I believe that anyone should have the right to be married, with or without the church involved.
I've grown up with a gay uncle that currently lives overseas. While being in his presence I have not felt anything different from him compared to my married uncle who has a daughter.
One of my family's close friend has also announced his sexuality towards other males. With knowing his sexuality has not changed mine or anyone else's view on him.
People who are so against the marriage of two people of the same sex are just too scared to face anything other than the norm.

Sexuality doesn't change a person from who they are, they are still human, still hurt, still love, still cry, still feel the exact same as a straight person.

I myself am not gay, I'm very much in love with my girlfriend and plan to marry her shortly. I just don't see why people who love the same sex have to go to the limited places that allow gay marriage to feel the exact same feeling I will feel shortly when I can marry the one person I love.

I think Gay marriage should be allowed in N.S.W and all over the world.
Who are we to control another's life? We are all the same, sexuality doesn't make them any less of a person than the straight person next to them.
