Re: Changing the definition of the marriage act

Dear Sir/Madam,

I feel marriage is an important institution in our society. It provides the most stable environment for children. As a society we ought to do all we can to ensure we nurture the next generation.

I feel marriage has and always has been, set out as a very important bond to stabilize family relationships. The reasons are clear for this. The necessity of a man and women being in this bond and under the commitment to each other is important for humanity at large. The future depends on the children of today. The examples set out by the parents, leads to what society will be tomorrow.

I feel changing the definition of marriage would be a great mistake. If same-sex couples are wanting to bond together, it is up to them. No one is stopping them. But the marriage act is a protection, a statement, a bond and commitment between a man and a women - no one else. Without critizing or ostisizing same sex couples, the marriage act should stay as it is to protect our family values and society. A society where since the beginning of creation, a man and women must come together to love, protect and propogate human kind.

Sincerely
