Questions on Notice

NSW Minerals Council

1. Are there many group apprenticeship schemes out there where an apprentice can work for a range of different companies? Obviously, the smaller the company, the more specialised the task. But if you want an apprentice to have a good embodiment of different aspects of their trade, then you really want them to move to different employers but under a group apprenticeship scheme.
2. Speaking of benchmarking against different States, are there aspects of similar programs that exist in other States that we could potentially learn lessons from or that we could adapt in improving these two funds that we're talking about? In terms of training schemes and in terms of other aspects of job creation, perhaps retraining people who may have experienced workplace injuries and can no longer continue to work in that particular role. In terms of those types of aspects of programs that may exist in other States, is there anything we can borrow from?

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY COMMITTEE ON INVESTMENT, INDUSTRY AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

INQUIRY INTO THE PERFORMANCE OF THE REGIONAL INVESTMENT ACTIVATION FUND AND THE REGIONAL JOB CREATION FUND

Friday 8 December 2023

Question:

Mr STEPHEN BALL: Are there many group apprenticeship schemes out there where an apprentice can work for a range of different companies? Obviously, the smaller the company, the more specialised the task. But if you want an apprentice to have a good embodiment of different aspects of their trade, then you really want them to move to different employers but under a group apprenticeship scheme.

Response:

Group Training Organisations (GTOs) employ apprentices and trainees and place them with host employers, while also providing any additional support to ensure that apprentices complete their training contract. Many GTOs rotate apprentices among host employers to enhance the quality and range of their experience. A number of NSW Minerals Council member companies source their apprentices through GTOs, working collaboratively to nurture a pipeline of skilled tradespeople entering the mining workforce.

Question:

Speaking of benchmarking against different States, are there aspects of similar programs that exist in other States that we could potentially learn lessons from or that we could adapt in improving these two funds that we're talking about?

Ms CHARISHMA KALIYANDA: In some ways. I think, again, it tended very heavily towards the planning issues that you've identified in your submission. I was more trying to understand, for example, in terms of training schemes and in terms of other aspects of job creation, perhaps retraining people who may have experienced workplace injuries and can no longer continue to work in that particular role. In terms of those types of aspects of programs that may exist in other States, is there anything we can borrow from?

Response:

The Australian mining industry places a priority on our people and investing in skills and knowledge to provide opportunities in the minerals workforce of the future.

There are an extensive range of proactive programs undertaken by the relevant State based mining representative bodies, as well as the Minerals Council of Australia, that are designed to attract and retain people in the mining workforce.

In addition the mining companies themselves offer various employment programs to attract people to the mining industry. The attached website has links to over 70 different mining related companies' employment webpages. Recruitment Websites – Australian Mining Careers. These companies offer a range of programs including graduate programs, traineeships, apprentices, experienced employees, as well as retraining opportunities within the companies themselves. There are also other employment service providers for the mining industry that offer employment opportunities. For example, Blackrock Industries - The Second Chance for Change (SCFC) Project - aims to provide Indigenous incarcerated men the opportunity to engage in long term, stable employment opportunities which in the long run will help with reducing recidivism rates. Eligible participants are offered both pre and post-employment servicing, training and mentoring¹.

There are also a range of Government initiatives at both the Australian and State levels that offer transition programs for employment. The following links to the relevant Government sites offer further information.
