This is not the solution for a 21st century city nor state that builds itself as future thinking. No where in the world has building more roads meant less traffic. We're going to become worse than Los Angeles.

The inner city is a unique place that holds out past and our future together nicely and you're going to ruin in to bring people in via cars so that all our history and neighbourhoods are lost to freeways and McApartments. Melbourne has successfully kept its inner city without the need for express ways running through it less people I realise but realistic in building for a future population.

Funds should be spent on infrastructure rather than roads with tolls that bring more traffic than required. We're a large city and the car and roads can not be the solution. This goes beyond just the inner west and western suburbs and I don't believe enough consultation was undertaken to make this the best and most viable option.
