I refer to changes in the regulations and believe that the terms of references are far too broad and can be interpreted in many different ways.

Also I have a legally owned firearms with a muzzle compensator. If I wish to make one with differing position of the escape holes, I would be in breach of the revised legislation. Also I have tools in my garage that have nothing to do directly with a firearm but could be interpreted by a local police person as being a precursor. These sorts of changes should be made with advice of the experts in gunsmithing etc, not by persons who probably have never even owned a firearms.
