(a) If so, by what measure?

Answer—

The Department of Education's Centre for Education Statistics and Evaluation conducted the evaluation of the implementation of Connected Communities in 15 schools from 2013 to 2017.

The evaluation noted that Connected Communities has had a positive impact in schools, particularly in outcomes for students in their early years. Connected Communities represents a sound policy approach that has the potential to provide further positive outcomes for students and communities, given more time.

The report's key findings are that:

- the strategy has had a positive impact in schools, particularly at the primary level with younger school children who were exposed to the strategy for their whole period at school
- the effects of disadvantage in these extremely disadvantaged communities has a particularly strong impact on student attendance and engagement
- there is moderate evidence to suggest that the strategy had a positive effect on Year 3 NAPLAN outcomes, but to date, little evidence for positive effects on NAPLAN outcomes in older years
- the focus on the early years of schooling appears to have a positive impact on students' developmental readiness
- there is strong evidence that student attendance increased for primary school students, following the introduction of strategy
- overall, school staff reported more linkages with services, particularly health services

- most school staff and communities support the strategy and feel that it is benefitting their schools overall
- the focus on culture is having positive effects on the school environment
- there is significant variation in outcomes between schools where the strategy is being implemented, which may be due to contextual factors such as location and availability of services.

Findings from the NSW Ombudsman's 2019 OCHRE Review Report: (Page 191)

Overall, the evidence indicates that Connected Communities is making a positive difference to the lives of students and their families at participating schools. There is not yet strong evidence of substantial improvements against several of the key deliverables (including improved school attendance, NAPLAN results for students in older years and increased retention of Aboriginal students). However, like CESE, we have reached a view that Connected Communities is 'showing promising results'. In particular, schools have made a range of important changes that, while not straightforward to measure, are essential to creating the necessary foundation for more tangible outcomes to be achieved in future. We have been impressed by the dedication of staff and the involvement of local community people in the participating schools, and we are pleased to be able to profile a sample of their efforts in this chapter. We support Education giving consideration to extending Connected Communities in the existing 15 schools and potentially to other sites.
