5572]; that Mr. Lucas was not responsible for the state of things that then existed, as he did not create it, but that he carried it on [5582]; that the officers did not work well together, the matron particularly failing to act in harmony with the sub-matrons [5588]; that Mr. Cowper came to assist, but did nothing without Mr. Lucas's full consent [5608]; that he and Mrs. Kelly assisted in carrying on the evening school, but Mrs. Lucas altered their arrangements, and so spoiled the plan [5621]; that there was a want of co-operation on the part of the matron with Mr. Cowper, while there was nothing on Mr. Cowper's part but an earnest desire to co-operate with Mr. Lucas to the fullest extent [5634]; that Mrs. Lucas is a woman of very irascible temper, and he has seen her exhibit temper to Mr. Cowper so that Mr. Lucas has been obliged to put her out of the office from the violence of her language [5644]; that punishments were inflicted by the superintendent, and he has heard of strait-jackets having been used and a gag [5652]; that at a time of riot Mr. Lucas seemed very ready to receive assistance [5697]; that the report (Appendix 2) was, out of kindness to Mr. Lucas, kept back by Mr. Cowper [5703]; that Mrs. Lucas used to take official letters to the superintendent's private residence, and open them there, and they sometimes remained there for days, and he has often heard the contents of official letters from the girls before the letters themselves reached him [5710]; that Mr. Lucas never wrote his own reports reports in the daily record, and it is a difficult thing to say whether he was too illiterate to do so, but that the letter produced (Appendix M 3) is a sample of his writing; that Mrs. Austin complained of Mrs. Lucas's bad temper repeatedly, and came to the office to report her on one occasion [5716-5724]; that Mr. Lucas intimated that Mr. Cowper was acting without authority [5748]; that Mr. Lucas and Mrs. Rowland were generally on friendly terms, and Mr. Lucas was supported by the matrons generally [5756]. SISTER MARY BENEDICT says she does not think Mrs. Lucas is at all harsh to the children, as she has never seen any harshness on her part [5877]. DR. O. S. EVANS says that it seemed to him the superintendent was not able to cope with the insubordination of the place; that Mr. Lucas told him he had no power to act except after reporting to the Colonial Secretary [5935]; that Mr. Lucas professed to be so hampered by instructions that he could do nothing, and seemed to be tied down by some unknown influences [5966]. DR. WATSON says that Mrs. Lucas is the only officer he has seen manage the girls [5982]. MR. WALLACE says that Mr. Lucas did not dispute with the sub-matrons, but that Mrs. Lucas did, and that she might be a little hasty [6000]. MR. ROBERTSON says it was thought that Mr. Lucas, who had a high character for philanthropy, could manage the girls, and he and his wife were appointed superintendent and matron, but it soon appeared that they were not qualified for the duties; that he (Mr. R.) asked Mr. Cowper to assist Mr. Lucas, which Mr. Cowper did with some success until, from jealousy on Mrs. Lucas's part, his efforts were nullified [6015]; that Mr. Lucas and his wife had for many years, on their sole responsibility, kept up a system of relief to poor people; that he was a man of reputable character, and he (Mr. R.) is inclined to think that, had he not been misled by other people, he would have carried out the arrangement with Mr. Cowper—one in which he (Mr. Lucas) entirely concurred [6019]; that there is an objection to the superintendent and matron of an institution being man and wife, and also objections to single men and women occupying such positions; that Mr. Lucas would have done better could he have controlled his wife, whom he plainly said that he could not manage; that he does not think anything can be said against Mrs. Lucas, but that she is sometimes a little bad-tempered; that if he had known what he knows now he would not have made the appointment [6035-6038]; that Mrs. Lucas was dissatisfied with Mr. Cowper because she thought he was taking from her a certain amount of control, and she had represented that to him [6949]. MR. COWPER said that, at the request of Mr. Robertson, then Colonial Secretary, he consented to assist Mr. Lucas in managing the Industrial School, the institution being then in a state of riot, and that in the course of a few months the girls became orderly and quiet; that Mr. Lucas told him he could not enforce implicit obedience, but he insisted that it should be enforced, and it was enforced; that he started an evening school; that Mrs. Lucas ridiculed the idea, and would not assist; that she then abused him for not asking her into the room on the first evening, and that she afterwards went in and upset the whole arrangements, thus rendering the attempt a failure; that Mr. Lucas, as far as words went, spoke of his aid as an advantage, but Mrs. Lucas got very jealous of him [6590]; that Mr. Lucas said that his wife was the difficulty [6615]; that he procured crockery mugs for the girls, and Mrs. Lucas kept them in the store a week, saying it was absurd to give them to the girls as they would break them [6616]. MR. F. KING says that Mr. Lucas is a kindly man, but fails to keep order and has not the ability to conduct the school; that he is too easy and is careless of his personal appearance, not being very clean himself; that he has seen him in the morning in a costume quite unfitted for the head of such an establishment; that Mrs. Lucas takes a great interest in the school, and he has never witnessed any infirmity of temper on her part, though he has heard of it [7343]. Several inmates of the institution gave evidence to the effect that they had been locked up in a damp dormitory, were allowed insufficient food, and though they were ill had no attention paid them; that Mr. and Mrs. Lucas would not let them alone, scolding them, the former following them about and "jawing" them, saying that he "was going away on Monday"; that he threw a bucket of water under the door of the dormitory in which they were confined, that he threatened to "smash Janet Boyd's teeth," and that the "Commission had told him the girls were all a pack of liars"; that when they were locked up he threw stones at them through the bars; that he beat Janet B—, Kate S—, Annie D—, Lizzie E—, and Annie R—, knocking the latter's head against the ground and kneeling on her; that he beat Annie S— with a broom-handle and bumped her head against the wall, and also beat Mary W—; that Mr. and Mrs. Lucas put them up to go against the matrons [8896-8910-8917-8938-8961-8975-8987-9022-9032-9048-9072-9111-9242-9276-9306]. SISTER MARY BENEDICT says that Mr. Lucas always distributed the books to the girls, and the sisters have never brought any books for distribution; that she never heard Mr. Lucas say any of the books were improper; that she believes the library is in Mr. Lucas's charge [9549-9560].

Subordinate officers: duties:
powers: charges against them.

MR. LUCAS says that there are under him the storekeeper, the matron, house matron, two sub-matrons, laundress, gate-keeper, teacher, and messenger [2602]; that each of the matrons, and the teacher, and the gatekeeper, has an inmate of the institution as a servant, and the system works badly; that all the officers but the superintendent should live together; that each officer has several children of her own, there being twelve officers' children living in the institution; that the officers get food for their children outside, and that cooking utensils, knives and forks, &c., belonging to the institution are taken down to the officers' quarters, and thus confusion and trouble are caused; that the officers have to stop with the children at meal-times, but dine at their own quarters [2687-2704]; that the girls cook their food in their quarters for them, and have their own meals in the officers' quarters, their meals being carried up to them from the dining-room of the institution [2708-2724]; that it is objectionable to have women with families living in the institution; that no one sleeps with the girls at night, though some one ought to do so, as the girls are left quite alone from sundown to sunrise [2728-2734]; that there are four matrons over the institution [2754]; that Mrs. Rowland, in addition to a servant, has a girl to mind her baby [2837]; that the matrons are not fenced off from the children, but are 25 yards from the first dormitory, but have to go about 60 yards before they can reach the children, and that they are away from them all night, except that the house matron goes through the wards at 9 p.m. and puts out the lights [2904-2916]; that the matrons do not reckon it any part of their duty to sleep with the children; that there should be a matron with the children at night, but it cannot be done in the present buildings; that the three matrons could not take charge of the six dormitories [2921-2933]; that the matrons would not care about sitting with the children from 6 to 9 p.m., as they are too tired; that when such a thing was tried the sub-matrons objected, and he does not think it is their duty to do it, as the rules say the girls are to be locked up, and the house matron to see all lights put out at 9 p.m. [2951-2955]; that the sub-matrons were not present when an attempt was made to amuse the girls at night, and said that they could not do it; that they could, but would not, and he thought they would refuse, as it had been tried [2961-2975]; that the officers living so far away from the children is one of the faults of the institution [2989]; that the sub-matrons work well, but are not so subordinate as they should be; that they do not take any interest in the institution, regarding it simply as a means of livelihood; that he would not like to injure the persons who are there, but they are not the persons he would select for such positions; that he would, however, sooner leave the institution himself than see a woman put out of it, for the sake of her little family; that all the present officers except Mrs. Dunn were there when he took charge of the place; that they just do their duty, and could take more interest in the girls than they do; that they just do their duties and no more; that this is very hard upon him, because he does not like to speak of these things, but he believes that is why the institution has been a failure from the first; that the children's affections might be gained by a greater show of interest in them, but that this is the most difficult part of the evidence, and he feels it very much, and that he only gives this evidence from a sense of duty; that the sub-matrons had carried out his instructions after a fashion, but not heartily, and he feels he is not properly supported by them; that he has no control over them—will not say they are unfit for their situations, but thinks a superintendent should appoint people he could agree with [3003-3023]; that the rules placarded about the institution were intended for the guidance of the officers, and it was not proper they should be placarded thus, as the girls constantly referred to them; that, when the evening amusements were started Mr. Cane and Mrs. Kelly volunteered to assist, but the matrons declined; that Mrs. Kelly's duties are confined to teaching the children in school-hours; that he cannot say whether the matrons' families divide their attention from their duties, but they have that tendency; that Mrs. King, the matron of the Reformatory, has charge of it [3039-3058]; that Mrs. King looks after both the dormitories and the school in the Reformatory [3084]; that Mrs. Rowland must have added certain statements to her evidence after giving it before the Commission [6311]; that she kicked his dog and cat, and had cruelly treated them; that Mrs. Brackenregg keeps a magpie and many dogs, which are not ill-used; that Mrs. Brackenregg and Mrs. Rowland said that Mr. Cowper went to the institution and handed papers about [6321-6328]; that when Mrs. Brackenregg was ordered to go and look for some of the children, on one occasion, she went off in a huff so absurdly that he could not help mimicking her before the girls; that she said she was not bound to go for the children, and that it was his duty to go; that she has frequently refused to obey orders; that once, when the girls were riotous, Mr. Cane walked out of the place, and he reported him to the Government, when his reply was that he was not asked to assist; that he ordered him to keep a gate, and he did not do so [6337-6350]; that Mrs. Brackenregg used to attend the prayer-room sometimes, but never went in by herself, and there has been no disturbance there since she was ordered out of it; that there is "too much of the old gentleman about her" for her to say, "We have had enough disputing, and now as we have come into the prayer-room we will stop it"; that he told her to go out because she was creating confusion [6389-6394]; that Mrs. Rowland had a quarrel with Emma G— about a letter which came for the girl in a different name, and Mrs. Rowland said to her—"You must have a queer mother to have so many names" [6425]; that he thought well of Mrs. Dunn until lately, but that he supposes you cannot find two worse creatures in the whole community than Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Brackenregg for concocting and scheming; that they are not fit to have the charge of girls, but that he has not reported any of them since he reported Mr. Cane unsuccessfully; that when they fall out they tell tales of each other, and when they are friends again scheme against others, and have done just enough duty to prevent their being reported; that they are not people of good moral character according to his idea, but he has only lately found them out, since the ships have been in dock; that there should not be such characters about the institution; that Mr. Cane was at one time extra zealous, and when he fell out with the others they said that Mr. Cane was trying to get up charges against him; that another time when Mr. Cane was there they said that Mr. Cowper was taking persons up to his house to give evidence; that then when Mr. Prior came Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Brackenregg joined together, but as Mrs. Rowland and Mr. Prior were to be matron and superintendent Mrs. Brackenregg seceded, and Mrs. Kelly, who did not join them, told Mrs. Lucas of the conspiracy; that he had ordered a gentleman out of Mrs. Rowland's house between 9 and 10 o'clock at night, and others had been seen there, in consequence he prevented people coming in; that it was notorious about the place that these people came in, so much so that people used to ask from the steamer was not that "the place where the whores were kept," and he thought that remark referred to both officers and inmates; that he accused Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Kelly of having people coming to their places at night; that Mrs. Kelly and Mrs. Brackenregg came up from Sydney at 11 p.m. with two gentlemen, and nearly an hour after they came ashore he went down to the gate and they had not come into the institution; that he does not know where they were, except that they were out with men, and that they had not come in at twenty minutes to 12; that this happened on only one occasion [6431-6464]; that he wishes to convey that the matrons referred to were guilty of imprudence only, not immorality [Note, page 194]; that on the occasion of the altercation described by Mrs. Rowland (question 4094) the row was caused by Mrs. Rowland telling a girl she was rotten [6465]; that the matrons on that occasion did not point out to him that the office was the proper place for him to speak to them in; that the story is an invention, and that one is always ready to back up the other, and he is not the first or second superintendent that has been turned out of the institution by a similar clique; that whenever there is a bit of a noise the four of them get together and, as Mrs. Connell says, there is as much cliquing together as would take a city [6478-6482]; that he can hear "Love amongst the Roses"—a regular bawdy song—sung in the school-room by the schoolmistress, and thinks it a very improper song, though he does not know the words [6495]; that about three or four weeks ago Mrs. Dunn sent over to the store to get a loaf of bread for Mrs. Brackenregg, although his orders were that no one was to have any bread out of the kitchen, and that though he took the loaf away Mrs. Dunn took a loaf to her house and said she had borrowed it, after his telling her that he did not permit such a thing; that one of the girls said that Mrs. Dunn said—"If Mrs. Lucas does not say anything, don't tell her; and if she does, say I am going to return the loaf"; that it has not been the practice for officers to borrow bread in that way; that Mrs. Dunn made that excuse; that Mrs. Dunn would be a first-rate woman if she were not mesmerized by Mrs. Rowland, who got her her situation, but of whom she had spoken as disparagingly as any woman could do [6504-6517]; that he had never had any quarrel with Mrs. Kelly, who had sympathized with Mrs. Lucas about the conduct of the others, though she did at one time desire to get Mrs. Lucas's place; that he recollected the circumstances related by Mrs. Kelly (question 5025), when he called her Mrs. Somebody, and that he had so spoken to her because she bounced him; that she did then say there was an office in which he could speak to her [6518-6528]; that when anything is wanted out of the store Mrs. Rowland goes and gets it, and is responsible; that Mrs. Rowland keeps a book, in which she enters articles obtained, &c. [6529-6541]; that the officers refused to help him in carrying on the evening school [6589]; that as soon as Mrs. Kelly heard the gate bell ring on the 26th November, 1873, she said to the girls—"Here is the Royal Commission," before she saw the members of the Commission come in; that she knew, the night before, that the Commission were coming; that it has all been well arranged to come and take the evidence just at this time; that one member of the Commission talks to persons on the island about what the Commission are going to do; that there have been communications passing between Mr. Cowper and some of the officers; that he does not wish to make any charge, but that Mr. Cowper knows all that takes place better than he does himself [9375-9389]; that Mrs. Kelly and the sisters (of the House of the Good Shepherd) are pushing the girls on to insubordination; that in the affair it is not Mr. Cowper, but the Church that interferes, in backing up Mrs. Kelly, who has said more than once that she did not care for him, as her Church would stick by her and help her to get over any difficulties she might encounter in carrying out its instructions; that the Commission would be astonished to hear how these parties were working, and he had some books to show, which he had picked out from those which the sisters had brought for the children, and it was surprising that with such teaching we had not had a rebellion among the Catholics long ago; that the book produced ("The Adventures of Moses Finigan," an Irish Pervert, by Brother James) is one he complains of, and one which was selected by the sisters for the Catholic girls; that not a page of it is unobjectionable; that he never interferes with the sisters ever since they spoke of him as the hireling of the Government; that he knows one of them said she would write to the Bishop, as it was no use reporting to Mr. Lucas, as he was the Government hireling [9396-9409]; that he really believes there are persons of influence and authority inciting the girls to insubordination, that he is prepared to point them out, but declines to do so to the Commission [9426]. MRS. LUCAS says that she is assisted by a house matron and two assistants, the house matron's duty being to superintend the cleaning of the establishment, take charge of the clothing and bed-linen, and the materials for making clothing, &c., and the sub-matrons being under the house matron's control [3252]; that the evening school was discontinued because the matrons would not assist in carrying it on [3269]; that there is no one with the children in the dormitories from 6 to 9 p.m. [3273]; that the fact of the sub-matrons having children on the place interferes with the discipline, and it is unpleasant to have so many houses, families, and servants; that the officers would not think of taking their meals with the girls, but it would be more homely if they did [3281-3286]; that she has not had proper assistance from the officers under her; that they are appointed by the Government, and she has nothing to do with even the engagement of a laundress, and the consequence is she has people there who are opposed to her; that the house matron and Mrs. Brackenregg are opposed to her; that she and Mrs. Brackenregg were never firm friends, though they had got on well when there was no party work going on; that they do not obey orders; that once when she complained that some sewing had not been properly supervised the sub-matron was impertinent, and that there was a system of worriting going on; that she is not supported by them and is spoken to insultingly, and has borne a great deal; that they insult her in this way before the girls; that Mrs. Brackenregg has three children, Mrs. Rowland two, Mrs. Dunn two, the teacher (Mrs. Kelly) two, and the gatekeeper three, and they all go to school upon the island outside the institution; that each officer has a girl from the institution as a servant [3291-3306]; that the officers are allowed rations for themselves but not for their children [3315]; that it is Mrs. Rowland's duty to count the clothes out to the laundry and back every week, but if she is engaged Mrs. Brackenregg does it [3330]; that in carrying on the night school the matrons would not assist; that Mr. Cane and Mrs. Kelly did assist, but Mrs. Kelly gave up when she (Mrs. Lucas) went into the room and made a complaint against her; that from what she had seen she would not leave the girls with those two parties, as they were opposed to her and influenced the girls; that Mr. Cane would praise a girl for disobeying her, and Mrs. Kelly took part with Mr. Cane [3336-3355]; that Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Brackenregg have spoken to her insolently, and the laundress also, but not lately [3363]; that Mrs. Rowland went to the institution the evening before she did, and Mrs. Brackenregg about a fortnight before; that the superintendent should have the privilege of choosing his own officers; that none of the officers would take a girl aside and advise her except Mrs. Dunn, but she has been generally on friendly terms with them when there has been no party influence at work to get her and her husband removed; that Mrs. Dunn is a conscientious woman whom she does not class with the others, but that the others influence the girls against the matron and superintendent's teaching and advice; that the officers are too light and trifling for their positions; that Mrs. Rowland is not a widow, her husband being away, but the others are; that Mrs. Kelly worked with Mr. Cane, but when Mr. Cane was removed they gave up working against the matron and superintendent, but had not worked with her for some time; that Mr. Prior was not friendly with them; that she has not reported them to the Government; that they exercise a bad influence over the girls; that gentlemen come into the institution to see them; that Mrs. Brackenregg has not to her knowledge been visited by gentlemen, but Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Kelly have, both in the afternoon and evening; that she could not prevent it, as people are allowed to visit them; that they are not religious, and the visiting sometimes interferes with their duties, as the officers go to their visitors and leave the children; that she has visitors, and so has Mrs. King, and she would not propose to exclude all visitors, but the practice has been carried too far [3406-3442]; that these matrons have Mr. Cowper at their back, that Mr. Cowper was heard to say "the saddle might be put on the right horse," in answer to something Mrs. Rowland said about being ousted, that she believes Mr. Cowper is carrying out a threat that he would not leave a stone unturned until Mr. Lucas was removed, and that after they have interviews with Mr. Cowper the officers are always more insolent [6150, and Note page 182]; that Mr. Brackenregg never attended the prayer except in the matron's absence, but did on one occasion tell a girl to disobey her, and told her to hold her tongue; that she had made complaints about Mrs. Brackenregg previously, and there have been constant disputes with her, the only way to secure peace being to let her do as she liked [6154-6172]; that the matrons have said offensive things to her—told her to go and serve out soup in the soup kitchen, and to go to the wash-tub, and that Mr. Lucas would have a cart and sell tripe; that she finds the officers' words are not to be taken; that it is a common thing for Mrs. Rowland, if she does not want to serve out clothes, to say the dirty ones have not been given in, though she knows that they have; that disputes take place in the girls' presence, as these people, when told to go and look for absent children, will tell her to go and look for them herself [6175-6181]; that Mrs. Rowland had taunted a girl who came in diseased, with her condition, and so caused a disturbance [6193]; that once Mrs. Rowland knocked a child's head against the wall, and has tripped a girl of fifteen or sixteen up, and held her down until she begged for mercy [6222-6232]; that she did not think such persons fit to have charge of children, and though she could not well report their conduct to the Government, she could astonish the Commission if she put down all that occurred in the institution [6245-6248]; that on the occasion of a riot all the officers ran out of the place, and Mr. Cane was hiding himself behind the policeman's coat-tails; that she had served the officers at any turn in sickness and health, and all their concoctions arose because they were not allowed to have in gentlemen of an evening to carry on flirtations, and the commencement of the unpleasantness was when Mr. Lucas found a gentleman in Mrs. Rowland's house between 9 and 10 p.m. and told him to go out; that she cannot speak to a girl but improper remarks are made; that the flirting got to a height within the last few months, and Mr. Lucas had to make a regulation to keep the gentlemen out; that Mr. Cowper has a way of knowing all that goes on, and knows that these people were out about the island, singing, &c., at unseemly hours; that she knew Mrs. Rowland was on board one of the ships in dock, as she was seen there; that Mrs. Rowland said she was under higher authority than any one there, and would do as she liked, and parade the island with gentlemen if she chose; that she did one Sunday bring up two gentlemen in defiance of "the old fellow," as she called Mr. Lucas; that Mr. Prior heard Mrs. Rowland say this in the presence of the girls [6829-6296]. MRS. KING says that she is matron of the Reformatory, and has no one to assist her but her daughter, who receives no salary [3131-3138]; that when she was matron of the Industrial School she had officers with families under her, and that some of the officers slept near the girls [3196-3206]. MRS. BRACKENREGG, sub-matron, says that her duties are varied, and have been increased lately, as she sees the cows milked and to the cleaning of the pigsties, the pumping of the water, &c.; that the first thing in the morning she sees to the cleaning of the dormitories, &c., then the cleaning of the lamps, and the store-room and the presses; that she attends muster at 8.30 and attends to little things about the place; that she then goes to the workroom and sits there until noon, and then attends the dining-room while the girls have dinner; that she goes to the sewing-room at 2 and remains there until 4, then goes to the milk-shed to see the cows fed and milked, &c.; then sees to the dormitories and that the lamps and candles are ready; then attends the dining-room while the girls have tea, and then attends muster and sees the girls into their dormitories; that she goes home at 6, but comes down again with the house matron at 9 p.m. to see the lights put out; that there is more work on Saturdays; that the matrons do each other's work; that Mrs. Dunn has attended to the kitchen since there has been no cook, and to the work-room also and the bath; that she (Mrs. B.) attends to the bath on Saturdays; that Mrs. Rowland attends the bathing of the big girls and Mrs. Dunn the smaller ones; that she does not object to the work, but thinks hers is not proper work; that there is a messenger in the institution; that she was never in a public institution before [3443-3458]; that none of the sub-matrons take their meals with the children, but stay in the dining-room during meals, and that no one stays in the dormitories with the children; that she is allowed a ration, and has an inmate as a servant [3489-3500]; that she does not know that she speaks insolently to Mrs. Lucas, but has never been great friends with her [3505]; that she, Mrs. Dunn, and Mrs. Rowland see the girls into their dormitories [3528]; that she attended the prayer-room for two years and four months, until she was ordered out of it; that she has tried to carry out Mrs. Lucas's orders in every way; that she was never told to take the children into school after tea and amuse them, and that the officers were willing to do so at any time that they were called upon; that the girls were always troublesome, and the matrons had to run up and down the hills hunting them up at all times [3555-3570]; that the girls steal things from the officers and smash their crockery and are not punished [3579]; that the girls call her "The Scorpion," Mrs. Rowland "The Kangaroo," and Mrs. Dunn a nickname she cannot repeat; that there is no cook, and the officers cannot each adhere to the duties defined in the regulations, but the duties are mixed, and her time is fully occupied from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m.; that her time is not taken up in looking after her own children, as all she does for them is done after the work of the institution is over; that the whole of her time is occupied by her public duties, but she goes home to breakfast and dinner [3592-3600]; that she stays with the children at dinner and tea, and they carry away their food in their hands, and she has no orders to stop their doing it, and that if she did interfere they would say she had no right to do so; that she finds it impossible to stop irregularities, because the superintendent does not support her [3610-3622]; that she has not a very bad temper, and can always explain and reason, and has tried repeatedly to reason with Mrs. Lucas [3636]; that the officers have much trouble with the girls; that sometimes she gives them a few touches with the cane, but not apply it heavily—not severely enough to mark them for any time; that Mrs. Lucas gives them more than she does; that when she (Mrs. B.) has not got a cane she boxes the girls' ears, or sometimes beats them with a small strap [3641-3673]; that the officers have to cane the girls to make them do the work, and that one girl showed fight, caught her by the throat and nearly choked her; that she gave the girl a slap and she turned on her [3710-3719]; that it is Mrs. Rowland's duty to put out the lights at 9 p.m., and she always accompanies her when she is at home [3726]; that she cannot say why the girls call her a scorpion, except that she goes about silently and comes upon them when they do not expect her [3770]; that Mrs. Rowland cuts out the girls' dresses and cuts them of the proper length, but the girls tear them to make them short [3791]. MRS. ROWLAND, house matron, says she has occupied that position for two years and four months, and is allowed a ration in addition to her salary; that in the morning she has to see that the dormitories are cleaned, having to attend three herself, to attend to the big girls, and to the bath, to the hospital, the cleaning of the dining-room, &c.; that after breakfast she attends muster, sees the waste packed up, the brooms, buckets, &c., put away and the work finished; then she attends the work-room, cuts out the work, and keeps an account of what is given out; then at 12.30 she goes home to dinner, then attends to muster the children and attends the work-room until 4; that she does not attend the girls at meals, except at tea; that when Mrs. Dunn and Mrs. Brackenregg are away she does their duty, and that Mrs. Dunn is doing cook's duty; that she draws whatever is wanted from the store and keeps an account of it; that she sees to the branding of the clothes, to the counting of the clothes, to the laundry, and to the giving out of clean linen, &c. [3796-3813]; that she has never received any instructions about giving the girls night-dresses, but was told when they wanted anything to give it them [3824]; that when she has reported clothes, &c., torn by the girls, Mrs. Lucas has told her it was no use bringing her torn clothes there, but to find out who did it [3868]; that she is sure she has always done her duty in supporting Mr. and Mrs. Lucas in their efforts to manage the girls, but that the girls are not taught to respect her; that Mr. and Mrs. Lucas will sometimes say how very bad she is—that she wants to get the girls punished [3890]; that she has been made to put strait-jackets on the girls [3903]; that she has never been asked to assist in amusing the children at night, but cannot see how the officers could do it under the present arrangements [3915]; that it is her duty to count the clothes to the laundress, but that they have been generally counted by the assistants; that every officer receives visitors, and she has had visitors also, but she does not suppose any one was in her house twice; that no gentleman has ever spent an evening in her house but once, and that she has never set the girls a bad example, though once when the ship "Cossack" was going out of dock she dipped dipped her flag, and Mrs. Kelly, Mrs. Lucas, Miss Lucas and herself were standing in a group and waved their handkerchiefs in answer to the salute, but the girls were not present; that remarks were afterwards made about that matter; that she has never committed any acts in the institution which were indicative of lightness of conduct, but that she knows a good many people and some of them come to see her, part of them being her own relations; that Mr. Prior was always asking the matrons to go and see him, and she, Mrs. Brackenregg, Miss Lucas, and the two Miss Connell's did go, and when they went to his door, he opened it and they ran in and locked him out; that they all laughed about it afterwards, but she was sorry for it, as Mr. Prior had since made nasty remarks about it; that the girls were not present, being locked up at the time, but the worst of it was that the girls were told of these things; that the officers have gone out to hear the "Blanche" Band play, and she has always gone with Miss Lucas [3953-3962]; that she often has to go down to the beach after the girls and then they abuse her; that besides her there are two matrons, Mrs. Dunn and Mrs. Brackenregg, and she does not know whose duty it is to bring the girls up from the beach [3995]; that she has never spoken to Mrs. Lucas about issuing night-dresses to the girls, but that if Mrs. Lucas ordered her to get them she would do so [4024]; that Mr. Cowper never ordered anything without consulting Mr. Lucas, that he counselled them rather to work for the good of the place than to oust Mr. Lucas, and that in a short time he very much improved the condition of the institution [4045-4055]; that Mr. Lucas did not ask her to assist him in carrying on the evening amusements, and she does not know whether he asked the other matrons, but she thinks it would be impossible for the officers to do so under the present management, as the hours are so late [4062-4065]; that Mrs. Kelly, the teacher, conducts prayers with the Roman Catholics and Mrs. Brackenregg and Mrs. Dunn with the Protestants until Mrs. Brackenregg was ordered out of the prayer-room [4102]; she has been constantly interfered with and insulted before the children by the superintendent and matron [4182]. MRS. DUNN says that she is one of the sub-matrons, has been so for two years and a month, and receives rations besides her salary; that she attends to the children's bath and cleanliness, sees the yard and out-houses cleaned, attends to the kitchen and dining-room, and after dinner attends the work-room, where she stays until 4 p.m., after which she goes to the kitchen again, and after tea attends muster; that she attends the prayer-room, sees the children locked up and goes home for the night; that the officers agree among themselves, but do not agree with the matron and superintendent, as the latter abuse the officers before the girls [4119-4136]; that she does not think it is possible for the sub-matrons to secure subordination unless the matron and superintendent are strict with the girls; that the matrons have no power to punish the girls, but do sometimes use a little cane in the work-room, though not severely [4262-4264]; that it is not her wish that the officers' servants should dine at the officers' quarters, as she had rather they got their meals in the mess-room, but that Mr. Lucas's girls were the first to be irregular in this way; that she has done all in her power to support the matron and superintendent and do good for the girls, and she believes all the other officers have done the same, but she has not been properly supported by the superintendent and matron; that if she makes a complaint to Mr. Lucas he will call up the girls and believe them rather than her, and will scold the officers for bringing him tales; that in consequence of this the matrons cannot get on with the girls at all [4271-4280]; that she never heard Mr. Cowper interfere in the place or give orders except through Mr. Lucas [4317]; that she was never asked to take part in the night school, and would never refuse to take part in it if she had an hour or two in the day, but she was from 6 a.m. to 7 p.m. attending to her duties, and sometimes the officers were thoroughly tired out owing to the insubordinate state of the institution [4309]; that every matron is at liberty to use the cane if she thinks proper, and they all use it sometimes, but that she has used moral influence as well; that at meal-times the matrons walk up and down the room, and keep order, and would not like to sit down with the girls herself [4338-4352]; that the officers' children do not associate with the inmates at all [4377]. MRS. AUSTIN says that she is the laundress, and has occupied that position for nearly two years, and has no other duties except attending to the laundry; that the girls are sent to her in turn to learn to wash [4492]; that she has never had any trouble with the girls though she has always had the wildest ones, and on some days she keeps them at work until tea-time; that she has no trouble in getting her orders carried out, though the girls may be a little troublesome when a ship is in dock, but that she could hardly check the girls for waving to the sailors when she saw the matrons setting the girls the example; that she had seen the matrons waving to the ships; that it would be easy to manage the girls if there were good matrons, but not matrons who would stand and wave to the ships; that she lives outside the institution, but stops there at work all day, and has seen the officers waving to the ships often, whenever there was a vessel in dock; that when Mr. Lucas would send them to muster the girls they would go and wave to the sailors; that she has never seen quarrels among the sub-matrons, but thinks the conduct of those ladies not likely to improve the girls; that she has seen the matron waving both to the ships and to passing steamers, and that the girls often get punished for the same thing [4526-4546]; that soon after Mr. Prior went to the institution she saw one of the matrons push another into the office with him and then lock him in before all the girls; that this was done by Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Brackenregg [4551]; that Mrs. Rowland beat Anne B— very severely, and on her reporting the matter to Mr. Lucas he said she had authority to beat her; that the girls on the officers' quarters behave worse than the others [4578-4587]; that she has seen Mrs. Brackenregg waving to the steamer; that some person on the steamer made a great mistake in waving to her (Mrs. Austin) one day; that young men go in to see the matrons at late hours, and she has seen two there at once; that all the visitors could not be relatives of the matrons; that she and the matrons are good friends, and she has never had any disagreement with them [4603-4628]; that she never had any occasion to get any of the girls punished, and she thought that created jealousy on the matron's part [4630]; that to please the matrons, Mr. Lucas sometimes punished the girls when they did not deserve it, and that he treated the matrons very kindly indeed; that she never goes to any of the matrons' houses [4645-4694]; that she does not know whether it is Mrs. Rowland's fault that the girls' dresses are so short, but Mrs. Rowland makes the dresses and she never noticed that the bottoms of the skirts were torn; that she spoke of Mrs. Rowland because she made those dresses, and did not mean to insinuate that the shortness of the skirts was her fault [4711-4750]. MR. MICHAEL PRIOR says that he is clerk and storekeeper, is allowed rations and quarters, and has held the position for sixteen months; that he takes charge of all stores and issues them, writes all documents required by the superintendent, and keeps a diary of occurrences, in which he inserts only what the superintendent directs him to insert [4766]; that he does not hold himself responsible for any of the entries; that the officers of the institution do not, as he thinks, work harmoniously together, and there is much insubordination among the girls owing to the officers' improprieties; that the matrons form connections with officers of vessels in dock, and while on duty duty they are generally waving to these officers; that he has seen two or three of them do so repeatedly, and the girls, seeing them do it, would do the same, and then altercations would follow; that Mrs. Brackenregg, Mrs. Kelly, and Mrs. Rowland have done it, but not Mrs. Dunn [4790-4803]; that on Anniversary night they refused to assist in supervising the girls when Mrs. Lucas wanted them to stay out of the dormitories; that a young child being brought into the institution, none of the matrons would look after it; that he is not aware of altercations having taken place between the matrons and the superintendent [4805-4811]; that he has seen the matrons repeatedly down about the ships at 9 or 10 at night, when out for a walk; that his house is close to the gate, and these people going backwards and forwards are a nuisance to him; that Mrs. Kelly, Mrs. Brackenregg, and Mrs. Rowland, have gone down to the shipping repeatedly within the last nine or ten months; that no one can go in or out of the gate without his seeing them, and he has been obliged to keep two dogs in order to keep the sailors away; that he cannot keep his family on the island on account of this conduct on the part of the matrons; that Mrs. Connell keeps the gate, and that her daughters go in and out as well as the matrons [4817-4833]; that he knows these people go to the sailors, because the sailors come up to the gate with them and go away again; that they could not be coming up from the late steamer from Sydney because it was before the late steamer began to run; that the persons who come to the gate with them are sailors and not people living on the island, and that two of them came to his place one night and asked for the matron [4841-4844]; that he has seen Mrs. Kelly come up at half-past 12 in the morning with a sailor, and that she was under his window with one of the men of the "Blanche" until half-past 12 o'clock; that he watched her, and she was under his window for half an hour acting very improperly; that what he saw he could not help seeing; that he was awakened after midnight by a knocking sound as if a cow's tail knocked against the window as they sometimes do, and he looking out with Mrs. Prior saw Mrs. Kelly and a stout man, one of the officers of the "Blanche"; that the man drew Mrs. Kelly over to his window and attempted to do something to her, and she broke from him and ran out to the path, and then he went close to the window, and there they were kissing and hugging one another; that this was the only impropriety he saw with his own eyes, and that he told Mr. and Mrs. Lucas of it next morning; that his wife saw it; that he did not accuse Mrs. Kelly of having acted immorally but merely imprudently [4844-4861]; that the girls used to hear from the sailors that the matrons went out in this way, and that thinking such conduct likely to demoralize the institution he spoke to Mr. Lucas about it frequently; that he has been friendly with the matrons, and has spoken to Mrs. Rowland about her unwise conduct; that Mrs. Rowland said she would do as she liked, but that Mrs. Kelly told him she was going to reform, and give up her flighty, foolish, giddy actions; that she promised to reform, in Mrs. Connell's presence; that he has heard nasty remarks made about the officers, and thought they should be stopped [4893-4917]; that Mrs. Lucas has been on friendly terms with Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Brackenregg, but not within the last three months, and that they joined in all walks and amusements, and that Mrs. Lucas was about the place when the matrons were waving to the ships; that he has noticed the matrons going in and out for the last nine months, and reported it long before the night on which he saw Mrs. Kelly; that one night Mrs. Prior woke up, there being a dreadful noise at the gate, and he, jumping up to see what it was, saw Mrs. Kelly and Mrs. Rowland at the gate, and two men pulling them about; that since then he has not been on friendly terms with the matrons; that he lived for three months on the island without his family, and not knowing the matrons were such people was then friendly with them, but never had any fun with them; that he was very angry at their once running into his house and pulling him out of bed; that he was fast asleep in bed at 8 or 9 o'clock at night, and Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Brackenregg came and pulled him out of bed; that he had not then been a fortnight on the place; that he never joked with them at all, and was very angry about this matter; that he had been superintendent of the Newcastle Asylum, and was removed from there in consequence of an error about some money due him; that there was an altercation with Dr. Wardle, but he (Mr. P.) did not then make any specific charges against any one [4932-4971.] Mrs. KELLY says that she is schoolmistress of the institution, and has been so for five years and ten months, was for some time engaged in teaching under the National Board, and is a Roman Catholic; that the school-hours are from 9 till 12, and 2 to 4; that she teaches under the Public School system; that she teaches the children to sing, but not the theory of singing, and attends the prayers of the Roman Catholic girls, and gives them religious instruction on Sundays, but has nothing to do with them when they are in the dormitories or at meals [4974-5000]; that she has used the cane, but not often, as for weeks she never used it except as a pointer; that she has come into collision with Mr. Lucas, and objects to his manner of speaking to her before the girls, as it tends to lessen their respect for her; that the other officers have been spoken to by Mr. and Mrs. Lucas in a very disrespectful way, and there have been altercations in the girls' presence; that on one occasion, and only one, she waved her handkerchief to a ship—the ship "Cossack," when she was going out of the dock, Mr. and Mrs. Lucas, Miss Lucas, and Mrs. Rowland being present, and also waving their handkerchiefs in answer to a salute made by the vessel; that the girls were not present; that she has been on board the "Cossack" and the "Blanche," once on board each ship, not at night, but between 4 and 5 in the afternoon; that she has met officers of those vessels accidentally on board the Sydney steamer, but never by appointment and has spoken to them, but never done anything to be ashamed of; that she denies the charges made by Mr. Prior, but that she and Mrs. Brackenregg having been to Sydney, returned to the island in the steamer with two officers of the "Blanche," who accompanied them to the gate of the institution; that she and Mrs. Brackenregg chatted with these officers for about ten minutes until the gate was opened; that no officer had spoken alone with her since she has been on the island; that she solemnly denies the charge which has been made; that she has not been on good terms with Mr. Prior, and has never spoken to him except on business after the first month of his being there; that from what had been told her of Mr. Prior, she did not think him a fit person to be seen with, and as he was constantly inviting her and the other matrons to take tea at his quarters she had sent him word that she did not wish him to visit her quarters; that she did not like to tell him the reason of her coolness, as she did not like to insult him [5016-5059]; that she has never wished her servant to dine at her quarters, but would rather she went to the dining-hall [6108]; that the laundress ought to have had more opportunity of seeing the girls do anything that deserves punishment than she has, because the laundry is closer to the institution than the schoolhouse [6118]; that she never told Mr. Prior that she was going to reform, and has said very little to him on any subject; that once when he was censuring the conduct of another officer she said "she was going to reform"; that he told a tale about this officer and she said she did not believe him; that she does not think there is one of the officers who speaks

to Mr. Prior, and only within the last few months Mrs. Lucas came crying to her and said she had been abused by Mr. Prior; that he had said he would not take her out of the gutter; that she has always tried to use moral influence with the girls, until she was prevented by Mrs. Lucas; that she and Mr. Cane had assisted Mr. Cowper to start the evening schools, Mrs. Lucas declining to assist; and that on the second evening Mrs. Lucas completely upset her arrangements and she did not go any more, as she considered herself insulted; that she knows Mrs. Lucas did this to insult her, and that she did not wish her to attend the school, though she would have been quite willing to do so [6121-6136]; that she did all she could to persuade the girls not to join in the riot that took place in November 1873, and did not give Sarah Bourke any butter to give to girls who were locked up; that she never suggested to the girls that to get Mr. Lucas out of the place they should break the schoolroom windows, and so far from urging them on, she begged and entreated of them to stop breaking the windows; that she had no idea of what they were going to do until she saw the stones in Polly Williams' hands [9309-9315]; that she has only read two books in the Catholic library, and knows nothing about a book called the "Adventures of Moses Finigan" [9579].

MRS. MARY CONNELL says that she is gatekeeper of the institution and has been so for over two years, and that she attends to the gate from 6 in the morning until 10 at night to let people in or out [5060]; that Mr. Lucas made a rule about closing the gate at 10 o'clock, because some gentlemen belonging to the men-of-war had been in the habit of coming in; that only two of these gentlemen visited the matrons, one visiting Mrs. King and Mrs. Barton, and another Mrs. Kelly; that there have been no such visitors there as late as half-past 12 at night since she has been gate-keeper; that at the latest, they have left Mrs. King's or Mrs. Kelly's quarters by 10 o'clock; that the matrons, except when coming up in the late steamer from Sydney, have never been out after 9 o'clock p.m.; that they could not go out without her knowledge; that she does not leave the key of the gate to any one but one of her daughters when she is inside at the table or when she visits Sydney; that she sometimes goes to Sydney and returns by the 10 p.m. boat; that the institution was in much better order when Mr. Cowper assisted in the management than it is in now [5064-5078]; that persons could not have been outside the gate night after night talking and laughing and making unseemly noises without her knowledge; that nothing of the kind takes place; that the matrons go out to visit Mrs. Hegarty's place, where their children go to school, but have not been out night after night, though they have been late when the late steamer has come up from Sydney; that if Mr. Prior states that they have been out after 12 he states what is false [5126-5129]; that she has heard of the matrons waving their handkerchiefs to ships and passing steamers but has never seen them do it, and that it could have been done without her seeing it; that the evidence given by Mr. Prior (questions 4817 to 4844) is very false, as she can positively state that no one has been out of the gate at that time, and there has never been any such conduct as could be considered a nuisance; that her daughters have gone out for a walk in the summer evenings; that one night when the steamer was late Mrs. Kelly and Mrs. Brackenregg came up to the gate very late, and when she opened the gate Mrs. Kelly was standing close by speaking to an officer of the "Blanche"; that Mrs. Kelly and Mrs. Brackenregg then came in together; that she did not hear any more of the matter until she heard that Mr. Prior made some remarks that were quite false; that Mr. Prior said a falsehood when he said Mrs. Kelly was under his window, as she was not near it; that Mr. Prior is in the habit of watching who goes in or out; that Mrs. Kelly was never out alone as late as midnight; that the only time she was late was when she went to Balmain with Mrs. Rowland, Miss Lucas, and two gentlemen; that Mrs. Kelly is there for nights after nights and never goes out [5151-5169]; that officers from the ships used to visit Mrs. King, Mrs. Barton, and Mrs. Kelly once or twice a week as long as the ship was in dock and afterwards [5200]; that other persons visit the matrons besides officers, and she never saw any impropriety in these visits; that she never heard of Mr. Prior getting dogs for protection; that he was never pulled out of bed at night, and though she heard of it she did not believe it; that he has said so himself lately, but did not say so at the time; that Mr. Prior used to ask the matrons to tea, and that Mrs. Rowland went but Mrs. Kelly did not, and that Mr. Prior and Mrs. Kelly were never very friendly, as Mrs. Kelly told her she did not care to form an acquaintance with him; that they went to see Mr. Prior, knocked at the door, and when he opened it pushed him out and went in, leaving him outside, he being in his trousers and shirt; that she saw him outside, and that they all laughed and considered the thing a joke, Mr. Prior as well as the others; that Mrs. Rowland, Mrs. Brackenregg, and Mrs. Hammond, the cook, were present, and that Miss Lucas saw it as well [5219-5259]; that Mr. Prior and Mrs. Rowland have since been on friendly terms, and he has taken his wife and family to visit her several times since [5265]; that, as far as she knew, Mr. Cowper had never done anything in the place but assist Mr. Lucas [5275].

CONSTABLE TURNER says that he has seen Mrs. Rowland, Mrs. Kelly, and Mrs. Brackenregg walking about the island with gentlemen, but has never seen any improper conduct on these people's part, and that he has never seen anything to lead him to suppose that the matrons were in the habit of going down to the ships and knocking about the island at all hours; that he did one night take Mrs. Rowland, Mrs. Kelly, Miss Lucas, and an officer of the "Blanche," over to Balmain [5328-5341]; that he had heard no one complain at all of Mr. Cowper's interference, except that he wanted to get Mr. Cane into Mr. Lucas's place, but that Mr. Cowper said to him that he would not go any more into the institution, as Mr. and Mrs. Lucas were jealous of him, and he could do no good; that he believed Mr. Cowper had done all he could to support Mr. Lucas [5345-5350]; that he has heard Mrs. Austin say she could manage the big girls best herself [5409]; that he has never, by day or night, seen any impropriety on the part of the officers [5424].

CONSTABLE GLASSINGTON says that he has never seen any improprieties between the matrons and the officers of ships in dock; that he has not seen any disorderly conduct on the part of the matrons, but has seen them talking to officers in daylight—not at night; that he has never seen them sitting down with officers, or walking singly with an officer, and that when ships are in dock he is always on duty [5456-5469]; that he has never seen the matrons waving their handkerchiefs to officers of the ships, but has heard Mr. Prior say that they did so; that he has heard Mrs. Austin complain about the management of the place, and of Mrs. Lucas's abuse of her [5500-5510].

MR. F. CANE says that some time ago he held the appointment of clerk and storekeeper in the institution, and left the place in March, 1871 [5535]; that the officers did not act harmoniously together, there not being that mutual respect between inferiors and superiors that there should have been [5587-5590]; that Mr. Cowper's exertions brought about a great improvement in the condition of the place; that Mr. Cowper was acting by authority of the Government, and from the first stated that he desired to do nothing without Mr. Lucas's consent [5598-5608]; that by his means an evening school was established, at which Mrs. Kelly and himself (Mr. Cane) assisted, but owing to Mrs. Lucas's interference the plan failed [5612-5625]; that he saw nothing in Mr. Cowper's conduct but an earnest desire to assist Mr. Lucas to the fullest fullest extent [5635]; that when Mr. Cowper first went into the institution he told him (Mr. Cane) that it was useless his thinking of having charge of the institution, as whatever was done must be done with a view of assisting Mr. Lucas, and that it was better for every one in the institution to try and gain individual credit [5692]; that he did feel hurt at having a man so ignorant as Mr. Lucas put over him, and should have left the place could he have afforded to have done so; that Mrs. Austin complained of Mrs. Lucas's temper and came to the office to report her once [5722]; that the positions of the officers quartered at Biloea are anything but likely to arouse the respect of the girls; that the profoundest respect should be paid to every officer: that Mrs. Kelly, the teacher, being a very superior person, has never lost influence in the institution; that Mrs. Kelly is utterly incapable of loose conduct, that she messed with himself and Mrs. Cane for some time, and he never knew her to commit an indiscretion or associate with persons who were not of thoroughly good character [5734-5739]; that Mrs. Rowland and Mr. Lucas were generally on friendly terms, and that Mr. Lucas was supported by the matrons generally; that he never saw any unwillingness on the part of the inferior officers to assist the superintendent in any way; that Mrs. Kelly bears the highest moral character that any person can bear, is utterly incapable of loose conduct, and has the friendship of the best society in the Colony [5756-5761]. DR. O. S. EVANS, the visiting surgeon, says that he has never heard of any quarrels with the officers, and is on good terms with them all [5944]. MR. WALLACE says that there were always rows and divisions among the officers [5995]. MR. COWPER says that he undertook, at the request of the then Colonial Secretary, to assist in the management of the institution, but had never in any way attempted to interfere with the superintendent's authority; that at his suggestion an evening school was started, Mr. Cane and Mrs. Kelly giving their assistance to supervise the girls, but that Mrs. Lucas interfered, altered the arrangements, and upset the whole thing; that he got philanthropic persons to visit the place and instruct the girls, and succeeded by this means in improving the condition of the institution, but that owing to jealousy of his influence on the part of Mrs. Lucas he had ceased his efforts, and no longer visited the institution [5690]; that during all the riots and disturbances Mrs. Kelly's school was orderly, as she always enforced discipline, and her orders were implicitly obeyed; that he has never seen anything in Mrs. Kelly's conduct to lead him to credit the charges made by Mr. Prior; that she laughs and talks freely, but has not, as far as he knows, been guilty of any impropriety; that Mr. Prior's evidence was the first imputation he had ever heard cast upon her [6596]; that he has always regarded Mrs. Lucas, Mrs. Rowland, and Mrs. Brackenreg as being particularly good friends, and that they were appointed about the same time as Mr. Lucas [6621]. MR. F. KING says that the children were allowed to run about without shoes and stockings, except in Mrs. Kelly's school, where they always had shoes and stockings on [7338]; that Mrs. Kelly and Mrs. Rowland are very efficient officers, who, during the riots at Newcastle, rendered material assistance by their influence in restoring order [7353]. MRS. AUSTIN says that Janet Boyd told her that Mrs. Kelly had advised Sarah Bourke to break the schoolroom windows in order to get Mr. Lucas sacked; that no one was present when Janet Boyd said this, but that Sarah Littlewood said the same thing; that she thought it was true when the girls did afterwards smash the schoolroom windows [8999-9004]. JANET BOYD says she never told Mrs. Austin that Mrs. Kelly said the way to get Mr. Lucas sacked was to break all the schoolroom windows, and that Mrs. Kelly had not said a word to her good or bad for some time [9041]; that she may have said to Mrs. Austin that some of the girls had told her this, and that one of the girls did tell her [9051]. SARAH LITTLEWOOD says that she believes Mrs. Kelly put the girls up to smashing the windows, as Sarah Bourke said Mrs. Kelly said it [9140]. BESSIE MOORE DANGAR says Sarah Littlewood told her Mrs. Kelly had given Sarah Bourke some butter to give to the girls who were locked up, and that she did not see Mrs. Kelly give the butter, but saw Sarah Bourke give it to the girls [9178]. SARAH BOURKE says that Mrs. Kelly never said to her that the way to get Mr. Lucas out of the place was to smash the windows, and that she never said anything of the kind in the dormitory or anywhere else [9219]; that she did not get any butter from Mrs. Kelly to carry to the girls who were locked up, but that she did give some butter which was taken out of Mr. Lucas's cupboard to the girls [9317]. ANNIE DOOLEY says she never heard that Mrs. Kelly said that the best way to get Mr. Lucas out of the place was to smash the windows, and she would have been sure to hear it if Sarah Bourke said it [9286].

MR. LUCAS says that nearly thirty prostitutes have been apprenticed out since he took charge of the place [2574]; that the girls on leaving the school are apprenticed out usually as servants, but he thinks one was apprenticed to a dressmaker; that sixty-two have been apprenticed [2547]; that parties who desire to get apprentices from the Industrial School write to him on the subject, as he has advertised several times that they are to be had; that he apprentices them; that the children are not apprenticed from the Reformatory; that those who do not suit and those who run away are sometimes returned to the school, and there are six or eight of that class now in the institution [2868-2873]; that there are many children in the institution who should not be there, but they are sent in on a Magistrate's warrant, and there is no way of refusing them; that there are several small children, one an infant eighteen months old [2880]; that the inmates of the Reformatory are sent there for petty larcenies, and cannot be apprenticed, but are simply discharged at the end of their sentence, or when they are eighteen years old; that Magistrates frequently send children to the Industrial School by mistake, instead of sending them to the Reformatory [3067-3073]; that he thinks if the Benches of Magistrates did their duty, more children would be sent to the Reformatory, as they now either escape altogether or are improperly sent to the Industrial School [3101]; that only two girls from the Reformatory have been placed in situations, one of whom went to Hunter's Hill, where she stayed two days, after which she got another place which she did not keep, and is now in the Female Refuge, but the other has turned out well [3110-3115]; that there is no power to apprentice the girls from the Reformatory, and they are turned out to get a living as best they can [3125]; that communication is sometimes kept up with girls after they leave the Industrial School, but he has not heard much of them; that they generally write to some one in the institution after they go out; that he has not heard of girls being taken before a Court by persons to whom they were apprenticed, their indentures being cancelled, and the girls left without any one to look after them; that application for transfer of a girl apprenticed must be made to the Colonial Secretary; that he has always objected to girls being returned to their parents; that the hope of such release renders the girls unmanageable [6545-6562]. MRS. LUCAS says it was objectionable that a girl going away to a situation should be allowed to see her friends at Mr. Cowper's house before she went; that if Mr. Cowper wanted a girl for a situation, he would not make inquiries of Mr. or Mrs. Lucas, but would select the girl himself; that most of the girls for whom he got situations were bad girls; that she has a letter from one in which she thanks Mr. Cowper for for getting her the situation she is in, but some have not proved good [6277-6286]. MRS. KING, matron of the reformatory, says that when the girls are released from the institution, situations are if possible obtained for them, and they are sent away respectably clothed; that the last one who went out returned to her home, but said she would seek a situation; and one had turned out badly [3181]. MRS. ROWLAND says that it would be a risk to put innocent children under the care of the prostitute girls from Biloele, but she does not think any of the bad girls have been sent out as nurses; and that some of the girls sent out have done well [4177.] MRS. DUNN says that it is not wise to allow children sent in to the Industrial School to be returned to their parents, as they would soon be on the streets again if they were [4321]; that she does not know how the girls are apprenticed from the institution [4445]. MR. F. CANE says that none of the girls were apprenticed the first year, as they had to remain twelve months in the institution by law [5560]; that Mr. Cowper obtained situations for all the most insubordinate girls, who were taken away from the towns and removed from the influence of old associates; that this being done, there was some hope for the institution; that such an effort had never been made before [5598]; that he had two girls apprenticed to him and took them with him to Newcastle, one of whom finished her apprenticeship and went to her family, while the other would make a first class servant, though when in the institution she was the most stupid girl there [5635]; that the girls frequently requested to be sent to situations and not to be sent back to their mothers, as going back to old associates would ruin them [5731]; that in many cases the system of placing the girls out as servants had worked well [5765]. MR. ROBERTSON says that most of the girls who were apprenticed out did, he thinks, turn out well, and that the attempt Mr. Cowper made to get them situations had considerable success [6015]; that he attributed the fact that at first no one would take these girls as apprentices, to the wretched conduct of the Press of the city, which constantly published paragraphs to the discredit of the institution [6040]; that he thinks it is not advantageous to return girls to their parents, and that not more than one in three so returned turn out well [6093]. MR. COWPER says that he obtained situations for many girls who had been most insubordinate, but who nevertheless turned out well [6590-6596]; that it is wrong to return these girls to their parents, and he has only known one of those so returned who has not gone astray; that the prospect of getting back to old associates unsettles them, but if they expect to get a situation they work better in the institution; that there are two girls now in the institution for whom it is of no use getting situations, as they are bent on returning to their old courses when released, which will be in a few months [6606]; that the law requires alteration, as there are many children who ought to be sent to the school, but who cannot be brought within the provisions of the Act [6607]; that provision should be made for apprenticing girls from the Reformatory, as when they are released it is difficult to know what to do with them [6608]. CAPTAIN D. C. F. SCOTT, P.M., says that if children are brought before him of a certain age, and appear fit for Biloele, he sends them there, but that if they are under eleven, twelve, or thirteen years of age he never does so; that he objects to sending them there if they are under thirteen; that he has no knowledge of Cockatoo, but believes it would ruin children to send them there; that he has heard the school has been transferred to Biloele, but he has never sent a child there; that a Reformatory is wanted, and he has heard there is one at Biloele, but is not aware of any place having been proclaimed as such; that he has nothing to do with the course pursued by other Benches, and was not quite aware whether the two institutions were settled; that he has sent hundreds of girls to the Industrial School, but has dealt otherwise with the younger girls; that he has sent many prostitutes there [9860-9886].

MR. LUCAS says that the average cost of the Industrial School is £35 per head per year, and that the Reformatory is the most expensive institution in the Colony [2750, 2888]; that he thinks he heard Mr. Robertson say between £1,500 and £2,000 had been spent on the buildings; that the expense of supervision is about £12 6s. per head per year, the expense of food and fuel about £10 10s. per head per year, and the remaining £12 per head covers the cost of clothing, ironmongery, cows, &c. [2889-2894]; that the small number of inmates makes the institution expensive, but if the place were better adapted to its object it would be less costly [2948, 2994]; that the annual cost of the Reformatory is about £80 per head, there being only eight children there, and the salaries amounting to £185 per year, besides the clothing, food, &c. [3085]; that there is a clerk and storekeeper, who keeps proper accounts and issues all stores; that Mrs. Rowland, the house-matron, gets whatever is wanted for the institution from the store, keeps her own book, in which she enters all transactions, and is responsible for all goods supplied to her; that he used to sign the book himself at one time; that no one gets anything out of the store but by his orders, and if the children do so he is not aware of it, but that the matrons get goods which Mrs. Rowland enters; that stock is taken in the store, but he does not always check the issues; and that the storekeeper and clerk writes his reports from his dictation [6529-6544]. MRS. KING says she does not know the cost per head per year of the girls in the Reformatory, but there have been no breakages, and she is very economic with the clothing; that the smallness of the number would make the cost per head greater, but there is little more than the cost of rations and clothing [3187]. MRS. ROWLAND says she keeps an account of what she supplies to the girls of the Industrial School, and draws bread and whatever is wanted from the store except the provisions [3810]. MR. PRIOR says that he, as clerk and storekeeper, keeps the accounts of both Reformatory and Industrial School, takes charge of all stores, and issues them as they are required, and that he is under the superintendent's orders [4766-4779]; that a record is kept of the work done by the girls, and a report sent in weekly to the Colonial Secretary [4830]. MR. CANE says that when he was storekeeper he kept a record of all goods issued; that he never issued goods to the girls; that the rations were supplied to the place daily or weekly, so that the quantity could not be exceeded; that he issued goods to any person who came with a proper order, but not otherwise; that he could not keep an account of the fuel consumed, though at Newcastle he used to weigh it; that he did not think there was a large difference between the consumption of fuel in summer and in winter; that he handed over the stock-book to the person who succeeded him, and counted the stock over to him in a proper business-like way; that the matron or house-matron used to draw whatever linen was needed; that he would issue material and receive back into the store the things made up, and issue them as required; that Mr. Brennand examined his books before he left, and was satisfied with them, and said it was one of the best kept stocks he ever saw; that the Inspector of Charities also examined his books; that he made an entry of every piece of washing sent to the "Vernon," but did not enter any leather, as none was ever sent [5669-5689]. SISTER MARY BENEDICT says the children could be taken charge of by her sisterhood for £14 or £15 per head per year, and that it was the supervision that was so expensive under the present system [5854]. MR. ROBERTSON says that the children cost something like £35 per year each, and could be sent to a good boarding-school for that sum [6032]. MR. COWPER says that there is no need for the expense expense that is incurred, and that the cost of supervision could be very much reduced [6601]. MR. KING says that he inspected the storekeeper's books, but not minutely, and that it was impossible on casual inspections to look closely into the accounts; that he never examined the mode in which stores were issued, but that Mr. Cane had the books in excellent order; that he is not aware goods were served out to the girls without their being required to produce any order, and without any entry of the issue being made [7356-7361].

MR. LUCAS says that the Inspector of Charities visits the institution once a quarter, but had not been for five months previous to July, 1873; that he simply looks round the place, examines the dormitories, and also the material with which the girls are working [3025]; that on one occasion a girl whom he had beaten showed the mark of the cane to the Inspector [6425]. MRS. KELLY says that the school is inspected by the Metropolitan Inspectors of the Council of Education [4992]. MR. CANE says that the first Report of the Inspector of Charities, Mr. Walker, would give an exact idea of the state of the institution in February, 1868 [5548]; and that the storekeeper's books in his time were always inspected [5686]. DR. O. S. EVANS says that the Inspector of Charities reported on one occasion that the girls had had the itch, and that he had not been there for ten months previously [5973]. MR. F. KING, Inspector of Charities, says that he inspected the institution in March, 1873, and reported on the case of the girl Gray who had been caned; and on the 18th April, when he reported on the untidy state of the children [7323-7335]; that he also inspected the institution in January, April, June, October, 1870, January, March, June, July, August, December, 1871, April, July, August, 1872, and March, 1873 [7457]. MR. WALKER, ex-Inspector of Charities, says that he visited the institution at Newcastle, held several inquiries there, and wrote some long reports [7671]; and that he visited the place about once a month on an average [7682].

INMATES.

MR. LUCAS says that the Industrial School is for girls only, but that there are three little boys aged from eighteen months to five years in it [2522]; that there are eighty-three girls and three boys in the school, which will hold 120, the greatest number ever in it having been 110; that the girl who has been there the longest has been there for six years [2543]; that they are kept in the place until the age of eighteen; that there are eighteen girls of the prostitute class—girls who have been upon the streets; and though the place admits of no classification, he puts these girls together as well as he can, but they associate with the others; that he had heard of girls going into the institution at Newcastle diseased at eleven and twelve years of age, but since he has been in the establishment none have come in younger than fourteen; that the eldest girl he has is sixteen, but they have to put down that age, otherwise they cannot be admitted; that he has girls of seventeen or eighteen, but has to go by the warrants; that it is undesirable to have these girls in an Industrial School, as the thieves and prostitutes should all go together into the Reformatory; that though a thief may not be a prostitute, most of the girls he speaks of are, he thinks, thieves; that if they cannot be kept apart altogether, it is better to mix prostitutes with thieves than with young and comparatively innocent children; that he thinks it is a mistake to send prostitutes to the Industrial School; that he has known convict women to reform, and thinks if girls who are taken from the streets go out to service and then back to their parents in Sydney there is little chance for them, but they will do better in the country [2551-2572]; that Biloea is not of much use as an institution for the reclamation of these girls, because there is no classification, and too many are put together; that a girl was sent to the Industrial School for thieving, who should have been sent to the Reformatory, and others had been sent to the Reformatory who should have been sent to the Industrial School; that there was one girl, aged fourteen, sent in enceinte, and she was sent away to the Asylum to be confined [2588-2595]; that there are thirty-six children who are not able to do anything, some being too small, others, though fifteen years of age, cannot hem the simplest things and are more trouble than the little ones [2607]; that the prostitutes are the wildest, though some of the others are very fast too, and there are now about thirty-eight girls who were in the institution when it was at Newcastle [2623]; that these girls have no moral tone until it is taught them, as they are picked up from among prostitutes and bad characters, and are neither truthful nor honest, from the youngest to the oldest; that they come from a vicious lot of people and are children of bad parents, some sent in because their parents are vagrants and others taken from prostitutes' houses; that they are not always vicious in themselves, but have been taught vice and are vicious from circumstances [2645-2651]; that he thinks there are many children who have no business there, some being too small, and others children who are simply destitute and should not be sent to mix with children of bad character; that there are no thieves in the school, but there are many inmates more fit to be at Randwick [2880-2887]; that there are eight girls in the Reformatory, the average last year (1872) being only four, and the children are sent there for petty larcenies instead of being sent to gaol; that they are of the same class as the inmates of the Industrial School, save that they have committed theft [3065-3073]; that as a matter of fact those who are sent to the Reformatory for small peculations are not as vicious as those sent to the Industrial School; that if the prostitutes were more looked after, there would be 200 more in the institution [3122-3129]. MRS. LUCAS says that the children are not quarrelsome as a rule [3275]; that there is a baby there about eighteen months old, which is very weak and delicate [3287]; that when Mr. Cowper gave some skipping-ropes into the charge of one of the girls, she showed appreciation of the confidence placed in her, and looked after them very well, but still there was difficulty in managing the girls [3359]; that they require constant change and do not keep to one thing long [3369]; that those who are prostitutes should be separated from the others, as they corrupt the young ones [3402]. MRS. KING says that the girls who are sent into the Reformatory are very rough when they first come in, that there was one girl who was so addicted to pilfering that it became part of her nature and she would steal anything for the mere sake of stealing, but she has given it up within the last year; that she has no prostitutes in the place, and her girls are all virtuous [3157]; that the girls she has are in a state of reformation and seem reformed [3179]; that at Newcastle the girls in the Industrial School were of all ages, from the little child to the big woman [3221]; that the Reformatory girls are not very truthful, but while some are addicted to lying others never tell a lie; that girls of the prostitute class are generally more depraved than thieves, and that some of the girls she has got are the offspring of respectable parents, while others are the children of loose characters [3244]. MRS. BRACKENREGG says that the girls steal from each other, all of them, even the little girls [3574]; that the girls are not always troublesome, as they are sometimes better behaved than at others [3640]; that they used to speak most offensively and called people all kinds of names, but were now afraid of the cane [3650]; that there was one girl there (Catherine Walker) who used to hear the little girls say their prayers in the dormitories of her own accord, and who had sufficient influence over them to induce them to do so [3706]; that those girls who enter the place uncorrupted soon get contaminated and become as bad as the rest; that the girls say they come in innocent, but soon learn to swear and lie and steal [3753]; that she thinks there are a great many girls there of the prostitute class, and the little girls are as bad as the others [3771]; MRS. ROWLAND says that all the girls in No. 3 dormitory have been girls of the town, and thinks that they teach the other girls everything that is bad—that there is a great deal of badness among them [3846]; that she believes one of the little girls would corrupt 500 innocent children; that one little girl of eight or nine years old knows as much as any big girl in the place; that the girls carry on disgraceful practices, and that grown girls found sleeping together should be punished; that when a girl is received into the institution she has to undergo a process of initiation, and is allowed no peace until she submits to it; that she heard a girl say to one who had just come in—"You will know something before you have been here a month—you will be surprised at the wickedness of this place"; that the girls sent in from the country are more moral than the others, and that in most instances girls are sent in from the country because they have no parents, not because they are vicious; that there are twenty-four or twenty-five prostitutes there, and one is quite a child, has been there three or four years, and is now not more than thirteen years of age; that this child was diseased when she came in [3924-3943]; that latterly she has not seen much improvement in the conduct of the girls, as their language is very bad, and they destroy things, but in a quieter way than before [4072]; that in October 1871 the majority of the girls were Catholics; that the girls were obedient to the sisters, and would do a deal for them; that at one time they tore their meat to pieces with their fingers, and could not be trusted with knives and forks, and are now better behaved at meals [4107-4118]. MRS. DUNN says that some of the small girls are very bad—have come into the school diseased, and would corrupt any set of girls that they went amongst; that perhaps twenty might be selected who would not contaminate innocent girls; that she has seen them resort to vile practices, both by day and night [4152-4163]; that some of the little ones are quite as bad as the others [4179]; that those who are sent in from the town are decidedly the worst [4258]; that they steal and use bad language now [4357]; that the vile practices to which she refers are unnatural sexual practices, too bad to be described, and she has heard other officers speak of similar practices having been carried on [4420]. MRS. AUSTIN says she finds some of the girls ignorant of laundry work, but that they are anxious to learn, and she has no trouble in managing them; that the girls under her control do not use bad language when they are with her [4522-4527]; that when she first went there she thought the girls very bad, but she does not think so now; that there are not many of the Newcastle girls there now, and that kindness will do anything with them [4558]; that she thinks they are improving, as there are not so many quarrels amongst them; that she never had occasion to have them punished; that they never did anything to deserve punishment except run away from the laundry for a few minutes; that they made a mess in the copper, and that offence did deserve punishment; that they never tell tales of each other [4629-4633]; that so far as she sees they are perfectly orderly and well-behaved, but as the laundry is some distance from the main buildings, they might be very bad without her knowing it; that they never sing bad songs in the laundry, but they sing nice pure romantic songs there [4696-4708]. MRS. KELLY says that some of the children are clever and attentive to instruction, and she finds them not more than ordinarily troublesome in school [4986]; that some are degradingly ignorant when they first come in, and some have no idea of God; that these ignorant children came from the country, not from Sydney; that they came from near Bathurst, and one, a big girl of sixteen, did not know her alphabet; some from the streets of Sydney have been sent to school, and have had some religious instruction before they came in, but are still very ignorant; that they are not the most ignorant, and many are anxious to learn [5002-5014]. MRS. CONNELL says the girls were very noisy and rude in October, 1871, and that they were much better when Mr. Cowper used to visit the institution, though they are still very rude and use bad language; that they are the rakings and scrapings of the streets; that they used scarcely ever to wear shoes and stockings, and that they were frequently guilty of thieving [5083-5092]; that the girls are not so good as they were six or eight months ago, as they are more impudent [5132]. CONSTABLE TURNER says that the girls do not use so much bad language now as they did some months ago, but they do use bad language sometimes; that when he first went there the girls were abusive and insulting to every one, the young ones being as bad as the others [5224-5311]; that the place is quieter because many of the worst girls have gone out [5396]. CONSTABLE GLASSINGTON says he has heard the girls use bad language lately [5471]. MR. CANE says that when punishment became severe the girls became more degraded and troublesome [5557]; that it is impossible to conceive any human beings more debased, as they were reared in an atmosphere of vice of every description; that no person of refinement and education could go among them without producing a good effect, as they are very sensible of refinement [5562-5564]; that they have a delight in setting officers who do not agree, against each other [5588]; that he spoke kindly to one girl about using some bad language, and the girl promised never to use it again and never did; that they are taken reeking out of Chinese dens and put into a dormitory with thirty others, who regale them with their horrible experiences [5630]; that he noticed little difference between the elder and younger girls as far as knowledge of evil was concerned, and the young ones who have been brought up in brothels are the worst as regards absolute want of moral training; that there was one little girl of fourteen who taught him more about Vagrant Acts than he ever knew before [5640]; that they are the most provoking of human beings, as they are perfectly wild children whose "larks" are dangerous, and as they have peculiar idiosyncracies [5658]; that after Mr. Cowper's interference there was a great change for the better [5705]; that there is not the slightest reliance to be placed on the statements of any of them, as they have not the least regard for truth [5725]; that it is scarcely possible to conceive the filthy sexual practices of some of them [5763]. SISTER MARY BENEDICT said that she did not find the children so wild as she anticipated when she went there first, that the nuns had great influence over them, and that they were ignorant [5778-5782]; that there is a great absence of self-respect among them [5802]; that they are very fond of the nuns and like to be near them, and that the nuns had in only one instance experienced a want of respect from any of them [5828]. MRS. FOOTR says that some seem to be stupid and dull, as if their intellect had been injured, that the worst girls are the most intelligent and the most ignorant ones from the country, that those with intellect seem anxious to learn and attentive, and that they have been sometimes quarrelsome with each other, but not shown her any disrespect [5866-5872]. MR. ROBERTSON says that the conduct of the big girls to the matron at Newcastle was such as was hardly fit to be mentioned [6015].

MR.

Mr. LUCAS says that the girls are locked up at night, and that it is necessary to lock them up, as even now they get away sometimes; that the candles are all put out in the dormitories at 9 p.m. in winter and 9:30 in summer, and the girls left alone for the night [2535-2542]; that they are kept until they are eighteen and then apprenticed, and that it would be better not to keep them so long; that there are eighteen girls of the prostitute class whom he puts to sleep together as well as he can, but who associate with the others in their work [2551-2557]; that there are too many girls sleeping together, as, out of ten girls in a room, if four want to reform the other six will not let them; that their worst time is between the ages of twelve and sixteen; that it is useless to attempt to reform a prostitute above that age, unless in a proper establishment where classification can take place [2586-2589]; that the girls above twelve years old learn to wash, mangle, iron, and cook, and all, from the smallest child, learn to sew; that a great many have been admitted who have not been taught to sew, and some have to be taught everything, while others can do almost anything; that the big girls sew from 9 to 12 in the morning, and the little ones from 2 to 4 in the afternoon, the big girls going to school in the afternoon and the little ones in the forenoon, thus keeping the elder and younger girls apart, though two or three work together in the kitchen and laundry; that the smaller children do not know, he thinks, why the prostitutes are kept apart, and they try to keep the reason secret, but he supposes they find it out by the distinction made in the dormitories; that there is much insubordination [2596-2618]; that there is no system of punishment of offenders provided by the law, but the superintendent can imprison rioters for fourteen days, reporting the fact to the Colonial Secretary, and if a girl offends singly he cannot lock her up for more than three days [2629-2640]; that when they are locked up the officers have to watch to prevent them being too well fed, as they are better fed by girls about the place who give them food than when they are free [2643]; that they have tea about 5 p.m., after the cows are milked, and then at dark are locked up in their dormitories, in which they have lights, but no tables, but where they have nothing to do except sing and amuse themselves, having no books to read or sewing to do; that when books were supplied to them they were destroyed, and now they are only allowed to have books on Sundays; that on holidays he allows them to stop out of the dormitories from 6 to 9 p.m., but the general rule is to lock them up in the dormitories without occupation or amusement; that they are taught to sing sometimes, but not as part of the school routine; that the place is virtually a gaol, and that he thinks it should be something quite different, but cannot be until the girls of the prostitute class are got rid of; that they are fond of doing crochet at night, and trim articles of dress with their work; that some of the Catholic girls are now doing some for the House of the Good Shepherd; that they leave school and work at 4 p.m. and play rounders and other games during the remainder of the afternoon [2653-2686]; that each of the officers has a girl to do housework, and he has two, and that these seven girls concoct much mischief; that the association of the prostitutes with the other girls in the play-ground cannot be prevented, and that the officers' servants are all of the prostitute class [2688]; that the officers' servants do not dine with the other children in the institution, but the girls take food for them up to the officers' quarters, and thus great confusion is caused [2696]; that these servant girls cannot get their meals in the common dining-room because they are at the officers' quarters, but that one girl carries up the meals to the others [2714]; that there is no one in the dormitories with the girls from the time they are locked up until the morning, and they can do as they like from sundown to sunrise; that the Protestants and Catholics separate for prayers night and morning after muster; that on Sunday mornings Mrs. Foott and Mrs. Lucas conduct a Sunday-school, and preachers come at 3 in the afternoon for the Protestants, while on Sunday morning two sisters from the House of the Good Shepherd come and instruct the Catholics, who he believes read their Bibles in the afternoon with the schoolmistress; that on Wednesday the same sisters come and have religious services, and on Thursday Mrs. Foott comes after school hours; that the prayers said morning and evening, when they are all assembled, are the only prayers that they say, except that the schoolmistress has prayers with the Catholics; that he often sees them, when he looks through the windows, saying prayers night and morning of their own accord; that they cannot be taught the habit of private prayer, because they have to get their baths directly they are out of bed, and though they could spare time for a prayer, he could not spare time to look after them; that he probably could enforce it, but it was not done when he went into the institution; that he thinks it would be a good thing, and does it in his own family, but that he has not officers enough to carry it out, as there are so many dormitories; that there is no one would like better to inculcate a religious principle into them, as it is the only thing to save them [2730-2749]; that when the girls are first received they are put into a bath and kept in a separate room until the doctor, who attends twice a week, has examined them, after which they are sent to work or to school; that girls who have just come in are never given as servants to the officers; that the girls who work in the laundry, kitchen, &c., are changed every week, each girl working in the laundry one week out of four, and as those who work in the kitchen are more suited to that work, they are changed once a fortnight; that the girls who work in the laundry do not go to school during the week they are at work, while of the three girls in the kitchen, one goes to school and two do not; that out of eighty-six children, the average attendance at the school is seventy-three, and there are three too young to go to school; that the girls are taught to make their own clothes, but not to cut them out [2755-2764]; that before they are locked up at night they separate for prayers, which they say aloud for themselves, the Catholics under the supervision of the teacher, and the Protestants with the matron; that he does not know the Catholic prayers, but the Protestants say Church of England prayers out of the Book of Common Prayer, which they have off by heart; that they are not able to say their prayers before they come into the institution; that the prayers last about fifteen minutes, being said kneeling; that on the Catholic side, Mrs. Kelly reads one part of the prayers and the girls respond, but he does not know what the prayers are; that he believes the children say prayers when they get up in the morning, but does not know it of his own knowledge; that there is nothing in the dormitories but the beds and three rows of matting; that there are no fires in them, and the girls being locked up in them from 6 to 9 are expected to go to bed; that no matron remains with them, but the iron gates are simply locked, and there the girls remain like the felons of old times; that the matron does not see them until 6 o'clock the next morning, when the gates are unlocked; that the girls are mustered at 9 a.m., and counted morning and evening before prayers [2781-2825]; that the girls who work at the laundry go there the first thing in the morning, and stop there all day, except at meal-times; that some go to the kitchen, and that the officers' servants go to school in the afternoon from 2 till 4, being employed at the officers' quarters until 2; that the extent of the schooling they receive is given between 2 and 4, but that they learn domestic work during the

the other hours ; that books are only given them on Sundays, because they destroy them on other days ; that they sometimes tear them on Sundays ; that there is no punishment proper to be inflicted upon them for insolence [2830-2849] ; that when a girl is locked up on bread and water she is put into No. 3 dormitory ; that there is no furniture there, as if there were they would break it ; that they get washed every morning, and are visited and kept clean ; that they are advised and talked with, but are not always in a very good temper for prayer [2856-2863] ; that there is no rule as to the way in which the girls should keep their hair ; that he cannot account for the untidy state of their hair, as they are combed and washed every day, and have ribbons to tie their hair ; that their friends bring them the ribbons, of any colour they think fit [2875-2879] ; that they are locked up at sundown, and the lights put out at 9, no one remaining with them [2916] ; that they tried to establish an evening school but it did not succeed, and the rules say that they are to be locked up in their dormitories at 9 o'clock ; that they knock off work at dark ; that it is not right the children should be left alone in their dormitories [2951-2987] ; that there is no communication between the children in the Reformatory and those in the Industrial School unless they go on messages ; that they all get water from the same pump, but are apart all day ; that they go to prayers together on Sundays, but do not go to school together, the Reformatory girls being taught in the Reformatory [3061-3064] ; that the children are not in the habit of leaving the table at meal-times without finishing their meals, or carrying away their food and eating it outside, except those who go to work ; that they say grace when the meal is over ; that two or three of the officers' servants may go when they ask leave ; that children are not seen outside after meals with their food in their hands, but they take their bread when they are done and march out in order ; that there is no water in the dining-room, as the children never ask for any, and there has never been any used for dinner in the place since he has been there ; there are no mugs of any kind upon the table ; that they would be running out for water all dinner-time if there were ; that they do not after dinner drink out of a horse-trough in the yard, but there is a tap in the yard, and a cup put there for them ; that they were, on the occasion when some members of the Commission visited the institution, drinking from the tap and not the trough ; that if they did drink from the trough the water was clean ; that the children do take out their broken victuals to eat at play ; that it has always been the practice ; that there was not a full supply of knives and forks for months ; that all the officers' servants now have their meals in the dining-hall and have done so since he was first examined, but did not do so before ; that they dine at 12 ; that on the occasion when the secretary and two members of the Commission visited the place, there may have been twenty-nine girls absent when they sat down to dinner, but that they all came in during the meal ; that there is no muster-roll, as the one he had got into confusion [6351-6377] ; that he never appeals to the girls against the officers [6480] ; that one of the girls who attends to the cows has been doing so for twelve months, and the other for four months ; that they learn to milk, the one who has been learning for twelve months being a good milker while the other is not ; that the former might have been two years at it, but he does not think so [6563] ; that they carried on the evening school for five or six weeks, and have commenced it again, but the girls prefer to be in their dormitories, where they sing bawdy songs and make a great noise [6580] ; that the girls having drawn indecent figures on the walls, on being ordered to rub them out said they would not do so for an Orange sod like him, and positively refused to obey him [9347] ; and that they bite and pinch each other till they make black marks, especially when they are fond of each other [9354]. Mrs. LUCAS says that they have had some trouble with the girls, but not so much within the last twelve months ; that they keep them pretty well occupied, but more might be done if the officers were willing to do their duty ; that they are locked up from 6 to 9 in the dormitories without any supervision or means of amusing themselves, but that they were allowed out, and attended an evening school, which had to be abandoned ; that she does not think it objectionable for them to be in the dormitories without any matron with them [3259-3274] ; that they are allowed to have books on Sunday, and that they amuse themselves in the dormitories with crochet and games ; that the officers having children of their own interferes with the discipline ; that it would be more homely and agreeable if more attention were paid to the girls ; that some girls are put to work under ten years of age, but not regular work, merely assisting in the dormitories and making their own beds ; that the children sent in young are the best sewers ; that they are not quarrelsome [3275-3289] ; that the children who are servants to the officers attend school in the afternoon ; that only the older ones are are servants ; that they all sleep in the dormitories and go to the officers' quarters at 6 a.m. ; that they have their meals at the officers' quarters [3306-3314] ; that they have to send round to muster the children, as there is no bell ; that the girls with braid on their dresses occupy no higher position than the others, but put it on by her permission ; that the girls with ribbon in their hair occupy no higher position than the others ; that their parents and friends bring them ribbons and they are allowed to wear them ; that they made it a point that the girls on the officers' quarters should come down to meals, but there is not sufficient time for the girls to get the officers' dinners over and be ready for school, so they are allowed to dine at the officers' quarters ; that they sometimes put their dinners away until tea-time [3320-3329] ; that the girls are mustered and counted before they are locked up, but are not called by name, as that plan had been found inconvenient ; that there is only a lamp in the passage, and unless there was a girl to hold the candle they could not call the roll ; that the girls say the General Confession and the Lord's Prayer morning and evening ; that they are taught to milk ; that there are three lots of girls sent to the laundry, being changed weekly ; that the older girls in the kitchen are not changed ; that all the girls are not taught to milk, some having no idea of it ; that the girls on the officers' quarters must be changed every four weeks for the laundry ; that she has known a girl stay for six or seven months on the officers' quarters ; that they are, as far as possible, taught housework ; that they are, by a fixed rule, changed from one duty to another every week, but, having no cook, one girl who understands cooking is kept as long as possible in the kitchen ; that she gets nothing extra, though it is desirable to give the girls some encouragement ; that there is now no system of rewards and punishments, the only reward being to get a girl a situation outside when they are ready to go out ; that when a girl comes in, she is bathed, her head examined, and, if clean, the hair left on ; that the hair is only tied back ; that the girls' hair is combed sometimes two or three times a day, and every girl is obliged to go to the bath and have her head washed daily ; that the young ones' hair is cut short, but not the hair of the big ones, except when a girl is careless and does not keep her head clean ; that nothing occurs among the big girls which the little ones do not know, and thus the young girls are corrupted ; that they are put into separate dormitories, but must mix in the day-time [3375-3403] ; that the girls may have had disputes with each other about eating meat on a Friday, but she never had any such dispute [6186] ; that the children were never allowed to have any night-dresses, except girls who are leaving the institution, or those who are sick; that night-dresses are never given them, nor did she ever suggest that they should have them; that they never had them at Newcastle [6235]; that no one has punished the girls worse than Mr. Cowper did, and that Mr. Cowper and Mrs. Kelly went about the building, and he put the girls in the cells for singing a song of their own concocting—"Charley is my darling" [6256]. Mrs. KING says that the girls in the Reformatory are taught housework; that they rise soon after daybreak, clean their dormitory, fold their bedding, &c., and then some go to the kitchen to prepare breakfast, while others are engaged upon other domestic duties; that they have breakfast, then prayers, she reading prayers to Protestants and Roman Catholics separately; that then they go to washing, sewing, &c.; that few know how to sew at first, but that now all make their own clothes; that they are in school from 2 to 4 p.m., when she teaches them; that then they have some recreation, tea, and bed; that in the evening they sit and read and sew until 9 p.m., when they are locked up [3142-3153]; that at Newcastle, when she had the Industrial School there, the girls who went as servants to the officers were changed once a month and sometimes oftener; that every week the girls were detailed to their various duties, and that the officers' servants went to school in the afternoon [3199]; that each girl had a number, and her number was put on her clothing, and each Saturday night the under-linen was laid out on the beds, and that she frequently inspected them to see that they were clean; that they wore hoods at play, and she had difficulty in making them wear them or in making them wear their boots; that they attended muster pretty regularly, but that the bigger ones used to try and evade school; that she had a muster roll and called it regularly, as it was necessary to do, in order to prevent the girls slipping away [3211-3226]; that when she had charge the girls were not allowed to dress their hair as they thought proper, and that if the girls' hair was clean and free from disease she never cut it off; that the Reformatory girls are encouraged to say prayers on rising in the morning [3236-3238]; that the children go into the premises of the Industrial School for religious instruction, but she had rather they did not, as the other girls ask them questions; that they only go for religious, not secular instruction, and that there should be more supervision over them on such occasions [3240]. Mrs. BRACKENREGG says that there are two girls kept regularly at the milking, but no more, though there are many girls big enough to learn [3459]; that each of the officers is allowed to have a girl as a servant, and the girls go to school in the afternoon [3472]; that the girls witness frequent disagreements between Mr. and Mrs. Lucas and the officers, and discipline is thus impaired; that the matrons do not take their meals with the girls, but remain with them at meal-times; that a big girl is put into a dormitory full of little children in order to mind them; that the officers' servants do not dine with the other girls, but run about and eat their dinners as they like; that there is a general want of order and discipline in the place [3478-3504]; that there is no muster roll, but the girls are counted in the dormitories and at muster; that there should be a muster roll, as girls may now slip out of one dormitory into another, as they have done sometimes; that the children say ordinary prayers out of the Book of Common Prayer and sing hymns; that they say prayers after they go into their dormitories, but the matrons do not hear them, there being a girl in the dormitory who is supposed to do so; that some do not undress and go to bed until the lights are put out [3534-3554]; that there is no difference made between girls who steal and girls who do not steal [3578]; that there are frequent unseemly exhibitions of temper by Mr. and Mrs. Lucas before the girls, who became impudent in consequence; that the girls nickname all the officers [3584-3591]; that the mustering of the children for dinner is very troublesome, and they drop in to dinner in ones and twos; that to-day when she said grace there were about twenty girls present besides the little ones; that when she says "What makes you so late?" a girl will answer simply "Nothing"; that she suggested that those who were late should go without their dinner, and Mr. Lucas assented, but that when she attempted to carry out that rule he gave them their dinners; that there was a time when they had no knives or forks, and used to pull the meat to pieces with their fingers; that they now carry away food from the tables, Mrs. Lucas being sometimes present as well as herself; that she has not been ordered to stop them; that if she checks the girls they say "Oh, Mr. Lucas won't say anything," or "I am not going to obey you"; that owing to the abuse they receive the matrons are not respected by the girls [3600-3622]; that no effort that she has seen is made to bring them under religious influences [3667]; that they have prayers every morning after muster, the matrons standing up while they are kneeling; that no one teaches them any prayers, but they learn from one another; that she has stood outside the dormitory at night and heard them saying their prayers, but not lately; that there was a girl called Catherine Walker who was particular in hearing them say their prayers, but she had not heard them say any since Catherine Walker left; that the officers can make them do some things without caning them, but have to cane them occasionally; that they sometimes show fight, and in one instance a girl caught her by the necktie and nearly choked her [3681-3720]; that the girls are left alone in the dormitories from 6 o'clock to 9 p.m. without any occupation, and under no supervision; that there is a light in the passage outside the dormitory, and they sit down by the gate close to the light and crochet; that they romp and tear the bed-clothes, and sometimes there is one continual shout and howl all night; that they sing songs; that they cannot see at the far end of the dormitory, so have to crowd about the gate like so many caged animals; that there is a candle in No. 3 dormitory, because it is differently situated to the others; that the girls are all mixed together in the day-time, and she does not think that the worst are picked out and put to sleep by themselves; that they must amuse themselves in the best way that they can, as one-half of the dormitory is in darkness; that the institution gives them no possible means of amusement; that they sing the most frightful songs, in which the little children soon learn to join, becoming as bad as the others; that at 9 o'clock she goes round with the house matron to put out the lights, but they do not see the girls go to bed; that they go to bed in the dark, but she never saw them go to bed in their clothes; that they do not fold their clothes or hang them up, there being no pegs for the purpose, but many sleep in their clothes; that there are no night-dresses, and they sleep in their chemises, except when in hospital [3726-3766]; that they are allowed so many suits of clothes by the Government; that they are treated pretty much like a lot of prisoners, and that the young children who go in there innocent are soon corrupted; that she was never told it was her duty to see that they went to bed in an orderly way; that she has seen the girls running about half naked of a morning, and has seen them cleaning up about the place without dresses on; that they wear their clothes indecently short, the girls tearing their dresses in order to make them short, and that they are not punished for tearing their clothes [3773-3795]. Mrs. ROWLAND says that she gets the children's clothes changed twice a week, the linen being put on the beds; that some have more clothes than others as they are extravagant and destroy them, but each girl is supposed to have four of each article of clothing per year; that they have no night-dresses; that the girls make their own beds; that they are locked up in the dormitories from 6 p.m. without lights or means of amusement; that they do crochet at this time and sing; that when the lights are extinguished in the passages they are left in absolute darkness, and she hears them still sitting by the door and talking; that they cluster round the grated door like so many little wild beasts looking out; that the girls being locked up so long before going to bed causes much evil; that they often sing improper songs in the dormitories; that they are taught to sing in the Sunday-school, but not in the day-school, and they are very fond of singing; that the younger ones sing improper songs as well as the others; that it is a great pity to have the little girls with the grown girls, as the latter corrupt the former [3812-3847]; that they always say their prayers before being locked up, but that a little ignorant child going into the institution is never taught a prayer by any one; that the big girls are too bad to say any prayers, but that the little ones say them sometimes of their own accord; that she goes down at 9 o'clock to put out the lights, and she does so but does not see that the girls go to bed; that their clothes are lying all over the dormitory; that if she were to tell them to go to bed they would probably abuse her, and they stay up sometimes after the light is removed; that they romp about and tear their clothes, and when she reports the clothes as being torn, Mrs. Lucas takes no notice, while the girls jeer at her; that the big girls tear their dresses to make them short, and some are disgustingly short; that they lose their clothes and hide them; that she found a girl once lighting a fire with her apron; that the girls' word is sometimes taken before hers by Mrs. Lucas [3853-3877]; that when disputes occur between the officers and the superintendent or matron the girls jeer at them and make comments on the proceedings; that all the affairs of the place are settled before the girls who know everything; that the girls were riotous at tea, and she tried to keep order and send for the superintendent who abused her in the girls' presence [3886-3889]; that if she gives an order the girls sometimes jeer and laugh, and when she reports them to Mr. Lucas nothing is done [3892]; that there was an attempt made to give the children some amusement at night, but she was never asked to assist [3908-3915]; that one bad girl she knows of does not sleep with the other prostitute girls, but with the young ones, while another who has not been immoral sleeps with the prostitute girls; that very small children there are conversant with evil, and one of them would corrupt 500 innocent children; that some very young girls were detected in filthy practices; that when a girl enters the institution she is forced to submit to a process of initiation by the others; that new comers are instructed by the others to rebel against the authority of the matrons; that some of the young girls are quite as bad as the grown girls; that they should be classified not by their ages, but according to their characters when they first come in [3929-3941]; that they are not employed all day, but some work in the sewing-room all the morning, go to school in the afternoon, and amuse themselves after 4 p.m.; that the grown girls have lighter work than the middle-sized girls, and that when not at work they spent their time in play or mischief [3945]; that the officers' servants could dine at the institution if they liked, but preferred not, and she would rather they would [3952]; that the girls had no hope, but that when they had the hope of getting situations they were more under control; that they were not so quiet now as they were when they had that hope; that they have too much of their own way; that they are quieter now than they were two years ago, when Mr. Cowper went into the place and effected some reform, so that she hardly knew the place [3971-3983]; that she has every day to go down to the beach to bring girls up, and when she does they abuse her; that she brought up two girls on Saturday, and as soon as they came up on one side they went down again on the other, and hid among the rocks, where she found them talking with some men; that these girls were not punished; that she found two girls once without any clothes on, jumping in and out of the water and talking to the men; that they made use of dirty language, and were scolded by Mr. Lucas, but not punished [3995-4005]; that there are very few perfect blankets in the place, and the girls are still destroying their clothes; that the girls have never had any night-dresses since she has been there, nor has she ever suggested to Mrs. Lucas that they should have them [4014]; that there is no punishment inflicted on the girls for indecent conduct; that they carry on bad practices in the day-time, and two girls about twelve years old were found by Mrs. Dunn; that the officers did their best to stop the singing of indecent songs, but could not [4032, 4040]; that Mr. Cowper effected great improvement in the discipline of the place; and that the evening amusements had a good influence, as the girls after them went to bed quietly and did not romp about; that she never heard why those evening amusements were given up, nor did she ever see any sufficient reason for giving them up; that about forty girls attended them [4054-4060]; that the conduct of the girls has been bad lately, and they use bad language in the presence of the officers and of the little children; that they tear their dresses to make them short and expose their legs; that they do not wear drawers; that Mrs. Foott, from Balmain, visits the Church of England children on Sundays and Thursdays, and the sisters visit the Roman Catholics on the same days, and Mr. Simmons visits the Protestants, but no Church of England clergyman visits them regularly; that the girls are sometimes rude to the ladies who visit them [4972-4086]; that they had been rude and abusive and insubordinate on several occasions without being punished (instances given); that before the sisters visited the place the Roman Catholics, who were in the majority there, were neglected and running about the island like wild creatures; that she has heard them speak about not having a clergyman coming to see them; that their neglected condition made them feel like outcasts; that the visits of the sisters had good effect, and the girls were obedient to them; that Mrs. Foott's visits were also decidedly beneficial; that at one time the girls could not be trusted with knives or forks, and tore their meat to pieces with their fingers; that they are better behaved than they once were, but have been getting worse conducted latterly [4107-4118]; that Mr. Lucas insulted her before a girl who had taken some aprons off the line; that the pigs and dog and cat were all fighting together in the dining-room over some crumbs thrown to them by the girls [4183].

Mrs. M. A. DUNN says that the girls often make rude remarks upon the quarrels that take place among the officers, and say that they will not obey any one but Mr. Lucas; that they are locked up from 6 to 6:30 p.m., without any occupation; that there was an attempt made to provide some evening amusements for them, but they got tired of them; that with classification, and under different management, they might be reclaimed; that the corrupt girls soon contaminate those who are innocent, and she believes the little children are corrupted by the elder ones, because they use bad language and sing bad songs [4136-4146]; that the girls are guilty of practices both by day and night which are too disgraceful to describe, and that if there were proper discipline this might be remedied; that the girls do not care about being locked up, but dread the cane; that they are very bold and defiant, and when locked up together they sing improper songs, and otherwise try to upset the discipline of the place; that the younger children hear the immoral songs and bad language; that they would be better if there were strict discipline and some system of rewards and punishments [4163-4181]; that they have too much leisure time, and concoct mischief, and that that they need a playground and a big room in which they could amuse themselves under the supervision of an officer; that obedience to orders is not enforced, and that they would get on better if the matron and superintendent were more strict; that Mr. Lucas lets them have too much of their own way; that the big girls used to go down to the beach and bathe, and that practice was stopped by firmness; that by decision one can get the girls to do almost anything; that the servant girls dine at the officers' quarters, and she does not wish it but cannot prevent it, as Mr. Lucas' servants were the first to introduce the irregularity; that if he she makes a complaint against a girl, the girl will be called up and believed, and that the girls are encouraged to run to the superintendent and matron with tales about the officers [4259-4277]; that in October, 1871, the girls constantly used bad language, would not wear shoes and stockings, were never regular at muster or meals, had no knives and forks, and tore the meat with their fingers, and threw bread about the dining-room sometimes at each other, sometimes at the officers; that they were very turbulent; that in two months there was a great change for the better, and they became quiet, and that the change was caused by persons from outside visiting them and giving them religious instruction [4285-4305]; that the girls looked forward to these visits, and enjoyed the instruction they received; that she did not take part in the evening school, but remembers an evening when Mr. Lucas gave an entertainment in honor of his birthday, and sang a vulgar song (words quoted) to the girls; that she thought it a very improper song to sing, and not likely to elevate the girls [4306-4316]; that she remembers two girls escaping one night, and that she thinks it would be better to have a muster-roll than simply to count the children as is now done; that the two girls who escaped were not missed, and they would have been missed had there been a muster roll called; that they do not attend meals regularly, but come and go as they like, no one sitting down with them, but the matrons walking about and keeping order [4328-4338]; that the girls steal and use bad language; that Mr. Langley and three Sunday school teachers visit them; that once they would not behave themselves and the teacher got angry and said he would walk out [4357]; that the girls are addicted to singing hymns and bad songs, the latter most frequently [4399]; that she witnessed disgraceful practices on the part of three little girls, and reported them to Mrs. Lucas, who talked to them, but they were not punished; that she talked to them for a long time; that she believes the same bad practices still prevail, but she has not seen anything more of them; that they get books to read on Sunday, but not on any other day, as they destroy them; that they have plenty of time to read but no room to read in [4414-4444]; that the evening school was given up because the girls being set to make dresses got tired of it; that she has gone down to the wards at night and heard the girls singing bad songs after they have said their prayers, but she never heard of their being punished for doing so [4471-4479]; that one night at tea the girls were noisy and threw bread at each other, and Mrs. Lucas being called in, abused Mrs. Rowland in their presence [6137].

Mrs. AUSTIN says that all the girls who are fit to go into the laundry are taught to wash, and she generally has the big girls, who come in turns, a different set each week, each set being one week in the laundry and three weeks out of it [4496]; that they are anxious to learn, and learn other work when they are not in the laundry, and that she never has any trouble in managing them [4524]; that she keeps them at work from 7 or 7:30 a.m., until tea-time, and has six at a time [4528]; that they are taught ironing; that they may be a little troublesome when there is a ship in dock, but not very; that they would run away sometimes for an hour or so, and she used to go after them, but found it was better to stop with those who remained; that the girls could not be expected to do otherwise, as the matron, showed them a bad example [4532-4538]; that under different supervision they would behave better, as they often get punished for doing what they see the matrons doing [4548]; that she thinks the girls are attentive to school, and all of them except the laundry girls go to school some part of the day, but she cannot spare the laundry girls; that the girls behave much better now than they did when she first went into the place; that kindness will do anything with them, and that the authorities there are not firm enough with them; that the girls never meddled with anything belonging to her because she placed confidence in them; that they never killed fowls or cooked them in the laundry, and always spared that place in their riots; that she knows nothing about the girls running down to the beach and bathing there; that there is a difficulty in making them wear shoes and stockings, and they often bring them to the laundry and put them on [4555-4571]; that she once complained to Mrs. Lucas about Mrs. Rowland having severely punished a girl, and had often wished that Mr. Lucas would not send girls to the officers' quarters; that the girls from the officers' quarters attend school in the afternoon, and the little girls in the morning, and that the girls on the officers' quarters behave worse the others; that she never thought it a good thing for the officers to have servants, and thinks there should be better matrons over the girls; that Mrs. Lucas is too small, and they are too active for her to beat them severely; that she remembered their making a mess in the copper and told Mr. Lucas of it, and no one was punished for it that she knows of [4578-4594]; that the laundry girls have to pump all the water for the laundry, and the others come and take it [4600]; that she has not seen any bad conduct on the part of the girls, nor has she heard of any, though she has heard of their being punished by Mr. Lucas against his conscience, and to please the matrons [4639-4646]; that as far as she sees, they are perfectly orderly and well behaved; that she is away from the main portion of the institution, and does not sleep on the premises, so that she cannot hear all that takes place; that she has heard them singing; that they sing funny songs and love tales in the laundry, but no bad songs; that she has heard them practising hymns for Mrs. Foott and the sisters from the House of the Good Shepherd; that they are remarkably well behaved in the laundry; that she does know how it is the girls' skirts are so short unless it is the fault of those who make their dresses, but she believes the girls like to have their dresses short, and does not know whether they tear them or not [4696-4719]; that the girls are sent regularly to the laundry, and she cannot tell how many times Lizzie L—— was sent there; that Lizzie L—— was in the institution for months and never went near the laundry because she was looking after the cows; that she believed Mr. Cowper particularly requested the girl should be sent into the laundry, and that she never was sent [4759].

Mr. PRIOR says that the girls used to talk to the sailors, and find out from them that the matrons used to visit the ships, and they thought they had a right to do what the matrons did [4893].

Mrs. KELLY says that the school hours are from 9 to 12 and 2 to 4, the little girls attending in the morning and the big girls in the afternoon; that those who attend to the kitchen and laundry do not go to school, but she gets them every other week; that she teaches under the Public School system, and her school is regularly inspected; that she teaches little songs to the young children, but not to the grown girls; that she attends the prayers of the Roman Catholic children, and on Sundays in the absence of other teachers gives them religious instructions [4983-4999]; that she has used the cane in the school, but very seldom [5016]; that the girls notice the disrespect with which Mr. Lucas treats treats the officers [5023]; that she did once wave her handkerchief in answer to a salute from a ship, but not in the presence of the girls [5034]; that an hour a day is allowed for religious instruction, and the children separate for it, she taking the Catholics and instructing them; that she never wished the servants to dine at the officers' quarters, but rather the reverse; that on articles being maliciously broken by the girls and the matter being reported to Mr. Lucas nothing was done, and in a case of theft also nothing was done; that officers have had things stolen from them frequently; that the girls write indecent things on the pavements; that she often hears the girls making unseemly noises [6104-6120]; that after being insulted by Mrs. Lucas she had ceased to attempt the exercise of moral influence in the place [6127]; that she assisted to start an evening school, but gave up on being insulted by Mrs. Lucas [6131]; that the books lent to the girls are given to them on Sunday only, and by Mrs. Lucas, who has charge of them [9570]. MRS. CONNELL says that in October, 1871, the girls were very noisy and impudent, but were much better when Mr. Cowper was in the habit of visiting the institution; that she cannot say much for them now, as they are very rude; that they used bad language, and do now; that they used to go down to the beach and bathe in sight of the public; that they seldom wore shoes and stockings; that they stole from the officers; that they receive religious instruction from Mrs. Foott, the sisters, and other persons, and that it has done them much good; that they sing hymns and bad songs about the place and in the dormitories; that they all used to look up to Mr. Cowper, but now they do not do so; that the girls were in better order and more respectful when Mr. Cowper visited the institution; that it is not easy to manage them, as there are two or three set to watch while the others are engaged in mischief [5077-5106]; that Sarah B—— managed to get some clothes, to get on board the steamer, and to escape without being missed, until the constable reported that he had seen her on the wharf [5119]; that the discipline of the school is not so good as it was six or eight months ago, and her impression is that Mr. Lucas is too kind to the girls; that though they get punished they do not seem to care for it [5132]; that she has heard of girls being gagged and put into strait-jackets and put in the cells, &c., and she has heard of, but not seen, the matrons waving handkerchiefs to the ships; that she has seen the girls waving to passing steamers, and has heard them say it is no harm for them to do so, as the matrons did it [5149-5155]; that the girls sometimes sing bad songs about the grounds, that she has heard some people say the caning carried on there was too severe [5171-5175]; that the children are mustered and locked up every night at 6 o'clock [5198]. CONSTABLE GLASSINGTON says he thinks the visits of ladies and clergymen &c. to the girls have had a very beneficial effect, that he attends service there himself, and the girls are very orderly [5526]. MR. CANE says that at Newcastle, when he first went to the institution, the discipline of the place was very fair [5552]; that the Rev. Mr. Selwyn visited the institution there, and the visits of respectable persons from outside always did the girls good [5563]; that at Biloea there was an utter want of moral control, the girls doing as they liked in every respect, and being allowed to see that the officers were not held in respect by the superintendent; that this state of disorganization continued until Mr. Cowper came to aid the superintendent, when a rapid and great improvement was effected, the institution being got into an orderly condition [5584-5600]; that when they are locked up together at night the girls are most riotous, and their being so shut up unemployed produces the most mischievous results; that when they were thoroughly occupied there was little disorder; that to remedy the evil an evening school was started and carried on well until Mrs. Lucas introduced ordinary day work, and so destroyed the scheme [5609-5627]; that there is no classification of the girls [5631]; that after the riotous girls had gone out he thought the institution might have been easily managed, and on the occasion of one serious riot all the girls were quiet except those who were in one dormitory [5705]; that he often heard the girls refuse to obey the matrons; that he had seen their indecent writings on the walls and pavements, and that the girls were punished for it if the writers could be traced [5750]. SISTER MARY BENEDICT says that she visits the institution on Wednesdays and Sundays in the mornings, and remains about three hours on the island; that all the Catholic children come to her on these occasions; that the nuns have great influence over them, and find them obedient [5770-5781]; that only firmness and kindness and discipline will do with them, and that the officers are not so much with them as they should be [5788]; that there is a great want of classification, small children being mixed up with those who are not ignorant of the foulest and vilest sins [5792]; that all they need is to be brought to think, as there is a great absence of self-respect among them [5802]; that the big girls would not corrupt the small ones if the superiors were vigilant [5807]; that the children are rather heedless during Sunday service, but were orderly; that they are getting better, but have not sufficient religious instruction [5813]; that she noticed the dresses of some of the girls were very short, but did not know that they shortened them themselves, or that they had exhibited any indelicacy of demeanour; that she had been surprised to find them so quiet; that they were only rude to her once, and are usually very respectful; that music soothes them; that they are not half employed; and that the practice of shutting several up in the dormitories together is pernicious; that the less severity used to a woman the better, as her tender heart could only be influenced by kindness, and that there is no necessity for treating them cruelly [5802-5841]. MRS. FOOTT says that she visits the island every Thursday and Sunday in order to give the girls religious instruction, remains there about two hours, and sees all the Protestant girls except those who are kept in the kitchen [5857]; that they have never treated her with disrespect or rudeness; that she does not know at what hour they are locked up in the evening, but has been told that books are given them to read [5874]; that she should be sorry to see any of them put down into the cells, but supposes that sometimes they deserve it; that she thinks caning may be sometimes necessary, but that more is to be done with them by kindness; that they are very good with her, and that they require more change than they get [5897]. DR. O. S. EVANS says that the system of management appeared to be too undecided, as the girls seemed to think that they could do as they liked without being punished; that there was a great want of firmness [5932]. MR. WALLACE says the girls used to come and chat with him, especially the little ones, and he saw nothing particular wrong with them, though they would have a wild fit now and then [5989]. MR. ROBERTSON says that the discipline of the place was very bad at Newcastle, and after some changes Mr. and Mrs. Lucas were sent to take charge of the institution, but that the condition of the school was still bad, though Mr. Cowper had by his exertions produced a considerable improvement [6015]; that he was not aware the children were locked up at dusk without amusements, but knew that Mr. Cowper had attempted to form an evening school [6048]. MR. COWPER said that when he, first, in accordance with the Colonial Secretary's request, attempted to assist the superintendent, he found the institution in a state of disorganization, the girls being insubordinate, the meals irregularly served, the girls without shoes and stockings, and using no knives and forks to eat with, disobedient, thievish, and under no apparent control; that by the introduction of visitors, who gave religious religious instruction, and by enforcing obedience, a speedy improvement was effected, and the institution became orderly; that Mrs. Foott, the sisters from the House of the Good Shepherd, and other persons, interested themselves in the children's welfare with good results; that an evening school was started, and succeeded well until Mrs. Lucas interfered and upset it; and that Mr. Lucas's jealousy of him put an end to his efforts [6590]. Mr. F. KING, Inspector of Charities, says that he reported upon the untidiness of the children, and that the discipline maintained by Mrs. Kelly in the school was much better than that which prevailed elsewhere in the institution [7334-7341]. [Several inmates gave evidence as to ill-usage to which they had been subjected, and also as to matters of discipline [8894-9308].

Mr. LUCAS says that the girls learn to wash, mangle, iron, cook, and sew, but not to cut out their clothes, and that all the clothes worn by the girls are made in the school; that there is so much cleaning and sweeping, all their time is taken up except the time spent in school and the sewing-room; that they have to pump all the water for the use of the establishment [2596-2610]; that they could do more remunerative work if the place were more compact; that they are doing some work now for the House of the Good Shepherd [2686]; that there are several girls who work in the laundry, and three in the kitchen, and many girls are able to make their own clothes [2762]; that if the place were properly constructed they could utilize the girls' labour by taking in washing, but now there is such a large area to keep clean that it occupies all the girls' time; that it would be an improvement to set them to sewing of an evening instead of locking them up from 6 to 9 without occupation [2949]; that they used to wash clothes for the "Vernon" boys [2772]; that he thinks they might do laundry work, and that their labour might be best utilized in that way, as he hears people in town complaining that they cannot get washing done [2995]. Mrs. LUCAS says that the girls are kept pretty well occupied, but if they had officers who did their duty, more might be done, though she does not think they are far enough advanced in sewing to take in anything but plain needlework [3264]; that there are some children under ten years of age assisting in the dormitories, making beds, &c., and some sewing, who are not more than seven or eight years old [3288]; that the girls are taught to milk, but it is difficult to find a girl who has any idea of it; that there are three lots of girls in the laundry and kitchen, and changes are made every week [3380]; and that the girls are taught housework, but there is not the accommodation there to teach them properly [3388]. Mrs. BRACKENREGG says there are two girls who are kept regularly at the milking [3461]. Mrs. ROWLAND says that the girls are not employed all day, and that the middling-sized girls do the most work [3945]. Mrs. AUSTIN says that in the laundry there are 1,200 dozen pieces washed weekly; that they wash for eighty-seven persons altogether, including inmates, officers, and officers' children; that they wash 1,712 pieces weekly, including the washing for the "Vernon" [4499-4520]. ANNIE DOOLEY says the girls make all their own clothes, and that she has made everything she has on [9296].

Mr. LUCAS says that there has been a good deal of insubordination among the girls at Biloea—some lately; that the day before the Commission visited the place a girl was going to strike the teacher with an inkstand; that to-day (10th July, 1873) the teacher's box was broken open and robbed; that there is less insubordination now than there was at Newcastle; that two or three take up the position of leaders of insubordination; that some time ago eight were sent to Sydney Gaol for breaking windows and burning a door [2618-2627]; that they destroy books when they are allowed to have them [2657]; that on one occasion they broke the locks of the dormitories, got out, and went away in a boat, none of the officers knowing anything of the escape [2736]; that when an attempt was made to keep them in an evening school, some of them got over the walls [2979]; that on one occasion the girls, after they were locked up, created a disturbance in consequence of Mr. Rowland insulting a girl named Annie D — [6465]; that those girls whose mothers are trying to get them released are the most unmanageable [6560]; that they make a great noise, and sing bawdy songs sometimes in the dormitories [6589]; that they knock themselves and each other about in climbing up the walls; that they drew figures on the walls turning him and Mrs. Lucas into contempt, and refused to rub them out on being ordered to do so; that the figures that were drawn and the names he was called were enough to make any man lose his temper, and that the girls told him they did not care for him and would not obey him; that on the Sunday afternoon they went about singing songs, supposed to be anti-Orange songs, such as "Down with the orange and up with the green," said that he was going to be sacked, and sang that they would rally round the beach, and all the old riot songs; that they kept this up the greater part of the night, and made so much row that Mrs. King came down to see what was the matter [9328-9357]; that when the girls called him Orange names he called them Fenians, and they laughed and said they would be all Fenians; that the new girls made all the mischief, as when they came in they began talking about the "poor Catholics," and he has heard constant party remarks since they came in; that the Protestant girls are in the minority, and are compelled to do as the others do; that he knows there are people of influence and position pushing them on [9390-9393]; that as improper books have been introduced by the sisters of charity, he is surprised there has not been a rebellion long ago [9399]; that it is not fair to him to take the evidence of the girls when they are in rebellion against him [9416]; that he threw a stone against the dormitory to frighten them, as they had climbed up to the windows and were shouting and carrying on in a disgraceful way; that he does not remember Mary C — two years ago tearing up some grass and shaking it at a steamer that passed by with an Orange picnic party and that dipped her flag to him; that he was never called an Orange dog from the time Mary C — jumped into the river until now; that he knows what the girls' object is, and who is keeping them up to it; and that he seriously means to say that there are persons of influence behind the scenes and inciting the girls to acts of insubordination [9422-9426]. Mrs. LUCAS says that she feared Mr. Cane and Mrs. Kelly would incite the girls to acts of insubordination, and that Mr. Cane had praised a girl for disobeying her [3354]; that there is a difficulty in managing the girls, and they are very troublesome [3362]; that when they had the evening school two girls went out and got over the wall [3370]; that she fears some of the officers influence the girls against her teaching and advice [3415]; that when she has been disputing with the officers the girls may have said "Go it—go it—give it to them!" [6181]; that there was a disturbance one night, not as described by Mrs. Rowland (question 4094), and it was caused by Mrs. Rowland insulting Annie D — [6193]; that the girls had no night-dresses, and she had not suggested that they should have any, as they were in such a riotous state the less they had the better [6238]; that when she first went to Newcastle there was no order or regularity, and the girls were at the broken windows like a lot of maniacs [6244]; that she thrashed Bridget M — for going on the beach and talking to some men [6254]; that Mr. Cowper put some girls down in the cells for singing a song of their own concocting, called "Charley is my darling" [6257]; that she had no influence with girls who were rioting, and on one occasion all the officers except herself rushed out of the place, and the girls were going about the island arm-in-arm with the officers from the "Vernon," instead of being taken up [6289]. MRS. KING says that when the Reformatory girls go for religious instruction, the others are carrying on all kinds of capers while on their knees [3240]. MRS. BRACKENREGG says that the girls shout out from the dormitories and abuse the officers and call them by offensive nick-names [3485]; that once seven girls escaped together, and it was believed that they stayed out of the dormitories, and were never locked up at all [3530]; that the girls are very troublesome, and the matrons have to be continually running up and down the rocks after them [3567]; that they do not point blank refuse to do a thing, but simply leave it undone [3643]; that they sometimes when punished show fight, and upon one occasion caught her by the throat and nearly choked her [3711]; that they tear their clothes in the dormitories, and make a great uproar there at night [3734]; that the little girls run to the elder ones for encouragement when corrected, and the elder ones prompt them to do wrong [3780]. MRS. ROWLAND says they often sing indecent songs, and both little and big girls join in them [3838]; that they tear their dresses to make them short, so as to show their legs; that they lose their clothes and hide them, and she once found a girl lighting a fire with her apron [3871]; that when Mr. Lucas abuses the matrons the children jeer at them [3886]; that the girls are very bad, but are now better than they were [3971]; that Sunday used to be a dreadful day to the officers, owing to the insubordination of the girls [3993]; that when she first went to Biloele it would have been impossible for any number of matrons to have prevented the girls singing bad songs, and that one night when Mr. Cowper went into the institution all the officers ran out, as they thought the girls were breaking the doors down [4040]; that the institution was in a riotous state when Mr. Lucas took charge of it at Newcastle, and the rioting was continued until some of the worst girls went away [4066]; that on the 22nd June, 1873, a girl insulted the sisters in the prayer-room, and that same night having been reproved got up a riot in the dormitory, the girls all singing the most disgraceful songs [4086]; that in October, 1871, the girls were like wild creatures running about the island and under no control [4108]. MRS. DUNN says the girls were very insubordinate in October, 1871, the institution having been in charge of a sergeant and two policemen, the girls having smashed iron-bedsteads, broke windows, and burned a door, besides committing other acts of violence; that it would not have been safe for any matron to sleep in the same room with them, and that when the worst girls were got rid of there was a great change for the better [4285-4304]; that she has often heard them singing bad songs after they were locked up at night [4476]. MRS. AUSTIN says that the girls might run away from the laundry for an hour or so when ships were in dock, but that she never found them very troublesome [4535]; that they were noisy when she first went there, but are not so now [4553]; that they used to run down to the beach and bathe, and would not wear shoes and stockings [4569]; that there is no bad conduct on the girls' part that ever she saw [4642]; that Janet B—— had told her that Sarah B—— said Mrs. Kelly advised the girls to get up a riot and break the schoolroom windows, as the means to get Mr. Lucas sacked, and that the girls did break those windows first in a riot which ensued next day [8999]. MRS. CONNELL says that the girls were noisy and insubordinate in October, 1871, used bad language, bathed in sight of the public, wore no shoes and stockings, and committed thefts; but that when Mr. Cowper visited the institution it was in better order [5077-5090]; that they sang bad songs [5171]. CONSTABLE TURNER says that when he first went to the island there were four or five policemen there, and it was necessary to send to the "Vernon" for aid, and to Sydney for all the Water Police; that the girls at that time smashed all the windows, broke their iron bedsteads, burnt the woodwork of a door, and destroyed much property; that the girls were thoroughly insubordinate and riotous, and he was more knocked about by them than he had ever been before in the execution of any police duty, so much so that he had to request relief from duty; that the girls still use bad language, but are not so bad as they were, but that up to within the last three months they sing hymns, songs, and blackguard verses [5286-5320]. That at the time of the riots the girls smashed all the glass in the place, and pelted the police [5353]. CONSTABLE GLASSINGTON gives corroborative evidence [5431]. MR. F. CANE says that the severe punishments inflicted on the girls for trifling offences caused them to break out in revolt at Newcastle, and also at Biloele [5555, 5592]; that owing to Mr. Cowper's exertions a great improvement was effected [5598]; that they can be controlled by kindness, but an attack upon them creates the most horrible results in language and conduct [5630]; that showing how much the discipline was improved by the means used by Mr. Cowper, all the girls except those in one dormitory were quiet when the American sailors caused a riot on the island [5707]; that in the riots of September, 1871, some extreme measures were needed to prevent destruction of Government property [5730]. SISTER MARY BENEDICT says that when she first went to the island there were eight girls in gaol for setting fire to the place, but that she did not find the children intractable [5778]. MRS. FOOT says that she found some difficulty in managing the children at first, but that they are better now [5869]; that she has heard the noise of the girls rioting from her house at Balmain, but not more than once, and that not within the past eighteen months [5905]. DR. O. S. EVANS says that he was never insulted by a girl but once, and then he was resolute in insisting that the girl should be punished, and he received from her an ample apology [5941]. MR. WALLACE says that while he was working in the institution there were several rows, and there were never any indications previous to the outbreak, that one would think the girls were all angels, but suddenly they would smash all before them [6009]. MR. ROBERTSON says that the insubordination at Newcastle was outrageous, and the girls assumed the complete mastery of the matron; that Mr. Lucas being appointed superintendent and the school moved to Biloele, it became evident that Mr. Lucas could not control them, and that he asked Mr. Cowper to assist, which he did for some time with good effect [6015]; that the insubordination was never so great at Biloele as at Newcastle, though there were times when some of the girls were put in strait-jackets by the police [6039]. MR. COWPER says that at the end of 1871 the institution was in a state of riot, and the school was in charge of a sergeant and several policemen, and the girls had done considerable damage; that he rendered assistance in restoring order, and in a short time managed to improve the condition of affairs, but from jealousy on the part of Mrs. Lucas was obliged to discontinue his exertions [6590]. MR. WALKER says that the outbreak at Newcastle was caused by bad management and by the Magistrates sending an unfit class of girls to the institution [7675]. MARY ANN WILLIAMS says that, being threatened by Mr. Lucas for refusing to obey him, she went in to smashing the windows, and the other girls followed her [8925]. [Several other inmates gave evidence as to this riot. Questions 8981-9327.] MRS. AUSTIN says that Sarah Little Wood told her Sarah Burke had said Mrs. Kelly advised the girls to break the schoolroom windows [8999]. MRS. KELLY says she heard a scream, and turning round, saw Polly Williams about to throw stones at the schoolroom windows; that she rushed up to her, but before she could stop her her the girls had broken several windows; that she could not stop the destruction, and had never previously spoken to any girls about smashing the windows [9310]. SISTER MARY BENEDICT says that she has endeavoured to repress as much as she could any spirit of insubordination among the girls [9563].

MR. LUCAS says that the system of correction is very trivial, as all he can do is to lock offenders up ^{Punishments.} for fourteen days, and they can dance and skip as they like; that a girl cannot be imprisoned without a report being sent to the Colonial Secretary, and that he locks them up first and reports afterwards [2628-2637]; that this system of locking them up in a room together is only a spree for them [2642]; that he has caned them two or three times with a small bamboo the size of a pencil—given them two or three cuts over the shoulders; that the matron beats the little ones and he beats the big ones, but has punished very few in that way; that when girls are locked up on bread and water they are put into No. 3 dormitory [2850-2856]; that he sends the report to the Colonial Secretary as soon as they are locked up, and does not get it back again until they are released [2864]; that he has not inflicted all the corporal punishment that has been inflicted; that Mrs. Rowland, he thinks, inflicts the most, but if he had a cane in his hand he might give a girl a few strokes, and any of the matrons might do the same; that he is not allowed by the regulations to inflict corporal punishment—is, in fact, expressly forbidden to do so—but must have some discipline; that he is aware the Colonial Secretary objected to the superintendent beating the girls, and expressly said that matrons only were to do so, but that he was recommended by Mr. Cowper to set aside the rules; that it was Mr. Cowper who got Mr. Robertson to allow the matrons to use the cane, though Mr. Robertson expressly forbade the superintendent to use it [6395-6413]; that the girls have not had black eyes from the effects of blows given by him, but there was one little girl named M——, whose ears he boxed, and his hand just blackened the corner of her eye; that Emma G—— complained to Mr. King about a beating, and showed him her arm marked with the cane; that it was untrue that Mrs. Rowland had seen him beat Henrietta M——, that she had a black eye for three weeks afterwards; that she had a black eye for a day or two; that he caned Annie D——, one of the biggest girls in the school, for insubordination [6414-6426]; that he does not know how certain marks and bruises seen upon the girls came there, but has slapped a few of them with his open hand; that he struck them on this occasion with nothing else; that he struck Mary W—— with the cane, but not Annie S—— nor Kate S——; that he did strike Kate S—— not with the cane but with his open hand; that he does not remember dragging her up to the wall and endeavouring to rub out an indecent drawing with the hair of her head; that he does not think he did so; that he might have done so, that he did seize one or two girls and tried to force them to rub it out, but they struggled and opposed him, and it might be that he might have tried to rub it out with Kate S——'s hair; that he might have thrown Annie S—— on the floor, but does not think he stood upon her; that he struck Janet B—— on that occasion with his open hand [9328-9353]; that he did not cane the girls, though Mrs. Lucas may have done so; that he did not strike one of the W—— girls; that he does not remember striking Annie S——; that he does not remember leaning down on Kate S——'s throat and chest, and nearly choking her, and does not think he did so, nor does he think he stood on her back [9364-9368]. MRS. LUCAS says the elder girls are sometimes punished by being locked up, and the younger ones punished with a cane [3263]; that she thinks there should a better system of rewards and punishments [3392]; that Mrs. Rowland knocked a child's head against the wall; that she (Mrs. Lucas) may have punished Ellen St——, but never dragged her about by the hair; that she once saw Mrs. Rowland knock down Margaret D——, a girl of 15 or 16, and put her knee on her stomach [6222-6234]; that she (Mrs. Lucas) has beaten Bridget M—— and done many things to the girls, but nothing more than she would do to her own children [6254]. MRS. BRACKENREGG says that Mr. Lucas did not want to put Mary C—— in the cells, but did it to pacify Mrs. Lucas [3584]; that she sometimes gives the girls a few touches of the cane, but Mrs. Lucas gives them good sound canings; that Mr. Lucas often beats them with a cane, and leaves marks on them [3643-3677]. MRS. ROWLAND says that Mr. Lucas caned Emma G——, a great tall girl about 17 years old; that the girls are afraid of the cane; that she has been called upon to put girls in strait-jackets [3898-3906]; that the superintendent has a good deal of power to inflict punishment [4001]; that Mrs. Lucas beats them, and gives them black eyes; that she dragged Ellen S—— by the hair, and tore out handfuls of it, and took Mary C—— by the hair and beat her till the blood streamed from her nose; that Mr. Lucas gave Henrietta M—— a black eye, which she had for three weeks [4188]. MRS. DUNN says the cane is the only thing the girls dread, and that they do not care about being locked up [4167]; that the matrons have power to punish the girls, and do sometimes use a little cane in the sewing-room, but not severely [4264]; that sometimes she never uses a cane all day, and sometimes she uses it three or four times a day; that every matron has not got a cane, but all are at liberty to use one; that she uses a cane about as thick as her finger [4346]; that she was told Henrietta M——'s black eye was given her by Mr. Lucas; that she did not see the beating of Mary C——, but was told of it; that she heard of the beating of Lizzie L—— and Ellen St——, and that Mrs. Lucas pulled out some of the latter's hair [4446-4469]. MRS. AUSTIN says that Mrs. Rowland shut Annie D—— in her store and beat her very severely [4578]; that Mr. Lucas told her he often punished the girls against his conscience and to please the matrons [4645]; MR. PRIOR says he thinks corporal punishment is enforced, but he has never seen it, and that no record of it is kept [4784]; that for insubordination the girls are locked up for a week or so on bread and water; that they are sometimes locked up in the dormitories, and he does not know whether they have there either fires or beds [4865]; that he is not aware that the canings have been severe, but there was one girl who showed marks of caning to Mr. King; that there are no other punishments but caning and confinement [4926]. MRS. KELLY says she has used the cane in school, but very seldom, and not more often than it is used in other schools [5016]. MRS. CONNELL says that the girls do not seem to care for punishment [5135]; that she hears of their being locked up on bread and water, and has heard of the cane being used, and has seen marks of it upon a girl; that she has heard of their being gagged and put in the cells [5144-5150]; that the canes and gags and strait-jackets have disappeared lately; that she has seen Henrietta M—— with a black eye, but did not know who gave it her, but believes it was Mr. or Mrs. Lucas; that Emma G—— showed the marks of her punishment to Mr. King and said Mr. Lucas caned her [5178-5192]. CONSTABLE TURNER says that the girls have been locked up in the dormitories together for five or six days, and are allowed blankets but no beds; that he assisted to put a strait-jacket on a girl and to gag her; that he knew of other instances of the use of the strait-jacket [5359-5378]. CONSTABLE GLASSINGTON gave similar evidence [5444]. MR. F. CANE says the punishments inflicted at Newcastle were severe and degrading, but those inflicted at Biloea not severe though injudicious [5557 and 5584]; that the superintendent caned the girls, and he had heard of strait-jackets and a gag being used; that the superintendent generally carried a cane, and he saw him him use it once, cutting at the girls as they passed him, whether they were the proper culprits or not; that he saw a girl at Newcastle whose eye was severely cut with a stick [5650-5658]; that severe punishments are useless and tend only to degrade the girls, but that in the riots of 1871 extreme measures were needed [5729]. SISTER MARY BENEDICT says she did not like the way in which the girls were locked up on bread and water and put down holes [5831]; that it is cruel in the extreme to put a woman down those holes and might put her out of her mind, and that there is no need to cane the girls [5844]. MRS. FOOTT says there may be some who deserve punishments, but that kindness goes far with them [5870]; that she has never seen any harshness on Mrs. Lucas's part [5877]; that she did not think a girl should be confined for fourteen days on bread and water, and that on certain occasions they might deserve caning [5898]. Dr. O. S. EVANS says he believes it became necessary to put some girls in the cells, but that it was done too late; that he should have stopped insubordination at all hazards the first moment it showed itself, had he had charge of the place [5937]; that, as an abstract question, fourteen days confinement on bread and water was too severe, but not as it was carried out at Biloea [5968]. Mr. ROBERTSON says that from harsh treatment of the girls at Newcastle the Government were compelled to remove Mr. Clarke, a former superintendent [6015]; that the use of the cane by Mr. Lucas was contrary to instructions, as, though matrons were allowed to punish in that way, the superintendent was strictly prohibited from using the cane [6033, 6092]; that there was a time when it was requisite to put strait-jackets on the girls [6039]. Mr. COWPER says that, being called upon to assist in suppressing a riot, he put the ringleaders in the cells, the only "separate and close confinement" available [6590]; that a girl was put into a strait-jacket and gagged by the police when she was half-naked [6594]; that confinement in the dormitories was no punishment at all, and that he was in favour of putting the girls in the cells solely to prevent destruction of Government property [6595]; that until lately he was not aware that severe corporal punishments were inflicted [6605]; that no officer had ever represented to him that any girl whom he put down the cells was ill [6615]; that he never advised Mr. Lucas to inflict corporal punishment, but told him that he would deal with the girls with a high hand [6618]. Several inmates gave evidence to the effect that they had been locked up in damp dormitories, beaten, and ill-treated by the superintendent [8902-8945-8987-9034-9071-9093-9111-9217-9238-9276].

Mr. LUCAS says that the girls have skipping-ropes, draughts and dominoes, and there was an attempt made to amuse them of an evening, but they got tired of that and tried to escape; that they play rounders, &c., in the afternoons after 4 o'clock, and those who like hoops can have them; that there are two libraries, one for Catholics and the other for Protestants, but they are only allowed to have the books on Sundays; that when they are locked up in their dormitories they sing and play about; that when they were allowed out, many preferred to stop in the dormitories, but that on holidays he lets them remain out in the dining- or sewing-room; that he bought a concertina for them and they broke it [2652-2674]; that they tire of everything very soon, and they are most fond of doing crochet-work, which they do at night [2684]; that they tried to have amusements in the evening, but the girls got tired of them, and he has tried them with fancy-work and needlework and draughts, &c.; that they like crochet and to hear a book read [2952-2986]; that if there were persons with them who really took an interest in them they could amuse them at night [3008]; that when the scheme of evening amusements was first spoken of, the general opinion was that it could not be carried out, and Mr. Cowper ordered the lamps, &c., on his own responsibility; that Mr. Cane and Mrs. Kelly volunteered to assist, but the other officers would not [3042]; that he thinks it has been represented to the Government that the children are shut up at 6 p.m. without any amusement or occupation, and he had promised to commence the night school again; that he has commenced it again, but the girls do not like to be out; that the big girls prefer being locked up unless they are allowed to dance; that he had to quarrel with some girls to bring them out; that there is some light in their dormitories, and they can sew and read and amuse themselves there [6576-6587]. MRS. LUCAS says that the girls used to be permitted to amuse themselves in the dining-room of an evening up to 9 o'clock, but the system had to be given up, as there was not sufficient supervision; that they are locked up in their dormitories from 6 o'clock, p.m., and amuse themselves there, some with crochet-work and others by playing about; that they have books to read on Sundays, and she lends them papers which are sent to her by friends [3266-3280]; that she got no assistance from the officers, with the exception of Mr. Cane and Mrs. Kelly, in carrying on the night school; that when she came into the room and found that Mr. Cowper had arranged the tables for draughts and work and crochet, she put the girls to various employments; that the girls were set to make their own dresses at their own request [3336-3349]; that the girls were amused with draughts, crochet, reading, writing, and sewing, Miss Lucas teaching woolwork and several fancy things, and Miss R. Lucas and herself plain needlework; that the girls got wearied, as they require constant change, and so they had them out twice a week, and then occasionally, and then the practice ceased altogether, as two girls tried to escape [3368]. MRS. KING says that the girls in the Reformatory are allowed to amuse themselves between 4 and 6 p.m., and that they read and sew in the evenings up to 9 p.m., when they are locked up [3152]; that at Newcastle she allowed the Industrial School girls to have some recreation in the evenings under the supervision of the officers [3230]. MRS. ROWLAND says that an attempt was made to give the girls some amusement in the evenings, and that she does not know how it came to be given up [3908]; that there should be a playground for them [3944]; that when they had evening amusements they were quieter than they now are [3976]; that these amusements had a soothing influence upon the girls, and there was less romping or tearing about [4056]; that they were fond of singing and were delighted with music, which they had for a short time [4111]. MRS. DUNN says that an effort was made to provide the girls with evening amusements, but that it was given up because the girls got tired of them [4140]; that on the occasion of Mr. Lucas's birthday, an entertainment was given, and Mr. Lucas sang a vulgar song [4311]; and her daughters, Mrs. Lucas's daughters, and also the inmates, sang hymns and songs [4387]; that the books from the library are never given to the girls except on Sundays [4414]; that the girls got tired of the evening amusements because they were compelled to make and mend dresses [4472]. MRS. AUSTIN says she often hears the girls singing, and that they sing nice pure romantic songs in the laundry [4708]. Mr. PRIOR says he was not present at any evening amusements given to the girls, but has heard them singing songs in the dormitories [4870]. CONSTABLE TURNER says that the girls sometimes sing hymns and sometimes blackguard songs [5317]. Mr. CANE says that he, Mrs. Kelly, and Mr. Cowper assisted to start evening amusements for the girls, and there appeared to be every chance of success, but that Mrs. Lucas set aside the fancy-work, &c., and set the girls to work at sewing [5612]; that when first amusements were introduced at Newcastle, he used to assist the matron in giving entertainments, in which the girls took part, and which were very successful [5630].

says that he, assisted by Mrs. Kelly and Mr. Cane, started an evening school, the idea being that the girls should play draughts, solitaire, &c., and do fancy-work, while some read and others wrote letters; that the attempt was successful, but that Mrs. Lucas, who refused to take part in it at first, went in on the second evening and upset the arrangements, introducing the work of the sewing-room; that this brought about the failure of the scheme [6590].

MR. LUCAS says that the contracts for the supply of provisions, &c., have been fairly carried out, though he has had to send back the meat once or twice in a week, and has had to go to Balmain to buy meat; that the meat has consisted of inferior joints, and he has not had to send it back above twice on account of its being stinking or anything of that kind; that the bread contract is well carried out, and the oatmeal and other things are first-rate; that he considers the oatmeal the best part of the diet [3086-3091]; that the meat contract specifies that the best must be supplied at the rate of 2½d. per lb. [3107]; that the children are not supplied with water at dinner, and have never asked for any [6354]; that the children take victuals out with them to eat at play [6364]; and that they are supposed to have their dinner at 12.30 every day [6373]. MRS. KING says that the rations for the Reformatory girls are as good as can be expected, and better than they were [3192]. MRS. BRACKENREGG says that the rations in the Industrial School are sometimes of good quality, and sometimes the reverse [3555].

MR. LUCAS says that the place is very healthy [2575], and that the buildings are not over-crowded, as they will hold 120 girls, and there are only eighty-three in them [2543]; that the general health of the inmates is very good, though they had the itch for a week, about sixty of them catching it; that it is supposed they caught it from the "Vernon," some of the boys' clothes from that vessel being washed in the institution; that the "Vernon" boys had the itch at the same time; that the "Vernon" people said the disease had been communicated to the boys by the girls, but he thought the boys had it first; that the girls have had the chicken-pox now and then [2767-2779]; that the accommodation in the Reformatory is miserably insufficient, as the place is over-crowded, although there are only eight inmates, and some of them have to sleep in the dining-room [3075]. MRS. LUCAS says the girls have been more healthy since they have been at Biloea than they were before [3290]. MRS. KING says that there is not sufficient sleeping accommodation for the Reformatory girls [3177]. MRS. DUNN says that at one time fifty or sixty of the girls had the itch, which she thinks they caught from the "Vernon" boys, whose clothes they used to wash [4409]. MRS. FOOT says she has been into the hospital to see sick children, and it always appeared clean [5888]. DR. O. S. EVANS says he considers the position of the school healthy, and the health of the inmates excellent; that the premises are kept as clean as circumstances will permit, but the closets are faulty, and he has complained of them frequently; that there is a bad smell from them, and if a death occurred, and he could find out the official who was responsible for remedying the evil, he would have a Coroner's inquest and punish that official for manslaughter [5912-5923]; that the girls had the itch, and, though sixty of them caught the disease, it was stamped out within a week [5971].

DEFECTS OF SYSTEM.

MR. LUCAS says that the big girls ought not to be mixed with the small children at all, but there is no way of keeping them apart [2557]; that thieves and prostitutes ought to be put together into the Reformatory [2562]; that it is a mistake to send the prostitutes to the Industrial School, but they should be in a place where they could have plenty of employment, and work and pay their expenses, and they should be released at the end of two years on bail [2573]; that he has had a girl sent into the Industrial School who should have been sent to the Reformatory, and there have been many girls sent to the Reformatory who had not committed any crime, these mistakes showing that Magistrates did not understand the objects of these institutions [2590]; that the law does not make proper provision for the punishment of offenders against the discipline of the place [2629]; that the system of allotting inmates as servants to the officers is bad, and causes much mischief [2687]; that some persons should sleep in the dormitories with the children, and that it is objectionable to have married women with families in the position of matrons [2728]; that there are a great many children in the institution who have no business there, but they come in by a Magistrate's warrant and he cannot refuse to receive them; that some of the children are too small to be sent in, one being only eighteen months old, and several others being very young, and sent in by Magistrates because they had no means of support—children who ought to be sent to Randwick [2880-2887]; that the place will be never worth calling an institution unless a place is built expressly for girls of the prostitute class, and the younger children sent to other Asylums [2935]; that there should be more children sent to the Reformatory, and that owing to the negligence or ignorance of Magistrates, children who should be sent there either escape punishment altogether or are improperly sent to the Industrial School [3101]; that the girls are turned out of the Reformatory at the expiration of their sentences to get a living as best they can, there being no power under the law to apprentice them; and that if the juvenile population were properly looked after there would be 200 or 300 prostitutes in the Reformatory, and the streets saved [3125-3129]. MRS. KING says it was the impossibility of classifying the girls of the Industrial School that overthrew her management of them at Newcastle; that she thinks many children who should be sent to the Reformatory are not sent there [3170-3173]; that it is objectionable to allow the children in the Industrial School to sleep without any officer near them [3209]; that they are sure to play tricks if left alone in that manner [3228]. MRS. BRACKENREGG says there is a want of order and discipline in the Industrial School [3504]; that the matron ought not to be a person who is related to the superintendent, as in such a case the superintendent will always take the matron's part against other officers; that Mrs. Lucas countermands officers' orders, and tells girls not to obey them [3512]; that there is no muster roll, the girls being simply counted night and morning [3535]; that young children going into the place innocent are soon corrupted by the others, and learn all kinds of wickedness [3753]; that such a result naturally follows from the system of allowing all classes of girls to associate together—the corrupt and the innocent [3777]. MR. ROWLAND says that the girls have no night-dresses, and cannot learn decent ways when so little regard is paid to decency; that they are left alone in the dormitories from dark until daylight, which is a great evil [3823-3837]; that the grown girls corrupt the young ones and teach them everything that is bad, there being no classification, and that the grown girls ought to be kept apart at night [3847]; that the grown girls should not associate with the young ones at any time [3922]; that there is one innocent girl put to sleep with a number of prostitutes, while another child who was a prostitute sleeps with the young children [3929]; that disgraceful practices are carried on, and a new inmate has to submit to a disgusting process of initiation [3936]; that a playground is needed [3944]; that the girls have too much of

of their own way and do as they like [3978]; that some one should remain in the dormitories with the children at night, but that it could be arranged for in the present building [4026]; that there is no punishment for filthy practices, and there is no use complaining to the superintendent or matron about girls uttering bad language [4033]. MRS. DUNN gives similar evidence [4137-4156-4163-4176], and thinks the children would be better if a stricter discipline were enforced [4180]; says that the children have too much leisure; that they want a playground or a large room to amuse themselves in [4259]; that by decision and firmness they can be got to do anything [4268] that the servants should not be allowed to dine at the officers' quarters [4271]; that the institution would be better managed if the superintendent and matron were not man and wife [4489]. MRS. AUSTIN says there is no bell, and the girls have to be collected as best they may be [4541]; that the conduct of the matrons is such as is not likely to improve the girls, and that the latter would do better under a different kind of women [4544]; that she believes the officers are not firm enough with the girls [4561]; that the system of allowing officers to have inmates as servants is not a good one [4586]; that if the matron had not been the superintendent's wife, she might have complained of her to him, but as she was his wife it was natural he should take her part [4599]. MR. PRIOR says that no inducement to behave well is held out to the girls [4885]. MRS. KELLY says the children have had no home training, and are therefore more troublesome than they would otherwise be [4988]. MRS. CONNELL says her impression is that Mr. Lucas is too kind to the girls, and is not firm enough [5134]; that there is no classification of the girls, as there should be, in order to prevent the big ones corrupting the others [5193]. CONSTABLE GLASSINGTON says that there being no classification, the prostitute girls would be likely to corrupt the others [5441]; and that there should be a stricter discipline [5491]; that passing over acts of insubordination without punishment is likely to render the girls still more insubordinate [5524]. MR. CANE finds fault with the weakness of discipline, the want of mutual respect among the officers, the mixing up of all classes of inmates together, and the absence of any evening amusements for the girls, or supervision over them in their dormitories [5580-5589-5610-5640-5734]. SISTER MARY BENEDICT says the associations of the place are not calculated to improve them, but it is enough to make them feel like prisoners, and the officers are not so much with the children as they should be [5789]; that there is a great want of classification, and it is a pity to have innocent children mixed up with grown girls who are not ignorant of the foulest sins [5792]; that there should be some person sleeping in the dormitory with them [5810]; that they should be kept employed [5833]; that the children have not fair play there [5853]. MRS. FOOTT says some girls go there innocent, and are made vicious by association with corrupt girls in the institution [5880]; that the main thing to make the school successful will be to classify the children [5884]. DR. O. S. EVANS condemns the want of firmness exhibited in the management of the institution [5933]; says that Mr. Lucas professed to be hampered by instructions, so that he could do nothing [5966]. MR. WALLACE says that the children should be classified [5994]. MR. ROBERTSON says the prison aspect of Biloea is objectionable, but in other respects it is a suitable site for the institution; that the management is defective; that the mixing up of all classes of children is injurious to the innocent ones [6015-6022]. MR. COWPER points out the vacillating character of the management, and the good effects of firmness in enforcing obedience to orders [6590]; also that the institution could be more cheaply conducted if the Government built a suitable place, handed it over to a committee of ladies, and paid so much per head for the maintenance of the inmates [6602]. CAPTAIN McLERIE says that destitute children should not be sent to Biloea, and that only prostitutes and thieves should be sent there; that he believes the Reformatory to be all humbug, and he would have only two classes in Biloea; that he would have Biloea for culprits, and send destitute children to Randwick [7559-7568]. MR. WALKER says the cause of the original outbreak was bad management [7675]. CAPTAIN SCOTT says a Reformatory is wanted—that he has heard there is one at Biloea, but is not aware of its having been proclaimed [9876]; that if children are under age there is no place to send them to [9865]; that he does not like sending young girls to Biloea [9931]; that the girls sent to the Reformatory might corrupt the girls sent to the Industrial School, as he believes they are allowed to mix [9960].

RESULTS OF INSTITUTION.

MR. LUCAS says he thinks that a great many girls have been reformed [2568]; that nearly thirty girls of the prostitute class have been apprenticed since he has had charge of the school, and some are out of their time and have gone again to service; that he has not heard of any leaving their apprenticeship and going on the streets; that there have been altogether sixty-two apprenticed, of whom some six have run away from employment and been taken back again; that he has only heard of one who ran away altogether [2574-2583]; that there is little good done to the prostitute girls there [2753]; that only two girls from the Reformatory have been placed in situations, and while one of them turned out well, the other did not [3110]; that he sometimes keeps up a correspondence with the girls or their masters after they leave the Industrial School; and that there was one girl who went to a situation, and had a baby and concealed it [6545]. MRS. KING says that when girls enter the Reformatory young, there is great hope of their being reclaimed [3155]; that the girls she has now seem to be reformed; that one girl she had sent out had turned out badly, and another had turned out well [3179-3184]. MRS. ROWLAND says that she does not think any improvement takes place in the morals of the girls in the Industrial School, but that some who have gone to service have turned out well; that many who went out were improved before they left, and have done well since [3964-3971]; that she thinks the girls can be reformed there, and that some of the worst girls were reformed and placed out as servants [4068]. MRS. DUNN says the girls might be reclaimed with classification and better management [4142]; that she does not think they are improved at present, but they might be [4151]; that some girls who have gone out to service have done well, and write letters to the matrons saying that they are comfortable and mean to be good [4326]; MRS. AUSTIN says she gets nice letters from girls who have gone out and are doing well [4548]. MR. PRIOR says that there is not much chance of the girls' reformation with the bad example of the matrons before them [9093]. MR. CANE says that through Mr. Cowper's instrumentality some of the worst girls were placed out in situations [5600]; that he (Mr. Cane) took two as servants with him to Newcastle, one of whom has since gone to her relatives, while the other was a first-class servant [5636]; that in spite of all its defects, the institution has been the means of reclaiming many girls from vice [5767]; SISTER MARY BENEDICT mentions three girls who were taken out of the institution, and who have turned out well [5796]. MRS. FOOTT has received letters from some of the worst girls who left the institution, and who seem to be in comfortable situations [5890]. MR. ROBERTSON believes that in few instances have the children failed who were apprenticed out [6015]. MR. COWPER mentions several instances of girls apprenticed apprenticed out and reformed, and says that in some cases they have not been sufficiently well cared for by their employers; that in many instances mistresses to whom they have been sent and who were disposed to treat them harshly, have acknowledged that they only needed patient and good management [6590]; that those who were sent away to country situations did well, while those who were returned to their friends returned to vicious courses [6591].

NAUTICAL SCHOOL SHIP "VERNON."

From the evidence of CAPT. MEIN, the Superintendent of this institution, it appears that there are ninety-nine boys in the school, and that there is room for 260; that there are fifteen officers and servants, the cost of the establishment being £32 per head; that carpentering, tailoring, shoemaking, and sailmaking, are taught the boys, who begin to learn these trades at six years of age [2084-2098]; that they are kept on board until they are twelve years old, and then apprenticed out; that they make all their own clothes, and boots for the Biloela girls. There is a schoolmaster who teaches the children half-time, and they are all from time to time employed in gardening. All the boys are taught to row, sail drill, the compass, lead line, reefing, splicing, &c. There have been 224 apprenticed out, chiefly to country people, as farm servants or general servants, very few being sent to sea or to trades. Most of them would prefer to go to sea, but have not the chance. CAPT. MEIN objects to the ship being moored near Cockatoo, and says she ought to be down the harbour, near the main body of shipping; he also says that it would be better not to limit the apprenticing of boys as sailors to ships that go merely short trips, and that it is unwise to release boys to their parents' care, as they would return to vicious courses. Their morality is low and none are to be trusted. They are visited by clergymen about once a fortnight, and by Sunday school teachers every week. The sanitary condition of the boys was not so good at Biloela as when they were down the harbour, as they had scarlet fever and itch at the former place. The value of their work is not deducted from the cost of the institution, nor is anything allowed for the boots made for Biloela. There are more applications for boys than can be attended to, and the applications are considered according to date. The boys do their own washing, and it is said that there are not sufficient officers and servants [2110-2224-2282-2290]. MR. E. BYRNE master tailor of the ship, complains that many boys who were taught trades and would make good tradesmen, have been sent to situations as general servants, and gives an instance [2322]. On examining the boy he referred to, the allegation was not sustained [6891]. A person named MORRIS examined at his own request, complained that boys of his sent to the ship were taught trades and then sent into the bush to look after cattle and that one was killed [6930]. MR. FOSBERY points out that innocent and vicious children are indiscriminately sent to the "Vernon" and that mischief is likely to result [2425]. MR. ROBERTSON objects to the "Vernon" being brought down the harbour; says that the Minister would not know whether boys who had learned trades were apprenticed to tradesmen or not; that he never thought Middle Harbour would be a good place for the ship [6056-6078-6097].

GENERAL SUGGESTIONS.

SUMMARY OF EVIDENCE RESPECTING AMALGAMATION OF ORPHAN SCHOOLS.

MRS. ADAMSON, matron of the Roman Catholic Orphan School, says there should not be more than 300 in any institution of the kind, as when there are many more they become less amenable to personal supervision [225]. THE VERY REV. S. J. A. SHEEHY says that the control of the children is better where the number is small, and the opinion is gaining ground that the size of these institutions should be reduced. He is averse to the amalgamation of the Orphan Schools, and thinks that the children of any special denomination would be better instructed as members of the Church to which they belong by being removed from the children of other denominations [399-406]. MR. JAMES MULLENS says that it is unwise to have 700 or 800 children massed together in one institution, and that the success of such an institution depends on the personal supervision of the children [485]; that 400 would be enough to have in any school if they were to be properly looked after [525]. THE RIGHT REV. DR. QUINN says that children of large Charitable Institutions generally have a sad appearance, and that the system of having large numbers together destroys individuality and self-reliance [707]; that in his point of view, the institution becomes less perfect as it becomes larger and less like a family [762]. MR. MAX says that he has not felt an inconvenience from having so many children in one institution, and that of course the increased number lessens the expense per head [1803]. THE RIGHT REV. DR. MARSDEN says that proper attention cannot be paid to the children if there are 700 or 800 of them in one institution, their individuality being lost among so many [4242]. MR. ROBERTSON thinks the crowding of children together an evil [6022]. MRS. BETTS thinks that the Protestant Orphan School should be made a nursery for infants under nine years of age, and that all over that age should be sent to some other institution [6772]. THE REV. G. SUTHERLAND, who has had experience of the institutions of Canada and America, thinks that the schools should be amalgamated if possible, on the score of efficiency and economy [7127]. He thinks the policy of the Country is to have common schools on a sound unsectarian basis, but that it is decidedly objectionable to have a school so large that each inmate therein is known by number only [7147]. MR. W. WILKINS describes two large institutions for the care and reformation of children, one at Swinton containing 800 children, and one at Norwood containing 1,200, and states that the training was good, the moral character of the children being carefully watched over, and good habits inculcated [7157, 7174, 7188]; he says the children improved wonderfully [7208]; he admits, however, that there is a danger of children being over-looked when there are too many together, and that such a system can only be carried on by first-class officers [7282].

CAPTAIN McLERIE says the Roman Catholic and Protestant Orphan Schools should be amalgamated with the Randwick institution; he had been one of the founders of the latter, and those founders had intended to propose such an amalgamation to the Government [7572]. THE HON. E. DEAS THOMSON says that in the Randwick institution the children lose very little of their individuality [7655]. MRS. BRISCOE says that 300 children would be enough to have in one school, as if there are too many it is impossible to pay proper regard to each [8008]. MR. S. H. PEARCE says that the cost per head should be lessened as the number of children in an institution is increased [8599]. MISS ROSAMOND HILL gives evidence to the effect that the congregation together of large numbers of children is an evil, and describes the "family system," adopted at Mettray, where, though the number of inmates is large, the school is broken up into groups [8616, 8666, 8723]. MISS PROBERT, matron of the Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum, says she knows the names of a good many of the children there, but not of all [9727].

CENTRAL

CENTRAL BOARD.

MR. EDWARD BYRNE says he thinks it would be well if there were an officer appointed by Government to whom persons might apply who were anxious to get apprentices from any of the public institutions [2324]. MR. FOSBERY says that it would be a good thing to have a central department, to which applications for apprentices could be made, and which should inquire into applications for admission, &c.; such a body could also watch over the children [2433]. THE RIGHT REV. DR. MARSDEN thinks that a central department should be established, but that there should also be local Boards to act in conjunction therewith, and to which reference could be made [4254]. MR. ROBERTSON says that no doubt it would be a good thing to have an officer or central department charged with the supervision of all the Charities, but that such an officer could scarcely do more than is done now by the Minister [6083]. MR. LUCAS thinks it would be requisite to have some officer to communicate with the masters of the girls after they have quitted Biloela [6555]. CAPTAIN MCCLERIE thinks that there should be a Government officer responsible for the whole of the Charitable Institutions, and who should have some control over them [7532]; he believes there should be a Central Board, having control over all the money voted for these institutions by Parliament, and assisted by officers who could make inquiries; it would be a large establishment [7615].

BOARDING-OUT SYSTEM.

THE VERY REV. S. J. A. SHEEHY says that he does not think the system of placing children out in families and paying a small sum for their keep and clothing would answer here, as there would be no sufficient control over the children; he fears that it would be like baby-farming; even as it is, children are sometimes not properly treated; he admits that there are some evils in the system of bringing up children in large institutions, where their individuality is destroyed, but he considers that there would be no sufficient supervision over children boarded out [377-384]. MR. JAMES MULLENS says that he has seen so many families neglected that he would not approve of leaving destitute children to the care of families in the country; that you might get one in a thousand well cared for; that he has not heard of the plan having been successful elsewhere [470-485]. THE RT. REV. DR. QUINN says the boarding-out system is in very successful operation in Ireland, where the payment made for each child was from £5 to £8 per year, the system having been established since 1863 [748-753]; he thinks people in this Country would be glad to take children to bring up on similar terms, and he has a commission to obtain two for such persons; he also thinks that they should take them without pay, unless they are very young, and that the proper selection of persons with whom to place them, and proper supervision of them should be parts of the system; and he is of opinion that some hundreds could be so disposed of; he believes that under such a system the children would grow up self-reliant, and having some home associations [764-775]. MR. FOSBERY says he saw a long code of regulations as to the boarding-out system in the Victorian Gazette, but he did not recommend it, as he believed it would be made a trade of by a certain class; he would not object to the plan, however, if one person were allowed to take not more than one child [2463]. MR. LUCAS thinks that if the girls in the Industrial School were boarded out, many persons would be glad to take them for a small weekly allowance [2946]. THE RIGHT REV. DR. MARSDEN, who has had some acquaintance with the boarding-out system in England, says that there the system was successfully carried out, the children being put out in the families of poor people, who received small weekly payments for their maintenance; he says that this method of providing for them is far preferable to putting them in large institutions, as it preserved their self-respect, but that care must be taken as to the persons to whom they are entrusted; he mentions that two or three children have been boarded out in this way in the neighbourhood of Bathurst with good results; he thinks that children might be boarded out here, but that the people who took them would require more money than was paid in England, though the children would be useful to the people living in the bush; he states that great care must be exercised in the selection of persons to be entrusted with children, and that provision should be made for inspecting them [4195-4215]; they should be placed near schools, and his fear was, lest in the remote districts they could not be kept in view [4228]. MR. ROBERTSON is in favour of the boarding-out system with regard to destitute children, and thinks that many of them might be easily disposed of in the country. They would be brought up in respectable families, would be overlooked by a committee of ladies, and would be both more comfortable and less expensive than at present [6022]. MR. WILKINS is doubtful as to the success of the boarding-out system in England, and thinks that any experiment of the kind would have to be made very cautiously here. The difficulty is in selecting proper persons to have the custody of the children, and the latter would in some cases probably be ill-treated. There is also very scant decency among the settlers in the country districts, and that people who obtained these destitute children would neglect them; at any rate great care would have to be exercised in selecting homes for these children, and they should be under supervision [7247-7272]. THE HON. E. DEAS THOMSON has no knowledge of the boarding-out system, but is afraid it would be difficult to find suitable families here with which children could be placed [7642]. MR. S. H. PEARCE says the boarding-out system may be successful in England, but he doubts whether it could be carried out here, the population being sparse; he thinks that if it could be carried out, the system would be better for the children generally [8550]. MISS ROSAMOND HILL describes the boarding-out system as it exists in England, states her thorough approval of it, and that it is making great progress; she says that it works well in South Australia [8746]. MISS EMILY CLARKE, who introduced the boarding-out system into South Australia, says that it has been carried on very successfully, and describes the method adopted [8817]; she says that the amount paid per child is 5s. per week, and that two-fifths of the children placed out have been adopted [8827]. MISS FLORENCE HILL gives similar evidence to that of her sister [9430]. MR. WINDEYER speaks of the boarding-out system having been in force in Victoria for about twelve months, and having been very successful [9793].

DEFECTS AND ABUSES.

MR. FOSBERY says that in his opinion many children are allowed to become burdens on the public who should not be so, and he relates an instance in which a parent possessed of considerable property in stock attempted to cast his children upon public charity; another case of a man in a respectable sphere of life, bringing four young children up from Melbourne and leaving them here; and another in which a high official came from a neighbouring Colony with two idiotic children, intending to leave them and return to his position in the other Colony [2403-2403-2415]; he says also that Magistrates frequently send children children to the Industrial Schools without proper inquiry, and thus mix vicious and innocent children together, and that he considers the whole Industrial and Reformatory scheme useless unless this evil is remedied; he also thinks that a history of each child should be sent with it to each institution; the operation of the law should take a wider scope and include more neglected children than it now does, as a pretence of selling oranges or matches about the streets enables a child to evade the Act, and the consequence is that numbers of neglected children are wandering about Sydney. The present system tends to make all children bad; he thinks the distinction between Industrial and Reformatory Schools should be rigidly enforced, and that country Magistrates should receive very precise instructions as to the intention of the Act, as they seemed to be in a state of entire ignorance, and he had very recently received a warrant sentencing a child to two years in the "Vernon" for theft; he is of opinion the supervision of all these matters should be entrusted to some proper authority [2422-2434]. It is unwise to mix prostitutes up with innocent girls as at Biloela, because nothing is more easy of corruption than a young girl's mind. Many thieves are highly moral, a shop-lifter being most likely not a prostitute; there should be, therefore, a third classification for girls who have lost their virtue. There are many juvenile prostitutes here, made so by the Chinese, and there is no law which enables such children to be rescued. At first the Act had a marked good effect; but mothers seeing that Magistrates would not send children to the schools unless under the strict letter of the law, ceased to care for the law. The Act should be interpreted in its broadest sense, and all neglected children taken charge of; his opinion is that if there were 990 children on the "Vernon" instead of 90, there would still be children to be dealt with; the carelessness or tenderness of Magistrates prevents their sending children to the institutions [2438-2454]; he thinks prostitutes should be kept apart; he knows that Chinamen spare no effort to procure young girls, and frequently have one girl among six of them in the same room, and though mothers take their girls away over and over again, when once they have participated in the vice they take to it; and this shows the necessity of restraining them [2476-2484]. MR. LUCAS says that children are often sent to the Reformatory at Biloela who should be sent to the Industrial School, and thinks it a mistake that there is no provision in the Act for apprenticing girls from the Reformatory [3067, 3126]; he thinks also that the Government should break up the Biloela establishment, and build a place where the girls could be classified [3118]. THE RIGHT REV. DR. MARSDEN thinks that bringing up children in large masses tends to degrade them [4194.] MR. F. CANE says that such institutions as that at Biloela are productive of much good, but that the children require to be classified, and he thinks there should be a reception-house through which all girls should pass before being permitted to mix with the others [5762]. MR. ROBERTSON thinks that the mixing together of vicious and innocent children is a great evil, and a fault of the law [6022.] MR. COWPER thinks if the Government were to build an Industrial School for girls, and have it managed by a committee of ladies, such an institution might be cheaply and successfully carried out [6604]; he considers it very wrong to return girls to their parents, as they nearly always go astray in such cases; it is objectionable, also, to return to their parents boys who have been sent to the "Vernon"; he points out that the system of decoying young girls away from their parents rendered the Act necessary, and he describes the means resorted to by Chinese in order to obtain young girls; he mentions instances of mothers living by prostitution and forcing their daughters to do the same, suggests that the law should be made more stringent, and advocates the establishment of a Reformatory for Boys; it is necessary, also, to make provision for apprenticing children from the Reformatory; Magistrates, also, have to contend against many difficulties in dealing with children brought before them [6606-6614]. MRS. BETTS thinks that only children whose mothers are living should not be admitted into Orphan Schools, unless the parents contribute to their support; and that a mother having several children in an institution should not be allowed to take out the elder ones without the younger [6815-6819]; she says that the present law is extremely defective as regards the apprenticeship of the children, and that the Acts under which they are apprenticed are contradictory [6838, 6860]. CAPT. McLERIE says that there is no efficient supervision over the expenditure of the money voted by Parliament for charitable purposes [7534]; he has no doubt that many parents are able to pay for the support of their children who are in the "Vernon" and other institutions, and he advocates the publication in the Gazette of names of parents who are able to pay and fail to do so; he thinks that the working of the Industrial and Reformatory Schools Act is very defective, and that the Reformatory at Biloela is all humbug [7554-7563]; he believes that the Magistrates carry out the law, but there are numbers of neglected children about because the police cannot legally take them up [7604]. CAPT. SCOTT says there is no place to send criminal children to when they are under thirteen years of age [9865].

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE.

ORPHAN SCHOOLS.

SATURDAY, 14 JUNE, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.

CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

Mrs. M. A. Adamson, Matron of the Roman Catholic Orphan School, examined during inspection of buildings:—

1. President.] You are the matron of this establishment? Yes.
2. You have the sole control over it? Yes.
3. You keep the books of the institution? Yes. The sister helps me to keep the books.
4. Can you produce your books? Yes. (Books of account, &c., produced.) This is the registry of the children in the institution (book produced). We put down here the date of the child's entry into the institution, where born, age at entering, name of the father, and the Country to which he belongs, and how long he has been dead, and so on. No matter how many children there may be of one family, they are all entered separately. When a child leaves us, you can see by this book what has become of it. You see here (referring to book) So-and-so. "Given to his mother, 31st May, 1869." He was returned to the school again—his mother was very poor, and she was obliged to bring him back again; he was returned here, and then he was again taken by his mother, and was again returned.
5. In a case of that kind, what authority have you—are you compelled to take the child back? I get the Government authority; I never take a child or send one away without the Government authority.
6. What is the mode of admission? If a child wishes to enter the institution, the first thing is to get a notice from the parish priest to certify that the case is a proper one. That certificate is sent down to the Vicar-General's office, and then it is sent on to the Government; and then there is a notice sent up to me to admit the child, and I do so. When a child goes away the same course is pursued. Sometimes the mothers will make complaints and get their children out. They go to the Vicar-General and come to me, and I say perhaps to them that I do not think it is right for them to take the children; but they will make a complaint, and get an order from the Colonial Secretary to get the child.
7. And does the Colonial Secretary give an order for the re-admission of children who have been taken away—do the Government know that they have been in before? I suppose that they keep their own records; that depends on themselves.
8. You think it is not desirable that children should be allowed to go out and come in again in this way? I think it might be sometimes very requisite; but I think that mothers should not be allowed to take away their children unless they are really able to support them. This person, to whom I referred just now, actually stole away her child once.
9. How long was the child away? It never came back.
10. You have spoken of instances in which children have been given to their mothers and have returned here again—will you give us one case? This is a case of the kind (referring to entry in book).
11. When did that child first come into the school? In April, 1869.
12. When was it returned to the mother? In May, 1869.
13. When did it come back to the school again? In February, 1870.
14. When did it again go back to its parents? In April, 1871.
15. And it is in the school now? Yes.
16. Do you not think that it is injurious to the child that it should go backwards and forwards in that way? Of course it is. In one instance the children were returned to the mother, and the committee learned that they were going about the streets. A lady interested herself in the matter, and I said it was ridiculous to take them into the school again; but the children were going about begging, and this lady interfered and got them in again. In that instance their coming in again was objected to because the children had been taken out twice.
17. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not think that it is wrong to let these children go out after they are once admitted here? Yes; unless the mother has married again, and has got into a somewhat comfortable position.
18. President.] But once out they should not be again admitted? No. I cannot say that there have been more than two of the cases I have described. They are exceptional cases. The children come in, and some of them are taken away by their friends, and some are apprenticed.
19. Will you please enumerate the books which you keep? The register book—which is the book now before you—containing the particulars concerning the admissions of the children, particulars of the child's parents, and also particulars as to where the child goes to when it leaves the institution. You see (referring to book) where that child is apprenticed now. Sometimes they are apprenticed and returned again, but not as a general rule.
20. What other books do you keep? This (book produced) is called the "medical comforts book." It is made up each month. In this are written down the names of those children who require wine and other medical comforts. We keep a rough copy, and send in returns of these things monthly. Here is entered the wine

- wine ordered for children by the doctor, and eggs, and biscuits, and so on, with the quantity received, and the names of the children to whom the articles are given. This book is kept upon the advice of Mr. Walker, the Acting Inspector of Charities, who suggested that I should keep it, and since he came here it has been kept. One of these papers (printed form produced—see Appendix A) goes to the Government every month, and one of these with it, showing my balance on hand (see Appendix A 1), and we keep duplicates. This return shows every month what wine, brandy, biscuits, &c., we had on the 1st of the month, what we have received during the month, what we have issued during the month, and the balance remaining on hand.
21. Is this book that you keep, an official record, kept at the suggestion of the Government Inspector of Charities? Yes.
22. Do you keep any other books officially? Yes. We have one form which we send in each month, and another which we send in each year. This (see Appendix A 1) is the summary. All these forms go to the Government every month.
23. Are the particulars on the monthly form the details of which the yearly form is a summary? Yes. Then there is the daily issue book (book produced). This shows the number of children every day for whom food is issued. The number of boys, the number of infant boys, the total number of boys; the number of girls, the number of infant girls, and the total number of girls; and the number of officers.
24. How often is this book made up? It is made up every day.
25. Does that go to the Government Inspector? If he wishes to see it, he can do so.
26. Are these books kept officially by the order of any authority, or are they kept by yourself for your own satisfaction? They are all ordered to be kept. This daily issue book was always kept.
27. Will you just enumerate the books which you keep officially? The daily issue book, the summary of medical comforts, and the return of medical comforts.
28. Are there any others? Then there is a ledger—two ledgers—that show the monthly balances.
29. These, I presume, show the accounts of every person with whom the establishment deals? No, there is a contractor—it is the contractor's account.
30. Does the book contain the accounts of all the persons that you deal with? We only deal with one person, and that shows the balances for every month. Sometimes we have two contractors, and sometimes only one.
31. Mr. Metcalfe.] You have no books of account with these people—they all go to the Government? I keep all the accounts. This (book produced) is the monthly report book. A copy of this goes in every month. It shows the number of children in the institution at date of last return, the number of children since admitted, the number sent out of the establishment, the number still remaining, and any remarks that may be necessary are added.
32. Remarks as to the state of the premises? Yes. A copy of that goes in to the Government every month.
33. President.] You are directly responsible to the Government? Yes.
34. There is no Board here? Yes, there is. I send down two returns; one goes to the Board, and the other is forwarded to the Government, with the doctor's report.
35. What Board is it that you refer to? The Vicar-General, the Very Rev. Father Sheehy, Mr. Mullens, Mr. O'Connor, and Mr. Hart. Father Sheehy is the chairman of the Board. Mr. O'Connor has resigned; Mr. Curran was appointed in his place.
36. By whom were these gentlemen appointed? By the Government, I think.
37. Do they visit the institution? Yes. This book (book produced) shows the wearing apparel and household articles supplied to me every year. The bills I send in you will see by this requisition book. Each year I make a requisition for what I require. I suppose you know what the requisition forms are; they are all the same for each institution. I send one in every year.
38. Mr. Metcalfe.] And then the Government advertises for contracts? Not for this institution alone, but for all. I think Messrs. Moore, Henderson, & Co. have been the contractors for wearing apparel. I send in my requisition every year. We make it out as to when we received the last supply; and if we have any goods in store we state what we have, what we require, and the rate of them. We have each year sent to us a schedule of prices, and from that we make out our requisition.
39. President.] You ask for every article of a certain quality—as, for instance, blankets, at 10s.? That is the Government price. We must take the Government price for everything.
40. Mr. Ellis.] When you apply for a certain number of things you specify the price? Yes.
41. President.] With what object—take the article of blankets—what is the object of putting them down at 10s. there? To show the amount it will come to in the long run.
42. But if that is the price fixed by the Government, why do you take the trouble to put the price down here? Because I am ordered to do so by the Government. The requisition forms are all made out exactly like this. We have the schedules of prices to go by, and, say I received in May, 1872, fifty blankets, which are at present in wear, they will come to £25; and when I receive them I have to put them down as received. Sometimes we do not receive what we order, and then this book will show what we have ordered and what we have received.
43. Mr. Metcalfe.] Does any one examine your stock to see whether you get more than you require, or less? Yes; these books are open to the Government Inspector, and he can take stock if he likes.
44. Do you send back the worn-out blankets? No. What should we do for floor-cloths in such a place as this if we were to send them back? In such a place as the Lunatic Asylum it is of course a different thing. There the patients, not being in their right mind, very often tear their blankets, and many things go back torn which are yet not worn out.
45. There is no check upon the expenditure of these goods beyond your own book? An account of everything we expend goes in to the Government, and every bill is sent to the Audit Office, and if there is a difference of threepence in the account they send it back to me.
46. Supposing that you order 100 blankets when you only require eighty, how would they find that out? It is the duty of the Government Inspector to examine into that.
47. There is no possible check upon that? Of course they must know from the number of children, and from what I had received before. They will see that fifty blankets are not too much. Of course we put by some blankets in the summer, and give them out in the winter.
48. It is just the same with calico and other things, I suppose—you make a requisition for what you require? Yes, and where I have had some difficulty in it, that they frequently send me less than I ask for. If I send in for 100 blankets, they only send me fifty, and so on. This year and last year they did so.
49. Last year? Yes, and this year they did not do so; but before that, my requisitions to Mr. Brennand were always reduced.

50. President.] And what is the consequence of your not getting these articles as they are ordered? I have to write and write again. Mrs. M. A. Adamson.
51. Do you ultimately get them? Yes, but it is a very great trouble.
52. Did they make any explanation as to the reason why less than the quantity required was supplied? Yes, that the amount voted for stores was not sufficient, and that they had to deduct from every department. I did not blame Mr. Brennand, because it was not his fault. This year I have generally got what I asked for. 14 June, 1873.
53. Mr. Ellis.] Do you apply for more things than you require? No. At one time, when there was some remark here about things not being as they should be, I explained that I had not got what I asked for, and the books would show it.
54. President.] Have you anything to complain of now in that respect? No; this year I have got what I asked for.
55. Mr. Cowper.] In consequence of their not supplying you at any time, have the children been left with insufficient clothing? Yes. It was bedding. There was not the sufficient change that there should have been.
56. Were they left short of blankets? Not short of them, but the blankets were not good for a month or so, until I got a fresh supply.
57. President.] Do you keep articles in store? Yes; wearing apparel, but not blankets. We have not one blanket in stock, but they every one have sufficient.
58. Have you other articles? Yes; calico, and things of that sort.
59. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you get a year's supply at once? Yes.
60. Does any one come up here to examine your stock and see what you have left? No; I show that in my next year's requisition.
61. Does any one come up to take stock with you? No. Of course if the Government Inspector comes up, the place is open to him.
62. Mr. Cowper.] Who is the Government Inspector? Mr. King, I believe.
63. President.] When was he here last? He has not been here for a long time.
64. Mr. Gould.] How often is he supposed to come here? I do not know. The committee come here every three months. I do not think that Mr. King has been here for the last two years. I cannot really tell you the date when he was here last, but I know that he has not been here for a long time. Mr. Walker used to come frequently.
65. How often do the committee come? Every three months.
66. What are their functions? They go over the place, and see that everything is in order.
67. How long have you been in charge of the place? Fourteen years last April.
68. Have you ever traced the after career of children who have left the institution? Yes, numbers of them; numbers come to visit me.
69. On the whole, are you satisfied with the results attained here? On the whole, I am very satisfied, especially during the last seven or eight years. When I came here there were many young children, and the place was not in a prosperous state, and it took a long time before we could get any results at all. Many of the children did not turn out as well as we expected, but on the whole the results have been satisfactory. I can show numbers of letters on the subject, which show that the children have done well.
70. I suppose that some of these children do not turn out well? A few do not.
71. Have you ever made any calculation as to what percentage of them turn out badly? I have not, but I do not think there has been one in twenty.
72. How many children do you apprentice in the course of a year? I think somewhere about thirty a year;—sometimes more, and sometimes less.
73. You apprentice them about the age of fourteen, do you not? About thirteen, or from twelve to thirteen.
74. Mr. Ellis.] Not under twelve? We are not allowed by the Government to apprentice them younger than twelve.
75. Have you a copy of the Regulations? Yes.
76. By whom were they compiled? They were drawn up by Mr. Walker, principally for the Protestant Orphan School, and they were revised by us. As we found that they did not suit us in some respects, we altered them.
77. In what way—in matters of discipline? Yes. There is very little difference.
78. Did Mr. Walker see them after they were altered? They were sent into the Colonial Secretary's Office, and in some way they were lost there, and we did not get them back for a long time.
79. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are the rations issued in the two establishments the same? Exactly the same. For some time they were not the same; we were not allowed so liberal a supply as they were allowed in the other school, and I had to overdraw, and they tried to make me pay £100 out of my own pocket for what I overdraw. Then Mr. Walker went over the matter, and saw how the case stood, and I sent to the Protestant Orphan School and got their lists, and I said if they would give me the same I would guarantee not to exceed the allowance.
80. You do not give the children meat on Friday, do you? No, but I had permission to change. I did not put on meat yesterday, but they had ling, rice, and potatoes. On other days they will have dumpling, and other days vegetables from the farm, pie-melons, and things of that sort.
81. President.] You apprentice, you say, about thirty children a year? Yes. I cannot say exactly.
82. Are any of these children ever returned by the persons to whom they are apprenticed? Very seldom.
83. Were any returned last year? There was one returned, and she was returned by the committee, for she went to a place which they found was not a good place, and she has been apprenticed again. If the children are not comfortable when they are apprenticed, they apply to the committee.
84. That is done through the parish priest? Yes; and the children are returned. Sometimes a child may be a little awkward for a time, and then a little talking to will do it good; or, perhaps, we write to the child, or see it here if they bring it up.
85. Can you tell how many children went wrong last year, and were not returned? My book will show. I do not know that any went wrong who were apprenticed last year. One boy ran away after he was apprenticed, and went to his parents. Certainly it was a very old decrepit person that he went to, and it was not a nice place for a young child. I do not remember that there was any other case last year.
86. Mr. Ellis.] Do you receive any reports concerning the children after they have been apprenticed? Yes, we frequently hear from the parties to whom they have been apprenticed, and from the children themselves, as the letters I have got will show.

- Mrs. M. A. Adamson.
14 June, 1873.
87. Are these reports generally satisfactory? Yes. (Letters produced.) There is one letter here will show. This person who wrote me this letter has had three children from this institution.
88. Mr. Cowper.] I see that you call this book (referring to book produced) an issue book. Can you explain how it shows what rations are given out? It shows the number of children, and as each child is allowed a certain quantity—
89. Can you tell us what that ration is? Yes, certainly.
90. President.] With reference to the letter which you have just produced, from a person who has had three boys out of the Orphan School, I see it is addressed "to all whom it may concern";—under what circumstances was it written? It was written to me.
91. Had you been in correspondence with this person before this letter was written? No, not since he took the last child away from here.
92. How long was that ago? About three months ago. I think there was something in the paper about two months ago, and some people thought that the children were going to be taken away from the institution, and they wrote on that account, I suppose.
93. You had no previous communication with this person before you received this letter? No; that is the only letter I have received from him.
94. You think then that this letter was written to you in consequence of the writer having seen the reports of some debates that have taken place in the House? Yes, I think so. (Letters produced.) These letters are similar, and have been written apparently for the same reason.
95. Mr. Metcalfe.] Have you ever been over the Destitute Children's Asylum at Randwick? No, I never have.
96. You do not know then whether the discipline here resembles the discipline at Randwick? No, I do not know what their discipline is there.
97. There they have a number of both Roman Catholic and Protestant children—I thought you might have seen how they made the children of all denominations live in harmony together, without any ill feeling being created? I do not know, I am sure; I have never been there myself, and so I cannot say.
98. Mr. Ellis.] Have you the entire management of this institution? I have.
99. President.] I see that all these letters you have produced were written in May, 1873? Yes, I think so.
100. You had not written to these people previous to your getting these letters? No, I had not.
101. I see that they all begin in the same way—"To all whom it may concern"? No, only two, I think. I was rather amused at that myself.
102. I see that these people, the writers of these letters, all object to the mixed education of children? Yes, they all do that.
103. And they seem to have been written by people who object to doing away with the denominational system here? Yes, that is what they all seem to object to.
104. Have you any letters which have been written by such persons as these, before any proposal of this sort was made? I have none at hand just now of this kind. I have letters from children. There are some of the attendants at Randwick who have their children here; they object to having them in the Randwick institution.
105. Mr. Ellis.] Do you find any difficulty in apprenticing the children as soon as they are fit? No, I have no difficulty at all; I could apprentice any number of them. There are numbers of applications which have been refused, and people are waiting for the children.
106. Do you find that people who have taken children frequently apply for others? Very often. When a child has nearly finished a term, the person to whom he is apprenticed will often apply for others. There are two or three waiting now.
107. Do the children generally go into the country? Yes; we prefer to send them into the country. We do not often send them to Sydney, except to places where we are sure that they will be well looked after.
108. Are there any trades taught to any of the children on the place? No; there is no one to teach them; except the boys who go to the farm. There is one boy taught farming—he is apprenticed to the man we have there; and there is one boy apprenticed to the baker.
109. Does the boy you speak of reside at the farm? Yes.
110. And do any of the other children go to the farm? Yes; it is not far from here.
111. Then you have two boys apprenticed on the place—one to the baker and one to the farmer? Yes; and one boy to the teacher, a pupil teacher, and one girl; and Mr. McCredie has recommended one for the infants.
112. President.] The children go to prayers in the morning? Yes.
113. What time is occupied in that? A quarter of an hour.
114. Are there any religious exercises besides that during the day? No; except the religious instruction at some hour appointed, as in all schools.
115. At what hour? From 9 to 10 o'clock.
116. The rest of the instruction which they receive is purely secular? Yes.
117. Are there any other hours set apart for prayer? They have prayers morning and evening.
118. For what time in the evening? A quarter of an hour.
119. Mr. Ellis.] I observe in this return, which was laid before Parliament some time ago, the names of inmates of this institution who are stated to be twenty-nine and twenty-two years old—how does that happen? Mary Murphy, one of those persons, has been here for more than twenty years. Her parents were dead when she came here, and she is nearly blind. She is not able to earn her living, but she is able to go about, and she stops in the infirmary here, doing little odd things.
120. Is the assistance which she renders an equivalent for her keep? Well, I do not think that any one would keep her for what she could do.
121. Do you not think it would be better if she went into another institution? It might be; but I think if you took her away from here it would be her death.
122. Then there is another girl here, Elizabeth Flynn, aged twenty-two? She assists in the laundry here. Her work is fully equivalent to the cost of keeping her here.
123. President.] What is her age? Twenty-two.
124. What is the reason of her staying here? She has very bad eyesight. The doctor thought she would go quite blind, but she is able to work in the laundry here, and her services are more than an equivalent for for her board. Margaret Gleeson, another of the persons you have referred to, is of weak intellect, and of course no one would take her as an apprentice. Her brothers and sisters have all been apprenticed, and finished their apprenticeship; and she works in the laundry, and is able to do a woman's work, for which, of course, she receives no pay.

Mrs. M. A.
Adamson.
14 June, 1873.

125. Mr. Ellis.] Is the assistance that she gives equal to what she receives? Indeed it is.
126. Then there is Michael Scofield, aged eighteen? He has since been taken by his mother. He was weak-minded and could do nothing about the place, and his mother came up, and I said to her that she ought to see what could be done for him—to see whether his brothers and sisters could not do something for him. They decided to buy her a mangle, which he could turn for her, and so he has left the institution.
127. These are the only persons of any age on the establishment? We have another girl who is nineteen, but she is of very weak intellect, almost idiotic, and she assists in the rough work.
128. President.] She is not fit to go out into the world and earn her own living? Oh dear no, she is not; you cannot even teach her her prayers.
129. Will you tell us what "sisters" you have here? The teacher—Sister Mary Gertrude.
130. Any other person in the position of an officer under you? The sub-matron—she is a sister, the teacher, and the infants' teacher, and myself; and I have another sister staying with me—that will be four.
131. Is there a storekeeper? No, I am the storekeeper myself, and when I am engaged, the sub-matron attends to it.
132. You have a drill-master? Yes.
133. What other persons? A schoolmaster, of course; two infirmary nurses, and one nurse for the junior boys, two infant nurses, two laundresses, one housemaid, one cook, one seamstress, and one cook for myself.
134. Are those all the persons employed on the establishment? Yes; there are eleven females.
135. You have not enumerated the men: have you a male cook? No, we have no male cook, but we have a baker, and we have a wood-cutter, who cuts wood and pumps water with the boys' assistance, and cleans up the grounds on the girls' side, and we have a gardener.
136. That is the man on the farm? No; he is a kind of garden labourer, and he goes to the farm to assist occasionally. He has to go to the train for all the stores, and do the general work required about the place.
137. At the farm you have one man? Yes; he has a wife, but of course the man only is paid.
138. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you get all your vegetables from the farm? Yes, nearly all; with the exception of potatoes, we have an immense supply.
139. And fruit? Very little fruit, as yet. We have only had the farm a few years, and we have plenty of fruit trees, but they are young, and have not borne much fruit; but we have plenty of vegetables.
140. President.] How is the water supply here? It is pretty good, but we have to pump it all—the tank is not good.
141. Is the tank not water-tight? The supply from the roof is not sufficient. The tank is not sufficient to supply the establishment, and so they dug deeper until they came to a spring.
142. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is the water brackish? Not at all; it is beautiful water.
143. President.] Does the drainage injure the water supply at all? No, it does not injure it at all. Some years ago we had no proper drainage before the sewers were made, and then we had a great deal of sickness. We lost eleven children in one year, and the doctors attributed it to the bad drainage.
144. How long is it since you have had a death? In November last a very delicate child died—a child who was delicate from his infancy—a kind of decline.
145. But you have had no diseases lately which could be traced to bad drainage? No, nothing of the sort.
146. Mr. Goold.] How long has that bad smell existed which we found at the infirmary here? I cannot say, but I think for the last twelve months. It has been worse since then than it was before.
147. President.] With regard to the prayers we were speaking of just now,—do the children say any other prayers besides those which they say in the chapel? Yes; at the beginning of the school there are prayers; then sometimes after school there is what we call a rosary, and the girls say it, but not as a regular thing. It is not put down as a regular thing, and it is never said in school; and the sisters instruct the children for half-an-hour.
148. Do they say any prayers when they go to bed? They go immediately to bed from prayers in the evening.
149. But they do not say prayers of themselves when they go to bed? They all recite them aloud. They ask God's protection during the night, and the sister superintends their doing so.
150. A child does not say a prayer beside its bed just when it is going to bed? No; there is a prayer said for them by the sister, which they all say when they are in bed.
151. Mr. Metcalfe.] Have you any form of prayer printed? No, really I have not. The prayer depends on the sister's choice.
152. President.] The children all meet together in the chapel? Yes, they all say their prayers aloud there together. Of course, if any child is not well, he says his prayers before, and separately.
153. Are the children allowed out of the establishment at all—do they ever go on errands for you into the town? No; I have one boy as messenger.
154. Then they are not employed in any way except within the precincts of this establishment? No; we do not want them to mix with other boys.
155. They do not walk out in procession? Yes. Sometimes we take them out to the farm, and give them a picnic—give them buns and lollies. They go to the parish church every Sunday.
156. You say that some of the teachers at Randwick prefer having their children here? Yes.
157. Do you know their reason? No, I cannot tell. I have not asked them.
158. Mr. Goold.] What teachers do you refer to? I did not say teachers—I said attendants.
159. Mr. Metcalfe.] You meant the children of attendants who were Roman Catholics? Of course.
160. Mr. Ellis.] Can you suggest any means by which the labour of the children could be turned to profitable account? I really do not know. There is so little time. They are all so young; and they have to assist in the work of the place, and there is a good deal of labour required to keep it in proper order.
161. President.] I saw some of them cutting up wood? Yes.
162. There are a certain number told off to do that? Yes, every week.

- Mrs. M. A. Adamson.
14 June, 1873.
163. They can use the cross-cut saw? Yes, they all learn those things.
164. Do they all go to the farm to work? Yes, all the bigger boys—those who are not too young.
165. At what age do they commence to go to the farm? Not younger than ten years I think.
166. What is the age of the youngest you have here? Only two years. They come in sometimes when they are only fourteen months old.
167. Mr. Ellis.] Is there no means here of teaching them trades? I do not think so. They leave us so young, and they have to be taught so much. That boy Gray whom you saw did not know his alphabet when he came here; he has been here for three years, and I think from the fright he got on the death of his mother his intellect is injured.
168. Can you give us the average cost per head of each child? I think it is from £14 to £15, but I cannot give that as a certainty—I can let you have it. At least, I can give a general average, for there are some things supplied to us from the store of which I do not know the prices.
169. President.] Do you know what is the value to the institution of the vegetables grown by the boys? I can show you the quantity that they supply, because I weigh all the vegetables that come in.
170. You have horses here? Yes, two horses.
171. Any cows? Yes.
172. Do the cows supply the establishment with milk? Sometimes it does, and sometimes only partially. There has been a great saving here of milk and vegetables.
173. Do you buy any vegetables? Very seldom. Sometimes we have to buy a few potatoes.
174. Does the farm grow provender for the horses and cows? We are allowed provender for one horse. I have a horse, which I do not use very much myself, and it does the work of the place. We have to cart things from the train, and we have the night-cart to be removed; that is a great inconvenience. We have no man to do that work, and the men here have to do it after their day's work, and they object a great deal to it. After their day's work they have to take that cart at 10 o'clock at night.
175. Do you find the accounts of the girls who have been apprenticed as good as the accounts of the boys? Equally so; in fact, more so.
176. Mr. Goold.] The accounts of the girls are more satisfactory than the accounts of the boys? Yes.
177. Mr. Metcalfe.] What is the daily ration for the children generally? I will show you. Half a pound of meat for each child, and a quarter of a pound of vegetables—vegetables we do not ration them, because we grow them, and give the children as much as we think they require; thirteen ounces of flour, which makes rather more than a pound of bread—
178. Do you allow them any pudding? Yes.
179. That comes out of the flour ration? Very often if I want to give them pudding extra, I overdraw the flour and underdraw the meat, and put one thing against the other.
180. Mr. Goold.] How much waste do you calculate there is in the meat which you receive—what weight of meat do you get to make up the allowance of half a pound? We do not give them half a pound of cooked meat; that is what is allowed altogether—bone and everything together.
181. Mr. Ellis.] Suppose you have to issue in rations 100 pounds of meat, how much meat would you order from the contractor? We only get the actual quantity—we never get any more.
182. Suppose twenty pounds of meat were boiled or roasted, have you any idea what the loss upon it would be? I cannot answer that question. I cannot say.
183. What rations do the attendants get? The attendants' meat is all weighed out to them. They are allowed a pound a day, and there is nothing allowed for waste. We get only the actual quantity of raw meat.
184. There is nothing added for the allowance on bone and the loss in cooking? No; the Government would not pay for it, if I added anything.
185. Mr. Couper.] Who is the contractor who supplies you with meat? Mr. Kidman.
186. Are you satisfied with the quality? I am satisfied with everything; but during the last few days I have not been satisfied with the meat. As a rule we have had splendid meat, but lately I have not considered it good. We have made no complaint as yet, but I intend to do so.
187. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you weigh the meat? Yes, every morning, and the attendants' allowance is weighed too.
188. And the children get half a pound of meat each, including bone? Yes.
189. Mr. Couper.] Your ration-book only shows the number of children who receive rations? Yes, but I know the amount allowed to each, and the quantity I should get.
190. But the children and officers are mixed up together in this statement? No, I beg your pardon, that is the number of children; there are 296 children on rations, and I must add the attendants' allowances to them when making up the quantity of rations.
191. The attendants get one share, and the officers another, and the children another? Yes; the officers and attendants get a pound of meat, and the children only get half a pound.
192. What quantity of tea, sugar, and flour daily do the officers get? The daily scale for the master, male teachers, and male attendants—16 ounces meat, 19 ounces fine flour, 16 ounces vegetables, $\frac{1}{2}$ -ounce tea, $2\frac{1}{2}$ ounces sugar, $\frac{1}{2}$ -ounce salt, $\frac{1}{2}$ -ounce soap, and 1 gill of milk. The matron, female teachers, and female attendants are only allowed 16 ounces of flour.
193. Are you satisfied with the drapery goods and clothing that you get? Yes, we have got very good things.
194. If they send you goods of an indifferent quality, are they prepared to change them for you? Yes, I always change them; this time they sent some prints which I did not consider suitable, and I returned them all. Anything which is not of the quality it should be I always return, and I find Mr. Moore always most obliging.
195. Mr. Goold.] With regard to this 16 ounces of meat which is allowed to the adults, is it cooked or in a raw state? The allowance to the officers and attendants is 1 lb. of raw meat.
196. Mr. Metcalfe.] I think you said that if the mothers of the children married again, the children were sent to them—Is there a rule of that kind? There is no rule, but the parents apply to the Government and get their children; they go and say that they are able to support them, and they get them.
197. President.] And when the mothers remarry and are able to support their children, do you think that they should be supported at the public expense? Certainly not, and the mothers generally do take them.

198. But in this return, which was laid before Parliament some months ago, I see that there are many children in the institution whose mothers are reported as having married again; for instance, here are Nos. 84, 85, 86, and 87, four children who evidently belong to one mother, who is reported here as having married again? She is in California, but I am unable to say what position she is in.

Mrs. M. A.
Adamson.
14 June, 1873.

199. Mr. Couper.] Have you not found that the conduct of stepfathers and stepmothers to their step-children is very often unkind and cruel? Yes, very often indeed, and there are very few children here with fathers.

200. President.] Here are No. 33 and No. 34, whose mother appears to have married again? She has married again, but before that I did not think her a person suitable to have the care of children.

201. Was she immoral? Yes, she was not a nice person.

202. Here is another—John Byrne, I think—whose mother has married again? She has married again I know, but I cannot tell whether she is able to support her child. I cannot be accountable for them.

203. There is no machinery by which you could find out whether a woman is able to support her children or not? No. I suppose that it could be done.

204. But there is no system about it? No.

205. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you think that children should be taken in here who have not lost both parents? Yes; some mothers are quite unable to support their children.

206. President.] Do you not think that parental control, however humble the parents' home may be, is better than the bringing up in an institution of this kind? I think that in this Country there are many people quite unfit to have the care of children.

207. Mr. Metcalfe.] But does not this kind of thing tend to pauperize the community? I do not see that; some of the children get into good positions and do very well. They do not seem to think themselves paupers. They come here to see me, really respectable, decent young men and women, and doing very well. I had one come to see me last week, who is married to a respectable young man down at Kissing Point, and who is doing very well. There was another who came down from Albury. She was here, and apprenticed from here. I persuaded her when her time was out to go to Albury, and she engaged there for twelve months. She is now comfortably married, and has paid for her sister, and paid her way up, and now the sister is comfortably married also, and they are looked upon with respect there. Numbers of children who were brought up here are comfortable now. There was another young girl came up here the other day, and I did not know her, though I had brought her up, and she had been apprenticed from here several years ago. She is doing very well. Numbers of them come up who have been here for years.

208. President.] Have you any suggestion to make for the improvement of the institution? I certainly think that something should be done to the building. We want more dormitory accommodation. We want another room here, too; I have not had a room to sit in for years. I have to sleep in the room I sit in—I have a stretcher bed there.

209. Have the ladies who are here with you a separate room to themselves? They sit with me. The room over-head is the only room we have.

210. Have you separate bed-rooms? They have all one room—the room over-head is the one I sleep in and the one I sit in.

211. Mr. Ellis.] If you want anything done about the place, can you get it done? No, we cannot now, and we find that a great inconvenience. I used to get many little things done, and send in the bill, and show the necessity of the expense.

212. President.] Such matters as what? Any little repairs about the place. The taps, for instance, have been leaking for the last two months, and wasting the water day and night, and I had the greatest difficulty in getting them repaired. I did get them done the other day, but it was annoying, with the labour that the men have to pump the water, to see it wasting in that way.

213. Mr. Ellis.] Did you get the repairs done? Yes; I sent notice to the Colonial Architect.

214. How long do they leave things undone after you send word to them? Perhaps weeks, and perhaps months. If you will take the trouble to look over the report book, you will see how little notice is taken of it. With regard to the colouring of the walls, we were waiting four years for it before we could get it done. I think for months and months, we sent in time after time, pointing out that the colouring of the walls had not been attended to. The walls looked very dingy, and last year they did it. There are many things which want doing, and they say that the funds do not admit of it. There were £500 voted last year, and Mr. Barnet said the money was voted so late that he had not had time to attend to the matter and to expend it, and so the money went back to the Treasury.

215. President.] Are there not certain things which you can get done on your own authority? No. There was a certain amount put aside for incidental expenses, and provided you did not overshoot that mark there was nothing said—you might get anything done. There was £1,000 voted for repairs, and yet we have had none done, except little things. You see that the laundry is in a frightful state, and the sleeping apartments of the servants are very inconvenient. They have to sleep over the laundry, where all the ironing and washing and drying is done, and there is nothing to prevent the steam ascending, and they tell me that they cannot sleep in that place, so that to-night I must put them somewhere on this side. All their clothes are wet from the steam.

216. Mr. Ellis.] You have applied to the Colonial Architect about this? Yes; last March twelvemonth I made a requisition for all I required. We have no seats in this covered way. We had seats of a rough kind before they cemented the place, but after it was cemented they took away the seats and said they would replace them with others, but they did not do it. We want school desks also. I made a requisition out for all that I required and sent it to Mr. Barnet last year, and then it was said they had not funds. I wrote again this year, and Mr. Barnet said that I had never sent in the requisition, but I had the copy to show, and I sent it down to Mr. Barnet, and somehow he got it into his hands and would not return it. I am sorry that I have not got it to show you.

217. You have to apply to the Colonial Architect for any trifling repairs needed about the place? Yes; and if you write for a thing and the cost does not exceed £5 he may get it done, but if it exceeds that, it must go to the Colonial Secretary for approval. I cannot get things done. They all say that they have no time to attend to these things—that they have too much to do.

218. From your long connection with this institution, what has been your impression as to the state of society here, as evidenced by the number of children who pass through the institution? Of course it is very difficult for me to answer that question.

Mrs. M. A. Adamson. 219. Do you think it argues well for the state of society that so many children should be compelled to seek refuge in an institution of this kind? I think that the gold diggings have had a great deal to do with it. It seems that numbers of parents went away to the gold diggings and were killed. There are numbers of children here whose fathers have been drowned, or killed in the bush in some way.

14 June, 1873.

220. Mr. Cowper.] On what do you base that statement? On my own book.

221. Does that show that many of the parents of these children died in gold-mining? Yes; they say their fathers went to the gold diggings and were killed.

222. Your book shows that they were gold-digging? Yes, going up the country for gold-digging or for work. I cannot say whether they went up or not, but that is what we are told.

223. Mr. Goold.] Have you any means of knowing how far intemperance has had to do with the position of these children—intemperance on the part of their parents? Of course I know nothing of the parents. We receive the children, and they tell me that their parents have died, and so on.

224. Mr. Ellis.] How many children do you think can be properly attended to in an institution of this kind? I do not think that it is well to have more than 300 children in any institution of this kind. I think that where there are too many together, you cannot study the dispositions of the children or watch over them as well as you might do.

225. You think 300 as many as you could manage? Yes; where there are so many they become less amenable to personal supervision—one cannot get to know them all, and ascertain individual traits of character.

226. You cannot take a personal interest in them? I do not think so. I know every child in this institution, and of course the masters over them can tell the disposition of every child almost—they can now.

227. Mr. Metcalfe.] But could you not have more masters if there were more children; in England they have some very large schools, and more masters? Yes; but I think that they are decreasing the numbers there. I do not think you could do with more than 300.

228. President.] When I was asking you just now as to whether you did not think that a child should be with its parents, whatever their home might be—if they were at all fit to look after a child—I wished to know whether you did not think that in an institution like this a child would be likely to lose home feelings and its sense of individuality? I do not think that they do myself. As far as I can see, they do not.

229. Does not your argument against increasing the size of the school tend in the same direction? Of course when you make a child look upon the place as its home it does not have that effect.

230. Do you think that at the present time you know the individual character of the children? Yes; if I wanted a boy for any duty I would ask the drillmaster, and he could tell me which boy would be the best, and in the girls' school the teacher could do the same.

231. How long has the drillmaster been here? Since September twelve months—the other drillmaster we had died.

232. Mr. Goold.] Do you not think you could ascertain the characters of the children in that way if there were 500, just the same as if there were 300? I do not think so. I should not have the individual knowledge of them. I myself know the characters of the children individually, and know their dispositions. Of course I am in constant intercourse with them.

233. Mr. Ellis.] You are continually amongst them? Yes, I am with them a great deal—frequently with them at meals.

234. President.] Is there anything which you wish to add to what you have already stated? I do not know of anything, except, as I have said, with regard to the building, some improvements are absolutely necessary.

235. To make the place healthy, what additional dormitory accommodation do you require? I think that two more dormitories would be sufficient.

236. How many beds should be taken out of the present dormitories, to make them healthy and comfortable? I cannot say at present, but I could make the calculation.

237. Will you do so, and attach it as an appendix to your evidence? Yes.* (See Appendix A 2.)

[Further examined in the boys' schoolroom.]

238. The boys are not in school on Saturday? No. They are on every day but Saturday. They used to have a half-holiday on Wednesday and another on Saturday, but I think it better for them to have the whole of one day.

239. What do you give them for dinner? Meat on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Sundays, and tea, and bread, and vegetables, and baked mutton.

240. What do you give them for tea? Tea and bread.

241. And for breakfast? Tea, and bread and butter.

242. No porridge or oatmeal? No, they do not like those things; they all like tea.

243. Plenty of milk? Yes, plenty. Sometimes I got coffee for them, but they did not seem to like it.

244. What is the cost per year—so much per head? I think it is between £14 and £15; but I cannot exactly tell you.

245. Do you keep a record as to where the boys go to? Yes.

246. Does any one look after them when they leave here? Yes, we send notice, when a boy is apprenticed, to the priest of the parish that the child is under his care.

247. Do any children return from their places? Very seldom.

[Further examined in boys' dormitory 1.]

248. Mr. Metcalfe.] How many children are there in this room? Sixty-two.

249. Is it not hot in the summer-time here? Yes.

250. What is the length of the room? 82 × 18.

251. Is it not very close in summer? Yes.

252. What is the state of the children here now? They are very healthy.

253. President.] Have you any portion of the premises set apart as a hospital? Yes.

254. Are there many cases now in the hospital? No; there are some children there with sore feet and a sore finger, and one with an abscess behind the ear, and one child with delicate lungs; that is all.

255.

* NOTE (on revision):—To give proper dormitory accommodation to the children, it will be necessary to remove eighteen beds from the girls' two dormitories and seventeen beds from the boys' two dormitories.

255. How often are the beds cleaned? Every Saturday.
256. What with? Water and kerosene oil.
257. Mr. Cowper.] Are there any vermin in them? There may be a few in summer-time, but none in the winter.
258. There are no crevices in the walls here where they can harbour? No; there is very little vermin in the place at all.
259. President.] Is it your opinion that this room is overcrowded? Yes, every room here is overcrowded. We have been promised a new room.
260. Mr. Cowper.] There are no bugs here now? None now.
261. You dress the beds with kerosene oil? Yes; we clean them with soap and water and kerosene oil.
262. President.] Are these beds placed here always the same distance apart that they are now? Yes.
263. About six inches apart? Yes.
264. Do more children than one sleep in a bed? There are in this room six children above the number of beds.
265. Then you do put more than one into a bed? In a few instances. There are here six more than the number.
266. Where do the children wash? In the lavatory.

Mrs. M. A.
Adamson,
14 June, 1873.

[Further examined in boys' dormitory, 2.]

267. How many sleep here? Forty-four.
268. How many sleep two in a bed? Some of them. There are thirty-seven beds, and forty-four boys.
269. How long is the room? 52 x 19.
270. How often do they have clean bed-clothes? They have clean pillow-cases each week and one clean sheet. The clean sheet is put on top each week, and the other sheet below.
271. The beds here are hardly a foot apart? They are not a foot apart.
272. Do you find this room very hot? Yes, the same as the other.
273. Over-crowded? Not so crowded as the other, but there are too many beds here for the size of the room.
274. How is the ventilation? Not good, but not so bad as in the other room. The opening of the ceiling has been a great improvement.
275. Mr. Metcalfe.] What time do the children go to bed? At 7 o'clock.
276. What time do they get up? At 6.
277. In summer do they have eleven hours bed? No, in winter. They go to bed at half-past 7, and rise at 5 in the summer.
278. What do they do when they get up? They wash, and those who are of any size assist in the duties of the house, some clean the dormitories, some cut wood, some clean the yard.
279. This is all done before school hours? Yes, before breakfast.
280. Then after breakfast? The prayer bell rings at a quarter past 7; the children breakfast at half-past 7. Then at half-past 8 the bell rings for school, and at 9 they go into school.
281. What time do they come out of school? At 12 o'clock. They have dinner at half-past 12. They go into school again at 2, and come out again at 4.
282. What time do they have tea? At 5.
283. What do they do then? Play about until it is time to go to bed. If it is wet weather we ring the prayer bell a little earlier, to send them out of the wet.
284. How are they supplied with bed-linen? Very well. We cannot complain; this year they have been more liberal than the last year. They have generally taken half off my requisitions which I send to Mr. Brennand. They have always taken half or a quarter off.

[Further examined in boys' clothes-room.]

285. Mr. Cowper.] How do you distinguish each boy's clothes? They are all numbered, and each boy has a bag with his number upon it. The summer clothes are taken from them and kept until the summer-time comes round again.
286. Have you pigeon-holes for each boy's clothes? No; the laundress sends in all the clothes, and they are known by the numbers.
287. How much clothes has each boy? Three day suits and a Sunday suit. They have one clean suit, one spare suit, and one suit in the wash. At present they dress in the tweed, and we have not got the second suit ready, they have not got coats made yet.
288. Where do the children wash? Down-stairs.

[Further examined in the infirmary.]

289. President.] These are all the children you have in the infirmary? Yes, these are all at present. There are ten—most of them with trifling hurts. One has weak lungs.
290. Who makes up your medicines? Any little trifling thing that is required I dispense myself; and in other cases we send to the dispenser just according to the order which the doctor leaves.
291. Who is the medical man attending here? Dr. Rutter. I said it was a sinecure, as from his report there was no sickness during the month.
292. What ward is this (ward up-stairs)? This is for delicate children. We bring them here from the other side, and if there is any epidemic we turn them all out here.
293. Mr. Metcalfe.] Have you had scarlatina here? I think we had eight cases a few months ago.
294. How often are the wards cleaned? They are washed once a week. The nurse sleeps in the enclosed place in the corner.
295. President.] What does this foul smell proceed from? It comes from the sewer. We cannot get rid of it at all. The sewer drains from the Lunatic Asylum and the Gaol, and empties into the river just below the dam. Until the drain was made from here there was no smell.
296. Mr. Goad.] Is this a constant smell? No, just as the wind is.

- Mrs. M. A. Adamson.
14 June, 1873.
297. Mr. Metcalfe.] Where does the drain go to? Into the river, below the dam. It runs under that water you see there, and under that bank, and the smell seems to come up through the bath-room below here. There is no smell on the ground floor.
298. President.] Do you notice the smell in any other part of the premises but this? No, nowhere but in the infirmary.
299. Does the Colonial Architect know of this? Indeed he does. He put in a stench-trap, but I see no improvement.
300. Where did they put it? Somewhere down here.
301. Has he been up when the smell has been like this? Yes, I think so, but I cannot certify to that.
302. How long is it since the Colonial Architect was here? About a month.
303. Did you tell him there was no improvement? Yes, I did so the last time I saw him.

[Further examined in boys' lavatory.]

304. Mr. Cowper.] Are the boys bathed here? Yes.
305. Mr. Metcalfe.] How many are bathed in the same water? About twenty in the one water.
306. Are they bathed winter and summer? Yes.
307. Mr. Cowper.] How often are those towels changed? Three times a week.
308. How many towels have they? Eight towels for 118 boys.

[Further examined in the girls' schoolroom.]

309. President.] At what age do you send out the girls? Between twelve and thirteen.
310. How many children attend here? I think about 111 is the daily average here.
311. What provision is made for them when they are apprenticed? When a child is apprenticed, the person to whom it is sent has to pay £3 a year during the term of the apprenticeship.
312. Who pays that? The person who has the child must do that. At the end of the term that money is given to the child. The mothers have—some of them—a great fancy for getting this money, but it is now put into the Savings' Bank, to the name of the Vicar-General, for the child, in order to prevent the mothers taking it, as they have a great habit of doing.
313. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are there not cases in which a mother who is able to maintain her child has it in this institution? Not many; some have taken the children away; some have married again, and then they have taken their children away.
314. You do not know of any cases in which the mothers and fathers could take their children but do not? No, there are only five of the fathers of the children here living.
315. Mr. Cowper.] As a rule you do not apprentice them to people in Sydney? No, we send them to the country; we have a few in Sydney, but we generally prefer to send them into the country. If we know that a child will be well taken care of and looked after, then we allow them to go; and of course we have to mind what child we do send to the town.

[Further examined in the girls' lavatory.]

316. President.] This is the girls' lavatory? Yes.
317. Are no basins supplied to them? No.
318. No baths supplied? No.
319. Have you applied for them? Yes.
320. How long is it since you applied for them? Ever since the building has been put up I have been applying for them.
321. How long ago is that? Four or five years ago.
322. Was no notice taken of the application? No.
323. Do you not find great inconvenience from this? Yes, it is the greatest inconvenience we have.

[Further examined in the girls' clothes-room.]

324. This is where the girls' clothes are kept? Yes.
325. Do the girls assist in the laundry? Only those that are grown up—those that have been referred to before. Some of the children assist a little. You cannot teach such young children.
326. As a matter of fact, they are not taught? No. We used to send them into the laundry, but they are too young; occasionally they go in, but not as a rule.
327. How many children have you here? We had 346 some time ago, and we refused to take any more.
328. On whose authority did you refuse to take any more? The doctor says the place is too crowded.

[Further examined in the girls' dormitories.]

329. How many children in this room (*room No. 1)? There are twenty-seven beds in this dormitory, and forty-three children. It is one of the new rooms—a fine airy room.
330. This next room (*room No. 2) is not so good? This is the old building. There are thirty-eight beds here, and sixty-eight children.
331. Do you find any vermin in these dormitories? Very little.
332. How often do you wash the beds? Every fortnight or so.
333. Do you dress them with kerosene? Yes.
334. How often? Just as it is required. I cannot say how often.
335. What room (*room No. 3) is this? The infants' dormitory. There are twenty-seven beds here, and twenty-seven children.
336. And in this adjoining room (*room No. 4)? There are thirty-two beds and thirty-three children.
337. Are the girls taught to work at all? The children are taught sewing and all kinds of house-work.
338. Have you no workroom? No; they sew in the school.
339. Where are the clothes made? They are made in the Gaol. They are cut out here. I cut out a good deal myself.

Sister

* NOTE (on revision) :—No. 1 girls' dormitories, 52 ft. × 18 ft.; No. 2 do., 52 ft. × 20 ft.; No. 3 do., 52 ft. × 18 ft.; No. 4 do., 52 ft. × 20 ft.

Sister Mary Gertrude, teacher, examined in the girls' schoolroom :—

340. President.] Are you in charge of the girls' school? Yes.
341. How many girls have you here? 119 is the number on the roll.
342. What is the average daily attendance? 111. It is in the book.
343. Mr. Metcalfe.] No children attend from outside? No.
344. President.] Have you anybody to assist in the teaching of the children? No, except the children of the higher classes.
345. How long have you been in charge of the school? For the last four years.
346. Were you engaged in tuition before? No, not before I became a nun, of course.
347. Have you informed yourself as to the mode of teaching adopted in the Public Schools? Yes; the school is inspected. Here is the Inspector's report. (See Appendix B.) He was here a few weeks ago.
348. You have not been in a training school yourself? No; it was not considered necessary.
349. Then you have no certificate from the Council of Education? No. This is Mr. M'Credie's report—the last report. I have 120 girls in the school, and there were 118 attending this week; last week the attendance was 119. Of course we cannot teach the children very much. They are apprenticed young, and leave as soon as they are fit for anything.
350. Are you still using the same books as are referred to in this report? I have not changed the classes yet. We do not change them until the commencement of each quarter.
351. Do you agree in the suggestions made in this report? Yes, I quite agree with them.
352. Since you have been here, have the pupils you have had got on well after leaving the school? Yes; I often receive letters from them.
353. Have you been able to trace their after career? Yes, I have often seen letters about them.
354. How many have been sent out during the four years you have been here? I do not know anything about that.
355. Do you not know, as taking an interest in the children? According as they leave I do. Each month I enter them as left. I dare say the matron will give you the information you require. I receive letters frequently from the children. Here are some. (Letters produced.) And here are letters which some of the girls in the school have just written to their friends. I usually look over them and correct them, but I have not corrected these yet. (Letters produced.)

Members Present :—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.
EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.
CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

The Very Rev. S. J. A. Sheehy, Chairman of the Committee, Parramatta Roman Catholic Orphan School, called in and examined :—

356. President.] You are the Vicar-General of the Roman Catholic Church here? Yes, of the arch-diocese of Sydney.
357. I believe that you have something to do with the apprenticing of the children in the Roman Catholic Orphan School at Parramatta? Yes; I am chairman of the committee.
358. How long have you acted in that capacity? About thirteen years, I think.
359. So that you are well acquainted with the operations of the school during that time, having taken considerable interest in the institution? I have been at all meetings of the committee that have been held in my time.
360. Have you, since you have been a member of the committee, been able to form any opinion as to the beneficial effect of the institution—that is, as to how far it has been successful in the objects for which it has been instituted? Certainly; for our means, with regard to the instruction of the children and placing them in situations, we have been very successful in most cases, I think. There have been some cases in which children have not turned out well, which may be expected, of course.
361. Have you been able to trace the after career of the children after they left the school? Yes, in many cases I have done so. During the term of their apprenticeship it is a part of my duty to inquire into the way in which they are treated by their masters, and how they conduct themselves; and after they leave their situations we hear occasionally from them.
362. You communicate with them, while they are in their situations, through the priest of the parish? When a child is apprenticed I always write to the priest of the district and inform him of the apprenticeship, and tell him to take special care of the child, and look after his interests, and report to the committee.
363. Has any record been kept as to what has become of the children from time to time after they have left their situations? I do not think that any record is kept as to what becomes of them after they leave their situations. They may probably communicate with the matron in some instances, but there is no official record.
364. As a rule, do you think you have been more successful with the boys than with the girls? It is very hard to say. Indeed, I have before my mind now some cases of boys who have not turned out well; but I cannot answer your question.
365. Can you give us any idea as to what proportion of the children do not turn out well? It is very small. I should think it was under 3 per cent.—it is not so much as 3 per cent. I really cannot answer accurately, because I have not seen the records for some time.
366. How many children are apprenticed in the course of the year? That I cannot say. At our last meeting there were four or five applications, and the applicants were promised that they should have apprentices when there were some in the school ready to go out. I may say that the records of all these things are kept at the institution, which I only visit periodically.

Very Rev. S.
J. A. Sheehy.

19 June, 1873.

367.

- Very Rev. S. J. A. Sheehy. 367. Does there seem to be a desire to get these children as apprentices? Yes, there are always more applications than we can supply.
- 19 June, 1873. 368. Do you lay down any rule as to sending children to the country, or do you send them to the town as well? We prefer sending them to the country. For my part I think it is better for the children that we should do so. In the country they are not exposed to the temptations to which they would be exposed in town.
369. The majority then are sent to the country? Yes. There are some in Sydney, but they are, as far as possible, apprenticed to tradespeople.
370. There are no facilities at the school for teaching them trades? No. With regard to that, I may be permitted to remark that it was the desire of the committee to teach them trades, but our powers are very limited, as they were defined some three or four years ago by the Colonial Secretary. We were then instructed that our powers merely extended to the apprenticing of the children. I think that, some time before, a representation was made as to the desirability of the children being taught trades at the school, but we have no power to appoint any one to teach them. I think that they could be taught there, but we have not been able to do it; we have no power whatever.
371. Are you acquainted with the Randwick institution? I have visited it sometimes.
372. Are you officially connected with it in any way? No, I am not on the Board.
373. They do teach the children some trades there? So I understand, but there the entire management of the institution is in the hands of a committee, who can employ persons to teach the children trades. At the Orphan School we have no power to employ servants or anybody else. It is a thing we have wished to do.
374. Mr. Metcalfe.] But if there are so many applications for the children, there is no need to teach them trades? Well, we have many children who could be better taught in the institution than they can be by placing them out as apprentices. When they are sent out into the country, there is not the same care exercised as there would be over them by the superiress of the place and the committee.
375. President.] At what age do you send the children out? I think at twelve years of age. I am not quite sure, but I think that that is the age under the Act.
376. Have you ever considered the desirability of keeping large numbers of children together in public institutions in this way—have you ever considered the matter with reference to the idea of putting them out with people in the country? You mean placing them out in families?
377. Yes? I have read about such a system—where it has been adopted in the Old Countries and in Adelaide—but I do not think it has been successful. I do not think that it is advisable to adopt such a system here.
378. What are the objections to the system? Well, I think that it would be very like baby-farming. I do not think that sufficient control could be exercised by persons who have the interests of the children at heart. Even as it is, it is sometimes difficult to get the children properly treated, and I am afraid that if they were placed in families as boarders, they would be taken at a low figure, and as much got out of them as could be got. I think that has been proved by experience, as far as my recollection goes, in Europe. I have seen some reports to that effect.
379. Can you refer us to any reports on the subject? I cannot. I have nothing by me; but that is my impression.
380. But do you not think that the natural tendency of this system of bringing up children together in these public institutions is to destroy a child's individuality, and that his peculiar characteristics, on the proper bringing out of which his future success in life depends, must be to a very great degree lost sight of? I dare say that there is some truth in that. In large institutions it may be the case. I have no doubt that if a child could be placed in a family, and there was a certainty that he would be well treated, that would be the best thing for him; but I have little confidence that he would be well treated.
381. Why do you think that children sent out to families in that way would be worse treated than the children whom you send out to families now? From the difficulty of inspection. There would have to be a very active supervision exercised over the children, and I do not see how it could be done.
382. Do you not think that, there being less poverty among the people here, and the necessaries of life being more plentiful here than in England, there would be less temptation on the part of persons who took charge of such children to deal unfairly with them? It may be so, but still the system would not answer.
383. Now that there are so many schools all over the country, do you not think that that further gives us an advantage over the Old Countries in carrying out such a system? It might in that respect.
384. Do you not think that one reason why the system has failed in Old Countries may have been the dearness of food—meat being dearer there and all the means of living—that there is not the temptation here to starve children that there would be in the Old Country? I think it is in human nature, that when a child is young and has no friends, he is not treated as he should be; and I do not think that these children, if they were farmed out, would be treated as they should be. It is perhaps a prejudice of mine, but I do not see it.
385. What I cannot understand is, how it should be worse for the children, under such a system, to send them out, than it is under the present system? Under the terms of the Act under which the children are at present placed out in that way, those who receive the children are now bound to look after them closely, and they are looked after; but even in these cases I am aware that the children are not always well treated, and under the plan you propose I am sure that unless the Government exercised a very active supervision, the children would not be properly taken care of.
386. Have you had any instances of that sort under the present system? Yes, I have had complaints.
387. Which were well founded? Yes, in some cases the children had just cause of complaint.
388. What has been done in such cases? In some cases the child has been removed. If a complaint is made by a child, or by any one who has the child's interest at heart, and it is well founded, we call the person before us, and either advise him to return the child or we remove it; or if the complaint is not well founded we caution the child about it.
389. Have any children been returned on the ground of their misbehaviour? Yes, they have.
390. How often does that occur? I cannot say exactly. I should say that there have been two or three cases within the last year of children who have been returned in that way.
391. How long do they remain in the place after they are returned? There are generally more applications for apprentices than we can find children for. If a child is sent back from Sydney, and there is an eligible place in the country, he is sent there.

392. Up to what age are they apprenticed? I think that they are apprenticed for seven years—from five to seven years—but I am not quite sure. Very Rev. S.
J. A. Sheehy.
393. And after that all control over the child is lost? We have nothing more to do with them. They apply to the committee and receive the money placed to their credit, and we have no more to do with them. 19 June, 1873.
394. What money is that? The fees paid by those who take the children.
395. How much do they pay? £3 a year.
396. And they find the child in clothes besides? Yes.
397. And the money is given to the child? Yes, on the termination of the apprenticeship.
398. Without any deductions? Without any.
399. Do you think that it is desirable at present to increase the number of children at present in the school? No, the school is too crowded at present; but even if it were not, I am not in favour of having a large number of children together in one institution—not a very large number.
400. Why not? I think the control is better where you have only a small number, and that is the opinion now prevalent at Home, where it is considered that the size of these institutions should be reduced. I think that the children are more easily controlled. We have, I think, 300 in the Orphan School, and that is quite a large enough number for any place.
401. Is there anything that you would wish to mention with regard to the Orphan School—anything that may be desirable for its improvement? Yes; first of all as regards the accommodation—it is entirely too small for the children who are there at present.
402. Is it over-crowded? Undoubtedly it is. Then I think there would be great good effected if there were facilities for training the children in the institution,—teaching them trades, and to work on the farm there. There is a farm attached to the place, but there are no means of teaching the children how to cultivate it. There is only a labourer on the place. The children do work there.
403. I suppose that you would be averse to breaking up the school for the purpose of bringing the children together in a larger establishment? Of course, as a clergyman, I must be averse to that. If you wish for my reasons on that point, I can give them to you.
404. I think you had better? That school was given to us by Sir George Gipps, as a Denominational Orphan School. Before that, the children were all together; afterwards, we had a small grant of, I think, £300 a-year. The school was handed over to us by Sir George Gipps. As a clergyman, I think that the children of any special denomination would be better instructed as members of the Church to which they belong, by being removed from the children of other denominations. We have our practices of religion to teach them, and the doctrines of the Church to teach them, which can be more easily done by keeping the children apart.
405. Are not your doctrines taught to the children of your denomination at Randwick? To a certain extent, I believe, but there are not the same facilities for it there as there are in the Orphan School, of course.
406. Do you not think it would be advantageous to put the children all together in one large institution, with a view to getting them taught trades—looking at the claims of all denominations, would it not be better to treat all alike, and make one large school as perfect as possible, as far as regards teaching the children how to earn a living? That is begging the question. It is taken for granted that they do get better education, which I do not admit. If they can receive as good an education, and, in addition to that, be taught their own doctrines, and be brought up as members of the Roman Catholic Church should be, I do not see the advantage of joining with any other body.
407. Granted: but is it not more expensive to the State to separate the children;—has not every denomination an equal right to a school, if the expense is paid out of the public funds? That is not exactly the question.
408. It is a question for the politician, is it not? Not one for me to touch on, I think. With regard to Randwick, there is now a large number of children there, and I imagine if there were 300 more added to them, the same staff of teachers would not be sufficient, and then the expenditure would be increased. Whether it would be more expensive to have more teachers than to have separate institutions is another matter.
409. But there is another alternative. If the Government, taking the two Orphan Schools at Parramatta, should add one to the other, and finding a more efficient staff, teach the two together? The question is, whether it would be more expensive or not.
410. Mr. Ellis.] Do you know the average cost per head of the children in the Orphan School? Yes; including everything, I think that they cost a little over £13 per head.
411. President.] Do you happen to know what is the cost per head at Randwick? I do not. I know that at one time the committee of the Orphan School applied to the Government for leave to do as is done at Randwick—provide for the children themselves. They pointed out that they could carry on the institution at less expense than was incurred by the Government. By calling for tenders for supplies and so on, they could manage the institution much more economically; but it was not allowed.
412. It could be more cheaply managed if the committee carried it on? Yes, if the committee were placed in the same position as the committee at Randwick is, I believe that they could manage it more economically.
413. Mr. Metcalfe.] The Orphan School is supported entirely by the Government? Yes.
414. There are no subscribers whatever? None.
415. You say that the number of children who have not turned out well is in the proportion of about 3 per cent.—that is, of boys and girls? Yes. I have no statistics of those who have come before the committee, but the complaints have been very few.
416. To what class of people do you apprentice the girls? We send them as domestic servants, and in some instances send them to dressmakers.
417. How far should the Government go in taking care of orphan children—It seems that all these children have mothers living: do you think that it is the duty of the Government in an unlimited manner to take care of the children of poor women? Certainly not; but in regard to these children, it is certified that the parents are not capable of supporting their children, from some cause or another.
418. But we are told that children are sometimes taken away by their mothers, and brought back again? As far as I am concerned, I have been against that. If the mother is represented as being able to take charge of the child, I should hesitate to recommend to the Government that it should be admitted.
419. President.] Do you admit the children? No; we cannot admit or refuse—we can simply recommend.

- Very Rev. S. J. A. Sheehy. I do.
420. But we are told that it is the case? Then you have been told by some one who knows better than I do.
421. Would you not allow them to go back? I do not say that. It might be a very hard case. It might be that the woman has got into better circumstances, and applies and gets her child out.
422. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you think a child should be taken in when the parent is living and in a sufficiently strong state of health to gain a living? Yes, I do. The woman may find it difficult to get a living, or may be supporting other children.
423. Do you think that much can be done in the way of teaching children trades before they are thirteen years of age? I do not think so. They are engaged in school duties, and cannot be taught much before that age.
424. You would not wish them to neglect the school duties? I think if they were taught trades in the place, it would lessen the expenses of the institution. The children could provide the shoes, &c., for the establishment.
425. But they should be out earning their own living if they are able to do that? Yes. At present they are not put to any such trades. There are no means of teaching them, and there is no discretion allowed to those who are in charge of the place.
426. Mr. Ellis.] What are the duties of the committee? In the beginning the committee had the entire management of the place, but within the last three or four years the power was taken out of our hands by the Colonial Secretary.
427. What are your duties now supposed to be? We are in rather an anomalous position. We had a letter from the Colonial Secretary stating that our duty was to apprentice the children, and we confined ourselves to that for some time. Afterwards, when Mr. Cowper was in office, he wrote and asked us to resume our duties again as a committee, and we have done all that we could—visiting the place and seeing that everything went on properly; but I have felt that we had no control.
428. What duties did he mean that you were to resume? That was never defined.
429. What duties have you resumed? The inspection of the place, holding examinations from time to time among the children, and so on.
430. It is, then, rather a general supervision, than any active interference in the affairs of the institution? Yes. We felt that we could not actively interfere, because of the minute which had been published by Sir James Martin. They seemed to think that we were taking the place out of the hands of the Government.
431. President.] Is that the minute you refer to (document handed to witness)? That is the minute I have been speaking of. (See Appendix C.) We never claimed any absolute or final authority.
432. Who has charge of the place? The matron. Any one receiving a salary beyond a certain amount is under the Colonial Secretary, so that in point of fact the committee feel that they have no power whatever. If there is a complaint among the servants, they refer to the matron. If there is a complaint among the teachers, the drillmaster, or any one else—they are employed by the Colonial Secretary, and they know that we cannot dismiss them, or anything else. There was a case occurred the other day—there was a little disturbance—and we gave them a little advice, exhorted them to settle the dispute; but we knew that if they liked to defy our authority, they could do so.
433. Mr. Ellis.] Then, with the exception of apprenticing the children, you have no power whatever? I think not.
434. It is only by a kind of sufferance that you exercise the powers which you exercise now? I feel in this way, apart from my duty as a clergyman, that I like to see how things are carried on, but I refrain from calling any one to order.
435. Your duties have not been defined since you received the letter from Mr. Cowper? No.
436. President.] Have you a copy of that letter? It is in my office.
437. Would you mind letting us have a copy of it? Certainly not; you can have it. (See Appendix C 1.)
438. Mr. Metcalfe.] You do not think that the system which is in force at Randwick prevents children there being made good members of your Church? I do not approve of the system at Randwick at all. I attended that institution myself at one time, when it was at Paddington, and I found that our children were, as regarded their religious observances, merely tolerated in the place, and that was a degradation to which they should not have been subjected. I may quote an instance:—When I was clergyman of the district of Paddington, I went to the institution to give instruction to the children. There was little accommodation in the house. When the other clergymen went to give instruction to the children of their denominations, the other children were sent out of the schoolroom; when I went, the children to whom I gave instruction were sent out into the wash-house or some other place of the kind. That sort of thing is not done now, but still there is something in Randwick which is not quite pleasant; there is not the same facility for giving our children religious instruction there that there is in other institutions; there cannot be that constant supervision over them.
439. President.] That strikes against the Public School system? It would of course.
440. Mr. Metcalfe.] Cannot the children grow up to be good christians in that way? Where there is any dogma you must have separation. As a clergyman, I cannot give it as my opinion that the Sunday Schools are sufficient for the purpose of teaching religious practices. We require to have the constant care of the children, and, in various ways, during school hours and at all times, we instil a love of religion into them.
441. President.] But where children are to be maintained at the public expense, is it not our duty to accommodate ourselves to circumstances as much as we can? Oh, no doubt. Supposing that the system was established, and I was asked to do what I could to carry it out, I would do so; but here we have a system, and I am asked to give it up and make the best of it.
442. When the change comes you will make the best of it? I should be sorry to look forward to such a change.
443. Mr. Goold.] Has it ever struck you that the facilities for entering these schools—as well as most other charitable institutions here—are too great; what I mean is, that from the ease with which parents can get their children into these Orphan Schools, they often do get them in, whereas if there were more trouble in doing so they would support the children themselves? There may be some cases of that kind, but I think that in general the parents are in distress. With regard to the Orphan School, all precautions are taken to ascertain that the children are such as should be admitted, before they are recommended to the Government. There is a certificate from a clergyman or from some person who knows the circumstances of the case, and upon that we forward the recommendation to the Government.
444. Are not clergymen much imposed upon by the representations of parents, who make them for the sole purpose purpose of getting rid of their children and the expense of maintaining them? Yes, I believe so, but then the recommendations of some clergymen I do not look upon with much confidence, and, as a matter of course, if we can get other testimony we look for it.

Very Rev. S.
J. A. Sheehy.

445. Do you not think that intemperance has had a great deal to do with the pauperism of the parents, and their consequent inability to support their children? I am not in a position to say that, but I do not think that we have anything to do with the cause. If the children are destitute, it matters not what the cause of the destitution may be.

19 June, 1873.

446. No, unless we can devise some means of reaching the parents and compelling them to support their children, instead of throwing them upon the State? In these cases the head of the family is supposed to be dead, or out of the Colony, having deserted his children.

447. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you not think that if a small sum, say 1s. per week, were demanded from the parents, it would be paid? If it were placed in the hands of police for collection, it might be paid, but no one else could get it.

448. Do you not think the threatened expulsion of the child if the money were not paid would make them pay? I do not think it would. There is a difficulty in dealing with a mother who may bring her child there, and perhaps within a month's time she may be at the other end of the Colony.

449. But parents go frequently to see their children? Yes, they do.

450. Do you not think that the indiscriminate introduction of such children into an asylum must tend to pauperize the minds of the people? I really do not know. I know there are some people who would be glad to throw off the responsibility of maintaining their children, but I do not think it is the fact in many cases.

451. President.] Is there anything else which you would like to add? No, I do not think there is.

James Mullens, Esq., Member of the Committee, Parramatta Roman Catholic Orphan School, called in and examined:—

452. President.] I believe that you are one of the committee for apprenticing the children of the Roman Catholic Orphan School, Parramatta? Yes.

J. Mullens,
Esq.

453. How long have you been on the committee? I think going on twelve years.

454. What are the duties of the committee at the present time? Well, we have meetings once a month, but the duties I can hardly define. The committee have very little power. They apprentice the children, and even that they have no power to do without submitting the names to the Government.

19 June, 1873.

455. They have nothing to do with the admission of children to the institution? No; they cannot even admit a child.

456. We have been told by the Vicar-General that, some time ago, the committee were given to understand that their duty was solely to see to the apprenticing of the children, and that since then they have received a letter from the Government asking them to resume whatever authority they had before—are you aware of that? Yes, but in some things only. We did not get the power. We never got the authority, for if we ever wanted to have anything done we were obliged to apply to the Government; formerly that was not the case.

457. Since you received the letter you have not exercised this supposed power? We were not allowed to exercise it. We went on in the same way, being only allowed to apprentice the children.

458. Is it a fact that you have never done more than apprentice the children? We tried. We made applications for many things, but we were not allowed to do anything. There was a fence wanted there, and we had no power even to have that erected. We had no funds at our disposal, and I suppose that even if we had funds at our disposal we could not order the work to be done.

459. Mr. Sheehy stated that some dispute took place between some persons on the establishment—do you know anything about it? There was a complaint.

460. Was the complaint made to you? We were told that there was one individual who had a charge to make against another, and we thought it our duty to inquire into the charge, with a view of reporting upon it to the Government if it was necessary. We had the man who was to make the charge sent for, and we asked him about the matter.

461. Who was the man? One of the schoolmasters. The drillmaster, I think, we wanted, and he had no charge to make.

462. Against whom? The other master. Some little difference they had, and he said he would not make any charge at all.

463. Nothing came of it then? Nothing then; but afterwards he made a complaint, and we inquired into it, and we found that it was not worth making any more of it. It was only a charge about his being a quarter of an hour late one morning, I think. But with regard to the other charge, when we called him in and asked him what he had to say, he said he would have nothing to say—that he had forgiven the party—and we did not consider it our duty to go into the matter, because he said he did not want to make any charge. Then something occurred the next day, and he made a charge against the same person for being a quarter of an hour late.

464. Can you tell us what success you have had in apprenticing children from the school? I think, as far as my experience goes, that the children have been well provided for. Some did not turn out well, as you will naturally expect, but on the whole they have behaved exceedingly well.

465. Do you know how many are sent out every year? I cannot tell. Some years there are more sent out than in others. The children are sent there very young, and according as they grow up to twelve years or thirteen years, we send them out. There are plenty of applications for them.

466. Have you been more successful with the children who are received young than with those who are received at a greater age? Nearly all the children there are, generally speaking, received young; when I say young, I mean eight or nine years of age, or perhaps ten years of age. We do not get any boys of twelve or thirteen years of age at all.

467. Have you ever considered whether it is desirable to have numbers of children brought up together in this way, in public institutions? I think as these children are, it is a good way of bringing them up. As far as I am myself concerned, if I left my children destitute, I would sooner have them there than in friends' houses—they would be a great deal better taken care of.

J. Mullens,
Esq.
19 June, 1873.

468. Have you formed that opinion from your personal knowledge of the way in which this school is conducted by the present person in charge of it, or have you formed that opinion in reference to such institutions generally? Certainly I speak of it as it is; I speak of the school as it is conducted at present. I do not know what any one else may do; I can only speak of the school as it is.

469. The lady who is now in charge of the school appears to be a lady who takes peculiar interest in the children and studies their dispositions? She does.

470. I wish to know whether you have ever considered the advisability of massing large numbers of children together in this way and bringing them up without home influences, in preference to the idea of getting them taken care of in families in the country? I would not approve of leaving them with families in the country at all.

471. Why not? I have seen so many families neglect their own children, and I think in an institution where there is a regular system, their habits are better formed than they would be in a private family.

472. Is there not as much chance of the children being neglected after they are apprenticed as there is of their being neglected now? But they are older when they are apprenticed, and then there is always some one looking after them when they are apprenticed.

473. But still they are apprenticed quite young enough to be corrupted, if the families to whom they are sent are not well-conducted? But what I infer from your question is, that they are to be sent out young to be brought up by families, instead of being sent to the institution; there is the difference, because they would be sent out so much younger. When they are apprenticed they are able to take care of themselves, but until they are, I think it is better that they should be in the institution.

474. But are they not of an age when they are apprenticed, at which they are more likely to be corrupted, if the moral habits of the family to whom they are sent are not good, than they would be if sent out at three or four years of age? But there is the difference, you see. They are getting up to the age at which we apprentice them. I think that the present system is preferable to sending them out to board.

475. Do you not think that the domestic supervision of a family, however poor in circumstances, would be better for a child than its being brought up in a public institution? You might get one family in a thousand who would take proper care of the children.

476. But do you not think that would be better for the children to begin with? No, I think that some parents' children would be better away from them than with them—even their own children. I think the supervision exercised over the children by persons in the institution would be better than the supervision they would get in some families. Of course it all depends on the people you send them to.

477. But do you not think that the scheme is worth being tried—such a scheme as this—suppose that respectable farmers are looked out for who are willing to take these children for a certain payment per annum, it being provided that they should be sent to some school in the neighbourhood (of course there is hardly a district in which there is not a school)—could not provision be made that the children should be sent to school and properly looked after? I do not think that such a plan would be of advantage to the children, but that on the contrary it would be a disadvantage.

478. Do you not think if they were put with families and accustomed to what they would have to go through, they would be more likely to grow up to be useful, than they are by being brought up in the institution? I think there would not be care enough taken of the children individually, because they would be sent out to work and to do things which they would be unable to do. They would be sent out in wet weather perhaps. The children are much better cared for in an institution like this. There could not be better care taken of children in a parent's house than is taken of them there. Of course higher schools would be better for the children—if there were boarding schools—but I presume you mean that they should be sent out to families and allowed to run about. They would not be taken care of. It could not be expected.

479. Mr. Gould.] Are you aware that that plan has been adopted with the children from the ragged schools? No, I am not aware of it.

480. It has been adopted with great success? I never heard of it before.

481. President.] Are you aware that this plan has been adopted with great success in England? I have never heard of its being a success. But, even if it were so in England, a great many things would be practicable there which would not do here, because England is thickly populated, and families are not so far away from each other there as they are here; here, if you send a child into the bush what care can be taken of it? When we apprentice a child we generally communicate with a clergyman, who takes the child and looks after him; and if there is a complaint made about him, we write to the clergyman at once to know the nature of the complaint, and who is in fault. We look entirely to the children's comforts.

482. Have you not known instances where parents, instead of putting their children into the Orphan School, they had them brought up in this way? I am not aware of anything of the kind in this Country.

483. Supposing the alternative was presented to abolish these Denominational Orphan Schools and put all the children together as in Randwick, or put them out in families in the way I have suggested—which would you prefer? To have them all at Randwick; do you mean all together as they are there?

484. Yes; supposing the Legislature says that it will not support Protestant and Roman Catholic Orphan Schools separately, but that the children must all go together—which alternative would you take? I would sooner they went to Randwick. Of the two evils I would sooner have them sent to Randwick, because I believe there would be better care taken of them there.

485. But which would be the best to advance the children's welfare in life—to mass them together in large numbers in these institutions, or send them out to families in the country: granted that the child in the country may run about barefooted or be sent out in wet weather, would it be any the worse off, as far as regards its ultimate progress in life, than it would be by herding with six or seven hundred others in an institution like this, no one knowing its disposition, and the child itself only known by a number—would it not be better for the child to live in the country air? The two things being so bad, I can hardly decide which would be the worse—it would take me some time to decide. I think both systems are very objectionable; 700 or 800 children would be too many to put into an institution together.

486. Mr. Ellis.] Have you anything to do with the Randwick institution? No.

487. Have you never been there? No, I have never been there, but I have been a subscriber to the institution for many years.

488. President.] Does not the success of institutions of this kind depend on the personal care that is taken of each child? It depends on the way they are looked after. There is great importance in the training of a child and bringing it up for the future—the way it is looked after to form its habits.

489. In point of fact, is not your praise of the Roman Catholic Orphan School founded upon the fact that the lady who is there seems to take a great personal interest in the children—that she studies their dispositions individually? Yes, of course she is very well in her department, but I think the whole of the officials do their duty.

J. Mullens,
Esq.
19 June, 1873.

490. Is not her personal interest in the children the marked feature there, in your opinion? I cannot go so far back as to give an opinion. I know at the time I was first connected with the school the committee had more power there—we were able to exercise more power, and it was from that circumstance the institution sprung up to what it is. We had power to build—we had power to advertise for tenders—we had power to do all these things. Money was placed to the credit of the school, and the accounts were paid by the Government.

491. But these powers have not been exercised for some time? Not for some time, but the thing goes on in exactly the same way—the only difference is we have less power.

492. But would not all your efforts have been futile but for the great efficiency of the matron there and the ladies under her? Of course we saw that she was efficient for that, and if she was not we would have got some one else again.

493. You know that it is difficult to get persons to take charge of children in this way? I do not know. When we wanted persons there, we had no difficulty in getting them.

494. Mr. Gould.] Don't you think that the success of an institution of that kind depends more on the matron than the committee? I do not know; I think that a committee to direct an institution like that should be experienced persons, and have power over the matters they are called upon to manage.

495. President.] Does not the successful bringing up of children depend on the domestic supervision? Yes.

496. Does that depend on the committee? Indirectly it does, because we call for reports as to the state of the school. If there are more children in the hospital, for instance, than usual, we ask the reason. We see that all is going on right, that the food and clothing are satisfactory and so on, and see that everything is in proper order.

497. Mr. Ellis.] By virtue of what authority do you do that? We had this authority at first—but our authority was disputed at one time, but we remained looking after the institution as we did before.

498. But exercising no powers? No powers at all. We could not take on a servant or an officer—we could not even dismiss a servant.

499. President.] Then the matron could refuse to send in a report if she liked? She could if she liked, and we then report her to the Government.

500. For what—a breach of etiquette? For not giving us the report. I do not know what the rules are, whether they would compel her to do it or not.

501. Mr. Ellis.] Have you no powers at all? We had powers at first.

502. Those powers were taken-away from you? They were taken away. We were told to send to the Government, and they would do whatever we wanted.

503. And after that you got a letter from Mr. Cowper asking you to resume your duties? Yes.

504. What duties did you resume? We had no power to resume our duties—they were never defined. We had no more power beyond apprenticing the children. We took no additional power. If we wanted a chimney swept, we had to send to the Colonial Architect to get it done.

505. You exercise a general supervision only? No more.

506. President.] Have you ever, on the strength of these reports, found fault with the officers there? Oh, yes.

507. How long since? One of the schoolmasters, some time since, defied us to interfere with him, and I went to Mr. Cowper and reported it, and he gave me authority to send up and have the man suspended.

508. By whose act was he suspended? By Mr. Cowper's. The Vicar-General was at Parramatta the same day.

509. Did you hold an investigation into this man's conduct before reporting him to Mr. Cowper? Yes, both before and after we did that.

510. Was the man dismissed? He was dismissed.

511. Mr. Ellis.] Are the committee appointed by the Government? Yes.

512. Do you not think that the Government should define their duties? Yes, I think that they should.

513. Do you think that it would be for the benefit of the institution that enlarged powers should be given to the committee of management? If we had powers the same as a committee should have, and if the servants there knew that we could exercise such powers, it would have a greater effect upon them than it has now.

514. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is not the institution very well managed now? Yes, very well.

515. Then are you not better without the powers than with them? But there are many things which we require to have done. There are many things for the benefit of the institution which, if the committee had more power to do, would be a great advantage. As far as the management of the place goes, it is very well conducted. Our supervision goes on just the same as if we had the greatest power.

516. President.] Do you not think that you have been very fortunate in getting the kind of lady that you have got there? Yes, I do think so indeed.

517. Has she not done what she has done there under the greatest disadvantages? Yes, she has given her heart and soul to the good of the place.

518. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not think the girls there ought to have a decent lavatory? Yes, they should have it. We made representations about it a long while ago.

519. President.] Do you know whether any representations have been made about the stench arising from the main sewer from the gaol? Yes, long ago.

520. Do you know whether it has been reported that what has been done is not effective to stop the nuisance? I do not know. I am not aware of that.

521. Do you think that it is desirable to increase the number of children in the school? With more accommodation I think that it could be managed.

522. Up to what number would you increase the school, supposing there were more accommodation provided? I think we could manage 400 children there very well.

523. Do you place that limit upon the number? Well, it would all depend on the amount of accommodation provided in the place.

524. Suppose that there were accommodation there for 1,000 children? No, that would be too many to have in one place.

- J. Mullens, Esq.
19 June, 1873.
525. Mr. Ellis.] What is the largest number of children that you would have there? I should think that 400 would be enough to have in any school, if they were to be looked after properly.
526. Mr. Metcalfe.] To what extent should the Government admit persons at all to institutions of this kind in a population like this? I do not see where you can draw the line. If there is sufficient accommodation, children should be admitted wherever the necessity arises. When we went there first the accommodation was very bad. We had a wing built where the girls' school is now. We were allowed to supervise those buildings and alterations ourselves. We called for tenders, and submitted the plans to the Government.
527. Do you think that the buildings should be added to as long as there are applications for the admission of children? No, I do not think that could be done.
528. President.] You would limit the number of children to be put together there? I think so.
529. Is not your reason for that, that the institution can only be useful when the domestic supervision was tolerably perfect? I think so.
530. Then would you go on establishing small institutions of the kind for every denomination? No, I do not think so.
531. But is not each denomination equally entitled to have one? Yes, but they have not all sufficient numbers of children to provide for. The numbers of most of the other denominations are very small.
532. But do not these institutions become more perfect when they are small? Yes, they do, of course. The fewer children there are in an institution the better for the children; but the other denominations are much smaller than ours, and I presume that the Government would not give an institution where there are only one or two of a religion.
533. Mr. Goold.] Suppose that the Presbyterians were to make a claim for an Orphan School? I would not complain.
534. Would you be in favour of allowing them one? Yes, I would.
535. Would that not increase the expenses of the State? I would be well satisfied to do that.
536. But would the general public be satisfied? I do not know. I speak for myself. We have to pay our own expenses in going up to the school, and we spend our day in the duty. We never have a farthing even for 'bus hire.
537. President.] Do you think that the Government ought to pay that? No, I do not; I would be content to pay it. I do not go into the institution for pay—not at all; but I do not think that it would do the Government very much harm to give free passes to persons visiting these institutions. I think that this committee is the only one that does not get their expenses paid in going to these institutions.
538. Mr. Metcalfe.] I do not think that there is a committee of the Protestant Orphan School? They may perhaps do without one, but the question is would it not be better managed with one.
539. President.] To the performance of what functions by the Board or committee do you attribute the success of the Roman Catholic Orphan School? I think it is due to the care and diligence displayed by those who are immediately in charge of the institution, and the interest that all persons connected with it take in the place.
540. Do you not think that the matron there, Mrs. Adamson, would take just as much interest in the children if there were no committee at all? I think so; but suppose that she were laid up, or that she wanted advice, she had the committee to advise with, like the manager of a bank, who has the directors to advise with. I may get on very well in business, but I may take the advice of a friend in any cases of doubt. I think that the committee are of great assistance to the matron in that way. She is fully competent to carry on the place; but if we had more powers over the servants of the institution there, and had them all immediately under us, the power to deal with them without appealing to the Government, very often we should get on better with matters there than we do. We could prevent many abuses that we notice.
541. What abuses do you see? Many things about the place. One day we went up to the school and found the boiler out of order, and we had no power to get it repaired.
542. But you spoke just now of having power over the servants? I am not speaking of the domestic servants, of course; the matron has power over them; but the drillmaster and the schoolmaster and others should be under our control. We have no power at all. We have no power even to apprentice a child without the consent of the Government.
543. And yet the institution is getting on admirably? Yes, it is.
544. Mr. Goold.] Is the school under the Council of Education? Yes, it is, as far as the inspection.
545. Has the inspector reported favourably upon it? I do not know when he reported last. One inspector some time ago reported that the place was dirty, and shortly afterwards Sir James Martin and Lady Martin visited the institution, and they were surprised with the place—surprised that a bad report should have been sent in about it.
546. When was the report sent in? I think it was immediately after Mr. King's appointment.
547. President.] The adverse report was from him? Yes, against the institution.
548. In what respect was it adverse? He said that it was dirty and badly managed, and that the children were dirty; and afterwards, when the Governor and others went up, they looked to see if there were any vermin about the place, and they were surprised to find that everything was in such good order.
549. You think that the report was ill-founded? Yes, I am sure of it.
550. There was no alteration in the place after the report was sent in? Not the least; it was always the same.
551. Mr. Ellis.] How long afterwards did Sir James Martin go up there? About twelve months after.
552. Mrs. Adamson has been there for some time? Yes, ever since I have been there.
553. And the place has always been the same? Yes, in point of cleanliness. We applied to have the infirmary painted (once we could have had it done ourselves), and we could not get it done for a couple of years, although it was a disgrace to the Government. I would be very sorry to keep property of mine in the same state without painting it. We had no power to get it done. I believe the matron planted some trees there—bought them herself and put them in, in order to make the place look a little better.
554. Was there any protest made against Mr. King's report? I forget whether there was or not.
555. Can you suggest any means by which the labour of the children could be utilized? I think I ought to have mentioned, when the President asked me about the training of the children on the establishment, that we have a farm there, and the children go to it and work sometimes.

556. Is there any one to instruct them there in farming? Yes, there is a man there, and the drillmaster goes with the children to the farm.

557. What are they taught? To cultivate the farm, and they also cut the wood for the place. The boys are not idle—they are always doing something.

558. But are they taught to do anything useful? We cannot teach them trades. As soon as they are able to do anything, they go out of the school.

559. But at Randwick the children learn trades: suppose that you had the means of teaching the children trades, could they not be made to learn trades? We send them out for that purpose when they are old enough.

560. But from eight to twelve years of age, could you not teach them? You cannot do much with them at that age. I think that what would be expended in teaching them trades when they are so young might be better expended in other ways.

561. President.] Are the children apprenticed when they are twelve years of age, or thirteen? Some boys of twelve are able to go out, but sometimes they do not go until they are thirteen.

562. You send them out when they are thirteen years of age? There are some who do not go out until they are fourteen years old.

563. Mr. Ellis.] My question was as to whether the labour of the children could not be turned to profitable account in the institution if there were persons to instruct them, as at Randwick? I think so.

564. President.] What is the cost of the children per head? I do not think that the cost comes to £14 per head. I think it is something like £13—I do not think it comes to £14.

565. Mr. Ellis.] Have you any figures to which you can refer us to show the cost? Some short time ago we went through the expenses and took the average, and I think we made out that the cost was about £13 a head. I know that it was under £14—a good deal under £14; and then I think we could make it come less if we had full power to make the contracts for the supplies.

566. President.] Where could you save? In many things, because we could get quantities of things at a cheap rate when the Government could not. They have contracts for large supplies. I do not know what the tenders are, but I think that we could manage, if we had the tenders to deal with, to bring them lower than they are now. I have no doubt of it at all. I know that if we had to say that there was so much money to be allowed for certain things, we should get them at that price. It would be done by getting stocks in quantities, and buying them when there is a glut in the market. We could get the goods in that way for a good deal less.

567. Mr. Gould.] Is not the institution supplied by contract? Oh yes, by Government contract. I hear that at Randwick a great many things are bought by merchants for the institution, who thus get the goods for them much cheaper than they would otherwise get them.

568. Mr. Ellis.] You think that if the committee had the whole management of the Orphan School, they could manage it much more cheaply than it is managed at present? I am sure of it.

569. What saving could be effected? I should think a saving of more than £1 a head.

570. And supplying everything of as good quality as is supplied now? Everything.

571. And, I presume, making the baths and other appliances somewhat better? Oh, there is no accommodation for the children there at all now, as far as baths go. It is only a wonder that the children are so well as they are, considering how badly they are supplied. They were a long time without a bath-room itself.

572. Have you ever complained to the Government about the state of the bath-room? Yes, repeatedly, and they have never noticed our request—never noticed it at all.

573. President.] Do you know that none of the girls do any work for the institution in the way of making clothes? I do not know.

574. Your attention has never been directed to that? It strikes me that they do some work; yes, I have seen the girls sewing there.

575. But the matron tells us that they do not make clothes for the institution? I do not know. I have seen them sewing.

576. Are you aware that at the Protestant Orphan School the children make very large quantities of clothes? They may be older children there.

577. Mr. Ellis.] What fees or wages are paid by masters for the children apprenticed to them? £3 a year.

578. To whom is that money paid? It is paid to the chairman—to the Savings' Bank—for the chairman of the committee.

579. What is done with that money? It is left in the bank until they are out of their time—it is allowed to accumulate in the bank, and when the children have finished their apprenticeship they get their money, so that of course a boy who serves an apprenticeship of seven years gets £21 to start with at the end of his time. At first the money used to be paid in to the names of the children themselves, and a great many would lose their money, being induced by their mothers to draw it out; and of course if a boy died, the money would remain in the Savings' Bank. If a master is in arrears with his fees, we always write to the parties calling attention to the matter, and if they don't answer the first letter we write again and make them pay in the money.

580. If they didn't pay, what would you do—do you withdraw the children? No.

581. What then do you do? Well, we hardly have power to summon them.

582. What would you do? We have no trouble about that matter; people hardly ever refuse to pay the money—they are very willing to pay.

583. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you adopt the same course with regard to the girls as you do with regard to the boys? Exactly the same; the money is paid in, and the girls can come and draw their money at the end of their time in the same way.

584. Mr. Ellis.] Do you give any printed instructions to the masters or the children for their mutual guidance, in reference to the apprenticeship, when the children are leaving the institution? When people apply to us for children, we look through their letters and see whether they are proper persons to be entrusted with the care of a child; and if we decide that the applicant is to have one of the children we send him a copy of the rules, and he must sign them and send them back to us. It is a form of application that they send to us, and we hold it as well as the indenture; the master then knows what he has to do with that child. We thought it was best to send one of these to him first of all. (See Appendix D.)

- J. Mullens, Esq. 585. Do the committee sign the indentures? Yes, two of the committee sign them.
- 19 June, 1873. 586. Mr. Goold.] To what trades are the children put, as a rule? We generally like to put them to some good trade—such as tailoring, carpentering, cabinet-making, and so on. Sometimes we are obliged to allow them to go to other trades, and we choose the children that are best fitted for them; for instance, if a blacksmith wants a boy, we send him a strong robust boy.
587. President.] No choice whatever is given to the boy? Oh, no.
588. Mr. Goold.] Do you not allow him to choose at all? No.
589. Mr. Coeper.] If a boy wanted to be a sailor instead of a blacksmith, would you not allow him to be a sailor? No, we could not, unless some captain were to go there for a boy, and we would then ask a boy whether he would like to go to sea.
590. President.] Suppose that two or three people of different trades applied for a boy—would you give the children a choice in that case? No.
591. Mr. Metcalfe.] I suppose the boys have little choice—they know very little of the world, or what goes on outside the institution? Oh, yes; they have perfect freedom—they go to the farm and about the place.
592. You send them into the bush generally? We do not like to send children too far into the bush, where they would not be able to go to church.
593. President.] It is the duty of the clergyman of the district, or at all events it is the system that the clergyman of the district should look after them? Yes.
594. Have you any system as to reports being sent to you with reference to the children? Yes, we write to the clergyman very often to have an eye on them, and let us know how they are getting on. (See Appendix D 1.)
595. There is nothing further—no regular system of reports? No.
596. Mr. Ellis.] Do you often cancel the indentures of apprenticeship? Not often; if a boy does not suit one master we generally try and have him transferred to another master—we transfer the indentures.
597. If you heard of any apprentice being improperly treated, would you consider it your duty to interfere? Decidedly. Even if I heard it direct from the child, it would be my duty to inquire into it and see justice done for the child. I consider that we were appointed solely to look after the children, and that the masters can look after themselves. It is the child we have to take care of.
598. What is the size of the farm that you have attached to the Orphan School? It is about thirty acres, I think.
599. President.] Who is it vested in? The trustees named to the Government and the Archbishop and committee, but I do not know whether it has been vested in them. It was given to us in Mr. Robertson's time.
600. How long ago? Six or seven years ago.
601. Mr. Ellis.] Are there any cows kept there? Yes, and the milk is used in the institution. Vegetables are grown there also.
602. Are the boys taught to milk? No, I do not think so.
603. A great saving I suppose is effected by using the vegetables that are grown upon the farm? Yes, a very great saving. They have plenty of vegetables.
604. President.] Do you not think that the boys should learn to milk? These boys are so very young.
605. Not too young to learn to milk? Yes, I think so. I would not teach them to do things that are too hard for them. The farm is too far away.
606. Mr. Ellis.] How far is the farm away from the school? About three miles—about half a mile by the pathway. If you want to cart anything, it is three miles round by the road, unless you can get permission of persons who own land there to pass through their properties.
607. President.] Is there anything that you wish to add yourself with reference to the school—the improvement of the place and so on? The only thing that I wish to add is (I do not say for myself personally), I think that there should be more power given to the committee. If the Government find that the members of the committee are persons who are capable of conducting an institution, I think that they should have more control, and then the institution could be carried on more cheaply and efficiently.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.

RICHARD DRIVER, Esq., M.P.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.

CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

Timothy Bryau, gardener, Parramatta Roman Catholic Orphan School, examined at the farm attached to the institution:—

- T. Bryan. 608. President.] What are you called here? Farm labourer. That is what I engaged for.
- 21 June, 1873. 609. How long have you been here? Five years last May.
610. What wages do you receive? £35 a year, and rations.
611. Mr. Driver.] Thirty-five shillings a week, or £35 a year? £35 a year.
612. President.] Have you cleared this ground that we see cleared? Yes, I cleared it all. It was, when I first came, just like the bush yonder.
613. How many acres are there in this farm? Either 59 or 69, I am not sure which.
614. How much cleared land is there—what is the size of the garden? There is about 5 acres of land here. I first measured it roughly with a tape.
615. I suppose you grow enough vegetables here to supply the school? Yes, with everything, except some potatoes.
616. Can you grow them in the summer? Yes.
617. The ground is not dry? No, it is very soft.

618. What stock have you here—what horses or cows? There are six cows, and a bull, and a horse, and T. Bryan there are a couple of cows away at grass.
619. Do you supply the school with milk from these cows? We send over about seven or eight quarts 21 June, 1873. every day. They have to buy milk besides. All the milk goes in from here.
620. Mr. Cowper.] How much do you send a day? About seven quarts a day this winter.
621. From how many cows? Three cows.
622. That is very little? These cows calved some months ago, and they do not give much milk now.
623. What do you feed them on? Green stuff. In the summer we have much more milk, and there is daily in summer 34 quarts milk sent to the school.
624. Do you manure the garden? Yes, I put plenty of manure upon it.
625. Of what kind? Stable manure. You see this wood here. I take this wood into town and swap it for dung, as I never get any money to buy manure.
626. But are you not able to get manure for nothing—for the mere trouble of carting it away? No, they charge 2s. 6d. a load for it. There is a great demand for manure here. I swap the wood for it, and of course I do not take in a very big load of wood to swap for a load of manure.
627. What is the price of a load of wood? 2s. 6d., or 3s. or 3s. 6d. and so on. I do not take a big load, but only what I know will suit the dung.
628. President.] How many boys are there employed upon the farm? There is one here always, and there are four boys who attend every day.
629. There is one boy apprenticed to you? Yes.
630. How long has he been here? I do not think he has been here twelve months yet.
631. For how long was he bound to you? Seven years.
632. How many boys have been bound to you since you have been here? One.
633. Where has he gone to? He went away with his mother, who came for him.
634. How long had he been in the school? Which?
635. The boy who went away? I do not know how long he was in the school when he came here.
636. Has this boy you have here now a parent living? Yes; he has a mother, but we do not know where she is.
637. How long is it since she was last seen? I do not know; a couple of years perhaps.
638. Do you find that the boys take to the work of the farm? Well, I have to put a bold face on for them sometimes, for they think that I have no right to correct them; but I get on with them pretty well.
639. How do you mean? They think that I should not correct them, or take up a stick to hit them, and threaten them, and make them afraid of me. I don't hit them—I only threaten them.
640. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is that orange orchard over there a part of the farm? No.
641. Whom does it belong to? I have a share of it.
642. Do you work there as well as on the farm? Oh no? There is a great deal of work for me here—more than I can do.
643. Mr. Cowper.] What assistance have you here? There is no one to do the work but myself.
644. Do not the boys work here? Yes, but they do not do much.
645. Did you stump this ground? Yes, I stumped it myself, and it was hard work. I had a hard master before I came here, but I have had to do harder work here.
646. President.] Do you grow all the vegetables for the supply of the school? Plenty of vegetables. I have heard the matron say there was too much. The first year I was here, there was an account of the vegetables taken, and there were twenty-two tons when it was made up; and I have had a great deal more than that since.
647. Is there any sale for vegetables in Parramatta? I do not know. I think there is sometimes in dry weather.
648. Supposing you brought more land under cultivation, and grew more vegetables—do you think there would be any sale for them in Parramatta? Sometimes I could sell them in dry weather. If the summer was dry, I could grow them here, as the garden is moist and handy to the creek.
649. You think the garden is in a good place? Yes, I do.
650. How many boys are sent to you out of the school to work? Three are sent for a week.
651. Are the same boys always sent? No, there is a different set every week.
652. Supposing a set of boys comes this week—how long will it be before the same set comes again? About six weeks generally. Sometimes boys only come once and never come any more, and sometimes I get a strange boy who has never been here before, and who is not of much use.
653. What work do you put them to? Different things. This boy that I have here digs and chips up the weeds, and does things of that kind.
654. Can you graft? Yes.
655. Do you think that this land would grow oranges? I think it would along the slope of the hill there, with a little bit more draining. We have a few young trees there which are doing pretty well.
656. Don't you think that this land here would grow them—the flat land? No; it is too much of a flat—there is no way for the water to run out of this.
657. Mr. Driver.] I see that the trees you have here are diseased? I don't see any disease on any of them—there is a little red scale, that's all.
658. Are not the trees before the door of your house diseased? No, there is nothing but a little red scale on them.
659. I can show you a black scale on them? I have never seen the black scale; I have only seen a little black soot on them.
660. President.] Do you teach the boys to graft? No. I have never grafted much here—only now and again.
661. Mr. Driver.] What stock did you graft the orange trees on? On common-lemon. I do not get my way of doing it, or I would have some Seville orange.
662. What kind of apple do you graft on? Any bit of a root.
663. President.] Have you been used to gardening before you came here? Yes; I have only been working in gardens.
664. Mr. Ellis.] Is your labour sufficient to keep this ground in order? No; I would never do it except for the little help that the boys give me. The ground cannot be ploughed here—it has all to be dug.

- T. Bryan. 665. Do these boys come for a portion of the day or for a whole day? They come here in the morning, go away to their breakfast, bring milk to school, and return after breakfast and dinner, and leave at 5 in the afternoon.
666. While the boys are here they get no schooling? No.
667. This boy who is bound to you gets no schooling? No; he is a good scholar though.
668. I suppose that he lives here? Yes; and these three boys, I don't have them for more than half the day.
669. Mr. Metcalfe.] Would it not be better to have some boys here altogether? I would sooner have them, but the matron is not satisfied to let them come, because she thinks they would lose their schooling.
670. President.] How would it be if they came every afternoon? I would only have a regular half-day out of them then.
671. But you might have the same boys every day? Yes, that would be better, but still I couldn't look after them; I would have to be doing things that they couldn't do, and they might be working somewhere else.
672. Mr. Metcalfe.] But some might be better instructed than others, and better able to do things? Yes. I send this boy to look after them.
673. Is there no one here when you are away? No, only this boy.
674. Do you give the boys tasks? Yes; but if I do, they don't do them; they will throw up a spadeful and cover it over so that you can't see whether the ground is dug or not; they know how to dodge better than any man.
675. President.] What is the best way to set them at work? Just to put them into the work, and show them how to do it, and never give them any share.
676. Mr. Ellis.] Do you think if you had an assistant the institution would gain much? Yes, I think so; supposing there was another man here to look after the cows and grow green stuff, and have plenty of milk for the school. I have to milk seven or eight cows every night and morning; I have to go away twice a week for vegetables for the school; and I have to get the vegetables overnight, for if I waited to get them in the morning it would be near night when I came back; then I have to look after the pigs as well.
677. How many pigs have you? Sometimes six or seven or eight and so on.
678. What is done with them? The matron kills one or two in the year, for the school, and others are sold.
679. So it would be a gain to the school to have an assistant here? Yes, I think so.
680. President.] Do you think that if you had an assistant and took in more ground, do you think you could grow enough vegetables to pay a man's wages? Not by myself. Since I came here, what with one thing and another, half a day is as much as I have been able to work in the garden.
681. Taking everything into account, do you not think the work done by an assistant here would be sufficient to pay a man's wages? Yes, double, if we grew more green stuff. You see that paddock there—I could never attend to it; and another thing, a man could supply the school with wood for years out of this, and that would be another saving; there would be work here for two more men to keep the school in wood and milk, and I could attend to the garden.
682. Are the boys taught to plough? No, there is very little ploughing done.
683. But could you not plough this ground up more quickly than you could dig it? No; the beds are so short that I cannot plough them—I have to dig them.
684. If more ground was taken in to grow green stuff you could plough that? Yes.
685. Are the boys not big enough to be taught to plough? This boy is, but I have so little ploughing to do.
686. Mr. Driver.] I suppose you use a one-horse plough? Yes.
687. Mr. Ellis.] As it is now, you have very little time to attend to the boys? Very little. There is only this boy; I tell him what to do, and he is master over them for the time.
688. But they may not mind him? As long as he is master over them they mind him, and if they please him they don't care about me.
689. President.] Are there any suggestions you would like to make as to the improvement of the farm, or to get the work carried on better? I do not know, unless you get another man to grow green stuff for the cows and another man to supply the place with wood.
690. Mr. Metcalfe.] Would a man supply sufficient to pay his wages? I am sure the supply of milk and wood would pay two men's wages.
691. President.] Do you not think that the boys might be employed to grub up stumps? There is not a boy in the place who would have that stump up in a week—they have not the strength, but they might cut them down with an axe.
692. Mr. Metcalfe.] They allow rations for that boy? Yes.
693. The same as are allowed to the boys at the school? The same ration as I get myself.
694. You find him a bedroom? The school finds him.
695. Does he sleep with your children? I gave him the chance to do so if he liked, but he preferred sleeping in that building.
696. Is he a good boy? Yes; he is rather sulky sometimes.
697. President.] Have you always plenty of water in this creek? Yes, always.
698. Mr. Metcalfe.] How many acres have you got here altogether? I don't know whether it is 59 or 69. When I came here there was a short way into the school, but the overseer of the factory won't let us go through his ground, and so I have to go three miles round to get to the school.
699. President.] Who won't let you go the short way? Mr. Firth of the factory—the Asylum.
700. He will not let you go through his ground? Through the Government ground.
701. Mr. Goid.] Is it public ground? Yes, it belongs to the factory just the same as this belongs to the school; he won't allow us to go through it; he will not even let us cross it on foot.
702. Are there any people of the Asylum about on the ground? A few in the garden; but we would not go through the garden—only through the paddock.
703. You would not interfere with the people? No, not at all.
704. Mr. Metcalfe.] Have you plenty of fruit? No, not much, but the trees have not been long in—they are only four years planted.

THURSDAY, 26 JUNE, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.

RICHARD DRIVER, Esq., M.P.

The Right Rev. Dr. Quinn, Roman Catholic Bishop of the Diocese of Bathurst, called in and examined:—

705. President.] I believe you are Bishop of the Roman Catholic Church for the diocese of Bathurst? The Rt. Rev.
Dr. Quinn.

Yes.

706. I understand that you wish to make some statement to the Committee, or to put before them your views with regard to the Roman Catholic Orphan School at Parramatta, into which we have been inquiring? I do not know much about the Orphan School at Parramatta. I wish to speak about a school I established myself. 26 June, 1873.

707. A school which is not supported by the State? Yes, not in any way supported by the State. I would bring under the notice of the Commission the peculiar way in which this institution is managed, and the cost of maintaining its inmates. The peculiarity of management consists in the children of the institution being mixed up with the children of parents outside. Both go to the Denominational School, and are educated together, wearing no uniform. They thus appear to lose sight of the fact that they are destitute or orphans. I don't know if the Commission has ever noticed that children of large charitable institutions have generally a sad, dejected appearance. The large number, the same size and age, the same dress, and a routine sameness in everything around them, keep continually before their eyes that they are destitute and dependent. This appears to me to be most undesirable, because when the inmates arrive at an age to go into the world, they have lost half their energy and self-reliance. My institution is managed so as to prevent the children as much as possible having this feeling.

708. You think that the system tends to destroy their individuality? Yes, the system of having large numbers together. In my school there has been an average of thirty-six from the commencement. There are at present forty-six. I think we might take in 100, but not more without injuring the system.

709. Orphans? Orphans to a certain degree. Some have lost both parents, some have lost one of their parents, and there are some whose parents are in gaol, so that the children are deprived of their aid. The person we have in charge of the school has a personal knowledge of every child in the institution. There are only forty-six, and she is with them all day, except when they are in school under the care of their teachers. This person is with them all day; she is, in fact, more like a mother to them than anything else.

710. Is she a nun—a sister connected with some religious order? She is. The one person has the care of them entirely. With regard to the cost of maintaining the inmates, the school is in connection with a large convent and boarding-school, and consequently, is less expensive than if it were maintained as a separate institution. Thus connected, each child costs yearly about £8 10s. If it were conducted as a separate institution, the yearly expense of supporting each child would be about £10.

711. Mr. Cowper.] Is that not because the nuns perform their duties without pay—without salary? They have no salary.

712. That is the reason why the cost is so small compared with the cost of other orphan schools, is it not? Salaries, no doubt, are a considerable item in the expense of such institutions.

713. We found, in our examination into the Sydney Infirmary, that there was a great difference between the cost of patients there and the cost of maintaining patients in St. Vincent's Hospital, and we found that the difference was caused by the fact that the officers of the Infirmary were all paid salaries, while the reverend mother and the sisters at St. Vincent's did everything without payment of any kind? No doubt.

714. I suppose then that the same reason applies to the Orphan School you have been speaking of—that is the reason why it is carried on so cheaply? With the additional reason that the institution is carried on in connection with two other large establishments, which, as I have said, considerably diminishes the yearly expenditure.

715. President.] Is there anything further that you wish to add? Nothing more than that it appears to me—but perhaps the Commission would not care to have my opinion —

716. Yes, if you please, we shall be very glad? It appears to me that the provisions of the Private Industrial Schools Act are best suited for the conducting of those Charities. In England, an Act identical in substance and almost alike in words to our Private Industrial Schools Act of 1866 became law in 1869, with the happiest results to society. I believe it is a great pecuniary loss to the State and a great disadvantage to the community at large, that our Act has not been brought into extensive use.

717. Mr. Ellis.] You would be inclined to apply that Act to these Orphanages? Yes, I think that such a plan would be very desirable.718. President.] In this school of yours do you take in an only child—suppose a woman is left with one child, have you any rule regulating the admission of such cases? The necessity of the case is the only reason for admitting any child. We are not bound by any rules, but do what we consider best. If it were a Government establishment, of course it would be regulated by an official of the Government.

719. Do you think it is desirable to take in a child to take care of, where it is the only child a woman has to support? Unless there were special reasons why such a child should be admitted, I would not take it in. The woman should support her child if she was able to do so, but if she were not it should be admitted.

720. Mr. Cowper.] There might be a reason for taking the child in if the woman was going into service and it would be impossible for her to take the child with her? In such a case I would advise the mother to place her child with some friend and pay for it. If she could not find such a friend, I would admit the child, provided she contributed to its support. We have several instances in Bathurst of mothers who followed both these courses.721. President.] Are there not numbers of women with a single child who get along by taking service at a lower rate than they otherwise would do? I believe there are.

722. Is it desirable to make the admissions to these places too easy? I think it is most undesirable.

723. Mr. Metcalfe.] It is only where a mother cannot maintain her children that you would admit them into

- The Rt. Rev. into an orphan school? Yes, that is one case. There are several other cases. Wherever there is a case of real necessity, from whatever cause it arises, aid should be given.
- Dr. Quinn.
- 26 June, 1873.
724. President.] What was your idea with regard to this school you established—as to the Government taking it over, as an Industrial School? I complied with the Act exactly, except as to the building. The Act provides for aid being given to private Industrial Schools.
725. Then you sought to bring this school of yours under the 22nd section of the Industrial Schools Act? Yes. That is, to this effect:—The Colonial Secretary may upon the application of the managers of any establishment in which industrial training is provided and in which children are clothed lodged and fed as well as taught appoint such person as he may think fit to examine into the condition of such establishment and to report to him thereon and if satisfied with such report he may by writing under his hand certify that such establishment is fitted for the reception of such children and such establishment shall thereupon become and be a "Private Industrial School" within the meaning of this Act.
726. The next clause is a long clause, and has reference to the withdrawal of certificate; and the next clause is with regard to children being removed from one school to another? Yes. I think the substance is in the first clause you read. What makes me believe that this is the best mode of conducting charitable institutions is, that there is a good deal left to private effort. The State does not do everything—does not pay the full cost.
727. You think that it is desirable to leave the people to pay part of the cost? Yes, I think that it is very desirable.
728. That the State should not bear the whole of the expense? It appears to me that it is very undesirable, for many reasons.
729. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you say that in no case the State should pay the whole cost? I cannot say that—there might be cases in which the State should pay. If it was a Government institution, for instance.
730. Mr. Ellis.] That is, if it is an exclusively Government institution? Yes.
731. Mr. Cowper.] But in the case of orphans, who is to pay? The parties interested in them should supplement the Government subsidy.
732. The Church, I suppose, or any one who will take the matter up? Yes; there are many institutions partly supported by other parties.
733. President.] In the same way, for instance, as a denominational school is supported? Yes.
734. What proportion do you propose that the Government should pay towards the support of these institutions? Say one-half. It appears to me that when the Government give a certain amount, other parties will then support them; it is a sort of encouragement to them to do so.
735. What is taught in the school which is under your supervision? They get the ordinary education of children outside.
736. They get it in the ordinary denominational school of the place? Yes.
737. Are they taught anything besides that? Yes, they are fitted for the situations which seem to suit their capacities best. Some are taught laundry work, others are prepared to be general servants, cooks, children's maids, &c.; any who manifest more than ordinary talents and are otherwise disposed, get special training, and are taught music, to enable them to take situations as governesses.
738. Mr. Cowper.] At what age are they sent out? At different ages. It depends on the capacity of the child.
739. Mr. Metcalfe.] At what age do they begin to work in the school? At four years of age. They do all their own work from four years and upwards. There are, I think, four of them who are servants in the convent at present.
740. Mr. Ellis.] Are they able to make their own clothes? They make all their own clothes; everything that they wear, except shoes, which of course could not be made by females.
741. President.] They are all girls then? Yes.
742. Has the limitation of the institution to girls arisen from the fact of its being connected with the convent up there? Yes; there are none but females in the place. I contemplate having another school, for boys, and of course that must be conducted by male persons. The only reason I did not get the Government to assist the institution was that the building was not considered suitable. Mr. Parkes was the Colonial Secretary at the time. He chanced to be in Bathurst himself, and he saw the house and said that it was not of a sufficiently permanent character; but since then we have built another house, and I intend to apply again to the Government for assistance.
743. Mr. Driver.] In what situation is this school—in what street or locality? In William-street. Not on the street exactly; it is off the street a bit; it is between William and George Streets; it is near to William-street—between the two, near the Roman Catholic Church.
744. Mr. Cowper.] I understand you to object to taking children into an institution supported wholly or partly by the Government, if their parents, or one parent, is living at the time—What would you propose to do with the child of a man whose wife has died, and who is a great drunkard? No, I do not object to that. I said that there were cases in which it would be desirable to take in such children.
745. What kind of school would you have for such children as that? An industrial school. I think that a man who is a drunkard has no right to have the care of children—that the State should bring them up.
746. But you object to sending children who may have one parent living, to an orphan school—Would not an orphan school be better for them than an industrial school? If a man is able to earn his bread and support his children he should do so. I only object to burden the State with the support of those children who can be supported by their parents.
747. But how would you provide for a case of this kind—the wife dead and the father a drunkard? That would be a case for the consideration of the Government or the party in charge of the establishment. I think it is desirable to take such a child from such a parent; in fact, I think it would be a saving to the State to take up these children and support them; because if they become criminals afterwards, which it is twenty chances to one they will if left so exposed, it is best for the State to take them, even for its own self-preservation. I think you have misunderstood me somewhat. I only said that when a parent is in a position to support a child, I do not think the State should step in and take that child from the parent; but in such cases as the one you have put, it is desirable that the State should support the child. With reference to the industrial school and the orphanage, I think that the orphanage could be conducted on the industrial school system.
748. President.] Have you ever considered the desirability of putting out destitute children with respectable families in the country? Yes. There is a house in Dublin conducted on that system very effectually—it has had a wonderful success; there are 1,000 children under its care now.
- 749.

749. Mr. Cowper.] A house, you say? Well, the ladies who receive the children and send them to the several parties in the country, live in a house in Dublin. The children, of course, are spread over the country. The Rt. Rev.
Dr. Quinn.

750. President.] The organization? Yes, organization—that is the better word. It was a lady who commenced it first—a Miss Eylward—a very charitable lady. She and others wrote to all parts of the Country and got a thorough knowledge of the farmers who would take these children, and by degrees they obtained a large connection throughout the Country, and now I believe they have 1,000 children out in the way I have described. There was a number of these ladies, and they have now united and have a house in Dublin, which is entirely conducted on the principles of charity. These ladies collect the money themselves to pay for these children. 26 June, 1873.

751. President.] Do you know how much they pay a year? I do not know exactly—I think from £5 to £8—I think seldom as high as £8.

752. How long has the system been established? I think since 1863 or 1864.

753. Is it considered successful in its results? Yes. Of course in the Old Country the provision made is not sufficient for all the orphans, as there are so many there, but as far as it goes it is successful; it is one of the most successful establishments in the Country.

754. Mr. Cowper.] Do they attend to the education of these children? The persons who have interested themselves in the institution look to that. They have made themselves acquainted with the whole Country, and they see that the children are placed in localities where they can attend school.

755. Have they inspectors to see that the children are properly cared for? No.

756. Mr. Ellis.] Have they correspondents who keep them informed as to the condition of the children? Yes. They have no paid inspectors, but they have correspondence with persons who see that the children are properly cared for.

757. President.] Bearing in mind what you said just now about a child's individuality being destroyed by his being brought up in a large school amongst several hundred others, do you not think that if a system of the kind you have described could be established here it would be better than the system we now have? I do indeed think so. That is one of the things which I wish to bring under the notice of the Commission. I believe it is desirable that children should be sent to private families. I believe that these large establishments do destroy the individuality of the children.

758. Mr. Cowper.] What should be the greatest number allowed to be together in an institution of the kind? I presume you mean such an institution as I have established. Taking into consideration the size of my denominational school I would receive up to 100, as I have stated above. The efficiency of the system requires that the outside should be very much more numerous than the indoor children of the institution.

759. Would you not find the machinery may be made more perfect where there are several hundreds of children than where there are but few? Not with regard to the individuality.

760. President.] In point of fact, according to your view of the object to be attained, the institution becomes less perfect according as it becomes larger—less like a family? Yes.

761. But even if the children got less education than they do under the present system, would not such a plan be preferable? I believe it would be.

762. They would be no worse off than are most other country children, and they would be much better off than those who are contaminated by town associations? Yes.

763. Mr. Metcalfe.] But would these people in the country be likely to take care of children who were not their own? That would be for the Government to see to.

764. But do you think that they would take care of them? I think so. I think that many would be glad to have the children. I have a commission to obtain two children for people in the country now.

765. Mr. Cowper.] Children of what age? Nine or ten years of age.

766. Have the people, for whom you are to obtain them, any children of their own? One person who applied to me was a farmer with a family reared; and the other person who applied to me was a printer from Bourke.

767. What sort of a child does he want? He wants a boy for his printing office.

768. He would want a boy of about thirteen years of age then? I think about nine or ten.

769. Mr. Ellis.] Considering the value of labour in this Country, do you think that people ought to be paid for taking these children? I think that unless they get them very young they ought to be very glad to take them without receiving any pay. When persons have applied to me for children, I have asked them whether they would feed and clothe them and so on, and I have told them that they would have to give a guarantee that they would do so.

770. Mr. Cowper.] How many children could you place out in your district? I cannot answer that question without making inquiry.

771. Well, can you give an estimate, within a hundred or so—we are supposed to have some 1,400 to dispose of? You could not in this Colony put out 1,400 with farmers. I think not. Of course it would be part of the system that the children should be looked after, and that care should be taken that they were sent to none but proper persons.

772. President.] From what you know of your own district, and of the Colony generally—some parts of it being thickly populated—do you not think that some hundreds of children could be put out in this way? I can scarcely say, but I will get what information I can with regard to that point and furnish it to you. (See Appendix E.) I think that some hundreds might be so disposed of.

773. Would it not be better to adopt such a plan, rather than to increase the size of our orphanages? I think it would be the best plan if it could be worked, and the organization in Dublin is considered the most effectual in the Country.

774. Under that system the children would grow up with some faith in themselves, and with some home associations? Yes.

775. In fact, the children would grow up much more fitted for taking their part in the world than they do in these establishments? Yes, exactly so.

776. Mr. Cowper.] In the case of a respectable woman left with two or three children, what would you propose to do with those children, provided that the mother was unable to look after them, and this system of farming children out was not carried into effect—you say you do not think that they should go into an orphanage, and it is sometimes unpleasant to have to send them to an industrial school—what would

- The Rt. Rev. Dr. Quinn. you propose to do with them? If it were a case deserving of charity, I would propose to send them to one of the schools.
- 26 June, 1873. 777. You do not think these children should be allowed to go astray because they have one parent living—because they happen to have a mother? I do not think that would be desirable.
778. What would you do then? I would take them into the school if the mother was not able to support them.
779. What do you think it is the duty of the Government to do? I think that it is the duty of the Government to take them in.
780. Do you not think it is better to send them to some institution, rather than allow them to go in process of law to some industrial school or reformatory? There would be no difficulty in sending them to a private industrial school.
781. President.] Should not the Government throw the burden of supporting these children as much as possible on the parents? Yes. It would be enough if the Government gave some encouragement—say, contributed a half of the expenses only.
782. Such a system would tend to pauperize the children? Yes.
783. Mr. Cowper.] Should not the parents be compelled to pay for the support of the children? Yes. I have some who pay a portion, but it is very difficult to get them to pay. There was a man came to me whose wife was killed, and who had some children whom I took in. He promised to pay for them, but I have never seen him since. Of course there will always be cases of that kind. The Commission will perceive that, from what I have so far stated to them, according to my views the best way for providing for destitute children is to put them out to respectable industrious farmers; and next to this, to place them in private industrial schools which will be carried on as far as possible according to the family system.

Michael O'Shea, drillmaster, Roman Catholic Orphan School, called in and examined:—

- M. O'Shea. 784. President.] You are the drillmaster of the Roman Catholic Orphan School at Parramatta? Yes.
- 26 June, 1873. 785. How long have you been there? One year and nine months.
786. What pay do you get? £70 a-year.
787. And board and lodging? Yes.
788. Are the boys regularly drilled? Yes.
789. How often? Once a day, with the exception of Saturday.
790. What other duties have you to perform besides that of drilling the boys? I have to see that the boys rise in the morning at 6 o'clock, and to put them to different things, such as cleaning the dormitories, pumping water, cutting wood, and cleaning themselves. There are some to clean up the floors and scrub the tables, and so on; and I have to see that other boys go to the farm for milk; and then to see that they wash themselves before a quarter to 7 o'clock, and have the lavatory cleaned up; then to see them to breakfast, to see that the food is properly cooked, and so on. Then, after breakfast, I see that they do their different works about the place.
791. Do they wash after their morning's work is done? Yes, before prayers, and then when the bell rings they wash again before going into school, and then I muster them over to the schoolmaster and march them into school.
792. How is the rest of your day occupied? Then I may have some clothing to mark, to look after the dormitories, and see that the clothes are sent to be repaired, if there are any that need repairing, and then I teach the boys music, and write music for them. Then at 12 o'clock I drill them until dinner-time.
793. You teach them music? Yes.
794. You have been in the Army? Yes.
795. In the Band? Yes.
796. Mr. Metcalfe.] How many of the boys learn music? Nine.
797. Out of how many? 110.
798. President.] At present you do not supervise the boys in their work at the farm at all? No. In the summer-time I do. I take them there to cut wood; but I do not go there except I am ordered. I have been there, but not for some time.
799. How many boys go to the farm at once? There are four boys there every day.
800. Are they apprenticed there? No.
801. What time do they remain at the farm? They go over for the milk in the morning, come back to breakfast, then go again to the farm and come back to dinner, and then go again and come back at 5 o'clock.
802. They do not get any schooling? They go to the farm for a week, and they do not get any schooling for that week.
803. They are alternately in school and at the farm? Yes.
804. Do all the boys in the school go to the farm in this way? Yes, those who are able to go—those who are big enough.
805. Mr. Metcalfe.] At what age do they go? At about ten years old, or ten and a half.
806. President.] It is at present no part of your duty to go with these boys and see that they do the work to which the gardener puts them? No, except the wood-cutting.
807. You do not supervise their digging in the garden? No.
808. As a mere matter of time you could do so—you would have time to look after them there? No, I would not have time to do that and attend to my other work besides. I would not have time to supervise the digging.
809. Not during any portion of the day? No. It takes me a good deal of time to teach the boys music and write the music for them; that takes up all my spare time.
810. How long are the boys in the music class—those whom you teach? Sometimes not half a day, and sometimes two hours. I have them every day learning music from half-past 6 until a quarter past 7.
811. When—in the evening or in the morning? In the morning.
812. Mr. Gould.] Every morning? Yes, every morning.
813. President.] At what other time do you teach them music? After breakfast I give them a lesson.
814. For how long? For half an hour.
815. Any other time occupied in teaching them music? Yes, when school is out I give them another half-hour.

M. O'Shea.
26 June, 1873.

816. The same boys? Yes.
817. That is taking up a good portion of the day to teach them music in, is it not? I am not with them all the time. I give them certain things to practice, and then I go to other work.
818. What music do you write for them? The generality of music—quadrilles, slow and quick marches, and songs, and so on.
819. Do you make out a copy of everything for each boy? Yes.
820. How much time is occupied in copying the music for them? I generally copy the music at night. I do the writing part then—I do it after hours.
821. If you do that at night, then surely you must have some spare hours to spend at the farm? I have other things to do; there is the marking of the clothes and the sorting of them out, and hair-cutting, and there are many other things, and sometimes I have to go on messages.
822. Do not the ladies who are there mark the clothes? No, not the boys' clothes.
823. Mr. Goold.] What do you mean by marking the clothes—marking them with a number? Each boy has a number.
824. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are not the boys called by their names? We call them all by their names, but in the dormitories they do not call the names out, they call a number out.
825. President.] You know that stench which exists in the infirmary there? Yes.
826. Do you know whether that has been as bad since the Colonial Architect did some works there, as it was before? Yes, just as bad.
827. Do you know whether the closets have got injured at all by the boys in any way? I have nothing to do with that part, so that I cannot answer the question.
828. Who looks after that part? There is a nurse, and the matron supervises the place—the infirmary.
829. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you not think that more boys might be sent to the farm to work than are sent now? Yes, but I suppose the reason why they do not have so many go to the farm is, that they would lose their proper allowance of schooling.
830. There are no boys taught anything but farming, are there? There is one boy apprenticed to the baker, and there is one a pupil teacher.
831. There is no such thing as tailoring or shoemaking going on in the school? No.
832. Can you give us any reason why there should not be some trades taught there? No.
833. President.] As a matter of fact, do all the children at various times go to the farm to work? Yes.
834. How long is it before those who go one week have to go again—how long do they continue going, so as to get all the school there? There are four boys who go to the farm this week, and those four boys do not go to the farm again for about ten weeks.
835. Mr. Ellis.] They cannot learn very much farming in that way? No.
836. President.] They go farming then about once in three months? Yes, and then they go besides to cut wood there.
837. Mr. Metcalfe.] Where does the wood that is used on the place for fuel come from? It is contracted for.
838. It is not got from the land belonging to the school? No, only a portion of it.
839. President.] Do you know whether any of the wood from the farm is sold in Parramatta? No, it is not.
840. Is any of it given in exchange for manure? I do not know.
841. Is there anything to prevent the boys cutting wood there for the school? No.
842. Is there any reason why the boys do not get all the wood from there? The only reason is that the wood is not good burning wood, not of good quality.
843. Mr. Metcalfe.] What wood is it? It is tea-tree, some of it.
844. President.] There is a good deal of gum and bloodwood there, is there not? There is gum there, and bloodwood I think.
845. Mr. Ellis.] Is not tea-tree good burning wood? No, it must be kept for a long time before it will burn.
846. Mr. Goold.] Do you see any reason why the boys should not be at school in the morning, and go to the farm during the after-part of the day? In the summer-time they do that.
847. How many of them go? Twelve of them.
848. How often do they go? Twice a week.
849. And for how many hours are they on the farm then? Two hours and a half.
850. Mr. Metcalfe.] So, in point of fact, when the boys are thirteen years old, and are sent out to situations, they know nothing except what they have been taught in school? That is all. They go away from the place sometimes at twelve years of age.
851. Do you not think that they could be taught at that age? Yes, but there is nothing at the present time which they could learn. There are some boys strong and able at twelve years of age, and others are very weak.
852. Mr. Ellis.] If there were any means of teaching them different trades, do you not think that the labour of the boys could be turned to profitable account? It is according to whatever trades they go to.
853. Could they not be taught shoemaking? They could.
854. And carpentering? Yes.
855. And cooking and baking? There is one boy now employed baking.
856. And what trade could they be taught that would not be profitable? Well, I know one trade myself, from my own experience—though it is one that gentlemen are mostly in favour of teaching them—and that is shoemaking.
857. Do you mean to say that that would not be a good trade to teach them? Yes, I am positive that it would not be.
858. Why? I am a shoemaker myself, and I know it would not be profitable to teach them shoemaking. You would have to pay a master £100 a year, and you would have to buy leather, and things, and the boys would spoil a great deal, and what profit would you have left at the end of the year?—It will scarcely pay the master's salary.
859. Mr. Metcalfe.] Could the boys not make their own boots and shoes? Never; not in twelve months.
860. Do you not know that they do make them at Randwick? I am not aware of it.
861. Mr. Ellis.] We are told that a smart boy there can turn out two pairs of boots in a day? Yes; but look at the time it takes to teach them that—the time that they are at a loss. They would not do any good for two years.

- M. O'Shea.
26 June, 1873.
862. Mr. Metcalfe.] But would it not be a good thing to make a boy skilful and able to earn his own living when he left school? Yes.
863. Mr. Ellis.] Could a boy, who was learning, not mend a pair of boots even if he could not make them? Yes; but I know myself that it is all loss.
864. Mr. Metcalfe.] How long were you apprenticed? For three years.
865. And you gave it up? Yes.
866. Mr. Ellis.] Could not the boys be taught to make all their own clothes? Well, there is not such a loss at the tailoring as at the shoemaking.
867. You are afraid of the waste of leather? Yes; and look at the tools too.
868. But what do other masters do when they take apprentices? When a master has one or two apprentices he can sit down and show them how to do things, but where there are so many they cannot be attended to and looked after.
869. But they would not all be taught the same trade? No.
870. And could not the advanced boys teach the others? Yes. After a few years the trades might be profitable to the institution—I am well aware of that.
871. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you not think that in the last half-year after it was established, it would begin to pay so well as to make up for the losses sustained in the first half-year? Not in the shoemaking, I think.
872. Mr. Goold.] Would it pay in two years? Oh yes.
873. Then would it not be as well to teach the boys shoemaking? Yes.
874. Mr. Metcalfe.] I suppose that you could do a good deal in the way of teaching the boys the rudiments of shoemaking? Yes.
875. Mr. Goold.] Do you know any of the large schools of England or Ireland? No; I am some time out of Ireland.
876. Are you aware that it is the system in England, Ireland, and America, to introduce the teaching of trades into these schools? Yes; I was in Portsmouth and Plymouth, and there were shoemaking, tailoring, and carpentering taught there in the schools; and I was in the Duke of York's Schools, in London, where they are all taught trades.
877. Were you an orphan in any of these schools? No; I just visited them.
878. You think that the system is a good one? Yes.
879. Have you ever suggested to the lady in charge of the Orphan School at Parramatta the expediency of introducing such a system here? No.
880. Mr. Ellis.] For how many hours are the children in school? Five hours; from 9 to 12, and from 2 to 4.
881. Do you think it would be desirable to reduce the school hours, and allow an extra hour or two for teaching the children some trades? Yes; some of the boys could be taught tailoring or shoemaking, and they could be an hour or so extra out of school.

Mr. Edward Marsden Betts called in and examined:—

- Mr. E. M. Betts.
26 June, 1873.
882. President.] You at present hold some appointment in the Gladesville Lunatic Asylum? Yes.
883. You previously held some office in the Parramatta Protestant Orphan School? Yes.
884. What position did you hold there? I was master.
885. How long were you there? Nine years.
886. Were you schoolmaster there? No; I was master—more clerk and storekeeper than head of the establishment.
887. You were not at the head of the establishment? No; the matron was the head.
888. And you were subordinate to her? Yes. I had charge of the boys' department in everything.
889. And you were clerk and storekeeper? Yes. I had charge of the whole of the boys' department, and had to see to their cleanliness, and so on.
890. You must have been very young when you received that appointment? I was about twenty-three.
891. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is the matron your mother? Yes.
892. President.] What salary did you receive? £93 at first, and £120 for the last three years.
893. And board and residence? Yes.
894. Will you tell us what your duties were with regard to the boys of whom you say that you had charge? I had to see that the drillmaster and the schoolmaster did their duties properly, and inspect the bed-rooms, and the dining-room, and the water-closets, and everything of that sort, once a day; and to inspect the cleanliness of the boys, see them all undressed and bathed once a week, and that they were clean generally.
895. In what way did you see that the schoolmaster did his duty? I approved of his programmes every quarter, and looked at his time-table to see that he kept up to what he professed to do.
896. Mr. Metcalfe.] Did you ever examine the boys? No.
897. President.] Did you not test his efficiency by the results of his teaching? No, not latterly. We used to give prizes and hold examinations at one time, but I never professed to be able to do that thoroughly. For the last two years the Inspector of the Council of Education has inspected the school; he has done so twice, and is to do so once every half-year for the future.
898. Whilst you were there were the boys taught any trades of any sort? No.
899. What were they taught? They were taught no trades, and did nothing beyond working in the garden.
900. Do they all work in the garden? No, only a few work in the garden—not all; many are too young.
901. How many? Sometimes two or three. One always did so regularly, but there were never more than three, I think, at work all day.
902. Was the one who always worked there apprenticed? No, he was a returned apprentice whom no one would have.
903. Why would no one take him? He had bad eyes, and was not quite right in his head.
904. Is he there now? Yes, he is there now. His sister was there, and she died at Gladesville, and there is no one to take care of him.
905. Are there any others regularly employed? No; a few work in the garden sometimes.
906. How many do you mean by "a few"? Two or three.

907. Are they there regularly? No; the schoolmaster used to select them to go nearly every day.
908. Then there was no system whatever with regard to sending these boys to work in the garden? No. It was not done to teach them gardening, but any that were intended to go to service were sent into the garden, and the schoolmaster selected them, because if I were to do so I might pick a boy who was backward in his education and thus do harm.
909. There was no system of sending them into the garden in turn? No, not every boy.
910. And a boy might leave the school without going into the garden at all? Yes, if a boy was going to a baker he would not be likely to go much into the garden.
911. How would you know what tradesmen the boys were going to? My mother was one of the trustees, and we could know pretty well; if a boy wished to be a baker we would do our best to give him that trade.
912. Have the boys a choice then? Yes, we always asked them what they would like to be, and we did our best to give them the trade that they wished for.
913. Then a large proportion of these boys never went to work in the garden? They were never taught gardening.
914. Do you think that any boy would be the worse for being taught to dig? No; but we had not the staff to teach them. We had a large garden, and only one man to attend to it, at £35 a year. You could not get a gardener to teach them much for that. It is very hard now to get a man at all to fill the situation at such a low rate of wages.
915. What are the drillmaster's duties there? First of all he sees that the boys get up in the morning and bathe, then he sees that they make their beds and wash their bed-rooms out, and then he takes them in to meals; and he sees that they are all ready for school, and hands them over to the schoolmaster at 9 o'clock, and at 12 o'clock he takes charge of them again and superintends any that may be working in the boys' garden.
916. Who works in that? The boys work in that.
917. At what time? When they are out of school.
918. I want you to give the routine of the drillmaster's duties? Well, after seeing the boys into school he is off duty until 12 o'clock.
919. He is doing nothing from 9 till 12? He is off duty until 12.
920. Then he does nothing from 9 till 12? No.
921. He gives his whole services to the institution, I suppose? He is not supposed to be working from 6 in the morning to 9 at night; he has printed rules.
922. Is he supposed to be idle from 9 o'clock to 12? No, he is not supposed to be idle.
923. Is he allowed to do any other work than the work of the institution? No.
924. Then he is idle from 9 till 12? No, he is just the same as any one else who has an hour or two off duty, and he get his dinner then.
925. However, he does nothing from 9 till 12? No.
926. And at 12, when he goes on duty again, what happens? He is on duty from 12 till 2. He takes charge of the boys from the schoolmaster, and if there is any work for them in the garden he takes them down there and keeps with them, and they work there in gangs. It does not follow that he does that every day, for sometimes there is no work to do there. Then he takes them to meals, and after that they clean up, and then he works in the garden from 2 till 4.
927. With the man who attends to the garden? No; it is a distinct garden—the boys' garden.
928. What is raised there? Vegetables and fruit.
929. Are they sent to the kitchen? Yes, except the fruit that is given to the children themselves.
930. What is the difference between the two gardens? The difference is that half the boys' garden is laid out for the boys, and the other half goes to the kitchen. The boys work in it under the drillmaster's direction. The produce from half of it goes to the establishment, and they work the other half for their own amusement and recreation.
931. Why does the drillmaster work particularly in that garden, and not in the other garden? Because it is close to his quarters, and it keeps him away from the gardener. The two persons' duties are distinct, and they never work together.
932. Mr. Ellis.] The boys' garden that you speak of, merely serves to amuse the boys and keep them out of mischief? Half of it does.
933. What does the drillmaster do after 4 o'clock? From 4 to half-past 4, or a quarter to 5, he drills the boys. He drills them for half-an-hour, and takes charge of them, if they go out to play, until half-past 8, when they go to bed; the little boys go to bed earlier; but he is supposed to be on duty until 9 o'clock, when he locks up.
934. Were the boys who were sent to work in the garden, sent for a week or a day at a time? They went by the day generally.
935. How do you mean? They went for only one day.
936. Suppose they went into the garden on Monday morning, would they work there all Monday? Yes.
937. And when would they go again? Perhaps not for eight days.
938. And who would be working in the garden in the meantime? The other boys of the class perhaps—the stronger boys. The class was generally taken in routine.
939. Had you no way of sending the boys into the garden upon any system? I directed the schoolmaster to send out the strongest boys, and those who would not lose time by working in the garden.
940. You state that they used to go in at intervals of eight or nine days? Yes, there was no specified time-table.
941. Did the same boys go again? Yes.
942. For how long? Only for a day.
943. And so on every eight or nine days throughout the year? Yes. It is impossible to lay down a rule for that. In wet weather there would not be a boy in the garden.
944. Mr. Metcalfe.] Gardening then is the only thing that any of the boys are taught out of school? Yes, beyond cleaning their portion of the institution.
945. President.] They are not taught any trades? No; only digging on the institution.
946. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do they not chop wood? No. They did for some time, but it was found that it did not answer.

Mr. E. M.
Betts.

26 June, 1873.

- Mr. E. M. Betts.
26 June, 1873.
947. How did not answer? They got dirty, and tore their clothes and made a litter over the place. They used to cut their own wood.
948. How do you mean "their own wood"? All that was used on their own side; but that is four or five years ago.
949. And for four or five years they have not even chopped wood? No.
950. Who cleans the panikins? The boys do that.
951. President.] Who chops the wood now? The woodman does it.
952. He has been taken on since the boys ceased to do it? No, he has always been there.
953. But how has the wood been supplied since the boys ceased to cut it? The wood was brought into the yard, and the boys used to cut it up.
954. But I suppose that when the boys ceased to cut the wood up, some one else had to do it? The arrangements are better now. There is not so much wood wanted. There were two kitchens then.
955. What are the duties of this wood-cutter who cuts the wood now? He pumps all the water, looks after the horses, and cuts up all the wood.
956. Do you know whether any of the girls are taught to wash? Yes, they are.
957. Mr. Gould.] What does this wood-cutter get a week? £35 a year.
958. And board and lodging? Yes.
959. Mr. Cowper.] Who milks the cows? The labourer.
960. That is another man? Yes.
961. President.] Are there any other male servants about the place? No, none, except the baker.
962. Mr. Ellis.] The farm is not cultivated at all? No, beyond the garden. We grow some green barley for the cows.
963. How many acres are there in the farm? There are about 3 acres in the farm.
964. In the whole of the farm? Do you mean under cultivation?
965. No, in the whole farm? 106 acres.
966. And about 3 acres in the garden? Yes. A great deal of the farm is useless, and cannot be cultivated—it is all stones and rocks.
967. Mr. Metcalfe.] But there is timber on it? Yes; all the heavy timber has been cut off it for the establishment. The baker only gets sufficient wood from it for his oven now.
968. Mr. Ellis.] Is any milk bought for the institution, or do the cows supply sufficient? The cows supply sufficient.
969. President.] Is there any system of keeping up a correspondence with the boys, or exercising any supervision over them after they have left the school? There is no authorized supervision over them. No one has power to interfere with them except through the Police Office. There is no provision for any one to supervise them.
970. Mr. Ellis.] Who apprentices them? The trustees.
971. Who are they? Mr. James Byrnes, my mother, and Mr. Halloran. Captain Wray Finch was a trustee.
972. Was Mrs. Betts a trustee before she was appointed matron of the institution? No.
973. How long has she been a trustee? About twenty-two years, I think.
974. What are the powers of the trustees? They are appointed to bind the children, according to an Act of Parliament.
975. Have they any other powers? None.
976. President.] Do they, as a matter of fact, exercise any other powers? No. I kept up as much of a correspondence with the boys as I could.
977. But I mean, do the trustees interfere with the management of the school? No.
978. Do they ever go there? No.
979. Mr. Metcalfe.] How have the boys turned out? Many of them have turned out very well; but some of those who went to private service have not done so well; they never do so well in private service.
980. Do you mean those who go to private service? Yes, those who are apprenticed to private service as general servants.
981. Do you mean that, as a rule, they turn out worse than those who go to a trade? Yes. The Acts under which the trustees are bound are contradictory, and want revising.
982. President.] In what respect? The Acts are not strictly followed out, and if they were it would be worse for the children.
983. How? The Acts say that the children shall be bound for seven years, and until they are twenty-one the males to receive £2 and the females only 30s. a year for the last three years. That is not acted upon.
984. What is not acted upon? The children are only bound for five years instead of seven.
985. What about the wages? A female gets £2 a year for the last three years,—that is £6 for five years, instead of £4 10s. for seven years.
986. Have you known any instances of apprentices having been returned? Yes, but very few.
987. How many are returned within a year? I do not think I have known more than one in a year.
988. How many are apprenticed in the year? The average is about fifteen boys and eight girls, and sometimes years go over and none are returned; sometimes one or two are returned.
989. Do you know the number of children that the school is supposed to contain? 250.
990. Has that limit been put upon it by the medical men, do you know? By Dr. Bassett and Dr. Pringle. That is as near as we can come to their limit, in round numbers. I have the standard that they allow.
991. You say that you were only twenty-three when you were appointed to the position you held in the school—what were you doing before that? I was in Gilchrist Watt's office when my father died. I had been five years there. My father was master at the institution before me, and when he died I was appointed.
992. What position do you occupy at Gladesville? I am assistant-superintendent there.
993. How long have you been there? Five or six months.
994. Mr. Ellis.] Have you, while you were at the Orphan School, ever experienced any difficulty in getting things done by the Colonial Architect's department? Great difficulty very often.
995. If some person connected with the establishment had power to get things done when they were required, do you think they could be done more economically? Yes; small matters might be done much more economically and quickly in that way I think.
996. Under the present system, a requisition is made to the Colonial Architect for everything? Yes, and sent to the Principal Under Secretary for his approval, if the estimated expense is over £5.

997. Then when the requisition goes in, the Colonial Architect sends up some one to inspect. Yes.
998. And then the matter is reported on, and so on? Yes.
999. President.] What about matters under £5? The Colonial Architect has authority to make any repairs under £5 without going to the Principal Under Secretary.
1000. Mr. Ellis.] There have been three new buildings erected there? Yes.
1001. What did they cost? I believe about £3,300.
1002. Who teaches the children their morning and evening prayers? They are taught their prayers by the teachers—the text of the prayer.
1003. What is that? The boys and girls have prayers to say at night. I do not know them by heart myself.
1004. Do they say them at night? Yes, under the supervision of the sub-matron and drillmaster.
1005. President.] Do they have prayers besides? Yes; in the morning they open school with prayers, and they are dismissed after school with a short prayer.
1006. Mr. Cowper.] Do they say prayers aloud in the dormitories? Yes.
1007. Who says them? The pupil teacher sees that they say them properly—that there is no laughing. One older boy generally stands up and sees that there is no irreverence.
1008. Is anything heard of the children after they leave the school? We hear of a good many of them. They write to us and we write to them, and many of them come to see us.
1009. Do you keep up a correspondence with their employers? I kept a diary, in which I entered up when the money for the children was due, and then if it was not paid I used to write to their masters.
1010. But had you any letters with reference to the conduct of the children and the satisfaction that they gave? A great many. I know a great many who have got on very well indeed.
1011. Mr. Goold.] Do you keep up a correspondence with them now? No. I did so up to the time I left.
1012. Mr. Metcalfe.] How many girls are married of those who have left the place? I know of some, but not many.
1013. Mr. Ellis.] How often do the trustees meet for the purpose of apprenticing the children? Of late years they have not met very frequently. Mr. Byrnes has been away, and Captain Finch not able to come.
1014. Which Mr. Byrnes is that? Mr. James Byrnes.
1015. How did they apprentice the children? Mr. Finch could not come, and Mr. Byrnes was away, and I had to send the names in to him.
1016. How are the applicants for apprentices dealt with? They are all registered alphabetically, and the most eligible applicant is selected.
1017. How do you find out the most eligible? By the inquiries we make.
1018. Do the trustees make the inquiries, or are all matters inquired into before the applications come before the trustees? Well, they know most of the people and are able to judge of their fitness in that way, and according as a boy is ready to go a person is selected to take him.
1019. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are they apprenticed to people in Parramatta? No, all over the country, and to trades as much as possible. The error in the Act has been represented to the Government, and an alteration to give them more remuneration and to supervise them has been suggested, but it has not been done.
1020. Mr. Cowper.] Is it usual to return children to their parents when the parents apply for them? If the mother has several children in the institution and will take them all, they are generally given up to her unless she is a bad character.
1021. That is, if a mother has three children in the school and applies for them all, she gets them, but she is not allowed to take the eldest one alone? Yes, that is it.
1022. President.] Do you know all the boys by name? Yes, I know every one of them.
1023. Mr. Ellis.] Does the Inspector of Charities ever visit the place? Yes, he is supposed to visit, and has done so, but I have not seen him for eighteen months, and I do not know his instructions.
1024. There is no other kind of inspection? No, except that of the Public School inspector, who only inspects the educational part of the arrangements.
1025. Mr. Cowper.] What is the dietary scale? Bread, butter or treacle, and tea for breakfast; bread and tea for supper, according to the scale.
1026. How much bread are the children allowed per day? 1 lb. each.
1027. Mr. Ellis.] Is the butter bought, or made on the place? Bought.
1028. President.] Are they allowed no meat? Yes, for dinner roast mutton four days a week, soups and boiled meat twice a week, and pies or Irish stew once a week. On Fridays they generally get meat pies, or Irish stew, or thick soup.
1029. Mr. Goold.] Are any of the girls taught cooking? They go into the kitchen to work, but they are not taught cooking.
1030. And they are not taught washing? Yes, they are taught washing; some of them go regularly into the laundry.
1031. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are they taught sewing? Yes.
1032. Do they make their own clothes there? Yes.
1033. President.] How far were you acquainted with the character and disposition of each boy? I was fairly acquainted with the character of each boy. I inquired of the drillmaster and schoolmaster as to their characters, and I knew them from seeing the boys every day.
1034. Have you, from long acquaintance with the school, any suggestion to make for its improvement? The matter of apprenticing the children requires improvement decidedly.
1035. Is there anything else? There should be some alteration as far as concerns the remuneration of the apprentices and their supervision by some Government officer, who should be authorized to look after them after they were apprenticed.
1036. Mr. Cowper.] With reference to the general management of the place, do you think that the education that they receive is sufficient; do you think that the schoolmaster and the schoolmistress are efficient? I think that they are quite as competent as you can get for the salaries of £70 and £120 a year.
1037. Do you know what salaries are paid to teachers in the Public Schools? Yes, a good many get £150 and £170, and then there are school fees.
1038. But they have no board and residence? Most of them have residence.
1039. But no board? No; but the board does not count for much at the Orphan School; it is a mere ration, and is not valuable.

Mr. E. M.
Betts.

26 June, 1873.

- Mr. E. M. Betts.
26 June, 1873.
1040. Mr. Cowper.] Were you satisfied with the progress made by the children? It fluctuated. They sometimes got on better than at others; sometimes the writing was better, and sometimes it was not good. During the last two or three years I did not take so much interest in the educational part of the school, in consequence of the Inspectors coming from the Public Schools. I wished them to be the judges of the progress of the children and the efficiency of the teachers; but we never saw their reports, and did not know what they said. (See Appendix F.)
1041. Do you not think that it would be better to have some tradesman to teach the boys to make boots and shoes, and so on? My own opinion is that to do that you should have one large establishment, and have a larger number of children. I do not think that in that small number, and with the demand there is for apprentices, it would be advisable; it would entail a heavy expense; and the children are no burden when they have reached the age of twelve years, for they can then be easily got rid of as apprentices; and it would be better to send them out and have them well looked after than keep them and teach them trades. In a small establishment it is not worth while to teach them trades on the score of economy.
1042. Mr. Goold.] If there was a larger number of children there they might be taught trades? Yes. I can better illustrate my meaning by referring to the boots. With our present numbers the boots and shoes cost £180 a year. Now a good bootmaker's wages would come to £150 a year, and then there would be material, and the clothes and keep of the apprentices, and the boots would cost far more than they do by contract.
1043. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you mean to say that the boots and shoes for that establishment only cost £180 a year? I think so. They only cost from 3s. 6d. to 4s. 6d. a pair.
1044. Mr. Cowper.] How long do they wear a pair of boots? Three months and four months.
1045. Mr. Ellis.] Do they wear them all day? They put them on before school, and if they are at play or working in the garden they take them off, after school.
1046. Mr. Metcalfe.] And £180 a year includes the cost of boots and shoes for them all? Yes. I have not an account of the expenditure by me, but I think the cost is from £180 to £200.
1047. You are sure that is the price? Yes.

FRIDAY, 27 JUNE, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.
SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.
CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

Miss Charlotte Hildebrand, teacher, Roman Catholic School, Benevolent Asylum, examined during the inspection of the school:—

- Miss C. Hildebrand.
27 June, 1873.
1048. President.] How do these children come to be here: are their parents in the institution? No; some of them are the children of very poor people; some are orphans, without father or mother; in some cases the fathers are dead, and in others the mothers. They are sent from here to Randwick every year.
1049. When do they go to Randwick? Some will be sent this quarter.
1050. At what age do they go to Randwick? At ten and eleven.
1051. At what age do they get them into the school? Some very small, and up to twelve years of age. When there is a large number in the house some of them are sent off to Randwick.
1052. Are these children ever examined by anybody? By the Board occasionally.
1053. Not by the Public School Inspector? No.
1054. Have you ever been employed in a school before you came here? Yes.
1055. Have you a certificate? No. I resigned on account of ill health.
1056. How old is the eldest child you have here? I do not know. They are not long in the school.
1057. Do you teach them under any particular system? Yes, under the Public School system. There are some children here who have not been in the school more than three months or so.
1058. How long has the boy been here who has been here the longest? He has been about twelve months with us, and has not gone to Randwick.
1059. At what age are they drafted to Randwick? It does not depend upon the age, but when the schoolroom is full. They are taken away sometimes in six months, and sometimes in twelve months, when in a healthy condition.
1060. You teach under the Public School system? Yes.
1061. Do you in any way conduct the school as a denominational Catholic school? I have prayers in the morning, and the children say their catechism twice a week in the afternoon.
1062. These are the only religious exercises that the children have? Yes.
1063. The only religious teaching? Yes. They have catechism twice a week for an hour.
1064. Have you had charge of any other catholic school but this? Yes, a provisional school.
1065. And is there no more religious teaching in a denominational school than there is here? No, I have never taught them more. I only taught them the catechism the same as I do here, and had prayers in the morning as I have here. They read the Bible too.
- [Children read some easy exercises.]
1066. Mr. Goold.] Are these all the children that belong to this division of the school? Yes.
1067. How many are there? Fifty-four on the roll, but they are not all present. Some are sick in the hospital, and some are at work.
1068. President.] Do they all come to school sometimes? Yes, unless when they are taken off to work.
1069. Are they taken off on any system? The big girls are taken off to scrub.
1070. Do they work week about? Every second day—they take it in turns.
1071. Are there any of the girls taught to work? A few of the girls in my school are taught household work—not needlework.
- 1072.

1072. How many girls are there in the school? Two big girls: the others are all small.
 1073. How big is the eldest girl? Thirteen, I think.
 1074. Then they are not always sent to Randwick? They are sent every twelve months, or every six months. I am not long here myself, but that is it, as far as I understand.
 1075. Mr. Goold.] Are any children taken directly from this institution into private families? Yes, sometimes.
 1076. Some of them seem to be quite infants? Yes, some are very small.

Miss C.
Hildebrand.
27 June, 1873.

Miss Abigail Morrison, teacher, Protestant School, Benevolent Asylum, examined during the inspection of the school:—

1077. President.] How many children have you here? There are forty-one on the roll, and about thirty-three here now.
 1078. What is the average attendance? I do not know exactly. I have not made it up. We do not require to do it here.
 1079. Do you teach these children under any particular system? No, I have no particular system.
 1080. Have you been a public school teacher? A denominational school teacher.
 1081. Have you got a certificate? No.
 1082. You have not been trained? No. I was six years in a denominational school before I came here.
 1083. How long is that ago? I have been eight years here, and before that I was six years in a denominational school.
 1084. You do not know whether you teach the children here under the Public School system or not? Not exactly.
 1085. In what respects is the teaching different? You see I have big and little here together, and I cannot so easily classify them.
 1086. Have you got the children classified at all? Yes, I have the children classified.
 1087. What religious teaching do they get? They read the Scriptures every morning, and they are taught the Church Catechism.
 1088. How often? On Fridays. They are taught the Church of England Catechism, and easy Scripture Lessons every morning. I open the school with prayer, and I read a chapter of the Bible and explain it to them; that is all the religious instruction they get.
 1089. Are they taught prayers? Yes.
 1090. At rising every morning and going to bed every night? Yes. The Matron always reads prayers every morning.
 1091. You have charge of the children only while they are in school? Every second day I have charge of the children from the time they rise in the morning until they retire at night.
 1092. What are the school hours? From half-past 9 until half-past 12, and from half-past 2 until half-past 4; and I see to the safe keeping of the children in the play-grounds.
 1093. How long has the child been with you who has been here the longest? The girl who has been here the longest is not in school now. She has been here for six years.
 1094. How old was she when she came here? About eight years I think.
 1095. How old is she now? About fourteen I think.
 1096. Where is she? She is at house-work.
 1097. Do you teach them needle-work? I do not. They are generally at work.
 1098. Are they taught regularly in the school? Yes, very regularly.
 1099. Do not clergymen come to see them? Yes, they come very often. Mr. Vidal reads prayers every Friday evening, and the children are present.
 1100. Does he give them religious teaching? Not often, but he does sometimes.
 1101. At what age are they taken to Randwick? After four.
 1102. Do you know on what principle they are taken? Only according to their health.
 1103. There is no particular age at which they are taken? No, but they are over four.
 1104. Mr. Goold.] What do you do with them on Sunday? They go to prayers, and then they play in the play-ground.
 1105. On Sunday? Yes. The children attend a service held by the City Missionaries in the Protestant School-room at 11 a.m.
 1106. Is any one with them? Yes; I have charge of both Catholics and Protestants all day every second Sunday.
 1107. There is no particular religious instruction? No.

Miss
A. Morrison.
27 June, 1873.

[Children read some easy exercises.]

1108. President.] Is the school inspected? The committee sometimes hear a class read or look at the writing.
 1109. Do they hold any examination? No, no regular examination.
 1110. They are not inspected by an Inspector from the Council of Education? No, my school is not under their surveillance; there are so few children, and they are so migratory.
 1111. What salary do you receive? £40.
 1112. And board and lodging? Yes.
 1113. You had charge of a school before? Yes, under the Denominational Board.
 1114. How long were you there? Upwards of six years.
 1115. Mr. Goold.] Who supplies the books and the school apparatus for this school? Mr. Mansfield.
 1116. What fund does it come out of? I do not know anything about that.

S. W.
Mansfield,
Esq.
27 June, 1873.

Samuel W. Mansfield, Esq., clerk and accountant, Maternity Hospital, examined during inspection of the institution :—

1117. President.] You are clerk and accountant of this Society? The Benevolent Asylum—yes.
1118. How long have you been connected with the institution? In that capacity?
1119. Yes? Ten or eleven years. I have been connected with the institution for nearly nineteen years.
1120. What salary do you receive? £400 a year now.
1121. You live on the premises? No.
1122. You do not live in the institution? No; I have no perquisites.
1123. No allowance for house rent or rations? No.
1124. What are your hours of attendance here? I come at half-past 6 in the morning during this time of the year, and in the summer-time earlier; go home to breakfast, and return a little after 9, and remain until dinner-time, when I go home to dinner, and return at 2 o'clock, and remain here until 5 or 6 or 7. There is no fixed time. On committee-days it is very often 6 or 7, or even later, when I leave.
1125. What are your duties? To keep all the accounts of the society, and keep all the records—to issue all allowances to the out-pensioners, to visit and report on the out-pensioners, report different cases, and have the general management of that department altogether,—the entire management.
1126. That is, of the out-door relief? Yes; to report upon the different cases weekly. Here is the record of my reports on the different cases. (Report book produced.)
1127. Will you enumerate the rest of your duties? There are no other special duties that I can think of. I have the general supervision of the whole; I am over the institution.
1128. How is the institution managed;—what is its organization? In what respect?
1129. What is the governing body of the institution? The committee.
1130. Consisting of how many members? Twenty-eight, I think, now. According to the rules they must not exceed thirty-four.
1131. Does that include the president, vice-presidents, honorary secretary, and treasurer? No.
1132. All of whom are members of the committee? Yes, ex officio.
1133. And may come and form part of it. Yes.
1134. How is this body elected or appointed? At the annual meetings.
1135. By whom? The subscribers.
1136. Do you know how many subscribers there are to the institution? At the present time?
1137. Yes? I do not know the exact number; I think about 400 or 500.
1138. What was the amount of the subscriptions last year? £780 odd, I think, speaking from memory.
1139. Mr. Metcalfe.] £710, according to last year's report? There was something after that, I think. It came up to £780.
1140. How much was contributed by the Government last year? £500 towards out-door relief.
1141. Is this institution kept up on an income of £1,200 a-year? No.
1142. Mr. Cowper.] Surely the Government gave £3,500 last year? They give a grant of £500 to the out-door relief, and all inmates are paid for by the Government at so much per head in addition to the £500.
1143. President.] What, last year, did the Government contribute towards the maintenance of the institution in all its departments? £3,772 15s. 1d. That was not for the year, because that includes the last quarter of 1871.
1144. What is the average annual contribution of the Government to the institution in all its branches? About that amount.
1145. Mr. Cowper.] Did they not contribute over £10,000 in the years 1860 and 1861? That was under a different arrangement altogether.
1146. Did they not contribute £7,000 in 1866? That was under a different arrangement; that included £2,500, a special grant for building.
1147. President.] What was the arrangement? All the paupers were here,—all the old men and women.
1148. Now the contribution is £4,000 a year? No, the general grant is £4,208. That was put on years ago, but we have never expended that amount, and never drawn it. Every quarter an account is rendered to the Government for so many women and children.
1149. What other sources of income have you? The Police fines.
1150. You mean the fines from the Police Benches? Yes; that is a very trifling matter.
1151. That was, last year, £381 6s. 10d.? About that.
1152. In your account of last year there appears a sum of £211 for interest: what is that the interest of? Interest on money invested, and the rent of a farm at Bankstown.
1153. What is the rent of the farm? £10 a year, and £75 for interest on Government debentures; at least, £150 for the year, and £75 for the half-year.
1154. You have not yet made up the £211? I cannot charge my memory with the exact items.
1155. There is the rent of the farm, £10 a year, and there is the interest on debentures. Yes, and interest on No. 2 debentures.
1156. Is there anything else? Nothing else.
1157. How long has the farm been in the possession of the institution? Many years.
1158. How many years? I cannot say exactly. It was long before I was connected with the institution.
1159. How long ago is that? Nineteen years.
1160. Was it given to the institution? No.
1161. How did the Society come to get it? It was mortgaged to the Society, and the Society had to foreclose and take the land. It was a loss. The mortgage was £400, and the farm lets for £10 a year.
1162. How big is it? 240 acres.
1163. How far is it from Sydney? About 15 miles.
1164. Any of it under cultivation? There has been, but there is none now.
1165. How did the institution become possessed of the debentures? There are £3,000 worth of debentures derived from the Railway Company by the purchase of land for railway purposes.
1166. Land purchased from the Society? Yes.
1167. And the other debentures? There are £1,000 from the late Mr. Manson, invested in New Zealand debentures. This money was left as a legacy to the Society.

S. W.
Mansfield,
Esq.

27 June, 1873.

1168. Then these are all your sources of income? Yes, these are all.
1169. Mr. Metcalfe.] Buildings have been added here since you got that money for the land from the Railway Company? Yes.
1170. Why was not that money expended in putting up these additional buildings? —
1171. President.] Is there any money at interest as a bank deposit? Yes, some £10,000 or £11,000.
1172. You did not mention that just now? Of course we have the interest of that.
1173. Mr. Metcalfe.] You do not use the interest of these investments to pay the expenses of the establishment? No.
1174. President.] How much money is there deposited in this way in the bank? £10,449, I think, from what I see in the report, but I can show you more clearly by one of my sheets.
1175. I see by your account that you have £11,000 as a bank deposit? Yes.
1176. What bank is that in? The Bank of New South Wales.
1177. Mr. Metcalfe.] What do you get for that? 3 per cent.
1178. What is the amount by this time, less the general account, in the bank? The general account was overdrawn, and this was taken from the accumulated interest, which this account should show more clearly.
1179. But how does the institution become possessed of this £11,000. It is made up of—house sold, £785; legacies and accumulated interest, £9,761 9s.; and legacies and land sold, £5,895 9s. 6d.; investment in the farm, £480,—making a total of £16,921 18s. 6d. Then there is on the other side—By investment (farm), £480; by Government debentures, £3,000; by New Zealand debentures, £1,000; by deposit in Bank of New South Wales, due 25 June, 1873, at 3 per cent., £6,000; by amount not re-invested, £5,000 15s. 4d.; and loan from accumulated interest, to general account, £1,135 3s. 2d.; total, £16,921 18s. 6d.
1180. What is the actual amount of the legacies that the institution holds? £5,330, and then there is the accumulated interest.
1181. Mr. Cowper.] Does the interest bring the amount up to £19,000? No; to £9,761.
1182. President.] But you have here in this report, £19,000? That is a misprint; it should be £9,000.
1183. Is the difference between that £5,000 and the £11,000 made up by the interest? Yes, you see here on bank deposits not expended but accumulating.
1184. Do the directors never spend the interest? Yes, they have invested it.
1185. But there it is only lent? The institution has got a fund from which they overdraw the annual amount of the interest, and, instead of spending that money they re-invest it. That has been done for years.
1186. What amount of interest is re-invested in this way, instead of being used in working the institution? What amount?
1187. Yes, what amount of interest instead of being spent last year was put into the bank again? You can scarcely get at the amount last year, but you must take the whole amount.
1188. Was there any interest coming in last year from any sources? Yes.
1189. How much? I cannot say how much just now.
1190. Mr. Metcalfe.] Will not your ledger tell you? No, I do not keep the cash account there. This sheet (sheet produced) will show clearly the interest up to last year.
1191. President.] I want to know what interest accrued due to the institution last year? I think about £400.
1192. What became of that £400? That went to the general account.
1193. I thought that you told us that it was re-invested, and not used in working the institution? When the deposits come due the interest is not re-invested; but the practice has been to add the interest to what was deposited, and re-invest it, until the year before last, when this account was overdrawn, and this sum was taken from it before any re-investment was made.
1194. Mr. Metcalfe.] Both these accounts are added up to the end of 1872, and it seems that the money received for interest was £211 exactly? Yes, irrespective of the interest on deposits—there is no account of that at all.
1195. That does not appear in this account at all? No.
1196. But that is very strange. What interest is that £211 then? On the Government debentures paid into the bank half-yearly, and the rent of the farm, and the New Zealand debentures.
1197. The money from these is used in working the institution? Yes.
1198. But the interest on the bank deposits is not used? No, it is not.
1199. President.] Can you tell us why? I cannot.
1200. Mr. Metcalfe.] What is the object of the directors accumulating this large fund—and why do they make a difference between one source of revenue and another; you have got some you use and some that you do not use—why is that? I cannot give any definite reason for it, unless it is done with a view of accumulating something more in the bank.
1201. You do not know what is the ultimate object of these accumulations? No, I cannot say, except to make a fund from the interest of which the operations of the Society might be carried on.
1202. President.] Have the Government any control in the management of the institution? Only by the inspector.
1203. They have no voice in the management of its affairs? No.
1204. Mr. Metcalfe.] And yet they find five-sixths of the funds? More than that—nine-tenths.
1205. President.] How often does the Board meet? Weekly, and quarterly the general committee—the whole committee; the house committee meet every Tuesday.
1206. Mr. Metcalfe.] You have a sub-committee that meet every Tuesday? Yes, the house committee.
1207. President.] Of how many members is it composed? Sixteen.
1208. What is the average attendance? Six, eight, or ten sometimes.
1209. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do the same members attend at every meeting? No, not always.
1210. Mr. Gould.] You have here in this balance sheet an item of £64 10s. “on account of inmates”: is that paid by the parents of the children? It is in some cases.
1211. How is it made up—in what other cases is money paid? Single women pay for admission.
1212. President.] Do all single women pay for admission? No; every case is considered by the committee upon its merits, but the system of making the single women pay was introduced because it was thought to be a check upon them.

S. W.
Mansfield,
Esq.
27 June, 1873.

1213. Does this sub-committee of sixteen practically manage the institution? Yes.
1214. What time does their sitting extend to every week? They meet at 4, and sit sometimes to 7.
1215. What sort of business do they transact? First of all general business, read minutes of the previous meeting, receive applications for out-door relief, or any other matter connected with the internal management of the house.
1216. Do you find that much time is taken up in discussing matters at length? Yes, on some occasions.
1217. What does that arise from, in your opinion? From differences of opinion sometimes as to the merits of applicants.
1218. Do you think that it in any way arises from the size of the committee? No, I do not think so.
1219. Do you see any object in having so large a committee—a committee of twenty-eight members? That is the general committee.
1220. Do you see any object in having so large a general committee? No, I do not see any object in having so large a committee, nor have I found any inconvenience from its size, as far as my experience is concerned.
1221. Do you not think that a smaller committee would get through the work more rapidly and with less waste of time? I think that they might—on some occasions particularly—but as a rule I have not found the committee too large. On the quarter-days the business is very soon gone through. It is mere formal business, merely the reception of documents and reading them over, and so on. With the weekly committees there is a good deal of time lost, but that does not occur from the number of members.
1222. From what cause does it occur? From difference of opinion among the parties present; but on the whole I do not see any reason to complain of that.
1223. When you say that time is lost then, do you not mean that it is lost unnecessarily? Merely by argument about some of the cases that come before the Board—with reference particularly to the admission of young females. There is often a strong feeling and discussion on that subject. Some members think that cases should be admitted and others think that they should not, from the circumstances that come before the Board.
1224. What position does the matron occupy in the place? She has the entire management of the institution inside—the direction and management of the house.
1225. She looks after the internal affairs of the institution? Yes, as far as the management goes—not the stores.
1226. Everything with regard to the management of the wards, and the cooking, and the clothing, and the discipline of the wards? Yes, they are entirely under her control.
1227. And you look after the stores and the external affairs of the institution? Yes.
1228. Dr. Renwick is the medical officer attending here? Yes.
1229. How often does he come? Twice every day, morning and afternoon, and at any hour day or night when his services may be required.
1230. Is he paid? Yes.
1231. What salary does he get? £250.
1232. Your subscriptions are collected by a collector on a commission, I suppose? Yes.
1233. Mr. Metcalfe.] The subscriptions have fallen off very much, have they not? No; rather increased within the last two years.
1234. Up to 1855 they were much larger? Yes.
1235. President.] At that time there were not so many institutions of a benevolent kind? No, perhaps not; but that is not the reason. At that time this was a benevolent institution for all the poor, but now all the aged people are taken charge of by the Government. Then we had all the church collections, and now we have not. At one time we had £1,200 or £1,300 from the churches.
1236. Of all denominations? Yes.
1237. Mr. Couper.] Then the Government having started other charitable institutions have prevented the public subscribing several thousands a year? Exactly so.
1238. President.] How long is it since the change was made in the character of the institution? The change was made in 1862.
1239. Would you tell us generally now what the institution is for? What—now?
1240. Yes? To receive young single women for confinement, and married women deserted by their husbands, with their children, and children—I scarcely know how to describe them, for many of them are not deserted, but still are brought here. Since January last, thirty-six children have been received here by order of the Colonial Secretary, and four women. Children are sent here from all parts of the Colony—sent down by Police Magistrates and the Magistrates in the interior. An application is made to the Colonial Secretary, stating the case, and then he gives an order for admission. There are some from the country, and some from Sydney. Children are continually sent here from both Police Courts—the Central Police Court and the Water Police Court. There is no other place for such children—no other receptacle but this. During the last week we had a child sent down from the Lunatic Asylum at Gladesville—an infant six days old. Its mother died there two days after its birth.
1241. What else? There are many similar cases.
1242. I mean what else does this institution do? It dispenses out-door relief.
1243. In what way do the single women obtain admission here? By presenting themselves before the committee, and giving in recommendations from some clergyman who knows something of the cases. Of course a woman has to state her own case, and how she came into the position, and upon the merits of the case she is admitted or rejected.
1244. What are supposed to be the merits of the case? The state of destitution in which a woman is placed—her being unfit for work, and without friends, or relatives, or home.
1245. What then do the disputes arise from when the cases come before the committee? Well, I can scarcely charge my memory with any specific dispute, but disputes do occur sometimes on such subjects; for instance, where an applicant may have relatives who are either in Sydney or not far from it, and some members of the committee think that the relatives should assist her or keep her in their own houses; and often applicants are rejected on that ground. In some cases it has occurred that a girl has had younger sisters in the same family, and they do not wish her to be confined there.
1246. That is a reason for accepting them here? Some members have thought so, and some, in some cases of the kind, have refused them, and they had to go to their parents.

1247. Mr. Metcalfe.] Then the decision is arbitrary? Yes.
1248. President.] There is no rule with reference to such cases? No, every case is to be decided upon its merits.
1249. Then, whether a case is admitted or rejected depends entirely on the committee of the day? Yes; that is, the view they take of it.
1250. Does it not come to that? Yes.
1251. On one day one committee may reject a girl, and on another day another committee may accept her on the same circumstances? Scarcely that. Greater necessity must be shown.
1252. But at all events there is no settled principle for the admission of patients? No settled principle. Every case must be dealt with on its own merits. There was a fixed rule once that no case should be admitted except on payment of £2.
1253. I see that you do receive some money from people coming into the house? Yes.
1254. How is that done? They are told that they are expected to pay, and if they are girls who have just come from service with a pocketful of money, it is only right that they should pay.
1255. But if they say that they have got nothing? Then they must show that they have got nothing.
1256. Is there an organized system of inquiry? Yes.
1257. Of what kind? On the part of those who recommend the applicants.
1258. But is there no organized system of inquiry except the inquiry by those who recommend them? No, none as to that.
1259. There is no organized system of inquiry by the institution itself? Not with reference to girls who come in for confinement.
1260. How long are the girls kept here? They are not supposed to remain longer than a month, and a great many do not remain so long, but some remain longer. Very few remain for the month.
1261. With regard to the married women, in what mode do they obtain admission here? Either from having been deserted by their husbands, or their husbands being sick in the Infirmary, or in hospitals in the interior. They are admitted under these circumstances, but not for any lengthened period.
1262. Is there any system of inquiry into the circumstances of their cases before their admission? Only from representations made at the time.
1263. No inquiry is made by any officer of the institution? No. They are generally of that character that the cases present themselves to the committee as being legitimate cases for assistance. Some cases are recommended by the Colonial Secretary, on representations made to him.
1264. What number of single girls do you take in, on an average, during the year? Between ninety and 100.
1265. Have you got a record of the number of cases you have had annually since the place has been opened? Yes. [See Appendix G.]
1266. Can you furnish us with it now? No. I will send it to you.
1267. What is the average number of married women who come here during the year? Three or four in a quarter. Latterly they have decreased very much.
1268. To what do you attribute that? To the husbands being better employed, and not deserting their families.
1269. There have been no alterations of the conditions on which they are admitted? No alterations.
1270. Then circumstances external to the institution have brought about the decrease? Yes.
1271. Is there any increase or decrease in the number of illegitimate births? A decrease.
1272. Since when? Within the last two or three years.
1273. There has been no alteration of the circumstances under which they are admitted? No.
1274. To what cause do you ascribe the decrease? I cannot see any cause, save in the improvement in the moral condition of the people.
1275. Mr. Couper.] What class of girls generally apply for admission here—servant girls, or girls who have relations? Servant girls, the majority of them.
1276. From Sydney or the country districts? Chiefly from Sydney.
1277. President.] Have you been able to trace whether they are native-born or not? Yes, we find out all that. The majority of them are native-born—I think forty-five out of sixty.
1278. Do you find that they chiefly belong to the uneducated class? Generally so.
1279. Do you keep any records as to whether they can read or write? We do not.
1280. What can you state as to the ages of these single females—do some appear to be very young? Yes, from 14 to 26—the youngest say 14; but that is an exceptional case. We have the child here now; she is in her 15th year—she is not 15 yet; and we have now in the establishment one who is 19 and waiting for her second confinement.
1281. Do you have instances of girls coming here more than once? It is not very frequent. Those are cases against which the committee set their faces very determinedly, and they refuse them admission if they find it at all safe to do so.
1282. What age do you find giving you the largest number of single females? From 18 to 21.
1283. Are any steps taken by the institution to find these girls employment when they leave? Yes; before they leave, a large majority of them get situations, either through the instrumentality of the matron, or by advertising, which I frequently do. There are a number eligible for servants, and, where the children are healthy, I advertise that the women can be employed, and applications are made at once.
1284. What wages do they get under these circumstances? The rule laid down by the committee is that they are not to refuse half-a-crown a week; but there are very few who do not engage for a much higher sum than that. When they see the girl, people do not attempt to give her half-a-crown, but they give 4s. or 5s. a week.
1285. Do the people who engage them appear to be a respectable class? Yes, that is always looked to.
1286. Have you traced the after-career of these women? Yes; it has come to my knowledge that many of them are comfortably married.
1287. Retrieved themselves? Yes.
1288. What has been the success of the institution with regard to the maternity hospital—the lives of the children? In what respect?
1289. Have you had many deaths occur in the lying-in wards? No, we have never had a death in the lying-in ward—never had a death in confinement.
1290. Never had a death since the place has been open? Not since Dr. Renwick has been here—either among the married or single women.

S. W.
Mansfield,
Esq.
27 June, 1873.

1291. Does Dr. Renwick attend all the cases? Yes.
1292. He is always called in to attend the cases? He sees every case; if not at the birth, soon after.
1293. With regard to the married women—they stay in a month the same as the others, I suppose? There is no fixed time for them; it is according to the urgency of the case. In most cases they are extremely anxious to go out again, and they do go out.
1294. Do you take in mothers with their children? Yes.
1295. Do you take the children in and attend to them while the mother is being confined? Yes.
1296. In any numbers? No.
1297. What limit do you fix? If a woman comes with one child, and is a fit case, we take her in; but a woman with a family must bring a special recommendation from the Colonial Secretary.
1298. What are the cases of children in which children are sent here by the Colonial Secretary? They are picked up about the streets by the police, and taken to the Police Courts for protection; then the circumstances are sent to the Colonial Secretary, and he gives an order for their admission. There are cases which come from the Gaol—there are many whose fathers are dead and mothers are in the Gaol.
1299. Are there many foundlings here? Not many at present.
1300. What is the average number of foundlings here per year? I do not think there has been one this year.
1301. Has the number increased or decreased? Decreased. We have a foundling ward here, but the children in it are not foundlings in the proper sense of the word; they are children who are picked up in the streets by the police.
1302. What has been the success of the institution in the rearing of these foundlings? Well, as a rule, I think not very satisfactory. There is great difficulty experienced in rearing them.
1303. Are there more children die than survive? I think the numbers are pretty nearly equal. The foundlings are generally brought here in such a state that it is impossible to resuscitate them after exposure to the cold and wet. They have frequently been brought in on cold wet nights, and thus deaths have been frequent. Some have been reared who have been brought in in that state. There are now in the institution two healthy children who were admitted in June, 1869.
1304. When young children are brought in here how are they nursed? By the most appropriate nurse in the institution. If a child is just born, it is taken into the ward where a woman has a child just born. A woman who acts as wet nurse is allowed a perquisite.
1305. What is she allowed? 2s. a week.
1306. Have you ever known instances in which foundlings have been claimed by their parents? No, not one, except one some years ago. It was not claimed by the parents in that instance, but was taken away under a feigned name. I am sure that there was some family connection in the matter.
1307. Have they ever been left here in such a way that they might be identified afterwards? No, not with clothing.
1308. Is there any provision made for the married women when they are discharged? Yes, prior to their leaving, when they are once discharged, of course—
1309. I mean with a view to their earning their own living? Oh yes; they are advertised frequently, when they are eligible for service and fit to go out, and applications are made here continually for servants. There are none allowed to remain in the house at all who are fit to go out as domestic servants, unless they are usefully employed about the place, and then they are not kept to the detriment of their getting away.
1310. Is there any fee ever paid by married women for their confinement? No.
1311. Then a woman cannot come here to be confined for payment? No; they have often applied, and have been refused. The committee say "No; if you are able to pay for your confinement, you are able to do so outside." The success of the confinements here has drawn many people here to apply for admission.
1312. We have seen a number of children here at school—what children are those? They are children who have been collected in the various ways I have spoken of.
1313. Children belonging to women who have come in here to be confined—children who have been sent in by the Colonial Secretary's order? Very few of that class, with the mothers being confined here.
1314. Would you enumerate the children who are here—the kind of children who come here? Children from Sydney, sent in by the Colonial Secretary's order; children from almost all parts of the Colony who are sent in here; and very soon there will be an application made for the removal of at least sixty to Randwick.
1315. How many children have you here now? 165.
1316. That is including new-born infants? Yes, including all.
1317. Mr. Cowper.] Infants with their mothers? Yes.
1318. President.] To what age are children kept here? There is no stipulation as to that.
1319. Then what becomes of them—to what age as a matter of fact are they kept here? There are only one or two in the house that the question will apply to at all, and they have been kept here under peculiar circumstances. Two are lame girls, who cannot be received into any other institution. They will not take them into Randwick if they are at all lame or disabled in any way. Both these girls are lame. There is another who is a little imbecile, and they will not take her into the Randwick Asylum. She has been sent there twice and returned.
1320. Why returned? Because she was not fit—not perfect.
1321. How not perfect? She is imbecile, and not sufficiently so to be sent to another institution. Application was made for her to be sent to Newcastle, but it was thought not fit for her to go there, and she is still here. Otherwise, children of eleven and twelve, if they get beyond the age for sending to Randwick, are not kept here at all. They are sent out as nurse girls to any one that applies for them.
1322. Then there is no principle on which they are sent to Randwick? None under four years of age or over ten are ever sent there.
1323. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you ever make inquiries about them after they go out from here? Yes, frequently. Any one who takes a child from here has to enter into a written obligation.
1324. President.] Is there anything provided as to wages? No; only that the child shall be properly clothed and fed, and attend religious services.
1325. Is there any supervision over them afterwards? No, not afterwards.

S. W.
Mansfield,
Esq.

27 June, 1873

1326. Suppose that they do not stay with their employers, what becomes of them? They are left to their own resources.
1327. They do not come back here at all? No.
1328. Mr. Goold.] Do I understand you to say that they do not go to Randwick before they are four years old, or after they are ten? Yes.
1329. President.] Are they sent from here to Randwick at any stated time? No.
1330. Who decides that they are to be kept here or sent there? When we have a good number of children here, healthy, clean, and strong, an application is made to transfer them to the Randwick institution.
1331. Mr. Cowper.] At what rate does the Government pay for these children in this institution? £14 a year.
1332. Mr. Metcalfe.] That is the average cost of each child? Yes.
1333. President.] I see two schools here? Yes.
1334. A Roman Catholic School and a Protestant School? Yes.
1335. Has the teaching here always been of a denominational character? Not always.
1336. How long has it been so? I think for the last ten years.
1337. Do you know under what circumstances sectarian teaching was introduced? I cannot state any set reason for it, save that it was thought desirable at that time, but from what circumstances I cannot remember.
1338. There are two female teachers? Yes.
1339. Roman Catholic and Protestant? Yes.
1340. Have the schools ever been inspected by the Council of Education's officers? No.
1341. Who supervises the schools? The committee. There is no special appointment for it—the committee look after it.
1342. There is no school committee? No, no special committee.
1343. There is no organized system by which the schools are examined or inspected? No.
1344. What regulations are there about the time of these schools? In what respect?
1345. In respect to the attendance of the children in the school? I do not know of any special regulations, except those with reference to the attendance of the teachers to their duties. They have regular rules to go by.
1346. Where are these rules—that is what I want to know? I think you will find them in the general rules—the time of opening school, entering it and leaving it, and so on.
1347. Then, with the exception of the rules which provide that a child shall be in school by a certain hour and so on, there are no rules provided for the management of these schools? No general rules.
1348. Do the committee engage a schoolmistress and turn her into the schoolroom and let her do what she likes? No. There is a weekly committee besides the house committee, who are appointed to visit the house, and they make a general supervision of the whole institution, including the schools.
1349. That is the only supervision of the schools that there is? Yes, that is the only special supervision that there is.
1350. Then these schools are conducted on no system, as far as the institution knows or directs—is it not so? There are no special rules and no special supervision.
1351. Who appoints the teachers? The committee, by advertisement, invite applicants to appear before them.
1352. Is there any condition that they shall be certified teachers under the Council of Education? No.
1353. And as a matter of fact the school is not inspected? No.
1354. Mr. Goold.] Who pays the teachers' salaries—the Government? No, the Society.
1355. What salary have they? £40 a year each.
1356. Do they live on the place? Yes, they have board and lodging.
1357. Does any clergyman attend to the religious teaching of the children? They do, but not in any organized way, I think—at least I am not aware of it.
1358. Do any clergymen come here regularly? Yes, there is service here regularly every Friday evening.
1359. Church of England service? Yes.
1360. What about the Roman Catholic children? They get instruction every Sunday, and at other times during the week, from what are called the "sisters."
1361. What religious teaching have the Protestant children during the week, if any? I am not aware of any special system of teaching for them.
1362. Do you see any object in keeping up two small denominational schools in this establishment? No, I do not.
1363. Do you not think that the children would be more advantageously managed if the two schools were made into one? I think that they might be quite as efficiently managed. I never saw any object to be gained by dividing them, myself.
1364. Mr. Goold.] Do you not think the teaching would be more efficient if they were amalgamated? I think that it might be.
1365. President.] Do you see anything, as far as you know of the management of the place, of any particular religious exercises that these children go through, or any systematic teaching that they have, which would prevent either school being conducted as a public school is conducted? No, I have never heard of anything.
1366. Has there ever been any attempt made by the committee to have one school here conducted on the public school principle, rather than the two schools you have here now? I cannot say that there has been any special attempt made, but the thing has been at various times spoken of, and it was thought better to let things remain as they were.
1367. If a child comes in as a foundling, what is done towards determining the religion in which it shall be brought up? You mean infant foundlings?
1368. Yes? We have always been guided by circumstances—the place where the child is found, and anything else that may tend to show to what denomination it might belong. For instance, if a foundling were picked up near St. Benedict's Church, it would be natural to suppose that the child belonged there. On the 28th June, 1869, a female child was found near St. Benedict's, the child was baptised in the asylum a Roman Catholic, and is now a fine girl. There was an instance of that kind the other day, and the child was

- was baptized there, but did not live long. There has always been care taken to have them baptized. We can generally form an opinion from the appearance of the child as to whom it belongs to; at least I can.
1369. And supposing that there is nothing whatever to indicate what religion a child belongs to? The rule here was to baptize them all as Church of England children—that was my system; but then there was an outcry, and it was thought unreasonable that they should all belong to the Church of England.
1370. Other Churches wished to have a share of them? Yes, and it was then determined that they should be shared equally, one for one.
1371. Mr. Goold.] Taking all the denominations? No, only the two. The others were left out of consideration; but since then I do not think that three have been baptized under similar circumstances.
1372. President.] Have you any reason to think that the charity is abused by people coming here to be confined—either single or married women? I do not think so; I think that it would be most difficult to point out a case in which it was not really necessary that the woman should be admitted. In the married cases one or two may have occurred where there has been a show of imposition—an appearance of it—where men have absented themselves just for the time while the wife came to be confined. That has occurred in one or two cases, but that is the only way in which to my knowledge imposition has been attempted.
1373. Have you yourself given any attention to the teaching in these schools? I have not for some years. When I resided on the premises I did, but that is eleven years ago; then there was only one school.
1374. Did you then see anything to prevent the children of both denominations being taught in that way? No; and they were then taught by a Roman Catholic.
1375. You yourself are a Protestant? Yes.
1376. And having observed the teaching by that system and under a Roman Catholic teacher, you see nothing to make you think that a system of that sort could not work? No.
1377. From that I gather that you are in favour of the Public School system generally? Decidedly.
1378. I do not think you have told us what servants there are in the institution? There are six paid servants besides the teachers, and the rest are inmates—all the rest of the servants.
1379. Are they all women? All women.
1380. There are no men servants? Yes, there are three old men,—the gate-keeper, yardsman, and the watchman.
1381. Mr. Metcalfe.] What has a watchman to do in a place like this? Walk round the place at night.
1382. What wages does he get? 4s. a week.
1383. Mr. Goold.] Is that the man at the gate? No; that is the gate-keeper; he gets the same.
1384. President.] Is he employed here constantly? Yes.
1385. Some old inmate of the place? They are not inmates here, but they are old men.
1386. What is this watchman? He goes round the place when the wards are locked up, and he is there to give notice if the doctor is wanted in the lying-in ward. He goes to the gate and sends for the doctor.
1387. What are the women employed on the place? Wardswomen, cook, laundress. There is a woman for the boys' ward, one for the foundling, the skin ward, cook, and laundress. The wardswomen for the women's wards are inmates, and are kept only for a short period.
1388. I think you said that you manage the whole of the out-door relief business? Yes.
1389. How many people weekly do you give assistance to on an average? At the present time I think that there are 410 cases on the books. They have decreased considerably. This time last year I think there were 515, or somewhere about that.
1390. What relief do you give? Bread, flour, or bread and meat.
1391. Is that all? That is all.
1392. Mr. Metcalfe.] You never give tea or sugar? Sugar, but no tea. In cases of sickness, arrowroot and things of that sort.
1393. You never give tea? No; I think it would be a bad thing to begin with.
1394. What ration is given out? Six loaves of bread and six pounds of meat, four loaves and four pounds of meat, three loaves and three pounds of meat, and two loaves and two pounds of meat a week.
1395. On what principle is the ration regulated? Two and two for a single person, three and three for a woman with one child, and four and four for a woman with three children, and six and six is the largest ration issued.
1396. How often are these rations given out? Once a week.
1397. Then in some cases you give six loaves at a time? Yes.
1398. What is the mode of obtaining this relief? By appearing before the committee and bringing the recommendation of the minister to whose church they belong, or from a subscriber who knows the circumstances of the case, and that is afterwards inquired into.
1399. What number of out-door pensioners can a subscriber recommend in the course of a year? There is no limit.
1400. As a matter of fact, do some subscribers send many more people than others? Yes; ministers of religion send more than other people.
1401. Do they send the chief portion of the cases? Yes.
1402. Mr. Goold.] Have you any printed forms of application? No.
1403. Do you merely give relief on receipt of these orders? Not before the applicants go before the committee. The case is investigated by the committee in the first instance.
1404. What mode of investigation is adopted by the committee? Questions are put to the parties, and inquiries are made by myself.
1405. Is it part of your duty to make these inquiries? Yes. You see by the report that last year there were 269 cases specially reported to the committee, of which 152 were struck off.
1406. That is, rejected? No, struck off the books. They had been receiving relief, but were considered unworthy to continue receiving it.
1407. Then you do not inquire before giving the relief? No.
1408. How long do they receive relief before the inquiry is made? Perhaps a week. I believe that very few impositions have taken place. Relief has not been sought by persons who do not require it—that has not been practised; but it is where a husband is sick in the Infirmary, and the family require relief and get it, and then the husband gets well and goes to work, and the family still continue to receive the relief, and after a time we find out the circumstances.
1409. Do these cases often occur? There is scarcely one in a hundred who has the honesty to say, "I do not require the relief any longer."

S. W.
Mansfield,
Esq.

27 June, 1873.

1410. Does this happen in the case of families? Yes, where the husband is up the country, or in the Infirmary, and he returns home and goes to work, and still they come for relief.

1411. Have you any assistance in making your inquiries? No. I have assistance, but in a way that I keep to myself. There is no system organized by the Society.

1412. Have you any way of communicating with the Infirmary as to the discharge of the fathers of families who receive relief? No, I have not.

1413. Do you not think that such a system could be established;—that on finding that the fathers of families obtaining relief are there, you could arrange to obtain from the Infirmary information as to their discharge? Yes, I might do it, but from my long knowledge of these people, and from practice in this work, I am a pretty good judge as to how they are going on.

1414. But you see your judgment fails you sometimes? No, not often.

1415. You say that it failed you in 152 cases out of 269? No, these cases were specially reported, and 152 were struck off.

1416. Mr. Gould.] What do you mean? There is a special report of every individual case.

1417. That 152 then were out of 500? No.

1418. Out of how many then? 269.

1419. Why were not the others examined into by you? So they had been; but these were special inquiries that were made, owing to certain circumstances.

1420. President.] But you gave relief in the first instance? Certainly.

1421. Then in these 152 cases you were imposed upon? I might have been for a longer or a shorter period.

1422. Mr. Gould.] When relief is allowed to any person, is it allowed for an indefinite period? No, it is sometimes for two weeks, sometimes for three weeks, and sometimes for a month.

1423. What is the longest time for which relief is allowed? A month.

1424. Mr. Metcalfe.] What is the longest time that they have received it? Sometimes they receive it for years.

1425. What cases are those? Cases which I know myself cannot be struck off.

1426. What sort of cases? Cases of people who are unfit for work.

1427. Mr. Gould.] If people apply for relief next week, will they be told that they will only get it for a certain period? Yes.

1428. What is the period? That depends on circumstances.

1429. And when the period has expired, do they make a fresh application? Yes.

1430. President.] Then you do not see any objection to this system of out-door relief, from your knowledge of it? No, I think it has been of great benefit.

1431. Can you suggest anything for the improvement of the system? No, I do not see what improvement could be made.

1432. Or for the improvement of the institution generally? No; as far as its objects now are concerned, I do not see that any improvement can be made.

1433. Except the amalgamation of the two schools? I see no objection to that.

1434. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you not think that, as the Government contribute so largely to the funds, they should appoint some members of the Board? I do not see any objection to it.

1435. And do you not think that the Board could be reduced with advantage? I have no doubt that it would be quite as well, though I have not found any difficulty in the working of the committee. If there were a smaller committee the business might be got through more speedily, but the attendance of members here is generally very good.

1436. Mr. Gould.] I suppose if any repairs are wanted here they are all done by the Government? No, they make no repairs.

1437. President.] Who are they done by? The committee.

1438. Mr. Gould.] I see that some of these buildings are newer than others—were they built by the committee or by the Government? By the Society. One large building was paid for by the Government, after a very special application.

1439. It was built by the Government? No, it was paid for afterwards by the Government.

1440. President.] Do you order the meat? Yes.

1441. What is your daily consumption of meat? The order for to-morrow is 66 lbs. of beef and 40 lbs. of mutton.

1442. Is there a certain ration allowed every day to everybody? Yes, $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of meat to every inmate.

1443. What do you allow for waste? 4 ounces out of every 12.

1444. In ordering meat, what do you allow for waste? One-third. There are ninety-seven in the house who are not on meat at all; then, making the calculation for those who do require it, brings the quantity to 66 lbs. beef and 40 lbs. of mutton. That includes servants and all the rest.

1445. You do not think it necessary, if rations to be issued require 100 lbs. of meat, to order 200 lbs.? No, I do not.

1446. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is the meat always roasted or always boiled? No, it is roasted and boiled alternately.

1447. President.] Do you see any necessity, in ordering meat for an institution of this sort, when 100 lbs. of beef are required for the rations, to order 200 lbs.? No, I do not.

1448. Did you ever hear of such a thing? No.

1449. It is not necessary to do so? I cannot see how it can possibly be necessary.

1450. Mr. Metcalfe.] You would order 1 lb. of meat to give a ration of $\frac{3}{4}$ lb.? My experience is that 1 lb. of meat roasted or boiled will yield one-third less of cooked meat, and to give $\frac{3}{4}$ lb. of cooked meat would take 1 lb. raw. Here the ration for each inmate being 8 ounces of meat without bone, I order for that $\frac{3}{4}$ lb.

1451. That is 12 ounces? Yes.

1452. President.] We are told that, in one institution, that when 100 lbs. of meat are required, 200 lbs. are ordered? On what principle?

1453. The principle that the loss is so much? ———

1454. What experience have you had in this place? Nearly nineteen years. Once I had nearly 500 or 600 inmates here, men and women.

S. W.
Mansfield,
Esq.
27 June, 1873.

1455. And your experience is that one-third is a proper allowance for waste in cooking and for bone in meat? Yes.
1456. Have you any objection to state that the assistance you receive in making inquiries as to cases of applicants for relief, is from gentlemen who for charitable reasons give you the information? I have no objection to state that, but I do not wish to disclose their names or anything more about them.

TUESDAY, 1 JULY, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.
SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.
CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

Thomas Nott, Esq., M.D., Medical Attendant, Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum, called in and examined:—

- T. Nott, Esq., M.D.
1 July, 1873.
1457. President.] I believe that you are visiting medical officer of the Randwick Asylum? I am.
1458. How long have you been so? Two years on the 1st of last April.
1459. Is it an honorary or a paid office? It is a paid office.
1460. What is the salary you receive? £200 a year.
1461. How often do you visit the institution? Three days a week—on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays. I go on those days whether there is anything to be done or not, but I am liable to be called there at any time.
1462. What is your opinion as to the present sanatory condition of the school? It was never better than it is now since I have been attending it.
1463. Do you consider the site healthy? Very.
1464. You do not think that it is too much exposed? I think not. We have a great number of children who come to us in a state of — debilitated, and ill fed and scrofulous, and after they have been there a few months they improve rapidly. I thought at first that I should find the air there was too bleak for children of that sort, but it has proved otherwise. It is extraordinary the improvement that takes place in them. We have had destitute children who have been fearfully neglected by their parents. I send them to the hospital for a short time, and send them out again cheerful and bonny.
1465. So that you are satisfied with the sanatory arrangements of the place? Quite.
1466. You have no improvements to suggest? No. The drainage has all been improved within the last year.
1467. Do you know where the drainage goes to ultimately? No, I do not know; to the sea, I think.
1468. Oh no, it goes towards the water supply? Does it?—It went the other way, I thought.
1469. It drains to the west and south-west? I did not know that—I thought it went the other way. I will make inquiry about that.
1470. What is your opinion as to the dormitory accommodation for the children—is there sufficient cubic space per bed? Oh, quite, I think. I have seen an orphan asylum, or rather foundling asylum, in England, and this is much better than that.
1471. Where is it? Guildford-street, Russell-square. I think that there are 1,000 children there.
1472. What is your opinion as to the propriety of allowing the boys to sleep two in a bed? As to health, do you mean?
1473. In every point of view? I do not think that it injures their health at all. You will see a great many children in families doing that.
1474. Of the age of the boys who are there? Do the elder boys sleep together—not the apprentices, do they?
1475. No, but all but the apprentices do, I think? I think that in our hospital we have the apprentices' ward, and they are not allowed to sleep two in a bed there. You see that I have so little to do with the internal economy of the building—I do not interfere. My department is the hospital, and I have the inspection of the children twice a year; they all strip and I inspect them; and if I have any suggestion to make, it is always attended to at once. But I have nothing to do with the internal economy of the place, and I do not interfere in any way; the superintendent would probably be annoyed if I did.
1476. But still you have an opinion as to these things? I cannot give any opinion on that point. I do not see why their sleeping two in a bed should be injurious as to their bodily health. I know that the apprentices sleep in the hospital, and I should not allow them to sleep together. I think the boys have pretty good sized beds.
1477. Not very large for two children, I think. Are you satisfied with the hospital accommodation there? Yes, I think that nothing could be better. There is every convenience there.
1478. What is the reason that the room which is the only one at present practically used as a hospital ward is not one of the rooms that is on the pavilion plan, with the windows on each side, without a thorough ventilation? Yes, that is our sick ward.
1479. The one that is used for hospital purposes? They are all used for hospital purposes you know.
1480. Mr. Cowper.] Not the apprentices' room? That is not; but that room is down-stairs.
1481. President.] I speak of the ward that was used for sick children the other day when we were there—it was a ward with windows on one side and not on the other? On the top of the stairs you mean?
1482. Yes, between the two wards? Yes; the reason that room is between the two is, that I divided the ward. I have an ophthalmic ward on the other side, and I do not like them to mix.
1483. Are there many ophthalmic cases? Yes, sometimes. There was a great deal of ophthalmia when I went there first, and I had a ward set apart for the ophthalmic cases, but there is very little now.
1484. But is not that room the room which is least adapted for hospital purposes? No. There are only eight beds there, and I have not found it defective. There is plenty of room and air. I am very fond of that little ward myself. I like to have patients there rather than elsewhere; they are not crowded.
1485. Mr. Cowper.] Do you require to have the same draughts in the ophthalmic wards as in the others? No. We have dark blinds there to keep out the light.

1486. Were you connected with any institution of this kind in England? No. I was in the Army when T. Nott, Esq., M.D.
1487. But not with the management of children? Not in a body.
1488. You have no improvement to suggest in connection with the Randwick Asylum, as far as it comes under your observation? I think that it is as good as it can be, and I think that the proof is, that we have so little sickness. The average number of patients in the hospital when I went there was fifty or sixty; now it is twenty or twenty-five. We have had no deaths this year, and last year we had only four, which is half per cent. on 800 children. This year we have had none at all. We had scarlatina very bad among them too, and we did not lose a single child, though we had eighty-one patients; and if the sanitary arrangements had not been good we should have lost some, for that is a disease that requires them more than any other.
1489. Mr. Ellis.] Have you ever considered the moral effect of associating a large number of children together in one building? I cannot say that I have. I have never had anything to do with an institution of the kind before. I took Dr. Brown's place when he went Home and then I was appointed.
1490. Have you ever considered the intellectual effect of educating such a large number of children altogether by one uniform system? No.
1491. I ask you the question because the children at Randwick all look so much alike that I cannot distinguish one from the other? There are I think some 800 boys at Eton.
1492. But I hope that the Eton boys had a more intelligent look than most of these? Yes.
1493. Have you seen the way in which children are drafted over here from the Benevolent Asylum? Yes, they cannot be entered here from there unless I see them and examine them first thoroughly. They all strip.
1494. Do you think that the children in the Benevolent Asylum are thoroughly clothed? I think that they always improve at our asylum.
1495. President.] Do you know the system on which the children are admitted into the Randwick Asylum? No, I do not. I have to go down once a year and select them. I meet the directors there, and select the children out of a large number. Dr. Renwick puts forward those that he wants drafted out, and I take them if they are fit.
1496. What is the test of their being fit? I like to have those who are not scrofulous.
1497. Mr. Metcalfe.] But you do not refuse scrofulous children at Randwick? No; I would if I could, but sometimes I cannot do so.
1498. Do not many children go in there who are scrofulous? Certainly; there are many of them who are very much diseased. Of course I speak as a medical officer when I say that I would refuse them if I could. The directors do as they like; and if you were to see some of them when they come in—their countenances—and the change in their countenances after they have been in some time —
1499. Mr. Ellis.] The improvement? Yes.
1500. In what respect? They look perfectly joyless when they come in, and are in a dreadful state of destitution and filth; and if you had but seen some that I admitted, and were to see them now, you would notice a wonderful improvement in them.
1501. President.] You say that you do not like taking in scrofulous children—Are those the only ones you hesitate about taking in? Yes; or children with any skin disease—with anything the matter about the head.
1502. Is there any regulation as to their age? They are all obliged to be of a certain age, and the directors pick them out at the Benevolent Asylum of a certain age.
1503. Mr. Gould.] Do you know of any reason why the whole of those children at the Benevolent Asylum should not go to Randwick? None whatever.
1504. Mr. Cowper.] Have you seen the children there? Yes, once a year, when I go down there.
1505. Have you ever seen children who might properly be taken into the Randwick institution refused admission? No.
1506. What age is the youngest child taken in at Randwick? At four years of age.
1507. Mr. Metcalfe.] There are little girls there under four I think? Yes; those are special cases.
1508. President.] What are they? I do not know. I object to their being taken in, but only as the medical man. I have nothing to do with the general discipline at all. I go into the committee if I wish to do so, but I never know what goes on in committee.
1509. Do you think the institution at Randwick is healthier for children than the one in George-street? Decidedly.
1510. Do you see any reason why these little children should not be brought up at Randwick? No, I cannot see any reason—no medical reason.
1511. Mr. Cowper.] Do they not refuse to take some every year? To take them from the Benevolent Asylum do you mean?
1512. Yes, from the Benevolent Asylum? No, I do not know that they have ever refused to take any, except on my certificate.
1513. And why do you advise them not to take a child? If the child is not healthy.
1514. What do you call unhealthy? If the child is scrofulous, for instance. I have to select the most healthy, for my own sake.
1515. But you do take scrofulous children into the asylum? Yes, at least children who have no symptoms of scrofula; but I can tell that they come from scrofulous parents.
1516. Mr. Gould.] Do you know upon what principle the committee act in making a selection from the children at the Benevolent Asylum? No, I do not know anything about their dealings at all.
1517. If I understood you correctly, you said that the committee met you there—or members of the committee? Members of the committee.
1518. And arranged as to the children to be taken? Yes. I suppose they take as many as they have room for; I do not know how that is. I am not enlightened as to the secrets of the committee. I am only called in when they want any medical opinion. I do not know anything at all about the Benevolent Asylum. I am never there except once a year when I go to select these children, and I meet Dr. Renwick there.
1519. Mr. Ellis.] Are they only selected once a year? Once a year since I have been medical-officer.

MONDAY, 7 JULY, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.

CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

Maurice Alexander, Esq., Hon. Treasurer, Benevolent Society, called in and examined:—

- Mr. Alexander, Esq. 1520. President.] I believe you are the honorary treasurer of the Benevolent Society? I am.
1521. How long have you been so? I think since 1860 or 1861.
1522. We see, by the accounts of the Society, that you have a considerable sum of money invested? Yes, we have. I believe that the statement in last year's report is correct.
1523. How much is it? According to this statement in the report, it is over £11,000.
1524. What has it accrued from? From legacies left by different parties. The principal one is from Mr. Francis Jones; I do not recollect the others.
1525. What was the amount? Something over £3,000 in the first instance.
1526. We are informed that the interest of this money is not used for current expenses, but that it is reinvested? That is the case as far as the bank deposits are concerned. Of course, as far as the investments in debentures, in the farm, and in the New Zealand debentures are concerned, the interest goes towards the current expenses.
1527. Can you tell us why one portion of the interest goes to pay current expenses while the other does not? It has been our wish to realize as much money as we can.
1528. With what object? To re-erect a new establishment. I think in 1866 or 1867 it was contemplated to erect a new establishment and sell the site of the old one.
1529. In whom is the site of the building in George-street vested? In trustees—the Hon. E. Deas Thomson, M.L.C., the Hon. George Allen, M.L.C., and the treasurer for the time being.
1530. Can you tell us what amount was subscribed to this Society last year? £710 14s. 6d., in 1872.
1531. What was the amount contributed by the Government? That is a different matter, I think. I am not quite so well up in what is subscribed for the assistance of the institution proper. There is a part of the sum granted for the support of children who are brought to us and intended to be sent to the Randwick Asylum.
1532. But what is the amount altogether—whatever the objects for which it is contributed may be? £3,772 15s. 1d.
1533. Mr. Metcalfe.] That is over and above what fines you receive from the Police Office? We have fines amounting to £351 6s. 10d. in addition.
1534. President.] Do you attend the committee meetings? Generally.
1535. Do you find that there is any inconvenience from the committee being so large? No, I have not. I do not think so.
1536. But do you not think the committee would work better if it were not so large? Of course, if the committee were paid, six or eight gentlemen would do the work of twenty; but when their services are gratuitous, or honorary, the question is whether, by having a great many, you cannot make sure of having a quorum.
1537. Do you think that it is desirable to have clergymen on these committees? I do not see any objection to it. We depend on their giving us information, and seeking information as to cases that come before us.
1538. Are you aware that there are two schools on the premises of this Society? Yes.
1539. Were they in existence when you became a member of the Board? When I became a member of the Board it was quite a different institution to what it is now.
1540. Then these schools were not in existence then? I cannot tell you—I do not recollect.
1541. Were not the schools formed after the old people were taken away? Yes.
1542. Why were two schools established? The Catholics did not like their children to be educated with the Protestant children, and vice versa.
1543. Do you think that it is right for two schoolmistresses to be employed? I cannot answer that question. I do not see the necessity of it. I prefer the children being educated together; but that is a sectarian question altogether—a question of opinion.
1544. Is it not a question of economy? I think so. If they were all educated together it would be much more economical.
1545. You have not paid much attention to the schools? I have been there and visited them frequently.
1546. Mr. Ellis.] Could one teacher attend well to more than thirty or forty children? I think not. I do not think that the staff could be reduced. Just as many assistants would be required as there are there now.
1547. Mr. Metcalfe.] But would not the education be better if the children were all together? Yes, there is no doubt of that. That is a mere question of the Denominational or Public School system.
1548. Mr. Ellis.] Are the teachers there certified by the Public School Board? I think not. They have very small infants to teach.
1549. Mr. Goold.] Do you see any reason why all these children should not be removed to Randwick? They are removed to Randwick.
1550. But would it not be better to have no schools there, and take all the children to Randwick? I think that the schools are useful to occupy the children's minds.
1551. President.] But is there any object in keeping them there? We do not keep them longer than we can possibly help.
1552. Mr. Ellis.] But cannot they be sent to Randwick instead of being kept at the Benevolent Asylum? But the authorities at Randwick will not receive them until they are four years old. Some of these children are only two years old.
1553. Mr. Goold.] Supposing that arrangements were made for their removal there, is there any reason why they should not go? I think not. The Randwick Institution would have a great objection to take them as they come off the streets.
1554. Mr. Ellis.] Then is the Benevolent Asylum a preparatory school for Randwick? Not exactly.

1555. Are the children supposed to be made more fit for Randwick? Well, these children have no right to go to the Benevolent Asylum at all, but go there as a last resource. It is not known what to do with them, and so they are sent to the Benevolent Asylum; and it is a mere home for them for a short time. The Randwick people would not take them, so they come to the Benevolent Asylum.
1556. Have you any idea of the average cost of the children in the Benevolent Asylum? I cannot tell that from memory. It would be stated in the report. I do not think it exceeds £8 or £9 odd, but you had better refer to the book for the exact sum.
1557. Mr. Metcalfe.] How is it that this interest comes to be reinvested? The money we have invested chiefly in the bank at 3 or 5 per cent., as the case may be. When the deposit receipts become due, the interest is added to the original amount, and reinvested in the same way.
1558. But you have got some debentures? The interest of them goes to the general account.
1559. Why? Because the Bank deducts the interest and pays it to the general account. We are bound, as far as this £1,000 is concerned—the legacy of Mr. William Manson, of Frazer & Co., to devote the interest of that to current expenses.
1560. Mr. Ellis.] How many lying-in wards are there in the institution? I have no idea; you must get that from the matron. There are a good many confinements during the year.
1561. Do you know whether there is any distinction made between respectable married women and unfortunate girls who come in under the same circumstances? I believe that they try to place them as well as they can; I think that they are classified as well as the limited wards will allow.
1562. Under what circumstances are women and children received into the institution? Under a variety of circumstances. Sometimes they are the children picked up by the police in the streets.
1563. I mean women with children? Sometimes a woman is in destitute circumstances and has no home or friends, and a clergyman or respectable housekeeper, or subscriber, gives a recommendation, and the committee takes the recommendation, and if they can admit the woman they will; but these cases are generally admitted by a recommendation from the Colonial Secretary.
1564. What is the time for which they keep people in the institution? If a single girl comes in to be confined —
1565. I mean all the women with children who are taken in there? These are exceptional cases altogether. Often application is made for a child to be admitted. Very young children take so much attention, and we admit the mother to take care of it.
1566. Do the women who go there to be confined pay anything? We have a rule that a single woman who is recommended pays £2. Of course, if it is found that she cannot pay the £2, she is admitted in any case. They generally come well-dressed, and we say—"We will admit you, but you must pay £2."
1567. And, with the exception of the part devoted to the destitute children, the institution is a lying-in hospital? Yes; and an out-door relief Society.
1568. Do you think that it would be any improvement if a lying-in ward were established in a public hospital, and the Benevolent Asylum left to exercise its charity in the ordinary way? Yes, there is no doubt of that; a lying-in hospital would be very beneficial.
1569. Do the committee ever take the trouble to find out whether a married woman going into the institution is able to pay something? If a married woman applies—of course it is understood that she is a married woman—she is recommended by people that the committee have confidence in, and it is Mr. Mansfield's place to satisfy himself, by seeing her marriage lines, that she is so.
1570. But do you make her pay anything? No; if they apply to be admitted, it is quite certain that they are not able to pay.
1571. What is the doctor's salary? £250 a year. Dr. Renwick has been there a long time.
1572. Mr. Couper.] Are there no fixed principles which guide the committee in admitting these people? Fixed principles! It is not a law like that of the Medes and Persians. If a girl comes in there from the country (we have had them come from Brisbane and Victoria) we know that they are poor and penniless, and we are obliged to admit them.
1573. Do you think that they are sent up from Brisbane and Melbourne for the purpose of being confined here? Yes, chiefly from Brisbane.
1574. Do you know of any instances of the kind? Yes; we have had several instances. These new arrivals too—girls from the "Silver Eagle," and other emigrant ships—we cannot exact the £2 from. We expect them to find their own baby-linen too, but this is not customary.
1575. Mr. Ellis.] But you receive them in any case? Yes, we must receive them.
1576. Do you not think that it would be well to make them pay? You cannot make some of them; you will not find a married woman going in there who is able to pay.
1577. Mr. Couper.] Have there not been cases of husbands going away from their wives in order that the women might go in and be confined, and then coming back again after the confinement was over? I do not think there has been a case of that kind. Men desert their wives, but not for objects of that sort. People may go into the Infirmary who can afford to pay for medical aid, but they do not go into the Benevolent Asylum. I am satisfied that there are few women in the Asylum who have not gone there from dire necessity. Of course, there is no doubt a good deal of imposition and deception is practised with regard to the out-door relief, but I do not believe that there is any in the other cases. Of course these single girls know that the institution is open, and they come in as bold as brass, and, no doubt, we have what may be called "respectable" girls, (belonging to respectable families), who are sent there to be confined, to get rid of the disgrace.
1578. Mr. Goold.] Do they pay anything? Yes, we insist on them paying £2 if they can.

John Matthew May, Esq., Superintendent, Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum, called in and examined:—

1579. President.] You are the superintendent of the Randwick Asylum? I am.
1580. How long have you been so? Since June, 1858.
1581. Was that when it was first opened? No; I was for a few months prior to that paid secretary.
1582. You have been in the institution since it opened? It was open when I took charge—Asylum for Destitute Children—had been open for some few months. When I took charge the removal from Paddington had taken place.

J. M. May,
Esq.

7 July, 1873.
1583.

- J. M. May, Esq.
7 July, 1873.
1583. You have a residence in the institution? Yes.
1584. What is your salary? £350, at present.
1585. Are you allowed fuel and light, and rations? Yes; fuel and light, and rations for myself and some members of my family.
1586. What members of your family? We have six rations.
1587. Do your family assist in the management of the place at all? No.
1588. How many paid officers and servants have you under you? I cannot exactly answer that question without referring to the return.
1589. Would this (Annual Report produced) assist you? This would not give me the exact number. I am preparing certain returns which will contain all the information you require, but I have not had time to complete them yet. (See Appendix H.)
1590. Can you tell us now the average cost of each child in the institution? Including all charges, such as repairs to buildings and so on, about £14 8s. 5d. per head.
1591. Can you tell us what was the income of the institution last year? About £11,125. There were £4,000 from the Government on account of the subscriptions, and for children paid for by the Government £4,183; that is altogether £8,183.
1592. How much was received from private subscriptions? £2,105. In addition, there were £68 for indenture fees, £590 paid by parents on account of children's maintenance; interest on the endowment fund and donations, £185. Total, £2,940 from all these sources.
1593. Do you know how much has been contributed by the Legislature towards the institution for building purposes since its foundation? The Government gave an amount equal to the Cuthill bequest, which was £12,000, and they supplemented that, and then there was a vote of £10,000. I think it was for the erection of a new wing—the south wing—which was built since the institution was opened at Randwick.
1594. Have there not been some other amounts besides these? The Government gave something towards the Catherine Hayes Hospital—about £2,000 if I am not mistaken.
1595. And the land? The land was in the original grant from the Crown.
1596. How much? 60 acres.
1597. How much land have you now? We have the use of 40 acres in addition. It was originally intended for a Benevolent Asylum, but not being wanted, it was given to us with the understanding we should retain it.
1598. That is 100 acres altogether? Yes.
1599. Mr. Gould.] Did the Government give money for a master's residence? Yes.
1600. How much? £1,000.
1601. Mr. Metcalfe.] What did the residence cost? About £1,400.
1602. Then the Government gave three-fourths of the money? Yes.
1603. President.] You have no funds invested but the perpetual subscribers' fund? No other fund, excepting the Cuthill gratuity fund.
1604. Do you know whether the institution is at present in debt? It is.
1605. To what extent? £2,100.
1606. In what way has that debt arisen? It is from the increased expenditure, owing to the increased numbers in the institution and the permanent improvements which have been effected.
1607. How much is due to permanent improvements? A great portion of it—the greater portion. I can enumerate some few of the improvements: the erection of the steam machinery, the improved cooking apparatus, the sinking of the large tank on the south side of the building, which holds 250,000 gallons of water, and is cut out of the solid rock, 80 feet long, 20 feet deep, and 26 feet broad; and our land is all enclosed.
1608. Over what period has this debt been accumulating? For the last seven years it has been slowly increasing.
1609. It has gradually increased during that time? Yes.
1610. Is there any expenditure at present going on in the way of effecting permanent improvements, or is the debt likely to be at all reduced this year? I cannot conceive that it is likely to be reduced, as our income is not equal to our expenditure.
1611. What was the deficiency last year? I beg your pardon.
1612. What was the deficiency last year? £2,415.
1613. Mr. Metcalfe.] And the year before £2,000? Yes.
1614. President.] In what way is the institution governed? By a Board of directors, from which is elected a house committee.
1615. By whom are they elected? A certain number of the directors retire every year, and those who are to replace them are elected at the annual meetings.
1616. By the subscribers? Yes.
1617. Does not the amount of the subscription entitle the subscriber to vote? A subscription of one guinea constitutes a member.
1618. What is the number of the managing Board—the governing body? About thirty.
1619. Mr. Metcalfe.] Does that include life directors? That does not include them. They can also take part in the proceedings.
1620. Do they? Some of them.
1621. President.] How many of these gentlemen are there who could exercise such a power if they chose? I should say about forty.
1622. And there are about thirty directors besides? Yes, about thirty who are chosen as directors.
1623. And there are treasurers and presidents and other officers who can also attend the Board meetings? Yes; I am including them. There may be some few life directors included also.
1624. Then the Board includes seventy people? Yes, about that, but there are one or two ladies who are life directors, and of course they do not come.
1625. Do the rules prevent their coming? No, I do not think so.
1626. How often does this Board meet? The house committee?
1627. The general committee? That is the general committee; they meet weekly.
1628. How often does the Board of directors meet? Once a month.
1629. And they delegate their powers to the house committee? Yes.

J. M. May,
Esq.

7 July, 1873.

1630. How many members is that composed of? About thirteen.
1631. And that body meets once a week? Yes, excepting when the Board meets.
1632. Mr. Goold.] Does not the rule fix the number of the house committee? It does.
1633. President.] What is the number that is fixed by rule? Not less than nine nor more than twelve members, exclusive of treasurer and secretary, who ex officio shall be members of the house committee; three to form a quorum.
1634. Are there any other committees besides the house committee? Sub-committees are occasionally appointed by the house committee for any special service.
1635. Do you think it is desirable to have so large a Board of directors? I think that it would be an exceedingly unmanageable body if they all took part in the management.
1636. Then it is only a manageable body because some of its members neglect their duties? Yes.
1637. It would otherwise be unwieldy? It would.
1638. What is the average attendance? I should say from fifteen to twenty at the Board meetings.
1639. And of the house committee? An average of eight or ten. Our meetings are very well attended indeed.
1640. The Government is not represented on this Board? No, not in any way, but the Inspector of Public Charities has visited the institution once.
1641. How long ago? A long time ago now; three or four years ago.
1642. Have the school teachers certificates under the Council of Education? No, not all the teachers; but our schoolmaster is a certificated teacher.
1643. How many teachers are there? In the boys' schoolroom, the schoolmaster and a male and female assistant; in the girls' schoolroom, a schoolmistress, with two assistants. It is now an absolute rule that, in any new appointments made in this department, it will be necessary for the teachers to produce certificates from the Council of Education.
1644. I think you said that the head female teacher had a certificate? Yes, she has, and so has the schoolmaster.
1645. And the system of teaching is exactly the same as that pursued in the Public Schools? Exactly the same. When I say exactly the same,—we have industrial training in addition to it.
1646. Mr. Ellis.] Are there separate schools there for Protestant and Catholic children? Only for the purposes of religious instruction. We never separate them for any other purpose; they mess together and sleep together, and amalgamate in every way.
1647. President.] Are the schools inspected by the Council of Education? Not necessarily so, unless invited to do so by the directors.
1648. As a matter of fact, are they inspected? They are not.
1649. They never have been? They have been some three or four years ago.
1650. Have they ever been inspected since the present teachers were appointed? No.
1651. Mr. Metcalfe.] Where do you get the books from? We buy them—generally from the same place that supplies the Council of Education. They are exactly the same books.
1652. Mr. Goold.] What is the reason that these schools have not been inspected for so long? The directors have appointed their own examiners, and have not considered it necessary that the schools should be otherwise inspected. They have considered the examiners appointed by themselves to be equally as well qualified as the inspectors of the Council of Education.
1653. Have they appointed any one? Yes.
1654. Who are the examiners? The chaplains and myself.
1655. Mr. Metcalfe.] The examination is as to general proficiency of the children? As to their attainments.
1656. Mr. Goold.] Who are the chaplains? The Rev. Thomas Wilson is the Protestant chaplain, and the Rev. G. M. Garavel the Roman Catholic.
1657. President.] The examinations are held every year? Yes, every year. Prior to the present arrangement being made, two examiners were appointed by the directors: one was Mr. Cannon of the Lyceum School, and the other was the schoolmaster of St. Paul's School.
1658. Are the girls taught needlework in the school? Yes.
1659. At what age do they commence to learn? Needlework?
1660. Yes? Very young. They commence before they leave the infants' school. A child who has been in the infant school two or three years can use her needle well before she is removed to the primary school.
1661. What religious instruction have the children? Do you mean the time occupied?
1662. Yes, and in what way? Religious instruction is conducted by the respective chaplains on Friday afternoons, which are set aside exclusively for this purpose; and then for half an hour daily they separate for religious instruction, which is conducted by the schoolmaster and mistress, the latter being a Roman Catholic; and in addition the children attend divine service at their respective places of worship, and divine service is conducted in the institution by the chaplains for the younger ones who cannot attend service outside.
1663. The older ones go out to church? Yes, they attend their respective churches, and the Sunday-school of the institution, which is conducted on the Sunday afternoons by the school officers.
1664. Are there prayers every day? Yes, public prayers read by the schoolmaster in opening and closing school, and the same by the schoolmistress.
1665. Do the children separate with that? Yes.
1666. The Protestants and Catholics? Yes.
1667. Besides that, are the children taught any prayers? They are taught private prayers, and those they repeat to themselves—or rather are supposed to repeat them—before undressing at night.
1668. Mr. Metcalfe.] Roman Catholics and Protestants? Yes.
1669. President.] They are taught to do this individually—they do not do it by word of command all at once? They all proceed to their dormitories; and immediately after the roll is called they kneel at their bedsides and remain kneeling for some minutes, during which they are supposed to say their prayers; and then they rise and begin to undress. That is done morning and evening.
1670. How many children are there in the institution at present? 816 children, including the apprentices.
1671. How many apprentices are there? About forty.
1672. Mr. Metcalfe.] They were all children, inmates of the institution? Yes, originally.

- J. M. May,
Esq.
7 July, 1873.
1673. President.] What is the youngest age at which you take children? Four years is the regular age, but in special cases we take children at three years of age.
1674. What is the mode of admission? There are regular forms of application, which have to be filled up by the applicant and signed by a magistrate or clergyman, who vouches for the correctness of the statements that are contained in the form. (See Appendix H 1.) This form goes before the house committee and is fully considered, the applicant with the child appearing before the committee at the same time.
1675. Mr. Metcalfe.] What do you mean by "the applicant"? The father or mother or guardian of the child who may be applying for admission.
1676. President.] I see in this form of application for admission there is a statement set forth to which I wish to draw your attention. It is that "children who are admissible into the Protestant or Roman Catholic Orphan Schools"—that is to say, children who have lost either both parents or the father only—"are ineligible for admission" to the Randwick institution. I want to know what are the conditions and circumstances under which children are admitted into the Randwick institution, and why orphans who are eligible for admission into the Roman Catholic and Protestant Orphan Schools are excluded? They are excluded under our by-laws.
1677. Can you tell me for what reason? There are institutions expressly for the reception of orphans, and I should imagine that in compiling the by-laws that was taken into consideration.
1678. What is the object then of the school? It is for destitute children.
1679. Are children who have no father or mother not supposed to be destitute? Children who are abandoned by their parents, or left without friends or protection—children the offspring of parents either or both of whom may be unable to support them, or unfit to educate them, and who may surrender them to the Society—children who may be compulsorily placed in the institution—and children of any of the above classes are received into the institution. Children are received by order of the Colonial Secretary, and provision is made for their support by the Government, but there is a rule that Roman Catholic or Protestant orphans shall not be considered eligible for this institution.
1680. And the meaning put upon that is, that if the children have lost both parents, or the father only, they are not to be allowed in? Yes.
1681. As a matter of fact, have you in the institution no children who have lost both parents? Only those who have been admitted by order of the Government from the Benevolent Asylum. That seems to qualify them.
1682. Mr. Metcalfe.] None others who are orphans? None.
1683. Are you sure of that? Quite sure; they would not come within the rules.
1684. Have you any children there who are the offspring of respectable parents? Well, the parents may be respectable in a certain sense of the word.
1685. Do not people who are well to do sometimes come to see these children? Yes.
1686. President.] In some cases these people are the parents? In some cases parents contribute towards the maintenance of their children. In every case, if a person is, from appearances, supposed to be able to contribute to a child's support, the directors endeavour to compel them to contribute. There are now about 12 per cent. of parents and others, numbering say ninety-six, contributing.
1687. But why should their children be kept there at all? The man may be an industrious man, and able to earn good wages, but he may have lost his wife and not be able to take care of his children at home.
1688. Then can a man get his children into the Randwick Asylum if his wife is dead? Yes. The man is better off than the wife in that respect.
1689. Then if the bread-winner of the family is taken away the children are not admitted? No.
1690. But if the woman dies, the husband could get his children into the institution? Yes.
1691. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is it not a fact that there are a great many bastard children there, whose fathers do not care to have anything to do with them? Yes, but most of them have been admitted from the Benevolent Asylum. Within the last few years the directors have not considered them eligible for admission, but there is nothing in our rules to prevent the admission of illegitimate children, and at the present time an illegitimate child would be considered eligible for admission.
1692. Mr. Ellis.] Would the institution take the trouble to find out whether the father could afford to pay for the child's support? Yes; use every possible endeavour; the most searching inquiry is instituted.
1693. By whom are such children brought in? By the mother herself very frequently.
1694. President.] How many illegitimate children have you in the institution? I do not know. Not many; not more than 2 or 3 per cent.
1695. There is a general impression that there are a great many there? It is not correct. There are very few, except those who come to us from the Benevolent Asylum.
1696. Mr. Ellis.] What is the difference between those who are received from the Benevolent Asylum and any others? We do not go into those cases at all.
1697. You take any number from the Benevolent Asylum? Yes.
1698. And you do not make any inquiry about them? Yes. If a person comes to see one of those children, he comes before me, and I enter the name of the person, and if there is anything wrong an inquiry is at once made.
1699. President.] But if no one comes to see the children, you have no means of knowing anything about them? No means at all.
1700. Mr. Ellis.] Has the institution ever taken any steps to compel the father of an illegitimate child to maintain it there? I cannot speak positively. I know I have often taken steps to endeavour to get at the fathers, but the information we receive with these children is so vague. It is often merely—"child illegitimate," and "mother in the institution."
1701. The father then gets off scot free in these cases? Yes, in nineteen cases out of twenty.
1702. President.] With reference to what you were saying, as to the advantage of a husband over a wife, a gentleman told me of this case which occurred some time ago:—A man on a station in the country lost his wife, and was left with several little children. He was a shepherd, and consequently away from home with his sheep. An attempt was made to get these children into the Randwick institution, but it was unsuccessful; and the same gentleman told me that he had a child apprenticed to him from Randwick, and that after the child was apprenticed, the father came to him, said he was willing to keep his child, that he had been trying to get him out of Randwick, and could not do so. Are these cases possible?
- Applications

Applications from parents to restore children are always gone into, and if the parent can show that he is able to provide for his children, and to contribute something on account of their maintenance in the past, and there are guarantees from a clergyman or other proper person that the man is considered to be in a position to maintain his children, the directors do not hesitate to hand them over, but otherwise they do not do so.

J. M. May,
Esq.
7 July, 1873.

1703. Then a father is not allowed to take his children without paying a lump sum down for them? He is expected to contribute to the past maintenance of the child, and the committee expect him to maintain the child afterwards.

1704. In the case I have mentioned, the father was unable to get his child out of the institution because he could not pay a lump sum down? It frequently happens that parents apply for their children when they have arrived at an age to be apprenticed. We hear nothing of them before, but then, when the children are ready to go out into the world, some person starts up and says—"I have been away, and I would like to have my child—I can provide for him." But the directors think that they can do as well for the child as the mother or father can, and there being no further additional expense, the child is apprenticed for six years.

1705. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is not that child occupying the place of one who has no person capable of caring for it? No. This happens when the child is ready to go out as an apprentice.

1706. Mr. Cowper.] In fact, the Board set their face against keeping children during their infancy and then handing them over to the parents when they become fit to work? Yes.

1707. Against being obliged to keep them when they are useless, and handing them over to the parents when they are fit to work? Yes, exactly so. The case that the President has mentioned might have happened in some district—I mean the case of the man whose children would not be received—some district where there were a number of wealthy people, and it might have been considered by the directors a case in which some little provision should have been made in the district itself where the distress occurred, the institution having no subscribers there. We have children from all parts of the country, and some districts are not at all represented in the subscription lists.

1708. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are all the clothes and boots worn by the children made on the place? Yes, they are all made by the children.

1709. I observed some women's boots being made there? Yes; we make for the Female Refuge, the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, and other institutions.

1710. I do not observe in the accounts any credit for things made on the premises at all? I am preparing a return of the kind, which I have been called upon to do. (See Appendix H.)

1711. In this statement (referring to balance sheet for 1872) there is not a shilling put down for work done? —

1712. Mr. Ellis.] Do the other institutions get their work done gratis? No, they pay for it.

1713. Mr. Cowper.] Surely some of the shoes we saw being made at Randwick were too smart for the inmates of these institutions? Yes; there is private work also done.

1714. Mr. Metcalfe.] Who keeps an account of that? The accountant in the office.

1715. It should go into this balance sheet then, should it not? Yes.

1716. But you see that in this account there is not a shilling stated for work done? It is I think mentioned in the body of the report. It is made an asset of. Here it is:—"During the year, 1,373 pairs of boots have been made, and 6,550 pairs have been repaired, in addition to which, 347 pairs of boots and shoes, realizing the sum of £176 8s. 3d., have been made for the use of the inmates of the Female Refuge, and for the children at the institution for the Deaf Dumb and Blind, &c."

1717. Mr. Ellis.] What became of that money? It was paid into the general fund, and the amount has reduced the expenditure to that extent.

1718. Where does the general account appear? In the balance sheet, under the head of clothing.

1719. Mr. Metcalfe.] There is nothing here as to any payment for nails, hammers, or anything of that kind? It has not been gone into in detail.

1720. I do not see anything credited for work done, or anything paid for materials used in making clothes? The return that I am preparing will give that information. (See Appendix H.)

1721. President.] Do you know on what principle children are drafted off from the Benevolent Asylum in George-street to Randwick? On what principle?

1722. Yes—Why are they sent to the Benevolent Asylum first and not to you by the Government—what is the object of keeping this small number of children in George-street? I can scarcely tell you what the object of keeping these children in George-street is, but I have considered that place more as a receiving house for children who may be picked up in the streets by the police.

1723. How often do you get them from there? When they have what is termed a draft ready—say from forty to fifty.

1724. How often does that happen? We have not had any this year.

1725. Mr. Metcalfe.] How is it you do not take the children who are there now? We could take them if they are eligible in health.

1726. Eligible in health? Yes. We do not take them if there is any cutaneous disease amongst them—the doctor will not pass them.

1727. Mr. Cowper.] Is that the only reason? I do not say that that is the only reason why they are kept there.

1728. You could take all over four years of age? Yes, except such as might be suffering from a contagious disease. I have room for 100 children now, but I should be sorry to see 100 children come in all at once.

1729. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you know why the children here are made to sleep two in a bed? From the want of accommodation.

1730. How many children were there in the institution when you first went to it? 140.

1731. Then there was plenty of space? Yes, but the beds were made large by order of the Board.

1732. President.] What is the largest number of children you have ever had there? We have had up to 900, including the apprentices.

1733. Mr. Cowper.] Can you manage 100 more than you have got now without going to additional expense for officers? Yes.

1734. President.] How long is it since you had 900 children there? About three years.

1735. Does the number who come in annually appear to be decreasing? Yes; the applications are certainly diminishing. I attribute that to the improved state of the times, and also to the very searching inquiry that is made by the directors in all cases of applications for admission.

- J. M. May, Esq.
7 July, 1873.
1736. What is the method of inquiry pursued? Some corroborative testimony, rather more than the mere signature of a magistrate or clergyman, to the applicant's statement—some director perhaps will offer to make inquiry into the case—or the accountant and collector will make inquiry and report upon the case. There is a considerable falling off in the number of admissions—we have had very few this year. The strength of the institution is gradually diminishing, the children going out, and few coming in to take their places.
1737. What has been the cause of their destitution? I attribute it to the migrating population—husbands leaving their homes and going to the gold fields—leaving their homes perhaps with no intention of deserting their families. But they go away, and at last get weaned from their homes. Perhaps they do return after an absence of several months, and make up a probable story of what has happened to them.
1738. How far has drunkenness assisted to bring about this destitution? Drunkenness has had considerable weight, but not to the extent that is generally believed.
1739. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are any of the children scrofulous? Very few among our children.
1740. President.] As far as I understand you, the only evidence you get as to applicants is with reference to written testimonials? If the application is from the country districts.
1741. Have you officers in the country districts to make inquiries? There is an officer whom the directors appoint to do so.
1742. Have you found that the institution has been much imposed upon? I suppose that there is scarcely an institution its existence but what has been imposed upon. A case may come to light occasionally, and I have reported several cases, in which people were able to contribute to the maintenance of their children, and, on inquiry being made, they have been compelled to do so to the full amount of our charge.
1743. What is that? The cost of maintaining the children in the institution.
1744. But if a parent can do that, is there any object gained by keeping his child in the institution? The directors would not do so if the parent were a respectable character.
1745. What is the longest time during which a parent has paid for his child? For years—a trifling amount—from 2s. 6d. to 7s. 6d. per week.
1746. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are these children ever allowed to go home to their parents? No, they are only allowed to see them at the institution.
1747. President.] Where people are paying in that way, have you inquired into their circumstances? Yes.
1748. What are they,—are they very poor? Many of them are in respectable service. For instance: Dr. Lang has a servant who has children in the institution, who has contributed regularly on account of their maintenance, and many others.
1749. Are they widows? Not widows, but the husbands may perhaps be away from them.
1750. They are married women? Yes.
1751. What trades do you teach in the place? The boys—shoe-making, tailoring, carpentering, baking.
1752. Do the children choose their own trades? I should not take a boy for a trade if he had any dislike to it; but there are generally plenty of volunteers for the trades.
1753. Is there any fixed number of apprentices taken by the institution? We should not exceed the number that we have at the present time,—that is, about thirty boys and twelve girls.
1754. What are the girls apprenticed to? They are taught to be domestic servants, and to do needle-work.
1755. Do you make all their clothing on the premises? Yes.
1756. Then you cannot tell us what amount is expended in raw material? Yes; in the return I am preparing I will give you that information, and show the profit or loss in each department. (See Appendix H.)
1757. Could you employ more children than you do at present? We could increase the number of trades if it were desirable to do so.
1758. Then, up to the time the children are ready to be apprenticed out you do not teach them any of these trades? Except a few on probation—on trial. Sometimes, if a boy has a taste for carpentering he is employed in the carpenters' shop, though not apprenticed; he may work with the carpenter for a few months.
1759. Do the children get any industrial teaching before they arrive at the age when they are apprenticed out? Yes.
1760. What do they get? One week in school and one week out, and those who are up to the standard are employed in various industrial pursuits.
1761. In what? On the farm or in the garden; one or two to the tailoring; one or two to the shoe-making and in the kitchen. Generally four each week to the tailoring.
1762. Are these boys apprenticed? They might be, but the number being complete they are apprenticed out afterwards.
1763. Mr. Metcalfe.] Of course they are all of considerable value to their masters when they go out? Yes.
1764. President.] Could they not be taught trades to any further extent in the institution than they are? Teach all the boys trades?
1765. Yes? Our applications are generally for agricultural servants or domestic servants, and we have generally forty boys employed every day in the garden and grounds. We teach them to milk and so on.
1766. Do you raise all your own vegetables? Yes, all our green vegetables.
1767. Everything with the exception of potatoes? Yes.
1768. Mr. Gould.] Could you grow potatoes if you had room? We do grow potatoes, but not to the extent that we require.
1769. Why do you not? We can scarcely do that. It is chiefly on account of the manure. Although we economize all our sewage, we scarcely have sufficient manure to cultivate more than we do.
1770. Could you not employ a number of boys in cultivating all that you required? It is a very exposed place, and we cannot calculate upon the seasons for growing potatoes. It is very near the sea. We grow tons and tons of cabbages and carrots, and things of that sort; but potatoes do not do so well, and we can purchase them cheaper than we can grow them.
1771. Could you grow sufficient carrots and turnips to sell? We have done so in the early years, but since the numbers have increased so much we can consume all the vegetables that are produced.
1772. But I am asking you whether, if you brought the land more under cultivation, you could not sell the vegetables, as is done by an Orphan School in Tasmania? —

1773. President.] Do you not think that could be done? I have no doubt that it could be done, but we should want further supervision for it. What we do raise now is raised at a very trifling cost.

J. M. May,
Esq.

1774. What men do you employ in the garden? A farm overseer.

1775. What does he get? About £90 a year.

1776. And a house to live in? No.

1777. No rations? No.

1778. There is room enough to raise more vegetables than you require? There is plenty of ground, but it is very poor ground. It is nothing but white sand, and it takes a great deal of manure. The want of manure is the chief reason that I do not do more in that way.

1779. Is there any way that you can see of utilizing the labour of these boys, so that it shall be productive of revenue to the institution, at the same time that they are learning something? They go out very young—when they are thirteen years of age; and if they are to be up to a certain standard in school attainments, I do not see that we can do much more than we are doing. A child may come into the institution at nine, years of age, and be so backward that he is really an infant in mind. He has to go into the infant-school, and stay there until he is fit to be removed to the primary school, and while he is there I should not put him to any manual labour.

1780. Is there a matron of the institution? Yes.

1781. What are her duties? She exercises a general supervision over the entire domestic arrangements of the institution.

1782. What are your duties as distinguished from hers? The immediate charge of the institution is vested in myself, under the control of the Board—the control of the institution, and the Catherine Hayes Hospital also. I am responsible for the efficient discharge of all duties by the officers of both establishments.

1783. What then are the peculiar duties of the matron? She exercises a general supervision over the entire establishment—inspects the rooms to see that the women perform their several duties.

1784. Mr. Metcalfe.] Who is the matron here? Miss Probert.

1785. President.] How long has she been here? About ten or twelve years.

1786. Did she resign lately, or was she removed for any cause? She was removed for a short time many years ago.

1787. How long ago? Seven or eight years ago.

1788. Removed by the Board? Yes, she was of course removed by the Board.

1789. How long was she away from the institution? For a short time only—ten days or a fortnight, something like that.

1790. What was the cause of her leaving? Some complaint was made by the lady visitors.

1791. What sort of a complaint? Of incompetency.

1792. Then the same Board that removed her restored her to her position? Yes. Applications were invited of candidates for the appointment: Miss Probert applied, and was re-elected.

1793. Mr. Ellis.] The total amount of the annual subscriptions you receive is about £2,000? Yes.

1794. And the total amount contributed by the Government? Is £8,000.

1795. Then the Government pays £4 for every £1 that is subscribed? Yes, about that.

1796. And yet it is called a private institution? Yes. The sources of its revenue are very unsatisfactory and unreliable.

1797. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you not think it would be an improvement if the Board were reduced to six? I might, in giving an opinion on that point, be considered an interested party.

1798. Mr. Ellis.] As far as the revenue is concerned, this is practically a Government institution? Yes, it is.

1799. Then it would only be a reasonable thing for the Government to be represented on the Board of management? —

1800. How are the children known in the institution—by their names or by numbers? By their names. In calling the roll the names of the children are called, and each child answers his number. For instance, John Smith is called, and he answers, number "15," or whatever it may be. Instead of saying "Yes, sir," he says "fifteen, sir." Each child on admission receives a number, which is termed the local number, and which is marked on every article of the child's clothing.

1801. Are the children generally called by their names or by their numbers? Always by their names. I should not know what a child's number was, except by looking at his hat or other article of clothing.

1802. Mr. Metcalfe.] When they are playing together, how are they called? Always by their names.

1803. Mr. Ellis.] Do you think that any inconvenience arises from having so many children in one institution? No, I have not felt it. Of course it is the increased number that lessens the expenditure per head. There are eleven or twelve returns of other institutions of a similar kind, which I have compared, and there is no institution that I have seen in which the cost of maintenance comes nearly so low as the cost of the Randwick Institution—there is not one that comes within £3 or £4 per head of it. (Comparative statement handed in. See Appendix H 2.)

1804. At what age are children received into the Randwick Institution from the Benevolent Asylum? Generally from four years of age up to nine or ten.

1805. Is there a rule against receiving them below the age of four? They are not received under three or four.

1806. What is the reason for the rule? Well, a child under three years of age would be a mere infant, and require a mother's care, which it would have in the Benevolent Asylum. It occurs to me, in reference to a former question which I did not reply to, that many of the children in the Benevolent Asylum are raised there from infancy, from women who are confined there.

1807. Mr. Metcalfe.] Have you been to Melbourne? Yes.

1808. Did you examine any of the institutions there? I did.

1809. Did you find that they were managed more cheaply there than here? No; they are all much more expensive. The cost there is considerably in excess of what it is here.

1810. Has each child there got a separate bed? Yes.

1811. In every other respect you consider that the management here is superior? Yes. The results here are quite equal to those attained in Melbourne, and they are attained at a much lower cost.

1812. Mr. Gould.] Have you ever been to Tasmania? Yes, I have been there.

1813. Did you visit the Queen's Orphanage near Hobart Town? Yes, I have been there—I am very familiar with the Queen's Asylum; I do not think that it will bear comparison with the Randwick Institution.

1814.

- J. M. May, Esq.
7 July, 1873.
1814. Can you give us any information as to how the children are taught there? The way that they are educated, do you mean?
1815. As to the industrial teaching they get? The industrial training is not so extended as our own.
1816. I was told the other day, by a gentleman from there, that they raise vegetables and milk, and dispose of them in the town, by which means the institution derives a large revenue from the boys' labour? We produce a large quantity of milk—about 700 quarts per week, and that multiplied by fifty-two, at 5d. a quart, would give a pretty round sum.
1817. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you use all that milk in the institution? Yes.
1818. President.] How many cows have you got? There are forty milch cows.
1819. Mr. Gould.] When we were visiting the institution, you showed us some gentlemen's boots made by the boys? Yes.
1820. Were those boots made in the institution—the materials prepared there, and all the fine work done there? Yes.
1821. The "closing" and all? Yes.
1822. Mr. Metcalfe.] The "closing" is done by the boys? Yes: boys who have left the institution and are in the service of Mr. Alderson and others, where they are earning between £2 and £3 a week. They are perfect masters of their trade when they leave the institution.
1823. President.] What is the average number of boys that you apprentice during the year? Between seventy and eighty last year, and the year before that we sent out something like that number.
1824. How many shoemakers and tailors do you turn out every year? Not many; perhaps two or three skilled workmen who have served their time.
1825. Have you traced the after history of many of the boys? I have. Some of the boys are doing remarkably well, and some of the girls too.
1826. Is there any supervision exercised over them in any way after they are apprenticed? No, we have done with them then. They are nineteen years of age when they finish their apprenticeship.
1827. I mean while they are in service? Yes; a continuous communication is kept up with them. Within the last few years their money has been paid into the Savings' Bank, and if the boy's master has anything to report, he will do so when he sends down the money. It is very seldom that we get a bad report of the apprentices.
1828. Mr. Cowper.] Do you know anything of a girl that was apprenticed to Mr. Teece? I do. She would not have been apprenticed to him if he had lived in Sydney. She was apprenticed to him when he was at Twofold Bay, and was as promising a girl as ever left the institution.
1829. Whose duty was it to look after her? Twofold Bay is rather a long way off.
1830. Whose duty was it to look after her when she came to Sydney? We did not know that she was in Sydney until we heard a bad report of her.
1831. Was not a report made to the committee that the girl had gone away—absconded from her master? Not until she had gone.
1832. What steps were taken to bring her back? I can scarcely call to mind.
1833. Do you recollect what became of her? I cannot say.
1834. President.] Do they sometimes write to you? Yes, frequently—very nice letters.
1835. Mr. Ellis.] What do the twenty-eight tons of vegetables that you produce chiefly consist of? They are the vegetables produced on the farm—carrots, cabbages, turnips, potatoes, and green herbs.
1836. President.] What is the allowance of bread for each child? 14 ounces a day.
1837. How much meat is allowed? 6 ounces. We have a very liberal diet indeed. Although there is a ration scale, I do not consider myself strictly bound by that scale, but, as the seasons vary, I find that the appetites of the children are better at some times than they are at others, and there are times when I think it as necessary to diminish the quantities allowed them as at other times I think it expedient to increase them.
1838. When do you find that they have the best appetites? In cold weather.
1839. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you give them puddings? Occasionally.
1840. Do you give them puddings on Fridays? The Roman Catholics.
1841. Not all the children? No; the Protestants have their meat as on other days.
1842. President.] Is the meat roasted? Boiled and baked.
1843. How often is it baked? Once a week.
1844. Mr. Cowper.] Can you give us the cost of the appliances which enable you to do the cooking of the establishment? I could do so, but the accountant would be the best person to do that.
1845. President.] It is only lately that you have had cooking by steam? Yes. It economizes in many ways, both as regards fuel and labour.
1846. Mr. Metcalfe.] Why do you give the children boiled meat on six days of the week? It is a kind of soup. The baked meat does not go so far, and the children do not seem to care about it so much, as they lose their soup.
1847. Mr. Cowper.] How do you make the soup? It is very good. Preparing it in the steam-pans is so superior—the meat is much more tender, and the soup is really excellent. This morning I sent for half a pint of it to the office. It was capital soup, seasoned with nice herbs.
1848. Mr. Ellis.] Do the children get the meat hot? Yes. There is a large steam table, considerably longer than this, and every endeavour is made to keep the meat hot. The soup is as hot as they can drink it, and they can lift the meat into it.
1849. President.] You carry on the washing by steam? The washing is done by hand labour, but the boiling is done by steam. A steam washing-machine has been imported, but is not put up yet. It has arrived from England.
1850. Mr. Cowper.] When do you take the meat out of the soup? Just before dinner—about twenty minutes to 12.
1851. Supposing that you give each child 6 ounces of meat, what quantity of meat do you order? It is 6 ounces of meat before it is cooked. The children are arranged in messes of sixteen, and the several pieces are skewered together before going into the copper—6 ounces for each child.
1852. Mr. Metcalfe.] What weight of cooked meat would that be? Between 4 and 5 ounces.
1853. Mr. Ellis.] Is there not more loss than that? Not more than a couple of ounces, I believe.
1854. President.] That is allowing for the bone too? Yes, and the waste in cooking.

1855. Mr. Couper.] Do you not find the meat over-boiled for eating? No.
1856. What time do you put it into the coppers? About 9 o'clock, and we take it out at 11:40.
1857. Mr. Ellis.] You do not order extra meat to make up for the loss in boiling? No, we do not require it. I think that the 6 ounces is ample. The only extra meat I order is for hospital purposes—10 or 12 pounds a day, but not more; the meat is generally within the limit of 6 ounces to each.
1858. Do you serve the rations out to the children separately? As I mentioned, the meat is skewered in messes for sixteen, and this is divided by the cooks and servants.
1859. It is divided into messes of sixteen? Yes, and the officers go round and see that it is fairly apportioned—great care is taken of that—and everything is done very quickly. It comes from the cook to the steam-table, and is served out quickly; and great care is taken that each child has a fair proportion. The children have enough to eat, I am convinced of that.
1860. President.] Have you any suggestions to make with regard to the institution? In speaking of our revenue, I may say that it would be increased very much if the country districts and municipalities could be compelled to contribute in some way. Our institution is the only one in the Colony into which destitute children can be received, and we receive them from all places. I noticed that in Melbourne, when a district or municipality had no institution for the relief of their own sick, they subsidized the nearest institution to it. At Ballarat alone, the institution last year received as much as £400 from distant municipalities and districts, in this manner.
1861. They were compelled to pay by law? No, not by law.
1862. For children from their districts? No, by voluntary contribution.
1863. According to the children that they send? No, not according to the children they send.
1864. Are all municipalities taxed in this way? No, they are not taxed.
1865. Is there anything else that you wish to add for the improvement of the place? No. I am preparing certain returns which will give you much of the information you require. You seem to dwell upon the industrial training of the children—do you mean that to apply to the training of the children before apprenticeship, or to extend the number of apprentices?
1866. I asked you about it with a view of ascertaining whether they could not be taught before they were apprenticed? In the event of extending the number of apprentices in the institution, in my opinion it would not be desirable to keep them until they are nineteen years of age, as it might prove objectionable keeping boys and girls of nineteen in the same institution. We have fortunately escaped all evil consequences as yet.
1867. To what age would you keep them? Up to the age of sixteen, and then they should go out into the world and complete their term under skilled tradesmen.
1868. They should finish their education outside the place? I think that good tradesmen would be glad to take them when they went out, and they would become better tradesmen.
1869. And then you could train far more? Yes, I might put on fifty or 100 in that way; but it would be too great a responsibility to keep them on the place until they are nineteen years of age.
1870. Mr. Ellis.] Do you think it is desirable to keep children there after the age of twelve? I think they should be kept until they are thirteen; that is not at all too old.
1871. You would not be in favour of keeping them beyond that age? We keep our own apprentices until they are nineteen years old.
1872. Your own apprentices; but could not the children be taught as part of the routine of the institution? Not at that young age. We do teach them to a certain extent in the general routine of the institution.
1873. Cannot the boys be utilized in the carpenters' shop and the gardener's place, and in one way or another, without making them actually apprentices? We do that every day. There are between thirty and forty employed on the farm, and if we require assistance in carpentering they are employed there as well.
1874. President.] Was not an attempt made at sericulture? Yes, to a certain extent.
1875. Is not that a labour that might be carried on by the children? Yes. There is very little labour about it. The principal trouble is in raising the food for the silk-worms. It fell through on that account last season.
1876. Could not more trees be planted—is not the soil suitable? We are planting more trees, but they require shelter and soil. Many people believe that the mulberry tree will grow anywhere, but that is a great mistake.
1877. Mr. Goold.] Have you tried the Alanthus tree? Yes; but it proved a great failure. We have very little shelter, and the southerly winds come up from Botany very cutting sometimes.
1878. President.] Have you ever proposed to the committee the desirability of not keeping the apprentices so long? I have not. It is an idea which has only recently occurred to me.
1879. Do you not think that the children might as well go out at twelve as at thirteen? Many would not be up to the school standard. I think that thirteen should be the minimum. Six years is a long time to apprentice a child—the period should be reduced.
1880. Mr. Ellis.] Can you suggest any means by which the labour of the children could contribute more than it does to the expenses of the establishment? Only in the way I suggest.
1881. I see here that they made 15,000 articles of dress last year. I suppose they would be worth, on an average, 1s. each? I estimate that in the returns I am preparing for you. (See Appendix H.)
1882. What would be about the value of these things—£600? More than that, I think.
1883. I think you could average them at 1s., and say that the annual productive labour is to the extent of £600 in needlework only? But there is more than that—considerably more than that. The farm produces considerably more; and the tailors and the shoemakers. It is what it would cost us if we had to purchase. These are things that must be considered.
1884. Mr. Goold.] Does this estimate that you give include the expenses of repairing the buildings? Yes, everything. The expense per head is £14 8s. 5d., including everything.
1885. And you include the interest of the money expended in building? No.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.

James Bardon, master shoemaker, Randwick Asylum, called in and examined:—

- J. Bardon. 1886. President.] I believe you are the shoemaker instructor at the Randwick Asylum? Yes.
- 8 July, 1873. 1887. How long have you been so? Well, I have been there some eight years or nine years now.
1888. Do you reside on the place? No, I live outside.
1889. What pay do you receive? £2 5s. a week.
1890. And rations? No, nothing else.
1891. How many apprentices have you at present under you? Thirteen apprentices.
1892. Do you teach any others besides these? When they leave, as their time is up, there are two more brought to me on trial.
1893. What age are they when they first come to you? They are not apprenticed before thirteen.
1894. At what age do they come on approval? I should say at about twelve years of age.
1895. How long are they apprenticed to the Society? For six years.
1896. When they leave you are they skilled tradesmen? There are three in Sydney who have gone out since I have been in the place. There are two working at Alderson's, and another in Woolloomooloo at a steam factory there; and there is one at Bathurst earning good wages.
1897. How many have you turned out in eight years? Four.
1898. How many have been under you as apprentices, from the time you began to teach them? I think there were three or four died during the eight years I have been there, besides the four who went away; and there are now thirteen apprentices; and those are all that have been under me since I have been in the place.
1899. What did those who died, die of? One met with an accident outside, in the breakfast hour. He broke his wrist, and it turned to lockjaw. And on last Queen's Birthday, there was another one drowned at Marubara Bay; and the other boy died of some disease—I forget what.
1900. Was there any illness in the school at the time? No.
1901. Could you teach any more apprentices than you have under you at present? I think so, if there was more room in the workshop.
1902. How many more could you teach? We have no room for any more at present—the place is so small. It is quite full now.
1903. But if you had more room, how many could you teach? Another half-dozen, I think.
1904. Do you think that there is any object in the apprentices remaining with you so long? That is the term for which apprentices are sent out—six years.
1905. But do you not think it would enable the school to teach more boys and get them quicker into the world if they remained with you for three years, and then were apprenticed out to some tradesman—you would then be able to teach more? I would not have boys fit in three years to do good work.
1906. But do not people as it is take apprentices to these trades without the boys having been previously apprenticed at all? Yes, they do take them at thirteen years of age.
1907. And would not they be more likely to take the boys if they were half taught? I think that a tradesman would as soon take a boy for six years as for three.
1908. Mr. Metcalfe.] I thought it was an admitted fact that for the first three years of a boy's apprenticeship he would be of little use to his master, who would hope to get a profit out of the boy's last three years work? Yes.
1909. President.] Is it not so—does not a master look to be paid for his trouble in teaching by the usefulness of the boy during the latter years of his apprenticeship? But does not the institution want the profit of the boy as well as any one outside, and should not the institution have the benefit, if any one has?
1910. That is another point to be considered—I am now looking at the apprenticing of the boys. Supposing that the institution thinks that it is desirable to get rid of these boys at sixteen instead of at nineteen—I am asking you whether persons would not be as ready to take them half taught as they are to take them not taught at all? Instead of having them six years I would only have them for three.
1911. You say a boy is no use for the first three years? You generally get them to be worth their keep in about twelve months.
1912. Then, if they are worth their keep in twelve months, they are worth a good deal more than their keep in three years? I should think so.
1913. Then do you not think that tradesmen would be glad to have them after they have served for three years under you? I dare say that they might; but they would not be anything like tradesmen in three years, and when they remain their full time in the place they are fit to go out and take their place alongside of men earning men's wages. There are some earning £2 and £2 10s. a week.
1914. Were you used to having apprentices before you went to Randwick? I have been at Randwick ever since I came to the Colony, with the exception of some two or three months after I arrived.
1915. Were you in business before you came to the Colony? Yes, I had a business of my own in Ireland.
1916. Did you take apprentices there? Yes.
1917. At what age did you take them? At no particular age there. I never had more than two at a time.
1918. How do the boys at Randwick compare with those at Home? They are as good as any boys I have ever been acquainted with.
1919. You do not think that their having been brought up in this Public Charity has made them sluggish, or taken away from them the desire to work for themselves and push their way in the world? No; I think that, on the contrary, it has made them rather sharp.
1920. Do you find that the boys are easy of control? I have found some of them very easy to be taught and very willing to learn.
1921. Is all the work, in the way of making boots and shoes for the inmates of Randwick, done in the place itself? Almost the whole of it, with the exception that sometimes when we are very busy and will not have time to do our own work, we get some tops made and brought in.

J. Bardon.
8 July, 1873.

1922. Are all the boots "closed" in the place? Yes; we do make the whole thing right through.
1923. How many hours a day do the apprentices work? We work from 6 o'clock to half-past 5, with an hour at breakfast-time and an hour at dinner; and we leave off at 4 o'clock on Saturdays.
1924. What do the apprentices do on the Saturday afternoon—are they ever allowed to go out of the place? Yes, they are allowed to go to the cricket-ground connected with the place.
1925. Are they allowed to go into the town at all? Yes, they get leave to go, one or two at a time.
1926. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do they get paid anything? Yes, some trifling payment—I do not know how much.
1927. President.] So much a year? The same as they would get outside the place.
1928. Mr. Metcalfe.] Then the result of your eight years' work is that you have turned four tradesmen out into the world? Yes.
1929. How many pairs of boots and shoes have you made in that time? I cannot tell you that.
1930. Have you made enough to provide for the establishment—made all that are used on the place? Yes, we have made all that are used on the place, and sold a good many besides.
1931. Then the thing pays well for itself, and the expenses are more than covered? I should think so.
1932. How many pairs of shoes does each child use in the year? We make about 1,300 or 1,400 pairs a year for the institution, independent of the outside work, and I suppose there is over £200 worth sold besides that.
1933. Mr. Cowper.] Were the boots we saw when we visited the institution made entirely by the boys who were working in the shop? All the boots in the place were made by the apprentices.
1934. The "closing" and all? The boys who are to go out first are taught "closing" before they leave.
1935. Answer my question, please—Was the whole of the work, including the "closing" of those boots we saw, done by the boys on the place? I could hardly answer that question with truthfulness, because I do some "closing" myself, but there is no work you saw that the boys cannot do.
1936. How long have the boys who made those boots been with you? I suppose about five years.
1937. Mr. Ellis.] At what age are the children apprenticed to you? At thirteen years of age—the same age at which the others go out.
1938. Could they not be apprenticed at an earlier age? They would not have finished their schooling before that. They are at school up to thirteen.
1939. Could they not go on learning a trade and attend to their schooling at the same time? No; the school hours are the working hours.
1940. Could not the time be so distributed that they could spend a certain number of hours in school, and a certain number of hours in learning the trade? Of course that could be done, if the directors wished to have it so.
1941. At what age could a boy begin to learn a trade? I do not think it would be of much use, his beginning to learn the trade before he is twelve or thirteen years of age.
1942. Could not a number of boys be taught the trade without being actually apprenticed to you? Yes; if they were kept in the workshop the same.
1943. Could they not be sent into the workshop on certain days of the week, or during certain hours of the day, to be taught? Of course they could be sent in at any time.
1944. You could teach a boy who was not apprenticed just as well as one who was? Yes, in the same length of time.
1945. The only difference would be, that length of time would enable you to turn out a more perfect tradesman? Yes; I would be sorry to send out a boy who has not learnt his trade.
1946. Would not half a trade be better than no trade at all? No; it is the worst thing that any one can have. It is better to be a labourer than a bad tradesman.
1947. Do you not think a master would be more willing to take as an apprentice a boy of thirteen who had partly learned his trade, than a boy of thirteen who knew nothing at all about it? That might be.
1948. Would he not be inclined to give a small premium to the institution for the sake of getting such a boy? Very likely, if he thought that the boy would be useful to him.
1949. Would not the boy be more useful to him if he had been taught something of the trade than if he had been taught nothing? Yes, he would be a good deal more useful.
1950. Suppose that these 1,300 pairs of boots and shoes, made in the institution, were bought by contract, what would they cost? I could hardly say what they would cost. You get boots and shoes, like other things, of different qualities.
1951. Give a guess at what the cost would be? You would not get the same sort of material that is in those boots and shoes, made-up, for less than 5s. a pair, or, the very lowest, 4s. 6d.
1952. What do you think that the material, for the same number of boots, costs the institution? I do not know anything about that.
1953. Have you no idea as to what would be the cost of the leather, nails, and so on, used in making a pair of boots? I dare say about 3s. a pair, one with another.
1954. Then the saving to the institution, by making the boots and shoes on the place, would be about 2s. 6d. a pair? Yes, to the best of my knowledge.
1955. Mr. Metcalfe.] What are the expenses of the workshop—only your salary? Yes, and whatever the apprentices cost.
1956. Mr. Ellis.] Then the institution gains about £200 a year by having the boots made on the place? More than that. There is private work done to that amount—work done for other institutions.
1957. Who receives the money for boots which are sold by the institution? It is paid in the office. When a gentleman comes for boots, he leaves his order in the office, in a book. It is signed by the manager and sent to me. I take the book from the office and attend to the orders, but I have nothing to do with the money.
1958. Mr. Metcalfe.] Can any one get boots made there who chooses? Yes, we make for almost every one that comes, and a great many have a curiosity to get boots from there.
1959. What do you charge for them? Gentlemen's boots are 10s. a pair, and I do not suppose you could get them for less than 14s. outside.
1960. Mr. Ellis.] Supposing that you made a pair of boots for me, as a director, what would they cost? You would just pay the same as a stranger. The charge is 10s. a pair, unless there is a different style of work in them, when they would be more.
1961. President.] Who buys the leather—you? No. I simply give in a requisition for what I want. I have a book that I send into the office every Saturday morning.

1962.

- J. Bardon. 1962. Mr. Metcalfe.] Who is the leather bought from? Sometimes from Vickery, sometimes from Alderson, or from Saddington & Sons.
- 8 July, 1873. 1963. It is colonial-made leather? Yes.
1964. Mr. Cowper.] Is it bad leather? No; if it does not suit, I have got liberty to send it back.
1965. Supposing that a boy of nine years old were kept out of school, and sent to you—could you teach him the trade? I do not suppose that at nine years of age he would be able to work at shoemaking.
1966. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is there any kind of work he could do at that age? Yes; he might be able to do some light things.
1967. President.] Could you not teach a boy younger than twelve years of age? Yes, you might teach him younger than that, but that is the time when they come to get some sort of sense, and pay attention to instructions. It is not, I think, much use, sending a child to learn a trade until he is of that age.
1968. Mr. Gould.] Do you know of any institutions of a similar kind in England or Ireland? No, I have never had anything to do with an institution of this kind before. I worked at my trade at Home.
1969. You are not aware of the practice in any of the institutions at Home of employing children at a much earlier age than you do here—that they go to school during one portion of the day and work during another portion of the day, so as to make the labour of the children of advantage to the institution? I do not know of it.
1970. Do you not think that that could be done here? I think that it could be done, but whether it would be for the benefit of the children of the institution I cannot say.
1971. Mr. Ellis.] As a matter of fact, are not the female children taught sewing every day there after school hours, or between school hours? I do not know.
1972. What is the highest price that you charge for boots? 12s. a pair.
1973. What is the general price for shoes? I think the highest is about the same price.
1974. Do you know whether the Female Refuge, and the Institution for the Deaf, Dumb and Blind, to which boots and shoes are supplied, pay for them at the rate of 10s. a pair? No, they do not pay 10s.; it is only elastic-side boots that cost so much.
1975. Then these boots are worth only about 4s. 6d. or 5s. a pair? Yes.
1976. In the last report of the Randwick Institution, 347 pairs of boots are said to have realized £176 8s. 3d.—that is at the rate of 10s. a pair? There are others included in that, I suppose, at higher prices.
1977. It says—"347 pairs of boots and shoes, realizing the sum of £176 8s. 3d., have been made for the use of the inmates of the Female Refuge, and for the children at the Institution for the Deaf, Dumb, and Blind, &c." They were paid for, you see, at the rate of 10s. per pair? I should not think that they would be worth so much myself.
1978. President.] When do your next apprentices go out? There will be two go out this year—this present year.
1979. It is only during the last two years that you have been sending apprentices out? There are some who have been out four years.
1980. But they were apprentices at Randwick before you went there? Yes, I think there was a shoemaker on the place for about sixteen months before I went there.
1981. You say that you have only turned out four apprentices? Yes, that is all.
1982. You have been there eight years, and you require to keep an apprentice for six years? Yes. There were apprentices there before I went there.
1983. You mean that there were apprentices in the establishment when you went there? Yes, I think there were only two, to the best of my knowledge, and they could not have been apprenticed for more than a year at the time.
1984. Is there any suggestion that you wish to make as to the improvement of this portion of the business? I do not know of anything, unless that we should have more room and more hands to work. At present, the way we are situated, we would not have room for any more—you saw the establishment when you were out there; it was a very small place.

Henry Monkley, master tailor, Randwick Destitute Children's Asylum, called in and examined:—

- H. Monkley. 1985. President.] You are the tailor instructor at Randwick? Yes.
- 8 July, 1873. 1986. How long have you been so? For two years and three months.
1987. What pay do you get? £2 5s. a week.
1988. Any allowances? No allowances whatever.
1989. Were there any apprentices to the tailoring trade at Randwick before you went there? No. When I first went there, the boys that I have got did not know a needle from a pin.
1990. You began the tailoring business in the place? Yes.
1991. How many apprentices have you now? Four.
1992. What is the largest number you have ever had? Five.
1993. How many apprentices have you turned out into the world? None yet.
1994. You have only been,—how long in the place? Two years and three months.
1995. Have you had any experience of apprentices before you went to Randwick? Yes; I have been at the trade all my life-time, except that for years I kept schools under the Board here. I served from January 1861 to 1869. I am accustomed to teach children.
1996. What schools did you keep? I was under Mr. Wilkins, and I had charge of a Church of England school.
1997. Have you ever had any apprentices under you in this Colony? Not before I went to Randwick.
1998. Have you had any in England? No; though I did carry on a business in England on my own responsibility in — 1999. Did you carry on your trade here? No, not on my own responsibility.
2000. Did you ever work at your trade at all here? Yes, with the leading masters in Sydney. Mr. Holle and Mr. Smith, and the leading masters in Sydney.
2001. How do you find the boys at Randwick in respect to intelligence and so on? On the average they are very intelligent, and they are, to speak candidly, submissive. On the whole they are very submissive, and willing to do their work, but some are not so ruly as others.
2002. How many boys could you teach? I could teach ten apprentices nicely if I had them.

2003. Is there anything to prevent your having them? I do not think so. I am promised more shortly. H. Monkley.
Four apprentices is a very small number to do the work there.
2004. Have you room in the work-room for any more? Yes. There is not room for more than ten apprentices there. 8 July, 1873.
2005. Do you know why it is that you have not had more apprentices sent to you? I do not know why it is.
2006. Do you make all the clothes used in the institution? Yes.
2007. All of them? Yes, all of them.
2008. Is there nothing put out to be made? Nothing that I am aware of—nothing that the children wear. I can give you a list of the articles that have been made on the place since I have been there. (See Appendix I.)
2009. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you make the shirts? I have made two or three Crimean shirts—my daughters have made them.
2010. Are the shirts made by the girls of the institution? The girls, I believe, do make the shirts, but then the worst of it is — (I do not wish to object to any of the arrangements, but the needlework is a thing far before all machine work, because there is no article a gentleman has that can be made by the machines as well as they can be made by hand. The very coats you have on were made by hand, for a machine will not do it. Put a gardener, a labouring man, to work a machine, and he can do it; but a boy learning the trade must know how to put his work “in form.” There is not a tailor in business of any respectability who uses the machine.)
2011. President.] Are the boys taught to use a needle before they come to you? No, I teach them from the beginning.
2012. Do you teach them to cut out? They are not sufficiently far advanced for that. That is a distinct branch of the trade. There is no journeyman tailor who will undertake to cut out. The wages that I get are very small, £2 5s. a week, and it is only the circumstances of my case that make me prefer living there. A man to cut out would get in Sydney from £4 to £7 a week.
2013. Mr. Cowper.] You do not teach them that then? No, they are not sufficiently far advanced, but by and by I will teach them to cut out. It is quite a distinct thing.
2014. President.] Can you teach them the trade when they are younger than thirteen years of age? Yes; I have some now who are younger than that.
2015. What age are they? Under ten.
2016. Do you find them easy to teach at that age? Yes. When I said that I had four apprentices, I omitted to say that I had some probationers who come sometimes.
2017. How many of them have you? Nine. They come one week and another week they go to school, so that I have four and a half of them with me constantly. There are half with me and half in school alternately.
2018. Do you think that is as well as if they all came to you every morning? When they are very young they might be permitted to come to me on alternate weeks, but when a boy is learning a trade with the expectation of earning his living at it he should be kept at it continually. If a boy is only at it now and again he gets to neglect his work.
2019. Mr. Cowper.] But you would have the boy for half a day? I had rather have him for a whole day; and I would get more work out of him in one whole day than I could in four half-days.
2020. President.] Supposing that it is thought desirable that a larger number of children should be taught, could they be taught in that way? They could be taught, but not so effectively as by being kept the whole day at work. It would be better for them to be one week in school and another week at the tailoring business, if they are to go to school at all, because they would get off their line of lesson altogether by continually changing day by day. Boys will play, you know, and they get to be careless, so that you have trouble in mastering them.
2021. Do I understand that with apprentices and probationers you have as many as you can teach? No, I should like more apprentices, because the probationers are not with me constantly.
2022. Do you make any clothes for people outside the institution at all? No, the boys are not far enough advanced to do that.
2023. Mr. Metcalfe.] You make clothes for all the children in the place? Yes.
2024. You do not make clothes for any other institution at all? No.
2025. Nothing for the place is made outside? Not that I am aware of; and see what a quantity there has been made during the time that I have been there.
2026. Mr. Ellis.] When the boys are apprenticed to you, are they supposed to have left school altogether? Yes.
2027. They devote themselves entirely to business? Yes.
2028. What is the youngest age at which you teach boys? About ten; when they are younger than that you cannot depend on their intellect.
2029. Are boys more stupid than girls? I do not think so, and I have had both under my care.
2030. We saw a number of girls considerably under ten learning to sew in the institution? Yes. You can account for that in a feasible manner by the dispositions of the children. A little girl will take her doll and make clothes for it very young. They take to it naturally. They are almost born with a needle in their hands.
2031. And would not a boy be born with an awl? No, with a top and bat rather.
2032. Mr. Metcalfe.] And you think that little boys cannot be taught to sew? I think not.
2033. Not under ten years of age? I do not think so.
2034. Did you ever hear of a child of nine years making a suit of clothes? No.
2035. Mr. Ellis.] What do you suppose to be about the value of the clothing that the boys under you make during the year? I will run it up as well as I can. I did prepare myself for a question of that sort, but I have taken it for the whole two years and three months I have been there. If the jackets were given out —
2036. Suppose they were bought by contract? Then I cannot answer the question.
2037. Have you no idea of what the cost would be? You would not get such a suit as one of those boys wears for less than 36s.
2038. Not by contract? I do not think so.
2039. How much would you allow for labour and how much for material? The material of the cheapest kind and the labour of the lowest description, it would come to that.

- H. Monkley. 2040. What would the material be worth? About 20s.
 2041. And the labour of making a jacket such as that worn by one of those boys would be worth 16s.? No, about 10s. I have overdone it. I should have said they would cost about 30s. each.
 8 July, 1873. 2042. What would be the actual cost of making such a jacket and trousers? About 10s., or I will say 9s., to beat it down as low as possible.
 2043. And the material will cost £1? Yes, about that.
 2044. How many pairs of trousers do you make in the year? About 2,201, since I have been there.
 2045. During the year, not since you have been there, but during the last twelve months? I can hardly tell. I was not aware that I should be asked such a question.*
 2046. The number stated in the report is 262? That is not correct. I have made more than that. That return is not correct.† There is only one kind of trousers mentioned in it, and I have made drill trousers as well as moleskins, and only moleskins are spoken of here.
 2047. Where are the drill trousers mentioned? They are not mentioned, and I have made plenty of them.
 2048. How many pairs of trousers do you think you have made in a year? I can hardly say. I gave in the account for fifteen months. Nearly 1,000 in the year—say 998.
 2049. That is about 800 more than are credited here in the report? Is that the last report?
 2050. Yes, the report for 1872? I have the book at home in which, when anything leaves the tailor's shop, I enter it and the superintendent signs it. I rely upon my book, and take everything from it.
 2051. Will you send us an extract from your book, giving the information I require? Yes, I will. (See Appendix I.)
 2052. Does it cost as much to make drill trousers as moleskin? Yes, quite as much.
 2054. You say that the labour of making a pair of trousers costs about 10s.? No; 5s. for each jacket, 4s. for each pair of trousers, and 1s. for each cap—that is 10s. altogether; and the cost of the labour of making the clothes for the institution for two years and three months I put down at £780 4s.
 2055. Mr. Cowper.] That is for two years and three months? Yes.
 2057. Have you made 1,000 suits of clothes in the year? Yes, over 2,000 in the two years and a quarter. 2,000 pairs of trousers.
 2058. Did you make the same number of jackets and caps? No, not the same number. Sometimes there you are at work on one description of article and sometimes on another.
 2059. Then the gain will not come up to even £500? I summed up the gross, and calculated what it would cost them to have the goods made, and I made it come to £780 during the two years and a half.
 2060. Will you send down your statement? Yes. (See Appendix I.)
 2061. The cost of labour and material? Yes; the cost of the material is almost beyond me, but I will inquire about it.
 2062. You can guess at it? Yes, I can do that.
 2063. Now, do you not think that the boys could be taught a trade just as well without being apprenticed? Yes, of course they could.
 2065. They make the girls learn dressmaking? I do not pretend to understand dressmaking, but the tailoring is a difficult business to understand.
 2066. You do not teach them cutting out? No.
 2067. Then is there anything so very abstruse about mere sewing? But I am speaking of a man going out to earn his living as he should earn it. He should be a good tradesman.
 2068. But I am speaking of a number of children being sent to you to learn something of your trade, so that he might know something of it when he was thirteen years of age? Yes, I have had a boy under me for three or four months, and then he has been taken away and put to some other employment, and so spoiled altogether again.
 2070. But if that were so, would it not be worth while for a master taking a boy taught in that way to give some small premium to get him? Yes, that would do.
 2071. The boy would know something? Yes, that would do very well, that is, as I understand it. I understand that if a boy was put with me from nine or ten years of age up to thirteen years of age, a tailor might then desire to have him as an apprentice?
 2072. Yes? That could be done; there is no doubt of it.
 2073. Do you not think a tailor would prefer to have such a boy rather than one who did not know how to thread a needle? Yes; but, unfortunately, in Sydney there are very few boys bound to tailors. You will scarcely find a shop where there are any apprentices.
 2074. Well, at all events, the boy would be more able to make his own clothes? Yes, he would be eligible for being apprenticed to a tailor. It is not the same here as it is in England. There are very few boys here who are apprenticed to tailors. I do not know but of two all through Sydney. There is Mr. Savage, a master tailor, who has one boy—or he had one some time ago; and I cannot say who it is has the other. I used to notice in my own mind that there were no apprentices in the Sydney shops.
 2075. Do the boys work with the needle? Yes, the needle. The needle, sir, is the main thing,—the sewing-machine is nothing at all.

* NOTE (on revision):—In two years and three months, trousers 2,128; average per year, 945.

† NOTE (on revision):—The gentleman who read the report to me looked at page 14. He should have looked at page 15 of the Annual Report of 1872.

2076. President.] Have you any suggestion to make for the improvement of your department? No. I think that I mentioned that my wages are very low, considering the work I have to do. H. Monkley.
2077. Mr. Ellis.] Have you any rations? No. 8 July, 1873.
2078. Quarters? No, nothing more than £2 5s. a week. I can earn that money, and more too, anywhere. I live out there on account of my wife's health.
2079. Mr. Cowper.] I expect, if you resigned, there would be 300 applications for the situation next morning? I am in doubt about that.

Captain J. S. V. Mein, Commander and Superintendent, Training Ship "Vernon," called in and examined:—

2080. President.] What is your official title? Commander and Superintendent. Capt. J. S. V. Mein.
2081. How long have you occupied the position? For six and a half years. 8 July, 1873.
2082. Since the school was started? Yes, before that; I fitted the ship out.
2083. What salary do you get? £200 a year. I had £190 last year. (See Appendix J.)
2084. How many boys are there at present in the school? Ninety-nine.
2085. Is the ship full? Oh no, nothing like it.
2086. How many more could you take? We could take 260 very well—comfortably.
2087. Without increasing the expenditure? The expenditure would be slightly increased, but the cost per head would be reduced. The only increase would be in the extra rations.
2088. Would there be any further expense for supervision in managing the boys? No, we could do the same for half a dozen as we do for the lot—we could not have any less supervision than we have now.
2089. How many paid officers and servants have you now? There are fifteen altogether. (See Appendix J.) (Return handed in.) 2090. The return you produce shows their offices and rate of pay? Yes.
2091. What trades are taught on board the ship? Carpentering, tailoring, shoemaking, sailmaking.
2092. Are the boys apprenticed to these trades? They learn them as part of their duty, but there is no apprenticing on board the ship; we apprentice them away.
2093. How soon do you begin to teach them trades? About a month after they come on board the ship.
2094. At what age? As young as six.
2095. Which of the trades do you teach them first? Any that they like to choose.
2096. Would you begin teaching them carpentering as young as six? No, not carpentering.
2097. As a matter of fact, do they begin to learn tailoring and shoemaking as young as six? Yes, whenever they are able to learn.
2098. How many boys have you learning these trades? I have returns here made out which will show you the whole of it. There are fifteen learning to be tailors, twenty-six shoemakers, six carpenters, and two sailmakers.
2099. To what age do you keep the boys? Do you mean how long are they kept on board?
2100. Yes, how old are they before they are apprenticed out? They must be twelve years of age, and they must have been twelve months on board the ship.
2101. How young is the youngest boy you have on board? There is only one little fellow who I think is between three and four. I have got his age down in one of these returns.
2102. Are all the articles of clothing made on board the ship? Yes, everything that they wear is made on board.
2103. Do you make anything besides the clothing for the boys on board the ship? We make boots for the girls' school at Biloela.
2104. In what way are the school duties of the boys and their trade instruction divided? They are told off at 9 o'clock in the morning to the duties they are to go to during the day. One division goes into school in the morning and another in the afternoon. I have got the regulations here. This is the regulation on the subject. (Document produced.)
2105. Is the division of the duties shown in this regulation? Yes; it shows the division that goes into school. They are divided into watches, and the starboard watch goes to school in two divisions one day—one division in the morning and one in the afternoon.
2106. Mr. Metcalfe.] Half of each watch goes to school at a time? Yes.
2107. And the other half goes to work? Yes. There is only one quarter of the boys in school at a time, and the other three quarters are at trades or at other work.
2108. President.] The boys in the vessel are divided into watches? Yes, and those watches into divisions—two divisions each watch.
2109. I want you to explain how the time is divided between the teaching in school and the teaching of the trades? Well, those who go to school in the forenoon go to their trades in the afternoon, and the next day also those who are not in the school division go to their trades. It takes two days to make the whole of the boys go to school. They do not all go to school on the same day, because they are in divisions, and two go one day and two the next.
2110. Then a boy is a whole day in school? A whole day, but not on any one day. He does not go into school all day,—only up to 12 o'clock.
2111. Then the boys who are in school to-day will not go to school again until—when? Their turn does not come until Wednesday.
2112. Mr. Gould.] Are they in school all day? No; only for half a day.
2113. And the other half-day they are at work? —
2114. President.] Is that it? Yes; they get about six and a half hours schooling a week, and the rest they get at their trades and the work of the ship.
2115. Is the method of instruction in the school the same as that pursued in the Public Schools? We have now the same method with the present teacher.
2116. Has that department ever been inspected by the inspectors of the Public Schools? Yes, it has been inspected three times; it is inspected every half-year.
2117. It is regularly inspected? Yes, regularly.

- Capt. J. S. V. Mein.
8 July, 1873.
2118. Have you had any reports from the inspectors? They do not come to me. I have never seen any except those entered in the book.
2119. Could you by this system teach many more boys trades if you had them? Yes, a great many; we could teach a whole shipful just the same way.
2120. Besides these things, are they taught the usual routine of ship work? Yes.
2121. They are all trained so as to take in sail readily? Yes, we must have that, but there are not enough for it. The yards are very heavy. We have sail drill every Wednesday, and they are all there.
2122. They are all taught to pull? Yes.
2123. And the compass? Yes, the compass and the lead line, and reefing and splicing.
2124. Do they use the sails? Yes; that is, on Wednesday. We have gun drill on Friday.
2125. Small-arm drill? Yes; but we have not had time for it lately. Cutlass drill for the bigger boys.
2126. Are they taught to swim? Not now. We used to teach them down at Garden Island.
2127. Is it not desirable that they should learn to swim? I think so, but we want a place where they can swim.
2128. How do you bath the boys? They get their baths on board, and wash every week in the bath-house.
2129. Have they been prevented from learning to swim by the ship having been moved up to Cockatoo? Yes, there is no place for them to bathe—there is no place we can go to. It is all either rock oysters or mud—there are no sandy beaches. We did swim at Cockatoo, but it was objected to.
2130. The boys are all taught to pull? Yes, they are all taught to pull.
2131. How many boys have been apprenticed out since you have had the ship? To the end of last month, 223. There are now 224, as there has been one go since.
2132. To what occupations have they been apprenticed: perhaps you can tell us by referring to your returns? No; this is only a return as to their conduct afterwards, and does not state what they are apprenticed to.
2133. Will you furnish us with the information? Yes. (See Appendix J 1.)
2134. What number of boys was apprenticed last year? Our years go from the 1st July to the 30th June. In that time fifty-six.
2135. To what trades? Four, mariners; seventeen, farmers; thirty-one, general servants; one, tailor; two, shoemakers; and one, mason—stone-mason.
2136. Does that represent the proportions in which they are sent out every year: I see that there are four mariners and thirty-one general servants? There are sometimes more.
2137. Are the general servants always in excess? There is the greatest demand for them and for farm servants. There was a greater demand for sailors when the boys were down here; people will not go up to Cockatoo after them. There was one ship actually went to sea without the boys after they had been approved of.
2138. Mr. Metcalfe.] Why were you removed from Garden Island? I cannot say. Mr. Robertson removed us. I cannot say what was the reason.
2139. President.] Is not the proportion of the boys who are sent to sea very small? I think so. There are thirty-one gone to sea altogether, and more went the first year than went afterwards,—that is, during the first year that we sent out apprentices.
2140. Mr. Metcalfe.] Have you watched the career of the boys who have gone to sea? Yes.
2141. Have they turned out well? As a general rule they have. One called upon me the other day who went to sea as second mate of one of Captain Towns' vessels.
2142. President.] Are they taught navigation? They used to be, but I have no time for it now.
2143. If you had an increased number you would want more assistance? We are short-handed now, and are at a great disadvantage.
2144. Do the boys like to go to sea? Most of them do—most of them prefer it, but some do not.
2145. Why is it that so few go? The demand for them among colonial ships is so small, and we are not allowed to apprentice them to English ships. When the Commodore here wanted boys, a great many volunteered, but we could not apprentice them; they must join the Navy for a certain number of years.
2146. They were willing to do that? Yes, the boys were willing.
2147. Mr. Metcalfe.] And they would have been under the care of the Navy authorities—not allowed to go on shore? They would be the same as the men. It would have been the saving of some of the boys.
2148. President.] You think that they should be allowed to go? I think so; I think it would be the making of them. There is a lot of overgrown boys that you cannot handle in any other way, but who could be kept in order on board a man-of-war; and it is always the large boys they want there.
2149. You say that there were more applications for them when the ship was down the harbour? Yes, the captains of vessels came on board and saw the boys.
2150. The presence of the ship attracts people? Yes. They do not know of her existence now. A tradesman in town the other day did not know the ship was in existence. I bought some things and told him to send them on board the "Vernon," and he said he thought the ship had been done away with.
2151. Then you think that it would be beneficial and promote the success of the ship as an industrial school, if she were to be down the harbour? Yes, I think she should be down the harbour. The boys were in better spirits when they saw the ships exercising down there. It is very dull where we are now; it is like being in prison. I feel it so myself, and I am sure the boys must.
2152. You think the ship being down the harbour had a good effect on the boys? Yes, they were smarter in every way when they were in sight of the men-of-war, and they did not want driving. You had only to say "Come along!" and they did whatever you wanted, and now you have to talk to them a dozen times over.
2153. Mr. Cowper.] Were you not in favour of the ship going to Middle Harbour? I was.
2154. Is there not the same objection to her being moored there as there is to her being at Biloela? Yes, but there is a good deal of ground there which might be used.
2155. President.] Is your experience against the ship's being put into such a remote place? What I wanted to go to Middle Harbour for was for the sake of the ground—we should have had there a good piece of ground to exercise the boys on and to mend our boats on.
2156. Mr. Metcalfe.] Did you not go to Garden Island when the ship was moored there? No, they would not permit us to go there, except to play.

2157. President.] Do you know the ground that has been resumed for military purposes by the Govern- Capt. J. S. V.
ment, in Mossman's Bay? Yes, I know it. Mein.
2158. Between Bradley's Head and Sirius Cove? Yes.
2159. Some of the ground there is very good for cultivation? Yes, some of the flats there are very good. 8 July, 1873.
2160. You think that that would be a better place for you than where you are now? Yes, both for cultivation and for exercising the boys too.
2161. Would you advise the bringing of the ship down there? Yes, I should most strongly advise her being shifted from where she is and brought down there.
2162. Have you ever had the opinions of shipmasters as to the boys you have sent out? Yes, I have had their opinions, but not in writing. I have had from Captain Towns a letter which I have sent to the Colonial Secretary. The letter is in the office here.
2163. Are there not some ships owned in the Colony that go to England? I do not know of any myself. Some go to California and China.
2165. What class of vessels have they been apprenticed to? Ships going to California, and China, and New Zealand. Mr. Andrews has had several—he is dead now; and the "Ashburton" has had several. They seem to turn out well in the whalers. Captain Towns had three or four. This boy whom I spoke of as having gone away second mate served his time in a whaler as boat-steerer, and two boys who served their time went back in the same ship.
2166. Do I understand you to say that all the boys are taught the trades you have mentioned? No, not all the boys—only some of them. There are forty-four sailors, and these sailors do not learn trades.
2167. And it is from the sailors that you send out the farmers? Yes, and from the trades too. If a boy is a tradesboy and he says that he would like to go we submit his name.
2168. Have you found any difficulty in apprenticing shoemakers and tailors? We have no applications for them. They do not like us apprenticing them in Sydney, as they do not turn out so well.
2169. They meet old companions? Yes.
2170. Mr. Couper.] Do you find it objectionable to release boys to their parents' charge? I think they should not be released.
2171. Why? They nearly all go back to their old habits and turn out badly. We have them sent back twice sometimes.
2172. The parents are bad? Yes. I have a list here—a record showing what the parents are.
2173. President.] Do you know what boys are convicted of offences? I only know if the information is sent to me.
2174. Do you know what number there are of that class? I do not take it down. I can only tell by the warrant.
2175. You are not informed in any way as to whether a boy sent on board the ship has been guilty of any crime, or simply unfortunate? No, not unless it is placed on the warrant.
2176. Do you not think it is desirable that you should be informed? I do not know.
2177. Would it not enable you to exercise a different supervision over the boys? We cannot separate them in the ship. They are all together. If a boy were ever so bad, he would have to mix with the other boys.
2178. Do you think that it is desirable that a boy who has committed a crime should consort with others, however unfortunate they may have been? No.
2179. Then you do not know what proportion of the boys in the ship have been convicted of offences, as distinguished from the boys who are simply unfortunate? I do not know what boys have been guilty of offences before coming to us.
2180. Do you think that it is desirable that boys—young criminals—who have been committing offences, should be sent to consort with boys who have simply been deserted by their parents? It does not appear to me to be desirable, but I think that those children are all homeless.
2181. But granted that they are all homeless—do you not think that the criminal class should be kept separate from the merely unfortunate class? If possible, it should be so.
2182. You understand that I am not asking you whether it is possible to separate these children on board your ship, but whether it is desirable to prevent those who are known to belong to the criminal class mixing with those who are homeless and destitute? I think so, for some criminal boys may spoil a good boy.
2183. What is your opinion as to the morality—the moral tone of the boys on board the "Vernon";—are they truthful? No, they are not. I think that their morality is very low myself—I know it is when we get them first.
2184. Do you think that it improves? Oh, yes; I know it does.
2185. Mr. Ellis.] Have you any boy on board the ship whom you would trust? I have not got a boy on board the ship that I would trust on shore.
2186. President.] Do you think he would run away? Yes, I think so.
2187. Mr. Ellis.] But would you trust him in any way? No, not with money—not with valuables.
2188. President.] Not a boy on board the ship? Yes—I must make an exception. There are two boys whom I would trust with things.
2189. Mr. Ellis.] Religious instruction does not then much improve their morals? Yes, I think it does.
2190. But if every boy is a liar and not to be trusted, I do not see where the improvement is? I cannot say that they are truthful.
2191. President.] You think that the greater portion of them are untruthful? I think so; but they improve.
2192. Mr. Gould.] They would be worse if they had no religious instruction? Yes, far worse.
2193. President.] What religious instruction do they get? Clergymen attend to instruct them, and there is a gentleman who comes on Sundays to teach the Sunday-school.
2194. Mr. Ellis.] What clergymen? The Church of England clergyman, and the Roman Catholic; the Church of England clergyman has been twenty-three times on board.
2195. In what time? The year.
2196. That is about once a fortnight? Sometimes he does not come once a fortnight. The Roman Catholic

- Capt. J. S. V. Catholic clergyman has been sixteen times, and the Presbyterian thirty-three. This gentleman who is put down as a Presbyterian is not a clergyman, but a teacher.
- Mein.
8 July, 1873.
2197. Mr. Metcalfe.] Does he talk to all the boys of his own persuasion? Yes, the Protestant boys—the Presbyterian and the Church of England boys. The clergymen agreed to let him take them and talk to them on Sunday afternoon.
2198. Mr. Ellis.] Do the boys say morning and evening prayers? Yes.
2199. Separately or all together? Separately.
2200. How are the morning prayers said? On the deck. They are only said by the schoolmaster and the Protestant boys.
2201. What becomes of the others? They say them by themselves.
2202. Suppose that they do not feel inclined to say them at all? We see them say them, and hear them.
2203. Are they obliged to say them aloud? No; sometimes they say them aloud.
2204. Suppose you have got an irreligious boy? He might not say them.
2205. But sixteen visits of a chaplain in a year would not make that boy religious? They used to come oftener when the ship was down here, but they cannot go so often where she is now.
2206. You only guess that the Roman Catholics say their prayers? I suppose that they do say them.
2207. You do not know? No.
2208. The schoolmaster is obliged to read to them? To the Protestant boys.
2209. President.] Do your returns show the number of Roman Catholics on board? Yes.
2210. Mr. Ellis.] What is the proportion? On board the ship?
2211. Yes, of Protestants and Roman Catholics? The return shows the numbers admitted during the year of the different religions. (See Appendix J.)
2212. Mr. Cowper.] Have you not the numbers who are actually in the school? I do not know that I have it here.
2213. Mr. Ellis.] Do the children go on shore to get religious instruction? Yes, they go on shore on Sunday morning; the Roman Catholics early, and when they come back the others go.
2214. Of course they go to their respective churches? Yes, they do.
2215. Mr. Metcalfe.] Some one goes with them? Yes, the officers who are of the same persuasion as the boys.
2216. Mr. Cowper.] Have you any Roman Catholic officers? Yes.
2217. Do they hear them say prayers? They are not told to do so.
2218. Mr. Ellis.] Do the boys say their prayers aloud? They say them in a group—one boy reads aloud.
2219. Who reads? One boy reads for the lot. One group goes aft and the other forward. They kneel down in groups when the whistle goes for them to go to prayers.
2220. Have the Protestant boys any other prayers than those which are said on deck in divisions? No, we have no prayers. They may say them themselves. The prayers are very short. There is the Lord's Prayer and one other prayer.
2221. Mr. Metcalfe.] Have you service on board on Sunday when the boys do not go to church? The Church of England Service—I read it to the Protestant boys. I do not belong to the Church of England, but still I read the service.
2222. President.] The boys go on shore, I believe, to work in the garden? Yes.
2223. Do they all go from time to time, or only a certain portion of them? Yes, all of them, except a very small boy who could not do anything.
2224. What work do they do on shore? They grow the vegetables for the consumption of the ship.
2225. Do you raise all your own vegetables? Yes. We have always an abundance of vegetables in the winter.
2226. Do the boys learn boat-building? Yes; a few of them are employed with the carpenter in building a steam-launch.
2227. Is that the department of carpentering that is taught? That is part of it; and the ship carpentering. They do other things besides that, but that is what they are doing just now. We repair all our own boats and keep them in order.
2228. One of the reasons why the ship was taken to Biloela was that the boys might work on shore in the garden there? I dare say it was.
2229. Mr. Ellis.] Was it with a view of teaching them agriculture that they were put on that little patch of ground? I dare say it was. We grow sufficient vegetables for the ship, but we do not gather all we grow.
2230. How is that? Because it is stolen.
2231. The vegetables are stolen? Sometimes I have known a whole crop of pease to be taken away, and three bushels of onions.
2232. By people on the island? Yes; I have seen them taking them myself.
2233. Mr. Metcalfe.] Children from the shore do you mean? No, on the island.
2234. Mr. Ellis.] How do you find that the children are as to health since the "Vernon" has been removed to her present position; is the health of the boys as good as it was when they were in Woolloomooloo Bay? It is not. Here is a statement of what it has cost for drugs in Woolloomooloo Bay and at Cockatoo. At Woolloomooloo the cost was £8 4s. 4d. for medicines for twelve months, and nothing was paid to the doctor, who attended without fee. Off Cockatoo the cost has been £27 1s. 10d. for twelve months, and £50 for the doctor's fee, and there are less boys on board now than there were when the ship was down here.
2235. Is that difference attributable to the change of place? Yes; we got scarlet fever up there, and I think we got it from Balmain.
2236. President.] In what way did you get it? It came, perhaps, in the clothes of some of our officers.
2237. Mr. Cowper.] Did not some boy who was sent on board turn out to be ill soon after he arrived? Lately, do you mean?
2238. The first boy that was ill with the scarlatina? The first boy that took ill was the coxswain of the boat that went over to Balmain.
2239. President.] Have you had any die on board? Not on board, but in the Infirmary. Yes, one was killed on board; he fell down the hold. That was in the first year.
2240. Do you see any way in which the labour of the boys might be made more productive and go further in

- in payment of the expenses of the ship? The boys are not large enough to do productive labour, and they are few in number. I have a return here of all the things that they have made. Capt. J. S. V.
Mein.
8 July, 1873.
2241. Do you know the cost of the school last year? Yes; here is the report—last year's report. (See Appendix J.) The boys cost £34 a head,—a few shillings more; and £32 a head this year—£2 less. We do not deduct the work they do from that amount.
2242. What was the value of the articles they produced last year? £383 last year, and this year £686 7s. 2d.
2243. What has caused the great increase in this year? The building of the steam-launch; she is a valuable boat.
2244. Built for the Government? Yes. She is all planked and timbered, and we are doing the inside of her.
2245. Mr. Metcalfe.] Coppered? She is not coppered yet, but we are planing her outside ready for caulking.
2246. Does that amount you have mentioned include the cost of clothes? Everything is included.
2247. And the wages and attendance? Yes, everything; fuel, oil, stores, gear, sundries, medicines, paint—everything. They are all carried out, so that you can see what they come to separately. (See Appendix J.)
2248. Mr. Ellis.] Can you get rid of boys as fast as they are ready to go out? Faster. I have a lot of applications ready now, and cannot supply them.
2249. Why? Because the boys are not long enough on board the ship, or not old enough to go away.
2250. Who apprentices them? I do, with the approval of the Colonial Secretary.
2251. What opportunity of knowing the character of an applicant has the Colonial Secretary? There is a recommendation from some Magistrate, or from some person who is well known.
2252. And do you think that the Colonial Secretary has time to read these applications? No. Mr. Halloran lays them before him I think.
2253. Suppose I wanted a boy from the "Vernon," what should I do? If you applied to me I would submit your name.
2254. But if there were a central committee to receive applications for all these institutions, how much better it would be? I do not know.
2256. Mr. Cowper.] Do you ask a boy, before apprenticing him, if he has any preference for a particular trade or calling? Yes, I always ask him that, and if he chooses a trade or would like to go to a certain place that may be vacant.
2257. It is not your habit to apprentice boys to tradesmen unless they wish to go to them? No.
2258. Mr. Ellis.] At Randwick they only apprentice the children to masters of the same religion as the children: do you observe any rule of that kind? We do not.
2259. You apprentice the children to the best of your judgment, with the most eligible masters? Yes, if we can get a master of the same religion as the child, we prefer to do so.
2260. Mr. Cowper.] You do not attribute the ill health of the boys to their having been removed to Cockatoo Island? I cannot say that. They might have got ill anywhere else. I only give the actual facts—one twelvemonth against the other.
2261. There was no scarlatina in the girls' school? I did not hear of any.
2262. Mr. Ellis.] I see that you have a mate and schoolmaster at £146, and a schoolmaster at £130? The mate and schoolmaster did both duties when we had no schoolmaster.
2263. What is he now? He is mate and clerk now.
2264. But I see there is a mate and clerk there too? It is the same person.
2265. But there are two salaries? It is two years there.
2266. The schoolmaster gets £130? Yes; it is a new appointment.
2267. Do the officers get rations? Yes, all on board, except the tailor and shoemaker.
2268. What are the peculiar duties of the boatswain? He looks after the rigging of the ship, and the seamen's work.
2269. Is £100 a year a fair salary for an officer of that kind? I think so. He has not a great deal of work, but his principal work is to handle the ship and look after the rigging.*
2270. The seamen get £72 a year each? Yes.
2271. That seems a high rate? It is the ordinary rate.
2272. I see that the shoemaker and tailor get £157 a year each, and the superintendent gets £200 a year? Yes.
2273. President.] Does the tailor live on board the ship? No, he lives on shore.
2274. Does the shoemaker get rations? No.
2275. Does the musician and barber? Yes, he lives on board.
2276. He gets £72 a year? Yes. He looks after the bath-house and the washing of the boys. We have always a difficulty in filling that place up.
2277. Does the steward get rations? Yes.
2278. And the gardener? Yes.
2279. There are six cooks here? They have only stopped a month each—the place is too hot for them.
2280. The salary of the cook is £84? Yes.
2281. Mr. Cowper.] Who does the washing on board? The boys themselves.
2282. Was it not intended that the washing should be done by the girls' school? I do not know, but we had it done there for some time.
2283. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is it done well by the boys? Yes.
2284. Mr. Cowper.] Finish your answer to my question? Do you want me to say why we do not send the clothes to the girls' school to be washed?
2285. Yes? It was in consequence of getting the itch. The girls blamed us for it, and we blamed the girls for sending it to us; so I stopped sending the clothes there.

2286.

* NOTE (on revision):—He has a great deal of work; his principal work is to look after the rigging, and everything about the ship above the deck, boats, &c.,—in fact the principal officer for carrying on the work.

- Capt. J. S. V. Mein. 2286. Mr. Ellis.] Did any of the boys catch the itch? Yes, and the girls too. They blamed us, and we blamed them.
- 8 July, 1873. 2287. Who do you think had it first? I think that it came from there, or I would not say so. The boys' washed clothes came on board, and after wearing them they got the itch. We had to whitewash the boys and clean them. I had to go ashore myself to boil the sulphur for them.
2288. Are they all clean now? Yes.
2289. How long is it since they had the itch at Biloela? About six months ago, as near as I can guess. I do not know exactly.
2290. President.] Have you any suggestion to make as to the management of the school or to improve its working? * I think we should have at the very least another two hands. We have not got enough to look after the boys properly. We are obliged to trust to these boys to keep watches, and that is not right.
2291. At night? No, in the day-time. There is a man to look after the lower deck, and if anything is wanted on the upper deck he has to come up.
2292. Mr. Ellis.] What kind of men do you want? Mr. Robertson said our names were too grand, and so altered them. He did not alter them to wardsmen, but thus:—altered quartermasters to seamen, master-at-arms to sailmaker and officer in charge of lower deck; the warders were done away with altogether.
2293. President.] Can you make any suggestion as to facilitating these boys getting apprenticed on board ships to a greater extent than they are now, besides the bringing of the ship down the harbour? If the boys were permitted to be apprenticed to foreign-going vessels we could get rid of them fast enough, but we are not allowed to apprentice them to foreign ships. Ships for India have offered to take them, but they are not allowed to go. We cannot let them go to Queensland. Mr. King wanted four boys, and I told him I could not let him have them.
2294. Mr. Ellis.] But then as it is you can get rid of the boys? Yes, on shore.
2295. President.] Not on board ships? No. I have had a boy waiting this six months for a ship. I have had to beg people to take him.
2296. And ships have gone away without, after they have been allotted them? Yes. They won't go up to Biloela for them. I have to put them on board the ships myself.
2297. Mr. Metcalfe.] When you put them on board, do you fit them out? Yes, we give them a chest with all that they require.
2298. And do the masters give them wages? Yes, small wages, and find them in everything else as well.

WEDNESDAY, 9 JULY, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.

CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

Edward Byrne, master tailor, Training Ship "Vernon," called in and examined:—

- E. Byrne. 2299. President.] You are the tailor instructor on board the "Vernon"? Yes.
- 9 July, 1873. 2300. How long have you occupied that position? Five years and nine days.
2301. Is that since the first opening of the school? I was not the first tailor appointed.
2302. What salary and allowances do you get? £157 a year.
2303. You live on board the vessel? No.
2304. You live on shore and find yourself? Yes.
2305. How many boys do you teach tailoring? There are fifteen at the present time. They vary from twelve sometimes up to twenty at others. There are fifteen now.
2306. Has the diminution of number been caused by boys going out as apprentices? Yes, but not to the trade; they have been sent up the country.
2307. How many boys have been apprenticed out of those taught by you since you have been there? Four altogether.
2308. How long were they under instruction? The four who went out?
2309. Yes? I think one was about two years and the other about three.
2310. Have you heard anything of their progress since they left you? Yes, I have heard of them. There are two who turned out remarkably well, and one I have no knowledge as to where he has gone at the present time, but I believe that his master allowed him to go to his mother; and the other turned out badly.
2311. You see no objection to apprenticing boys in this way out of the school to tradesmen before they have been perfectly educated in their trade? I think that they should be, because they cannot be very far advanced in my business on board the "Vernon."
2312. You think they should be what? Apprenticed out. As soon as they are as advanced as they can be on board the "Vernon" they should be sent away. Of course the work on board the ship is rough, and only goes a certain distance.
2313. How soon can a boy learn this business? I have them at eight years old on board the "Vernon," but I think that is rather early, though there I cannot see any objection to their being taught very young.
2314. Do you think that they might well begin to learn at nine? I think so. I have known them learn on shore at that age.
2315. How long would it be before a boy who began to learn at nine would be useful to his master? A couple of years; if he is an intelligent boy he would be of some use within that time. I do not know whether you saw some clothes that were made on board the ship. They were made by a boy of nine, and there were some others which were made by a boy of ten.

* NOTE (on revision):—If not out of place, I would like to refer the Commission to my letter of 3 May, 1869, to the Principal Under Secretary, that was printed and laid before the Legislative Assembly, especially to paragraph No. 2.

2316. You see no necessity for keeping a boy until he is thirteen years of age before he begins to learn? No, not the slightest in my business. E. Byrne.
2317. Have you had experience of apprentices before you went to the "Vernon"? Yes, I have. 9 July, 1873.
2318. Do you find that these boys you are teaching there are as intelligent as other apprentices? Yes, quite so. Some of them are dull—some very dull, but others I think very sharp. There is one who is the sharpest I ever saw at the trade, but he is very young.
2319. How old is he? I think about nine years old.
2320. We are told that at Randwick they do not apprentice their boys out at all—that they educate some to the business of tailoring in the establishment, and do not let them leave until they have been six years apprenticed—do you not think that people would be glad to get a boy who had been taught in the institution for two or three years, and who could serve the rest of his time out of doors? My impression is that a boy taught for two years—say beginning at nine—might go away at eleven or twelve, and be apprenticed until he was twenty.
2321. Do you think that people outside would be glad to get boys in that way? I think so. There is a gentleman who has had one boy from the "Vernon," who has turned out so well that his master is about to apply for another; but I think there is an objection to sending boys out to tradesmen in the city.
2322. What became of that boy of nine years of age who made the clothes that we saw? He was apprenticed as a servant to Mr. Moriarty.
2323. Not as a tailor? Not as a tailor.
2324. Do you think that if there were an officer appointed by the Government, in Sydney, to whom persons might apply who were anxious to get apprentices from various public institutions where boys are efficiently taught trades, such a system would answer? I think so.
2325. Then do you think it would be desirable that such an officer should inform himself, either by personal reference or by reports, as to whether boys were ready to go out as apprentices? I think so.
2326. Do you think that that boy who showed such a natural aptitude for the trade would have succeeded better in life if he had been sent to a tradesman, than going as he did as a general servant? I am satisfied that he would. In our business you can earn £3 a week, and you know all that a servant can earn, and of course he is only in the position of a servant.
2327. Then in point of fact, the natural aptitude of this boy and the training he has received in his trade is thrown away? Yes.
2328. Mr. Gould.] Is he apprenticed? Yes, they are all apprenticed.
2329. For how long? Until they are eighteen years of age.
2330. President.] Do you know how a boy comes to be placed under you to be taught tailoring? He is sent down by the captain. I know that one person applied for two boys and only received one.
2331. Mr. Metcalfe.] Was he a tradesman? Yes, he was. He applied for two tailor boys and there was only one eligible; but as soon as they are eligible they are sent away—the moment they are eligible; and I believe that the tailor boys should be kept for some time in order that the boys may be sent out to a tailor if possible. They are sent out at once, and a boy may be sent out to-day and a tailor might apply for him to-morrow.
2332. You think that if a proper officer were appointed to investigate matters the tradesmen would apply to him? I think so.
2333. Suppose that an advertisement were put into the papers, that there were so many tailor boys ready to be engaged, on board the "Vernon," and that persons wishing to have them should apply on board,—how would that do? That might do.
2334. President.] Do you think that tradesmen in the country, if the thing were made more public, would be glad to get such boys as apprentices? I think so. I do not see what objection there can be to apprenticing boys in the city. The country boys might be apprenticed in the city, and the city boys might be sent up the country.
2335. How many boys could you teach, supposing that the school were increased? If I have to work as I am doing now, I should not be able to teach more than fifteen.
2336. No more than you have now? I do not think so. I have fifteen, but they are not all down at one time.
2337. Why do you say that if you are worked as hard as you are now you will not be able to teach more boys? At present I have to send in at the end of every week an account of my work, and that has to be forwarded to the Colonial Secretary every week. My first object, therefore, must be to show that I have been hard at work myself, by making up a good amount of work, and my next object would be to teach the boys. I believe that my first object should be to teach the boys, and do as much as I can as well.
2338. How do you show the quantity of work done,—by the quantity of clothes made? Yes. At times there are probably twenty pairs of trousers made in a week; and if I make twenty pairs of trousers in a week, and at the same time have boys, some of whom are under nine years of age, to look after and bring forward a bit, I must be pretty busy.
2339. How many pairs of trousers would be a fair day's work? One pair of trousers a day in the city; but then you cannot compare those trousers to the trousers we make on board the "Vernon." There it is only rough work.
2340. But if you were allowed to give your whole attention to teaching the boys, how many could you teach? I could take on the whole number at once, and do work as well. They come to me in watches now.
2341. Mr. Metcalfe.] What work is required of you? I do not know what is required, but the work I do is to make eighteen or twenty pairs of trousers a week.
2342. Do the Government find fault with you if you do not produce a sufficient quantity of work? They do not exactly find fault with me; but at one time the returns were sent back, with an inquiry as to why the tradesman did not do more work; and the Inspector of Charities came himself, and I explained my part to him. I do not know how the affair was settled with the shoemaker.
2343. I think that if you were to represent to the Government that you had too little time occupied in superintending, and too much time occupied in work, they would relax your work a little? But there is another consideration,—the boys must be clothed, and they wear out a considerable amount of clothes, and I must make sufficient to clothe them. There are 100 there now, and they want six suits of clothes in the year—that is 600 suits in the year—that is a lot of clothing.
2344. Mr. Ellis.] That is more than my acquaintances wear. Is the material good? At the present time.

- E. Byrne. 2345. As a rule, is the material good? No, it is not good.
2346. President.] Shoddy? It is next door to shoddy—it is contract material.
- 9 July, 1873. 2347. What does the clothing of a boy cost a year? I cannot say at the present time, but when the clothes were contracted for they used to cost £1 a suit.
2348. Mr. Ellis.] Who accepts the contract? There is no contract now for clothing. When a new boy comes on board he is supplied with three suits of serge—two new ones and one old one—likewise one brown suit, that is four suits of clothing at once.
2349. Mr. Cowper.] What is a brown suit? It is what we call “duck,” but they call it “dowlas” on board.
2350. President.] You mean a summer suit? No, it is a different suit that they get in summer. They are supplied in summer with two new suits of white clothing, and they have this suit of dowlas to work in on shore, so that in reality they are supplied with six suits of clothes.
2351. What do you mean by saying that they are supplied with one suit of old clothes? That is a suit that has been worn in the winter.
2352. But I think you said that when a boy first comes on board he gets two new suits and one old one? Yes, he gets two new suits of clothes, and one suit that has been worn before by boys. He has two suits of new and one of the dowlas or brown duck.
2353. When the boys are sent away, then, their clothes are kept? No; if they go to sea their clothes are given to them—they are well fitted out.
2354. But how could the clothes be given away to new boys if the boys going away take their clothes with them? If a boy goes up the country he is only allowed to take one suit with him.
2355. For how many hours a day do you teach the boys? From 9 o'clock until 5.
2356. Every day? Every day except Saturday, but on Saturday I go on board to get the work cut out for the ensuing week.
2357. Do you make for other institutions besides making for the ship? No, I have sufficient to do to do the work of the ship.
2358. Mr. Ellis.] Suppose a boy to have been learning the trade from you for three years (say from nine to twelve) would it be worth a master's while to pay a small premium to get that boy apprenticed to him? No, I think not.
2359. Then what would his three years' learning under you be worth? It would simply qualify the boy to go out and be placed with a master to finish his trade.
2360. But a master tailor will take the boys at once without their being taught? In Sydney?
2361. I am asking you? I think not; in a very few instances they might do it.
2362. Would they not take apprentices at all? They are not inclined to take apprentices at all in my trade. They are not willing in Sydney to take boys who are unacquainted with the trade.
2363. Suppose that a boy has been learning for three years, would he not be more useful than a boy who has never learned anything? Certainly, and that is the reason why a master would take him from the “Vernon.”
2364. But would it not be worth a man's while to give a premium to get such a boy? I think not.
2365. Then the teaching would be worth very little? The boy would not be sufficiently far advanced.
2366. Not in three years? The work is rough on board the “Vernon,” and a boy would advance as far in two years as in three.
2367. Mr. Metcalfe.] Then when he went out he would have to unlearn a good deal? He is only equal to seaming and felling, and doing rough work.
2368. Mr. Ellis.] What is supposed to be the value of the clothes made on board during the year? The contract price of every suit was £1, and the cost of the material I think would not be more than 10s.
2369. Then the labour of making a suit is worth 10s.? Yes.
2370. How many suits of clothes do you make in a year? If I make twenty pairs of trousers a week, that would be equivalent to about eight suits of clothes a week.
2371. That would be 400 suits a year? —
2372. President.] Do the boys help you to make them? Yes; but they are very little help to me.
2373. Mr. Ellis.] You make about 400 suits? Yes, perhaps a little more than 400.
2374. Then that is a gain of £200 a year to the institution? Yes, a little more.
2375. Mr. Metcalfe.] Were those clothes that we saw on board the ship made altogether by a boy, without any help from you? They were made wholly and solely by the boys, for the purpose of being exhibited.
2376. Mr. Ellis.] From what you said just now, I understood that you were obliged to make out a return in such a way as to show the department was a profitable one, and that in order to be able to show a large amount of work, you were obliged to neglect the boys? No. I believe that I am compelled to produce a certain quantity of work every week, and I have given a proof of it in the fact that the order of the Colonial Secretary was given to inquire why a certain quantity of work was not done in a certain week.
2377. And I think you said that to produce a certain quantity of work you did it yourself, instead of teaching the boys? Yes, exactly so. If I find that the boys are a little behind, and attempt to teach them, then I must exert myself a little more, and neglect them with a view of completing my own week's work—what I consider a fair week's work.
2378. Have you found the boys truthful and trustworthy, as a rule? As a rule they do not tell the truth; some of them do, but as a rule they do not.
2379. What religious instruction do they get? At present very little. When they were in Woolloomooloo Bay there were three different clergymen came off, and they had ample instruction then.
2380. And now? There are very few clergymen attend in the week-days.
2381. Mr. Gould.] Do you hear much bad language amongst them? Very little indeed.
2382. President.] With regard to the truthfulness of the boys, which are the worst,—the boys who have been longest in the ship, or those who come on board last? The boys who come last are more given to untruthfulness.
2383. Then you think that the boys improve on board the ship? Yes, I am sure of it. I believe there is a great improvement in them in every way. I have seen boys come so filthy and dirty that you would hardly like to touch them, and in a fortnight or three weeks you would scarcely know them again.
2384. Do you think that it was right to take the ship up to Cockatoo? I disapprove of it, as far as I am concerned. I think it was not a benefit in any way. I think the boys should be in a more public position, where they can see the ships going in and out, and have their minds disposed for the sea. They see nothing now but broken-down ships.
- 2385.

2385. Mr. Ellis.] Is there any reason why the boys' minds should be disposed for the sea? Yes; I think that was why the vessel was got; she was got for that express purpose. You were asking me about the health of the boys, and I may say that I believe there has been three times as much sickness among them up there as there was among them in Woolloomooloo Bay. There has been more sickness among them in the short time they have been at Cockatoo than there was all the time they were in Woolloomooloo Bay.

E. Byrne.
9 July, 1873.

2386. President.] To what do you attribute that? I think that when the ship was in Woolloomooloo Bay she was more sheltered from the cold westerly wind, which causes the boys to take cold. We had a proof of that when we lay off the point of Garden Island. There the boys all had sore throats, until the Health Officer ordered the ship to be placed in a more sheltered position. That is a proof, I think, of the effect of the cold winds upon the boys. Then I think that persons coming on board from Balmain have brought scarlatina and other complaints which they never had at Woolloomooloo, and there the doctor took charge of the health of the children, and received no extra pay, whereas now the doctor comes from Balmain to attend them.

2387. Mr. Cowper.] Has there not been scarlatina in Sydney as well as in Balmain? Not on board the ship when she lay at Woolloomooloo.

2388. Do you not know of one of the officer's children having died of scarlatina, a few days before the disease broke out in the ship? I was not aware. I was aware that a child died, but I did not know the disease.

2389. Do you not think that the girls' school at Biloela is in a position equally exposed to the westerly winds? Yes; but the girls are well housed, while the boys are exposed, dabbling about in the wet in the early morning; and the westerly winds striking on them then is enough to give them colds. I know it would me. Putting the scarlatina out of the question, there has been more sickness among them up there.

2390. Mr. Ellis.] What kind of sickness? Some eruption.

2391. What do you call it? I cannot say.

2392. Is it the itch? They have had that too.

2393. Where did they get it from? I cannot say.

2394. Is there any truth in the report that they got it from the clothes sent to the island to be washed? There may be.

2395. Have you heard that report? I have heard it said.

2396. Were many of the boys affected with the itch? Yes, a great number.

2397. President.] There are none ill now? No, none sick at the present time.

2398. Have you any suggestions to make for the improvement of the department—the care of the ship generally? Of the ship I do not wish to say anything, but I think there should be some alteration in the system with regard to the boys. I think that the boys under me should be kept longer at the trade previous to being sent away—that mechanics should be given the opportunity of applying for them. Say that a boy is eligible to go out at twelve years of age, he might be kept for some little time, so that a tradesman might apply for him.

2399. Mr. Ellis.] Would it not be as well to announce in the papers that after a certain time a boy would be eligible to go out to a particular trade? I think so. I think that some means should be taken to acquaint the masters in the country as well as in the town that there were boys in the ship eligible to go out as apprentices. That should be done, I think; and the boys should be kept in the ship a certain time after they were eligible, in order to give an opportunity for tradesmen to apply for them.

Edmund Fosbery, Esq., Secretary and Superintendent of Police, called in and examined:—

2400. President.] What is your official position? I am Secretary and Superintendent of Police.

2401. We have thought that you could give us some useful information with regard to the subject matter of our inquiry respecting the Public Charities of the Colony. Have you ever had occasion to inquire whether the parents of any of these children who are admitted into our Public Charities are in a position to support them? We are constantly referred to and asked to make inquiries into the circumstances of relatives before children are allowed to become a public burden. These inquiries are made through the agency of the police generally.

E. Fosbery,
Esq.
9 July, 1873.

2402. What has been generally the result of your inquiries? The results have been reported upon and dealt with case by case—but do you mean my general views as to the results?

2403. Yes? My opinion is that a great many children are allowed to become burdens on the public who should not be so.

2404. And you found that opinion on the inquiries you have made in individual cases? Yes; but I do not say that inquiries are made by the police in every instance. It is only in special cases that they do so. But I think that there is too much facility given to parents to procure the admission of their children into public institutions.

2405. With regard to what institutions have you made inquiries? We do not know what institutions they are for, but I believe the custom is to send the children to the Benevolent Asylum, whence they are afterwards drafted to Randwick, or the Orphan Schools, according to the circumstances of each case. I only refer generally to children who become a public charge.

2406. You refer particularly to those who are sent to the Benevolent Asylum? I think that they are all sent to the Benevolent Asylum.

2407. Do the children in the Roman Catholic and Protestant Orphan Schools go to the Benevolent Asylum first? No, very seldom. Those cases are inquired into by other persons. The children are left at Parramatta on their way down the country, and it is very seldom that the police are referred to about them at all. Their admission orders are obtained upon certain recommendations.

2408. What would you advise as to the best way of checking these abuses? I think that some system should be introduced—there appears to be none at present—rendering it necessary to go through a certain form of inquiry and report before the final order is given for the children to be taken charge of. I think that the facilities are at present too ready to hand for people who wish to dispose of their relatives. I can instance a case where a high official came from a neighbouring Colony with two idiotic children and obtained an order for their admission into the Asylum, intending to leave them here and return to his position in the other Colony.

E. Fosbery,
Esq.

9 July, 1873.

2409. From whom was the order obtained? This occurred some years ago, and I cannot say. The thing was not matured; the order was cancelled, upon a representation of the circumstances being made.

2410. President.] Did this person attempt to get rid of his own children? Yes, or they were in charge of his wife.

2411. Have you any other instances? I cannot charge my memory with any other cases, but I may say that there have been numerous instances in which attempts have been made of an improper nature. I will instance a case that took place last week in which two children were deserted by their parents, who went on a professional begging tour through the country, and left these children with scarcely any of the necessaries of life. One broke his arm, both were of tender years, and the police found them starving with scarcely a rag to cover them, deserted in an isolated part of the bush. An order was instantly applied for for their admission into the Asylum, but upon rigid search being ordered the police discovered the father, brought him back, found that he was possessed of a considerable amount of stock, horses and cattle and sheep, and a valuable free selection; and but for this interference, I believe that the children would have been made a charge upon the public until they were able to earn their own living. In this case the father was compelled to take the children back.

2412. Mr. Ellis.] Do you think that he deserted them? Yes, I believe that he did.

2413. President.] What district was this in? This was in the Jingera district.

2414. Do you think that this happens more frequently in the case of fatherless than of motherless children? Most decidedly, the children are more frequently left in charge of the mother. They are more frequently deserted by the father than by the mother.

2415. Do you know that the rule is at Randwick that a child deserted by the father is ineligible for admission, but that deserted by the mother it is eligible? I think it is a very queer rule. There is one feature of this matter I may mention, as I think it requires notice. In the present state of the law, deserted wives and children have no redress as against husbands in another Colony. A husband has merely to cross the Murray, or step into a Brisbane steamer, and he is as safe from pursuit as if he were in Europe. But the law is different as regards New South Wales and the other Colonies. For the desertion of a child (which is an indictable misdemeanour) the law here permits the remand of a parent charged, on a warrant, to another Colony. The consequence is, that not only do parents desert their children and leave them in Sydney, but they bring them here from other Colonies, and return to their own homes, leaving their children behind them. A case occurred of a man in a respectable sphere of life bringing four young children from Melbourne, giving a lodging-house keeper here £4, and taking the first steamer to Melbourne, leaving the children behind him. Those children would have been a burden upon the public here, but I took upon myself to send them back to Melbourne.

2416. Mr. Ellis.] Is there not an Act in Melbourne providing that such persons may be taken on warrant? No. Under Jervis's Act we can remand from here to another Colony.

2417. Is that Act not in force in other Colonies? No, it must be for a felony, and then it can only be done by a circuitous method.

2418. President.] Then you are of opinion that there should be some legislation of a reciprocal character, to prevent each Colony being burdened with the poor of the others? Most decidedly. I do not see why a man who deserts his wife should not be brought back, just the same as a man who commits a felony.

2419. Mr. Cooper.] Or deserts his illegitimate children either? Certainly.

2420. President.] Is there anything else you wish to bring under our notice? I do not know whether it is within the province of the Commission to make inquiries as to the Asylum for the Insane—as to the treatment of pauper lunatics in the country districts.

2421. I think not; but we shall be glad to hear anything you have to say on the subject? I do not think it can be represented too often that, from want of care and proper means for treating lunatics in the country districts, they are dragged through the country hundreds of miles, frequently under restraint, and at an enormous cost to the public, simply for the purpose of bringing them down to Sydney, possibly making confirmed lunatics of them thereby. I know an instance in point of a woman who was brought twice from a distant part of the country, at a cost each time of £70; and of course the exposure and restraint and the hardship of travelling rendered her disease ten times worse than it otherwise would have been.

2422. And of course the Country is at the expense? Yes. The remedy would be to have in all local hospitals or gaols a ward for the temporary treatment at least of pauper lunatics.

2423. What is your opinion of the results of the working of the Industrial Schools and Reformatory Acts? The Reformatory Act is a dead letter at present, as far as male children are concerned, in the absence of any school for boys; and I also consider that the want of judgment on the part of the Magistrates, in sending children to the Industrial School without fitting inquiry, results in the bringing together of two opposite classes—one class consisting of children who have been well brought up and cared for, but who by the death of their parents or other misfortune are left friendless, and the other consisting of children who have been brought up in the midst of vice and dishonesty. These children are sent to the same establishment, and corrupt the others.

2424. You think that provision should be made for the separation of these two classes of young people? I cannot insist upon the necessity too strongly. I consider the whole scheme useless in the absence of some provision of that kind.

2425. You are not of opinion that all the children who go into the Industrial School are criminal in their character? I know that they are not. Four children were the other day brought into my office whose mother was weak-minded and father dead. They were sent to the "Vernon." One was an infant, and they had been properly cared for as far as they had lived. They were uncorrupted, innocent children, well brought up, and I cannot think that to place them among street arabs was at all likely to advance their future welfare.

2426. Mr. Metcalfe.] Were they all boys? Yes. Of course I am not in a position to say that the superintendent does not take every means in his power to classify them. I have no doubt that he does so; but it is impossible to do it perfectly.

2427. President.] He says that he does not know the difference between criminal children and those who are simply unfortunate? There is another thing that should be done,—a history of each child should be sent to every institution. There is a kind of form filled up now, but it is merely an outline.

2428. Then you do not think that it is desirable to evade the law as is done at present, by Benches of Magistrates giving nominal sentences, and then allowing informations to be laid under the Industrial Schools

Schools Act in order that the children may be sent to an industrial school? I think that the law never contemplated anything of the kind. I think that the operation of the Act should be extended to include neglected children in a broader scope than it does at present. For instance, a child may be selling a few oranges about the street to keep its mother in drink, and it is said to be earning a livelihood, and not to be a fit subject to be brought under the Act. I can give instances of the kind. I consider that where evidence can be brought that a child has been allowed to live beyond proper control of some sort or another, it should be dealt with under the Act as neglected. I do not think that any member of the Commission can have walked about Sydney without wondering that some of the children he sees about the streets are not on the "Vernon."

E. Fosbery,
Esq.
9 July, 1873.

2429. You are of opinion, I gather then, that it would be desirable that a different kind of supervision, and if possible some separation of the children, should take place on the "Vernon"? I think that the distinction intended by the Act between reformatory and industrial schools should be rigidly enforced.

2430. Does not the present system tend to make all the children bad? Yes, I think that a little leaven would leaven the whole lump—that one bad boy will corrupt the others.

2431. Mr. Metcalfe.] You do not think that one little boy can do that? I think that the precocity of some of the young in corruption is such that you would be astonished at it.

2432. But would not that go out of their minds when they came into the institution? I do not think that they ever forget it. I would make another suggestion, and that is, that the country Magistrates should in all cases of this kind receive very precise instructions as to the intentions of the Government as regards the operation of the Act, for they seem now to be in a state of entire ignorance as to the intention of the Act. Only yesterday I received a warrant sentencing a child to two years in the "Vernon," for theft.

2433. Mr. Ellis.] With reference to the imposition that is practised upon these charitable institutions, do you think that it would be desirable to have some central office in Sydney, in charge of an officer or committee whose duty it would be to inquire into and report upon all doubtful cases? I think it should be entrusted to some proper authority, with the machinery of the Government at its disposal, to make inquiries.

2436. And the officer could select the most suitable? Yes; I quite agree with that.

2437. President.] What is your opinion as to the probability of reforming girls who have become prostitutes when very young, and of the desirability of sending them to a reformatory where there are criminals not of that class, rather than to an industrial school as at Biloela? I think that the difficulty of reclaiming a woman who has once been a prostitute is much greater than of reclaiming those who have been thieves; and I am very sorry to say, as far as inquiries made by the police go, that those who were supposed to be reclaimed have very soon relapsed into their old habits. The effort should be to prevent their becoming prostitutes, and we should not shut our eyes to the fact that they become prostitutes here at a very early age.

2438. We have been told that in the Industrial School at Biloela there are ten girls who are recognized as prostitutes: do you think that it is desirable those girls should be in the Industrial School? Most decidedly not amongst innocent girls. There is nothing more easy of corruption than a young girl's mind by one who has been herself corrupted.

2439. Mr. Gould.] Suppose that a girl like that you have mentioned went among a number of other innocent girls, what would happen? She would soon put them in the way of doing the same as herself.

2440. President.] You think that the prostitute class of girls should be dealt with in a reformatory rather than in an industrial school? I think that they should be treated as a separate class altogether. Many thieves are very moral. It does not follow that a shop-lifter is a prostitute; most likely not.

2441. Of the two alternatives which should you prefer: there is a reformatory containing five or six girls, and there is an industrial school with fifty or sixty unfortunates in it—to which of these would you rather send the prostitutes? I think that either course is beset with difficulty, and I should prefer a third classification for girls who have lost their virtue.

2442. And not send them to either? No. I cannot emphasize too strongly my contradiction of the idea that prostitutes are always women. Let the people who think so take the evidence of any person who knows anything of the subject, and they will learn how many young girls become prostitutes. You see them here among the Chinamen, young girls.

2443. Is there no power of taking them away from the Chinamen? No legal remedy might be applicable: improper houses are suppressed on complaint.

2444. Cannot these children be taken up under the Industrial Schools Act? Well, the mother perhaps is living with them—some possibly married to Chinese. The Act has made them very knowing. For a long time it had a marked effect. The children were not neglected, the parents clad them properly, and made, at all events, an outward show of caring for them, to prevent their being seized by the police.

2445. What was the effect of the working of the Act? This was the effect at first, but they see now that the Magistrates will not send the children to the Industrial School unless warranted by the strict letter of the law.

2446. Then you think that the operation of the Act should be extended? Most decidedly. I think that it should be interpreted in its broadest sense, and all neglected children taken charge of.

2447. Would you think a prima facie case sufficient? It would be so now.

2448. I mean whether the children have mothers or not? I would leave the Magistrate to be the judge of the circumstances in a broader sense than at present. It is not a final decision. If two Magistrates give an improper decision, it can be rectified on appeal at a moment's notice. There is no danger.

- E. Fosbery, Esq.
9 July, 1873.
2449. You think that there is no danger of undue severity? Certainly not. I look upon that as a paternal Act for the benefit of the growing population, not as a penal Act, and I think that the Magistrates have looked upon it too generally in the latter light. I do not know how many children are on the "Vernon" now.
2450. Ninety-nine? I think then that if there was another 0 added to that, it would still leave children to be dealt with; and it would be cheap to society at large to deal with them in that way.
2451. Mr. Metcalfe.] But their places would be filled up by others, as these mothers are so bad? No; bad as these mothers are, they mostly have affection for their children, and would go to great lengths to prevent their being taken from them. I think that an Act of a broad character would do much good in that way.
2452. President.] You think that the Act did arouse them at first? I think so; but they saw that there were fixed limits, and that if they kept clear of them their children could not be taken away.
2453. And they evade the Act in consequence? Yes.
2454. Mr. Couper.] Do you not think that the carelessness of the Magistrates in sending children to these schools rather encourages the parents? I do. I think that the Magistrates split straws over the matter, and a few tears from parents make them order a child to be restored to them, against the weight of evidence.
2455. President.] Do you think that children sent on board the "Vernon" should be allowed to return to their parents as easily as they are allowed now? I do not think that any children are discharged from the "Vernon" without searching inquiry being made into all the circumstances, through the agency of the police.
2456. A case came under my notice of a boy who was got out of the "Vernon," who was found to have committed a felony and to be consorting with persons of bad character? The recommendations of the police against a boy's discharge may not in every case have had effect.
2457. Mr. Couper.] Do you not know that children who have been discharged have been brought up a second time and sent back to the "Vernon"? I am sure that they have.
2458. Have not the police told you that a great many of the worst boys in Sydney now are those who have been released by the Government? By apprenticeship?
2459. No—released by the Government? I am not quite sure that they have not been released by apprenticeship and turned adrift; but I believe that some whom the police reported should not have been released have been released.
2460. Have not the police reported that they are disheartened, and do not like to bring cases before the Bench? The police have reported to me that cases which, after due inquiry, they thought eligible, have been dismissed by the Bench.
2461. President.] Do you think that the pretence of an occupation made by a child selling a few oranges or matches should be a sufficient excuse? I think not. The general evidence of want of care should be sufficient.
2462. Mr. Couper.] Do you not think that something should be done to prevent the masters taking the apprentices they receive before a Bench of Magistrates and having the indentures cancelled, without informing the Government or the officers with reference to it? Most decidedly. I think that as long as the apprenticeship lasts, the person in loco parentis is bound to go through a certain form, and communicate with the officer from whom the child has been taken, in order that its future disposal may be a matter of regulation.
2464. Why should it be made more a trade of than at present—at present the children are put out as apprentices at the age of twelve years or thirteen years? Why cannot we get people to take an interest in children at an earlier age, more especially as we might have an arrangement for the Police Magistrates to look after them—an organization of inspectors, and provision made to send the children to the Public Schools? I think it might be done if the number of boys sent out in that way were limited to one or two to each place; but if you allowed one person to take a good many children, I think the system would have the tendency that I have suggested.
2465. But we would not allow one person to have a number of children? Then I should not have any objection to the plan.
2466. Mr. Ellis.] And we should not pay people for taking them? Not pay anything?
2467. President.] Yes, I contemplate suggesting the payment of a small sum. How long ago is it since the code of regulations you spoke of were published? I got a copy last week, and I have it in the office. I will send it you. (See Appendix K.)
2468. You are aware, I suppose, that foundling children are taken care of in the Asylum in George-street? Yes, in the Benevolent Asylum.
2469. Do you think that foundlings are becoming more numerous than they were? I think that cases of the improper disposal of children have become more numerous—I won't say that they are disposed of as foundlings, but murdered; but it would be well not to run into an extreme, by giving people too great facilities to dispose of their children. If there were a foundling hospital organized and well conducted, then not only would unfortunates get rid of their children, but others would salve their consciences by saying—"This child will be well taken care of and brought up, and it is only a burden to me—I will get rid of it"; and would send it to the foundling hospital.
2470. We are told, and have reason for supposing, that the out-door dispensing of the Infirmary is much imposed upon by people taking advantage of that Charity, whose position does not entitle them to assistance? I have not the slightest doubt of it, because I am aware that the thing obtains in London to an enormous extent. I believe that people in very good circumstances indeed avail themselves of it, and the reason that they do so is, not only that they save their money, as that they get good advice and good medicine.
2471. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do not they charge people a trifle in London? They may in some places, but not at all.
2472. President.] Do you think that an institution like the Infirmary should have the assistance of an officer of the police to make inquiries as to the people who get this relief? I think that the authorities of the institution should be exacting as to the form of recommendation being sent by known persons, and that in doubtful cases some inquiries should be made, through some agency or other.
- 2473.

2473. Suppose that the Infirmary were thrown open to all necessitous persons, without having orders from subscribers at all, do you think that the applicants should bring their recommendations from the Inspector General of Police? I think the recommendation should come from some one whose signature would be something more than a mere form; and, with the greatest respect for the clergy, I say that they are much more easily imposed upon than any other members of the community.

2474. Mr. Ellis.] Are there at present a great many young girls living in a state of prostitution in Sydney? Well, considering that Sydney is a sea-port town, and comparing it with other cities, its character is not exceptionally bad in this respect; but there are a great many young girls prostitutes.

2475. Of such an age that they might by authority of the law be removed and placed in an asylum? I think so—under sixteen.

2476. Instead of sending young prostitutes to an industrial school, as at Biloela, to corrupt others, do you think that it would be any improvement to send them to the Female Refuge or House of the Good Shepherd, supposing that adequate arrangements were made for their reception? I think such girls would be better kept apart.

2477. There they would be kept apart from innocent people—from persons who have not fallen to the same state as themselves? I think so.

2478. Do you know anything of the moral character of Biloela? I do not.

2479. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not think that it would be impossible to keep these girls in such an institution as the Female Refuge? Of course, the amount of restraint would be only that allowed by the law, and when they were in good health, and able to earn a livelihood, they would soon take situations. I do not think that any difficulty has been found in the House of the Good Shepherd, however, in restraint.

2480. Do you not see that the difference now is, that the girls are sent against their will to the Industrial School, but they go of their own accord to the House of the Good Shepherd, sorry for their misdeeds? I understood the President to mean girls who would be at present amenable to the Industrial Schools Act, and, as it is in the power of the Government to have Industrial Schools in more places than one, that they could legalize this place.

2481. Mr. Ellis.] That is what I meant? Yes.

2482. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not know that it is the habit of the Chinese to pay some good-looking girl to entrap these younger girls into their places, and to make them prostitutes? I know that some Chinamen will spare no effort to procure young girls; they frequently have one girl among six of them in the same room.

2483. Do you not think that if the police were on the alert, believing that they could get a conviction, that by taking these girls into custody the first or second night, they could be reformed? Well, mothers come to me, and say that they take their girls away, over and over again, but when once the girls have participated in this vicious life they take to it.

2484. President.] Does not that show the necessity of restraining them? Yes, it shows the necessity of restraint.

2485. Mr. Ellis.] Do you not think that some officer connected with the central department, of which we have been speaking, should take all necessary steps for the purpose of compelling the fathers of illegitimate children to support their offspring? The police take action in that way as it is, but the difficulty is —

2486. They take action occasionally, but it is not a duty which is imposed upon them? Yes, it is a regulation of the service that they must see that the mothers lay informations against the fathers who desert their children; but the facilities for getting beyond the jurisdiction of the Courts here are so great, that the law becomes almost a dead letter.

2487. President.] Is there any other suggestion that you wish to make? There is nothing that occurs to me just now.

THURSDAY, 10 JULY, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, ESQ., PRESIDENT.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.

CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

JOSEPH WEARNE, Esq., M.P.

Mr. George Lucas, Superintendent, Biloela Industrial and Reformatory School for Girls, called in and examined:—

2488. President.] You are the Superintendent of the Industrial School at Biloela? Yes, and Superintendent of the Reformatory also.

2489. How long have you been so? Two years the 18th of last March.

2490. What salary and allowances do you get? £135 a year for the Industrial School, and £65 for the Reformatory.

2491. And you have a residence? Yes.

2492. And rations? Yes, rations.

2493. Mrs. Lucas is also an officer of the institution? Yes; she is the Matron.

2494. What pay does she get? £100 a year—last year she got £98.

2495. And rations too? Yes.

2496. The school was established at Biloela when you went there? No, at Newcastle. I went to Newcastle first.

2497. How long were you there before the school was removed to Sydney? About ten weeks.

2498. Do you think that Newcastle—or rather the buildings at Newcastle—were well suited for such a school? No.

2499. Will you please explain why? Yes. The dormitories were too large for schools of that class, and there was no accommodation for classification.

E. Fosbery,
Esq.

9 July, 1873.

Mr. G. Lucas.

10 July, 1873.

- Mr. G. Lucas. 2500. It was the old military barracks? Yes. Fifteen or sixteen girls in a room, especially those who have just come from the streets, is not proper.
- 10 July, 1878. 2501. Were there any other objections? Well, the building was in a dilapidated state—all broken to pieces.
2502. I mean as to the position it was in? No; except for the classification of the girls.
2503. Do you think that it was right to have the school in a position where it could be overlooked by every idle fellow in the town—it was down in a hollow, was it not? Yes; that was not right.
2504. It was so, was it not—the girls could carry on conversations with all the idle fellows who liked to come there? Yes.
2505. The building was in fact situated in a hollow, so that on three sides any one could look down into it? Yes.
2506. That injured the discipline of the place, did it not? Yes; it was so when I went there. Men used to talk from the side of the hill to the girls, and such like.
2507. The back of the building was against a cutting in the hill? Yes; there was a street on top of the hill.
2508. You thought that it was desirable to remove the school from that position? Yes, I did think it should be removed to some other locality.
2509. What do you think of the present situation of the school? It is not a suitable one.
2510. What is your reason for thinking so? The buildings are not suitable.
2511. What about the locality? Well, boats come round, and the men-of-war are in the docks sometimes, and there is only an iron fence between the school and the water-works outside.
2512. What do you mean by the water-works? A reservoir containing the water supply of the island and the "Vernon."
2513. Do you mean that the position of the school is undesirable, considering its close proximity to the dock, into which not only merchant vessels come, but also men-of-war ships with a large number of men? Yes, and the place is in such a rugged state.
2514. Do you think that it is advantageous or disadvantageous that the school should be upon an island? It would, I think, be advantageous if it were not for the ships and the unsuitability of the place for this class of people.
2515. From anything that you have seen do you think that the position is undesirable, bearing in mind the fact that the island was originally used as a prison? Well, the place is very healthy, but the quarters—the officers' quarters—are totally unsuited.
2516. But supposing that they were suitable, do you think it is desirable, from the place having been always associated with the name of a prison, as a position for such a school; have you come to any conclusion on that point, either theoretically or from anything you have seen? I think that it would take a prison to hold those girls when they first went there; nothing but iron bars and strong locks would do it.
2517. I want to know whether you think that the fact of the place where these young people are taken to, who are not supposed to be criminals, but merely unfortunate in the circumstances of their lives in such a way as to make them an object of care by the State,—do you think that it is desirable to take them to a place which has become associated with the name of a prison? I think that it would be better that it had not been a prison; I think it would be better if they went to a place that had not been a prison. I think that is against the place.
2518. Do you think that has had a bad effect practically? I do not know; I do not think it has practically.
2519. From anything you have seen or heard amongst the girls, do you think that they associate it with the idea of a prison? No, I do not.
2520. Then you think that the objection to the place on that ground which arises in your mind would affect the public in an abstract point of view, rather than the girls themselves? I think that if the girls had nicer buildings—
2521. It would not matter whether it was a prison or not? No, I think the name of the place does not affect them.
2522. The Industrial School is for girls only? Well there are three little boys there—one five years old, another three, and the other eighteen months.
2523. The place has been proclaimed as an Industrial School for Girls only? Yes.
2524. Do I understand you to say that you would not advise the removal of the school from that locality if the buildings were suitable, or do you think that the objection arising from the school being near the dock are reasons for removing it? I think that the buildings are not suitable in any shape or form. They are not fit for a school.
2525. Are you in favour of removing the school to some other locality? Yes, if the buildings are proper, but if the buildings are not suitable I would not be. That has been the defect here,—that we have had no proper buildings.
2526. You have nothing but the old prison buildings? No.
2527. With all the old associations of a prison? Yes.
2528. Iron bars, whitewashed walls, barred windows and inclosed? Yes, most of them close; they have got shutters.
2529. You think that this prison-like aspect of the place has an injurious effect upon the girls? I should think that it does not elevate them at all. It would be better if they had a nicer place.
2530. Do you think that it is desirable that young people who have been taken possession of by law for the purpose of rescuing them from misery should be put into a place which has all the associations of a prison? I should not but for the bigger girls taken from the streets. They happen to be in the same school, and have to be taken care of.
2531. You allude to girls of the prostitute class? Yes.
2532. Then you think the effect of the building upon the girls must necessarily be bad? Yes, I think so.
2533. Do you not think that the place where such a school is established should be made as far as possible, consistent with its being a public institution, of a home-like character, and as unlike a prison as possible? Yes, with suitable dormitories and places.
2534. Apart from the prison-like appearance of the dormitories, what other objection have you to them? For the bigger girls they are too big—too large. For those girls that are under ten or twelve I have no objection to the size of the rooms; but for the big girls they should not be above three in a dormitory, according to my views.

2535. Are the girls locked up at night? Yes.
2536. Within those iron bars? Yes.
2537. Is that necessary, in your opinion? Yes, it is; for even there they get out sometimes.
2538. What other objections do you make to the buildings on the island? These buildings?
2539. The buildings which are used for the purposes of the school? These are the only objections I have, —I think that the dormitories are not suitable, so far as the bigger girls are concerned. For the smaller girls the dormitories are large and well ventilated, but for the prison-appearance; and another thing, there is no place for any officers to sleep in the institution, which I consider is essential to the proper working of such an establishment. It is very wrong altogether.
2540. Do you mean that the officers in charge of the girls have to sleep at a distance from them? Yes.
2541. You think that they should be at hand to control the girls and be a check upon them? Yes; there is no chance at all of that.
2542. Do you then simply lock the girls up for the night and leave them? Yes, put all the candles out at 9 o'clock in winter, and half-past 9 in summer, and the girls are left for the night, unless the matron or I walk round the building to see that all is right. There is nobody in charge.
2543. How many girls are there in the school? Eighty-three, and three boys.
2544. Is it full? No; it will hold 120.
2545. How many is the greatest number you have ever had there? 110. We brought 105 from Newcastle, and five were admitted here.
2546. How long has the girl who has been there the longest been there? From Mrs. King's time, when the school was established—six years.
2547. What becomes of the girls on leaving the school? They are apprenticed out. Sixty-two have been apprenticed from there.
2548. From Biloela? Yes.
2549. Are they apprenticed to trades? Servants. I think one was apprenticed to a trade.
2550. What trade? Dressmaking.
2551. To what age do you keep them? Eighteen.
2552. That is the limit allowed by law? Yes.
2553. Do you think that it is desirable the school should keep them until they are of that age? Well, I do not think so. I think if it was a year or two less it would be better. It would be better if they were younger.
2554. How many girls have you in the school of the prostitute class? Eighteen.
2555. These have been upon the streets? Yes, eighteen out of the eighty-three, as near as I can remember.
2556. Does the place admit of any classification of the girls? No, I put these girls to sleep together as well as I can.
2557. But otherwise they associate with the other inmates? Yes, they work altogether, and so on. The little children go to school in the morning and the big girls in the afternoon, but there is no way of keeping them apart. They should not be mixed at all.
2558. What is the youngest age at which they come to you from the streets? I have heard say that they have been diseased up in Newcastle at eleven and twelve years of age, but there have been none since I have been in the institution so young as that—fourteen has been the youngest.
2559. What is the age of the oldest girl you have got in the school? Sixteen years, but they have to put their names down as under that, or otherwise they cannot be admitted.
2560. You have girls there older than that? Yes.
2561. To what age? Seventeen or eighteen. I have to go by the warrant.
2562. Do you think that it is desirable to have these girls in an industrial school? No, I think that in the Reformatory the thieves and prostitutes should be together.
2563. With regard to that opinion, experience proves that girls may be guilty of thieving, and in point of fact thieves, but still they will not prostitute themselves? It is quite likely, but I think most of those girls are thieves.
2564. But it does not follow that a thief is a prostitute? No.
2565. And certainly not that a child guilty of one act of petty larceny should be a prostitute? No.
2566. And if that is the case, should prostitutes be allowed to mingle with them and corrupt those who are still uncorrupt? There are so few of the others.
2567. You think it is better for them to corrupt five in the Reformatory than ten in the Industrial School; but still, if it is desirable for them to be in one place or the other, should they be put amongst either class? I do not think so, if it could be avoided; but if you are compelled to mix them, the prostitutes should go with the thieves.
2568. What is your opinion as to the ultimate chance or probability of reforming girls who have been once on the streets? I think that a great many have reformed.
2569. Do you found that upon the observation of the school? Not only observation of the school, but observation through life.
2570. Do you think that this reform takes place at so early a period? I have known convict women to reform.
2571. But they were women advanced in years, whose passions were toned down? No; women of twenty.
2572. But had they not then a better chance of reclaiming their character, in the peculiar circumstances of the Colony, than girls who are taken off the streets now? No. If girls go out to service and then go back to their parents in Sydney, there is little chance for them; but if they are got away into the country they will do better.
2573. At all events, you are not in favour of sending prostitutes to the Industrial School? No. I think that it is a mistake. I think that there should be a place for them, and there should be plenty of employment for them, so that they could work and pay their own expenses, in a place properly built and arranged. I would let them out at the end of two years, by some one going bail for them.
2574. How many of this class have been apprenticed since you have been in the school? Nearly thirty.
2575. Prostitutes? Yes.
2576. Of how many have you heard since they left the school? There is a large number not out of their apprenticeship yet.

- Mr. G. Lucas. 2577. But of how many girls' progress have you heard since they left you? I have heard of a good many.
- 10 July, 1873. 2578. About how many? Fourteen or fifteen. Some are out of their time, and have gone to service again in one or two instances.
2579. In how many instances have the girls turned out badly? I have not heard of any leaving their apprenticeship and going on the streets; they have hardly got out of their time yet.
2580. Have any of them run away from their employers? Some have—about six.
2581. Out of how many? There have been sixty-two apprenticed.
2582. I think you said you had heard of fourteen or fifteen since? Yes.
2583. And out of those fourteen or fifteen there are six whom you know have turned out badly? They have run away, and been taken back again. I have only heard of one who left her apprenticeship altogether.
2584. About how old are they? Sixteen or seventeen.
2585. Is it the result of your experience that it is undesirable to have to do with girls of this class? If they are taken up at all (which I believe is desirable), they should be put into some place by themselves, and made to earn their living.
2586. Do you think that is desirable in the case of girls of sixteen or seventeen? I think it would be better. I think that sixteen would be about the proper age for them to be kept in the school—from twelve to sixteen. That is about the worst time with them.
2587. You think that it is useless to deal with a prostitute above the age of sixteen unless she shows a disposition to help herself? Yes. I think that it is of use if they are put into a proper building, where they can be properly classified—a place made purposely for them.
2588. Mr. Metcalfe.] You do not think that it is of much use at Biloela? No, not for the big girls.
2589. Why do you think so? Because there are too many of them together, and too many sleep together. If there are ten girls in a room and four want to reform, the other six will not allow them.
2590. President.] Is it not a fact that from time to time you have had girls sent to the Industrial School who should have been sent to the Reformatory? I have not, except on one occasion, when I sent the girl to the Reformatory—a girl named Tout, sent, for thieving, to the Industrial School. I sent her to the Reformatory. There have been others sent to the Reformatory for having no lawful means of support, but who did not commit any crime.
2591. Girls who should have been sent to the Industrial School? Yes.
2592. This shows that the Magistrates did not understand the class of people for whom the schools were intended? Very much so. That little girl Dangar—as soon as I got the warrant I took it to Mr. Halloran, and showed it to him. She is the girl that was sent down from Goulburn.
2593. She was in the family-way? No; we have only had one girl there in the family-way.
2594. What age was she? I think fourteen; she was sent there as fourteen.
2595. What has become of the baby? It is not born yet. We have sent the girl to the Asylum to be confined.
2596. What industrial training do the girls receive? They learn to wash, mangle, iron, and sew. They make their own clothes.
2597. All the clothes worn by the girls are made in the school? Yes.
2598. Are they all taught to wash? Yes, all above twelve years of age. I always send the small ones with the bigger ones,—five strong girls and a little one.
2599. Then all above that age learn to wash? Yes.
2600. Are they all taught to sew? Yes.
2601. Whatever their age may be? Yes, whatever their age—from the smallest child; and they do their own cooking now.
2602. What officers have you under you in the institution? The clerk and storekeeper, the house matron, matron, two sub-matrons, laundress, and gate-keeper.
2603. Is that all? And the messenger,—the carter and messenger.
2604. Are the children taught the use of the sewing-machine? No. We had sewing-machines, but Mr. Robertson objected, and said the girls should learn to make their own husbands' shirts, and do their own work.
2605. Have you a sewing-machine? We have two, but they are not used on account of that,—that they should learn sewing by hand.
2606. But could they not learn hand-sewing just as well? Yes, but there would not be work for them with the other.
2607. But their whole time now cannot be occupied in making clothes for themselves? We have thirty-six children who can hardly do anything.
2608. How many have you who can sew? A great many have been admitted who have not been taught to sew. Of twenty-five admissions during the present year, fifteen have to be taught to sew—in fact, taught everything. Some can do almost anything, while others cannot hem the simplest things at fourteen or fifteen years of age; they are more trouble than the little children.
2609. Is it not your opinion that they could do work for other institutions? They would do if the place was not quite so straggling. The place is so large,—there is so much cleaning and sweeping that it takes all the girls' time, with the exception of the time occupied with needlework and the school.
2610. How much time is devoted to needlework? The big girls from 9 till 12 in the morning, and the little ones from 2 till 4 in the afternoon. They have to pump the water. Every drop of water that is used has to be raised with the force-pump.
2611. For how many hours a day do the children go to school? From 9 till 12, the little ones go; and the big ones in the afternoon from 2 till 4. The big ones and the small ones do not go together. I keep the girls of the prostitute class to go in the afternoon generally.
2612. By themselves? Yes, with the exception of one or two big girls that are nearly the same size, and that have to work with them.
2613. Why have they to work with them? In the kitchen and the laundry.
2614. Do you think that the big girls are safer from being contaminated by these prostitutes than the little children are? I do not think so, but we cannot keep them apart as the school is situated.
2615. Do the other girls know why it is that girls of the prostitute class are kept apart? No, I do not think so.

2616. You think that the fact is not known? No, I do not think it is.
2617. You endeavour to keep the fact concealed that these girls are of this class? Yes; so far as we know, they do not know; but I suppose that they find it out by the distinctions that are made sometimes when they are classified for the dormitories. Mr. G. Lucas.
10 July, 1873.
2618. Have you had much insubordination amongst them since you have been at Biloela? Yes, a great deal.
2619. Lately? Yes, and some lately.
2620. What was the last? The day before you went there, one of the girls in the school was going to strike the schoolmistress with an inkstand; and to-day I heard, just as I came away, that the schoolmistress's box had been broken open and robbed.
2621. Has there been as much insubordination at Biloela as there was at Newcastle? No; they obey orders here a great deal better than they did there.
2622. Have you any of the Newcastle girls still left in the school? Only one that has been on the streets, and some others that have grown up in the school.
2623. Are the girls of the prostitute class the wildest? Yes; we had some others who were very fast too.
2624. How many girls of both classes who were in the Newcastle school have you left? About thirty-eight I think.
2625. Do you find that these girls who came from Newcastle are promoters of insubordination? Generally there are one or two others who take up a position as leaders.
2626. Some of them had to be prosecuted some time ago for attempting to burn the place down, or burning a door? Yes, eight of them were sent to gaol for breaking windows and burning a door.
2627. Mr. Metcalfe.] Sent to Sydney Gaol? Yes.
2628. President.] What system of correction have you? It is very trivial. All we can do is to lock them up for fourteen days on bread and water, and they can dance and skip as they like; and that is the only punishment we can give them.
2629. There is no system of punishment provided by the Act? No, I do not think so.
2630. Do you think that power should be given by the law to deal with offenders against the discipline of the place? I think so.
2631. You think the omission of such a provision is a deficiency in the present Act? Yes, I think so.
2632. Are you under the impression that at present there is no power given you to punish a girl for refusing to conform to the rules of the school—are you under the impression that no punishment can be given for breaking the rules? There is no power given by the Act to punish them for anything but running away, and in cases of that kind the superintendent has power to confine them for fourteen days.
2633. Then you are of opinion that power should be given you to punish for infractions of rules? Yes. The Executive has given some power, but not sufficient.
2634. What power has been given you? I can give them fourteen days on bread and water, for rioting—for any riotous conduct, or such like.
2635. What power have you got beyond that? I think when there are only one or two I should have the power of punishing them. If there is only one to be punished, the Colonial Secretary has to be notified.
2636. If there is only one? She cannot be put in without notifying the Colonial Secretary—she cannot be put in confinement.
2637. But in other cases have you not power? Yes, I do it, and I send the report to the Colonial Secretary; and, in many cases, when I get it back the girls are out again.
2638. What power should you have? That is according to the offence.
2639. What system of discipline should you recommend? I should recommend that we have a room for separate punishment, allowing for ventilation at the top, so that the girls might be put in a sort of solitary confinement.
2640. Solitary confinement is your idea? Yes. It is not solitary confinement at present, because a good number goes together generally. If there is a girl who offends singly, I cannot lock her up for more than two or three days.
2641. What period should you lock them up for? They should be separate, and should be locked up for eight or ten days. Dr. Evans spoke about that.
2642. Who spoke about it? Dr. Evans. He agreed that they might have eight or ten days solitary confinement, and be taken out to get the fresh air and such like—that is his opinion. This system of locking up a number in a room is only just a spree for them. Some of them got out the other night, took a boat and went off to Sydney. They had fourteen days confinement in No. 3 dormitory, and, of course, it was recreation for them. There were eight of them together.
2643. All together? Yes; and you have to keep two or three officers there to keep them from being too well fed. They were better fed while locked up than when free.
2644. How was that? Because they had so many assistants—girls about the place—to give them in food through the windows. They are a body of children who stick together. They never tell tales of one another.
2645. What is your opinion of the moral tone of these children, apart from those of the prostitute class? They have no moral tone until it is taught them, because they are picked up from among prostitutes and bad characters.
2646. What do you think as to their truthfulness? They are not very truthful.
2647. As to their honesty? They are not honest either.
2648. Mr. Metcalfe.] Not any of them? No, not from the youngest to the oldest.
2649. Not those in the Industrial School? No. They come in there from among a vicious lot of people, and their parents are bad. There are children there of ten and eleven years of age, sent in because their parents are vagrants. Others are taken up from houses where prostitutes are living.
2650. President.] Is it your opinion that all these classes of unfortunate female children are necessarily vicious? Not in themselves, they are not, but they have been taught so—taught deception.
2651. They are vicious from the circumstances under which they have been found? Generally, I think.
2652. What amusements (if any) or recreation for the girls have you? No amusements, except skipping-ropes, draughts, and dominoes; and we did try to amuse them of an evening for some time, but they got tired of it and attempted to get over the wall. They soon tire of amusements of that sort.

- Mr. G. Lucas. 2653. At what times do they have these amusements? They had them for a short time at night. They leave school and work at 4 o'clock, and they have the remainder of the afternoon for amusements.
- 10 July, 1873. 2654. What are they doing then? They play about.
2655. What means of playing have they? They run about the place, and play rounders and many other games. Those who want hoops can get them. They play rounders and such like games.
2656. Are there libraries? Yes, two libraries in the place—one for the Catholics, and one for the Protestants. They use them on Sundays.
2657. Only on Sundays? Yes; they destroy them at other times. There was a lot of "Chatter-boxes," and they are all destroyed.
2658. What time do they have tea? As soon as they have done milking the cows—about 5 o'clock.
2659. What do the girls do after tea? They are locked up at dark.
2660. Do they have any lights? Yes.
2661. In their rooms? Yes.
2662. They have no tables there? No.
2663. What do they do then? Sit up, play about, sing, and one thing and another. That is the worst part of my time.
2664. Then they have nothing to do? Nothing.
2665. There is no sewing going on? No.
2666. No reading? No.
2667. No books are supplied to them? No. When they were supplied to them they were destroyed.
2668. Are they not supplied with books on Sundays? Yes; Mrs. Lucas serves them out to the girls on the Sunday mornings, and receives them at night.
2669. Do you not think that the fact of their having nothing to do in their dormitories during all those hours is calculated to produce disorder, on the principle of the old nursery saying that "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do"? When they had liberty to stop out, many of them preferred to go to the dormitories. On holidays I allow them to stop out.
2670. Where? In the dining-room, or the sewing-room.
2671. On what holidays? General holidays.
2672. But the general rule is to lock them up in the dormitories, without any occupation or amusement being given them? Yes.
2673. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are there any musical instruments in the place? No.
2674. Do you not think that they would like to learn some? I bought a concertina some time since, and they broke it. I have tried many of these things.
2675. President.] Are they taught to sing? Yes, in school.
2676. As part of their education? Not the usual singing.
2677. Does the schoolmistress teach singing to them? Sometimes she does.
2678. Is it not part of the routine of the school? No, not in that school.
2679. Is it not desirable that it should be so? Yes, if we had a teacher to teach singing.
2680. Mr. Metcalfe.] The place must be nothing better than a gaol? That is what it is virtually.
2681. President.] That is your opinion of what it comes to—the kind of life? That is it, only that they are taught.
2682. Is that your theory of what an industrial school should be? I think that it should be quite different to that, but until we get rid of that class I do not know what to do.
2683. You think that while those prostitutes are there the thing is hopeless? Yes, until they are put by themselves. I think that the prostitutes could be saved, but they should not be there.
2684. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you not think that if they had a piano they would try to learn it, if there was any one to teach them? I do not know. They are not very fond of these things. They tire of everything very soon. The greatest thing they do at night is crochet; they all like that, and nearly all do it.
2685. President.] What becomes of their work—do they sell it? Put it round their clothes. They give it to girls going out.
2686. They trim articles of dress? Yes. Some of the Catholics are doing something now for the sisters of the House of the Good Shepherd.
2687. Do you not think that such a large number of young girls could do remunerative work for the institution? Yes, if the place were more compact; but the distance to the pump—which is the only water supply—and the number of girls told off to the officers, render it almost impracticable. I consider that one of the worst features of the system is the officers having these girls as servants, for they do a deal of mischief. Most of the mischief has been created in this way.
2688. In what way? I have two girls who attend my quarters and do about the place, clean up, and bathe the children, and so on, and do the domestic work, and they go to school in the afternoon. And each of the officers—the schoolmistress, the house-matron, and the sub-matrons, Mrs. Kelly, Mrs. Brackenregg, and Mrs. Rowland, and Mrs. Dunn—each has a girl to look after their quarters. These girls have very little to do. Mrs. Rowland, for instance, is compelled to be in the institution, and so she has a girl to do her house-work; each of the officers has a girl—that is six grown-up girls, or rather five of them, and a little nurse girl; and then there are the two girls from my place. These girls all run from one to the other, and thus create a great deal of mischief. They can concoct anything.
2689. How does this system work badly? I gave you as an instance what happened to-day. One of these girls broke open a box and took money out of it.
2690. How is it that this system is allowed to continue if it works badly? They cannot do without it.
2691. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are these girls of the prostitute class? Yes. None of the others are big enough.
2692. Do they all associate in the play-grounds? Yes; we cannot help it sometimes, their all getting together.
2693. President.] What would you recommend in order to put a stop to this state of things? I would recommend, as the only way, that a proper building should be fitted up. If the place is to be carried on there must be proper buildings, and the officers should have their rooms all together, and a servant appointed for them.
2694. And paid servants? Yes.
2695. You would have them all to live together? Yes, all except the superintendent. I think that it would be a great saving. I find that we have great trouble about the food and everything else under the present system. There are twelve children in the place (I am sorry to say anything against widows who who have children to support, but I am speaking about carrying out the institution)—there are twelve children, and each officer only gets a ration allowed, of course, and there are twelve children living in the institution. Mr. G. Lucas.

10 July, 1873.

2696. Mr. Metcalfe.] Belonging to the officers? Yes, of course the officers. They have to get food for their children outside, but then the cooking utensils, plates, knives, forks, &c., go into the officers' quarters that should be in the institution, and it causes a deal of trouble sometimes. We have had a good deal of annoyance in that way. Instead of all the officers being in one place, we have a lot of scattered huts—if you like the term—and the forks and knives are carried from the institution up to the officers' quarters, and they have to be gathered up, and sometimes they collect some of the officers' own property, and sometimes there is a noise over it.

2697. There is confusion between the property of the officers and the property of the institution? Yes, and it leads to ill feeling, and the officers do not like their places to be ransacked; but the girls carry the things over there, and we cannot help it if the children take these things up and mix the plates, knives, and forks.

2698. But why should they do so? Because the officers' servants at dinner-time are preparing the dinners for the officers, and one of them brings their dinners from the dining-room to the quarters, and thus the confusion arises.

2699. Is there no regular system of discipline—do not they all have their meals at once? No, we cannot always be there, and they carry these things up during the day.

2700. The knives and forks? Yes.

2701. Why? Because the girls take their meals up sometimes.

2702. Why? They take them up to one another.

2703. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do they not always dine together? No, they must have the food ready for the officers when they go up for their meals. They have to stop in the dining-room. The officers of the institution have to stop to see that the girls behave themselves.

2704. And they don't dine at the same time? No; the officers dine in their own quarters.

2705. With their children? Yes.

2706. Are rations provided for them by the Government? Not for the children; they buy food for them.

2707. Where do they buy it? In Sydney.

2708. Do they cook their food in the kitchen of the institution? The girls cook their food in their quarters for them.

2709. President.] I do not understand now how it is that these things are carried on in this way? These girls at the officers' quarters have to get the officers' meals ready before they come up, and they do not get their meals there,—it is carried up to them.

2710. Carried up to the officers or the children? To the children.

2711. Mr. Metcalfe.] Then it appears to be an abuse, the children living there at all? I do not mean the children of the officers, but the servants.

2712. President.] Do the children who are waiting upon the officers have their meals at the officers' quarters? Yes.

2713. Do the officers find these children, or the institution? The institution finds them.

2714. Do they take their meals in the dining-room of the institution? Not in the dinner-time.

2715. Why not? Because they are at the officers' quarters.

2716. Then how are they carrying knives and forks to the officers' quarters? One goes round and takes up the meals for the other five, and they come for the officers' meals too.

2717. Are the officers' meals cooked in the common kitchen? Yes.

2718. Mr. Metcalfe.] In the King's School the master dines with the boys? That is what I want.

2719. Do you see any reason why it should not be so here,—why the officers should not dine with the children? I do not, but these ladies have got families of their own.

2720. What ladies? The officers of the institution.

2721. Do their families live on the island? Yes. The gatekeeper has three daughters; Mrs. Dunn has two; the schoolmistress two small children, and they have their own quarters, and they have to have a servant.

2722. And this is a great inconvenience? Yes, it is the greatest plague we have.

2723. Mr. Cowper.] Do the girls have to go up to the officers at dinner-time? Yes, they stop there.

2724. President.] Who looks after the children at their meals? The matrons. One stops in the kitchen to see the dinner properly served, and the other two stop in the dining-room.

2725. Mr. Wearne.] Then, if I understand you, during dinner-time the matrons look after the children? Yes.

2726. And the girls—that is, their servants—are looking after the cooking, and so on, of the officers' meals in their houses? Yes.

2728. Then you think that having married women, with their children, living in the institution, is objectionable? Yes, I think so. I find that my own family are an objection.

2729. You think that a matron should sleep under the same roof as the girls, in order to have them under her eye? Yes. I do not know why we have not had misfortunes there, considering that — 2730. You have no one with the girls from the time they are locked up? No.

2731. These eighty-three girls are locked up there with no one to look after them? Yes.

2732. Your matrons are outside the premises altogether? Not outside the premises, but outside the square.

2733. Away from the girls? Yes.

2734. The girls can do as they like from sundown to sunrise? Yes, unless the matron's attention is called to them.

2735. How can that be? Unless we go round to see—we do that.

2736. You live away from the place? Yes. I will give an instance. They broke the locks, got out and went away in a boat, and no one knew anything about it. We were so far away that we did not hear them.

2737. President.] What religious instruction have the girls? The Protestants have prayers night and morning—they repeat prayers to the matron night and morning; and the Catholics have prayers night and

Mr. G. Lucas. and morning. They each go to their separate dormitories. When I call over the muster-roll at night I say, "Fall out," and the Catholics fall out and go into one room, and the Protestants into another, and the same in the morning. On Sunday mornings Mrs. Foott and Mrs. Lucas conduct Sunday-school; and Mr. Langley provides preachers to come at 3 in the afternoon—that is, for the Protestant portion. On Sunday morning at half-past 9, two sisters from the House of the Good Shepherd come and give instruction to the Catholics; and I believe that the children read their Bibles in the afternoon with the schoolmistress. On Wednesday the same sisters from the Good Shepherd come. They come on Wednesday mornings, and have a religious service at from half-past 9 to 12 o'clock.

10 July, 1873.

2738. Is that all? Mrs. Foott comes on Thursday, after school hours, to the Protestants.

2739. Then do I understand you that the only prayers the girls say are the morning and evening prayers, which are said when they are all assembled together for the same purpose? Yes—the Catholics in one section, and the Protestants in another.

2740. That is all? Yes, except that the schoolmistress has prayers with the Catholics.

2741. Are they not taught to say prayers by their bedsides when they rise in the morning and go to bed at night? No; but they do say prayers night and morning. I often see them when I look through the windows.

2742. They do that of their own accord? Yes. The other is all that is laid down for us—that they are to have prayers night and morning.

2743. But whether it is laid down or not, do you not think that they should be taught a habit of private prayer? They cannot do that, because it takes all the morning to get the place ready. They have to get their baths directly they are out of bed.

2744. Mr. Wearne.] Surely they could spare time for a prayer? They could.

2745. You could not spend time to look after them? No.

2746. President.] I may inform you that it is done in other institutions? Yes; but here they all mixed together in the dormitories.

2747. Do you not think that it is desirable to instil such a habit into a child's mind? I dare say I could enforce it, but it was not carried on in the institution when I went to it.

2748. Do you think that would be better than the mere perfunctory going through a book by a teacher? Yes. I have to do it in my own family, I know.

2749. Do you not think that everything should be made to give way to this—that a child might even go without a bath rather than not say her prayers? Yes, I dare say; but I have not the officers to do it. There are so many dormitories. I cannot go into a dormitory and do it. There is no one would like to inculcate the religious principle into them more than I would, for it is the only principle to save them.

2750. Mr. Metcalfe.] What is the average expense of the place per head? £35 a year.

2751. How many girls are there in the Reformatory? Eight at present.

2752. What is the average cost of each of these girls? I know that it is the most expensive school in the Colony.

2753. And you think that there is very little good done with the prostitute girls there? I do not say that there is no good done, but I think there is little advantage to them there as the place is situated.

FRIDAY, 11 JULY, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.

CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

JOSEPH WEARNE, Esq., M.P.

Mr. George Lucas, Superintendent, Industrial and Reformatory Schools for Girls, Biloela, called in and further examined:—

Mr. G. Lucas. 2754. Mr. Ellis.] How many officers are there in the Industrial School? There are four matrons and myself.

11 July, 1873. 2755. What is done with the girls when they are first received on the island? They are taken and put into a bath.

2756. And then? Then they are kept in a separate room until the doctor sees them.

2757. How long may that be? The doctor attends twice a week, on Mondays and Thursdays.

2758. And when the doctor has seen them what is done with them? They are sent to work with the girls or sent to school, according to their age and size.

2759. They are sent to school immediately? Yes, the next day perhaps.

2760. Mr. Metcalfe.] Before the doctor sees them? No, after.

2761. Mr. Ellis.] Are they ever given at once as servants to any of the officers of the institution? No.

2762. Are there regular days for their employment in the laundry, kitchen, and in the school? The girls that go to the laundry are changed every week, making provision for each girl serving one week out of four in that capacity, it being similar with the other duties, with the exception of the kitchen; and as we have some more suited for cooks than others, we change them once a fortnight.

2763. How about their schooling? The week the girls are upon the laundry they do not go to school at all. There are three in the kitchen; one goes to school and the other two do not. Our average attendance at school out of eighty-six is seventy-three. I think that that is the average; and I think there are three too young to go to school.

2764. Are they taught to cut out and make their own clothes? No. They are taught to make them, but not to cut them out.

2765. Are there any girls in the institution who are able to make their own clothes? Yes.

2766. How many? I should say about thirty.

2767. What is their general state of health? Good—very good.

2768. Have there been any diseases amongst them since you have been there? They had the itch for a week—at least it was said to be the itch.

2769. How many of them had it? I think the doctor said there were about sixty.
2770. Did you cure them all in a week? I think the doctor said so.
2771. That is sharp practice—do you think that they were cured? I have seen nothing of the disease since. 11 July, 1873.
2772. Do you know how that disease was communicated to them? Well, there was some dispute about that. The girls washed the clothes of the "Vernon" boys; and they having it at the time, it is supposed that the girls must have got it in that way.
2773. Did the Industrial School furnish it to the "Vernon"; or did the "Vernon" furnish it to the Industrial School? That is the dispute—we thought it likelier to come in dirty clothes than in clean.
2774. Does not the same doctor attend both places? Yes.
2775. And could he not settle that grave question? He did not.
2776. It is still unsettled? Yes. Nearly all on the "Vernon" had it, I believe, but I would not be sure—I would not go into any particulars about it.
2777. You do not know who had it first in the order? I do not know. We think the "Vernon" had it first.
2778. Is that the only disease that has shown itself among the children? The others have had chicken pox, I think.
2779. How many of them? A few now and again at odd times.
2780. How long did it last? Sometimes a week or fortnight—sometimes three weeks.
2781. I think you said, last night, that before the girls were locked up at night you divided them into two divisions, and ordered them into separate rooms to say their prayers? Yes.
2782. Who superintends them when they are saying their prayers? The matron in one room and the schoolmistress in the other.
2783. Do the matron and schoolmistress read prayers aloud, or do the children pray for themselves? They pray for themselves.
2784. How is it known that they pray at all? They pray aloud.
2785. What prayers do they say? I do not know the Catholic prayers.
2786. The Church of England? The Church of England prayers, out of the prayer-book.
2787. The Creed and the Lord's Prayer, I suppose? Yes, I think so.
2788. President.] Do the children say these prayers without their being read to them out of the book? Yes.
2789. Do they know the collects by heart? Not the collects, the general Church of England prayers.
2790. Mr. Ellis.] Do you know what particular Church of England prayers they are? I do not.
2791. Have you ever heard them saying their prayers? Yes. If I had a prayer-book here I could show what prayer it is that they say. They are taught to say their prayers from the book, but I always pray extempore myself.
2792. Do the children pray extempore? They generally use the prayers of the Church of England—morning and evening prayers.
2793. But these prayers are not read out to them? They have them all off by heart.
2794. All of the prayer-book? No, the morning and evening prayers.
2795. Mr. Gould.] Do you mean the ordinary services of the Church? Yes, those that are generally used, without going into the collect.
2796. Mr. Ellis.] Are they able to say their prayers before they come on to the island? No, they are taught by Mrs. Foott, who attends twice a week, and Mrs. Lucas.
2797. How long do the prayers last? I suppose about fifteen minutes.
2798. Do they say them kneeling? Yes.
2799. On those cold flags we saw there? They have got matting.
2800. I suppose that on the Catholic side the prayers are conducted in the same style? Yes, just the same.
2801. In the Catholic side, do the children read aloud? Yes; Mrs. Kelly reads one part, and the girls respond.
2802. President.] Is it the Litany you mean? The Catholic prayers.
2803. Mr. Ellis.] You do not know what they are? No.
2804. When do they say morning prayers? Just before they go into school.
2805. They do not say any when they get up? I believe that they do.
2806. You do not know? I have been informed that they do.
2807. Who informed you? The matron.
2808. Is she there when they get up? Yes, she is there, but I do not know whether she makes them say their prayers.
2809. Do they kneel down then? I believe so.
2810. Do you know it? Not of my own knowledge.
2811. Well, in the evening after they have gone through their prayers they are locked up? Yes.
2812. In the dormitories? Yes.
2813. There is nothing in the dormitories but the beds? No, that is all.
2814. And the cool flags? There is matting down—three rows of matting, I think.
2815. Are there fires in the dormitories? No, there are no fires in the place. It would not do to have fires there.
2816. Then they knock about in these rooms from 6 to 9 doing nothing? They are expected to go to bed.
2817. But expectations are not relied upon—they are not obliged to go to bed? They should do.
2818. Then why do you not make them? I do not go into the dormitories.
2819. Does the matron remain with them? No.
2820. She simply locks up those iron gates, and they remain there locked in like the felons of old times? Yes. The matrons and I go round at 9 o'clock to see that the lights are put out, and then the matrons go home.
2821. When does the matron see them again? In the morning, at 6 o'clock.
2822. Are the gates then unlocked? Yes.
2823. When are the girls mustered? At 9 o'clock, before going to school.
2824. Who calls over the muster roll? I do. I count the children.

- Mr. G. Lucas. 2825. Do you count them before they go to prayers? Yes, before they go to prayers in the evening, and then in the dormitories after they are locked up.
- 11 July, 1873. 2826. Do you go into the dormitories yourself then? The matron counts some and I count the others.
2827. But do you go into the dormitories—you cannot count them from the doors? The matron counts them, and I stand at the door and count them.
2828. Do they answer to their names? No.
2829. Do you think that you count them so accurately that none can be absent without your knowledge? I think so.
2830. Do you strictly enforce the regular hours for the girls to attend in the school, the laundry, and the kitchen? Yes, there are regular hours for them—they go in the morning the first thing to the laundry, and with the exception of their meal hours they stop there all day; and some go to the kitchen.
2831. What becomes of the girls who are servants to the officers of the institution? When?
2832. Are there not some girls who act as servants to the officers? Yes. They all go to school in the afternoon.
2833. At what time? From 2 till 4.
2834. Then up to 2 o'clock they are employed in domestic duties—how many for each officer? One for each.
2835. How many are there? Five, I think. There are the two sub-matrons, the house matron, the school-mistress, and the gate-keeper.
2836. Each of these girls goes to school? Yes.
2837. Are there any more than those you have mentioned? No more than that Mrs. Rowland has a little girl to mind her baby.
2838. Have you none? Yes, I have two.
2839. These children of course go to school from 2 till 4? Yes.
2840. That is the extent of the instruction that they receive? They learn their domestic work, and I think that is where they learn most.
2841. I think you said that you only give them books on Sunday out of the library? Yes, that is all.
2842. What is your reason for not giving them books on week-days? Because they destroy them.
2843. Have you observed that the bump of destructiveness is peculiarly developed on Sundays? There is some one with them on Sundays.
2844. And could not one of the matrons look after them? Not on week-days. They are at different works and at school on week-days.
2845. But during the hours of relaxation, when they are locked up, would not some of them usefully employ their time in reading? They have had books, and they have destroyed them.
2846. But still they do not destroy them on Sundays? There is some one with them all day on Sunday.
2847. Suppose a girl is really inclined to tear a book, would she not tear it on Sunday? She would not get one the next week if she did.
2848. But as a matter of fact, do they tear their books on week-days and not on Sundays? They do tear them occasionally.
2849. What punishment do you inflict upon them when they are rude to the officers or the visitors, or misbehave themselves in any way? Well, there is no punishment.
2850. Have they ever been caned? Yes, I have caned them two or three times.
2851. What sort of cane do you use? A small bamboo.
2852. What sort? About this size (holding up a pencil).
2853. Where do you cane them? Over the shoulders.
2854. How many cuts do you give them? Two or three.
2855. Do you beat them all in that way when they deserve it? The big ones. The matron beats the little ones. It is very few that I have punished.
2856. When a girl is put on bread and water and locked up, where is she confined? In No. 3 dormitory. There are several there.
2857. Is there any furniture there? No. They would break the things if there were.
2858. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is there nothing for them to sit down upon? Matting and the beds—that is all.
2859. Mr. Ellis.] Is the place matted all over, because it seemed to me to be very scarce? No, not all over.
2860. The girls are put there on bread and water in that cold flagged place? Yes.
2861. Do you think that they come out reformed or with the rheumatism? They are the most healthy children in the Colony. They get washed every morning.
2862. During the time they are in confinement are they taught to say their prayers or anything at all? They are locked up, and they are visited and kept clean.
2863. But you do not know that they say a prayer? We go and advise with them and talk to them. They are not always in a very good temper for prayer.
2864. I do not suppose that I should be in a good temper, kept there on cold flags. Then I understood you to say that when you punish them you send the report to the Colonial Secretary? Yes, I send the report at once, as soon as the girls are locked up.
2865. And then it is so quickly considered that you get it back again after the children are released? Yes.
2866. Do they ever make any remarks upon these reports? They just say "Approved."
2867. When it is all over? Yes, they say that they approve of the sentence.
2868. Who apprentices the children from the Industrial School? I do.
2869. How do you receive applications? From the parties who want the girls; they write to me.
2870. How do the people outside in the country know that you have girls here fit to be apprenticed? I advertised several times.
2871. The children cannot be apprenticed out of the Reformatory, I believe? No.
2872. Mr. Gould.] You have spoken of children coming back to the school: how often have they returned to you after they have left? On only two occasions, I think, the girls have gone back again to their friends, and I think we have had six or eight from their apprenticeship.
2873. Apprentices returned to the school? Yes; those who do not suit, and those who run away from the place.

2874. Who has charge of the children in the school—who is responsible for their cleanliness? The house matron is responsible for the cleanliness of the school. Mr. G. Lucas.
11 July, 1873.
2875. Is there any rule in the school as to the way in which the girls should keep their hair? No.
2876. When we were over there I was struck with the very untidy state of the girls' heads in the school—how do you account for that? I do not know. I am sure that they are combed every day and washed well.
2877. Are the girls allowed to do up their hair as they think fit? They have hair ribbons to tie their hair up.
2878. Is one allowed to have red ribbon, and another pink, and so on? I do not know. I think not. I think that their friends bring them those ribbons when they come to see them.
2879. Do you allow the children to wear anything that they think proper? We never see any harm in the children wearing a red ribbon or a green ribbon.
2880. Are there any children there who, in your opinion, ought to go to some other institution, to Randwick for instance? Yes, I think that there are a great many children who have no business there.
2881. President.] In the Industrial School? I have only got them because they come by a Magistrate's warrant, and there was no way of refusing them or anything else.
2882. Mr. Gould.] Why do you think so? I think that a good many of the children are too small to be here;—here is a baby eighteen months old, and there were three boys, one three years and one five, sent to the "Vernon."
2883. Are you aware of there being two or three of a family in that school whose father was killed somewhere up on the mines? I have not heard that the father was killed. What was the name?
2884. I forget the name? Tomlinson, do you mean?—There is one little girl named Boyd in the institution. They wrote to me from Braidwood to know how she was getting on.
2885. Are they such children as should be in the Randwick institution instead of where they are? These children, it appears, had no lawful means of support, and are sent by Benches of Magistrates. I think that all small children should be at Randwick, or at some other institution, considering the mixed nature of the institution at Biloela.
2886. And these children mix with those who are sent in as thieves and prostitutes? Not as thieves. We have no thieves. The institution is so constructed that—2887. You have many children there who are more fit to be in such a school as that at Randwick than a school of this kind? Yes.
2888. Mr. Wearne.] You stated yesterday that the expense of this institution was £35 per head per year? Yes, I think so. I shall have the full statistics by Monday, but I have not yet got from the Colonial Architect's office the expenses of the building.
2889. Do you know what has been the amount expended on the premises since you went there? I think I heard Mr. Robertson say between £1,500 and £2,000.
2890. You said that you thought that the buildings were not suitable? They are not.
2891. Has the building anything to do with the expense of £35 per head per annum—what causes the expense to be so great? The supervision, I think, is the largest item; £12 6s. I think the supervision is.
2892. And the rest is £22 14s.? Somewhere about that. I think that the food and fuel comes to about ten guineas.
2893. What is the other £12 for? Clothing and ironmongery; and some cows were bought.
2894. And the cost of the cows is included in the £35 per annum? Yes.
2895. How long have you been there? Ever since the 26th May, 1871.
2896. You have been there two years then? Yes.
2897. You said that the sub-matrons have families living there with them? Yes; they have two or three children each.
2898. Is not the place where the children are fenced in? No.
2899. Well, there is a certain portion of the island partitioned off for the children? Yes, there is a line run from one side to the other.
2900. Are not the residences of the matrons outside that line? No; you come in at the gate, and then the matrons' residences are between the gate and Mrs. King's.
2901. Is there not a gate leading to where the children are? There is a quadrangle inside the enclosure altogether.
2902. So that the children do not go outside of that? Yes, they do.
2903. Not at night? No.
2904. The matrons are fenced off from the children? No, they are not.
2905. How far away are the matrons from the dormitories of the children? About twenty-five yards from the first dormitory—what we call No. 1; but Mrs. King's is between. It is about twenty-five yards.
2906. What distance have the matrons to go from their residences before they get to the children? Well, I suppose they would have to go round by the kitchen—the nearest gate.
2907. What distance would it be? Well, I suppose they would have to go about forty yards before they could get inside at all.
2908. Before they got to the children's dormitories? Through the kitchen yard to the first dormitory I suppose is about sixty yards, but you can get to look through the window at twenty-five yards.
2909. If the matrons wanted to go into the dormitory, they would have to go sixty yards before they could get to the children? Yes, before getting to the first dormitory.
2910. How many sub-matrons have you? The house-matron and two sub-matrons, and Mrs. Lucas—four altogether.
2911. There are three besides Mrs. Lucas? Yes.
2912. Are there any other persons to take charge of these children besides these matrons? No.
2913. And these matrons are away from them all night? Yes.
2914. They are locked up at sundown? Yes.
2915. And then at 9 o'clock some one goes through the wards? Yes; the house-matron goes through the wards then.
2916. Mr. Ellis.] I think, in answer to a question from me, you said that they were locked up at sundown, and no more attention was paid to them? No; their lights are put out at 9.
2917. But no one remains with them? No.

- Mr. G. Lucas. 2918. Mr. Wearne.] They are there from 6 at night until 6 the next morning without having any one with them, save when the house-matron visits them to put out the lights? Yes, except that the matron and myself go round. I go round myself at half-past 10 every night, and see what is going on.
- 11 July, 1873. 2919. You say that these sub-matrons have families living with them? Yes. Mrs. Dunn has got three, and Mrs. Rowland has got two, and the gate-keeper — 2920. But the gate-keeper has nothing to do with the girls? No; but the children are inside the fence.
2921. What I want to know is, whether the sub-matrons are prevented from doing their duty—that they cannot sleep with these children because they have children of their own at home? They do not reckon that part of their duty at all.
2922. Do you think that it should be? I do.
2923. Do you think that the school is as efficiently managed as it would be if the sub-matrons slept with the girls, to take charge of them? I think that there should be a matron in the room to see if anything is the matter, or to stop any noise at night. But they could not do it there. I consider that the place is without accommodation; there is no proper accommodation at all.
2924. If you wanted to make a change you could not? No, there are only those little rooms where the new girls sleep when they come, and where the little boy sleeps.
2925. How was it at Newcastle? I think there the cook slept in between the dormitories in one place, and one of the sub-matrons in the other.
2926. Do you not know? I was there for so short a time, and the cook died. Mrs. Brackenregg used to sleep between two of the dormitories.
2927. She could see what was going on? Yes.
2928. It is not the same now? No.
2929. And it is not possible now for the matrons to be with the children? Not the way these buildings are constructed.
2930. Mr. Goold.] Do you think the matrons should sleep in the dormitories with the girls? No.
2931. Should they have separate rooms for themselves attached to each dormitory? No.
2932. Mr. Wearne.] Could a matron not sleep in a place partitioned off in the dormitory? But there are six dormitories.
2933. But could not three matrons take charge of six dormitories? I do not think so.
2934. Is there no communication between them? There are passages between them.
2935. Of course no Parliament in the world would stand such an expense as that of £34 per annum for these girls, and we wish to know how the expense can be reduced? The place will never be worth calling an institution unless a place is built expressly for the class of girls such as these prostitutes. I believe it would be one of the finest institutions for the sake of the community to get up; but it should be constructed for this class of girls alone.
2936. President.] The prostitutes alone? Yes. The other children might be sent to the other asylums. That is my impression. I think the Industrial School should be for all of that class, and that the children under twelve years of age should be all sent to Randwick, or to some institution like it, and an institution built on purpose for prostitutes. It would, I believe, be one of the finest works that the Government ever did to take these children and send them to a proper institution, but their dormitories should not be for more than three or four. I have made that recommendation to the Government.
2937. Children not prostitutes you would have sent to Randwick? To another institution: I do not know about Randwick.
2938. You recommend the Government to have a building on purpose for these prostitutes? I believe it would be one of the finest works they could do.
2939. Is there such a building anywhere? There is in England.
2940. What are the buildings to which you allude? There are institutions of that kind in England.
2941. Where? Millbank.
2942. That is a penitentiary? Yes. All these girls should be committed by a Bench to an institution of that description. I believe that those who go to this Female Refuge are very near past hope when they go there, but these children should be sent to a proper place where they can be taught everything—domestic work and washing—and educated.
2943. Mr. Wearne.] Do you not think that the Female Refuge is the sort of place we want? No. That is a voluntary affair. The girls are not sent there—they go in; but these children should be taken up. I am sorry to say that I believe there are thousands of children in Sydney who should be taken up and compelled by the State to go into an institution of that kind.
2944. Do you think that these two institutions—the Female Refuge and the House of the Good Shepherd—could not be utilized? I think not. I think that the building should be built on purpose, with dormitories, where you could classify the girls. Even if you put fifty girls in this institution now, and you put ten in a dormitory—perhaps some of them are quiet or inclined to be, and the others will not allow it. But if you had a place where the girls might be classified, in proper dormitories, and if you had rewards for good conduct and means of punishing girls for bad conduct, you would do much better.
2945. Suppose the Government were to proclaim these two buildings industrial schools and give money towards them, do you not think that the officers could be utilized, and thus expenditure saved to the Government? It would be quite possible, but I think there is no way of doing any good in the matter but by starting it on purpose on a broad principle—making it a separate institution. I dare say that these institutions would do, but it would be breaking up useful institutions to carry this out. I believe that the Good Shepherd and the other institution are doing good work.
2946. Do you not think that if these children were farmed out to families, there are many who would be glad to take them at a small weekly allowance? I dare say they would.
2947. Would not that be less expense to the Government? How would they get educated?
2949. Can you not utilize the labour of these girls by taking in washing, and so save something towards the expenses? Yes, if the place were properly constructed we could, but now there is such a large area to keep clean that it takes the girls all their time to keep it clean. With the exception of their work in the sewing-room, the laundry and the kitchen, it pretty well occupies all their time.

2950. Would it not be an improvement to have the sewing in the evening from 6 to 9, when the girls' Mr. G. Lucas. would have something to do instead of being locked up and doing nothing? Yes, I should be glad to see that

11 July, 1873.

2951. President.] Is there not a room where they could sit, under the supervision of the sub-matrons? The sub-matrons would not care about that, I think. They are too tired for that. They reckon that when they get up at 6 in the morning and work until 6 at night, they are not fit to do much after that.

2952. Do you not know that in all the large boarding schools it is the duty of the masters to sit with the boys of an evening? We tried it here, but the girls got tired.

2953. Who got tired—the sub-matrons? They did not try it at all; they objected.

2954. Did you tell them that it was their duty to do it? No, I do not think it is. The rules say that the girls are to be locked up in their dormitories, and that the house matron is to see that the lights are put out.

2955. At what time? At 9 o'clock. The place is lit up—they have lights in their dormitories.

2956. Mr. Wearne.] Do you think that it would be an improvement if the sub-matrons would attend to these girls in some building? I have thought so always.

2957. Have you recommended it? Yes, we tried it.

2958. Why did not you continue it? It was not continued because it fell through.

2959. What fell through? Mrs. Lucas, Mrs. Kelly, and myself—we tried it, and the girls soon got tired of it. They tried to get over the walls.

2960. But suppose that they did sewing? You would want a large staff to keep them quiet. Those girls have had all their own way all their life-time.

2961. President.] But is it not the business of the institution to humanize them, and not to give them their own way? I have tried them with fancy-work, and needle-work, draughts, and dominoes, and so on.

2962. How long was it tried? For three months.

2963. Mr. Wearne.] And were not the sub-matrons present? No.

2964. Did you ask them to be present? Yes, but they said that they could not do it.

2965. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you consider that the plan would work well? I do, but I cannot carry it out.

2966. But if you recommended it, would not the Government order it to be carried out? We should have to get more hands.

2967. How is that? The matrons say that they have enough work, and that they are tired out when the night comes.

2968. Mr. Gould.] At what time do they knock off work? At dark; in the summer-time at 6 o'clock.

2969. Is that fixed by regulation? I think not.

2970. Why should they not remain with the children until 9 o'clock? ———

2971. Mr. Metcalfe.] School-mistresses in girls' schools are never away from their pupils—could not the matrons here do the same? They could, but they will not.

2972. Mr. Wearne.] Do you not think it would be an improvement? I do.

2973. You think that they would refuse? I do.

2974. How do you know that they would? Well, we tried it.

2975. But if you are master, they must do as you tell them? They are employed by the Government as well as I am.

2976. Do you think any person in the world would allow these girls to be there alone in their dormitories all night? I know it is not right.

2977. You think it would be an improvement for the girls to have something to do, but yet you will not give it them? I have tried it without effect.

2978. I should recommend you then to write to the Colonial Secretary, and state that you cannot carry out this improvement? ———

2979. President.] When you say that the arrangement was broken up, or given up, how do you mean that this way of passing the evening ceased to continue? The girls got over the walls while Mrs. Lucas, Mr. Cane, and I were inside.

2980. Inside where? Inside the dining-room. Of course the girls have to go out to the water-closets.

2981. Do they all go out in a body? No, two or three of them.

2982. But why should two or three girls being insubordinate break it up in this way? They were all inclined to do it.

2983. Of course they have bad habits; but if the object of the institution is to wean them from their bad habits, it can only be done by persistently trying to humanize them? Well, say that there are forty girls in a room which is lit up, and the girls are all doing something—how many will it take to look after them?

2984. Mr. Wearne.] You have the sub-matrons and the house matron—surely two persons could take charge of forty girls like that? No.

2985. Not from 6 to 9? No.

2986. Mr. Metcalfe.] You said that they liked crochet? Yes, they like to do crochet, and so on; and they like to hear a book read.

2987. Mr. Wearne.] Suppose that the sub-matrons were requested to be present at 9 o'clock, would it not be an improvement? I am sure it would.

2988. I heard you say something about the girls having to go to the officers' quarters to be servants there, and that you could not keep plates and knives and forks because they went to the officers' quarters? Yes, they take things up there.

2989. Do you think it is right for these officers to be living away from the institution like that? That is one of the faults of the institution—the officers should be all together.

2990. Is there not a place for them in the institution? No, there is no place.

2991. You think it is hopeless to endeavour to improve the system in the present building? I think that the present building is not calculated to carry out the principles of the Industrial Schools Act.

2992. Can the present building be improved from what it is now? Nothing more than it is. The buildings are very cold; every building about the place is flagged.

2993. There is no reason why the girls should be in the dormitories from 6 o'clock until 9. Yes; there is matting on the floors of the dormitories, and the girls have their beds to go to.

2994. Must this great expense be kept up? I do not know. The place is so scattered and straggling that I do not think we could do with a less staff; but if it was more compact we might.

- Mr. G. Lucas. 2995. You do not think that the labour of the girls could be utilized? Yes, I do. I think that they might do laundry work.
- 11 July, 1873. 2996. Could you utilize their labour? Yes, I think so.
2997. Have you ever thought how it could be done? By taking in washing, more than anything else.
2998. Mr. Metcalfe.] Would you be likely to get washing to do upon that island? Yes; I hear people in town complaining that they cannot get washing done.
2999. President.] Can you not get washing from the ships? Yes, I think so.
3000. And the boys of the "Vernon" might be employed to take the washing backwards and forwards? Yes, that might be done.
3001. Mr. Ellis.] To all intents and purposes the place is as much a prison now as it was when there were 500 felons confined there? I think so. I never thought the place was fitted for what it is now, though after we came from Newcastle the girls were so riotous that it would take a prison to hold them.
3002. Have you ever considered what would be an eligible locality for the school? No; I do not know of any place at present.
3003. President.] Speaking of the sub-matrons declining to do the work in the evening—are you satisfied with their efficiency generally? I believe that they work well, but I do not think that they are so subordinate as they might be; still that is only—
3004. Do you mean that they do not take an interest in their work? Yes. I do not think that they care so much about the institution as other people might do. They feel that it is a living for them, and that is all; that they are appointed there to get a living for themselves. But there are people who, beyond that, would take an interest in the institution and try to carry out its objects.
3005. Is it not the kind of work in which you can only hope for success when people take an interest in it? Yes, that is where the system is at fault. Appointments are made through patronage or something of that kind. I would not like to injure those women who are there, but I do not think that they would be the persons I would select to carry out the objects of the institution. I would almost sooner leave the institution myself, however, than see a woman put out of it, for the sake of her little family.
3006. Mr. Wearne.] Were those women there when you took charge of the school? Yes, all but Mrs. Dunn.
3007. Mr. Goold.] You think that a want of interest on the part of these matrons is one of the causes of failure? I think if two or three individuals were determined to carry out a thing it would be carried out better, while half a dozen who are only getting their bread in the place do not care about it.
3008. You think that if there were two or three persons really interested in the girls they could interest them at night? Yes, that could be done.
3009. Then it follows that the failure in interesting the girls is because the parties who are there do not feel the interest in them that they should do? Yes; they just do their duty. I think they could take more interest in the girls, and I think that persons would look after the girls better who took an interest in the work.
3010. President.] In fact, there is on the part of these officers a more perfunctory performance of their duties, and nothing more? Yes. (This is very hard upon me, because I do not like to speak of these things; but I believe that is why the institution has been a failure from the first.)
3011. Mr. Wearne.] Do you think that the matrons have the affections of the children? Some few have. Some few of the girls have an affection for the matrons.
3012. President.] Do you think that their affections might be gained still more readily by a greater interest being shown, and more love of the work? Yes, I think so. (This is about the most difficult part of my evidence that I have to speak. I feel this very much.)
3013. Of course we understand that it is only a sense of duty that makes you give such evidence? Yes. When I took charge of that school, I did so with a view of benefiting the children. I do not know whether I was the right person—perhaps not.
3014. But you took the position because you wished to reform the children? Yes, that has been my work for a quarter of a century.
3015. You have directed your attention to charitable objects before you went there? Yes.
3016. Mr. Wearne.] Have these matrons ever refused to carry out your instructions? No. With regard to amusing the girls at night, I said that I should like it, and they said that they were too tired—they made a kind of appeal to me.
3017. Do you think that the matrons have failed to carry out your instructions? They have carried them out in a way. There are two or three ways of going to work when you get instructions.
3018. Do you feel that they have carried out your instructions? Not as I would like—not heartily, on some occasions.
3019. Do you think that any other person has interfered with them? Not that I know of. I know there is a great deal of mischief done in an institution like this; if one is offended another is.
3020. President.] Do I gather from what you say that there is a want of unanimity in the institution? Yes.
3021. You feel that you are not supported by your subordinates as you should be? Yes.
3022. Mr. Wearne.] You think that you should have the appointing of your own officers? I think that unless the Government gets some person that they have confidence in, and allows him to appoint his own officers, it will never work. They know that I have no control over them; and they know that they can write to the Colonial Secretary, and the evidence of two or three of them can go together.
3023. Mr. Ellis.] Do I understand that you consider them unfit for their situations? I will not say that, but I think that the officer in charge of the place should select people that he could agree with.
3024. Mr. Metcalfe.] On his own responsibility, and not being accountable to any one? Let him be responsible to the Government, and let them have some officer to go round from time to time and see that the thing was properly carried on.
3025. Mr. Wearne.] There is such a person now—the Inspector of Charities? He visits once a quarter.
3026. He does visit you? Yes, but he has not been for five months.

3027.

* NOTE (on revision):—I cannot recollect that such a question was asked, nor do I remember answering in those words; for I have reason to believe that they have been interfered with, thus in a great measure weakening my authority.

3027. President.] What does he do? He looks round the place, and looks to see what sort of material we are working with. Mr. G. Lucas.
11 July, 1873.
3028. The calico, and things of that sort? Yes, and he looks through the dormitories, and so on.
3029. Mr. Wearne.] Then you recommend that the superintendent should have full power to select his own officers, and if his officers did not carry out his instructions properly they should be dismissed? Yes.
3030. Mr. Metcalfe.] Without appeal? If he dismissed them wrongfully, of course he would be liable.
3031. President.] You could not prevent their appealing to the Government, but you should be supreme in your own department; and if you made a mistake, except under some wrong impression, that would go to show that you were not fit for the position? Yes. (I am not giving this opinion as far as it concerns myself.)
3032. It is not a power which you desire for yourself, but for any officer at the head of such an institution? Yes.
3033. Mr. Wearne.] Have you any other suggestion to make? No; my principal suggestion would be to build a separate place for the prostitutes.
3034. President.] Are the rules of the place, as to the locking up of the girls and so on, printed? I think that they are, but I would not be sure.
3035. Mr. Wearne.] Have you the rules hung up in the place? Yes, there are some.
3036. President.] Have you any printed rules? Yes. (See Appendix L.)
3037. Those that we saw hanging up? Yes.
3038. But those were not for the regulation of the place, but for the officers? Yes, that is what they are intended for.
3039. But do you think that it is proper that these rules for the guidance of the officers should be placarded everywhere? No. The girls point to them and say—"That is what you have got to do." At Newcastle, so far as the servants were concerned, Mrs. King and Captain Clarke had the power of dismissing them, but I have not. They had the power of dismissing the cook and laundress, and that is a power that has been taken away from me.
3040. Mr. Wearne.] Then you had that power when you were at Newcastle? Yes.
3041. And it has been taken away from you since? Yes, these rules take away the power. The old ones say the superintendent has power to dismiss, but these do not say so.
3042. Mr. Cowper.] Do you recollect, when the evening amusements were first spoken of, that it was the general opinion that they could not be carried out? Yes.
3043. And do you recollect my ordering the lamps on my own responsibility, in order to try the question? Yes.
3044. And it was thought such an extraordinary idea that we hardly dare ask the Government to go to the expense? Yes.
3045. Do you recollect that the first evening Mr. Cane and Mrs. Kelly volunteered to assist? Yes.
3046. The sub-matrons said that they had too much to do, but the others volunteered? Yes.
3047. And then Mrs. Lucas thought that she could manage it, and she did for a short time? Yes.
3048. Mr. Wearne.] Mrs. Kelly is the teacher? Yes.
3049. None of the sub-matrons offered to assist? No.
3050. President.] Mrs. Kelly's duties are confined to teaching the children in school-hours? Yes.
3051. And the others, who should be always with the children, refuse to assist? Yes.
3052. Mr. Gould.] Do you think that the attention of the matrons is divided between the inmates and their own children? Well, I cannot say. I know that they have their duties as parents to look after their children.
3053. What I mean is, that it would be desirable to have persons without family as sub-matrons? Yes, if the place is to be carried on properly. That is of course a subject on which I have now to give my opinion, and I give the opinion that such persons should be without children.
3054. You think that the children divide their attention? I do not say that it does, but it has a tendency to that.
3055. It would be better, in the interests of the institution, to have a person without children than a widow with children? Yes.
3056. President.] Besides the Industrial School there is a Reformatory for Girls? Yes.
3057. What is your position with regard to that? I am superintendent.
3058. What assistance have you in managing it? There is only Mrs. King, the matron there. She has charge of it altogether.
3059. She has the immediate control of it? Yes.
3060. The place where this school is kept is separated from the rest of the Industrial School buildings? Yes, by a fence.
3061. So that there is no communication between the children in the Reformatory and those in the Industrial School? No, unless they go on messages; and they have to pump from the same pump.
3062. They do not live together? No, they are apart all day.
3063. They have a separate establishment and a separate economy altogether? Yes. I think that they go to prayers together on a Sunday.
3064. Do they go to school together? No. The girls in the Reformatory are taught in the Reformatory.
3065. How many children are there there at present? Eight; the average last year was four.
3066. The number has increased lately? Yes, this year.
3067. Does that in a measure arise from the fact that the attention of the Benches of Magistrates has been called to the school latterly? Yes, most likely; and the mistakes with regard to the Industrial School.
3068. I suppose that children are sent there for petty larcenies? Yes, instead of being sent to gaol. It is a sort of juvenile prison.
3069. They are not apprenticed from this place? No; it is a question I was going to ask the Government whether they should be.
3070. They are simply discharged at the end of their period of sentence, or at their arrival at the age prescribed by the Act? Is there any age under the Act?
3071. Yes, the age of eighteen? Yes, at that age then.
3072. Have the children in this Reformatory come under your observation much? Yes, I see them every day.
3073. Are they children of the same class as those in the Industrial School, with the exception that they have

- Mr. G. Lucas. have committed crime; are they like the other children in point of conduct generally? Yes, they are about the same I think.
- 11 July, 1873. 3074. Are the buildings in which this Reformatory is conducted, in your opinion, suitable for such a place? Not suitable by any means.
3075. Is not the accommodation of the place miserably insufficient? It is.
3077. The dormitory accommodation is insufficient even when the place is not crowded, and the girls have to sleep in the dining-room? Yes.
3078. The proper dormitory accommodation is only provided for four or five? Yes.
3079. In fact, the place is over-crowded now with only eight children? Yes. I was asked for a report upon the place and I pointed these things out, and they have come to survey the place. I saw that there was a recommendation to spend about £500 on it.
3080. Is it, in your opinion, desirable for the Government to spend more money on the place? No, I think the institution should be removed.
3081. As far as the objects to be attained by such an institution are concerned, do you not think that it would be money thrown away? Yes. The Government sent to me to report upon the place, although I made no recommendation about it, and I reported some three or four months ago, and to-day they came to look at the place.
3082. Mr. Metcalfe.] What are your duties in this reformatory? I just go to see that the children are properly attended to—that the children attend the school, and so on.
3083. You have to see that Mrs. King does her duty? Yes.
3084. She looks after the children both in the dormitories and the school, and you see that she does her work properly? Yes.
3085. What is the annual expense of each child? About £80, I think. (See Appendix L.) Mrs. King's salary and mine are the only salaries. I have £65 and she has £120; and then her own rations is £16 10s. I reckon that for an officer's rations in full. That is the entire thing; but I think, if they had separate places, money should be given instead of rations. I think it is a bad system to give rations in an institution.
3086. Are you satisfied with the manner in which the contracts have been carried out for the institution? Yes; I think that they have been very fair. I have had to send the meat back twice in a week.
3087. Mr. Wearne.] You have sent it back twice a week, and yet it is very fair? Yes, it has been very fair. I have had to go to Balmain to buy some.
3088. President.] Is it bad meat, or what? I have one piece sent so often.
3089. Inferior joints? Yes. I have not had to send it back above twice for stinking, or anything of that kind. I think I have sent it back on two occasions. They sometimes send inferior meat.
3090. Is the bread contract well carried out? Yes.
3091. Who is the contractor? Kidman. The oatmeal and other things are first-rate. I consider that is one of the best parts of our diet.
3092. Do you think that, apart from the utter insufficiency of the buildings, the locality is otherwise no more suited for a Reformatory than for an Industrial School? I do not know. I should not find so much fault with the locality for that, because they are not allowed to go out of certain boundaries.
3093. It is more of a prison in its character? If the other building were floored and properly fitted up, that would make more of a Reformatory on a large scale than it is at present.
3094. You mean if the Industrial School were fitted up? Yes.
3095. That the building would not be objectionable for the purposes of a Reformatory? No, because a Reformatory is a prison to a certain extent.
3096. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you think that the good effected by the institution for these children at all justifies the expense? I think it has been an experiment, and now is the time to alter it.
3097. President.] Alter it in what way? I think the Industrial School should be altered too; I think it should be kept for prostitutes only, and I think a new Reformatory and Industrial should be built.
3098. Do I understand you that the prostitutes and the children in the Reformatory should go together? From the arguments you used yesterday I have thought differently. There are eight children there now who have never been tainted except by theft.
3099. Presuming that the police experience shows that a child may be a thief but not a prostitute, it is not desirable to associate thieves with prostitutes? No; but still there might be a classification in different wards and different places.
3100. Is there any other suggestion you would make for the improvement of the Reformatory? No, that is all. I think that the number of the inmates does not justify keeping up an institution like that.
3101. What would you do with our criminal children? I do not know; I think that there should be more sent there.
3102. You think that if the Benches of Magistrates did their duty, there would be more sent there? Yes.
3103. You think that these eight children who are there now do not represent those who should be there? No, not at all.
3104. They either escape punishment altogether, or are sent to the Industrial School improperly? Yes, or to gaol.
3105. Mr. Gould.] What is the cost per head of the children in the Reformatory? £80 per head.
3106. Does that include your salary and the matron's? Yes. Of course if I was not there, my salary would not be adequate for my duties in connection with the other place. It is almost saying that I do the supervision of the Reformatory for nothing, for my salary should be the same for the other place.
3107. Mr. Cowper.] Your meat contract specifies that you are to have the very best? Yes.
3108. And you think that you get that, as a general rule? Yes.
3109. Mr. Metcalfe.] What do you pay for meat? 2½d. a pound.
3110. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not find that there is a difficulty in disposing of the girls after they go through the Reformatory—in getting them situations, and making them remain in them? There have only been two I think.
3111. Do you not find a difficulty? Yes. One girl was sent to Hunter's Hill, and then came back, and Mr. Cowper got a place for her on the island.
3112. Does not that show that there was a difficulty? She got a place at Hunter's Hill.

3113. How long did she keep it? About two days.
3114. I then got her a place—do you know how long she kept that? I do not. She is now in the Female Refuge. There is one girl, Meehan, as fine a servant as there is in the Colony.
3115. Do you not think there should be some regulations as to the time they are at a place? Yes, I think so.
3116. Do you not think that employers could be better found for them then? Yes. That Randall—the other one—got a situation in a public-house, and got pilfering there, and she is in Darlinghurst Gaol now.
3117. Mr. Metcalfe.] Did she get wages given her? I am not sure.
3118. Mr. Wearne.] Your only recommendation is to break up the establishment? Yes; and build another one.
3119. I do not mean that; to repeal the law and have another establishment. If the average number of inmates is only four, should we have such an establishment? The law is not carried out.
3120. You think that one establishment would do for the lot? Well, Mr. Windeyer spoke to me yesterday about the contamination of thieves and prostitutes, and I do not now think it would be wise to have them together; but still, I would sooner see the prostitutes and thieves together, than the prostitutes and the children who have committed no offence. I would break both institutions up, and make a grand affair of it.
3121. Can you suggest any improvement in the place under the same management? No, none. It could not be improved, except at a very great cost.
3122. Mr. Ellis.] As a matter of fact, the girls who are sent to the Reformatory as criminals, for stealing pocket-handkerchiefs, are not as vicious as those who are sent to the Industrial School? That is just it.
3123. That is to say, that the best girls are sent to the Reformatory? Yes. Those that are picked up in the streets have been thieves all their life-time, but not taken up in that way. Generally I think they are of this class in the Industrial School, though there are many respectable girls there.
3124. Then these girls are sent to the Reformatory? Yes, they have been out of our control.
3125. Then these girls, as soon as their sentence has expired, are turned out to get a living in the best way they can? Yes.
3126. There is no power under the law to apprentice them? No.
3127. And so the end of their reformation is to expose them to temptation, by turning them out a little older than they come in? Yes. Of course this girl went to a situation at Hunter's Hill, and Mr. Cowper then got her one, and she did not keep that; but she was not right in her head.
3128. President.] Is there anything that you wish to suggest? Not at present. The only suggestion I have to make is, to make a place for prostitutes and a place for thieves.
3129. And your opinion is that if the juvenile population were looked up, there would be many more in the Reformatory than there are? Yes; and if the prostitutes were looked after, there would be 200 or 300 in the institution, and the streets saved.
3130. Mr. Metcalfe.] The little girls should be sent to Randwick? Yes.

Mr. G. Lucas.

MONDAY, 14 JULY, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.

CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

Mrs. Agnes King, Matron, Reformatory School for Girls, Biloela, called in and examined:—

3131. President.] You are the Matron of the Reformatory at Biloela? Yes.
3132. How long have you held that office? Since it opened—in 1869, I think that was.
3133. In Newcastle? Yes.
3134. What salary do you get? £120 a year.
3135. And you reside on the place? Yes.
3136. And have rations? Yes; it is called about a half-ration—the same as the girls get.
3137. Mr. Metcalfe.] You have only a half-ration? Yes; none for my family—only for myself.
3138. President.] You have no one to assist you in the Reformatory? No; only my daughter, who fills my place when I am absent. She does that by permission of the Government, but she does not get any pay for doing it. I have never asked for anything for her, but she is recognized by the Government.
3139. Then there are no other officers in the place? No, I am the only one.
3140. Practically, the sole control of the Reformatory is in your hands? Yes, what I call the detail—Mr. Lucas is just the superintendent.
3141. How many children have you there now? Eight.
3142. What are they taught? They are taught domestic work. Would you like me to begin the routine of the day?
3143. Yes, if you please? They rise when the other Industrial School girls rise (there used to be a regular bell, but we have not had it for some time) in the morning. I rise as soon as I see day break. I call them, and they get up, fold up their bedding, and clean their dormitory. There are so many girls to the dormitory, and others to the kitchen, to clean it up and get breakfast ready, and others to my own room, and others to the yard. I just divide them, and send them to the domestic work.
3144. You teach them the work of a household? Yes; the place being so small, it is more like the work of a home than of a large institution.
3145. After that what do they do? Then there is breakfast and prayers—the Protestants first and then the Roman Catholics come in. I read the prayers to them.
3146. Do you read to both of them? Yes. I taught all the Catholic prayers to all the girls of that persuasion. We read the Confession first always, and then the Lord's Prayer, and then the Hail Mary, as the

Mrs. A. King.
14 July, 1873.

Mrs. A. King. the priest wished. The priest at Newcastle asked me to do it and gave me a programme, and the same with the Protestants.

14 July, 1873. 3147. You are a Protestant yourself? Yes.

3148. After prayers what then? Then they go out to prepare for the work of the day. For instance, to-day, Monday, there is all the washing for the girls, and the bed-linen, and the clothing; and the kitchen dinner to prepare; and then there is the house-work, and there is sewing; they have all their clothing to make—I teach them that. There are very few who know how to sew when they come in, and many do not even know their letters.

3149. What are the hours of instruction? In the afternoon from 2 till 4, secular instruction, when I have them all in.

3150. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is there no school in the morning? I call needlework schooling, but we have no secular instruction in the morning. (I cannot mix secular instruction with needlework.) The children have recreation then, until tea-time. I teach sometimes until nearly 5 o'clock, for I have so many different classes.

3151. Children at different stages? I have as many different stages as if there were 100 children there, because I must teach them according to what they know.

3152. They have recreation from 4 to 6. Yes, and get their tea in the evening. Then they have the advantage in the evening of sitting in the dining-room near me, and they read and sew. I have no restriction upon them, and they can make any nice little thing for themselves.

3153. President.] They are always under your supervision? Yes, I am in my own room next to them, and if I hear any noise I go out to them. They are not locked up until 9 o'clock, as their number is so small.

3154. Have you sufficient dormitory accommodation? It is very insufficient—some have to sleep in the dining-room now. There was sufficient accommodation when I came from Newcastle, when I had not so many girls. I was anxious even then to get it enlarged, and Mr. Robertson, who was then Colonial Secretary, used to say—"Sufficient for the day was the evil thereof." I had only three girls then, and there have been more committed since.

3155. What is your opinion as to the results of the attempts made to reclaim these children? I think that where the brain is not affected—if there is no defect there—getting them so young as I do, there is great hope for them.

3156. Do you see any improvement in them there? Oh yes. You can see a great difference in them from what they are when they are first committed. Have you not observed the change, Mr. Cowper?

3157. They are very rough, I suppose, when they first come? Yes. One of those you saw has only given up pilfering within the last year. It seemed to be a part of her nature, and it is only within the last year that she has given it up.

3158. Did she pilfer after coming to you? Yes; anything that was in my room that she thought looked nice she would take and plant in the ground—anything that she fancied. She would take things for no reason but just for the sake of having them—such things as ornaments, or anything nice. But it is more easy in time to root out a vice like that than some other vices.

3159. Mr. Metcalfe.] What other vices? —

3160. President.] You mean that there is more trouble with the other class of girls who go there—the girls from the streets? Yes.

3161. Have you any of those girls in the Reformatory now? None, thank goodness.

3162. Are they more troublesome than the others? Yes, because this vice is not so easily eradicated.

3163. Do you think that it is desirable that class of girls should go into the Reformatory? No; they contaminate the others.

3164. Then your evidence agrees with the experience of the police, who say that a girl may be virtuous although she is a thief? Yes; these girls that I have are all virtuous I know.

3165. But they are thieves? Yes.

3166. You do not think that Newcastle was a suitable place for such an institution? Do you mean the school altogether, or only the Reformatory?

3167. Either institution? Well, was it not rather too much overlooked by the town?

3168. I am asking you whether the place was suitable—was it overlooked? Yes, it was overlooked in the first place, and in the second place I had not division enough to enable me to reform the girls. I would like to divide every crime until it was cured, just as you would classify different diseases.

3169. What is your opinion as to the suitability of Cockatoo Island for such a purpose? I like the island, but the buildings are not suitable. I like the position after the other place. We have not the interference here that we had there, where we were surrounded so closely by the town.

3170. Do you not think, with regard to the Industrial School, that it is undesirable that young girls, whom it is sought to wean from rough and demoralized ways, should be kept in a place with such associations; is it not likely that they will not be well affected or impressed by being brought to a place tainted with all the associations of a prison, and being shut up behind iron bars? It wants a thorough division between the young girls and the old ones. It was partly that which overthrew me at Newcastle.

3171. You think the evil was in mixing these girls from the streets with the others? Yes. We divided them as well as we could, but still they were in the place, and if it was only a ribald song it would catch their ear.

3172. Mr. Goold.] A song that would be sung by some one in the town? No, a ribald song of their own. They have learned all these things.

3173. President.] Speaking of the small number you have under your control, is it not the fact that children who should have been sent to the Reformatory have not been sent there? I think so. I think there are several who might have been sent there.

3174. Have you had any children sent to you from the Central Police Office in Sydney? Not that I am aware of. I read in the paper about one being brought up, and I went over and asked to see Captain Scott and told him about it, and that there was a place where the girl could be sent to, and that I was the matron; and he told me that a private gentleman had applied for this girl, and that he had handed her over to him.

3176. Mr. Metcalfe.] But suppose that you did get them, where would you put them? That question has been put to me before. As the time of those in the institution expires, they go out and make room for others.

Mrs. A. King.

14 July, 1873.

3177. But suppose you had six sent to you to-day, what could you do with them? I would put them on the floor of the dining-room to sleep. I could manage very well with them in the day-time—it is the sleeping accommodation that is so deficient.

3178. Then the place is unsuitable? Yes. The place is good, but I have not sleeping accommodation enough for the girls.

3179. Do you think that the girls you have got in there now are in a state of reformation and seem reformed? Yes, I do think so.

3180. President.] What becomes of the girls there after they have served their time or become of an age to be discharged? You mean the girls in the Reformatory?

3181. Yes? The last one that went out was restored to her father and mother in Newcastle, and she promised me that she would go to a situation as soon as she went home. She was sent away respectably clothed. They all are nicely clothed, and especially if they were destitute. There was one came to me who turned out badly, but she was too old—she was a very old girl.

3182. You mean the one that was prosecuted? Yes. Mr. Cox got her a situation once or twice.

3183. Have you sent out none but these? Yes. The first one I sent out turned out well. I kept her myself as a servant and paid her; and then she went to a situation in Singleton, and the last I heard of her she was still there.

3184. Mr. Metcalfe.] How long was she in the institution? Committed for one year. She was my first girl.

3185. How long was she in the institution? Some years ago.

3186. President.] How many girls have you had in the place from first to last? Fifteen, I think. There was the girl Louisa Winter—I got her a situation at Hunter's Hill, but she left it within a few days. I think that her brain was not right. Her mother died in the Lunatic Asylum. Mr. Cowper got her a situation, and I have not heard of her since. And one died with me—she had disease of the heart. There has been only one death in the place since it opened.

3187. The expenditure of the Government per head for these girls is about—how much? Well, I do not know. I cannot say. I have not the books, and I do not think it would be fair to reckon mine with the others. I pride myself on the economical working of the place since the Reformatory has been opened. There has been nothing broken—no smashing—and I have the same blankets now that I opened with. I am very economic with the girls' clothing, and they are very wasteful—these girls—I have to teach them care.

3188. You are the only person in the place who is paid a salary? Yes, with the exception of Mr. Lucas.

3189. Mr. Cowper.] And the great cost per head is in consequence of your having so few girls in the Reformatory? I do not know what the cost is.

3190. But that would increase the cost per head? Yes, I have no doubt it would. There is only the cost of their rations and of their clothing.

3191. They are the same everywhere, so that in your case it would not be greater than in the case of other institutions? Yes; you can see what I draw—it is all down.

3192. Are the rations good? Yes, better than they were. Everything is as good as can be expected. All the girls say to me that they have never had such a home in their lives before; and I try to instil into their minds to be grateful.

3193. Should they not come outside that wall sometimes—is not the confinement too great? Well, I asked that they might be allowed to come out sometimes, but it was not agreed to.

3194. Who would not agree to it? Mr. Lucas and Mr. Robertson were asked.

3195. Mr. Metcalfe.] You mean that you asked permission for them to walk on the island? Yes. I dare not do it under the present regulations—I dare not take them for a walk on the island—they must not go beyond the limits of their present place. It is a very little spot, and fortunately we have only a few girls in it.

3196. Mr. Cowper.] You were formerly matron of the Industrial School? Yes; matron superintendent.

3197. Had you not officers under you who had families? Yes.

3198. How did you arrange for their attendance—had they servants selected from the girls? Yes.

3199. What were your rules with reference to these girls when they attended upon the officers? It was this way: having such changeable beings to deal with, we could not keep them long in one place—their minds weary of one place. I changed them once a month, as a general rule—sometimes weekly. At muster every Monday morning I would make the house matron write on a slate who were to go to different departments, before she went down—each department. They were then detailed to the work—so many for each department; and they were marched away and put into the charge of the officers, who had to see that they behaved themselves, and see that they had clean clothing, and got their changes and food like the rest.

3200. Did not the officers' servants attend at meals with the girls at the general table? I tried that, but it was no good—they would tattle too much; they only came down to the institution to sleep.

3201. Were the dormitories distant from the other places? Yes.

3202. Where did those girls sleep? In the large dormitories. I wanted all the servants to sleep by themselves. That would have been a better plan.

3203. Were they away all day? Not all day. They came to school in the afternoon—came for half a day.

3204. Who looked after the officers' children while these girls were away at school? The officers' children?—Oh, they had to get somebody else to mind them. Mrs. Kelly, the teacher, a widow, came to me. As she had a baby, I gave her one of my best girls to nurse the baby and be with her. They had always to come to prayers morning and night, and this girl got lessons from Mrs. Kelly sometimes.

3205. But still they had their meals in the officers' quarters, and did not come down into the common dining-room? No, they did not.

3206. Did the officers sleep near the girls at night? Yes—the sub-matron and cook—in a room close by.

3207. Attached to each large dormitory there was a small room in which a matron slept? Yes.

3208. Do you know that they do not sleep near them now? No, they do not.

Mrs. A. King. 3209. Do you not think that that is objectionable? Yes. I know that if I had charge of them I could not sleep if I thought that all these little children were left all night like that. It is necessary that some one should be near them to look in in case of anything happening, and see what is the matter.

14 July, 1873.

3210. What regulations had you with reference to the girls' clothing—where did you keep it, and how many suits had each girl? They had clothes made of a kind of twill, "dungaree," for working in, and then they had a school suit, and then Mr. Parkes gave them the privilege of going to church, so that we had to make them church clothing as well.

3211. I want you to say how you kept the clothing, and under what system it was given out? It was branded. Each girl had a number, and her number was put on her clothing, and each Saturday night a girl's under-linen was laid on her bed, and on Sunday they got their frocks all out of the store.

3212. Mr. Metcalfe.] The clothes were branded where the brand could not be seen as they walked about? Yes, it was branded just in the lining of each inmate's clothes.

3213. Mr. Cowper.] Had they two suits of clothes or three suits—I want to know the system that you adopted with reference to them—had they clean clothes on Saturday night, and was it possible for one to take from another without your detecting her? No, because I was very strict at the muster. It depends a deal on the officer. As I had every rank before me, I would go and look at their clothes and see that they were all right, and I would inspect their ears and their heads after school twice a week. They came every Saturday to have their heads inspected and their clothes.

3214. How many suits had they? They had two suits for working in, and the Sunday suit.

3215. They had three suits then? Yes.

3216. Had you pigeon-holes in which to keep each girl's suits? They were not made then. We used to hang them on pegs, and all the hats were in a box. The house was not in good order when I went there.

3217. Did the girls wear hats at play? They wore hoods.

3218. At play? Yes.

3219. Did you find much difficulty in making them wear them? Great difficulty, and great difficulty in making them keep boots on. They would run about with their bare feet.

3220. Did the girls attend regularly when the bell was rung for muster? Pretty regularly; sometimes they would plant, and we had to search for them. There was great trouble sometimes in getting the bigger ones in—the older ones—they used to try and evade school.

3221. Mr. Metcalfe.] How old were they? Beyond the age specified by the Act—beyond sixteen. The first that came were of all ages, from the little child up to the big woman.

3222. Mr. Cowper.] Had you a muster-roll? Yes.

3223. When was it called? Every morning; and then at night I had the bed-roll called, because at night they might slip you.

3224. Do you think that that was necessary to keep up the discipline? Yes, with girls like those. They are always watching for a chance to slip you, and unless the roll is called, one gets out and runs away perhaps.

3225. Do you think that if the muster-roll were not called, the girls would be apt to get away and elude the officers without their being noticed? Yes. Captain Clarke did away with the roll-call and counted the girls instead, and sometimes they doubled on him in the counting. They slip behind one another so as to be counted twice over. It is necessary to call each girl's name and get an answer; and that is done in all other institutions.

3226. That is better than counting? Yes, because then the girls cannot slip you.

3227. Mr. Gould.] What do you think of the plan of locking up the children at 6 o'clock in the evening, or at dark, and leaving them alone until 9 o'clock, when they go to bed—leaving them alone without any occupation? Without supervision you mean—what do I think of it?

3228. Yes? Well, I think that is the way that all youth will get up to their little tricks if they are left alone and put together like that.

3229. Do you not think that some means could be adopted to interest them from the time it is dark until they go to bed? Yes.

3230. What was the plan that you adopted in Newcastle? Well, I had to lock them up. I found that it was necessary at dusk because of the girls absconding. I was compelled to lock them up, but then they were under supervision. The officers grumbled at it, but they had to do it. My matrons had to be with the girls from 6 till 9. I did not compel the girls to do what is called institution work, though some volunteered to make clothing, but I would allow them to make ornamental things, and do anything in the way of recreation. They had books too. I had just got a fine library of books, and they had them to read; and sometimes they would get up and have a dance. They were very fond of dancing.

3231. Was that allowed? Not in the dormitory.

3232. Was it allowed? No. I let them dance outside in the play-hour, but it was not allowed otherwise. In the summer evenings they were later in coming in. There was a play-ground outside, and every officer went out there with the girls, and I went out myself and let them what I call "let the steam off" before they went in. They could frolic there and have nice games until they went in.

3233. Did you find that it was impossible to interest them during those three hours before bed-time? Many would be interested, but there was always one disaffected or riotous girl.

3234. But it was effectual in interesting the others? Yes, it occupied their minds; and if you can do that, they do not get plotting together so much.

3235. Did you find it possible to do that by the means that you adopted? Yes; if I was with them they would not do anything wrong.

3236. What plan was adopted with regard to these girls when they came in—with regard to their hair, for instance—were they allowed to have it done as they thought proper? No, not when I had charge of the institution.

3237. There was a uniform mode of dressing their hair? Yes; I had it quite uniform in the case of all the children. I always came and saw to the children when they came in. They had a bath first; were stripped and washed immediately, and if the hair was dirty (I mean diseased or verminous—sometimes they had both disease and vermin) it had to be cut off, and the girl brought before the doctor the first time he came to the institution. If the big girls' hair was clean and free from disease I never cut it, but if it was not clean I made a rule that it must come off, because I might have got the whole institution diseased by one girl.

3238. President.] Besides the prayers that you read to them, are the children encouraged to say their prayers themselves before going to bed and on rising in the morning,—I mean the girls in the Reformatory?

tory? Yes. The girls say "Hail Mary" when they go to bed and rise; but I forgot to tell you, when I take them in at 9, I always make them all say the "Lord's Prayer," and the Catholics bless themselves, and then I leave them and they repeat the "Hail Mary." Mrs. A. King.
14 July, 1873.

3239. Have you any suggestions to make for the improvement of the Reformatory, besides giving better accommodation? Yes; I would like a nice schoolroom and dining-room, because it impresses them with order in the mind; it teaches them that the place is very different to what they have been brought up to.

3240. Do you think it would be possible to send the children, for secular instruction, to the school where the Industrial School children go during the day? They have gone for religious instruction, but at present I would rather that they did not, because of the others asking them questions; and they see some very bad conduct. I spoke to the nuns about it. While they are on their knees teaching them, the girls are carrying on all sorts of capers—the girls of the Industrial School. I beg of my girls not to notice them and keep away by themselves. Where there is a thorough supervision it could be done, but I do think that the girls are better apart altogether. I do think so, because the example of evil is stronger; they catch it more readily than they can be taught good things.

3241. Mr. Gould.] Is it your opinion that there is not a sufficient supervision over the children when they are in the school? I am speaking of the religious instruction. I do not go to the secular instruction—I know nothing about that; it is only the religious instruction that my girls go to.

3242. When you spoke of there not being sufficient supervision, what did you refer to? There are two nuns who come to teach them, and while one is reading prayers she cannot give her attention to the children. It requires an officer to supervise them and take down their names on the slate.

3243. You think that there is not sufficient supervision? I think that one of the officers should supervise them during prayers—during the religious instruction. They are not like quiet creatures who will stay in church, attentive to the minister's preaching.

3244. Mr. Cowper.] Do you find that the girls tell you the truth about what takes place? They may not be very truthful—they may not tell me all the truth; but I have asked the nuns if their conduct was good, and they said that they had no complaint to make.

3245. They are not truthful as a rule, are they? Yes, they are as a rule.

3246. Mr. Metcalfe.] When they first come in are they truthful? Some are addicted to lying, and some are not; some I have never found tell a lie.

3247. President.] Do you not find that girls of the prostitute class are generally more depraved than those who are simply committed for thieving? Yes.

3248. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are the parents of the children in the Reformatory all of them loose characters? Some are.

3249. Not all? Not all. I think that the girl Phillips' father was a respectable man. He was what is called a shepherd, and she was brought up the same, assisting to herd sheep. But the last three I have got are, I think, the children of parents who are very loose characters.

Mrs. Mary Ann Lucas, Matron, Industrial School for Girls, Biloela, called in and examined:—

3250. President.] You are the matron of the Industrial School at Biloela? Yes.

3251. And you have been acting in that capacity ever since the appointment of your husband as superintendent? Yes.

3252. We are told that you are assisted by some sub-matrons? Yes, there is a house-matron and two assistants.

3253. What are their duties? The house-matron's duty is to superintend the cleaning of the establishment, and she has all the clothing in her charge,—the bed-linen, and the girls' clothing, and the materials from the store both for making the clothing and for the house-linen; and the assistants act under Mrs. Rowland, the house-matron. Their duties are whatever Mrs. Rowland appoints.

3254. What are your duties? I am supposed to superintend the whole.

3255. Have you sufficient assistance in looking after the children? Yes.

3256. Do you think that the place is a suitable one in which to carry on an industrial school? I do not think so. The buildings are not at all suitable, nor yet the place.

3257. You think that the place is unsuitable on account of its being near the Dry Dock? That is one objection; and the great objection is that all the buildings have stone floors, which are very damp, cold, and unsightly. It is too much like a prison.

3258. You do not think that the associations of the place are at all calculated to exercise a good influence upon the girls and wean them from their bad habits? No, I do not. A strong place is required for some of the girls, but I think that the others are now in that state that a place which was not so much like a prison would suit them better.

3259. Have you had much trouble with them since they have been there? Yes, a good deal, but not so much within the last twelve months. We have had some trouble, but nothing to what we have had before.

3260. Why are they quieter now? Owing to the management, I think.

3261. Are the same girls there now that you had before when they were so troublesome? No; great numbers have gone out. They were very troublesome in Newcastle.

3262. Were those who have gone very disorderly characters? Yes, they were.

3263. What mode have you of punishing the children? The older girls are sometimes punished by being locked up, and the younger ones are sometimes punished with a cane.

3264. Is the time of the girls fully occupied in the washing and the other duties which they have to perform about the place? We keep them pretty well occupied; but by having officers who were willing and did their duty, more might be done—we could take more work—more washing could be done; but I do not think that they are far enough advanced in sewing to take in anything but plain needlework.

Mrs. M. A.
Lucas.

14 July, 1873.

- Mrs. M. A. Lucas. 3266. We are told that the children are locked up at night from about 6 o'clock until bed-time, without any means of interesting or amusing themselves, and without any supervision? No, they are locked up at present from 6 till 9, but they have been allowed out from 6 till 9.
- 14 July, 1873. 3267. Where were they then? In the dining-room.
3268. When was that left off? I think in April 1872, as a regular thing.
3269. Why was it left off? Well, I had no assistance but my own family to carry it out. The officers were not willing to assist.
3270. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you mean the matrons? Yes.
3271. Are they not under your orders to do what you tell them? Apparently not. They say that their hours are very long there—from 6 to 6.
3272. President.] Did you refer this matter to the Government at all? I am not aware whether Mr. Lucas did or not.
3273. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is there no one with the children in the dormitories from 6 to 6? No.
3274. Do you not think that that is objectionable? No, I do not.
3275. Do they never quarrel? No, they are not quarrelsome as a rule.
3276. President.] Suppose that one of them is sick in the night? They never have been. They must call if they are.
3277. They might be ill in the night? They might be, but they never have been. It has never happened that anything has occurred, but Mr. Lucas very often gets up at 12 o'clock and at 3 o'clock sometimes, and takes a walk round; and either I or Mr. Lucas is in and out of the building between 6 and 9, so that nothing can occur up to that time. They amuse themselves with crochet, and they have games which they play, and the younger children put the bedsteads to one side and have a game.
3278. Do they read? Yes.
3279. What books do they read? They have been lent books by myself and other persons; books that do not belong to the library.
3280. But these books are only lent to them on Sunday? Yes, they are issued on Sundays. We thought that we should try them on Sundays first and then on week-days afterwards, if they kept them clean. Sometimes I get papers sent by friends—tracts and London Journals—and I lend them those.
3281. We are told that the fact of the sub-matrons having children of their own on the place somewhat interferes with the discipline—have you found that? Yes.
3282. In what way? In several ways. The children interfere with the school children sometimes. It is not pleasant to have so many separate families. If the officers all had one dining-hall the institution could be carried on much better; but it is very unpleasant to have so many families, so many houses and so many servants.
3283. Why should not the officers dine and drink tea with the girls? Oh, those ladies would not think of doing that.
3284. Mr. Metcalfe.] It is called a school, you know, and in all the schools that I ever heard of, the teachers sit at table with girls? Not this class of girls.
3285. I do not see why they should not sit down with them? Well, our officers have a great objection to sitting down with the girls.
3286. Do you not think that if they did sit down with them, it would have a very good effect on the discipline of the girls? Yes, I think so. It would be more homely and more agreeable for the girls, and more attention could be paid them.
3287. President.] What is the age of the youngest child you have got there? We have a baby there who I think is about eighteen months old—I do not know its age exactly. It is very weak and delicate.
3288. How soon do you begin to teach the children to work? Some we have working are under ten years of age—doing little things, but not regular work—assisting in the dormitories, making their own beds.
3289. I mean needlework? There are some sewing who are not more than seven or eight years old. We are teaching them at five and six. Those children who have been sent into the institution young are the best sewers we have. Some of the little girls are the best sewers in the place.
3290. They have been healthy at Cockatoo? Yes; I think more so than before—very healthy.
3291. Have you had that assistance from the officers under you that you think that you should have? No, I have not.
3292. Mr. Metcalfe.] By whom are the officers appointed? By the Government.
3293. You have nothing to do with their appointment? No, not even with regard to the laundress or cook, and that makes it very difficult. We have people sent there who sometimes are opposed to us altogether.
3294. President.] Does that state of things exist now? Yes.
3295. That is, there are people there who are opposed to you altogether? Yes; the house matron, and one of the assistants, Mrs. Brackenregg.
3296. Mr. Couper.] Is Mrs. Brackenregg opposed to you? Yes.
3297. I thought you were such firm friends? No, we were never firm friends. There have been times when they worked very well, but that was when there was no party-work going on; for the past two months especially they have not.
3298. President.] How does this want of unanimity show itself? In not complying with orders that are given.
3299. Give us instances of that? I went into the workroom and saw a girl stitching up a coloured body with white thread, which should have been stitched up with black, and a girl has to spend the whole afternoon undoing that work; and when I said that more attention should be paid to the girls' work, I was told by the officer "Did I think she could fix work and attend to the girls too." I said—"The Government would think us foolish to apply for more assistants." They then said—"They were not servants under me." At that time there were two assistants in the room to look after not more than twelve girls.
3300. Has there ever been any actual disobedience of orders by these officers? Yes, in little things which I cannot exactly describe. There is a system of worrying and small annoyances going on.
3301. You think that you have not got the support that you should have? Yes. If a girl has not a change of clothing, and I speak about it, I am spoken to in an insulting manner. If a girl's head is not clean, and I speak of it, I am spoken to in a way that I should not be. I have borne a great deal, for I know that they are people with families, who might not be able to gain a living so well elsewhere.

Mrs. M. A.
Lucas.

14 July, 1873.

3302. Mr. Gould.] Do they speak to you in this way before the girls? Yes.
3303. Mr. Metcalfe.] How many of the officers have children on the island? Mrs. Brackenregg has three, Mrs. Rowland has two, the teacher has two, the second assistant has two, and the gatekeeper has three.
3304. That is twelve children altogether? Yes.
3305. Where do these children go to school? They have gone to a school on the other side of the island; there is a private school there—Mrs. Hegarty's.
3306. Who waits upon these children? Each of the officers has a girl from the institution.
3307. Is that understood by the Government to be the case? I believe so. It was the case when we took charge of the school at Newcastle.
3308. How can these children attend school if they attend to the house-work of the sub-matrons? They go to school in the afternoon.
3309. None go in the morning? Yes, the small children go in the morning, and the older ones in the afternoon.
3310. It is only the older ones who are at service? In some cases.
3311. They do not go to the officers then after dinner? Yes, they go after school.
3312. Where do they sleep? In the dormitories with the other girls.
3313. And go to the officers' quarters in the morning again? Yes, they go at 6 o'clock, when they are out of the dormitories.
3314. Where do they have their meals? At the officers' quarters generally.
3315. And are rations given out to the officers and their families by the institution? The officers' ration is a pound of meat and a pound of bread a day—the regular ration.
3316. That cannot keep a family? No, I suppose not; they purchase rations for their families.
3317. These people are not married? No.
3318. Who fetches their provisions? Their children. They send them to Sydney for them.
3319. The children are of a sufficient age to go? Yes.
3320. Mr. Couper.] Was this always the system—that a girl should go up to the officers' quarters and stay there? No; we have made it a point that the girls should come down to their meals.
3321. When did the system commence? I cannot say; but we found it inconvenient with regard to the officers' girls going to school in the afternoon. There was not sufficient time for the officers to go to dinner and get their dinner over, and for their girls to be ready for school. When we took charge of the school the girls who were on the officers' quarters only went to school once a fortnight, but since we have been at Cockatoo Mr. Lucas has insisted on their going every afternoon, and that is how they are allowed to have their dinner at the officers' quarters, to give them time to be at school by a quarter to 2.
3322. Mr. Metcalfe.] I do not see what advantage there is in their having their dinner at the officers' quarters—they cannot have their dinners with the officers? I do not know. I think sometimes they put it past till tea-time.
3323. Mr. Couper.] Have you any bell? No, we have not had one for many months.
3324. How are the children called to school, or mustered at any time? We have to send girls round to muster them.
3325. What has become of the bell? We have one there now, but it cannot be rung.
3326. President.] Why—has it not got a tongue? It is out of repair. Some men came up and repaired it, and it rang three times after that. Mr. Lucas sent in last November about it, and has been continually sending in.
3327. Mr. Couper.] What position do the girls hold in the school who have braid on their dresses? None. They ask permission to put it on, and I have allowed them.
3328. And the girls who have ribbon in their hair—do they occupy any higher position than the others? No.
3329. How is it that they are allowed such a privilege? Their parents and friends bring them ribbons, and we have not thought it objectionable to allow them to wear them. If I mistake not, you bought them some coloured ribbons some time back yourself.
3330. Are the clothes counted out to the laundry every week and counted back again? Yes.
3331. Whose duty is it to do that? Mrs. Rowland's—it is her duty properly; but if she is engaged, Mrs. Brackenregg does it.
3332. How many suits of clothes has each girl allowed her? She has two suits, one to go to school in and one to work in, and a Sunday suit.
3333. She has a Sunday suit and two other suits? I understood you to ask how many suits has each girl. She has three dresses—a working dress and a dress to go to school in, and a Sunday dress. We give each of them two sets of everything, two petticoats, two pairs of stockings, two of everything.
3334. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are two pairs of stockings enough for a girl? Yes; they change twice a week.
3335. What do the sub-matrons get paid? ———
3336. Mr. Couper.] You say that you did not get any assistance from the officers with reference to the night school? No.
3337. Do you not recollect that I commenced that night school with the assistance of two or three volunteers? Yes; Mr. Cane and Mrs. Kelly.
3338. You did not require the assistance of the officers then? How long did it last?
3339. You did not want assistance then? I made no statement of that kind.
3340. Were not the lamps for that school purchased by me, and was not everything got by me? Yes, you purchased them, but the Government paid for them.
3341. Was it not the general opinion that it would be impossible to get the girls to attend an evening school like that? It was carried on some time, of course.
3342. Without your assistance? When I went into the room Mrs. Kelly gave up. I know that you made a complaint, and that Mrs. Kelly made a complaint when I went into the room; but as matron of the institution I thought it was my duty to be wherever the girls were assembled together.
3343. Was your husband not there? He was outside—he was there sometimes.
3344. But was he not enough to keep order in the place, without your being there? I do not know.
3345. But you complained of want of assistance in conducting the school? How want of assistance?
3346. Did you not interfere and prevent the thing being carried on? In what way?
3347. Did I not arrange the tables for draughts, and work, and crochet, and so on, and did you not then come in and put the girls to various employments? I did.
- 3348.

- Mrs. M. A. Lucas.
14 July, 1873.
3348. Did you not come and take the girls away from those tables and put them to do work? I beg your pardon—I did not.
3349. When I came in, were you not there with the girls making dresses? Yes, at the request of the girls, who would not stop out unless we did so.
3350. Would it not have been fair to allow those persons who offered to conduct this night school to carry it on, and see what they could do without your interference? I do not think so, from my own opinion of those two parties. From what I have seen, I would not leave the girls with them.
3351. President.] Why not? Because I know that both Mr. Cane and Mrs. Kelly were in opposition to myself.
3352. How do you mean in opposition? Well, if they could work us out—that was the object.
3353. What could they do in the school of an evening? Well, they have influence over the girls.
3354. Would they influence them to insubordination? Yes, against me and against Mr. Lucas—Mr. Cane especially. I cannot say so much as to Mrs. Kelly, but I know that she was with Mr. Cane. The insubordination was shown in this manner,—that if I gave a girl an order she would disobey me, and I have seen Mr. Cane praising a girl for being so brave as to disobey my orders.
3355. How did Mrs. Kelly show it? By taking part with Mr. Cane in all his proceedings; and the antecedents of these people throughout the institution will be seen.
3356. Mr. Cowper.] Had they not opportunities of starting acts of insubordination throughout the day; were they not in the school and about the grounds all day, and could they not more easily urge the girls on to rebel then, than they could when you and Mr. Lucas were present? Mr. Lucas was not there all the time I think.
3357. He said he would be—certainly Mr. Lucas said he would have the school started, and they were the only ones to assist? Wherever the girls were I felt that it was my duty to be.
3358. You did not come in at first? I did not at first, because I had not thought over it, but afterwards I did go in.
3359. When I bought skipping-ropes as a kind of reward for them, did you not say that it would be impossible to put a girl in charge of them? Yes, I say so still.
3360. And did I not put Sarah Boswell in charge of them, and did not she take charge of them very nicely? Yes, with my superintending her and counting them.
3361. Did she not feel a pleasure in looking after them, and seeing that the little children had them? She did it very well. I do not say that she did not, but on many occasions they would have been short if I had not looked after them.
3362. But do you not think that, considering the difficulty the officers had in managing the girls, it was rather a wonder that the girl did so well as she did? We have a difficulty in managing the girls, and we find them very troublesome, but I am there to see that they do things.
3363. Do you find that the officers speak to you insolently? They did some time back.
3364. Did you find that they did so without provocation? I do not consider that I ever gave them provocation.
3365. Do you mean to say that they speak to you loudly and insolently without provocation? Yes.
3366. Do all of them act in this way? I do not say all of them. Mrs. Brackenregg has been most insolent, and so has Mrs. Rowland.
3367. Do you find that the laundress speaks to you in this way? She has done, but not of late.
3368. What kind of amusement did you give the girls? Draughts, reading, writing, crochet, and sewing. Miss Lucas taught woolwork and several little fancy things. Miss R. Lucas taught them crochet, and I had a table with plain needlework.
3369. And you found that you had to give that up? Yes. The girls got wearied. They are girls that require a constant change—they do not keep to one thing very long, and they got at last that they did not care to come out. We had them out twice a week, and afterwards occasionally.
3370. Mr. Lucas says that they used to get away? Yes, two girls got over the wall.
3371. How did they manage that? We were in the dining-room, and they got out of the back door into the quadrangle, and then they got over.
3372. Do you not think that if you had fastened the doors that could have been prevented? We could not keep the doors locked.
3373. Do you not think that the girls could remain in the room for two hours without going out? We could not fasten the back door.
3374. When were these two girls missed? At muster, before going to their dormitories. They were picked up by the police on the island. It was E— J— and—I forget the other one's name who got over.
3375. They were not discovered to be away until the police found them? We missed them when we went to lock up. We always muster the girls before taking them to the dormitories.
3376. How do you muster them? We count them, and then every girl is counted in the dormitory.
3377. By name—are they called by name? No.
3378. Do you not think that it would be better to do so? We tried to adopt that plan, but the dormitories are not well lighted, and we found that it was rather inconvenient. There is only a lamp in the passage, and unless we had a girl to hold the light we could not call the roll. We should have nothing to go by. We had a roll for every dormitory at first when we came to the island, and then we adopted the plan of counting the children.
3379. What prayers do they say? The General Confession and the Lord's Prayer, every night and morning.
3380. Do you teach them to milk? Yes. If a girl becomes a good milker we put on another, but we find it very difficult to get a girl who has any idea of milking.
3381. Have you regular changes from the laundry to the kitchen? Yes; there are three lots of girls, and they are changed once in three weeks.
3382. There is a fresh lot of girls there every week? Yes.
3383. And the same is done with regard to the kitchen? We do not change the older girls in the kitchen.
3384. President.] Are not all the girls taught to milk? Some have no idea of it.
3385. But is it not the object of the school to teach them? Yes.
3386. Mr. Cowper.] Are the girls that go to the officers' quarters changed? Yes; they must be changed every four weeks for the laundry.

3387. How long has one girl been on the officers' quarters? I have know a girl stay for six or seven months, but they always go to school.

3388. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are they taught house-work? As far as we can, but we have not the accommodation there to do so properly.

3389. Mr. Goold.] Have you any fixed rule for changing them about from one duty to another? Yes; we change them every week; the laundry girls are changed every week, and two of the kitchen girls every week, but having no cook, we endeavour to keep a girl there who understands cooking as long as we can.

3390. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not give her something extra? No, we do not yet.

3391. Would it not be a good plan to do so? Mr. Lucas intended to see Mr. Halloran about it. There was something said about 6d. a week.

3392. Mr. Goold.] Do you think that it is desirable to pay them? I think that it is an encouragement. I think that there should be a better system of rewards and punishments. At present there is none whatever. The only reward we can hold out to the girls is to get them situations as soon as they are ready to go out.

3393. What do you do with a girl when she first comes to the institution? I hand her over to the house matron to be bathed, and all her clothes are taken off and the institution clothes are put on.

3394. What is done with her hair? Her head is examined, and if the head is clean the hair is left on. We very seldom cut their hair.

3395. You have no uniform plan with regard to the dressing of their hair? It is only tied back.

3396. How often do these girls we saw in the schools have their hair combed? Sometimes two or three times a day; but every girl is obliged to go to the bath and have her head washed in the morning.

3397. Who sees that it is done? One of the assistants.

3398. Are you satisfied that it is done? It is not done sometimes as I should wish. Some children I have to take myself and see that it is done, and this last week I had four children to take care of myself.

3399. Do you not think that their hair should be cut shorter? The hair of the younger ones we cut short, but the older ones we allow to have their hair long, as a privilege. I should not like to degrade them by cutting their hair.

3400. I do not say cut it quite short, but should there not be a tidiness about the children's heads which did not appear with those we saw in the school? The place is very windy, and using nothing but water the hair is very rough, but with one or two exceptions the girls' hair is quite short enough.

3401. I do not mean that the hair should be cut very short, but so that it can be kept clean? If I see that a girl is careless and does not keep her hair clean, we cut it—we have to do so.

3402. President.] Is there anything that you wish to suggest for the improvement of the place? Yes; I would suggest that these girls who are brought into the place from prostitution should be in a separate institution from the children. I said from the time that I first went into the place that it was a very great evil. Nothing occurs among the big girls that the younger ones do not know, and of course they do the same.

3403. Mr. Metcalfe.] And they may be all corrupted? Yes. It is a very great evil. Those young girls who might be brought up innocently are corrupted by these other girls being brought up with them. We have them in separate dormitories, but that is all we can do, for the place is so situated that they must all mix together.

3404. President.] I see that it is provided in the rules, under the head "Superintendent,"—that he shall "endeavour to obtain needlework, washing, paper-bag making, &c., to be performed at the school; the net profits of which will be rateably divided amongst the girls monthly in proportion to their good marks, as will be also the net profits of other industries maintained in the school."—Is there any such work done as will allow of that rule being carried out? No, we have not had any opportunity there, with the exception of the woolwork done in the evening. I bought the material, and the girls did the work, and what we sold the proceeds were distributed to the girls that did the work. That is what I wanted to carry out. If the girls did fancy articles, I would sell them and give the girls the profits. They made a good many things, such as ladies' neck-ties, babies' boots, table-covers, D'Oyleys, and many little things.

3405. Have you any other suggestion to make besides the one you have made with regard to the separation of these two classes of girls? No, I think not. I think that if the girls were separated it would be a great help and a great benefit to the younger children.

3406. Mr. Lucas seemed to desire the responsibility being imposed upon him of choosing his own officers and being responsible for their attention—do you think that that would be better? I think that whoever is superintendent should have the privilege of choosing their own officers. People are there in opposition to us—perhaps in favour of another superintendent—and in consequence they will not work with us.

3407. Mr. Cane was storekeeper there before, was he not? Yes.

3408. Was he an applicant for the office of superintendent when Mr. Lucas was appointed? Yes, I have understood so.

3409. And you believe that his not getting the position has thrown him into a position of antagonism? Yes. It was said that he would soon have Mr. Lucas out and take the position himself.

3410. Mr. Goold.] How many officers were there in the place when you went there? The teacher, and Mrs. Rowland, and Mrs. Brackenregg. Mrs. Rowland went the evening before we went, but she was an old friend of Captain Clarke's, and Mrs. Brackenregg was there a fortnight.

3411. President.] Is this not practically an institution where there must be unanimity among the officials in order to effect the reformation of these girls? Yes. I think myself that I am working single-handed; for if I go and give these girls advice, I do not know another officer that would take a girl aside and give her advice, except perhaps Mrs. Dunn.

3412. Mr. Cowper.] Have you not been on very friendly terms with the matrons generally? Yes, I have been when there was no party influence at work.

3413. President.] What do you mean by party influence? I mean influenced as they have been by the prospect of removing the matron and superintendent, and getting higher positions themselves—which is the position that they are in at the present time.

3414. Do you think that they all expect that? Well, from what I understand, I do not class Mrs. Dunn with them. She is a conscientious woman, and I have known her take the girls aside and give them advice; but I have not seen the others do so.

3415. Do you mean to say that the matrons there are so indifferent as to the objects of the school that they

*Mrs. M. A.
Lucas.*

14 July, 1873.

- Mrs. M. A. Lucas. they will not advise the children? They may tell the children not to do so and so, or speak to them, that they must not do such and such a thing again. And when I see the influence that they have over the minds of some of the bigger girls, I am afraid that they influence them against our teachings and advice.
- 14 July, 1873. 3416. You think that an officer of the institution, besides doing the work that she is ordered to do, should acquire some influence over the girls and exercise it for their good? Yes, I believe that the officers should be persons of stability of character or else it is no use their being there, for those girls are keen in their perceptions, and feel and know more than they are supposed to know, and if I do wrong they see it quickly, and it has a bad influence upon them. Some of the officers there are too light and trifling for the position. We want more staid people there. If the girls are to be reformed it is not by such people.
3417. Mr. Metcalfe.] They are all mothers, are they not? Yes, but all mothers are not serious.
3418. All widows? Yes. At least, Mrs. Rowland is not a widow. Her husband is away.
3419. Mr. Cowper.] How long is it since the party feeling has arisen? Well, Mrs. Kelly was with Mr. Cane, and when Mr. Cane was removed they saw no prospect of his getting the position, and they had no alternative but to work with us; but I have taken no notice of them, hoping that they would see that it was to their interest as well as to the interest of the school to work with us.
3420. They have not worked with you? No, not for some time back.
3421. Has Mr. Prior joined that party? I do not say so. I do not know. They are not friendly, nor do they speak at all.
3422. Mr. Goold.] Have you ever reported their conduct to the Government? I have not, because, as I have said before, they are women with families and have nothing to depend upon, and I thought that they would see it would be to their own benefit to do their duty there and act in a different manner.
3423. Mr. Cowper.] You spoke of their possessing influence—what influence did you mean? Influence—well, if officers are light and trifling, and go out in the evening, and gentlemen come to see them, and they come in next day and talk before the girls of what has transpired the night before—
3424. But what influence can they have—you mean, I suppose, that they exercise a bad influence over the girls? Yes.
3425. I thought you meant that they had influence with a Member of Parliament to get you put out? No.
3426. Mr. Goold.] I understood you to say that they have gentlemen there? Gentlemen come into the institution to see them.
3427. Mr. Cowper.] Has Mrs. Brackenregg been visited by gentlemen? Not that I am aware of; but Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Kelly have.
3428. Mr. Goold.] During the day? Yes. Gentlemen come up by the half-past 3 boat, and in the evening too.
3429. And you consider it your duty to prevent that? Well, I could not prevent that, but I say that the influence of ladies who are so trifling—
3430. Mr. Metcalfe.] But are people allowed to visit the officers in this way? Yes, they have always been allowed to visit.
3431. Mr. Goold.] Are they religious? They are not religious.
3432. Does the visiting interfere with the discharge of their duties? Yes, it does at times.
3433. President.] In what way? By the officers going out to visitors and leaving their duties.
3434. Mr. Cowper.] Can you not stop them—forbid them to go? I have sent for them, but of course that is —
3435. Would it not be the proper way for the person in charge of the institution to give the gatekeeper an order not to admit persons? Mr. Lucas did make a regulation that no one should be admitted after 7 o'clock, or should be allowed out after 10 p.m.
3436. Has he not been supported in that? He has tried it, but I cannot say whether it has been carried out or not.
3437. You have visitors, I suppose? I have.
3438. And has not Mrs. King? Not after night.
3439. You all have visitors—has it not been a regular thing? Yes, it has been. We have had visitors.
3440. President.] Do you propose to exclude all visitors? No.
3441. You do not mean to say that an officer, whatever her position, should not see her friends? I think that it is right they should see their friends, and I have given way, and fulfilled their duties to allow them to see them.
3442. You think that the practice has been carried to too great an extent? It is so. The fact of Mr. Lucas having to make a regulation shows that.

Mrs. Caroline Brackenregg, sub-matron, Industrial School for Girls, Biloela, called in and examined:—

- Mrs. C. Brackenregg. 3443. President.] You are one of the sub-matrons at Biloela Industrial School? Yes.
3444. How long have you held that position? Two years and five months.
3445. What salary do you get? £50 a year.
- 14 July, 1873. 3446. Do you get any rations? Yes, we have rations allowed us.
3447. One ration? Yes, one ration—the usual ration.
3448. What are your duties in the school? My duties are very varied. I went there as assistant matron, and I have more duties to perform now.
3449. What duties did you expect to have to perform? I expected to do what I called a fair quantity of duties; but now I have other duties put upon me.
3450. What are they? Seeing to the feeding of the pigs, and seeing to the cleaning of the pig-sties—all the menial work of the institution—at least that part, and I have to see the cows milked.
3451. Do you do these things yourself? No; I have to see them done, and the water pumped for the cows—all such work as that; and I am accountable for it; if there is anything wrong about the cow-shed I am called to account for it. When I get up in the morning, the first thing I do is to go to the dormitories and see that they are cleaned up, and get the beds made as far as I can get them (for I have to leave that, and see how they are getting on in the milking-shed); then I see to the other matters—the cleaning of the lamps and the store-room, and the presses have to be cleaned; then when I have done that it is half-past half-past 7, and I go to breakfast; then at half-past 8 I attend the muster, and then there are little things about the place to be seen to, such as picking up brooms and buckets, and so on; and then I go to the work-room and sit there until 12 o'clock, and I superintend the sewing; then before I leave that I see that the work is put away.

Mrs. C.
Brackenregg.

14 July, 1873.

3452. That is the needlework? Yes. Then I go to the dining-hall and wait there until the dinner is over, and that may be—I cannot say what time—I cannot tell what hour it may be—it may be one day at 1 o'clock and another day half-past 1, or any hour—I cannot state any time. Then I go home and get my own dinner, and go down to the sewing-room at 2 o'clock and stay there until 4. Then I go to the milk-shed and see the cows fed and milked and the milk taken round to the store, and then see to the dormitories that the candles and lamps and so on are got ready for the night; and then I go to the dining-hall again and wait there until tea is over, which may be sometimes early, while at other times the girls go straight from tea to muster; then I see the lights put into the dormitories, and the girls are mustered and prayers are said, and the girls are put into the dormitories; and then I go home to tea; then I come down again at 9 o'clock with the house-matron to see that all is correct, and then I go home for good. These are the principal things, but each day brings its own duties; for instance, there is more work on Saturday.

3453. What do the other sub-matrons do? That is Mrs. Dunn, the other sub-matron; she was supposed to take part with me—such as attending to the bath—there is that to attend to; but since there has been no cook I cannot really tell you what we do. We do each other's work. She is in the kitchen instead of the bath-room, and it interferes with our arrangements, or rather the arrangements of the institution. She is in the kitchen instead of the bath-room, and of course she has to attend in the work-room as well. I attend to the bathing on Saturdays only.

3454. Mr. Cowper.] You look after different sets of girls? No; Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Dunn attend to them; Mrs. Rowland attends to her own bathing in the morning; she attends to the big girls, and Mrs. Dunn to the smaller girls.

3455. President.] Then is it your complaint that there is a want of system, or that there is too much work, or a different kind of work to what you bargained for? There is no system at all. I do not object to the work, but I do not think it is proper work. I do not think you will get a servant to go and see pigsties cleaned out and troughs cleaned, and so on.

3456. I have seen many a lady in the country superintending the cleaning of these things herself. So long as you are not asked to do it yourself, surely there is no hardship in looking on? No, I am not above doing it, but I have other things to do, and when I went there I was not aware I had to do that.

3457. Mr. Metcalfe.] There are no boys in the institution? There is a messenger there who brings in coal and so on.

3458. President.] Were you in a public institution before you went there? No, never.

3459. You spoke about superintending the milking. How many girls on the island can milk? I do not think there are above four or five who can milk.

3460. How many girls are there altogether? About eighty, I think.

3461. Are they not all taught regularly? There are two kept at the milking.

3462. Are they not all taught? There are two regularly. One of the milking girls went, and we had another taught in her place.

3463. Do not you think it would be a desirable thing for girls there to learn to milk? Yes, I think it would be quite right for them to learn.

3464. Then there are two who learn regularly? Yes, there are two who milk regularly.

3465. There are many others big enough in the school to learn? Yes.

3466. I think we have been told that you are a widow? Yes.

3467. Have you any family? Yes—three children.

3468. What are their ages? One is twelve, another is ten, and the other is a little girl.

3469. Mr. Cowper.] The two boys are twelve and ten? The eldest boy is twelve, and the girl is fourteen years of age.

3470. President.] Do they live on the island? Yes, but the eldest boy is going away.

3471. Do they go to school? Yes—on the island, to Mrs. Hegarty, who keeps the post office.

3472. Does one of the girls of the institution work for you? Yes, we are allowed a girl to work for us.

3473. Does she go to school? Yes, in the afternoon.

3474. You get your meals in your own house, do you not? Yes, at home—there is no other place to get them.

3475. Do you and the superintendent, Mr. Lucas, get on comfortably together? No, not at all comfortably.

3476. How is that? Well, it is rather a difficult thing for me to say. I scarcely know how to answer that question, because Mr. Lucas's ideas are so very low and vulgar that I don't think it is possible for any one to get on with him.

3477. In what way? His ideas about females are low, and I complain of the way we are treated.

3479. Has this happened more than once? Yes, it has happened frequently; and Mr. Lucas never complains to us of anything privately, but at the mustering before all the girls we are abused, and the girls hear everything, and how is it possible for them to respect us?

3480. How long has this uncomfortable feeling existed in the place? For a length of time; and often we said that we would send in a memo. of our grievances, and Mr. Lucas said it was no use—"that he would let us know that, with the large body of people he had to support him, he did not care for any one—that he did not care for Mr. Robertson when he was in, and when Mr. Parkes was in he did not care for him either."

3481. Do you mean to say that you have heard these things yourself, or is it the talk of the place? I have heard them myself with my own ears.

3482. Mr. Gould.] Has he said this before the girls? Yes, before the girls; what does he care? he cares for nobody, and frequently we would have complained only for that.

- Mrs. C. Brackenregg
14 July, 1878.
3483. President.] How did this begin? It is all a suspicion on his part, and it is a very wrong suspicion indeed, that if anything goes wrong it is all our fault. The fact is, he does not know how to manage the institution, and he puts down all the mishaps that happen, to us unfortunate females.
3484. Do you think that you have done your best for the girls? Yes. I have never left any stone unturned to assist him; but no matter what you do, there is always that eye of suspicion. It is quite natural for people to talk together, and he thinks we are talking about him. We have a great many things to consult about, and when we are talking together, Mr. Lucas always thinks we are talking about him and Mrs. Lucas. I was talking to a girl in the dormitory the other day, and Mrs. Lucas rushed in, and said "Don't you be talking about me." That is the eye of suspicion always upon us. Her name was never mentioned on the occasion at all. And when we tell her that something is destroyed, she will say—"Tell us who did it"; but how can we do that. I would be happy to tell her if I could, but it is not our duty to find out these things. I thought that it was the duty of the head of the establishment to do that, and if we go to her with the information, what can we do more?
3485. But do you not suppose that it is your duty to help Mrs. Lucas to maintain order and discipline? Yes, as far as laid in our power; but if I said to a girl that she did such and such a thing, she would want proof of it, and that would be hard; and if I complain to Mrs. Lucas of a girl, she says—"Oh, you are always trying to get up rows"; and the other night they were all making a noise in the dormitories—we could not tell what it was about—and we went down to assist Mr. and Mrs. Lucas, and we got a volley of abuse from them. "Oh," they said, "this is all your work. Oh, bring those girls out—it is easy to know who they are." And of course these girls pick up Mr. Lucas's spirit at once, as these vulgar-minded people do, and they shout out from the dormitories and abuse us.
3486. You and the other matrons? Yes, the matrons.
3487. Mr. Goold.] In the presence of the girls? Yes; and the girls shout out to me—"Oh, you old scorpion," and to Mrs. Rowland, "Oh, you old kangaroo"—that is what they call her.
3488. President.] Have you ever done anything to make Mr. Lucas think that you did not support him; because it is fair to tell you that he complains of a want of support from you—such support as he requires in an institution of this sort? I can speak conscientiously for myself, and say that I have never done anything in that institution that he did not approve of; but he is so suspicious, and the very girls, he says, were put up to things by us. There was a girl that I had in my quarters for five months with me, and Mrs. Lucas was always accusing me of hearing tales from this girl, and Mr. Lucas said he knew all about it (he always knows all about everything—he says "I know all about it"); and this girl was impertinent to me, and I told her to go back into the institution at once. Would I have done that to that girl if I had put her up to anything?—No; I have never said a thing to any of them that I am ashamed of.
3489. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do any of the sub-matrons take their meals with the children? No, but they sit in the hall during meal-times.
3490. Why do they not sit down with them? It has never been done.
3491. Are the joints carved at the table, or is the meat brought in on plates? No, it is all cut up on plates.
3492. Does not Mr. Lucas sit down with the children? Oh dear no. The matrons stay in the dining-hall until the girls have dined.
3493. And the same at night? Yes, at every meal.
3494. And no one takes care of these wards where the little children are, at night? No, only where there is a dormitory full of small children, a larger girl is put in to mind them.
3495. You are allowed one ration for yourself? Yes.
3496. Where do you get food for your children? I buy that in Sydney. I generally get a large piece of meat, and that does for two or three days; but I generally give the children bread and butter—they seem to like it best. They have nothing from the institution.
3497. The food is cooked for you by a girl from the institution? Yes.
3498. She has her dinner with you? In the dining-hall. They carry their dinners away—a good many of them.
3499. Mr. Couper.] That was not allowed, was it? At one time it was not, but the rule has been broken through.
3500. How long has it been so? I do not know. They are not supposed to take away any knives and forks, and they are supposed to bring one of our plates for their dinners. Mr. Lucas said they were not to do it, and they did not do it for a time, but if they do not do it this week they will next. Mr. Lucas's own girls did not come to dinner, and so of course the others would not.
3501. Then it is because Mr. Lucas's girls are allowed to do it, that your girls expect to be allowed to do it also? Yes, that is what they say. They say—"Why should we come down if the others do not?"
3502. Mr. Metcalfe.] Then they prefer having their meals at your house? Yes, because they can run about and eat them as they like.
3503. Mr. Couper.] Would you prefer that they had their meals in the dining-hall? Of course it would be better if they did. They take our plates down; but if Mr. Lucas wanted it, it would be all right, but as he does not enforce it they do as they like.
3504. Mr. Goold.] I suppose that there is a want of discipline in the institution? Yes; a want of order and discipline.
3505. Mr. Couper.] Mrs. Lucas complains that you speak insolently to her? I do not know of it.
3506. Is there anything of that kind that you remember? Not that I am aware of.
3507. She says that she has never given you any provocation, and that you speak insultingly to her? She has insulted me in every possible way—in such a way that if I had any feeling at all I could not help feeling Mrs. Lucas's insults.
3508. I thought that you were great friends? No; I do not think from first going into the institution that she ever liked me.
3509. How did she insult you? The way in which she talks to us before the girls is very insulting.
3510. You have not said anything about her doing that—you have only mentioned Mr. Lucas having done that? And she assists him. Anything he says she says, and how can we argue with two people at once? and if one commences the other commences too.

TUESDAY, 15 JULY, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.
MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.
CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

JOSEPH WEARNE, Esq., M.P.

Mrs. Caroline Brackenregg, Sub-matron, Industrial School, Biloela, called in and further examined:—

3511. Mr. Cowper.] You said something yesterday as to the way in which Mr. Lucas spoke to you, and I do not think that you gave the Commission any statement with reference to Mrs. Lucas: did you always find her treat you as she should do? Not at all. I have the same complaint against her as against Mr. Lucas—in fact more so, because if he was not influenced so much by her he would be better than he is. She represents things to him in any way that she thinks proper, and then of course when she speaks first, what we say is put down as nothing at all.

Mrs. C.
Brackenregg.
15 July, 1873.

3512. Do you think it is advisable that the superintendent of an institution like that should have his wife associated with him as matron? I think that it has been a decided oversight. I do not think that the matron should be related to the superintendent.

3513. Do you find that it is impossible for the officers to get that justice from the superintendent that they expect when their accuser is the superintendent's own wife? No. For, as I said before, if Mrs. Lucas represents a thing, of course he believes in her, and our statements, of course, are nothing at all—nothing; we get no justice whatever. He says that he does not know us, and he does her—that he has never known her to tell an untruth, and he is not going to take our word before hers.

3514. Do you find that she supports your authority in the institution? No, nothing of the kind—in fact she countermands our orders, and I have heard her tell a girl not to mind me or obey my orders.

3515. President.] In your presence? Yes.

3516. Mr. Cowper.] How long ago? About two years ago.

3517. We should like to have something more recent than that? She has done so many times. I could give several instances.

3518. Mr. Goold.] You had better name an instance if you can? There was the other day, I sent a little girl with a message, and when I sent her she told Mrs. Lucas she was going with a message for me, and she told her not to go—not to mind us, but her.

3519. President.] When was this? A short time ago.

3520. Can you fix the date? I cannot. It was about two months ago.

3521. Where were you sending the child to? On a message to another matron.

3522. Inside the institution? Yes.

3523. Mr. Goold.] Was there anything objectionable in the message? No, it was only about the business of the institution. Mrs. Lucas asked the girl where she was going, and the girl said—"On a message for Mrs. Brackenregg"; and she told her not to go at all.

3524. Mr. Cowper.] Can you give an instance in which Mrs. Lucas has interfered with your arrangements? If I give an order to have a thing done a certain way, she will give orders to have it done in another way.

3525. When you are there carrying out the work? Yes.

3526. Well, when you speak to her and reason with her, will she not give way? No, she will not reason. She flies into a temper.

3527. Will she not listen to you? No, she will not listen at all, but she gets into a towering rage. She will not go into the rights of a thing, but gets into a rage, and never takes any notice of what we say.

3528. Whose duty was it to see the girls into the dormitories from the evening schoolroom, or after tea? Well, we have done it. I have done it always since I have been in the institution—Mrs. Dunn and I. Mrs. Rowland has her department. They have one dormitory, and I have another.

3529. Have there not been instances of the girls getting out at night and going to town without being discovered? Yes; there was an instance of that not long ago.

3530. Can you account for that? It was seven girls got away together, and I cannot account for it at all, except that they must have had false keys.

3531. How could they get them? It is impossible to say.

3533. They were never locked up at all? No; in fact one of the girls told me that she stayed out.

3534. Are the girls not counted at all? At this time they were not counted in the dormitories but at muster, but since these girls made their escape they have been counted in.

3535. Is the roll called—are they counted by name? No; they are simply counted—there must be so many girls in each dormitory.

3536. Is there a dormitory-register or muster-roll? No; there is no muster-roll. The girls are in the dormitories. I have so many in mine, and I count them.

3537. Do you not think it would be advisable to have a muster-roll, so as to call each girl by name? There has never been such a thing there.

3538. Don't you think that it should be done? I think so.

3539. Would it not prevent accidents of this kind? It might. A girl may slip out of one dormitory into another.

3540. Do they do that now? It has not been done lately, but it has been done.

- Mrs. C. Brackenregg. 3542. Is it your duty to read prayers to the Protestant children? Yes, I have done so the whole time I have been there.
- 15 July, 1873. 3543. What prayers do they say? The common prayers.
3544. What prayers? "I believe in God the Father," and all those —
3545. What are the other prayers? I forget the other, though I have heard it so often. Really I have forgotten it; it is very stupid of me, but I have forgotten the name of it. They say the Lord's Prayer and one prayer that is read in church,—dear, dear! I know that prayer so well too,—how stupid of me to forget it!
3546. Is it the Confession—one of the prayers said in the Church of England? I have heard it hundreds of times—how stupid of me to forget it!
3547. It has jumped out of your head and you cannot get it back again? It is as familiar to me as possible. They say the Lord's Prayer and other things, and they sing.
3548. What do they sing? "Shall we meet beyond the river?" and so on.
3549. Do they say any prayers after they go into the dormitory? Yes.
3550. Do they kneel down by their bedsides and say their prayers? Yes; after they go into the dormitories.
3551. President.] Then, if we have been told by Mr. Lucas that they do not say their prayers by their bedsides privately, that is a mistake? Well, we are given to believe by the girls themselves that they do say their prayers. We do not hear them. There is a girl in the dormitory who is supposed to hear them say their prayers, but I cannot say that I hear them.
3552. Do you see them kneeling down by their beds and saying their prayers? I have seen them do it, but not every night. I have stood at the window and listened to them, when we were at Newcastle.
3553. Is there any one in the dormitory with them? No. I have stood at the window and heard them saying their prayers.
3554. Mr. Cowper.] Do some of them undress at 6 o'clock and others not until 9 o'clock? No, not until we put the lights out. The last prayer that they say is "Our Father," and then they sing and we dismiss.
3555. Are the rations that you get of good quality? Sometimes they are, and sometimes they are not. With regard to the prayers, I attended that prayer-room for two years and four months, and then Mr. Lucas found out that it was Mrs. Lucas' duty, and she came, and then he ordered me out of the prayer-room.
3556. What did he say? It was the morning when he was taking off the way I walked, and then we went into the dormitory, and I said I thought that as we were come into the prayer-room it was better to hold our noise; and Mrs. Lucas said—"If you don't like it, go out of the prayer-room"; and then Mr. Lucas came up before all and told me—"You go out of the prayer-room," says he, "you are not wanted here." Mrs. Lucas did not attend the prayer-room punctually, until she read in the rules that she had to do so.
3557. Mr. Goold.] Is that what you call the place—the prayer-room? It is the dormitory; but when we hold prayers there we call it the prayer-room.
3558. Mr. Cowper.] Mrs. Lucas says that you have not carried out her orders? It is not true. I have tried to carry out Mr. and Mrs. Lucas's orders in every way.
3559. Were you ever ordered to take the girls into school after tea and amuse them? Never. Mr. Lucas was absent, and he said "I wish you would go in my place," and I went; and that is the only time he ever asked me to go. Any time that he called upon us we were quite willing.
3560. At the time the night school was started the girls were rather troublesome, were they not? The night school?
3561. Yes? You know I was not there.
3562. But were they troublesome in the day-time, then? Yes, they were always troublesome.
3563. Can you describe the kind of work you had with them, to show how you were employed? We were employed all day.
3564. Was there any extra work with them then? Yes.
3565. Was it not a short time before that that they had to have a sergeant and two police on the place? Yes; and then we could not keep them quiet, and we never had a moment to call our own.
3566. What did you do? We had to run up and down the hills, and hunt the girls up, and keep them in order.
3567. You had to run up and down the rocks after the girls? Yes, we had to do the policemen's work—we had to go and hunt them up, and go and search for them, and perhaps find them planted away in a rock at the back of Mrs. King's, or in the cells, or any place where they could get.
3568. How many hours a day were you running up and down the rocks? At all times, except when we were in the work-room.
3569. Was it one hour or several hours? One hour! Oh dear! One hour!
3570. How many hours was it? With the exception of when we were in the work-room we were always after them. It was one continual run; our boot bill can tell you that.
3571. Was it not the practice of the girls to take away their clothes and hide them in the rocks. Yes, they would hide their dresses and things.
3572. Is there no check upon that? They are not so bad now, but at one time we could not keep the clothes together at all.
3573. Mr. Goold.] How long is it since the last occasion on which they carried away their clothes in this way? Last week there were some things planted away under a stone. Mrs. Rowland has more to do with the clothes department than I have.
3574. Do the girls behave honestly to one another? No, they steal from one another. We have a girl in the hospital, A—H—, and her mother brought her some things and they were stolen. This did not occur while in hospital. If the mothers bring the girls things, it is a great chance if they are not stolen.
3575. Are these things found again? No, because they are taken away.
3576. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do all the girls steal in this way? Yes, they all steal things, even the little girls. I have a little girl there who will steal and put things away in the bosom of her dress.
3577. What is done with them? Nothing.
3578. Is there any difference made between the girls that steal and the girls that do not? Not the slightest.
3579. Do they steal from the officers? Yes; they go to my boxes and steal things. They steal all my pocket-handkerchiefs, and they take away my dinner-things and smash them.

Mrs. C.
Brackenregg.

15 July, 1873.

3580. How long ago did they do this? The week before last.

3581. Were they punished for it? No, they were not.

3582. Mr. Gould.] Did you discover the girls who stole them? One of the girls told me who did it; but there was no punishment. They are not punished at all. I think that Mr. Lucas is afraid to punish them, for fear lest they should kick up a row. I have found the blankets in the dormitories torn, and I have pointed it out to Mrs. Lucas, and she says—"Show me the girl that has done it"; but that is impossible. I use my best endeavours to know who has done it. Of course the girls who scrub the dormitories are most likely to tear the blankets for floorcloths, but we cannot tell who does it. We are constantly repairing sheets torn by those girls.

3583. Is that done now? Yes, now. I have two sheets now left to repair.

3584. Mr. Metcalfe.] Are linen sheets given to those girls? It is very strong stuff. They are very good sheets. We have some linen that is very strong, of course. And then Mrs. Lucas—the girls cannot have any great respect for her—when she will get into a rage with Mr. Lucas and pitch the keys at him before the matrons and the girls, and she will take the cane and pitch it at him, and say "Go and mind the institution yourself." And then he will go and coax her to go back, and then she comes back, and he does anything she tells him. She did the same thing with M— C—, and insisted on her being put down the cell, and Mr. Lucas did not want to do it, but she insisted, and so it was done to pacify Mrs. Lucas. That is the way that the institution is worked.

3585. President.] Were there any of the girls about when this took place? They are always about, and if there is anything going on they always cluster round. The kitchen girls are always in the kitchen. When the row took place I had just gone home, when I was sent for to assist.

3586. How long is this ago? I do not know how long M— C— has been away. It was just a little before she left the institution, but I would not like to say the time unless I was sure about it. It is not so very long ago. And there was one day in the sewing-room Mrs. Lucas came in, and we were busy with our duties there, and a girl by some chance or other had used the wrong cotton. I came in directly after Mrs. Lucas spoke to Mrs. Dunn about this, and Mrs. Dunn merely remarked "We must be more careful"; and Mrs. Lucas said, "What are you saying?—This is a fine set out"; and then it went on. Mr. Lucas came next, and they were both talking together, and they both went on at us for I do not know how long, until we did not know what we were doing. At any rate, after they had given us as much as they thought proper, she said—"We will go to Mrs. Rowland, and give it to her now." Mrs. Rowland was in the store, and they went to her then, and I don't know how long that lasted, but they left her in the same state.

3587. Mr. Gould.] Was this before the girls? All before the girls. Even this morning the girls said to me—"You are all going to get the sack; we know all about it." They have been most impudent. There was a lady came in, and the girls said—"Oh, the old matrons are going to get the sack; here is the new matron." How do the girls get this information?

3588. President.] When you say that they left Mrs. Rowland "in the same state"—what do you mean? They put us in a fluster, and they went next at Mrs. Rowland, and of course she was put out too; and the rest of that afternoon I could not get on with my work, and Mr. Lucas told me that I was merely an attendant there. I do not care how humble I am, but I do not like to be made a show of before the girls, because they will not respect you.

3589. Mr. Cowper.] When you were scolded once, was any reference made to a position that you occupied before? Yes. I was told that I had better go back and keep a public-house as I did before.

3590. Were you told that in the presence of the girls? Yes, of course. Mr. Brackenregg kept the Tamworth Hotel in Tamworth at one time, and I have had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Windeyer there. These are the constant slurs that are put upon us. She says that we do not speak properly to her, but I only say "Very well, Mrs. Lucas," but she goes on so that we cannot bear her at all.

3591. President.] Do you mean that she is habitually violent—because there are many people who lose their temper when they are provoked? She is so easily provoked. I can give you one instance—The girls used to call her "Betty Four-eyes"—that is what they call her—and one of the girls went and told her that I heard another call her that. She did not ask me, but she let out a volley of abuse—"She would let me know whether I would stand by and hear her abused," and I never heard it at all. I wanted to explain, and she would not hear me, and she said she had her friends, and she would not hear what I had to say.

3592. I suppose these girls have a way of nicknaming people? Yes. They call Mrs. Dunn—Well I cannot tell you what they call her. They call me the "scorpion," and Mrs. Rowland the "kangaroo."

3593. Mrs. Lucas said that you neglected your duty in not attending to the sewing? That was the time I spoke of.

3594. Explain how it occurred? Mrs. Dunn does not go into the sewing-room until late, and we have the work to fix for the children in the evening—there are so many little children there—about thirty. In the morning I had to fix the work for the children, and give out their work and see that they all attend, and during that time this girl took up this black cotton and commenced making a body; but she did not finish it. That was what the turmoil was about. That was an oversight of mine, but I had not the slightest intention of the girl doing what she did. It was an oversight of mine. That was one instance. The work in the workroom is much better done than it used to be—and Mr. King says so—and I said so to Mrs. Lucas once, and she said "Oh, you need not take credit for that—I have as much to do with it as you have."

3595. Mr. Cowper.] Does each officer perform the duties assigned to her by the regulations? Of course there is no cook, and the duties are mixed, and one interferes with the other.

3596. You do not adhere to the regulations? No, we cannot do that, because the duties interfere with each other.

3597. I suppose that each officer understands her duty for the day—you have regular duties assigned to you? Yes, unless anything unforeseen occurs. We cannot always tell. We cannot say that our duties are laid down for the day, for if any new duties are put down we must do them.

3598. Do you consider that you are fully employed from 6 in the morning until 6 at night? Fully. I never have a moment to spare.

3599. Then is it true that a great portion of your time is taken up in looking after your own children? No. I wish you could see my children. All I do for them is done after the work of the institution is done, and sometimes I have to sit up until 12 o'clock at night. I hardly speak to them in the day-time. I run down and get my dinner, and if the children say anything to me I scarcely answer them. There is none

- Mrs. C. Brackenregg.
15 July, 1873.
- none of my time devoted to my children until the duty of the institution is done. Of course I know that the Government do not pay me to look after my children, and I do not do so until my work is done.
3600. Is the whole of your time taken up by your public duties? Yes. With the exception of meal-times, I am at the institution all day. I go home to breakfast and dinner. I go to breakfast from half-past 7 to half-past 8, and I cannot tell you the time I go to dinner, for there is no bell, and mustering these children from all parts of our part of the island is something frightful. They drop in at dinner one or two at a time.
3601. Do they still run up the rocks? Not so much as before.
3602. Have not the girls to attend regularly at meals? They do not. I think to-day when I said grace I had the little ones in, and I think there were about twenty others, and when I have said grace I cannot leave the dining-hall to look for the children. If I say to them—"What makes you so late?" they say—"Nothing." I proposed to Mr. Lucas that if the girls were late it would be a punishment to keep back their dinner. He said—"All right—do it"; but if I did it he would be the first to give them back their dinners.
3603. President.] Did he do so? He would do so, and he has done so. He does not like them to go without their dinners.
3604. Mr. Gould.] Then I understand you that after ordering you to keep their dinners from them, he has gone and given it to them? He has said—"Oh give the poor things their dinner"; and yet he would say—"Well, if they do not come to dinner, keep it back."
3605. President.] Did you intend to keep them without dinner altogether? Of course I intended to obey his orders.
3606. Mr. Cowper.] Did you not propose to keep them without dinner? I did propose to do it. I think if that was done, they would be more regular in their attendance.
3607. I think there was a time when they had no knives or forks? Yes; they used to pull the meat to pieces with their fingers, until Mr. Lucas gleaned some ideas from one person and another, and then there were some knives and forks got.
3608. Do you remember when I ordered the crockery mugs, the delf mugs, they were kept in the store for weeks, because Mr. Lucas was afraid that they would be broken—that Mrs. Lucas thought that it was nonsense for them to have crockery mugs, as they were sure to be broken? Yes.
3609. President.] Do you think that the children can be reclaimed from rough and uncivilized ways, unless they are given the ordinary utensils and appliances of civilized life? I think it is necessary to give them to them, because they give them refinement; but when they sit down like so many heathens, it makes the mind very coarse.
3610. Mr. Cowper.] Are they allowed to carry their bread away from the table, and eat it out of their fingers? Yes, at dinner-time and at tea-time I am present, and they carry it away then.
3611. President.] Is there any one else present but you? Yes, Mrs. Lucas sometimes.
3612. How is it that you allow them to do this? I have no orders to stop their doing it.
3613. But surely you do not require an order to see that they carry out the habits of ordinary decency? I do not require that. I know that they ought to eat their food at the table, but they —
3614. Mr. Metcalfe.] Is the whole of the bread served out to the children in the morning? No. There are certain times laid down for us to be at our duties. We have to be in the sewing-room by a certain hour.
3615. Mr. Cowper.] Mr. Windeyer has asked you whether you would not stop children taking their bread away in their hands? Yes, I would stop them.
3616. Why do you not stop them? Because I have never had any orders to that effect.
3617. Is Mrs. Lucas present when they do so? Yes; she is there and she sees it done, and she never says anything about it.
3618. President.] Have you seen it done in her presence? Yes, I have seen it done before her.
3619. You said that you were in charge of these children at dinner; and if Mr. and Mrs. Lucas are not there, it is hardly fair to put this breach of discipline down to their neglect? They do not say to me—"These children are in your charge." Mrs. Lucas comes in and out, and she is there pretty often when the children are dismissed, but she is not always there.
3620. You have seen this thing occur in the presence of Mrs. Lucas more than once? More than once! More than a dozen times.
3621. And you have not thought proper to interfere in the matter yourself? If I had done so they would think it was something that I had no right to interfere with.
3622. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not find it impossible to put a stop to proceedings, however irregular, when the superintendent allows these proceedings? Of course, he is the head of the establishment, and the girls will say to me—"Oh, Mr. Lucas will not say anything"; so then of course I can do nothing. And if I say anything to a girl, she will most likely say, "I will not do anything for you—I am not going to obey you, but only Mr. and Mrs. Lucas." That is what they constantly tell us, because of the disrespect that is shown to us and the way in which we are abused at muster. These girls of course cannot respect us as they should do. It is putting us on a level with the girls, by the disrespect that is shown to us. Mrs. Lucas thinks nothing of telling me before the girls that I do not speak the truth. She told me so the other day.
3623. Were the girls mustered up when she said so? Yes; and in any case the girls' words are not taken except when it suits Mr. and Mrs. Lucas.
3624. Were the other matrons there? Yes; Mrs. Rowland was there.
3625. Did she hear this? I cannot positively say whether she did or not, but she was there, and I believe that she did hear it, for she was getting the rounds of the house too, and I got it after.
3626. On what occasion did this happen? It was about this girl that I sent back to the institution. Mrs. Lucas said that she used to be bringing tales to me.
3627. I understood that it was on the occasion of her telling you to go out of the prayer-room? Yes.
3628. Did this all happen then at the same time? Yes.
3629. How long ago? It may be about three weeks ago.
3630. At what time of the day? In the morning.
3631. In what part of the institution did it occur? Over by the dormitories 1 and 2, in the yard—in the square—where we muster up the girls. The girl that I spoke of had been in my quarters for a long time.

3632. Mr. Ellis.] What do you mean by Mrs. Lucas getting into a towering rage? If I speak of anything at all she loses her temper, and she has no command over it, and she says the most violent things when in a rage. You know what a rage a person must be in when a person pitches her keys over to the superintendent, and throws the cane over to him. That is what I mean. She loses all command over herself.
3633. Does she often get into a towering rage? Yes, very often.
3634. Has she often been in a towering rage with you? Yes.
3635. Did you bear it silently? No; because I tried to explain.
3636. Do you get into a towering rage with her? No, I have not a very bad temper.
3637. I do not say that you have? I do not get into such violent tempers as she does—I can always explain and reason.
3638. Have you tried to reason with her? Yes, repeatedly I have tried to reason with her.
3639. Two ladies in a rage would not be likely to reason much: you sometimes try to explain to her? Yes.
3640. The girls are always troublesome? No, not always. Some days they are a little better than others; but take them altogether they are very troublesome.
3641. In what way? It is troublesome to get them to do their work, and in the sewing-room we have very great trouble in getting them to do their work, and it is troublesome to get them to attend muster, and troublesome to get them to attend meals, and troublesome to get them to work.
3642. What do you do with them? Try to get them.
3643. How do you try? They never say point blank that they will not do a thing, but they do not do it, and sometimes I require to give them a few touches of the cane.
3644. What sort of cane do you use? A moderate-sized cane.
3645. What size is it—we know the size of the cane Mr. Lucas uses—what size is yours? I do not know whether mine is off the same piece. Mr. Lucas had a larger cane than we had.
3646. What size would you describe it to be—was it as large as your little finger? It might be that.
3647. Where would you apply the cane to the girls? To their backs—sometimes to their hands.
3648. Would you give it them heavily? Not too heavily. I would give them a few sharp cuts.
3649. Severely enough to raise marks? Yes, for a moment or two there would be a mark, but it would not be of long duration.
3650. Mr. Couper.] Was it not the case that before you were allowed to use the cane the children spoke to you in the most offensive manner, and called you all kinds of names? Yes, the only thing that intimidates them at all is the cane.
3651. Mr. Ellis.] To what extent are you allowed to use the cane? I do not know.
3652. How many strokes do you generally give them? I do not suppose I have given them more than four or five cuts.
3653. You have used it in the evening? Yes, in the evening, when we have one; sometimes we have not one, and when we have not one I find them very troublesome.
3654. You think that the cane is more effectual than any moral influence? They are frightened of the cane.
3655. They are not very sensible then of other influences? They do not take so much notice of anything as they do of the cane.
3656. Does Mrs. Lucas ever cane them? Yes.
3657. Does she use the same moderation that you do? She canes them pretty freely sometimes.
3658. What do you mean by pretty freely? She gives them more than I do.
3659. How many cuts do you think that she gives them when she goes about it? I have seen her cane them very well—give them a good sound caning.
3660. But how many strokes would she give them—a good sound caning from an angry woman may sometimes mean a pretty smart punishment? I have seen her cane them.
3661. Did her caning leave any marks on them? I cannot say that I ever saw any.
3662. Do you think that she ever gave one of them a dozen strokes? I do not like to say more than I am sure of. I cannot say.
3663. She has given them a good sound caning? Yes, a good caning.
3664. Does she use a cane of the same moderate dimensions as you do, or does she use Mr. Lucas's cane? She uses Mr. Lucas's cane.
3665. Do you think that this caning has a good effect? Yes; the girls are not so troublesome.
3666. And no other influence will keep them in order? I am sure that I do not know. All children dread the cane.
3667. Is there any effort made to bring them under religious influences? Not that I have seen.
3668. Is it always an appeal to the cane? They do not always get caned.
3669. But I understand you to say that when they will not do a thing you must cane them? I have not always got a cane.
3670. What do you do then? Box their ears.
3671. With your open hand? Yes. Sometimes I have a strap to beat them with.
3672. What sort of a strap? A small strap. Sometimes the girls burn the canes.
3673. What kind of a strap have you? Oh, it is a very small strap.
3674. Are the big girls caned, or only the smaller girls? The big girls are often beaten by Mr. Lucas with the cane; but he has not done so lately. He has left marks on them.
3675. Left marks on them? Yes.
3676. He told us that he only gave them a few gentle taps? Some time ago a girl showed her arm to Mr. King where Mr. Lucas beat her.
3677. Did he say anything when the girl showed him her arm? He took it down, but I cannot say whether he reported it. The girl stood with her arm exposed, and showed it to Mr. King, and I heard Mr. Lucas say at muster that he would cane them whenever he liked. I have seen marks of the cane on A—D's back where he caned her.
3678. President.] What age is she? She is one of the biggest girls in the school.
3679. What is her age? About sixteen.
3680. Mr. Ellis.] What religious instruction do the girls get? Do you mean on Sundays?
3681. Every day? They have prayers in the morning.

Mrs. C.
Brackenregg.
15 July, 1873

- Mrs. C. 3682. When? After muster.
- Brackenregg. 3683. Not in the dormitories—not when they get out of bed? No; as I explained, we hold prayers in the dormitory, and after the girls are mustered they go to prayers.
- 15 July, 1873. 3684. At what time do they rise? At daylight.
3685. When do they say their prayers? In the dormitories.
3686. At what hour? After muster.
3687. How soon after they rise is that? At half-past 8 we muster them, and sometimes it lasts longer than at other times; and then we go into the dormitories and say prayers.
3688. How do they say them? They kneel down.
3689. Does any one kneel down with them? The matrons stand up.
3690. Do they say prayers with them? They say them to themselves.
3691. How do they learn them? They say prayers with the others when they come in.
3692. Does any one teach them the prayers they are to say? No.
3693. Nobody? No.
3694. Do they pray extempore—on their own account? I do not think so—no, of course not.
3695. But they must do something of the kind if they are not taught any prayers? If a girl comes in and kneels down she learns her prayers from the others.
3696. Or she does not? I do not know anything about that.
3697. Does any one teach that girl to say her prayers? No.
3698. She learns them as best she can? Yes; and they have prayers in the dormitories at night, which are conducted in the same way.
3699. You said, I think, that you thought they said prayers after they retired into the dormitories at night? I have not been inside to hear them say their prayers, but I have stood outside the dormitory and heard them.
3700. How many girls are there in the dormitory? In the dormitory that Mrs. Dunn has charge of there are thirty-three.
3701. And were they nearly all praying on their own account? They did not on their own account—there was a girl in the dormitory.
3702. But Mr. Lucas said that they said prayers in divisions before retiring: do I understand you that they say prayers in the dormitories? The Catholics pray by themselves.
3703. In the dormitories where they sleep have you heard them pray? Yes, but not lately.
3704. Were all the girls praying at the same time, after the public prayers had been said? I cannot say.
3705. Were there any of the girls praying while the others were laughing and talking? Latterly I have not heard them say their prayers, but I have heard them.
3706. What strikes me as strange is that any girl there should be so pious as to pray aloud while the others were laughing and talking? There was no laughing or talking at the time this occurred in the smaller children's dormitory. We had a girl called Catherine Walker who was particular in hearing them say their prayers, and I have not heard them say them since she left.
3707. President.] Was she an inmate? Yes, one of the girls.
3708. Mr. Ellis.] This was the second time that the girls had prayers in the evening? Yes, I have heard them when Catherine Walker was there, but not lately.
3709. Had Catherine Walker so much influence there that she could induce them to say their prayers? Yes, I have seen them do it.
3710. Although none of the officers could get them to do anything except by caning—What has become of that girl? She has gone out. We can make them do some things without caning, but if they will not do the work we have to cane them.
3711. Do any of them ever show fight? Yes. There was one did. J—W—.
3712. What did she do? She caught me by the neck-tie and nearly choked me.
3713. What was done with her? There was nothing done with her then.
3714. What was done afterwards? Mr. Lucas beat her at night.
3715. He beat her for the way in which she turned round on you? I do not think that he beat her for that, but for another offence.
3716. What offence was it? For tearing some of my linen in the laundry.
3717. Was that what he punished her for? I do not think that it was for me that he punished her. I do not think that he sets a sufficient value upon me.
3718. Does he care about your linen more? She tore it with her teeth, and he beat her in the dining-room, and she gave a rush out, and because I did not stop her as she ran past the corner of the table, he abused me. She rushed past the corner of the table where I was standing quite unawares.
3719. Have the girls ever turned upon any other officers of the institution at any time? I cannot say. They will be better able to answer that question for themselves. That was the only girl who turned upon me. I was in the dormitory with her, and I gave her a slap and she turned on me. She was a strong girl, and I hit her first.
3720. What for? Because she tore my linen. She caught me by a woollen neck-tie I had on, and she nearly choked me.
3721. What did you do? I went and told Mr. Lucas.
3722. Did the girl let you go? Yes, she did when she thought proper. She tore my dress, and then she went down to the laundry and boasted of the way in which she had treated me. I tried to hit her; but she had me too tight. She is a very powerful girl.
3723. Since Catherine Walker left the place I understand you to say that the children do not say their prayers in the dormitories after they retire for the night? I cannot say. I have not heard them.
3724. Do you believe that they now never say their prayers? I cannot say, because I do not know whether they do or not. I am not there.
3725. President.] In point of fact, no one is there? No one is there.
3726. Mr. Ellis.] Whose duty is it to put out the lights before the children retire? It is Mrs. Rowland's duty, and I always accompany her when I am at home.
3727. At what time is that done? At half-past 9 in the summer and 9 in the winter. We have no clock, but we go by the gun.
3728. The girls are left alone to do as best they can in these cold dormitories, without a single thing to amuse or occupy them? Yes.

3729. As a matter of fact, what do they do in those dormitories between 6 and 9? There is a light in the passage and some can crochet. They sit down by the gate close to the light. Mrs. C. Brackenregg.
3730. President.] Then there is no light in the dormitory at all? No; it is in the passage.
3731. Then the putting of the lights out is not putting them out in the dormitories, but in the passage? 15 July, 1873. The dormitories are not all situated the same. There is a light in some of the dormitories where there is no passage, but in others there is a passage between them, and there is a light in the passage.
3732. Mr. Ellis.] How do they amuse themselves? They play about and crochet.
3733. What do they play? I cannot say, but I think that they have a romp and tear about the dormitories.
3734. Do they tear the beds and the bed-clothes? Yes, they do, because nearly every morning we find things torn.
3735. Is it not one continual shout there from night until morning? Yes, it is one continual shout and howl, and everything else. And sometimes they sing songs—sometimes one song and sometimes another.
3736. President.] With the light in the passage as you describe, there can only be a slight glimmer at the far end of the dormitory? Of course, at the far end they cannot see to do anything; they must come to the gate to see.
3737. And so they crowd round the gate like so many caged animals? Yes; they cannot see at the other end.
3738. There is no light in the dormitory? No, only in the passage.
3739. Is not the light removed from the dormitory and a night-light put up? No, there is no night-light. There are no lights put into the dormitories except in No. 3, where they have a candle.
3740. They have a light in the dormitory itself? Yes, because it is differently situated to the others. There is no passage there, so that we must put the light in the dormitory.
3741. How many girls sleep there? That is Mrs. Rowland's department. Nos. 3, 4, and 5 are hers, and I cannot tell you how the light is situated; but in the others they flock all round the gates—the poor little things.
3742. Mr. Cowper.] Do you think that the prostitute girls are classified in any way, or separated from the others? All mixed all together.
3743. At night? No, in the day-time.
3744. Are the worst girls picked out and placed in a dormitory by themselves? I do not think so.
3745. Mr. Ellis.] You said that the only things they do after they retire to the dormitories are to sing and scream? They romp and play games and shout.
3746. What kind of games do they play? They romp and tear about; I can only say by the noise that they make. They play games such as "The frog in the middle," and other games. I have heard Mr. Lucas tell them to hold their noise—that they would be heard at Balmain.
3747. Could they do nothing else? They could not. They must amuse themselves in the best way that they can, for one half of the dormitory is in darkness.
3748. As far as the institution is concerned, it gives them no possible means of amusement and recreation? They have no amusement.
3749. Have you ever heard them sing bad songs? Oh yes—most frightful songs.
3750. Most frightful songs? Oh, frightful.
3751. Are they sung for the edification of the officers? I do not think that they edify us very much.
3752. You go to listen to them sometimes? We never go to listen—we can hear quite enough of them without that.
3753. On the whole, then, this is a highly improving place for young girls, as far as morals are concerned? Those that come in good get corrupted. The little children get to join in those songs. If they come into the institution good they soon become as bad as the others. The girls say that they come in innocent, and that they know far more when they have been a little time in the institution; they soon learn to steal and lie, and swear, and do everything else.
3754. President.] How long is it since you heard the girls singing these bad songs? I think I mentioned that they did so, when we all went down to assist Mr. and Mrs. Lucas, and got abused for it—when they were all making a noise in the yard.
3755. That was about five weeks ago? Yes, I think it was about five or six weeks ago, but I have such a bad memory for dates.
3756. Mr. Ellis.] You say that you go round at night with the house matron to extinguish the lights? Yes, at 9 o'clock.
3757. Do you see that the girls are all in bed, or do you leave them to go to bed? No, they are not in bed then.
3758. What do they do? They go to bed in the dark.
3759. Then it is probable that they go to bed in their clothes? I never saw them in bed in their clothes.
3760. Do they ever get into bed with their boots on? The night that they escaped they did.
3761. Do you think that when they had the happiness of staying there they did? I cannot say.
3762. Do you not think that it is probable that they sometimes tumble into bed boots and all? They might, but I never saw them on them.
3763. President.] You do not go into the dormitories at night? We do occasionally go into the dormitories. We go in and see them all sleeping together with the beds all drawn up in the middle. We do not do that every night.
3764. Mr. Ellis.] You do not do that as a general rule, but you look at them now and then like a lot of wild beasts in a menagerie? We put out the light and go away.
3765. President.] They are not taught any habits of neatness—not taught to fold up their clothes? No; there are no pegs to hang their clothes up, and a good many of them sleep on their clothes.
3766. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you see that their night-dresses are folded up? There are no night-dresses. They sleep in their chemises, except when they are in the hospital.
3767. Suppose that a child were taken ill in the night, what could you do—could you hear? Yes. There was one fell down once from a window—she fell down and shouted, and we heard her and went up.
3768. Mr. Ellis.] How do they get up to those windows? They stand up on the bedsteads, and then one girl will stand upon the shoulders of another.
3769. They practice acrobatic feats then? Yes, they are very clever at that.
3770. Why do they call you a scorpion? I cannot say. I do not think that they have any reason for calling me that, except that I go about silently, and come upon them when they do not expect me.

- Mrs. C. Brackenregg.
15 July, 1873.
3771. Mr. Metcalfe.] How many of the prostitute class have you out of the whole number? I do not know. I think there are a great many. I think that there are some little girls bad as well as the others.
3772. How many girls have you there? I think there are eighty-one. There are thirty-four little ones, and it is difficult to tell you how many are prostitutes.
3773. Mr. Ellis.] How many suits of clothes has each child? That is in Mrs. Rowland's department—she is the house-matron. The things are sent to us to be made. They are only allowed so many suits of clothes by the Government, and Mrs. Rowland knows all about it.
3774. It seems to me that these girls are treated pretty much like a lot of prisoners? Yes, they are put in there and locked up.
3775. There is nothing in the institution calculated to improve them morally or socially except the caning? —
3776. President.] Is it your deliberate opinion that the young children who come in, apparently innocent, get corrupted after they go there? Yes, I know it for a fact.
3777. Can it be otherwise, herding together as they do, and with these girls singing improper songs? It cannot be otherwise; they are with these girls all day, and they can hear all that goes on in the dormitories at night, and they take up the spirit of the big girls.
3778. Were they singing in No. 3 ward on the occasion that you mentioned? Yes, on the night that we all went down.
3779. And the little girls took the songs up? They did not then, but they will do it sometimes. They know the songs that the big girls know. This morning in the sewing-room one of the girls said to me—"We were sent to this institution to be improved, and we know now far more wickedness than we did when we came in."
3780. Do you think that under better auspices and a different kind of management you could get hold of these little children and influence them for good? Yes, if they were not allowed to mix with the bigger girls. If I had them apart I think that they might be reclaimed. I think that you might work upon them in that way; but now if they are corrected they run to the big girls and receive encouragement, and that prompts them to do what is wrong. If they could be kept entirely away from the big girls that might do.
3781. Were you never told that it was part of your duty to see these children go to bed—to see that they went to bed in an orderly way, and that they said their prayers? No.
3782. Mr. Ellis.] Have you ever seen any of the girls going about half naked in the morning? Yes.
3783. President.] Out of their dormitories? Yes. They run about in their chemises and petticoats in the morning.
3784. Where? About the institution. I have seen them cleaning up about the place without their dresses. Then they wear their clothes so dreadfully short.
3785. Are not the clothes made in the institution? Yes, they are.
3786. Mr. Metcalfe.] Why are they made so short? They are not made so. Some of the larger girls have taken their dresses in the dormitory, and torn pieces off the top to make them short.
3787. Mr. Ellis.] What for? Because they like to have their dresses short—very short. It is the larger girls who like it—the middle-sized girls are not so bad.
3788. But does the institution consult their tastes? We often have to lengthen their dresses.
3789. But I understand that the dresses are generally short? Yes, they are.
3790. President.] This desire on the part of the girls to shorten their dresses, I understand, arises from an immodesty which makes them wish to expose themselves? Yes, they like to have their dresses short.
3791. Mr. Cowper.] Who cuts out these dresses? Mrs. Rowland.
3792. Does she cut them out long? Yes, they are cut out of the proper length. Mrs. Rowland is in that department. I do not know very much about it.
3793. Mr. Metcalfe.] They are cut of the ordinary length? Yes. This last time they took dresses into their dormitories and tore pieces off them, to make them short.
3794. President.] Were they punished for that? No, not punished. Mrs. Rowland found pieces in the dormitories in the morning, and we had to plan how to make the dresses longer.
3795. Is there anything you wish to add, beyond what you have already said? No, I do not think of any thing more just now.

Mrs. Mary Anne Rowland, house-matron, Industrial School for Girls, Biloela, called in and examined:—

- Mrs. M. A. Rowland.
15 July, 1873.
3796. President.] I believe that you are house-matron of the Industrial School at Biloela? Yes.
3797. How long have you been there? Two years and four months.
3798. Were you at Newcastle? Yes, I was; I went there with Mr. Lucas.
3799. What salary do you receive? £75 a year.
3800. And you have rations? Yes, I have.
3801. Will you tell us what your duties are on the establishment? In the morning I have to see that the dormitories are all cleaned. I have to attend to three dormitories myself. All the grown girls I attend to the management of myself. And I have to see that the other dormitories are properly cleaned up under the supervision of the sub-matrons; and I attend to the grown girls' bath.
3802. Yourself personally? Yes; I see to the dormitories being done properly, and attend to the girls' bath, and see to the hospital, and see that the dining-room is properly cleaned, and so on.
3803. What then? I go home to breakfast, and after that I have to come down to muster the children.
3804. After breakfast? Yes; and then I have to stay out to see the waste packed up, and the brooms and buckets put away, and all the work that is unfinished from the morning is finished. I have to stay to do that and see the dining-room cleaned, and the hospital and the baths are left till the children have gone into school. Then I have to see what work has to be given out to the sewing-room, and keep an account of that and cut it all for the day.
3805. For the clothes which are made on the place? Yes, for the day,—the work to give to Mrs. Brackenregg. I cut it out and give it to the work-room; then at half-past 12 I go home to dinner, and after that I go down to muster the children, and then go into the work-room at half-past 1.
3806. Do you go home to your dinner? Yes; and go back again at half-past 1. I go to dinner at half-past 12.

Mrs. M. A.
Rowland.

15 July, 1873.

3807. You have nothing to do with the girls at meals? No, not until tea-time.
3808. Are the children supposed to have finished their dinner at half-past 1 o'clock. Yes, sometimes they are supposed to. So then I go into the sewing-room and take Mrs. Brackenregg's and Mrs. Dunn's place until they come back from their dinner at half-past 2 o'clock.
3809. You are there when they are away? Yes, I do their duty for that time. Mrs. Dunn is doing cook's duty now, and I have to take her place in the morning.
3810. And at half-past 1? I give out the work and attend to the sewing-room, and after that I have to see what is wanted for the work-room again up until 4 o'clock, and draw bread and whatever is wanted from the store.
3811. In the way of provisions? No; in the way of clothing and whatever is wanted from the store, and keep an account of it.
3812. Do you keep books? Yes; I keep an account of what I give to the girls—their clothing; and I see to the branding of the clothes, and see the clothes counted to the laundry and from it, and get all the children's clothes changed twice a week and placed on their beds.
3813. Bed-clothes? No; their linen has to be put round the dormitories on each child's bed. I have to see that done myself.
3814. You mean when the clean clothes are given out? Yes; twice a week.
3815. Can you tell us what clothes each child has? During the week?
3816. How many articles of clothing each child has? Some have more than others during the year; some are extravagant and destroy their clothes.
3817. Is there not an allowance of clothes to each child? Yes. They are supposed to have four dresses each.
3818. What underclothing? Four of each in the year—four chemises, four petticoats, four of everything.
3819. Do they wear flannel at all? No; they wear blue serge.
3820. Mr. Couper.] As petticoats? Yes, and white ones as well.
3821. President.] Do you mean that all the petticoats are made of serge? There is one white calico petticoat.
3822. What do they do when that white petticoat is at the wash? They wear the white ones on Sundays, and they wear the blue serge ones on week-days.
3823. They have no night-dresses? No, they have no night-dresses.
3824. Was this a matter of regulation or an instruction? I have never received any instructions about them—I was never told that there was any particular quantity to be given to them. I was told when they wanted anything to give it them.
3825. Who told you that? Mr. and Mrs. Lucas.
3826. Do you think it is nice that these girls should sleep in their chemises? I do not think that it is at all nice.
3827. Do you think that it is at all likely that they can grow up with nice ways unless these things are observed? They should most decidedly have them, I think.
3828. Has this subject ever been spoken of amongst you—have you ever spoken of it to Mr. Lucas? No, I have never spoken about it.
3829. Do they make their own beds? Yes, they do. The little girls cannot always make their own beds. Of course there are dormitory girls, and if the girls do not make them properly, they go over them, and I have to see it done—to see them go over it and see that it is done well.
3830. We are told that the children are locked up in their dormitories from 6 o'clock until 9 without any tables or any books, and that the place is so dark that if they had books they could not see to read them; and that they crowd round those iron-barred gates near to the light without any means of amusement; and that the light is outside? That is true. There is no light in any of the dormitories but No. 3.
3831. That is where the big girls are? They have a candle there.
3832. What do they do? Sometimes they have crochet work, and sometimes they sing.
3833. Do you think that it is desirable that these girls should be left in those half-lighted, gloomy dormitories, without any amusement whatever, during so many hours? I think that they should have some amusement.
3834. But, as a matter of fact, what do they do when they are left in absolute darkness, and when they are supposed to go to bed? When I go down they are always sitting by the door, talking.
3835. Clustered about this grated door? Yes. One may have crochet, and the others may be sitting round looking on. They all sit round the door.
3836. Like so many little wild beasts looking out? Yes.
3837. Do you not think that such a state of things as this is likely to encourage among the girls noise and romping of a violent character? I think it is. I think that it is a great evil. The girls are so long closed up there before going to bed, and that is the cause of a great deal of badness among them, such as planning riots, and anything for the sake of a change.
3838. Have you heard them sing improper songs? Yes, very improper songs, in their dormitories. They are often singing improper songs.
3839. Is there any singing of a good character taught in the school? In the Sunday-school it is always taught, I know.
3840. Are the girls taught to sing, as a part of the usual routine of the school? I think not. I have never heard of their being taught singing in the day-school.
3841. They show a fondness for singing? Yes, they are very fond of it—they are always singing.
3842. It is in fact their only amusement in the darkness of those dormitories? They are very fond of it—they are constantly singing about the institution.
3843. And they sing improper songs? Sometimes they sing very improper songs—disgusting songs.
3844. Do the older ones and the younger ones too all sing these songs? The younger ones sometimes join in.
3845. Can they hear them very plainly? Oh yes—any one can hear them.
3846. These girls in No. 3 dormitory have been girls of the town? Yes, they all have, I believe—all in that dormitory.
3847. From what you have observed, do you think that these older girls corrupt the younger ones? Oh yes; it is a great pity to have them together—they teach them everything that is bad; and I think that it

Mrs. M. A.
Rowland.

15 July, 1873.

it is a great mistake that the older ones are allowed to sleep together—I think that there is a great deal of badness there.

3848. You think that they should be kept apart at night? Yes, most decidedly. They should not sleep together.

3849. Do you mean that they should have separate rooms? Yes, they should have separate rooms, or they should not be allowed to sleep together.

3850. Have they not their own beds? Yes, but they do sleep together.

3851. They are locked up from 6 o'clock in the evening? Yes, until 6 o'clock the next morning.

3852. They can do anything that they like inside the dormitories between those hours? Yes.

3853. Do you know whether the girls are in any way taught to say their prayers on going to bed? Yes, they always say their prayers before they are locked up in the dormitories.

3854. Yes, but that is a kind of public or family prayer that they say together? Yes.

3855. What I want to know is this: suppose a little ignorant child comes into this place who has never been taught to say any prayers at all, is there any rule of the institution to provide for that child's being taught to say its prayers by somebody? Not at all; it is never taught by anybody; it just goes in with the other children.

3856. Then a child goes in there to be reclaimed, and there are no means whatever taken to teach her to say her prayers—the mere appearance of religion is kept up, and that is all? There are no means taken to teach them their prayers.

3857. In this No. 3 dormitory, which has been more especially under your observation, do you know whether any of these girls ever do say their prayers, after they have joined in those which are imposed by the routine of the place? No, I do not believe that they do—they are too bad. I have seen some of the little girls saying their prayers.

3858. In that dormitory? No; in the others I have seen the smaller children on their knees.

3859. They do that because they are inclined to do it, but have they ever been taught to do it by any one in the institution? No. It is very likely that they do it from inclination.

3860. When these lights are taken away, does somebody see that the children go to bed, or are they supposed to go to bed, or is everybody in ignorance of what they do: describe what is done? When I go down at 9 o'clock we are supposed to put out all the lights.

3861. Do you give them warning that you are going to do so? We just put out the light and go away; because as long as we stay there they will not go to bed, but when you put out the light they do.

3862. There is no one to see that they do go to bed? Not at all.

3863. Does no one teach them to fold up their clothes and so on? No; their clothes are lying all over the dormitory.

3864. Do you think that children are to be reclaimed under this system? No; I should think there should be some one with them.

3865. Do Mr. and Mrs. Lucas know of these things? Yes, they are nearly always there when we are there. They have seen all these things. If I tell the girls to go to bed they will very likely abuse me.

3866. You simply take away the light in order to enforce the girls' going to bed? Yes. They stay up sometimes afterwards.

3867. If they chose to romp about they can? They do sometimes. It is just as it suits their fancy.

3868. Do they tear their clothes? Yes; there is not a perfect blanket in the place. If they want a piece of blanket they tear it off. I have frequently spoken about that, but nothing has been done.

3869. To whom have you reported it? To Mr. and Mrs. Lucas—I have reported it to both of them; and Mrs. Lucas says it is no use my bringing my torn clothes there, to make her a low bully; to go and find out who did it—that I must find out who did it.

3870. You have found the clothes torn? Yes, I find the blankets torn in the morning or the pieces on the floor torn, and when I point them out to Mrs. Lucas I can get no satisfaction at all; and the girls will turn round and say, "You got a deal of satisfaction for going with tales of us." Of course they are not punished, and then the girls jeer at me. The big girls do this, but of course the little ones do not.

3871. Speaking of tearing clothes, we have been told that the big girls tear their dresses to make them short? They do—they like to have them up to their knees, those big girls. I cut some dresses the other day out of the new materials, and I found strips in the dormitory and showed them to Mrs. Lucas, and she just tossed her head and walked away, and there was no more about it. I showed her the new material. The dresses have to be altered frequently.

3872. What is that for—what do they tear their dresses for? Simply to show their feet. They are very proud of that kind of thing.

3873. They do it then from immodesty? Yes. Some of the dresses are disgustingly short, and they will have them so. They take them into the dormitories and alter them.

3874. Have they ever been punished for this? No, never. I have great trouble with the clothes of the place. It is one of the greatest troubles I have. The girls lose their clothes and hide them. Mrs. Lucas went and found a girl lighting a fire with one of those Forfar aprons. They lose and destroy their clothes, and then I get blamed, for the girls say that they never had them, and the girls' word is often taken instead of mine. Sometimes I find their clothes under the rocks.

3875. You say that the girls' word is taken before yours—can you give instances of that? Yes. The girls have taken things and I have told Mrs. Lucas, and she has taken the girls' word before mine.

3876. We wish to inquire into these things, and in order to do so we must have specific instances given? Not later than a week ago, J—B— came for a clean apron, and I said—"I cannot give you one, as you did not return me the other." She said she had given me the dirty one; and I said no, she had not, and I refused to give her another apron. The girl then went to Mrs. Lucas, and Mrs. Lucas came out and said that I was to give the girl a clean apron. I said the girl had not given up her apron, and the girl positively denied it, and said she did give her things to me. However, she said presently that she had sent them up from the laundry, and that they were clean in my store, and the end of it was I found that the girl had them about ten minutes before and asked one of the girls to wash them; and yet Mrs. Lucas blamed me for not minding them.

3877. You have not told us now in what way Mr. Lucas took the girl's word before yours? He said—"I do not know how it is between you," and I do not consider that that is satisfactory. I said that "I have very great trouble—these girls will not give up their soiled clothes. I get abused every way, and what am I to do?" Mr. Lucas said—"Oh, there is always some bother and some disturbance." That is no satisfaction satisfaction to me; and Mr. Lucas says, "When the girls are quiet you are always bothering about some apron or some article that is of no value."

Mrs. M. A.
Rowland.

3878. Have you ever heard Mr. Lucas tell one of the sub-matrons that she was not to be believed? They have told us all that; and Mr. Lucas has said that he would believe his wife better than the whole lot of us put together—that he knew her, but he did not know us. He has said that before the girls.

15 July, 1873.

3879. Have you heard Mrs. Lucas say that to one of the sub-matrons? I do not remember Mrs. Lucas saying so.

3880. Do you remember about five weeks ago an altercation taking place between Mrs. Brackenregg and Mrs. Lucas, about muster-time in the morning, when anything of this kind was said,—about not believing her? Yes, there was something said about not believing her, but we have had so many disputes there at muster, both morning and evening, that I cannot remember the particular one you speak of.

3881. Do you recollect the case of a girl called Sarah H—, who was allotted to Mrs. Brackenregg to do her housework, and whom Mrs. Brackenregg sent away from her house because she was impertinent? Yes.

3882. And do you recollect on the occasion of an altercation about this girl carrying her tales, Mrs. Brackenregg bringing forward the fact of her having sent this girl back to the institution as a proof that she had not encouraged her to bear tales? Yes, that is perfectly true.

3883. What occurred on the occasion? Mr. Lucas accused her of always prompting this girl and causing her to tell tales and that kind of thing. Mrs. Brackenregg said—"One proof that I never left that girl power to say anything about me is, that I sent her away at a moment's notice—and if I did that, would I be likely to leave myself in her power?"

3884. Did they say anything in answer to that about not believing the statement? I do not remember rightly. I cannot remember what was said beyond that.

3885. It has been said to you that they would not believe you? Yes, Mr. Lucas has said that to me, and to the others too, on different occasions.

3886. When the children were present? Yes, they were present. It was said almost always when the girls were mustered. It was then that the disputes arose, and they choose that time for abusing us. They are abusing us the whole time, and in fact I do not know all that they say, for they talk in such a high tone, and the girls keep on saying, "Go it—go it," and all that kind of low jeering.

3887. The girls make these comments on the disputes that take place? Yes. It is a common thing for Mr. Lucas to commence at us at muster. They settle all the affairs of the place before these girls—the whole management of the place is settled before the girls—they know everything. One night, at tea, the girls behaved in a riotous manner at the table. I called order, and Mrs. Dunn did the same; and at last I asked Mrs. Dunn to go for Mr. Lucas. She went out and met Mrs. Lucas, who brought Mr. Lucas; and I don't know what she said to him, but he came in and set to and abused me in the most shameful manner, and put his hand up to my face, and said he would suspend me; that Mrs. Dunn told Mrs. Lucas I had not tried to keep order, and Mrs. Dunn denied having said so.

3888. Was Mrs. Dunn present? Yes. I could not speak—I was so surprised at the volley of abuse I got before all the girls.

3889. How long is this ago? About seven or eight months ago. He put his hand up to my face, and I thought he was going to strike me. I thought he would suspend me—so the next morning I asked him to go to the office, as I was going to report to the Colonial Secretary; and then he came to my store and asked me to make it up, and I asked him then had he anything against me—did I not always do my duty properly; and he said that I had done so, and that he considered me one of the best officers on the place, and would I shake hands. I was going to report the matter then to the Colonial Secretary. The girls on that occasion ran about saying how "Mrs. Lucas beat Mrs. Rowland and tore her by the hair of her head," and the other officers thought that it was so. They were surprised when I went home and found that it was not true.

3890. Are you sure that you have always done your duty in supporting Mr. and Mrs. Lucas in their efforts to manage these girls? Always.

3891. They complain that you are not zealous in the discharge of your duties? I do all in my power, but when I complain of anything no notice whatever is taken of my complaints. If I go to Mrs. Lucas about anything that a girl has been doing, she will take no notice; in fact, she says "You can fight your own battles; we are not going to be bullies for you." The girls are not taught to respect us, but quite the reverse. If I give an order, Mrs. Lucas will give another quite different one; and when she sees that I tell them to do a thing in a certain way, she orders them not to do it so, but to obey her, as she is the Matron.

3892. How do you know that? She has done it in my presence. Not long ago I called a girl to come to me. I called Mary Anne B—, and Mrs. Lucas said "Where are you going?" The girl said, "Mrs. Rowland wants me"; and Mrs. Lucas told her to go to school—not to mind, and I said nothing more about it. If I give an order the girls sometimes jeer and laugh, and when I report it to Mr. and Mrs. Lucas, they say "how very bad I am—that I want to get the girls punished—that when they are quiet I will not allow them to be so, but make complaints against them." On another occasion, Mrs. Lucas, when I was at Newcastle, said she would run every Roman Catholic out of the place—that she would not have them there.

3893. Where was this? At Newcastle.

3894. Is this something you have been told by others, or did you hear it yourself? No, Mrs. Lucas said it to me. We were speaking one day, and she told me that she would have every Roman Catholic run out of the place; that they had no more right there than had people of any other religion.

3895. Mr. Ellis.] Of what religion are you? I am a Roman Catholic. I remember Rose O— had some dispute about eating meat on a Friday—I do not remember the exact circumstances—but she said she would tell the priest, and Mrs. Lucas's words were, "What do I care about your poor miserable things of priests!"

3896. President.] Did you hear her say that yourself? Yes; I was standing in the girls bath-room at the time. On another occasion, Mr. Lucas (when one of the girls had showed her arm, where it was marked with the cane, to Mr. King) said at muster that he would "just as soon cane Parkes as one of them—that he did not care two-pence for Parkes." I was present when that was said. It was said at muster before the girls and to the girls.

3897. Mr. Gould.] It was said before the girls? Yes, it was said to the girls.

3898. That he would just as soon cane Parkes as one of them? Yes; that the girl need not have shown

- Mrs. M. A. Rowland. shown her marks to Mr. King, as he would just as soon cane Parkes as her.
- 15 July, 1873. 3899. President.] How old was this girl? She was a great tall girl—I should fancy from her size that she was seventeen years old.
3900. Mr. Ellis.] Did she show the marks on her arm to Mr. King? Yes, she did, and he noticed them.
3901. Mr. Wearne.] Should the girl have been beaten? She was insolent to the matron, and she should have been punished for her insolence.
3902. Mr. Metcalfe.] That is the only way that they can be punished—by stripes of the cane?—
3903. Mr. Cowper.] That is the only thing that they care for? They are afraid of the cane. I have been there when the girls have been rioting, and the police have been standing on one side, and I have been called upon to lace the strait-jackets on the girls. I don't think that was at all right.
3904. Mr. Ellis.] Strait-jackets? Yes, when the girls have been rioting.
3905. The same as they put on lunatics? Similar things. I have thought it was a man's place to do that instead of me, especially when the men were standing there looking on, and yet I had to do it.
3906. Mr. Metcalfe.] There is only one messenger there? There are water police to render assistance—they were standing there when this was done, and I thought it was hard that I should have to do it when the men were standing there; it is not an easy matter to lace jackets on those girls; we are constantly abused on these occasions before the girls.
3907. President.] What do you mean by that? They tell us that we do not do this right or that right, and I consider that abuse before the girls.
3908. Were you there when there was some attempt made to give the girls some amusement and employment at night? I was.
3909. How long was that experiment tried? I forget.
3910. How long was it persevered in? I am not certain, but I should think it was four or five months—I should imagine so.
3911. Why was it given up? I am sure I do not know—I never heard any cause for it. I was at home in the evenings after 7 o'clock.
3912. Don't you get away until 7? No, I do not, at least in summer-time it is near 7. I go down at 6 o'clock in the morning, and I never go near the house, except for breakfast and dinner, during the whole day.
3913. How long are you away from the institution? An hour for breakfast and an hour for dinner. The house-matron who was there before me had always two hours every day besides.
3914. And under the present system the children are always locked up after 6 o'clock? Yes, and when they are locked up we go home to our tea.
3915. Have you refused to assist in amusing the children at night? I have never been asked—but of course I don't see well how we could do it. From the time we get home until the lights are put out at 9—unless a different arrangement is made, the thing would be impossible under the present system.
3916. Do you not think it would be desirable? I think so, for these grown girls—they want something of the kind, but I think it is time for the younger children to go to bed.
3917. Mr. Ellis.] Are the girls ever punished for singing these immoral songs after they retire to the dormitories? No, they are never punished.
3918. They sing them after the night prayers? Yes, and sometimes they sing them going about in the day-time.

MONDAY, 4 AUGUST, 1873.

Members Present:—

WILLIAM CHARLES WINDEYER, Esq., PRESIDENT.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.
EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.

SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.
CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

JOSEPH WEARNE, Esq., M.L.A.

Mrs. Mary Anne Rowland, house-matron, Industrial School, Biloela, called in and further examined:—

- Mrs. M. A. Rowland. 4 Aug., 1873. 3919. Mr. Cowper.] Can you point out to the Commission what you consider to be the defects in the present management, and suggest anything for its improvement? I think that there should be a classification of the girls, which would be a very great improvement.
3920. How would you classify them—please explain? I should not allow those grown girls to mix with the smaller ones, as I believe that they contaminate them very much.
3921. How would you propose to classify them? I would not allow them to sleep together, or to be together in the dormitories or at meals, or in the play-grounds.
3922. You would not let them mix together at all? No, I would not.
3923. Where would you draw the line—how would you classify them? At present that is rather a difficult question for me to answer.
3924. How many prostitutes are there in the institution now? I should think that there were about twenty-four or twenty-five.
3925. What is the age of the youngest? Well, there is one there quite a child—she has been there three or four years. I think she is twelve years of age. She is the youngest, and I think that she is between twelve and thirteen years of age.
3926. Do you know, from her being ill when she came in, or anything of that sort, that she was a bad girl? Yes. She did not come in in my time, but I have heard—I was told by the matron, Mrs. Clarke, who pointed her out to me—that it was so. I remember the girl being pointed out to me some three or four years ago.
3927. Mr. Goold.] And she is only about thirteen now? Yes.
3928. Mr. Cowper.] Are there many of the girls who go into the institution, girls who are suffering from the effects of prostitution? They have all gone out, that is the very young girls—children almost; there is only one there now that I know of that is so young.

3929.

Mrs. M. A.
Rowland.
4 Aug., 1878.

3929. Then is she the only girl of that age that you have there, whom you would class among the prostitutes? She is not with them—she sleeps with the others.
3930. But would you propose that she should go with the others? Yes.
3931. She is the only one? Yes. Well, there is one girl that I know of that has not been bad in the same dormitory with those bad girls, and I think that that is a very great mistake.
3932. A girl who has not been a prostitute? Yes. A girl who has been five years in the institution. She has been there shortly after it opened, and she is not now more than twelve or thirteen years old, and she sleeps in No. 5 dormitory, with some of the bad girls. That is a great mistake—a very great mistake.
3933. How do you propose to classify the girls—by their ages, or by the characters that they receive when they come in? By the characters that they receive when they come in—not by their age.
3934. And do you think that dependence can be placed on the characters given to these girls when they come into the institution? Well, sometimes. You mean whether they are good or bad?
3935. Yes? Well, sometimes by their health and by their conduct. I know that the very small children there—quite little things of eight years of age—they know a great deal.
3936. Do you know it to be a fact that some of the younger children are guilty of such bad practices that it would be undesirable to send them to any other institution, and mix them with any other children who are supposed to be innocent? Well, I believe that one of those children would corrupt 500 innocent children—one of those little girls would. I could choose one girl—not from her actions alone—not more than eight or nine years old, and she knows as much as any big girl in the place; and there are other little girls who know as much. There are two little girls about twelve years of age, and I know for a fact that (what you heard about them, Mr. Cowper) was true (what you were asking me about). Mrs. Dunn has seen something herself, and she complained about it; they are only twelve years of age, and it was something very bad indeed.
3937. Can you suggest any method of preventing their carrying on these practices which are so disgraceful? No, I cannot indeed, but I think that the grown girls when they are found sleeping together should be punished.
3938. Do you know it as a fact that when a girl is received into the institution she is obliged to submit to disgraceful treatment from the other girls in the school, as a process of initiation, and that she is allowed no peace until she does so? Yes, that is a fact.
3939. Of course I know that these things are unpleasant to talk about, but I have heard that this is the state of things, and am anxious to know the truth? Yes, it is quite true. Directly a girl is sent in there she is told that she will soon learn a good deal more than she knew outside. The girls who have been in there for some time—they teach them. The first thing you hear them saying when a new girl arrives there is—“Oh, you will know more, when you have been here a month, than you ever knew outside.” I have heard that frequently. There was a girl came in on Thursday, and I heard a girl say to her—“You will know something before you have been here a month—you will be surprised at the wickedness of this place.” And she said—“Don’t you let the matrons bully you and pick at you—you give them plenty of abuse; if you do not do that, they will make you work and do everything for them; but you never mind them and give them plenty of abuse.” That is the way they talk to them. The girls receive lessons the first day that they arrive how to act.
3940. Do you think that by having separate rooms for the girls, or by having some officer to sleep near them, these evil practices might be prevented? Yes. I think that an officer sleeping near them might prevent it. Of course separate rooms would be better, but that would be too expensive. An officer or some one in charge of the place to sleep near them, would prevent it, or would be likely to prevent it.
3941. Have you found that some young girls—a number of the young girls—are quite as depraved as the older ones? Yes, some of the younger ones are—not the very youngest, but those of twelve years of age, they are quite as bad as the older girls.
3942. Do you find the girls who are sent in from the country are more moral than those who are sent in from the city? Yes, I believe that they are. They do not know as much as the Sydney girls.
3943. In most cases they are sent in from the country because they have no parents, and not because they are vicious? Yes, very often because they have no parents.
3944. You say that you have nothing to propose for the improvement of the place? There should be a play-ground. As it is now, we have to run all round the island after those girls.
3945. Are the girls constantly employed all day? No, not all day.
3946. Mr. Metcalfe.] Not at all? Not the whole of the day. Some girls work in the sewing-room until 12, and then in the afternoon go to school, and have the rest of the afternoon for play.
3947. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not think that the large girls, at any rate, should be constantly kept at work just the same as house servants are? Yes, they should be kept constantly at work, and not allowed so much time to play. In fact the older girls have the lighter work there—it is the middling-sized girls who do the most work, or are doing the most now.
3948. When they are not at work I suppose that they spend their time in mischief? Yes; or playing about.
3949. Do you recollect whether you gave any evidence about the girls who work for the officers having their dinners at the officers’ quarters? No, I did not.
3950. Can you tell me how it is that the girls are kept at the officers’ quarters during dinner-time, and when that system commenced? I do not thoroughly understand you.
3951. Can you tell me how it came about that the girls are left at the officers’ quarters at dinner-time, and when that system commenced? Well, it commenced since we came from Newcastle to Biloela. The girls generally went down and brought their dinners up to the house and took their dinners in the kitchen; or they could go down if they liked and take it in the institution.
3952. Was it not the practice for a long time after you were there for the officers’ servants to go down to the dining-hall for their dinners? Yes, they all went down, and then they left it off and came to our places again. That order has been given two or three times and broken again. I would rather that the girls would go down to their dinner.
3953. I believe that it is your duty to count the clothes to the laundress? Yes.
3954. Has that always been the system? No. The assistants generally counted the clothes.
3955. They have always been counted? Yes, by the assistants.

- Mrs. M. A. Rowland. 3956. By some one? Yes, they have been always counted.
3957. From the very commencement? Yes.
3959. Have you any recollection of ever doing anything which could be construed into setting a bad example to the girls who were under your charge? No, never in the girls' presence. There was one thing that I have heard some remarks about since it happened. The ship "Cossack" was going out, and she dipped her flag as she passed, and myself and Mrs. Kelly, and Mrs. Lucas and Miss Lucas, we were all standing in a group, and we waved our handkerchiefs to this vessel as she was going out. I did hear some remarks made about that. The girls were not present then. I have heard remarks made about our doing that—there was a good deal of talk about it; but we were all there together, and we all returned the salute when they dipped the flag.
3960. President.] You are not conscious then of having committed any acts which were indicative of a lightness of conduct on your part as an officer of the institution? Never in that institution. My husband was a Government surveyor—a surveyor in the country—and from his having been a good deal through the country I know a great many people, and some of them come to see me, but as to having them in the house constantly—I do not. There is only one gentleman who has been in my house three times, or four times at the most; and the others have only been in once. They do not care for the island. I think it was to see the place, which was so notorious, rather than to see me, that they came; and part of them were my own relations. There was another thing we did when the girls were not present. When Mr. Prior came there first he was always asking us to go to his house and see him; so Mrs. Brackenregg and I, and Miss Lucas, and two others (the Miss Connells) went out to see him; and when we went to the door and he opened it and came out, we ran into the house and locked the door, and left Mr. Prior outside. I told Mrs. Lucas of that the next day, and we all laughed about it, and they have often laughed about it; but lately we have not been friends with Mr. Prior, and he has made nasty remarks about that affair. These are the only two things that I regret having done on that island. These things I do regret, as they have tried to make harm out of them—but they are the only things.
3961. There was nothing more than these foolish little indiscretions or jokes? No. The girls were not present. The girls were in the dormitories locked up; and what is the worst part of the matter, the girls are told of these little things. They are spoken of by the girls.
3962. Mr. Metcalfe.] Who tells them? That I do not know; but in the presence of these girls I never was guilty of an act that was a bad example to them. I know what those girls are, and I am very particular in their presence, for they watch your every look. We have (I don't know whether it was any harm or not)—we have gone out when our work has been done to hear the Band play when the ships have been in. We never went alone; all the officers went together, and our children too. I have taken my children to hear the "Blanche" band playing, but not to any other vessel; and I nearly always went with Miss Lucas. She has been with me on several occasions, and I think that if Mr. and Mrs. Lucas ever saw anything wrong with me they would scarcely allow their daughter to associate with me in that way. Of course, for the last two months we have not been so friendly, and she has not been with me. As to our being flighty, it was only the other day that Mr. Lucas said to me that he did not like people in the place who were too old and staid—he said they were too fidgety; in fact, his words were that they were "too thin-skinned." He said that two months ago.
3963. Mr. Cowper.] But he has not a person of that sort in the place? Yes; there was one person who made a complaint about something, and he turned round in my store and said "Oh, she is getting old and fidgety—she is too thin-skinned altogether." I think if they had seen anything giddy or flighty about us they would have told us of it.
3964. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you think that any improvement takes place in the morals of the girls on the island? No, I do not believe that there is.
3965. In none of them? Some of them have improved. Some have turned out well since they have been in service, but the conduct of the girls in the institution is not better.
3966. There is no improvement in the girls who are in the place, morally or religiously? No; but some of those bad girls who go out to service turn out very well.
3967. Those who have gone out to private service? Yes.
3968. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not recollect, when I first went into the institution—when I wanted the girls to go to service they all refused, and I could hardly get a girl to go? Yes, I remember it. They did not care for going to service.
3969. And do you not recollect that within three months of that time the larger portion of the girls who came from Newcastle went away willingly, and the girls used to run after me to get them places? Yes, I have remarked that. I have seen them run out to meet you—or not exactly to meet you, but so as you would remark them, if you had a place for them. I remember that. They would say—"Here is Mr. Cowper—who has he got a place for?" and they seemed to be delighted. But at first they were not going to leave the institution—they had an easy life, and they would stay there. There was one girl there that I got a place for (I got places for five girls altogether). She served me faithfully, and I got her a place, and she wrote me a letter saying that I was the best friend that she had, to take her out of the institution. I think that the girls are only too glad to go away as servants.
3970. Do you not think that a great many of the older girls who were there were improved before they left the school? Yes, they were.
3971. And they left the school with the intention of doing well? Yes, and they have done well, to my knowledge; but now the girls have no hope—they do not seem to have any hope; they do not care—they are as bad as ever again.
3972. Why? I do not know.
3973. They cannot have got as bad as they ever were? No. At one time these girls were in a very bad state—their conduct at least was—and then when they had a hope of going out as servants, they all seemed to change.

3974. Why have they lost hope—the law is still the same? I do not know what it is; but the girls are not as quiet lately as they were then, at this particular time. Mrs. M. A. Rowland.
3975. There are no riots now? No.
3976. How are they less quiet now than they were? It is so. They had evening amusements then, and they had something to look forward to; but now I do not— 4 Aug., 1873.
3977. Do I understand you to say that it is possible to reclaim these girls? Yes, it is possible.
3978. As far as your experience goes, you think that it is possible? Yes; but they want to be dealt with very firmly, and still with great kindness. They have at present too much of their own way—they do as they like in fact.
3979. Mr. Wearne.] Then do you think that two years ago the girls were better than they are now? No, they were worse then—two years ago.
3980. Well, at the time Mr. Cowper speaks of? They were worse at Newcastle.
3981. Mr. Cowper speaks of 1871—October, 1871—when he interfered with the establishment;—you say that the girls were better then? Yes, in December they were decidedly better in their behaviour than they are now.
3982. What do they do now that they did not do then? Their language now is very bad indeed.
3983. Worse than it was then? Very much worse—very much. In fact, I was away for a month when Mr. Cowper came in there (I was ill for a month, and away from the institution), and when I came back I could scarcely believe it was the same place, the change was so great that I saw in the girls. I remember one of the officers (Mrs. Brackenregg) coming to see me, and she said—“You will not know the place; the girls will do anything you tell them now”; and when I went back I did not know the place.
3984. How long did Mr. Cowper continue to visit the establishment? I really do not know.
3985. Was it three months or six months, or twelve? I should fancy— Do you mean how long did he come in constantly?
3986. Yes—how long did Mr. Cowper take the control of the establishment out of Mr. Lucas's hands? I am not aware that he did.
3987. But if Mr. Cowper governed the place, the other did not? I do not know that he did; but he held out this hope to the girls of their going out to service, and there was a great change in their behaviour.
3988. This was in 1871—two years ago—and you say that the girls were not so good as they were during the month that Mr. Cowper interfered with them? The month—it was more than that. He went in before I went away, and he continued his visits for some time after I returned, and when I went back there were a great many bad girls gone, and there was a great change.
3989. But since he has stopped interfering they have not been so good as they were? They have not.
3990. In what way? I have said to the girls—“If you do not do so and so, I will complain to Mr. Cowper and get you stopped for a place.”
3991. Has not Mr. Lucas got places for them? I do not know. Only for a few, I think.
3992. But have not as many girls been sent out since Mr. Cowper interfered in the way you have described? But Mr. Cowper got the places for them.
3993. Does he still use the same influences for them that he did? He still gets the places for them, but then he used to come in every morning and evening, and now he does not. When Mr. Cowper went there the Sunday was a dreadful day to us. From dinner-time until night some of the girls were always down on the beach, and there were people in boats—men calling out to these girls and shouting out to them, the girls answering them, and the language that they used was something shocking.
3994. And because Mr. Cowper held out an inducement to these girls to behave themselves there was a change of everything? Yes. The police were sent away, and there was a complete change. When I went back to the place I never thought of going down to the beach.
3995. Then it was because Mr. Cowper was living on the island, and because the water police were there, that the girls became quiet—they were afraid of the water police? They are not afraid of the water police, but the water police kept the boats away. The girls now go down to the beach again. I had to go down to the beach twice for two girls the other day to bring them up to their work. There was not a day last week that I have not had to do so; and then the girls give me impudence and abuse me.
3996. You are the house-matron? Yes.
3997. How many matrons are there besides you? Two; Mrs. Dunn and Mrs. Brackenregg.
3998. Whose duty would it be to keep these girls on the place? I do not know.
3999. Are they allowed to go down to the beach? No; but if I bring them up there is no notice taken of it. I bring them up on one side and they go down on the other; and when I complain Mr. Lucas takes no notice of it. I brought two girls up on Saturday, and as soon as they came up on one side they went down again on the other and hid under the rocks, and I found them there talking with the men, although I had just brought them up. And they are not punished.
4000. What punishment do you think should be inflicted upon them? There should be some punishment. That is for the superintendent to decide.
4001. What punishment has he the power of inflicting? He has a good deal of power.
4002. What punishment do the rules allow him to inflict upon those girls? Whatever is necessary.
4003. What power is allowed him? I do not know his rules.
4004. But you know the rules generally for the guidance of the officers of the institution, do you not;—what punishments could he inflict? Separation from meals; keep them in the square; lock them up. He is allowed to do that.
4005. Which, you think, he should do in these cases? Yes, I believe so. I found two girls, about two months ago, without a particle of clothes on, jumping in and out of the water and talking to these men. I told Mrs. Lucas of it, and she scolded the girls certainly, but they were not punished; and these girls were there naked and springing in and out of the water, and they made use of very dirty language.
4006. Where were the men? At a dredge that was there.
4007. I was reading just now where in your evidence you say,—“I asked Mrs. Dunn to go for Mr. Lucas. She went out and met Mrs. Lucas, who brought Mr. Lucas. I do not know what she said to him, but he came in and set to and abused me in the most shameful manner, and put his hand up to my face.” Did he do so? He did do so.
4008. How long is that ago,—you say here seven or eight months ago? Yes.
4009. Then you say in your evidence—“I asked him to go to the office, as I was going to the Colonial Secretary”? To report to the Colonial Secretary it should be.

- Mrs. M. A. Rowland. 4010. "As I was going to the Colonial Secretary, and then he came to my store and asked me to make it up, and I asked him had he anything against me?" And he said, "No."
- 4 Aug., 1873. 4011. Did he ask your pardon—(this is not correct, for you said he asked your pardon, I remember that distinctly, for it struck me at the time) did he do so? He asked me to make it up.
4012. You still affirm the same thing that you have stated in this evidence? Yes. Mrs. Dunn was present when he put his hand up to my face. He took no notice of the girls at all, and they were present.
4013. Did he afterwards go to you and beg your pardon? Mr. Lucas came and said that he was very sorry, and that he had made a mistake. He said—"Mrs. Rowland, I am very sorry for this"; and that was acknowledging that he was wrong.
4014. You state in your evidence that there is not a perfect blanket in the place? There are very few perfect.
4015. Is it that they are still destroying their clothes? Yes, they are doing so still.
4016. And you assert that there is now not a perfect blanket in the place? Last Saturday I took some pieces of blanket to Mrs. Lucas that had been torn off in the dormitory, and I told her the girl who had done it, and she never took a bit of notice of it.
4017. President.] That was on Saturday last? Yes.
4018. The 2nd of this month? Yes.
4019. Mr. Wearne.] You say that the girls have no night-dresses—have they always been without them? Yes.
4020. They have never had them? Never since I have been there.
4021. You were at Newcastle? Yes, I was there two days before Mr. and Mrs. Lucas.
4022. Had the girls night-dresses then? They had night-dresses when I was there first; but of course the girls were in a riotous state, and whether the night-dresses were used or not I do not know.
4023. You have charge of all the clothing, and you have never issued any night-dresses? No, never.
4024. Have you ever spoken to Mrs. Lucas about this? No, I have not spoken to her. I leave that to her. If she gave me orders to get night-dresses for the girls, I would get them done; but she does not like my interfering with her duties.
4025. Mr. Metcalfe.] Have you suggested to her that the girls should have night-dresses? No.
4026. Mr. Wearne.] Do you think that it is right that the girls should be left alone in the dormitories from 6 o'clock until 9 every night? No; I think that some one should be with them.
4027. Could it be arranged for in the present building? No, it could not. There is no place for a person to sleep.
4028. Could there not be a partition fixed in the dormitories for them? No. There are two little rooms between the dormitories, but there are none in the dormitories.
4029. Could the matrons see into the dormitories from those rooms? Yes.
4030. Would it not be an improvement if the matrons were to sleep near the girls in those rooms? Yes, it would be an improvement. They are very small rooms.
4031. And in any suggestions that we may make, it should be a recommendation of this Commission that the matrons should sleep there? ———
4032. You were speaking just now of the initiation of girls when they arrive there. Is it possible that you know of these things being carried on, and yet, as matrons of the institution, allow them to be carried on? Allow what?
4033. Allow the filthy conduct you have described to be carried on—that every girl that comes in is initiated? What can be done?—There is no punishment. A girl on Sunday week made use of shocking language in the dormitory, and I called Mrs. Lucas across the yard and told her the exact words that the girl used, and she took no notice of it. What is the use of complaining?—There is no use in it whatever.
4034. If the matrons slept in the same rooms with the girls, then these initiations could not take place? They might take place, of course.
4035. They would not be likely to take place? They might.
4036. But the matron would not allow it? She would not allow it if she could help it; but I think that when a matron finds a thing out the girls should be punished for it.
4037. Mr. Cowper.] Do they not carry on these bad practices—perhaps not initiation exactly, but these other bad practices, in the day-time? Yes.
4038. Can you think of any remedy for that? There were two girls the other day, about twelve years of age, who were found by Mrs. Dunn in the day-time, and she told Mrs. Lucas of it ———
4039. Mr. Wearne.] In the yard with the others, or away from the place? At the end of the house, near the gate as you go into the institution.
4040. Mr. Cowper.] Do you think that it would be possible for any number of matrons to have stopped the girls singing the bad songs in 1871, when you first went to Biloela? No; we tried our best and we could not do it. No one could stop them.
4041. Do you recollect the night that I went down there, about 8 o'clock, when you all rushed out, thinking that the whole place was coming down? Yes, I remember it. We all ran out. We thought that the girls were breaking the doors down.
4042. And do you not think that the improvement that took place at that time was in consequence of a great number of the big girls being got out to service? Yes, it was; all the worst of those girls were taken to service.
4043. Those girls who had been engaged in the riots at Newcastle? Yes.
4044. And do you not think that the good behaviour of the girls that remained was owing to the big girls being sent out, and because everybody in the place appeared to work together? Yes, they did.
4045. Did you ever hear me propose anything in the place, or order any officer or girl to do anything in the institution, without consulting Mr. Lucas? No, never.
4046. And did I not, when first I went in there, state that I had heard that the difficulty Mr. Lucas had was in consequence of the officers wishing to get his place? Yes.
4047. And did I not warn you that it would be out of the question for any one to think of such a thing? You did.
4048. And did I not say that it would be rather to the credit of you all to manage the institution so as to get individual credit, rather than to try to get any person out of it with the hope of getting what you could never obtain? I never thought of such a thing—nor did any other officer that I know of; but Mrs. Lucas is so suspicious ———

Mrs. M. A.
Rowland.

4 Aug., 1873.

4049. President.] Did Mr. Cowper tell you that? Yes, he did.
4050. Mr. Cowper.] Did I not tell you that it would be better for you all to work together, and each in that way to get a portion of the credit for the good management of the place—rather than that you should be striving after a position which you could never obtain? You did.
4051. Have you ever heard me speak in any other terms—or against Mr. Lucas? I never did; but I have heard Mr. Lucas speak very disrespectfully of you.
4052. Never mind that—
4053. President.] Do I understand you to say that you were away at the time that Mr. Cowper was authorized to assist in the management of the place? I went away about three weeks or a month after that, and I was away for a month.
4054. And when you came back you saw a change for the better in the demeanour of the girls? Yes, a decided change. I had only to tell the girls their work and show them how to do it, and they would do it. There was no running down to the beach to get the girls to their work, and to receive insults from them.
4055. And you think that this change was the effect of Mr. Cowper's exertions in trying to get places for the girls? I do think so.
4056. Do you think that the evening amusements for the girls, which have been alluded to before, had a soothing influence upon the manners of the girls? Oh yes, decidedly. The girls were better then; they went to bed quietly; you heard no noise for the night after. They were amused for the evening, and there was no romping and tearing about.
4057. What was the reason that the evening amusements were given up? I never heard what the reason was. I do not know why they were given up. Mr. and Mrs. Lucas and their family conducted them for some time, but why they gave it up I do not know.
4058. When that system was given up the present system was introduced—or rather, gone back to, of their being locked up at dark, with nothing for them to do but make mischief? Yes.
4059. As far as you saw, was there any sufficient reason for giving up this system of amusing the girls at night? I never saw any reason for it.
4060. Mr. Wearne.] How many girls attended these evening amusements? I should think that there were about forty.
4061. That was about half of them;—were they the larger ones? Yes; the younger ones did not attend. There were thirty-four who were not ten years of age.
4062. Mr. Lucas said that the matrons were opposed to assisting him—that they thought they had enough to do without joining in this. Did he ask you to assist him? He did not ask me.
4063. Do you know whether he asked the other matrons? I do not know; but I know that it was impossible to do it under the present management.
4064. President.] Why? The hours are so late; by the time we had tea it would be almost time to lock the girls up for the night; but I have no doubt the thing could be done.
4065. Under a different routine? Yes, it could be done; and no officer would object to assist in it. I know that I myself would not object, but at present it could not be expected, from the hour at which we get home to our tea.
4066. Mr. Cowper.] Was not the institution in a state of riot when Mr. Lucas took charge of it down at Newcastle? Yes, it was in a very riotous state.
4067. Was not the rioting almost continuous until these forty girls went out? Yes, it was.
4068. Mr. Ellis.] Considering the whole character of the place, do you think that it is likely the girls will ever be reformed there? Yes, I think that they can be reformed; it has been done there, I may say, for a short time.
4069. You think that some of them have been reformed there? Yes, and some of the worst girls.
4070. In what way? Well, they got placed out at service, and they stayed in their places and finished their time, and then they went to service again.
4071. Were they sent out of the institution because they became good, or because they were of an age to be no longer kept in the institution? No; not because of their age, but because places of service were got for them, and they went to them.
4072. Have you observed any manifest change for the better in the conduct of the girls there? Well, latterly I have not.
4073. You think that under the influences of the place, as it is now, they continue much the same there from first to last? They do. They do things now in a much quieter way—they are not riotous now, but they are constantly destroying things in a quieter way; we do not see them doing it.
4074. Do they do nothing worse than destroy things? Yes, their language is very bad.
4075. Is it very bad now? Yes, of the very worst description. It is shocking to hear them use such language, and in the presence of the little children too.
4076. They make use of bad language in the presence of the officers? Yes, they do.
4077. And in the presence of the little children? Yes, they do.
4078. Mr. Metcalfe.] You said that they would not wear their dresses long? No, they tear strips off them.
4079. For the purpose of shortening them, so that they can show their legs to people about the place? Yes; we find the strips that are torn off the dresses.
4080. Do they not wear drawers? No.
4081. Should they not be allowed them? I think so, when their dresses are so short as they are now.
4082. Mr. Ellis.] Do any charitable ladies visit these girls? Yes. Mrs. Foott from Balmain visits the Church of England children—she comes on Sundays and Thursdays to the Church of England children, and the Sisters come on the same days to the Roman Catholic children.
4083. Mr. Metcalfe.] Does not some gentleman visit the Protestant children? Yes, Mr. Simmons I think.
4084. Mr. Ellis.] Do they give them instruction? Yes.
4085. Mr. Metcalfe.] Does no Church of England clergyman visit them? None at all; at least there has been one at different times, but none has visited regularly.
4086. Mr. Ellis.] Are the girls ever rude to these ladies? Yes, they are. On the 22nd June last, one of the girls insulted the Sisters in the prayer-room; and the night before, the same girl insulted me at the prayers. She insulted me, and Mr. Lucas took her out of the prayer-room; and that night, to annoy us, the girl attempted to get up a riot in No. 3 dormitory. They all commenced singing the most disgraceful songs, and I went down with the other officers, and we met Mr. and Mrs. Lucas coming into the yard; and

Mrs. M. A.
Rowland.
4 Aug., 1873.

and Mrs. Lucas opened the door of the passage, and she said—"It is easy to pick the girls out here; and here are their friends come to back them up"; and these two girls that she spoke of, Jane W— and Sarah H—, they were sitting at the door perfectly quiet. Mrs. Lucas accused us of being there to support them—to back up these two girls, Sarah H— and Janey W—.

4087. At what time was this? About 8 o'clock. We went to the other dormitory, and the girls called us all names, and Mr. Lucas did not prevent them.

4088. Mr. Wearne.] How did he help them? He said—"This is all your doing." I said—"This is all because that girl behaved badly in the prayer-room and I complained of it." I said the girl did behave very badly to me, and I hoped he would punish her; but that girl was never punished at all. She said she made the disturbance because she was put out of the prayer-room, and that girl is the leader of all the girls—she is Sarah B—; and she is Mr. Lucas's servant. It was at 8 o'clock at night we came down.

4089. At what time do you have prayers? In the institution?

4090. Yes? At different times—sometimes at 6 o'clock, and sometimes at half-past 6.

4091. I understand from your evidence that the girls are locked up from 6 in the evening until 7 o'clock the next morning? Yes, 6. Sometimes it is half-past 6 before they are locked up.

4092. And on this occasion you say that it was 8 o'clock when they had prayers? No. This happened on the 21st June: it was the shortest day in the year.—I remember it through that. We form a line when the girls go to prayers, and this girl ran out of the line and rushed into the dormitory, and Mr. Lucas was standing there and he did not stop her. I was determined that she should not do that, and I followed her into the dormitory and ordered her out, and she positively refused to go out. I then called Mr. Lucas, and with that she insulted me, and said that she would not do anything for me; and I said—"Mr. Lucas, I will not say the prayers with that girl behaving in that manner."

4093. Mr. Ellis.] What was she doing? Using bad language.

4094. Before the prayers? Yes, before the other children. I said the prayers. The girls were locked up, and we went home to tea; and then we heard a great noise, and the girls singing the songs that they have when there is a riot. We went down (we did not wait to be sent for), and as we went into the yard Mrs. Lucas came in and she went to No. 5, and said—"Here is your friends come to back you, Janey W— and Sarah H—; and as true as there is a God in Heaven I will make you suffer for this night." And these girls were sitting perfectly quiet, and when she saw that she shut the door, and went over to No. 3, where this girl was who made all the noise; and Mr. Lucas said to me, "This is all your fault—all this row and noise; it will be a good thing when you are out of the place."

4095. Mr. Wearne.] To whom did he say that? To me.

4096. In the presence of the girls? Yes, in the hearing of the girls; and this girl, Sarah B—, saying, "Give it her—she wants it; she will not turn me out of the prayer-room again." I said to Mr. Lucas—"This is no place to speak to me like this; there is an office where you could say it in, in the morning, and not to say it here before the girls."

4097. I shall ask Mr. Lucas about this when he comes here? He could not deny it; and it all took place by the dormitory door of the girls.

4098. This was on the 21st June? Yes; and then, on another occasion, this girl insulted the Sisters in the prayer-room, and she was corrected for it, but not punished for insulting them. It is not at all right for Mr. Lucas to say these things in the presence of the girls. They have behaved shamefully to us ever since. The day before this Friday I was up till 12 o'clock with this Janey W—, getting the bedsteads laced and repaired, and the sackings were broken, and the next morning, the 21st, they were broken down again. I took Mr. Lucas over and showed it to him, and the words that he made use of were "Why don't you prevent them?" and I said "How can I prevent them?" He said "Why do you not see that they do not do it?" I said "If I told them not to do it, they would not obey me." And as I was speaking to him, Mrs. Lucas called out from the other room, and said "Come here and put this woman out of the prayer-room"; and Mr. Lucas went over and put Mrs. Brackenregg out of the prayer-room.

4099. He put Mrs. Brackenregg out of the prayer-room? Yes; Mrs. Lucas called him over, and he went over to the prayer-room and brought Mrs. Brackenregg out before him.

4100. What was the reason of that? Well, they had a quarrel in the morning at muster. I had a quarrel too. I corrected a girl for saying that I laughed at Mrs. Lucas. I said to her that I would give her something to laugh for if she said such things, and Mrs. Lucas came and said, "How dare you interfere with a girl who is making a complaint to me?" I said, "That girl should be punished for the lie"; she said that I laughed at her, and I never did so.

4101. Why was Mrs. Brackenregg turned out of the prayer-room? They had a quarrel in the morning. Mr. and Mrs. Lucas were at Mrs. Brackenregg, and Mrs. Lucas and I had a quarrel about my speaking to the girl. She was at Mrs. Brackenregg for Sarah H—. They kept it up still in the prayer-room, and Mrs. Brackenregg turned round and said, "Now we are in the prayer-room and may stop it"; and Mrs. Lucas said, "If you don't like it go out"; and then she went for Mr. Lucas, and he brought her out before him.

4102. I thought the teacher conducted the prayers? The Roman Catholics only.

4103. Is Mrs. Brackenregg a Roman Catholic? No.

4104. Who conducted prayers with the Protestants? Mrs. Brackenregg.

4105. I thought that Mrs. Lucas conducted the prayers? No; she only did so for the last two months, since she came to the institution. Mrs. Brackenregg conducted them, and Mrs. Dunn. Mrs. Lucas has conducted them ever since this quarrel took place.

4106. Mrs. Lucas has conducted the prayers then ever since? Yes. Mrs. Brackenregg has not gone into prayer-room since.

4107. Mr. Cowper.] Going back to October, 1871, Mrs. Rowland, were not the majority of the girls then in the institution Roman Catholics? Yes, they were.

4108. And were they not in the afternoons without instruction—religious instruction—running about the island like wild creatures? Except that given by the school-mistress. They were running about the beach and the hills, and the matrons after them; and as fast as they got them up one side of the hill they ran down on the other.

4109. Do you not think that it made them feel themselves outcasts, when they saw that the Protestants were visited by a clergyman, while they, the Roman Catholics, were not? Yes, they have felt that. I have heard the girls speak of not having a clergyman.

4110. Do you not think that the visits of the Sisters of Charity afterwards, had a very good effect? Yes, Mrs. M. A. Rowland.
 4111. And did you not notice that they joined in the prayers and the music and the singing at the school-room afterwards with great pleasure? They did. They did seem delighted with the singing, and we had 4 Aug., 1873.
 4112. Do you not think that Mrs. Foott's visits to the Protestant children in the morning to teach Sunday-school had a good effect upon the girls? Yes, decidedly.
 4113. Do you recollect that at that time they had their meals without knives and forks, and pulled their meat to pieces with their fingers, and that their behaviour was so bad they could hardly be trusted with knives? Yes, it was so.
 4114. And do you not attribute the improvement in a great measure to the religious instruction that they received on the Sabbath? Yes, I think it has a great deal to do with the change in those girls.
 4115. Do you not think that the visits of ladies on subsequent occasions have had a good influence upon them? Yes, I think that they have.
 4116. Do you not think that the girls now are much better behaved at meals, or at any time, than they used to be? Yes, they are at meals.
 4117. And do you not think that in their outward demeanour on the play-ground they are better behaved? Well, they have been up to within the last five or six months, but I cannot say that they are just now, for during the last couple of months they have really been very bad—they are just doing as they like.
 4118. I thought that they were better behaved myself? Oh yes, they are better than when you first came there, but they are not as good as they were twelve months ago. Of course they are much better than they were.

Mrs. Mary Anne Dunn, sub-matron, Industrial School, Biloela, called in and examined:—

4119. President.] I believe that you are one of the sub-matrons of the Industrial School at Biloela? Yes. Mrs. M. A. Dunn.
 4120. How long have you been there? Two years and one month. 4 Aug., 1873.
 4121. What salary do you receive? £50 a year.
 4122. Any rations? Yes, one ration.
 4123. What are your duties? I go down generally as soon as it is daylight to attend to the children's bath, and attend to their heads, and attend to them while they are having their bath; and then I have to see that the yard is kept clean, the out-houses cleaned, and the yard swept; and then I have to go to the kitchen to give out the provisions for the breakfast, and I have to go back to the bath now and then; and then I have to attend to the dining-room while the girls are at breakfast; and I have then to go to the kitchen again and put the provisions away for the day, and I generally go home about 9 o'clock to my own breakfast. Then after that I have to go to the kitchen again and stay there until the girls have the food for dinner prepared ready to be cooked; and after that I go the work-room and stay there until 12 o'clock, and return to the kitchen again, where I stay until the dinner is carved and sent into the dining-room; and then I go home to my own dinner. Then I go to the work-room and stay there until 4 o'clock; and then I go to the kitchen and see that the tea is sent in to the dining-room, and then by the time tea is over it is muster. I attend muster, and attend in the prayer-room, and lock up the children, and then go home for the night.
 4124. As far as you see, are the officers of the institution working harmoniously together? Yes, the officers are, with the exception of Mr. and Mrs. Lucas.
 4125. What do you mean by that—do you mean that the officers agree amongst themselves, but do not agree with Mr. and Mrs. Lucas? Not very well.
 4126. How does this disagreement show itself? In various ways. Mrs. Lucas does not feel pleased with what we do, and finds fault before the girls, which is very wrong I think. If she has occasion to find fault she should do it privately; it tends to degrade the officers very much.
 4127. Has that ever taken place in your case? Yes, it has taken place in my own case three or four times.
 4128. In what way and to what extent? For instance, one day in the work-room (I saw the fault myself and spoke to the girl about it) the body of a dress was done wrong, being sewn with the wrong coloured thread, and Mrs. Lucas spoke about it, and I made a remark, which Mrs. Lucas had previously made about it, and she came back and said unpleasant things to me before the girls, and then went and brought in Mr. Lucas.
 4129. To do what? To abuse me, I suppose, because I made that remark, which was a simple remark that she had made herself previously.
 4130. Tell us what the remark was? I said that the body had been stitched with the wrong thread, and she said the girls must be watched. I said that we did watch them, but that I thought a girl of the age of the one who made the mistake would know how to do the work; and then as Mrs. Lucas was going out I merely made the remark to Mrs. Brackenregg that we should have to watch the girls better, and then Mrs. Lucas got into a temper about it. I do not think that she heard what I said, but thought that I said something different.
 4131. And did she speak rudely to you before the girls? Yes, she did. She spoke to me most insultingly before the girls.
 4132. Have you ever heard her speak so to the other officers? Yes, frequently.
 4133. Which officers have you heard her speak to in that way, before the girls? Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Brackenregg.
 4134. She has done so in the presence of the girls? Yes.
 4135. More than once? Yes, frequently.
 4136. Do the girls ever make remarks upon these quarrels that go on amongst the officers? Yes, they often do make rude remarks, and are impertinent to us afterwards. They tell us that they will not do this and that—they will not do that, except for Mrs. Lucas.
 4137. We are told that the children are locked up at night without anything to do until bed-time? No, they have nothing to do at all. They are locked up at half-past 6 in the summer-time, and at 6 in the winter, and they have nothing at all to do—most of them.

- Mrs. M. A. 4138. Do you think that this is desirable? No, not at all. I think it would be better to have something Dunn. to employ the children.
4139. Were you there when an attempt was made to get up some amusement for them? Yes, I was.
- 4 Aug., 1873. 4140. Do you know why that was given up? I think it was given up in consequence of the girls getting tired of it, but I cannot be sure, as I was not present.
4141. You did not see anything of the working of the plan yourself? No, I was never there.
4142. Do you think that it is desirable to have those older girls there at all—those who have been on the town? Yes; I think that we might manage to reclaim those girls, with classification and different management.
4143. Would you allow them to mix with the other girls at all? No; I think that they soon corrupt the other girls and make them as bad as themselves.
4144. There is no means of separating them at present? Not at present; the place is very inconvenient.
4145. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you believe that the little children are corrupted by the older ones? Yes,
I do, indeed.
4146. For what reason do you believe that? Because they make use of bad language, and sing songs which they should not know anything about.
4147. Then you think that more harm than good is done to the young children by their going to the school? By their going to the school?
4148. I mean by their going to Biloela? They are doing more harm than good at present, because they mix with the other girls, but if they were separated we could bring them up properly.
4149. Is it possible to separate them on the island? Not at present—not unless there was a place built for them.
4150. And of course you must have a separate staff of matrons for these younger children? Yes, I should think that it would be desirable.
4151. You do not think that they are at all improved on the island? Not at present, but I think that they might be.
4152. Mr. Couper.] Do you not think that some of the small girls are as bad as the older ones? Yes,
I do.
4153. Do you know that some of the young ones have come into the institution suffering from disease caused by bad living? Yes.
4154. What is the age of the youngest of such girls? Of the bad girls do you mean?
4155. Yes? They have come in about twelve years of age.
4156. Do you think that these girls would be likely to contaminate girls in other institutions if they were placed there? Yes, decidedly, I think that they would corrupt any girl or set of girls that they went amongst.
4157. And do you think that there are many of them in the institution? We have not so many as we had. There are not many of the young ones in that state.
4158. How many young ones do you think that you could pick out who would not be likely to contaminate other girls? I cannot answer that question without some consideration.
4159. You know that there are about thirty young ones in the place? About thirty-five young ones.
4160. How many others do you think there are who could be selected? Perhaps about twenty.
4161. Twenty may be selected, you think? Yes.
4162. And you think that there are still about forty girls there who would be likely to lead other girls into the same wicked habits that they have been accustomed to? Yes, I do.
4163. Do you know that the girls are guilty of practices, both by day and night, which are too disgraceful to describe? Yes, they are. I have seen it myself in the daylight—something dreadful.
4164. How long ago? About three months ago. I cannot give you the dates, because I have not kept dates.
4165. Can you suggest any remedy for this? I think if the children were kept in subjection—if there was a proper discipline in the institution—it might be remedied. These girls want to be under strict discipline.
4166. How would you propose to do it—to keep them in such a state of discipline that they would not be able to have recourse to such practices? They would have to be kept apart, and properly punished for every breach of discipline they committed.
4167. How would you punish them? The cane is the only punishment they dread. They do not care about being locked up as they are locked up at present, but they do dread the cane.
4168. Is that the only way to keep them in order? That is the only way.
4169. Do you not think moral influence would have some effect upon them? Yes, I do think so, if it was used there as it should be.
4170. Is it not the business of the officers of the institution to use this moral influence as far as possible?
I do think so—every officer should do it.
4171. Do you not try to do it yourself? Yes, I have tried it.
4172. How is it that you have not succeeded? We have not been able to carry it out as we should do.
My time is fully occupied in my duties that I have scarcely time to talk to the girls at all; but I have endeavoured to do so on many occasions.
4173. Do you not think that more is to be done with the girls by means of moral influence than by severe punishments? Yes, I think so; but they want punishing sometimes—some of them. They are very bold and defiant sometimes.
4174. Do you not think that when the larger girls get apparently beyond control and are unwilling to submit to any influences whatever, it is necessary that they should be punished at times by being placed in close confinement? Yes, in separate confinement—solitary confinement I should say. They should not be put together in one room when they have to be confined. There have been three or four and sometimes seven put into one dormitory, and that does them no good at all—it is no punishment to them.
4175. When the girls are confined together in this way, do you not find that they sing improper songs and make improper noises, and try to excite the other girls to do the same, thus upsetting the discipline of the place? Yes, they do.
4176. And do you not think that it is impossible to keep the discipline among those girls if the girls who misbehave are not punished in such a way that they cannot, while under punishment, communicate with the other girls? Most decidedly. The dormitories are so situated that the younger children can hear everything that goes on; they sing the immoral songs and use bad language sometimes.

4177. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you not think that it is highly dangerous to allow girls of that character to be sent out to be servants in families—would they not exercise a contaminating influence on the children they were sent to take care of? I do not know; some of them have turned out well.

4178. Do you not think that it is a risk to put pure children under the care of such characters as those? Yes, it is a risk; but I do not think that these bad girls have been sent out as nurses, but as domestic servants. The little ones have gone as nurses.

4179. But the little ones seem to be as bad as the others? Yes, some of them are; but not all of them.

4180. Can you suggest any better plan of managing these children—you say that the whole system is very faulty? Well, I think it would be better if there were strict discipline used, which there is not at present; and that they should be punished when they break out and make these noises and do these things which they are in the habit of doing.

4181. But a system which is all punishments and no rewards never reclaims people, I think? No; I do not mean to say that they should be always punished; I think that we should use moral influences as well.

Mrs. M. A.
Dunn.

4 Aug., 1873.

Mrs. Mary Anne Rowland called in and further examined, at her own request:—

4182. President.] I understand that you have something further to state to us beyond what you have already said? Yes. Mr. Lucas made a statement the other day, that we came here and told a pack of lies. We did no such thing, and for my own part I am willing to take my oath that all I have said is true.

4183. Do you mean to say that Mr. Lucas said so here? Yes, he said we told a pack of lies to the Royal Commission. The other day a girl went to the line and took two aprons off it. I missed the holland aprons, and wanted them for Sunday, and they were found stowed away in the kitchen, and I got them from the girl that washed them out. I said to Mrs. Lucas that these girls should not be allowed to go to the line and take the clothes off it, as it put me out very much with the clothes. She said—"Where are they?" And I said that Janey M—, had them, and I found them in the kitchen. Mrs. Lucas said—"Oh, nonsense, they are not allowed to go and do it"; and I said—"There is a proof that the girls had the aprons, as I was three short." Mr. Lucas and Mrs. Lucas would not listen to a word I said, and he called in the girl and said to me, as I was stating the case—"Hold your tongue, and let the girl speak." And I said, "I thought that I was the first to speak; but as the girl is to be the first, why go on Janey Murphy." The girl then said, "I did not take them." "Why," I said, "I have just found them in the kitchen and got them washed." And she said she did not take them, and the other girl was there, and she said—"I saw you take them." And Mr. Lucas said—"Do you think I am a fool, to have these complaints made to me?" I said—"The girls are allowed to take these things off the line, and I cannot account for them if they do." And then they commenced and insulted me before that girl, and said that I delighted to have rows, and they went on at me in that way. Mrs. Lucas walking up and down and abusing me, until Mr. Lucas told her to hold her tongue. I said—"You will not listen to a word that I have to say, and Mrs. Lucas will not either—you will hear nothing that I have to say." And Mr. Lucas said—"You will go to the Royal Commission now and tell your lies, but I have seen the day when a woman who struck my dog or cat I would give her a lift in the ear." What he meant was that the cats and dogs were fighting in the dining-room, and the children were throwing crumbs to the pigs—

4184. Where do you say—in the dining-room? Yes, among the children there. They were throwing crumbs to the little pigs in there, and bits of bread, and the pigs and dog and cat were all fighting together, and making a great noise, and I beat them out as well as I could—there was a great commotion. This was what Mr. Lucas cast up to me then, when he said "I saw the day when I would strike the woman who struck my cat and dog."

4185. Before this girl? Yes, two or three girls were present; and then he is astonished that the girls do not respect us or obey us. Then, on the 1st July, the girls broke all our dishes, and Mrs. Lucas's words were that we got into a bad temper about it, and he would propose to the Royal Commission to take us all out of this place—that there was always some fuss about the place. And then he said to Mrs. Dunn—"If I lose my place here I will drag every one of you out with me."

4186. Was any one present on these occasions? On the 2nd July Mrs. Brackenregg was present, and on the 2nd of July Mrs. Kelly was present when he said—"There is no peace in a place where any of you are."

4187. Is there anything else that you wish to say? The day after I came here first a little boy struck a girl in the room, and I put him in the corner, and Mrs. Lucas said to him—"Come to your seat immediately, and sit down." That is taking all the authority out of my hands.

4188. Mr. Wearne.] Do you mean that she said it to you? I stood the child in the corner, and Mrs. Lucas told him to come out immediately, and I consider that that was taking the authority out of my hands. Last Saturday week I was taking down on the slate a girl's size for boots, and I was speaking to the girl and asking the size, when Mrs. Lucas called out—"How dare you stand speaking to Mrs. Rowland when I am speaking to you?" and I did not hear her speak to the girl; and I was only doing my duty. On another morning, I took a child and shook her for tearing her pinafore, and Mrs. Lucas burst out laughing because I shook the child. That was not proper I think. And I think that standing a child in the corner is not such a great punishment as beating them—giving them black eyes, as Mr. Lucas does. I have seen Mr. Lucas beat a child, Henrietta M—, and she had a black eye for three weeks afterwards.

4189. Mr. Gould.] Did you see her with a black eye? Yes; it was black for three weeks; and Mrs. Lucas beat Lizzie L— and gave her a black eye. And I saw Ellen S—, where Mrs. Lucas dragged her by the hair of the head, and I saw handfuls of hair come out of the girl's head; and I think the punishment that I gave that child, by standing him in the corner, was more simple than dragging girls about by the hair of the head. Since I have been there there have been aprons lost from the laundry, and Mrs. Lucas has said why did I not find the girl; and yet, when I did find the girl out—"Oh," she said, "it was only a mistake." On another occasion, Mrs. Lucas took a girl by the hair of her head and beat her, and the blood was streaming from the girl's nose.

4190. What girl was that? Mary C—. She caught Mr. Lucas by the beard. I do not forget it, because Mrs. Lucas accused me of not doing my duty. She got hold of the girl, and with her closed hand she hit her up in the face—hitting her until the blood streamed out. I asked her to let go, and then she turned upon me, and said—"You to take the girl's part—you to stand there when she is pulling Mr. Lucas by the beard!" Mr. Lucas told her to hold her tongue. Was that not doing my duty—just telling her to let the girl go?

The Right Rev. Dr. Marsden, Bishop of Bathurst, called in and examined:—

- Right Rev. Dr. Marsden. 4193. President.] I believe you are Bishop of the Church of England for the diocese of Bathurst? Yes.
- 11 Aug., 1873. 4194. This Commission has been appointed to inquire into the Public Charities of the Colony,—amongst others, industrial and reformatory schools and orphanages; and, in considering the means of disposing of or educating neglected children, the topic of boarding them out in the country has come under consideration. We have been given to understand that your lordship has some knowledge of the working of such a system in England? Yes. I do not know that there has been the same need for the farming out system here as there is in England. I can only speak of it as I found it there. It was thought that the bringing up of children in the work-house gave them degrading ideas of themselves—that they lost their self-respect—and it was suggested that they should be handed over to various persons—in my parish amongst others,—and this was done, I believe, in mine and the neighbouring parishes with very good results. The difficulties in the way of such a system here would be, I apprehend, the want of local supervision. Of course, as no doubt the Commissioners are aware, in England, in addition to the general Board there is also a local Board consisting of elected members—(some are elected by the rate-payers and others are ex officio members)—and there is a proper routine. Everything comes under the cognizance of the local Board. Its members are personally acquainted with the characters of the individuals to whom children are consigned. These individuals have, moreover, to go before the local Board periodically to receive their pay—(they themselves are very often in the receipt of parish pay)—and there is a greater acquaintance with individual characters than there is out here. Then one thing that was proposed was that these children should be sent to school—that was thought desirable; instead of being taught in the work-house school they were to be sent to the parochial school, in order to do away with that sense of degradation that they feel at being brought up in a work-house. An English poor person has a great horror of going to the work-house, but not in cases where they have been brought up as children in a work-house; and it was to neutralize the latter result that the system I refer to was originated. I think the advantage of it is, that it keeps up the home influences in a way which could not be done in any public institution; and if you can get persons locally interested (such as ministers of religion) to act in loco parentis to the children, I think the system might be tried here. But if the thing is to be left in the hands of a Police Magistrate and a policeman, I doubt they would take more than a mere routine interest in the matter.
4195. In what part of England did this system come under your notice? In Evesham, in Worcestershire. I had one of the churches there.
4196. Where did the children come from—were they town children? There were some town and some country children, but those that I became acquainted with were in the town.
4197. The children are placed out in the town as well as in the country? Yes; those I speak of were in the town.
4198. Can you tell us what pay was given with them? I cannot recollect exactly, but I think it was 3s. That seems low, no doubt; but when an adult pauper got 2s. and at times two loaves, it was considered a gain to them to have a child to board for 3s. per week; and they did not clothe them.
4199. How were they clothed? The clothing was found by the Poor Law Board, and paid for out of the local rates.
4200. How young were these children—what was the age of the youngest that was put out in this way? I hardly recollect that. I should think about seven or eight years old—that was, I think, about the age.
4201. Were they bound to these people for any time? I think not. They were left with them as long as the persons gave satisfaction. I was, if anything came under my knowledge, to report it, and I think it would be very desirable that some one should do so here.
4202. Used the clergy to look after all these children in this way? Yes.
4203. Then, according to your observation of this system, it was attended with favourable results? Yes, it produced a favourable impression on my mind—I mean that it seemed to me far more preferable than their going to the Union.
4204. It did not tend so much to pauperize the children? Oh no.
4205. It preserved their individuality of character more than would have been the case in any large institutions in which there were some hundreds of children? Yes, it preserved their self-respect. The work-house is regarded by some as almost a prison. They seem to lose caste as it were by going there. I think it would be desirable in this Country, where we have not that intimate knowledge of individuals that we have at Home, that there should be great care taken in drawing up any testimonials as to persons' characters. Sometimes they are worded in such a general way that the people can get any one almost to sign them.
4206. You mean testimonials as to the character of the people who take the children? Yes, the character of the people.
4207. With whom it is proposed to put them? Yes.
4208. You have not been very long in the Colony? About three years and a half.
4209. Do you know enough of the circumstances of the Colony with reference to this question to be able to give an opinion as to how far it would be possible to carry out such a system here? No. There were some children sent out in Bathurst, but I have not heard the result. There were some orphans in the gaol, and I suggested that they should be sent somewhere, and they were sent to persons in the town by the the Police Magistrate. He seemed satisfied then with the result of what he had done, but I have heard of the matter since. I think it is very desirable indeed that there should be periodical reports of these children, if they were placed out. Right Rev.

Dr. Marsden.

4210. Reports from some inspector? No, I should get them from the ministers of the various denominations I think. I should send the children to the care of their ministers, and I am sure the ministers would look after their own flock. They should be asked whether they would be good enough to report as to the well-being of the children. I shall be glad to get any more definite information on this subject by writing to my friends on the spot. I should anticipate here that the expense would be one great obstacle to the system, because you will have to pay more here than at Home, though the necessaries of life here are much cheaper. 11 Aug., 1873.

4211. But would not the children here be useful to people living in the bush? Yes, there might be an advantage in that way.

4212. So that if the people receive enough to clothe a child and provide for its bare living, they would be glad to take it? Yes.

4213. Especially with the prospect of having the children as apprentices afterwards when they were old enough? Yes; but if that were the case, the children must be what are called "half-timers"—they must go to school part of their time. If the girls are sent out as nurses and kept at work, you do away with one of the objects of the system, which is, that the children shall go to school. That is one of the objects I have in view.

4214. Yes, they should go to school regularly, but work part of the day? I think then that the great difficulty would be in the choice of persons who would take them.

4215. You think the difficulties of the case are not insuperable? No. I think that more care should be taken here with regard to the selection of persons with whom children are put, because you can tell the characters better in England. I could tell you the character of any person in my parish in England; but here the people fluctuate a good deal, and it is not easy to gain a knowledge of them. In England, you see, these people have to report themselves every week or fortnight in coming for their pay, and then they would be asked how the children were getting on, whether they went to school, and so on, so that the children would be under the eye of those who took an interest in them.

4216. Supposing that the alternative were presented to you, in the event of the Denominational Orphan Schools being closed, of sending children to a large institution like Randwick, or of boarding them out in this way,—which would you prefer? That would depend a good deal on how the children regarded being sent to Randwick—whether the associations would be in their favour.

4217. But apart from that? I prefer the boarding out system, if you can get the proper people to take the children; but of course care should be taken to see that they have proper food, and so on.

4218. The temptations to stint children of their food are not the same as they are in England—everybody here lives so much better? Yes. The inducement in England to take the children is that they will be in the receipt regularly of money. The poor people in my parish were often, in the cold frosty weather, for weeks together without getting a penny; and so this money coming in helped them on to a certain extent.

4219. This was amongst an agricultural population I suppose? Yes. I think also that the children should be sent to a place of worship once a week, provided that there is no reasonable obstacle to their going.

4220. Mr. Metcalfe.] Supposing that the children are well cared for at Randwick, you would not then prefer that they should be boarded out? No; if the thing is in good working order, and the home feeling is not destroyed. I cannot speak of Randwick, because I am not acquainted with the place.

4221. What class of persons would you get to take these children here? In England?

4222. No—here? I think that in Bathurst the idea was that you would get rather a better class of people to take them if they were able to do a little in the way of helping.

4223. It would be very little that a child of eight years old could do, and what object do you suppose people with families of their own would have in taking the children of other people into their homes? To run of errands, or to mind the baby when the mother was occupied. I do not suppose that the children would be taken by the better class, but by the lower middle class.

4224. Are you aware of the cost of keeping the children in these institutions? I do not know. I think the expense may be an objection to this plan.

4225. The cost at Randwick is about £14 per head per year? The expense may be an obstacle to the boarding-out system here.

4226. You do not know what pay people would expect? I do not. I understood that those who were sent out in Bathurst were taken gratuitously—but they were exceptional cases.

4227. Married couples without children of their own might take them? Yes.

4228. But do you think that people would take them of that tender age? Well, in England people with three or four children take them because they want the money. My fear would be that in the remoter regions we should lose sight of the children altogether.

4229. Among the small farmers, for instance, scattered about Bathurst, and at some distance from it, you could not very well look after them? That would be a difficulty.

4230. And they would not be sent to school? They would have to be placed near a school and near to a place of worship, otherwise I think that we should be inflicting a hardship upon them.

4231. Mr. Cowper.] You think that in apprenticing them out care should be taken not to send them to people who were more than a certain distance from the school? Certainly not.

4232. What distance? A mile and a half would be the outside. We have children who come greater distances than that, but then they come on horseback, which these children would hardly do.

4233. How many children do you think could be disposed of in this way in your district? That I have not any idea of.

4234. Mr. Ellis.] Have you had any experience, Dr. Marsden, in the working of the Industrial Schools? In this Country?

4235. Or at Home? I have not. That was one reason why this boarding out system was adopted—we had no institution at all like Randwick or the Orphan Schools. We simply had choice of the Union, and therefore our need was great.

4236. You mean the work-houses? Yes.

4237. As far as I have been able to gather from reading, nothing seems to be more detrimental to children than their being brought up in work-houses? No. It destroys their self-respect. We do not want to make the place too pleasant for them, otherwise the expenses would be enormous. The poor rates are enormous in England. They were 8s. in the £ in a parish adjacent to mine in Shropshire. The effect of their their being so high was that owners of property would not allow cottages to be built on their land, and the people were sent on the parish when they were sick or enfeebled. We had instances of that in my last parish—that the owners of estates had the use of the people while they were able to work, and then we had to maintain them when they were ill or disabled.

4238. I understand you to say that as far as possible the family system should be carried out in the bringing up of the children? Yes; and it would be very beneficial if you got proper persons to look after the children.

4239. You think that even in large establishments—even in the Industrial Schools—that system should be considered? Yes.

4240. It is scarcely possible to carry out the family system in a large institution, is it? To carry out the family system?

4241. Yes; to make the children have that feeling? Well, we endeavour to counteract the other feeling by as far as possible providing amusements for the children, such as buying them toys and so on.

4242. Could you pay that attention to them if they were in a school among 700 or 800 other children? You cannot. No.

4243. Do you not think that all sense of individuality is lost in such an institution? Yes.

4244. In a smaller school it might be possible to carry out your view? Yes.

4245. President.] Is there any suggestion that you wish to make upon this subject? No more than this, that I have made. I shall be glad, if the plan is carried out, to co-operate as far as I can, and to request those who are associated with me to do so; and I think that they will be glad to do so. I think that all ministers, to whatever denomination they belong, would be glad to assist. Of course the children would belong to them, and it would be their business to look after them.

4246. Mr. Ellis.] You are aware that numbers of young girls are picked up in the streets and sent to these Industrial Schools and Reformatories—Do you believe that it is possible to reform such girls without bringing a religious influence to bear upon them? I have the impression that it is not. It is said that they make use of these places as hospitals where they go when they have contracted diseases; but when they are well they come out of them again and resume their course of life.

4247. Mr. Couper.] But they can come out of those institutions when they please? Pretty well.

4248. Mr. Metcalfe.] But we refer to schools from which they cannot get out? There would no doubt be a greater check upon them there.

4249. Mr. Ellis.] Do you think that any man—no matter what his respectability or intelligence may be—should be at the head of a Female Industrial School? You mean a married man?

4250. Yes—any man: would it not be better to have a female head. I ask you the question because I see that Miss Carpenter and others speak very strongly against any gentleman being entrusted with the management of these institutions? Of course it is a subject which they are more competent to deal with. I think it would be desirable to get, in addition to any paid agents, volunteers to interest themselves in the institution.

4251. Mr. Metcalfe.] Volunteers—to visit the place, you mean? Yes.

4252. Mr. Ellis.] As a matter of opinion, what do you think yourself as to the institution being under a male or female head? I think that females would be best to take the management.

4253. Assuming that they are perfectly competent to do so, and are fitted for the purpose? Yes. I think that some suspicion may be thrown upon a gentleman, however good his character may be, placed in such a position. It would, therefore, certainly take away one objection, if none but females managed the institution. One of the difficulties with regard to this system of boarding children out is as to how far the law of slander comes in, if a report is made about a person. Supposing that a child is recommended to my care, and I report that the person who has the child and who had a good character once no longer bears that good character, should I subject myself to an action for defamation of character. That is one of the difficulties that has occurred to me. Of course in England this boarding out system, under improper authority, turned out most disastrous. There were a number of murders committed.

4254. Do you think it would be desirable to establish a head office in Sydney, and a Board, the members of which would have the entire control and supervision of all charitable institutions receiving aid from the Government? Yes, decidedly; and you could have some responsible individuals upon that Board.

4255. By whom these children could be apprenticed and admitted into the various institutions? Yes, and to whom references could be made and complaints. But the great point with me is to have a local Board so that these people who took the children could come under their eye. I think that if you have a central, Board in Sydney alone, you have the system good in theory but not in practice.

4256. I mean a centre of communication merely, and to have local Boards also? Yes; they have that in London. There is a general Board and a local Board, and the general Board exercises control over the local Board.

4257. And over the institutions? Yes. There is a certain limit allowed to the local Boards. A thing is sanctioned at head quarters. It is found to work well, I believe.

Mrs. Mary Anne Dunn, sub-matron, Industrial School, Biloela, called in and further examined:—

Mrs. M. A.
Dunn.
11 Aug., 1873.

4258. Mr. Couper.] Is it your opinion that the girls sent into the school from the country are generally more immoral in their character than those who are sent in from the city? No; those sent in from town are decidedly the worst.

4259. Do you not think that, in order to preserve discipline, the girls should be kept constantly employed,—that when they have completed one work they should be put to another? Yes; they have too much leisure time—some of them.

4260. And they use that leisure time in concocting mischief? Yes. I think that we want a room for them to go into. They have now no room to go into to play or amuse themselves, and so they run about the island. If they want to do a little crochet or anything of that kind there is no room for them to go into; and the children too, if there was a fenced in play-ground for them it would be much better. They could be there with an officer, who would prevent a great many of those bad practices that are carried on. I think too it is not right for those big girls to run about in the cold weather as they do. They are very comfortless, and I think that there should be a big room for them to go into, where they could sew or read and keep their minds employed.

4261. Do you not think that implicit obedience to orders should be enforced? Yes, decidedly. It is not enforced at present. Mrs. M. A. Dunn.
4262. Do you think that it is possible for the subordinate officers to ensure order unless the superintendent and matron are strict with these girls? No, I do not think it is. I think that we could get on much better with the girls if the superintendent and matron were more strict than they are. 11 Aug., 1873.
4263. Have you found that Mr. Lucas is too good-natured with the girls? Yes, I think that he lets them have too much of their own way, and when we make a complaint he does not attend to it. We do not get justice in that way, for he would rather believe the girls than believe us.
4264. Mr. Metcalfe.] You cannot punish the girls, can you? No, we have no power to punish them, but we do sometimes use a little cane in the work-room. We do not use it severely.
4265. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not think that if obedience were insisted upon regularly the girls would be much more manageable? Yes, that is what we want. The girls should be taught to obey us just the same as they obey the superintendent and the matron, but we have no power to make them do so.
4266. Do you recollect that in October, 1871—I cannot remember the day or week, but about that time—the girls regularly went down to the beach, and often bathed there—large girls—in the presence of people on the water, and of the inhabitants of Spectacle Island? Yes. We have had to bring them up sometimes.
4267. And that practice was put a stop to by its being insisted upon that they should not go down? Yes, it was.
4268. And that was one of the most difficult things to prevent, for they were very fond of doing it? Yes, they were very fond of bathing. It was very difficult at first to prevent them going down, but they were stopped. They want decision—these girls; if you are decisive with them you can get them to do almost anything.
4269. If the bathing was prevented in that simple manner, do you think that everything else might be stopped as easily if determination were shown by the officers at the head of the establishment? Yes, I think so.
4270. Complaint has been made as to the girls who are servants to the officers dining at the officers' quarters? Yes.
4271. Is it your wish that the girls should dine at your quarters rather than at the mess-room with the rest of the girls? It is not my wish; I had sooner that they went down to their meals—I think that it is much better that they should; but they are allowed to carry their meals away.
4272. Mr. Cowper.] Were not Mr. Lucas's girls the first to be irregular in this manner? Yes.
4273. Was it not on that account that the girls of the officers got into this habit? Yes. They were not satisfied, and they said—"Why should Mr. Lucas's servants take their meals away, if we are not allowed to do so?"
4274. We have been told that the subordinate officers fail to support the matron as they should do? I can speak for myself, and I am sure that I have done all in my power to support Mr. and Mrs. Lucas and do good for the girls; and I believe that every one else has done the same.
4275. Have you been properly supported in your position by the officers over you? No, I have not.
4276. Can you give any instance in which you have not been? Well, I can give an instance in this way, that if I go to Mr. Lucas and make a complaint, he will call up the girls and they will tell their tale, and he will believe them instead of believing me. He will pay no attention to what I say; he will not punish or reprimand a girl; and so it goes on from bad to worse, until it is now dreadful to be there at all.
4277. President.] In what way? The girls are encouraged to run to Mr. and Mrs. Lucas with tales, and the girls tell them tales of the officers, and then Mr. and Mrs. Lucas scold the officers for the tales that they tell them.
4278. Scold the officers? Yes, scold whatever officer it happens to be.
4279. Has that ever happened to yourself? Yes. I can give you an instance of it. A girl went to the bath to have her hair attended to, and because Mrs. Brackenregg did not attend to her at once, as she was busy with some of the other girls at the time, the girl came and said that Mrs. Brackenregg would not attend to her, but was talking to Mr. Turner the constable; so Mr. Lucas went across to Mrs. Brackenregg and ordered her to look at the girl's head at once, and he said that she had no business to talk to Mr. Turner. But Mr. Turner had never been inside the institution at all, so she could not have been talking to him.
4280. Was it untrue then that she was talking to this person? Of course it was. Turner had not been inside the institution at all that morning, and Mrs. Brackenregg had not been anywhere but to get meat, and she had only been away from the bath a few minutes. She was never on the beach at all. That is an instance of the way in which we are treated. We cannot get on with the girls at all.
4281. When was this? On Saturday.
4282. On Saturday, the 9th June? Yes, on Saturday last.
4283. Was the girl present when Mr. Lucas reprimanded Mrs. Brackenregg in this way? Yes, she was.
4284. Have you ever seen a similar thing occur before—do you know of any other instances besides that one? I cannot remember any at the present time, but I know that there have been several instances of it, though I cannot bring them to my recollection just now.
4285. Mr. Cowper.] About October 1871, was it not of hourly occurrence that girls swore, used bad language, and were impertinent to the officers and to every one else who entered the institution? Yes.
4286. Did they refuse to take situations when they were offered them? Yes.
4287. Was it not almost impossible to get them to wear shoes and stockings? Yes, it was a great difficulty—we could not get them to wear them for a long time.
4288. Were they ever regular at muster or at meals? No, never.
4289. Did they not throw the bread about the dining-room, and at one another, and sometimes at the officers? Yes.
4290. Had they not their meals without knives or forks, tearing the meat to pieces with their fingers—and did not several girls drink out of one panikin? Yes; I remember that perfectly, for it was when I went to the institution. They had no knives and forks, and had only one panikin between two or three girls.
4291. And when mugs were got for them they used them and did not break them? Yes.
4292. Were not those mugs left in the store for some time, because it was said that it was no use giving them to the girls, as they would only break them? Yes.

- Mrs. M. A. 4293. In August, 1871, was not the institution in charge of a sergeant and two policemen? Yes.
 Dunn. 4294. Do you think that at that time it would have been possible for any number of matrons to keep the girls quiet at night? No.
 11 Aug., 1873. 4295. Even if they had been with them in the dormitories? I do not think so.
 4296. Would it have been safe for a matron to stop in the dormitories with them? No, it would not. I was at one time in a room next the dormitories, and I can assure you that I never got a bit of sleep the whole night long. It was dreadful.
 4297. Did they not at that time smash the iron bedsteads? Yes.
 4298. Did they not take the iron off the doors and burn the wood? Yes, they did.
 4299. Did they not tear up their clothes—their bedding and wearing apparel? Yes. They do that now sometimes.
 4300. And at that time it seemed impossible to prevent their doing so? Yes.
 4301. Did they not only smash all the windows of the institution, and break outside, but go down to the dock and break the windows there? Yes, they did.
 4302. Before two months were over, was there not an immense change for the better, and almost continual quiet restored? Yes, there was a great change in the two months, and they became very much quieter.
 4303. President.] To what did you attribute that change? I can scarcely remember what was the cause of the improvement. I think it was very likely because many of the biggest girls went out. There were a great many went out.
 4304. Mr. Cowper.] But even before they went out was not quiet restored? Yes, they did behave better.
 4305. Do you not think that the visits there of people from outside the institution, who came to teach them on Sundays, and to take notice of them on other days, had a beneficial effect? Yes, it had then, and it has now. It had a good effect at that time, and it has still.
 4306. Do you not think that the girls looked forward to the instruction that they were to get on Sundays—particularly to the singing and music—that the Roman Catholics especially enjoyed it? Yes, they did.
 4307. Do you not think that it had a soothing influence upon them, and softened their characters? Yes, I think it did.
 4308. Do you recollect the night on which the evening school was started? Yes.
 4309. Were you ever asked to take part in it? No, I was never asked; and I would never refuse to take part in it, provided that I had an hour or two in the day; but I could not do my own duties as well, because I was from 6 in the morning until 7 at night attending to my duties; and, of course, at 7 o'clock we have our tea to get when we go home, and we have only two hours in the day besides for breakfast and dinner. I could take part in it if I had a little time in the day, but not as it is now.
 4310. Were you not at that time thoroughly knocked up, owing to the insubordinate state of the institution? Yes, sometimes we were thoroughly tired out.
 4311. Do you recollect a certain evening, said to be the evening of Mr. Lucas's birthday, when there was an entertainment given to the girls? Yes, I do.
 4312. Who sang songs on that evening? Several of the girls, and Mr. Lucas.
 4313. Do you recollect a song in which these words occurred—
 "When I was young, I courted the cook—
 Most people thought I was silly;
 But I knew what I was about—
 It was all for the sake of my belly.
 Ri-to-rol-de-rol-de-ri-to, &c."?
 Yes, I do.
 4314. Who sang that song? Mr. Lucas.
 4315. Do you think that that was a sort of thing likely to elevate the girls? No, I thought it was a very improper song to sing.
 4316. Do you think it was calculated to give them proper notions as to how they should improve themselves and reform? No, I thought it was very improper.
 4317. Have you ever heard me at any time interfere in any way in the place, or give orders to any of the officers or children except through Mr. Lucas? I never did.
 4318. Did you ever know me to say or do anything likely to cause the people under Mr. Lucas to think less of him? No, never. I never did.
 4319. Have I not always said that you should rather try to gain for yourselves individual credit by making the institution a success? Yes.
 4320. And I advised you always accordingly? Yes; you always gave us advice to that effect.
 4321. Do you think that it is advisable to allow the girls, when they are once placed in that institution, to be returned to their parents? No, I think it is objectionable, because many of them are bad characters, and many of the girls will soon be on the streets again if they go to their parents, particularly if the parents reside in Sydney.
 4322. Do you not think that their being allowed to expect soon to be released to their parents has made some of the girls there very difficult to manage? Yes, they do get very bold and unmanageable when they expect to get home to their parents.
 4323. They do not settle down? No, not at all.
 4324. It is your opinion then that, when once the State has taken charge of these girls, they should not be kept in the institution at great expense to the Country, to be returned to the parents who have failed to manage them—to the parents who will probably let them go astray? No, I think it is much better for them to go to service.
 4325. To new people? Yes.
 4326. Among fresh faces? Yes. Some who have gone out are very good indeed, and they write letters to Mrs. Lucas and to some of the matrons, saying how comfortable they are, and that they are good, and mean to be good.
 4327. Have the girls ever told you that they are afraid to trust themselves amongst old associations? No, I have never heard them say that.
 4328. Do you recollect two girls getting out one night when there was evening school? Yes. Amelia J— and Charlotte H— got out over the wall. They have gone out since,—one to service, and the other to her father and mother. Amelia J— went up the country to service.
 4329. You recollect their getting out? Yes, perfectly.
 4330. Do you not think that if there had been a dormitory muster-roll, and the names had been called, they could not have got out without being missed? Yes; but I think that they got out while in the dining-room.
 4331.

4331. But could not the roll be called so as to prevent such a thing? Yes, I think that it would be much better than only counting them as they do now. We should miss them at once if the roll were called. At present Mr. Lucas counts them at muster, and we count them into the dormitories.

Mrs. M. A.
Dunn.

4332. But you did not miss those girls on that night? No, we did not.

11 Aug., 1873.

4333. If there had been a muster-roll called at the dormitories these girls would have been missed? Yes, of course they would. There is no muster-roll called at all.

4334. Have you a bell to call the children to their meals? No, we have no bell. We have to run about the place and collect them, and we never have them all at meals together.

4335. The children do not attend regularly? No; there is no bell to call them, and we have to send a girl after them, and then we have to go ourselves, and it is the same at meals as at muster.

4336. Do I understand you to say that they do not all sit down together and rise together at meals? No, they do not.

4337. They come and go as they like? Yes.

4338. Mr. Metcalfe.] Who sits with them? No one. We walk up and down the room and keep order.

4339. Do you not think that the master and mistress as well as yourselves should sit with them? I would not like that myself.

4340. Mr. Ellis.] You turn them into the place to feed like a lot of pigs, in fact? I should not like to sit down with them. I think that we can keep much better order by walking up and down the room.

4341. But do you have a cane when you are walking up and down? We have not got a cane at present.

4342. But have you a cane when you go into the dining-room to keep order? Yes, sometimes. We have a cane sometimes, but we have none now. I do not think that there is a cane in the place at all.

4343. What has become of it? I do not know. Sometimes the girls destroy the canes. We have a little one in the sewing-room.

4344. You say that the cane is the only punishment that they dread? Yes, it is the only thing.

4345. Do you administer it frequently? No, not very.

4346. How often in the day? Sometimes I never use it at all in the day, and sometimes I use it three or four times.

4347. Has every matron in the establishment got a cane? No.

4348. Is every matron at liberty to use the cane if she thinks proper to do so? Yes.

4349. Do they all use it? Yes, sometimes they do.

4350. What is the size of the cane? About the thickness of my finger.

4351. And you think that the only way to keep them in order is to cane them? No, I do not say that is the only way.

4352. You have stated so in your evidence? I have used moral influence as well.

4353. Is there any moral influence used in the place? Yes; not so much as there should be.

4354. The cane is the most moralizing influence that you have? We have no canes at present. I have not seen one on the place for the last fortnight.

4355. What has become of them? I do not know what has become of them.

4356. Do the girls steal them and burn them? Yes, they do that very frequently.

4357. Mr. Cowper.] Do the girls steal now? Yes.

4358. Do they use bad language? Yes, they do indeed.

4359. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do any clergymen ever go to see them? Do you mean the Protestants?

4360. Yes? Yes; Mr. Langley comes occasionally, and three Sunday-school teachers come over and talk to the girls.

4361. Are they young men? Yes, two are young men, and one is an elderly gentleman. He can preach a nice sermon to them too; but on Sunday week they behaved themselves badly, and he got angry, and said he would put on his hat and walk out.

4362. Mr. Cowper.] What were they doing? Laughing and talking. They would not behave themselves.

4363. President.] Have you ever been aware of differences between Mr. and Mrs. Lucas, arising out of the management of the institution? Yes.

4364. Disputes? Yes, I have heard them dispute.

4365. Before the children ever? Yes.

4366. What kind of disputes were they? Well, Mr. Lucas and Mrs. Lucas sometimes have disputes about the school, and if a girl misbehaves herself, and Mr. Lucas will not punish her, Mrs. Lucas insists upon it, and then they have high words.

4367. Before the children? Yes, and the officers too.

4368. Did you ever see the keys thrown by Mrs. Lucas to Mr. Lucas, and hear her tell him to manage the place himself? Yes, I have seen that twice.

4369. Were the children present? Yes, they were on one occasion. The first time there was a good many girls there, and the second time there was only a few.

4370. Tell us what took place? The dispute was about Mary Coghlan, I think. I was away part of the time, and did not see the beginning of it, but I came down and Mr. and Mrs. Lucas were disputing about putting the girl down in the cells. Mrs. Lucas insisted on his doing it, and he would not; and she threw the keys down and said she would not do any more in the institution, and she went away out of the yard.

4371. Was this done in an excited way? Yes, she was in a very excited state.

4372. Is that usually her manner when she loses her temper? Yes.

4373. And you say that the children were present and saw this exhibition of temper? Yes.

4374. Mr. Ellis.] You said just now something about—"when you went home of an evening"—what did you mean? When we go to our quarters in the evening.

4375. Are not your quarters within the enclosure on the island? Yes, they are close to the institution.

4376. Do the children of any of the officers associate in any way with the children who are put on the island? No. Do I understand you to say the officers' children?

4377. Yes. Do the children of the officers in any way associate with the children of the Industrial School? No, not at all.

4378. How are they kept separate? They never go down to the institution. They are up at the officers' quarters.

4379. But I understand you to say that they are all in the enclosure? You mean inside the fence?

4380. Yes? Yes; but the children go to school, and my two girls are grown up and they never go to the institution. If they go out at all they go outside the fence.

4381. Do they never walk about inside the fence? No, never.

4382. Do none of the officers' children? None.

4383.

- Mrs. M. A. 4383. If they want an airing they go outside the fence? Yes.
 Dunn. 4384. Mr. Cowper.] But do not your children mix with Mr. Lucas's children? Yes.
 4385. And with the servants of the officers? Yes, they do. I did not understand.
 11 Aug., 1873. 4386. And they speak to them sometimes, and may meet them about the place? Yes.
 4387. Mr. Ellis.] You said just now that Mr. Lucas sang a song on the occasion of his birthday? Yes.
 4388. Where was he when he sang this song? In the dining-room with the girls. He gave them a treat on the occasion.
 4389. Were the matrons present? Yes.
 4390. Did they sing? I do not remember any of them singing.
 4391. Was the singing confined to Mr. Lucas? Yes. There were some of the girls who sang some songs too.
 4392. What kind of songs did they sing? Hymns, and things of that sort.
 4393. Did they sing hymns as a set off to that little matter of Mr. Lucas's about the cook? That was the wind-up of the entertainment.
 4394. Was Mrs. Lucas present? Yes.
 4395. Did any one else sing? I think that my girls and Mrs. Lucas's girls sang.
 4396. It was a family entertainment? Yes; it was an entertainment given to the girls, and they all joined in and sang to please the girls.
 4397. Were the majority of the songs hymns? I really cannot tell you that.
 4398. Or were they mixed up together in unreasonable proportions? No; I think that they sang a few hymns first and then two or three songs.
 4399. Are the girls addicted to singing hymns? Yes, they do sing them frequently.
 4400. At what time? When they are doing their work during the day.
 4401. Do they sing bad songs too? Yes, they do frequently.
 4402. Which do they sing most frequently—the hymns or the bad songs? The bad songs most frequently, but we do not allow them to sing them; if we are within hearing, of course we make them leave it off.
 4403. How long did that entertainment last at which the hymns and songs were indulged in? From about 5 o'clock in the evening until 9—they stayed out until 9.
 4404. Were all hands singing from 6 o'clock until 9? No, they were not all singing.
 4405. I mean those who were gifted with voices? No, not all. The girls were playing in the yard part of the time.
 4406. Do you remember some time ago when a number of girls were diseased? Yes, there was some disease amongst them since I have been there.
 4407. How many of them were suffering from that disease? I do not remember more than two or three at the same time, but I cannot say—I have so little to do with those elder girls.
 4408. Was there not some dispute about the disease getting from the "Vernon" to the island? Yes. I did not understand you—I thought that you meant something else.
 4409. On that occasion how many of the girls were sick? Nearly the whole school was sick—fifty or sixty of the girls.
 4410. From that disease, whatever it was? Yes.
 4411. Mr. Metcalfe.] It was the itch, was it not? Yes.
 4412. Mr. Ellis.] Where do you think that the disease came from? I think it came from the "Vernon." The fact is that the "Vernon" washing was done on the island at the time, and the laundress remarked that some of the clothes—the backs of the shirts—were all over the ointment that they used in that disease, and the laundry girls got it first on their fingers.
 4413. That was how you came to infer that the disease came from the "Vernon"? Yes, that was what Mrs. Lucas thought brought it there.
 4414. We were shown a small library of books intended for the use of the children: are those books ever given to them on week-days? No, never, but on Sundays.
 4415. Why are they not given to them on other days? I do not know. Mrs. Lucas takes charge of the books, and she distributes them whenever she thinks proper.
 4416. Have you heard any reason assigned for not giving out these books on week-days? No—except that the children tear them.
 4417. And would they not be as likely to tear them on Sundays as on week-days? I think so.
 4418. They get no books at all on week-days—they only get them on Sundays? Yes.
 4419. Mr. Metcalfe.] Have they any opportunity of reading on any other day but Sunday? Yes, they have plenty of time, but there is no room for them to read in.
 4420. Mr. Ellis.] You stated in your evidence the other evening, that the girls were guilty of practices, both by day and night, which were too disgraceful to describe? Yes, they are too bad to describe.
 4421. There is nothing too bad to be described, although it may be unpleasant to describe it—I should like to know what it is? I cannot tell you.
 4422. President.] You mean that there are unnatural sexual practices, do you not? Yes.
 4423. Mr. Cowper.] Could you not write it? I could not.
 4424. Mr. Ellis.] Why can you not tell us now what it is? I cannot describe it. I think that any one can understand what is meant.
 4425. These things happen in the day-time? Yes, in the day-time.
 4426. You have seen it in the day-time? Yes.
 4427. Where did you see it? Near the gate.
 4428. Were there many of the girls present? There were only three girls there.
 4429. How long ago is it since you saw this? About two or three months ago. I could not say the time exactly.
 4430. Did you report it then? I told Mrs. Lucas about it.
 4431. Was that the only occasion on which you noticed such a thing? That was the only time I ever noticed it.
 4432. Did you ever hear of other people complaining about similar practices being carried on upon the island? Yes, I have heard Mrs. Rowland speak of it.
 4433. Do you believe that these practices still prevail in the institution? I cannot say for certain, but I have heard Mrs. Rowland say that they do. This was the only occasion on which I ever saw anything of the kind.

4434. Mr. Goold.] What action did Mrs. Lucas take when you told her of this? She talked to the girls about it,—that was all.
4435. They were not punished then? No, they were not.
4436. Do you think that they should have been? Yes, I do think so, decidedly.
4437. Mr. Ellis.] Were these girls not punished at all? No, they were not punished. It was on a Sunday morning after they had come out from prayers. I cannot tell you the date, as I have never kept dates. I saw the thing myself, and I was very much shocked.
4438. What age were the girls? Two were about twelve years of age, and the other was about fourteen.
4439. Were there any other girls present? No, none.
4440. How did these three girls get away from the others? Oh, they all run about the island, you know. They are not confined to one place. There is no place to put them in,—that's what I say. We want a play-ground to keep them in where an officer could be with them.
4441. President.] Were all three of these girls consenting parties? Yes.
4442. Mr. Ellis.] Did you ever speak to them yourself? Yes, I did. I talked to them for a long time.
4443. What did they say? They did not say much; they were ashamed of it.
4444. You believe that the same bad practices still prevail on the island? I believe they do, as far as I can learn, but I have not seen them.
4445. Do you know how the girls are apprenticed from there? No, I do not.
4446. President.] Did you ever see any of the children with a black eye? Yes, I have.
4447. Did you know how the girl got the black eye? I was told it was caused by Mr. Lucas beating her.
4448. Do you know the name of the girl? Yes; Henrietta M—.
4449. It was said Mr. Lucas gave it to her? Yes, I heard so.
4450. Was that the report that was current on the island at the time? Yes.
4451. You know nothing personally of the matter? No; I only know what I was told. It was said that the girl was interfering with Mr. Prior, and that Mr. Lucas beat her and gave her a black eye.
4452. Do you know anything of a fight with a girl in which Mr. and Mrs. Lucas were involved? Yes; that is the time I was speaking about when Mrs. Lucas threw down the keys; it was about Mary C—.
4453. Did you see that? No, I only saw the last part of it. I was there when Mrs. Lucas threw the keys down. It was Mary C—. I did not see the beating of the girl. I was not present then, and did not see that.
4454. Who told you of it? I cannot say whether it was Mrs. Rowland or Mrs. Brackenregg. I do not remember.
4455. You were told about the time it happened? Yes.
4456. Do you know whether the girl was bleeding? I do not.
4457. Do you know a girl named Lizzie L—? Yes.
4458. Do you know whether she was ever beaten? Yes, she was, one Sunday morning.
4459. By whom? I cannot say whether it was by Mr. or Mrs. Lucas.
4460. Was she marked? Yes; she had a black eye.
4461. Mr. Cowper.] She was one of the quietest girls in the school? Yes, she was.
4462. She would obey any order? Yes.
4463. Do you know what she was beaten for? No, I do not.
4464. President.] Do you know a girl named Ellen S—? Yes; she is a little girl—a young girl.
4465. Do you know anything of her having been knocked about? No, I do not.
4466. Did you hear anything of it? I heard Mrs. Rowland say that she had been.
4467. Mr. Cowper.] At the time it was done? Yes.
4468. President.] It was spoken of as a thing that had just occurred on the place? Yes.
4469. What did you hear about it? That Mrs. Lucas had pulled the girl's hair, and pulled some of it out—I think she said.
4470. Mr. Ellis.] Reference has been made to some amusements provided for the girls at night? Yes.
4471. Did you say that those amusements were given up because the girls got tired of them? I cannot say. I was never there.
4472. Do you think it is likely that the girls would get tired of a little amusement? I think that they got tired of it because, instead of being amused, their dresses were taken in there to be made and repaired, and they did not care for that.
4473. But you would not call that amusement? I do not; and I think that is why they got tired of it. I have heard it said.
4474. What was called amusement was work, and that was why the girls got tired of it? Yes, that is what I think; I would not say for a certainty, for I really do not know,—but I have heard it said.
4475. Did you ever go down to the wards after the girls were shut up at night? Yes; I have gone down when Mrs. Rowland has been absent, to put out the lights.
4476. Did you ever hear the girls singing bad songs? Yes.
4477. After they have been locked up at night? Yes.
4478. After they have said their night prayers? Yes.
4479. Did you ever hear of their being punished for doing so? No, never.
4480. President.] Do you recollect anything taking place on the 21st of last month, or lately, between you or Mrs. Rowland and Mr. Lucas—do you recollect Mr. Lucas saying, "If I lose my place I will drag every one of you out with me"? Yes; he said that to me. He said it to me on the 21st July. He said that if he went out he would drag the whole of us with him.
4481. How did he come to say that? It was a simple thing. Mrs. Brackenregg had no bread, and as long as I have been in the kitchen I have been in the habit of lending a loaf to any officer who wants one, and they return it to me next day. Mrs. Lucas has had bread in that way herself. Mrs. Brackenregg sent to me and asked if I would lend her a loaf of bread, as it was wet and the boys could not get it from town. I had not the bread in the kitchen, so I sent a girl across to the store to Mr. Prior to tell him to give her a loaf, and to make one short in the next day's bread. Mrs. Lucas was in the dining-room, and she saw the girl going, and so she called her and asked her what I was saying to her. The girl told her, and she let her go for the bread, but followed her to the store, and when she got the loaf she took it from her; and then Mr. Lucas came and told me he would not allow me to do such a thing. I said I had often done it before—that Mrs. Lucas had had bread just in the same way as the others—that I always lent a loaf when it was wanted, and always got it back again. I said I did not see any harm in it. And then

- then he went on at a great length, and he told me that what I have said,—“If I go out of the institution I will drag every one of you with me.”
4482. Were the girls present? They were present. It was at breakfast-time. He said too, that I had committed a theft by taking that bread.
4483. Did he say that before the inmates of the school? Yes; he said that I had committed a theft by doing it—a thing that I have done in his presence and in Mrs. Lucas's presence; and Mrs. Lucas has done the same.
4484. That is, when an officer's private supply of bread is short, they borrow a loaf from the institution? Yes, and pay me back the next day. It is not like a place where we could send out and get bread whenever we were short. We have no means there of getting a loaf except by sending to Sydney for it.
4485. And Mrs. Lucas has had the same privilege as the other officers? Yes, quite the same.
4486. In what way was it said that you had been guilty of a theft? Mr. Lucas said that I had no authority to do it, and I said—“Mrs. Lucas has had a loaf of bread, and all the officers have had it, and I did not know that I was doing any harm this morning any more than any other morning”; and he said—“You have committed a theft by doing it, and if I go out of the place I will drag you all with me.”
4487. Mr. Goold.] This was last month? Yes, the 21st of last month. I remember that because I was very much hurt about it.
4488. President.] The children were present? Yes.
4489. Mr. Cowper.] Do you not think it is injudicious to have the superintendent and matron man and wife? I do. I think that the institution would be managed much better if they were not man and wife.
4490. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you think there should be a master there at all? Yes; I think that there requires to be a man there.
4491. President.] Is there anything else that you would like to state yourself? No, I do not think so.

EYRE G. ELLIS, Esq.
SAMUEL GOOLD, Esq.

MICHAEL METCALFE, Esq.
CHARLES COWPER, JUN., Esq.

Mrs. Harriet Austin, laundress, Industrial School, Biloela, called in and examined:—

- Mrs. H. Austin.
12 Aug., 1873.
4492. President.] What position do you occupy in the Industrial School? I am the laundress.
4493. What salary do you get? £30.
4494. How long have you been there? I think going on for two years, but I do not know.
4495. You have no other duties, I suppose, except to look after the laundry? No.
4496. Are the girls all sent to you to wash, and to be taught washing and ironing, and the other duties of a laundress? Yes, all the girls fit to come to the laundry come. I generally have the big girls.
4497. Do they come in turns? Yes.
4498. A different set of girls every week? Yes; a different set every week. They are three weeks off and one week on.
4499. How many pieces do you wash in the week? A great many—there is a great number in it—I think about 1,200 dozen or more some weeks.
4500. 1,200 dozen? Yes, between the matron's clothes and all.
4501. You mean 1,200 pieces? No, 1,200 dozen.
4502. How many have you done this week? Well, up to to-day, I got the girls to work well this morning, so as to get finished up, and it is forty-six dozen up to to-day.
4503. Well, if you do forty-six dozen in that time, how many do you do in a week? About 1,200 dozen.
4504. You must be wrong—1,200 pieces you must mean? Oh no.
4505. Do you do as much as forty-six dozen every day? Not every day—in the summer we might, but not in the winter season.
4506. You begin to wash on Monday? Yes.
4507. And when do you finish? On Friday.
4508. How many dozen do you do a day? I never counted that. I always do whatever comes in.
4509. You have done forty-six dozen to-day? Yes.
4510. And that is rather more than the usual number? No, it is not.
4511. Mr. Cowper.] Is that not more than there used to be? Yes, a good many more.
4512. Mr. Metcalfe.] How many persons do you wash for altogether? Eighty-seven girls, and then there are the matron's children, and I think there are over twenty of them.
4513. And that is all? Yes.
4514. That will be 107 persons altogether? Yes.
4515. How many pieces a day do they each have, do you think? I cannot say how many a day.
4516. Well—a week? Some of the matrons may have five dozen or six dozen a week, and some of them have less.
4517. President.] That is including the children? Yes.
4518. That would not make 1,200 dozen a week? Yes, that is what we do.
4519. Mr. Metcalfe.] But the children are included in the 107 persons—you must be mistaken in your reckoning? Well, perhaps I am. It is a great number I know.
4520. Well, make it up, and put it in your evidence afterwards? Yes. 1,712 pieces, the “Vernon” included.
4521. President.] Do you find that the girls know anything of this work when they come to you? Some of them do—some get situations and go away, and then there are fresh girls.
4522. Do you find that they are ignorant of the work when they come in? Some of them.
4523. The biggest or the youngest? The youngest, of course; the big girls have a good knowledge of washing or ironing when they come in—some of them.

Mrs.
H. Austin.

12 Aug., 1873.

4524. Do they show any indisposition to learn when they come to you? No, some of them are anxious to learn and get out to situations—the big girls; I always tell them that, if they know how to wash and iron, they will do better for themselves. They are with me for a week every month, and of course they learn to do other work in the other three weeks.

4525. Then do most of the girls when they leave the island know how to do the work of the laundry? Yes—not all, for there are some little ones who go to situations, and they would not be fit to go into the laundry and wash and iron; but the bigger girls do the ironing, and the little ones iron small articles.

4526. Do you have any trouble in managing the girls? No, I have never had any trouble there with the girls, though I have always had the wildest ones; the biggest girls, of course, always come to me.

4527. Do you find that those who are under your control are addicted to bad language? No; they may use it outside, but not with me.

4528. For how long during the day are they kept at this work? On some days I keep them until tea-time.

4529. From what time in the morning? From 7 o'clock, it may be, or half-past 7; in the summer mornings the girls are as anxious to commence early as I am myself, to get from the heat of the day.

4530. How many girls have you at a time? Six. Then there are some mangling, and some ironing, and some washing. Sometimes it was very hard on the girls last summer, for it was all ironing.

4531. How was that? We had not got a mangle, and there was all the print dresses to starch and iron. We do not have any shirts certainly, except from Mr. Lucas and Mr. Prior, and except the children's shirts, and we do not count them much.

4532. The girls are taught to iron shirts? Yes. The small girls iron small things, and the big girls the large ones.

4533. You have had no trouble in getting your orders carried out? No. The girls might be a little troublesome sometimes when a ship is in—they may run away from me now and again, but I would always get them back soon again.

4534. When a ship is in dock? Yes.

4535. For how long would they be away? Oh, for sometimes an hour or so. I used to go after them, but I found it was better to stop and mind those I had left, and the others would soon come back.

4536. Where did they go to? Just to the wall where they could get sight of the dock. When I would check the girls for running away to look over at the ship they would say—"Why do you check us—the matrons do it, and why do you find fault with us?" and I saw the matrons doing it, so that I could not say much to the girls for doing it.

4537. Did you see the matrons doing it? Yes, I did see them waving to the ship, and so I could not blame the girls for doing the same.

4538. Did Mr. Lucas see them? I do not know whether Mr. Lucas saw them or not, but I think that I did remark it to Mr. Cowper once—A good many friends would ask me how the girls got on, and how I liked the place, and I have always said that it would be easy to manage the girls if there were good matrons over them, but not matrons who would stand and wave to the officers or sailors, I don't know which, on the ships. I live on the other side of the island, in a small little cottage near Mr. Cowper's gate, and I could see them every Sunday and on every other day waving to the ship and to the steamer too. I stop in the institution all day, and do not get home until evening. I never take a breakfast-hour or dinner-hour at all. But in my place there I am very lonely, for I had not my children with me; so in July I had my children down, for it is not very nice being up there near to the sailors, and with the sailors going about, though they never speak to me—they have never minded me at all.

4539. On what occasions have you seen this waving to the officers? On many occasions, so that you see I could not say so much to the girls.

4540. How many times have you seen it? I cannot say. Whenever there was a ship in. There is a ship in at present, but it is a French ship, and I don't expect that the girls understand them, so that I shall not have very much trouble. I have never made any remark to Mr. Lucas about the matrons.

4541. Were the matrons all together when this waving took place? Not all—they did not all be there together at one time. Very likely when Mr. Lucas would have the matrons to muster up the girls, they would go and wave to the officers. There is no bell to call the girls together, and so they have to collect them the best way they can.

4542. Have you ever seen quarrels amongst the officers on the island? No never. I am never much from the laundry, so I have no opportunity—

4543. The laundry is away from the building? Yes, it is down on the point, and the clothes come from the institution down to the laundry by the laundry girls.

4544. Mr. Metcalfe.] You think that the conduct of the matrons is not such as is likely to improve the girls? I do not think so, and I never did from the first week I went there; and I am there two years.

4545. And you think that with different kind of women there the girls would do better? Yes, I think so.

4546. What is it you see that is blamable? I think that it is not very nice for the matrons over these girls to be waving to the officers. These girls often get punished for that, and the matrons would do the same thing themselves. They would wave to the officers, and of course the girls would do the same to the other men; and on the steamer the same way. I can always see the steamer passing the laundry, and I have seen the matrons waving to both the steamer and the ship. I have often told Mr. Lucas about the girls doing it, but I have never spoken about the matrons to him, because I thought that they knew better.

4547. You say that the girls behave well? Yes.

4548. And you think that under a different supervision they would behave better? Yes, I am sure of it, because I have had nice letters from the girls who have gone out, and they are doing very well.

4549. You see nothing of them after they have done their work with you? No, not till the next day. They go to breakfast and dinner, and then just clean themselves for the evening, and I go away, and they go to their tea.

4550. Do you mean your remarks to apply to all the matrons? No, only two.

4551. Only two? Only two; and this is another thing I remarked when Mr. Cane went away and this other storekeeper came. Soon after he came I was going to tea, and I saw one of the matrons take and push another into the office and lock him in, before all the girls, and then run to the window and look in. Mr. Lucas was in Sydney, but I do not know whether Mrs. Lucas was present or not.

4552. Mr. Ellis.] Who were the two matrons? Mrs. Rowland and Mrs. Brackenregg. Of course it was only play; but it was no place to do it before these girls, who were sent in there to be reformed.

- Mrs. H. Austin.
12 Aug., 1873.
4553. Mr. Metcalfe.] Do you think that the girls are improved on the island, either in their morals or their manners? I think so. I will not say much as to their manners—in their morals I think they are.
4554. In what way are they improved? They are quieter. I do not hear any noises among them now. When I first went there, they were noisy and used to sing out to people passing.
4555. Do you think that they are attentive to school? Yes, I think so. I see a great number going to school.
4556. This remark applies generally? Yes; all the girls go to school—except the laundry girls—some part of the day. The laundry girls do not come into the laundry only for one week, and when they get changed to other work they go to school in the afternoon. When they are in the laundry I cannot spare them.
4557. You have been in the school nearly as long as the other people? Yes, I think so. They were not more than three months before me. They went in May I think, and I went in November.
4558. Mr. Couper.] Do you not think that when you first went there, some of the girls were as bad as any girls could possibly be? Yes, I think so. I thought they were very bad when I went there first, but I suppose from being so long amongst them I do not think them so bad now. I certainly do think that they are a great deal better than when I went there first; but there are not many big girls there now—they have been hired out.
