It has come to my attention that greed, misrepresentation of information, lack of compassion for thy neighbour and complete disregard for our natural environment is running rampant on the Murray-Darling Basin. Flood water harvesting is crippling our native landscape, putting undue stress on the mental health of proud Australian's and impacting our Aboriginal communities and their individual connections to traditional ways of living. We need regulations in place to protect the river ecosystems, communities and farmers who depend on it for the entire length on the river not only for right now but future generations. We need ease of access to and transparency of information as a method of control of the corruption and manipulation that is currently in place so we can protect the Murray-Darling and all who depend on it.
