Well done Mark Latham for introducing millions of Australian parents to the wonderful democratic ability to have a real say in the way their children ought to be taught.

Most no doubt feel their kids are being taught through another dimension or totally unfamiliar methods. Methods that their kids cannot even decipher for their parents.

Many hard working parents wouldn't know that most children are getting through their school years under indoctrination principles set out by the left leaning teaching curriculum. Where are the unbiased fact finding missions of the past where a teacher would ask the student to research a topic and then be marked on the depth and contents of the work, regardless of its political leanings?

My kids of primary school age have at times spoken about how a particular politician is 'really bad'. I then asked them why and who told them that? They then stumble through some type of odd explanation that their teacher told them. I don't think I need to explain which party the teacher isn't fond of in this submission. There's no other system but indoctrination to explain these actions.

Why is mediocrity celebrated? Why are there activities run by external sources at the school who have staff with inexperienced and questionable teaching abilities?

Why are there teachers given the task of demonstrating a sport or activity that have never participated in that sport?
