Marriage between a man and a woman has been the foundation of society for so long it is easy to forget its value. It is the place in which children, for their wellbeing, are born and nurtured by two different people who bring different strengths inherent in their different genders as much as their different personalities. It is the place where a man and woman complement each other by their differences, for the wellbeing of each other. To change this is to change the fabric of society. To change this because it discriminates is no reason at all. Good discrimination happens everywhere. Parents discriminate what is appropriate for their children to watch on television. Teachers discriminate aspects of the curriculum in order to teach to their students' ability. Marriage must be safeguarded and kept distinct by being exclusively for a man and woman.
