A museum in Western Sydney could be an asset to those cultural aficionados identified by a thorough market research as future visitors to such a location. Sydney, now a major city on the world stage, has grown enough to accommodate an additional museum. But, if it were the only one, this would limit access of visitors from country areas, overseas tourists who concentrate their excursions in the Harbour area and others eg the elderly, or people with disabilities, who have difficulty in travelling far. The Powerhouse should not be demolished and should remain in its current location. Enough historical city buildings have been demolished and ugly boxes built in their place. High rise apartments can be built in Parramatta. It also has desirable feng shui.
