Marriage between men and women is a universal feature in all cultures historically and anthropologically. To redefine the meaning of marriage by expanding its definition to include homosexual people, undermines this historic and anthropological understanding which has been the foundation of almost every culture since civilisation began. There will always be exceptions to the "norm" in every culture, but I wonder, what are the consequences to society of normalising and legitimising every minority group that lobbies noisily and persistently enough to demand equal rights"?
