The family is a natural concept. For millenia nature has provided that a man and a woman through their complementary reproductive systems give rise to new human life. Nature also provides nuturing on the part of the mother and the father for these new human lives. This nuturing is again complementary: the mother provides a nuturing which is distinct from that of the father. A happy child is dependent on both types of nuturing.

The family as nature has presented it to us is critical to the health of the communities and wider societies in which it participates.

To change the concept of family to that which some legislators in NSW are proposing will turn the concept of the family on its head and will place future communities and socities in danger of collapse.
