Very simply, the NSW RSPCA are the biggest killers of companion animals in Australia. The appears to be doing a great job making money, but the kill rates at the institution are heartbreakingly high, mostly not because 'the animals are not suitable to be re-homed but because of the very flawed 'temperance test'. The RSPCA NSW is being run like a corporate business which is fine to a point, but not when the money is not being spent on helping the animals to find a new home. In my opinion should be strongly reminded that he's in charge of a welfare organization that is suppose to help and protect animals, not just to make money and convenience kill animals that can't deal with being in a pound and so fail the 'test'. Too many animals are being destroyed by the very organization that was set up to help them, don't you think this is completely wrong?
