REPORT.

FIRST PART.

To His Excellency the Right Honorable CHARLES ROBERT, BARON CARRINGTON, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Colony of New South Wales and its Dependencies.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,—

We who have signed and affixed our seals to this the First Part of our Report, having been appointed by Letters Patent under the Great Seal of the Colony, dated respectively the 22nd day of February and the 12th day of March, 1886, issued under your Excellency's hand, "authorizing and appointing us, or any three or more of us, to make a diligent and full inquiry into the causes of the excessive use of intoxicating drink by the people of this Colony, the deterioration it has produced in public morality, and the extent to which legislation has been effective or otherwise in repressing the vice of drunkenness, and regulating the traffic in liquor throughout the said Colony, and to report to your Excellency our conclusions in the premises, and also to make such recommendations for further remedial or amended legislation as might seem to us desirable in the matter," have the honor to submit to your Excellency the following Report:—

Preliminary.—Before proceeding to submit the results of the evidence, which we think it incumbent on us to arrange, as far as practicable, according to the order of subjects indicated in our Commission, we desire to state that in the minutes of evidence appended to this Report the same order has not been followed, because it would have been in the highest degree inconvenient, if even it had been practicable, to have done so. The statements and opinions of the witnesses on the various subjects upon which they were examined will therefore be found scattered through their evidence, while it has been our endeavour to collect and arrange it as methodically as possible under appropriate titles in our Report. During the session of the Commission eighty-three meetings have been held, at which the evidence of 115 witnesses was obtained. In the first place the evidence of the Police was taken, then followed that of Sir Alfred Stephen and the Stipendiary Magistrates; Comptroller-General of Prisons; and the Gaol Authorities, including the Governor, Doctor, Chaplain, and the Superintendent of the Reception House for Lunatics; then the evidence of the Collector of Customs; of Dr. Manning; of Mr. Barney, the Inspector of Distilleries; Mr. Hamlet and Mr. Watt, Government Analysts; Mr. Noble, Temperance Lecturer; Drs. MacLaurin and Mackellar; the Right Rev. Bishop Barry; Dr. Tucker; the Revs. F. B. Boycé, J. D. Langley, R. Sellors,

Sellers, and J. Jefferis; Messrs. Booth and Clark; Judge Wilkinson; Messrs. J. M. Toohey and J. B. Olliffe, M's.P., formerly members of the Commission; Messrs. Weale and Thompson, office-bearers of the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association; Messrs. Hilder and North, and a number of licensed victuallers; Sir John Robertson; and Mr. M. Joseph, an hotel broker. After the examination of these witnesses, on the suggestion of Mr. Dibbs (then Colonial Secretary) we examined a large number of artizans and operatives from the principal factories and shops. We also examined Capt. Adams, of the S.S. "Newcastle," Mr. Whitton, Provadore of the S.S. "Maitland"; Mr. T. Davis, Secretary of the Seamen's Union; the Rev. W. Bradley and Mr. J. S. Shearston, connected with the Sailors' Mission; Mr. Vale, Secretary to the Victorian Alliance for the Suppression of Intemperance; Mr. W. Richardson; Col. P. G. Ballingall, Member of the Legislature of Iowa, U.S.; Mr. Knapp, Secretary of the Local Option League; and Messrs. C. B. Hayes, and J. H. Moore, both the last named gentlemen having recently arrived from Canada, and being in a position to give valuable evidence on the working of the Canadian Liquor Traffic Acts.

It is necessary to add that our inquiries have been necessarily limited to the Metropolitan Licensing District, although indirectly much valuable evidence has been elicited which is not limited to any district but is applicable to the entire Colony. Possibly our inquiries might in some respects have claimed a greater range, and a higher degree, of authority than they may now receive, had they been extended to some of the larger towns of the Colony, such as Newcastle, Maitland, Bathurst, Albury, Grafton, Tamworth, Wagga Wagga,—but as the expense of visiting those towns was considered by the Government to be greater than they cared to authorize, and than the results would be likely to justify, we were obliged to abandon the idea of taking evidence in the country.

Lastly, we desire to state by way of explanation that the vast range of the Inquiry delegated to us has rendered it necessary that we should submit our Report in two Parts. This (the First Part) will, however, be found to embrace the more important of the numerous questions involved in the exercise of the Drink Traffic.

CONSUMPTION OF LIQUOR IN NEW SOUTH WALES.

Our Commission begins by stating that your Excellency, "having had under consideration the serious evils directly and indirectly produced by the large and increasing consumption of intoxicants in the Colony of New South Wales," had thought fit to authorize us to make a diligent and full inquiry into the causes of this excessive use of intoxicating drink. The first subject, therefore, upon which it is our duty to report is, the consumption of liquor in this Colony. The growth of that consumption is shown in the appended tables; and by comparing them with the consumption statistics of other countries we shall be better able to ascertain with some approximation to accuracy the comparative, as well as the proportionate, development of the Liquor traffic of this Colony.

Upon this somewhat difficult subject of investigation we have, in addition to the general statements and opinions of witnesses speaking without official or special knowledge of the matter, the very valuable evidence of the Collector of Customs, the Chief Inspector of Distilleries, and the gentlemen who were authorized to give evidence on behalf of the Local Option League, the Rev. F. B. Boyce and Mr. E. J. H. Knapp.

In

In the course of his examination (see Minutes of Evidence, pp. 163, &c.), the Collector of Customs produced Customs statistics covering, with subsequent statistics for the year 1886 furnished to the Commission by the same officer, a complete decennial period, viz., from 1877 to 1886, and showing the quantities of the various imported liquors on which duty had been paid, or in other words, which had passed into consumption. From these returns we are able to compile the tables below, in which the duty paid is, in the case of spirits, on proof gallons, and for other liquors on liquid gallons* :—

The subjoined table, showing the quantities of wines and beers manufactured in the Colony for the years 1881-1886, together with quantities exported, is constructed, for the first four years in the column relating to beers, from a Return supplied supplied by the Chief Inspector of Distilleries ; for the two last years in that column the estimate of manufacture is based on the returns taken under the Beer Duty Act :—

We are indebted for the appended table showing the total consumption of spirits, wines, and beer in Victoria, during the years 1885 and 1886, to the courtesy of the Secretary for Trade and Customs of that Colony :—

From this table we are able to construct a table of average consumption per head of population for the years which it embraces :—

The results of the comparison of the consumption of liquors as between New South Wales and Victoria may be thus stated for 1886, on an average per head of population :—

From such authentic information as we have had access to, the subjoined tables have been constructed in order to show the total consumption of liquors and the average in gallons per head of population for the year 1885 in the Colonies of Queensland, New Zealand, and South Australia.

In comparing these statistics of consumption it is necessary to bear in mind that in respect of Colonial Beer the estimate in Victoria, Queensland, and South Australia is approximate only, and that in all the Colonies the estimate of Colonial-made Wine is also more or less of the like character. In this Colony the estimate of Colonial Beer—a very large factor in Drink Statistics—has also been hitherto only an approximate one.

For the year 1885 the consumption per head of intoxicating liquor in the United Kingdom—so far as we have been able to ascertain—was as follows :—

Spirits .. .. .	0.97
Wines ... .. .	0.38
Beer. ... .. .	26.85

the quantities being—of spirits, 35,361,461 gallons; of wines, 13,767,928 gallons; and of beer, 975,644,568 gallons. Compared Compared with the consumption of the United Kingdom for the year 1885 our consumption of spirits was more by .33 of a gallon, and our consumption of beers was less by 13.66 gallons, while our consumption of wine was more by .26 of a gallon.

Compared with Victoria for the year 1886, the consumption of spirits in New South Wales was .13 of a gallon above that Colony for each head of the population; of beers, about 3.17 gallons below; and of wines, about .50 of a gallon below.

But as the year 1885 is the latest for which we have been able to procure statistics of consumption for all the six countries presently to be compared, we take that as the datum year, with the following results:—

Compared with the consumption of Victoria (for the same year, 1885) our consumption of spirits was .25 of a gallon more: of beers, 2.61 gallons less; and of wines, .51 of a gallon less.

Compared with the consumption of the Northern Colony, Queensland, our consumption of spirits was .61 of a gallon less; of beers, 2.46 gallons more; and of wines, the same. Compared with the consumption of New Zealand, our consumption of spirits was .43 of a gallon more; of beers, 4.56 gallons more; and of wines .38 of a gallon more. Compared with the consumption of South Australia, our consumption of spirits was .52 of a gallon more; of beers, .89 of a gallon less; and of wines, .92 of a gallon less.

The relative consumption of the various kinds of liquor per head of the population of the United Kingdom, New South Wales, Victoria, New Zealand, Queensland, and South Australia, for the year 1885, is shown in the table below in gallons:—

	Spirits.	Beers.	Wines.
United Kingdom	0.97	26.85	0.38
New South Wales	1.30	13.19	0.64
Victoria	1.05	15.80	1.15
New Zealand	0.87	8.63	0.26
Queensland	1.91	10.73	0.64
South Australia	0.78	14.08	1.56

We have endeavoured by means of the above table to show the relative consumption of liquors for the year 1885 as between the countries therein mentioned and this Colony; but the decennial tables furnished by Mr. Powell enable us also to note the progressive increase and decrease of consumption from the year 1877 to the year 1886. We think that the figures shown in the third and fifth columns of these tables prove, beyond the possibility of doubt, that instead of increasing with the increase of population in this Colony, the consumption of every kind of liquor, except imported sparkling wines, imported bottled beer, and Colonial beer, has decreased, not always by the same ratio, for the entire period, or by the same ratio for any given year, but steadily, and in some cases, by very strongly marked ratios.

In

In spirits—by far the most common and pernicious among the factors of drunkenness—the consumption in 1877 for imported spirits stood at 1·61 per head of the population. In 1878 it stood at 1·65 per head. In 1886 the consumption was 1·19 per head; the decline for the last six years was regular, and, for the last two years of that period, marked. The consumption of Colonial spirits has during the same period descended from ·026 in 1877 to ·010 in 1886.

Similarly the consumption of imported beer in wood has declined from 1·04 in 1877 to ·71 in 1886—that of still wines from ·28 in 1877 to ·16 in 1886. The consumption of sparkling wines is the same, ·021, for each year of comparison, though that consumption slightly increased during the four years preceding 1886. The consumption of Colonial wine stood at ·63 in 1881. That for the preceding five years has not been ascertained. In 1886 it stood at ·54. On the other hand the consumption of imported bottled beer has increased from ·82 in 1877 to 1·41 in 1886, and of Colonial beer, from 12·65 in 1881 (an approximate estimate) to 11·21 in 1885, and 10·73 in 1886 (also approximate estimates).*

The appended Drink Bill for this Colony, with comparative figures for those of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, and for Victoria and New Zealand, has been compiled from information and explanations supplied by the Rev. F. B. Boyce.

NEW SOUTH WALES DRINK BILL FOR 1885 (CORRECTED).

This Table is compiled from the Custom-house Returns, except for Colonial beer and wine, the figures for which are taken from the Return of the Chief Inspector of Distilleries. The Rev. Mr. Boyce's Drink Bill figures are given under each head, and his retail prices of liquors have been adopted.

NOTE.—The figures in black or large type are Mr. Boyce's, and appear to represent total importations without making allowance for exports and stocks in bond at the end of the year. As regards spirits the difference is inconsiderable, but in the case of wines and beers the difference is considerable. In compiling this Drink Bill the figures representing the total number of gallons on which the duty has been paid have been used for imported wines, and beers less drawbacks; for Colonial wine and beer the figures represent the total estimated manufacture, less the number of gallons exported; these last were furnished by Mr. Barney the Inspector of Distilleries.

It will be observed that there are two columns in the first of these three Drink Bill tables; in the first column will be found the figures given by the Rev. Mr. Boyce in his evidence before the Commission. Mr. Boyce thought it well afterwards to correct those figures, and he did so in a letter to the Commission (First Appendix M). These corrections are shown in the second column of the table. They increase the quantities on every article consumed, except beer in wood and bottle, and imported wines. And in the case of Colonial beer, not only is the quantity manufactured raised from 14,542,319 gallons to 14,701,838 gallons, but the retail price is increased from 2s. to 3s. per gallon. The effect of this last increase alone was to raise the Drink Bill for Colonial beer from £1,454,232 to £2,205,275; that is to say, by no less a sum than £751,043.

We have made, in the second table, a corrected statement, for the purpose of showing at a glance the true quantities of liquor that went into consumption during the year 1885. This we have done by deducting exports and stocks in bond from imports, which Mr. Boyce seems not to have done. On the other hand we have given him the advantage of a smaller population, by taking the mean population for the year under consideration instead of the population as computed at the end of that year. We have also accepted in every case his estimate of the selling price. The result is that instead of the average per head reaching £5 11s. 8½d., as he computed in his explanation (above referred to), it should reach £5 14s. per head.

But there is a fundamental and fatal error in the estimate of Colonial beer which makes havoc of Mr. Boyce's Drink Bill to such an extent that it is almost valueless as a measure of drunkenness. The output of Colonial beer has been enormously overrated. Instead of reaching 14,701,838 gallons for 1885, it could not, we believe, have exceeded eleven millions. We were unable, until quite recently, to satisfy ourselves on this point, but having waited until the returns for 1886-7 under the Beer Duty Act recently passed should be forthcoming, we now know (see Mr. Powell's letter, First Appendix, V) that for the year ending June, 1887, not more than 10,000,000 gallons were brewed throughout the Colony, and we are assured by Mr. Powell that we may quite safely assume that, when the returns are published, those figures will not be exceeded, or if exceeded at all, that the excess will be inappreciable. We, of course, cannot say that the output for 1885 might not have been larger than that for the succeeding year, or for the twelve months covered by the brewers' returns under the Beer Duty Act, but, after making all possible inquiries open to us, we feel satisfied that the output for 1885 could not have exceeded that for 1886-7 by more than 1,000,000 gallons.

It is open, therefore, to anyone to controvert Mr. Boyce's Drink Bill for 1885, and it will be seen by Mr. Powell's letter (First Appendix, H 1) that that experienced and accurate officer considered Mr. Boyce's estimate of output as well as his prices to be too high.

But when we come to the construction of a Drink Bill for the year 1886 we are on firmer ground. In the table for that year we have adopted Mr. Boyce's prices, high as they undoubtedly are in most cases, and we have taken from official returns the quantities, deducting of course the exports.

The result is that for that year (1886) the Drink Bill of this Colony, instead of reaching £5,131,000, as computed by Mr. Boyce (see Report of Deputation of Local Option League to the Colonial Secretary, August 13th, 1887), could not have exceeded at Mr. Boyce's prices, £4,634,020; or in other words, £4 14s. 6 $\frac{3}{4}$ d., instead of £5 4s. 8 $\frac{3}{4}$ d., per head of mean population; a difference equal to 10s. 2d. per head.

It will also be worth noting that, as compared with the Drink Bill average per head for 1885, according to Mr. Boyce's figures, that for 1886 is, within a few pence, less by 20s. per head.

We consider that this result will compare not unfavourably with the Drink Bills of both Victoria and Queensland, assuming that those Bills were calculated on the same system as we have adopted; and we venture to believe that we have demonstrated to all impartial judges that this Colony cannot claim that position for expenditure on drink which had been so incautiously allotted to it(*).

But, as a matter of fact, all Drink Bills are merely misleading if regarded as accurate measures of the consumption of liquor in any given country, or as a test of the inebriety of one community when compared with that of another.

The table on page 27 shows the relative consumption of spirits, beer, and wines in gallons per head of the population for the United Kingdom and five Australasian Colonies. This table, taken in conjunction with arrests and convictions for drunkenness, should afford a much more trustworthy guide to those who are desirous of ascertaining the truth than any possible drink bill, however accurately constructed.

But whether our expenditure on liquors were £5 11s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., or, as corrected, £5 14s., per head of population for 1885, or, as seems more probable, £5 0s. 5d., or thereabout, it is impossible, we think, to regard that expenditure with satisfaction. We may admit with Mr. Powell (see his letter, First Appendix, H1) that "whatever may be the correct Drink Bill against the consumers of alcoholic beverages in New South Wales, it should not be forgotten that these liquors contributed £847,151 to the revenue for 1885"—that, in other words, the Legislature would perhaps experience an insurmountable difficulty in replacing that contribution to the Treasury by any practicable expedient in taxation; but it still remains a fact that if we all threw into the Treasury chest what we spend in liquor each year, the burden of our taxation might be lightened by more than one-half. On the other hand it must be admitted that there has been a marked decline in our consumption of all liquors (except imported beers), though, whether we are entitled to claim credit for the fact from having adopted sounder opinions on the subject of alcohol, or because we have had less money to spend on it than we had in former years, it may be difficult to determine. The fact, in any case, is a noticeable one, whatever moral it may be made to point.

(* We are aware that the framers of our Drink Bills are in the habit of basing their calculations on Official Returns; but the returns for Colonial beer, prior to the passing of the Beer Duty Act were, on the face of them, merely approximations; and a large allowance should have been made on that score. But instead of making any allowance, the framers of Drink Bills for this Colony seem to have accepted with avidity all maximum quantities, and even to have forgotten to deduct exports or make any other proper allowances, so as to get at "actual consumption."

THE QUALITY OF THE LIQUOR CONSUMED.

Passing from the consideration of the quantity, to the quality, of the liquor consumed in this Colony, we have, again, the evidence of people giving their testimony, mainly as the result of hearsay—the expression of ordinary public opinion—and we have the evidence of official persons, some of whom speak with the authority of experts, and from large experience. The opinion of a considerable majority of the witnesses examined is, that although there may be no deleterious foreign ingredients discoverable by the analyst in the spirits commonly consumed by the people of this Colony, yet that those spirits are, in the cheaper forms offered by the retailers, very injurious to health; that they are in many cases unfit for human consumption because of the presence of fusel oil—the best indication, in the case of spirits distilled from grain, of coarseness and immaturity; and that the base of most of the ordinary spirits vended in public-houses is silent spirit, from which, by the addition of flavouring and other materials, brandy or whisky can be compounded with almost equal facility, and so far as the consumer is concerned, with equal intoxicating effect.

The sophistication and adulteration of liquors as a subject of repressive legislation is as old as, if not older than, the time of Edward III, but unfortunately the science of ‘sophistication’ has advanced with a rapidity far greater than the science of its detection.

But it would be a mistake to infer from the evidence taken by us that any considerable proportion of sophisticated or deleterious spirit, is manufactured in this Colony. We took pains to discover whether any direct evidence of “doctoring” in any noticeable degree could be furnished; but the result of a somewhat lengthy investigation has been to distinctly disprove the existence of such a system on any scale suggesting legislative interference. The fact is, it does not pay to doctor liquors in this Colony when imported whisky, the most popular of spirituous drinks, can be bought in bond at 3s. 6d. per gallon, and brandy at 3s. It is true that there has been some importation of what are called “Essences,” liquids intended to assist in the production of such beverages as Irish whisky, rum, gin, port, sherry, “hot tom,” hot tom bitters, ginger ale, &c. But the quantities imported are, we are informed by the Collector of Customs, not such as to account in any appreciable degree for the quantity of sophisticated and noxious liquor alleged to be always passing into consumption. Nine samples of these essences were forwarded by us to the Government Analyst, who reported on them in the following terms:—

The general composition of these liquids is: first—a strong, ethylic alcohol, varying from 40 to 50 per cent., probably good rectified spirit, a suitable colouring matter, together with two or more essential oils, alcohols or extracts, so as to produce the desired flavour.

By following the directions given on the label, the actual amount of essence in a liquor so treated would be from one to three parts in a thousand. Judging from the amount of fusel oil in any one of them, a liquor so compounded, could not, in my opinion, be rendered more injurious than it was before the essence was added. That is to say that the use of these essences, secundum artem, in the mixing or blending of spirits is not, in my opinion, injurious to health.

There are two specific uses for these essences: first, by taking a given volume of white or silent spirit and adding the requisite quantity of essence, an artificial spirituous liquor may be compounded second—given a low class brandy, an inferior whisky, or a cheap rum, these liquors might be considerably improved by the addition of the proper essence and colouring matter. A cheap or damaged “port” wine by the judicious mixture of the essence and skilful manipulation could be made to pass muster amongst publicans easily enough. For instance, a badly made colonial wine (red) could, by essence, and by fortifying with brandy, be made into as good a port wine as that usually met with.

In

In addition to those analyses I have made up artificial or spurious liquors both with and without the aid of the essences. Starting with plain white spirit alone, I have manufactured gin, whisky, and brandy, samples of which I now send to the Commission for inspection.

However, in actual practice I do not consider that liquors are manufactured from white, silent, or plain spirit in this country. It would be too perilous an undertaking, as I found that with some of the essences admixture alone was insufficient, and that distillation was necessary.

I believe the use of the essences is confined almost entirely to the so-called improvement of poor liquors. The spirit importer or merchant usually makes use of essences with liquors already known, as brandy, whisky, rum, &c., and not for their manufacture from silent spirit.

We may appear to have given rather too much consideration to the examination of these Essences, in view of the assurance of the Collector of Customs that the quantity imported is inconsiderable, and of the opinion of the Government Analyst that "their use, secundum artem, is not injurious to health," but we had heard, in so many quarters, that a large proportion of the deleterious liquors retailed in low class public-houses, was composed of these essences, that we felt it our duty to give them our special attention. But, while admitting with Mr. Hamlet that a liquor manufactured of silent spirit and one of these essences may not be more injurious than it would be without the essence, also that badly made red colonial wine could by the assistance of the "port wine essence," and fortification with brandy, be made into as good a port as that usually met with,—yet we think that no mercy should be shown to any of these sophisticants, or to the "sophisticators" who use them; and that it may be fairly regarded as a duty of the Government to intervene if possible, between the public upon whom sham or doctored liquors are palmed off, and the unscrupulous people who are not ashamed to manufacture them. The liquors compounded may not be demonstrably injurious to health, or may not be more injurious than the base of the composition, silent spirit, or bad colonial wine (as the case may be), but they are produced by fraud. They are represented to be what they are not, and their manufacture should, we think, be rigorously prohibited. The best method of prohibition, in our opinion, would be either to place a very heavy import duty on "essences" and all similar sophisticants, or to absolutely prohibit their importation, as, we are given to understand, is the course taken by the Customs authorities in the United Kingdom.

We would recommend the same course to be pursued with certain liquid abominations imported for the obvious purpose of being mixed with weaker liquids and then passed into consumption. Samples of these liquids were sent to us by the Collector of Customs. Their actual alcoholic strength had been "obscured," so as to cheat the ordinary test; but, according to Mr. Hamlet's analyses of three samples sent him, two contained a percentage of absolute alcohol of 58·50, equal to 16 degrees overproof: the third contained of absolute alcohol 58·25, equal to 15 degrees overproof. All the samples contained fusel oil, and according to the evidence of Mr. C. Gordon, Principal Gauger at the Customs, who distilled one sample, an unusually large proportion appearing in the distillate, said Mr. Gordon "as a thick white compact scum or sort of fat." These importations are meant to serve two, more or less, infamous purposes. One is to evade the Customs duty by "obscuration of actual alcoholic strength," the other to provide the liquor sophisticator with a cheap and powerful agent. We think the Legislature might fairly be appealed to for the protection of the public against these and similar importations. It is probable that in each of the cases mentioned (the "essences" and the "obscured" spirits), these liquids were intended to test the market. We have no reason to believe that any large quantities of what in one case is intended to produce counterfeit liquor, and in the other is a vile poison intended to raise the intoxicating strength of the liquid with which it is compounded, have as yet been introduced into the Colony. The best answer, therefore, to the importers who wish to test this market would be (in our opinion) a prompt legislative prohibition of their infamous attempt to establish this trade—a trade, be it remembered, which begins by a cunning device to swindle the Customs, and then establishes itself as an agency for the wholesale distribution of poison.

We now pass to the analyses, conducted at our instance, of such samples of spirits procured from the various Sydney Bonds as are most in demand. Sixteen samples of brandy, whisky, and rum were procured from the respective bonded warehouses and stores enumerated in Table K (First Appendix), and these were submitted for analysis to the Government Analyst.

The selling prices of these spirits are shown in the table to vary from 3s. per gallon (in bond) for brandy and 3s. 6d. for whisky, to 43s. 6d. and 12s. 6d.,—and rum, with 83·77 per cent. of alcohol in it, or 155·13 by proof, was priced as low as 2s. per gallon.

Of these samples the Government Analyst reported that, with the exception of traces of lead and copper in the two samples of rum, none of the statutory ingredients mentioned in the Licensing Act had been discovered, nor had wood spirit been discovered in any of them; but that in seven samples fusel oil had been discovered.

Four samples of flask brandy were subsequently submitted to the Government Analyst (see First Appendix, K 2), but with the exception of traces of lead (“heavy traces,” in one sample), none of the deleterious substances referred to in sec. 89 of the Licensing Act were discovered, and no traces of fusel oil were detected; but this, as Mr. Hamlet suggests, may have been owing to the fact that the bulk of the samples was used up in every case in searching for the substances mentioned in the Act.

At a later date, two samples of spirits obtained from the Collector of Customs were forwarded to Mr. Hamlet for analysis. We were informed that spirits of this kind were being surreptitiously sold, in considerable quantities. The result of the analysis by Mr. Hamlet of the first sample was (see First Appendix, T) that it was 64·87 overproof, containing of absolute alcohol 91·11; that traces of fusel oil and other higher alcohols were discovered in it, and that it was considered by the analyst, to be entirely unfit for drinking purposes. The second sample on analysis was found to be 66·75 overproof, containing of absolute alcohol 92·48, and was also pronounced to be entirely unfit for drinking purposes. It likewise contained fusel oil.

The course pursued by us for the purpose of testing the quality of spirits was repeated in respect to fermented liquors of Colonial manufacture. For the purpose of analysis, fourteen samples of beer (including one of porter), the products of the various breweries in Sydney and its immediate neighbourhood were procured from ten retail establishments, by Sub-Inspector Lenthall, and submitted for analysis to the Government Analyst. He reported (see First Appendix, K 1) that all the samples were found to be absolutely free from any poisonous organic substances, metals, mineral acids, or the prohibited ingredients mentioned in the Licensing Act, and that the fixed and volatile solids were found to be those which should be expected in genuine malt liquors.

Then,

Then, in consequence of numerous reports that reached us respecting the alleged excessive alcoholic strength of lager beer, both German and American, sixteen samples were, by our request, procured by the same officer. The names of the various samples, with the result of the analysis in each case, are given in the First Appendix, Table K 3. It was found that all these lagers have a slightly higher alcoholic strength than the lager beer ordinarily used in Germany, but all were declared by the analyst to be "genuinely wholesome drinks," though some of them were manufactured from other materials than malt and hops, e.g., the Pilsener and Fryderlund brands.

We will now go back a few years, and refer briefly to some elaborate analyses made in the year 1882 in consequence of a statement of Mr. J. K. Waters, Inspector of Liquors at Melbourne, purporting to represent the result of experiments on Sydney liquors made in September, 1881. The liquors (brandy, whisky, rum, and beer) procured by Mr. Waters were described by him in highly disparaging terms (see First Appendix, C 1). The analyses of thirty samples of spirits taken indiscriminately are shown in the second Table (C 1, as above). These go far to disprove the statements of Mr. Waters. Sulphate of copper, which Mr. Waters alleged to be present in the three samples of whisky examined by him, was never found in any whisky examined by Mr. Watt. Neither vitriol nor the trace of any other mineral than lead, although stated to have been found by Mr. Waters in both whisky and rum, was found by Mr. Watt in the samples submitted to him. Two samples of brandy were considered to have been made up from colonial wine; and that most deleterious substance (not found by Mr. Waters) fusel oil, was ascertained by Mr. Watt to be present in at least six samples.

Tannin, burnt sugar, acetic acid, decoction of prunes, were found in greater or less proportion, but in no instance was tobacco or picROTOXIA (Cocculus Indicus, or Anamirta Cocculus) found to be present in any of the thirty samples of spirits examined.

A second analytical investigation of Sydney liquors was undertaken about the same time, twelve samples of Colonial wine having been submitted to Mr. Watt by the Chief Inspector of Distilleries. The results of the analysis are shown in the third table (see First Appendix, C 1). In strength these samples varied from 36.61 for port to 23.87 for claret, and 23.76 for another port. This last was described as being more of a vinegar than a wine, and indeed it contained 1,393 grains of acid to the gallon. Four samples comprising three ports and one sherry were reported as inferior made-up liquids, but the rest were described as very good, or good sound, or fairly good wines, and no foreign colouring matter or noxious ingredient was detected in any of them.

A third examination of Sydney Liquors, represented by eleven samples of Colonial-brewed ales and porters, submitted by the Chief Inspector of Distilleries, was then made by the Government Analyst. The results are shown in the last table (see First Appendix, C 1). They may be concisely described as exceedingly satisfactory. In not a single case was any metallic substance detected—picROTOXIA, nicotin, salt, or indeed any other noxious ingredient. All the samples examined are described as having been brewed from "mixtures of malt and artificial sugar such as glucose or saccharum," and as being fairly good beverages. In two samples small quantities of salicylic acid were discovered, added probably as preservatives.

We come now to the results of the last analyses of Colonial beer made by Mr. Hamlet. As the quantities previously submitted for examination were nearly always exhausted in the search for the noxious ingredients mentioned in the Licensing Act, larger quantities were now procured. The six samples of beer operated on by Mr. Hamlet were obtained from the principal Sydney Breweries by Sub-Inspector Lenthall. The results communicated by the Analyst have, in one respect, corroborated the testimony of the purity of this liquor so far as purity is implied by the absence of narcotic, mineral, and other foreign ingredients injurious to health. But, in another aspect, the analysis has furnished results of a startling character. Mr. Hamlet in his report (see First Appendix, U), says that he examined these samples of beer for the purpose (among others) of ascertaining the nature and character of the alcohols they contained, and that, "with this object in view the alcoholic distillate has been submitted to the process known as fractional distillation, that is to say, the volatile alcohols have been more or less separated from each other in the order of their boiling points. In this way, isobutylic and amylic alcohols were detected. These compounds are present in the complex liquid called fousel or fusel oil (*) and give a character to the beer different from that of malt liquors properly fermented at a low temperature (not above 70° Fahr.) Knowing the injurious properties of fusel oil, I am of opinion (adds Mr. Hamlet) that its effect when introduced into the blood is more or less that of a poison." †

Fusel oil.

FUSEL oil is the name applied to the volatile oily liquids, of a nauseous fiery taste and smell, which are obtained in the rectification of spirituous liquors made by the fermentation of grain, potatoes, the marc of grapes and other material, and which, as they are of higher boiling-point than ethylic alcohol, occur in largest quantity in the last portions of the distillate. Besides ethylic or ordinary alcohol, and amylic or pentylic alcohol, which are present in them all, there have been found in fusel oils several other bodies of the  $C_n H_{2n+1} \dots O H$  series, also certain ethers, and members of the  $C_n H_{2n} O_2$  series of fatty acids. Normal propylic alcohol,  $C_3 H_7 O H$ , is contained in the fusel oil of the marc brandy of the south of France, and isopropylic butylic alcohol,  $C H (C H_3)_2 \cdot C H_2 \cdot O H$ , in that of beetroot molasses. The chief constituent of the fusel oil procured in the manufacture of alcohol from potatoes and grain, usually known as fusel oil and potato-spirit, is isopropylic amylic alcohol, or isobutylcarbinol  $C H (C H_3)_2 \cdot C H_2 \cdot C H_2 \cdot O H$ , boiling at  $129^\circ - 130^\circ C.$ , and inactive as regards polarized light. Ordinary fusel oil yields besides another isomeric amylic alcohol, boiling at about  $128^\circ$ , and laevorotatory. The formation of amylic alcohol is stated by Liebig (Familiar Letters on Chemistry, p. 217, 4th ed., 1859), never to take place in fermenting fluids in the presence of tartar, of racemic, tartaric, or citric acid, or of certain bitter substances, as hops. It is produced principally in alkaline or neutral liquids, and in such as contain lactic or acetic acid. Schorlemmer (Proc. Roy. Soc. xv., 1866, p. 131) has shown that amyl compounds prepared from fusel oil and from American petroleum agree in specific gravity and boiling-point, and are therefore to be regarded as identical. Variable quantities of fusel oil, less or greater according to the stage of ripening, exists in commercial spirits. Administered in small amount, it exercises a poisonous action, causing thirst and headache, with furred tongue. (Brit. and For. Med. Chir. Rev., xxviii., 1861, p. 101.) In crude spirit made from potatoes, after its purification in the cold from noxious gases by means of charcoal, M. Rabuteau found 50 per cent. of ethylic, and 1.5 per cent. of isopropylic alcohol and traces of propylic, and of ordinary and a more complex amylic alcohol. He discovered that in  $\frac{1}{2}$  aqueous solution ethylic alcohol was not injurious to frogs, isopropylic alcohol killed after some hours, and propylic alcohol in a single hour, whilst the vapours of a similar solution of amylic alcohol were instantaneously fatal to them, and even diluted to as much as 500 times its bulk that body exercised on them a poisonous influence. The widely different actions of common alcohol and of such compounds as the potato-oils in intoxicating drinks, he points out, render it necessary to distinguish between the excitable ethylysm produced by the former, and the dull and heavy amylysm, or more properly polyalcoholism of the latter. (See Le Progrès Médical, 1878, p. 979, Société de Biologie.) To remove fusel oil from spirits, a matter of prime importance to the distiller, a great number of methods have been resorted to. A practically pure spirit can be obtained by rectification several times after dilution with water, or by the use of specially constructed stills, as Coffey's (see Distillation, vol. vii, p.p. 265-6). Among the materials which have been employed for the complete defuselation of spirit are the powder of freshly-burnt charcoal, which acts best when the vapour of the liquid is passed through it, and charcoal with manganese peroxide, with slaked lime, and with soap-boilers' bye; also saturated solution of chloride of lime, alone or with zinc chloride; and calcium chloride, olive oil, soda, soap, and milk. The presence of fusel oil in spirit may be suspected when the addition of four parts of water causes milkiness. It is detected by its odour when the spirit is diluted with warm water, or when its ethylic alcohol has been allowed to evaporate. To remove the last-named body and water from fusel oil, calcium chloride has been employed. The estimation of the alcohols of fusel oil may be effected by Dupré's process, in which their corresponding acids are obtained by oxidizing with sulphuric acid and potassium dichromate, and eventually the quantity of barium in the barium salts of the purified acids is determined (see Analyst, March 31, 1871). Fusel oil is employed in the arts as a source of amylic alcohol.

† We are indebted to Mr. Hamlet for the subjoined description of fusel oil, as distinguished from other alcohols.

"ETHYLIC alcohol, alcohol or spirit of wine, is a clear colourless liquid, lighter than water, having an agreeable and far-pervading odour. It is composed entirely of hydrogen, oxygen, and carbon, and is quite inflammable. When taken in small quantities it appears to improve digestion, and is thus useful to persons of weak stomach. In large doses, however, even the absolutely pure substance acts as a powerful poison. It should be remembered that in science we know of the existence of a large number of alcohols, and that when most people speak of alcohol they always mean the familiar substance found in honestly-made wines, beers, and spirits; but in the complex liquid known as fusel oil there are several volatile alcohols, every one of which differs specifically from the liquid popularly called alcohol. Fortunately, the scientific chemist is able to identify any particular member of the alcohol family, and to determine its variety and leading characteristics. Fusel oil is a mixture containing alcohols of the  $(C_n H_{2n+1})_2$  series, and is composed chiefly of isopentylic alcohol or amylic alcohol and isobutylic alcohol. Amylic alcohol is a clear, colourless, highly refractive liquid, having a burning taste and a strong penetrating odour. Inhalation of its vapour produces difficulty of breathing, coughing,

We have said that the results of these analyses were of a startling character, and the expression may require explanation. We were perfectly familiar with the fact that immature spirits so largely imported into this Colony contained fusel oil, but we were not prepared for the discovery of fusel oil in liquors which had not undergone the process of distillation, but only that of fermentation. It is probable that the condition of the brewing temperature in the fermentation of the beers examined by Mr. Hamlet may have had much to do with the development in that process of this poisonous form of alcohol (fusel oil). But whether high temperature be the true cause or not, we regard the fact that fusel oil is present in Colonial beers to be as serious in one aspect as it is suggestive in another; and although the percentage of fusel oil found in the beer is not perhaps more than a fifth or sixth of the percentage in cheap whisky or brandy, yet the result on the beer drinker, who probably consumes more than six times the weight of beer than the whisky or brandy drinker does of spirits, is about the same.

The witnesses who complained so strongly of the quality of Colonial beer, and of its effects on the system of those who drink it, as they had been accustomed to drink English beer, and who, in spite of the results of preceding analyses adhered to those opinions, are now fortified by this discovery of Mr. Hamlet's. There is fusel oil in the whisky* and brandy, and fusel oil in the beer so largely consumed by the classes who are dependent for their beverages on the public-houses. We cannot blame the keeper of the public-house for selling liquor which contains what "is more or less of a poison," for it is probable that he is innocent (at least as a rule) of any knowledge that the liquors which he sells contain that pernicious substance. We cannot blame the brewers or the spirit merchants, and for the same reason. Trade competition has compelled those engaged in the business of manufacture, or of wholesale or retail supply to the public, to manufacture, import, and sell a cheap article. The importers are obliged to furnish the retail trade with liquors which the retailers can afford to sell at popular prices. The brewers, for climatic reasons, are obliged to brew (practically) all the year round, and they cannot be condemned for brewing at higher temperatures than are obtainable in countries favoured by a colder climate.

But the public health is a matter of paramount concern; and the discovery of a poisonous substance in a popular beverage (developed during the very process of fermentation and not introduced afterwards for any fraudulent or improper purpose) is a fact which demands, we think, at the hands of the Legislature, the most serious consideration.

headache, and giddiness. Some time ago an assistant and myself suffered acutely whilst engaged in purifying some fusel oil in the Government Laboratory. We both of us felt as though we had undergone violent physical exercise, such as running, and the sensation was by palpitation of the heart. When taken internally it exerts a powerful effect upon the lungs, heart, and brain. In a few minutes a giddiness is felt, which is followed by coma. The principal action, however, of amylic alcohol is its remarkable property of producing muscular twitchings and tremors, the tremulous motion being in all respects similar to what is frequently seen in those persons who suffer from delirium tremens. Its continued effect is followed by profound narcotism, reduction of temperature, and violent muscular tremors. Amylic alcohol has in many of my own experiments proved fatal to frogs and guinea pigs. The liquid having been injected in the usual manner, well-marked tremors are always observed, and are aggravated by merely touching the animal. These symptoms last for about four or five hours before death takes place. Enlenberg, however, records an experiment in which 40 drops of the substance administered to a full-sized kitten produced anaesthesia with recovery on the day following. From these and other recorded experiments there is no reasonable doubt that fusel oil is a poison capable of producing well-marked symptoms of giddiness and headache when taken in small quantities, and that its continued use will produce muscular tremors in the human subject; while in the case of an animal such as a guinea pig anaesthesia is followed by death.

People have known for a long time that fusel oil was a very common bane in spirits; they are now informed that it exists in Colonial beer. Parliament might, therefore, be invited, we think, to deal with liquors containing fusel oil, and with persons who knowingly or recklessly vend such liquors, under a new light, and with a fuller knowledge than was available when the Adulteration Act of 1879 was passed.

But before making any recommendation for more stringent legislation it will be well to consider briefly how the law now stands.

The only enactments in force in this Colony which deal with the adulteration of liquors, or the sale of noxious liquors are the Adulteration of Food Act, passed in 1879, and the Licensing Act of 1882.

The first of these Acts (42 Vic., No. 14) makes it a misdemeanour punishable by imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding six months.

- (a.) For purposes of sale to knowingly mix or cause or permit to be mixed with any article of drink any ingredient, &c., or to colour any such article so as in any such case to render such article injurious to health :
- (b.) Knowing that any such article was so mixed or coloured to sell the same :
- (c.) To sell and deliver or cause or permit to be sold and delivered for immediate consumption by the buyer, intoxicating liquor containing fusel oil in a proportion injurious to health, with knowledge that the liquor was unfit for present consumption or injurious to health :

To every offence of knowingly selling or keeping or exposing for sale any liquor mixed with any deleterious ingredient, that is to say, Cocculus Indicus copperas, opium, Indian hemp, strychnine, tobacco, darnel seed, extract of logwood, salts of zinc or lead, alum, or any extract or compound of any of such ingredients, or any other ingredient injurious to health,* the Licensing Act (45 Vic., No. 14) attaches a penalty of not less than £10 nor more than £50 for the first offence, and for any subsequent offence a penalty not exceeding £100, or imprisonment not exceeding three months, with forfeiture of the adulterated liquor, &c., in all cases, and of the license on a repeated offence.

The same Act also declares that the holder of a license having in his possession or on his premises any adulterated liquor or any of the above named deleterious ingredients, for the possession of which he is unable to account satisfactorily, shall be deemed to have exposed adulterated liquor for sale, while an earlier section (19) of the Act empowers Inspectors to enter any licensed premises at any time during business hours, and demand and take any sample of liquors on the premises for the purpose of analysis.

This being the condition of the law as applicable to the sale, &c., of liquors containing a substance which we believe to be infinitely more injurious to health than any ingredient likely to be added by the most unscrupulous "doctorer" of liquor, it is manifest that the law affords no sufficient protection against "fusel oil." It is obvious that no conviction of the ordinary vendor of crude spirits or of beer containing fusel oil could be expected, for how could it be proved that the vendor knew that the liquor was unfit for present consumption or was injurious to health, or, to use the words of the Act "could with reasonable diligence have obtained that knowledge"?

DRUNKENNESS AS A NATIONAL EVIL.

In a very impressive and instructive article contributed by Cardinal Manning to the Fortnightly Review for September, 1886, that distinguished prelate asked this question:—"What is the dominant vice of the United Kingdom"? And he answered it by asking what one vice would supply an answer to each of thirteen given questions. Those questions, unfortunately, are pertinent to a similar inquiry for this Colony; and it seems to us that the answer which his Eminence found to be the only possible one for each of those questions,—viz., intemperance in intoxicating drink—must be the answer to a similar series of questions asked in New South Wales.

"It is no rhetoric, nor exaggeration, nor fanaticism" Cardinal Manning declares, "to affirm that intemperance in intoxicating drink is a vice that stands head and shoulders above all the vices by which we are afflicted; and that comparing the United Kingdom, not only with the wine-growing countries of the south, which are traditionally sober, but with the nations of the north, such as Germany and Scandinavia, which are historically hard drinkers, we are pre-eminent in this scandal and shame, and that intemperance in intoxicating drink may, in sad and sober truth, be called our national vice."

The test questions from which this terrible inference was drawn were these:—

1. Is there any vice in the United Kingdom that slays at least 60,000, or as others believe and affirm, 120,000 every year?
2. Or that lays the seeds of a whole harvest of diseases of the most fatal kind, and renders all other lighter diseases more acute, and perhaps even fatal in the end?
3. Or that causes at the least one-third of all the madness confined in our asylums?
4. Or that prompts directly or indirectly 75 per cent. of all crime?
5. Or that produces an unseen and secret world of all kinds of moral evil, and of personal degradation which no police court ever knows, and no human eye can ever reach?
6. Or that, in the midst of our immense and multiplying wealth produces not poverty, which is honorable, but pauperism which is a degradation to a civilized people?
7. Or that ruins men of every class and condition of life, from the highest to the lowest, men of every degree of culture and of education, of every honorable profession, public officials, military and naval officers and men, railway and household servants, and what is worse than all, that ruins women of every class, from the most rude to the most refined?
8. Or that, above all other evils, is the most potent cause of destruction to the domestic life of all classes?
9. Or that has already wrecked, and is continually wrecking, the homes of our agricultural and factory workmen?
10. Or that has already been found to paralyse the productiveness of our industries in comparison with other countries, especially the United States?

We look upon the Adulteration of Food Act of 1879 as altogether insufficient to furnish a remedy for a mischief which has now grown into very serious dimensions. The Legislature, we venture to think, will have to take a new departure if the mischief is to be effectively dealt with.

What then should be the new remedy for a new condition of things ?

We are fully conscious of the responsibility incurred by us in venturing to propose a scheme for the repression of this growing traffic in poison. We know that our proposals, if acted upon, would most seriously hamper trade, but we consider it to be our duty to propose such remedies as we think suited to the mischief without concerning ourselves overmuch with the effect they may have, for a time, in curtailing or interfering with the wholesale or retail traffic in drink, or in increasing the price of wholesome liquors.

There seems to us to be no effective remedy against the consumption of poisonous beverages but prohibition; we therefore recommend that no spirits imported into this Colony and no home made spirits be allowed to pass into consumption if they are found to contain fusel oil; this would mean practically that all spirits would be arrested on their progress to the consumer's mouth at the bonded warehouse, and that a sample must be taken from each "package" before duty could be paid on it, unless sufficient evidence could be adduced by the importer, or the bonder, that the "packages" had been passed at the port of shipment as free from fusel oil, or were covered by a sufficient certificate of age from the manufacturer. But no previous analysis in bond, or certificate from the distiller, would be sufficient without an exemplary penalty on the vendor. Accordingly we propose that every person who sells spirits containing fusel oil shall incur a heavy penalty, and on the second offence shall forfeit his license, whether that be a spirit merchant's, wholesale, or a publican's or other retail, license.

We admit that these recommendations have a Draconic look about them, and that the first effect of a law which should attempt to give effect to them would be to raise the prices of wholesome spirits all round. But we think, on the other hand, that the ultimate consumer will be the better for any law which compels him to drink wholesome spirits (if he drinks spirits at all), even if he have to pay twice as much as he does now for poisonous or sophisticated spirits.

With respect to Colonial beer, we would recommend similar legislation, and for the same reasons: In the case of Colonial beer we believe that that most pernicious substance (amylic and its kindred alcohols), though present in very small quantities, is as widespread a bane as the fusel oil of the cheap whisky, and the sham brandy. We also believe that, under improved conditions, the brewing processes can be carried on in this Colony as successfully as in any other country. If Colonial beer brewed at high temperature is pernicious, it must be brewed either at artificially lowered temperatures, as we are given to understand is done in many parts of the United States, or on the table-lands. In any case it is wrong to permit the annual consumption of millions of gallons of fusel oil beer.

11. Or, as we are officially informed, render our commercial seamen less trustworthy on board ship ?
12. Or that spreads these accumulating evils throughout the British Empire, and is blighting our fairest Colonies ?
13. Or that has destroyed, and is destroying, the indigenous races wheresoever the British Empire is in contact with them, so that from the hem of its garment there goes out, not the virtue of civilization and of Christianity, but of degradation and of death ?

Your Excellency's Commission in authorising us "to make a diligent and full inquiry into the causes of the excessive use of intoxicating drink by the people of this Colony and the deterioration it has produced in public morality" has laid upon us the obligation of taking a large body of evidence, much of which might be fairly enough regarded as constituting the reply of our own people to Cardinal Manning's questions. For example: The Inspector-General of Police (203), referring to his Report for 1885, says that "it seemed to him an awful thing that 232 cases in one year should occur in which people have met with violent deaths owing to intemperance." It struck him (204) as a grievously large number. Inspector Camplin, speaking from an experience of the Colony extending for about thirty years, declares that the intemperate use of liquor is a primary cause of much of our crime, especially crimes of violence; that robbery from the person in houses of ill-fame is generally traceable to drink; that in many cases the young men who commit outrages on females are incited to the commission of those crimes by drink; that drink incites the larikin to assault Chinamen; and, in short, that three-fourths of our crime is directly attributable to drink. Sir Alfred Stephen (2213), speaking from a judicial experience of crime in this Colony reaching thirty years, and in Tasmania twelve years, gives it as his deliberate opinion, the result of that experience, "that a very large, a preponderating, proportion of crime was directly and indirectly the result of intoxication—in the cases of small crimes, very frequently; but in those of the greater crimes, particularly crimes of violence, almost universally. It is not merely that crime is caused directly by drink, but that it is the cause where the perpetrator has nothing to do with drink, except as the man who takes advantage of it. Drink is frequently the occasion of the crime in this way: that the person robbed or injured is himself drunk, and so affords the opportunity and the temptation to the commission of the crime. Robberies occasionally take place in the parks. For instance: a person is robbed whilst lying drunk; people in that condition are of course an easy prey to the thief. I cannot state one single transaction or state of things existing in the Colony in which there is anything wrong—anything blamable, anything criminal—that takes place, but drink has something to do with it. Cases of indecent exposure of the person, cases of attempted rape, and other offences, are the direct result of drink. Then, as to wife-beating and the various miseries that result from unhappiness in married life: I believe that almost every case of the many—not scores but hundreds—that exist in this town are invariably the result of drink; and in this particular class of cases the horrible results are such as to shock anyone. Not one week of my life elapses but I have some unhappy woman or some unhappy children coming to me with a tale of misery; and I say deliberately, and without any exaggeration, that not a week passes that some tale of distress is not told me—some account of unhappiness, and misery, and privation—the result of drunkenness on the part of a husband, sometimes on the part of the wife, but much more generally on the part of the husband." The drunkenness here referred to was, in the witness's opinion (2214) "almost in every case the result of drinking at public-houses; certainly 95 per cent. of it." The same witness (2219) "believed that drunkenness is very much on the increase. "I believe," said he, "that drunkenness among young men especially is on the increase from private drinking, and especially that the practice of drinking to excess springs from the habit of what is called 'nobblerizing,' and the habit of drinking at irregular intervals. If five or six persons go into a public-house, each of whom requires one drink, No. 1 will treat the other five, and afterwards each of the other five will treat all the rest, so that each man drinks six glasses instead of one glass."

We have no desire to paint a sensational picture of the evils which in this Colony result from an intemperate indulgence in drink. These evils can hardly be exaggerated, but on the other hand it would be manifestly unfair to the colony to deny that there is a tendency to exaggerate the percentage of crimes directly caused by drink. Although the law may hold that drunkenness is no excuse for crime, it cannot be doubted that among the masses it is believed that crimes committed under the influence of drink are less heinous than those perpetrated by persons in a condition of sobriety. It is common enough to hear, by way of palliation of a misdeed, that it was committed by a man in a condition of intoxication; and it is reasonable to suppose that many of those who live criminal lives have a tendency to attribute their downfall to drink rather than to moral depravity. The stories told by them to prison chaplains and to others under whose observation they more immediately fall are liable to be thus coloured and distorted. And the evidence of Canon Rich and the Rev. J. D. Langley suggests that a very large number of prisoners are in the habit of regarding drink as an excuse for their crimes. But when every deduction has been made on this account it cannot be doubted that a very large proportion of crime is due either directly or indirectly to drink, and very few of the witnesses examined by us are disposed to place the percentage caused in this way at a lower figure than 75, for it must be remembered that where crime is committed by persons not in a state of intoxication, the inducing cause is most commonly traceable to habits of intemperance. Persons who acquire habits of intemperate indulgence are often deprived of the power of making a living by legitimate methods, and, in order to obtain the means of satisfying their craving, they have recourse to dishonest practices which eventually lead to a life of confirmed criminality. It will be seen that, from an experience of two years as chaplain of Berrima Gaol, the Rev. J. D. Langley is disposed to believe that 90 per cent. of crimes are due directly or indirectly to drink. Canon Rich states that in his opinion this percentage is too high, but he considers that the proportion is nevertheless very large. The Governor of Darlinghurst Gaol, however, holds that the average of cases in that gaol due to drink is not less than 92 or 93 per cent.; and his information has been derived by examination of some of the long-sentence prisoners, by consulting officers of the gaol who speak from their personal knowledge of the prisoners, and from what the prisoner's relatives say when they visit the gaol; but perhaps one of the most striking illustrations of the concurrence of drunkenness with criminal habits is to be found in a table which was prepared for Dr. Maurice O'Connor, the visiting surgeon of Darlinghurst Gaol (minutes of evidence, page 158). Taking the totals for six and a half years we there find that out of 34,266 prisoners not less than 5,686 were actually under medical treatment from diseases caused by drink. It is submitted that if one sixth of the whole number were in such a condition as to require medical treatment it may legitimately be inferred that among the rest the proportion of those who have been in the habit of exceeding, but not to the point of producing actual disease, must be very large indeed.

It is hardly necessary, however, to recapitulate the evidence, for among the witnesses who have been examined there is hardly any dissent from the proposition, that not less than three-fourths (and in the opinion of the majority a far larger proportion) of existing crime is due to excessive habits of drinking. And in considering the conditions of this Colony we might naturally expect that an apparently larger percentage of crime due to this source would be found in a vigorous young Colony than in Great Britain. For it must be remembered that many of the temptations to crime which exist in England, arising from unavoidable misfortune and want, are hardly known in a country where any able-bodied man is able to make a living if he will work for it. We fear, therefore, that there are no special circumstances to mitigate our estimate of the crime attributable to drunkenness, and that we must conclude that the effect of it in producing crime is not less in New South Wales than it is stated to be in England by Cardinal Manning.

It remains for us to point out that the class of crimes arising from drink is a very large one, and includes most of the offences with which courts of justice are commonly called upon to deal. Small assaults and petty larcenies are nearly as much attributed to drink as more serious crimes, while it is admitted that a large proportion of malicious injuries, manslaughter, murder, and rape—particularly of the latter—are committed under the direct influence of drink. In the case of the minor crimes, such as theft and robbery, it is probable that the temptation is very frequently to be found in the desire to obtain means for satisfying the appetite for alcohol; but the more serious crimes have often been committed by persons not included in what are commonly called the criminal classes as well as by those who are generally regarded as belonging to them. In this connection crimes of violence deserve especial mention, and, in particular, rape and indecent assaults upon women, while in one case, quoted by Canon Rich, a man apparently respectable and well-educated incurred a sentence of two years' imprisonment for a robbery which appeared to be the result of a drunken spree. It may be added that persons who drink to excess are not only actively, but also passively instrumental, in causing crime, and that a large number of robberies from the person are committed upon intoxicated people. It is not, of course, contended that these persons can be regarded as responsible for the crimes of which they are the objects, but it is evident that they provide a temptation to crime which it may be worth while for the State to take into consideration.

A class must be noticed which appears to be increasingly given to drinking habits, and which presents much difficulty. From the evidence generally it may be gathered that the drinking habits of the larrikin class are becoming far greater than they used to be; and it is to be feared that those who belong to it are most of all liable to commit crimes when in an intoxicated condition. Their case seems, too often, to be little short of hopeless, and their vicious habits to be so confirmed as to leave little hope of reformation. They are almost all of them natives of the Colony, but the class seems to be confined almost wholly to Sydney. The existence of it, however, points to another evil which is consequent upon the prevalence of drinking habits in this colony. We allude to the condition of the children of intemperate persons. It is obvious that these brought up not only without any supervision by their parents but with a bad example always before them can have very little chance of growing up to be respectable citizens. Moreover, there can be no doubt that the largest part of the poverty and squalor which exist in certain parts of Sydney are directly traceable to the squandering of money upon drink or the effect of drink in depriving those who give way to it of the power of keeping their situations or of obtaining fresh employment. The children of parents who have reduced themselves to these conditions are often compelled to shift for themselves as best they can, and to associate with the worst kind of companions. It is probable that the training of many of the worst sort of larrikins has been of this kind, and that drunken parents are the natural cause of drunken and criminal children. It is not pretended that the whole of the dangerous larrikin class is bred under these conditions. The origin of that class is of course foreign to this inquiry; but it is so far pertinent in that it cannot be doubted that some of the worst members of it are recruited from among the children of drunken parents.

The burden which is thus cast upon the tax-paying public from this source must not be ignored; for it is an obvious justification of legislation that, in addition to promoting the moral welfare, it is calculated to reduce the weight of taxation which falls upon the people. In this regard the evidence of Mr. Vale, secretary to the "Victorian Alliance for the Suppression of the Liquor Traffic," is worthy of attention. Mr. Vale says, "In regard to the effect of drink in producing poverty, I may say that the Superintendent of our Immigrants' Home has stated that nearly all the cases which were before him are cases of poverty originating in intemperance. Mr. Guillaume, the Superintendent of the Industrial and Reformatory Schools Department, has stated that at least 90 per cent. of the children left to the charge of the State are the children of intemperate parents. In fact, 90 per cent. seems to be the favourite calculation. Roughly speaking, it means nearly all." It is thus obvious that the expenditure of the State upon the children of drunken parents must be very considerable, and, if the testimony quoted may be relied upon, it could be reduced within very narrow limits if anything could be done to materially diminish intoxication.

As is only too well known, the evil of drunkenness is not confined to men, but the evidence taken by the Commission to ascertain whether female intemperance was increasing or diminishing is far from satisfactory. Some witnesses thought they observed a decided increase, while others considered that there is no more intemperance among women, according to population, than there was before the Licensing Act was passed, but that the amount might be put down as stationary.

We are indebted to the Government Statistician for the following table, which, as will be seen, covers the decennial period 1876-1886, and from which it will be manifest that the percentage of arrests of males and females to the total population of the Colony has varied only to the extent of a small fraction between the first and last year of that period. It was 2·67 in 1876, and is 2·69 in 1886; but the percentage of arrests of women was, in 1876, 1·31 of the total female population, while in 1886 it fell to 1·01. The 4,431 arrests of women for drunkenness and drunken offences in 1886, representing as it does nearly one-sixth of the whole number of arrests for that year for those causes, and although a large number of those arrests stand for the same individuals, female drunkards being arrested much oftener than males, discloses nevertheless a terribly widespread evil, and the state of domestic misery, squalor, and degradation which these figures mean can hardly be exaggerated. They tell their own story, and no one can mistake their meaning :—

It is perhaps hardly necessary to go through the questions suggested by Cardinal Manning in detail. Unfortunately the consequences of drink which are stated in them will be found from statements scattered all through the evidence to be as prevalent in this country, and more particularly in the metropolis, as they are in Great Britain. It cannot be contested that excessive drinking carries with vice and immorality domestic discord, misery, want, and crime. A class of cases which have formed the subject of judicial comment is constantly being exhibited in our Divorce Court, where drink has been the direct agent in the breaking-up of homes; they will be referred to when we come to deal with the relative merits of the gaol and reformatory treatment of confirmed drunkards. The present observations may be concluded by a few remarks upon the evidence which has been brought before the Commission with regard to drink as a cause of lunacy.

There can be no doubt that in a large number of cases lunacy has been due to habits of excessive drinking; but a full consideration of the evidence adduced leads to the belief that the popular estimate of drink as a factor in lunacy is far higher than the facts would warrant. The majority of witnesses appear to be inclined to hold that lunacy arising from this cause does not amount to a greater proportion at most than 15 per cent. of the cases which have come before them in lunatic asylums, and even this figure is not reached except after allowance and correction by some of the most important witnesses. Thus we have Dr. Manning, to whose evidence evidence we are disposed to attribute great weight, telling us that the figures given in a return prepared on the 15th May, 1884, by an order of the Legislative Assembly, represent about the proportion of inmates who are permanently in the asylums though they do not by any means present a fair proportion of the cases admitted which are due to drink. The figures given are 137 patients out of 2,450 or  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Sir Alfred Stephen, it may be remarked, regards this proportion as very striking. Dr. Manning further states that the admissions during ten years from the 1st January, 1869, to the 31st December, 1878, which were due to drink amounted to upwards of 8 per cent., and for the next five years—1880–1884—to 11 per cent. Quoting Dr. Herbert Major, Medical Superintendent of the largest asylum in Yorkshire, he tells us that the average amounts to 13 or 14 per cent. Dr. Manning admits, however, that a very large proportion of temporary insanity is due to drink, but this form of insanity is curable by abstinence and a proper diet. A very large number of cases are stopped in the Reception House. “During 1885 there were 362 cases remanded from the Police Court—211 recovered in the Reception House; 140 were sent to the Asylum; 4 died; and 7 remained at the end of the year. Of the 211 who recovered in the Reception House, I am quite sure that three-fourths were due to drink. In the up-country gaols in the same year 413 were received under remand for medical treatment because they had shown to the police signs of temporary insanity—125 were sent to hospitals; 242 were discharged as sane in due course, and I have every reason to think that fully three-fourths of these latter cases were due to drink;” but of these it must be borne in mind that a large number were repeating instances in both cases. The general conclusion to be derived from the evidence of this witness would appear to be that the excessive use of alcohol has the effect, if continued, of altering the tissue of the brain, but that it more readily affects the tissues of the liver and kidneys; and, taking other testimony into account, it would seem that in healthy subjects death is more likely to result than insanity. The figures, however, obtained in this Colony do not accurately indicate the percentage of lunacy, because admission to our asylums is less easy than in England, and, making due allowance on this account, and taking into consideration the general experience derived from observations upon the excessive use of alcohol, we may fairly conclude that drunkenness is responsible for something like 11 or 12 per cent. of the cases of lunacy admitted to our asylums.

The opinions of other medical witnesses do not differ greatly from that expressed by Dr. Manning. We must, however, except those of Mr. Fowler, Superintendent of the Reception House for the Insane, at Darlinghurst, and Dr. Tucker. Mr. Fowler says, speaking from an experience of twenty-four years, that three cases of insanity out of five are due to excessive drinking. He speaks only of those who pass through his hands, but is of opinion that many cases of delirium tremens end in confirmed lunacy; and Dr. Tucker tells us that after visiting between 500 and 600 asylums in other parts of the world, and being supplied by their Superintendents with returns showing the causes or supposed causes of insanity, he would say, speaking from memory, that at least 80 per cent. of these institutions return the largest number of cases as having been produced by drink. In one of his answers (5027) he says, “My opinion coincides with that of Dr. Wilkins of San Francisco, who, fourteen or fifteen years ago was employed by his Government to visit lunatic asylums; in his work he says that one-half of the insanity, and probably more, is caused by intemperance.” (See also First Appendix, L.)

On

On the other hand, Dr. Maclaurin and Dr. Mackellar do not consider that any considerable number of permanent cases of lunacy are attributable to drink. Dr. Maclaurin seems to consider that the tendency to drink on the part of persons who subsequently become lunatics is a phase of the complaint, and Dr. Mackellar remarks (4748) "I do not regard drunkenness as by any means a potent cause of lunacy; but I think that large numbers of people become drunkards at the onset of insanity; that is to say drunkenness is one of the very early symptoms of insanity, precisely as other excesses are frequently early symptoms observed before the question of insanity arises. I am perfectly convinced (4749) that the commonly accepted idea that drunkenness is a cause of insanity is quite fallacious, that is, the idea that it is a potent cause of insanity." It must be obvious that if a tendency to drunkenness is to be regarded as an early symptom of insanity the figures given by Mr. Fowler and Dr. Tucker may require considerable correction; but, allowing for this, we conclude, as stated, that the evidence given upon the question, points to a proportion of lunacy due to drink that approaches 12 per cent. It may be gathered generally that this proportion would be materially reduced by an improvement in the quality of the liquor which is generally supplied; but even after such a reduction the figures must suggest the existence of an evil arising from excessive drinking which is deserving of serious consideration if only because it is only one of several to which allusion has been made. In concluding our remarks upon this part of the subject we would add that there is another aspect of excessive drinking which is of the gravest kind. Statistics perhaps can hardly be collected to show the effect of drunkenness in reducing the average term of life. It may not be possible to discover how many lives have been shortened, or by how many years, through excessive indulgence in alcohol; but the whole of the medical evidence points to a deterioration in vital organs from this cause, and there can be no doubt that a large proportion of the population die prematurely from excessive drinking, not immediately only, but in consequence of constitutions deteriorated and debilitated, by drink. Though this consideration must be of less importance than that of the effect of drink in producing widespread misery and degradation among the living, it must be taken into serious account as indicating a loss to the country which we trust may not be wholly unavoidable. And, apart from the value of individual lives thus shortened or destroyed, there is the direct burden upon the country of supporting the surviving dependants.

REPRESSIVE MEASURES: (1) PENAL—(2) REMEDIAL—
(3) RESTRICTIVE.

The methods which have been adopted to check the evil of drunkenness may be divided, roughly, into two kinds. We propose to consider them in their chronological order as adopted among English speaking people. The first plan devised was to treat drunkenness as a crime and to punish the drunkard as a criminal; the second method has been to restrict, as far as has been hitherto possible, the temptations to drink and the facilities for obtaining liquor at all times and in all places. In some countries restriction has been carried to the point of actual prohibition. In the one case it has been sought to deter the drunkard from over-indulgence by punishing drunkenness by fine or imprisonment, and by treating it as a crime in any person to be drunk in a public place even though his drunkenness should not be associated associated with any other wrong-doing. In the other, persons engaging in the business of selling liquor have been compelled by the law to obtain licenses for that purpose, and to conform to certain regulations as to the days and hours during which the sale of liquor may be carried on; and the law has made it discretionary with particular persons or bodies to refuse licenses if in their judgment it would be against the public interest to grant them; the number of houses at which liquor may be sold has been limited; and in certain cases an absolute or limited veto has been placed in the hands of the ratepayers or residents of determinate areas. These endeavours on the part of the Legislature to limit the traffic in liquor will be further dealt with when we come to discuss the question of Local Option. At present we shall briefly consider the first or punitive method of repression.

The system of repression by direct punishment of the drunkard has been tried since the year 1604;* but the regulation of the traffic in drink dates from a much earlier time; and it is perhaps not too much to say that all efforts of the law to check drunkenness by treating it as a crime have ended in complete failure. We have examined a large number of witnesses as to the effects of gaol treatment in this Colony, and cannot find that in a single instance any witness has spoken favourably of it. The plan at present followed is to inflict a fine for drunkenness, and in default of payment to send the drunkard to prison for such a period, within prescribed limits, as the discretion of the magistrate may suggest. "The drunkards," says Sir Alfred Stephen, "come up to the police-courts in batches, and are sent away as a matter of course. I think that the system of fining for drunkenness, as I have seen it myself in practice at police-offices here, more than once, is simply a farce: A man is found beastly drunk by a constable; next morning he is fined so much, or in default so many hours, or so many days; I do not know whether he pays the fine or not; it is folly!" The evidence of the stipendiary magistrates, of Mr. Maclean, Comptroller-General of Prisons, of Mr. Read, Governor of Darlinghurst Gaol, of the medical and clerical witnesses, and of representatives of the working classes, is all to the same effect. They unanimously condemn the present system of short terms of imprisonment. Their testimony may be summed up in the words of Mr. Addison, S.M.: "It is one ceaseless round of punishment; it is simply filling the gaols every week without the slightest amelioration." Mr. Read says, "The gaol is simply a hospital for them [drunkards]—a means of prolonging their lives * * * * * The gaol is like a club for them; they are brought out of the Domain, or perhaps from lying in the gutter. In the course of the day or two which they spend in gaol they are cured and cleansed; otherwise they would not live long. I have had one woman committed between 200 and 300 times for drunkenness." It may be replied to statements of this kind that prisons are made too comfortable for drunkards, and that they ought to be compelled to work; but it must be remembered that, under our present system of short terms of imprisonment, a man who has been indulging in drink to such excess as to bring himself under the notice of the police is frequently not in a condition to perform [any labour. This will be more evident from a reference to the return prepared by Mr. Read (3550), by which it appears that out of 5,869 convictions only five persons were sentenced to terms of imprisonment exceeding seven days. The evidence shows that the only effect of the present system of gaol treatment is to produce a recovery from the condition of prostration brought about by excesses, and that from the moment of, or very shortly after, his discharge, the drunkard has no other intention than to return to his vicious habits. As soon as he is again in a position to earn a little money, that money is spent upon drink, and with the drink comes a return of that condition which brings him again before the magistrate. He goes back to gaol and comes out only to get drunk again. The opinions and experience of more than forty witnesses may be said to support this view directly or indirectly, and we cannot express too strongly our opinion that gaol treatment, in its present form, is utterly powerless—either as a remedy or as a deterrent. As a deterrent it has been shown to be wholly useless in appealing to a floating population of perhaps more than 3,000 habitual drunkards in the metropolitan district alone, for these do not belong to the class which is influenced by one of the most dreaded consequences of imprisonment. They are lost to all sense of shame, and have sunk so low that they regard a few days spent in gaol as a convenient means of recovering from a fit of drunkenness rather than as a punishment for indulging in it.

It need hardly be said that we regard this state of things with the gravest misgivings, and are driven to the conclusion that some material change in the law ought to be made without any delay. It is not probable that any alteration of existing methods in the direction of severer punishments would be sufficient to meet the case. What is wanted is a detention which should be sufficiently prolonged to enable those for whom reform is still possible to break completely away from their habits of continual excess; and it is not believed that this result could be secured by committing habitual drunkards to ordinary gaols for long periods. There are several considerations which lead us to think that such a course would have very unfortunate results. In the first place, it does not seem right that persons imprisoned for drunkenness should be imprisoned in places where they would be liable to consort with ordinary criminals. Putting aside the fact that crime is to some extent contagious, the surroundings in the ordinary gaol are not of the kind which would cultivate that spirit of self-restraint to which alone we can look to effect a permanent cure. Moreover, it may be doubted whether in classing the drunkard with those who have been found guilty of actual crime we are not putting him in a position which must render reform exceptionally difficult. Whatever may be the moral guilt of drunkenness, we know that it is not regarded by the public at large as implying the same disgrace as larceny or embezzlement; and in casting an equal stigma of imprisonment upon the drunkard, we should be throwing difficulties in the way of his leading a better life after liberation. Some proportion also must be observed between different degrees of turpitude, and if persons guilty of drunkenness are to receive the same punishment as those convicted of crimes, it is difficult to see how we can mark the distinction which undoubtedly exists between the drunkard and the criminal. And if a man should, for a particular offence, be sentenced to two or three months in gaol, how shall we deal with him upon a repetition of the offence? Gaols do not reform drunkards, because the necessary machinery does not exist in them for treating drunkards with a view to reformation; and gaol treatment can never be an adequate deterrent, because the punishment of imprisonment cannot, without violating our sense of justice, be allotted for repeated acts of drunkenness on the same principle as in the case of ordinary offences.

And here it may be asked whether we are well advised in regarding drunkenness as a crime at all. Sir Alfred Stephen says, "Either it is a crime or not. If punishable it is punishable because of the dangers to which the State is exposed by drunkenness; otherwise why should I not get drunk if my character was not anything to me?—but drunkenness is a crime in my opinion because of its inevitable tendency to wickedness.” But many things have similar tendencies, and are not treated as being therefore criminal. All excess has a greater or less tendency to result in wickedness, but excess in drink is the only one which the law punishes. However, we do not desire to discuss the abstract principle. We would rather have regard to the practical aspect of the matter and ask whether the present unfortunate conditions are not to some extent due to a mistaken view taken at the outset. Our laws have started with the assumption that drunkenness is a crime, and have treated it accordingly; and now, after many years of experience, we find that our efforts at repression have failed in the most disastrous manner. We have not succeeded in producing any amelioration in the habits of the habitual drunkard, and our gaol treatment, though it has admittedly been instrumental in prolonging the drunkard’s life, has yet done nothing to help or to induce him to reform. Another method now remains to be tried. We may cease to regard the habitual drunkard as a mere criminal to be punished by fine and imprisonment, and inquire whether something may not be accomplished by treating him as one who suffers from a disease which is, to some extent, analogous to temporary or intermittent derangement of mind.

We have been driven to the conclusion that the gaol treatment of drunkards has ended in conspicuous failure, and that any amelioration of present conditions is only to be attained by the adoption of a radically different method. The opinions of a great many witnesses have been sought upon the probable efficacy of reformatory institutions, and it may be said that there is an unanimous expression of opinion favourable to them. The method we propose is that persons convicted of habitual intoxication should be separated from those undergoing sentence for crimes, and that they should be sent to asylums or reformatories specially designed for the treatment of inebriates. The case of those found guilty of crimes in connection with drunkenness must of course receive special consideration; but it does not appear to present any grave difficulty. We proceed, however, to deal first with those whose case is one of habitual drunkenness only. From the evidence before us we are led to believe that the chief requisite for these persons is a prolonged seclusion in an institution specially adapted to meet their case. Dr. Manning says (4057) “More good, however, could be done for these people in inebriate asylums, because they could be detained a longer time. It is necessary to talk to and advise them; to feed them in the manner I have suggested, and to restore their health; and they come out after a residence of one, two, or three months, certainly more fitted to face the world. But in the reception-house or the gaol, where they are treated only for a matter of a fortnight or ten days at the longest, there is no good done, except temporarily and by saving life and reason.” The opinions of other experts also appear to be in harmony with the view of Dr. Manning. We would therefore recommend the establishment of “Inebriate Asylums” wholly distinct from those designed for ordinary lunatics, and that habitual drunkards should no longer be sent to the ordinary gaols. Power should be given to magistrates to commit such drunkards to these institutions for periods varying from (say) three months up to eighteen months, or two years, according to the number of previous convictions recorded against them or the gravity of the case in other respects. These asylums should be made as far as possible self-supporting, and the labour of the inmates should be utilized for that purpose. The evidence before us goes to show that the labour of persons who would be unable to work at first would, in most cases, be available after a short period of treatment. Dr. Manning, speaking of a case of this kind, says, "After a week or about ten days he would recover his health, so that during the remainder of his stay—which in my opinion should not be a short one—he would be employed to a great extent in earning his own living, and reducing the expense of the institution. I think, as a rule, it would be very unwise to commit people for a shorter period than three months. I should very much prefer six months to deal with these cases, and during five months of that period a large majority would be able to work." (4058) "You think that the State might go so far as to punish the habitual drunkard by committing him to six months seclusion? Decidedly. Because, in addition to punishing him, you are improving his health, and giving him a chance to do well in the world. The sentence which deprives him of his liberty is also doing him a great good by giving him a chance of reformation, and putting him in a condition of health to enable him to do so." A reference to the evidence on the subject of Gaol Treatment will show that the witnesses have in every instance expressed opinions which agree substantially with those of Dr. Manning. Some of them, it is true, observe that it is necessary that we should not be too sanguine about the results of the course recommended; but all concur in the belief that marked good would result from the establishment of institutions based upon the lines indicated, and if, as remarked by one witness, only one third of the cases treated were reclaimed, the resulting advantage would not only be very great, but a marked diminution would be effected in the general cost of the system. Repeating our recommendation then, we think that two or more stipendiary magistrates in the metropolitan district, and two magistrates in the country districts, one being a police magistrate, should be empowered to commit habitual drunkards to Inebriate Asylums, for such periods of not less than three months, or more than two years, as they might think advisable; that it should be competent to the inebriate or his friends to apply at intervals of not less than three months for release; and that if upon a consideration of, and due inquiry into, the case, the Superintendent and two duly qualified medical men should be of opinion that he had become permanently reformed, the inebriate should be released with or without conditions. But we are strongly of opinion that the system should be extended to meet cases other than those which come before the Police Courts in the ordinary way. There is a large class of persons whose habits of intoxication are a misery to themselves and their relations and friends, but whose excesses do not bring them—except in the last stage of their career—before the public. Many of these bring degradation upon themselves and their families from an insane and irresistible craving for drink. Many cases which come before the Divorce Courts are of this kind. Men who have acquired the habit of drink break away from their homes and leave their wives and families to support themselves or to sink into destitution; and too often, if the deserted wife is successful in supporting herself, the husband returns only to force her to purchase a period of quiet by the sacrifice of her savings. Very often these people are merely drunkards, but drunkards who could be reclaimed were it possible to place them under restraint. Under existing conditions, however, there is no resource but the Divorce Court, or an application perhaps under the Deserted Wives Act, and, in neither case, does the remedy touch the true seat of the mischief. There are also large numbers of persons whose friends are obliged to contemplate helplessly their downward course. They are quite unable to resist their craving for drink, but are kept from falling into the hands of the police, and yet nothing can be done to reform or restrain them.

It has been remarked that a vast amount of poverty is due to drink; and that the largest proportion of crime is committed under its influence. We believe that much of the evil so arising would be preventible if proper means were taken to enable the friends of habitual drunkards, or the victims themselves, to procure or submit to, proper restraint. It is, indeed, probable that many of the latter would voluntarily submit to seclusion for a fixed period with a view to treatment; and this system, which has been tried in England and in America, has been found to yield satisfactory results. We, however, desire to go much farther, and would recommend that habitual drunkards, on proper proof being given of their condition, should be committed to inebriate asylums on the application of their friends, in a manner similar to that which now obtains in the case of lunatics. In answer to the question whether he would approve of such a system, Dr. Maclaurin says, "I have always looked on that as a thing which is absolutely necessary for the protection of these people. Take the case of a man or woman, the father or mother of a family, who for some reason or other gives way altogether and becomes a grovelling drunkard; we know in many cases it has come on acutely, and we know that in all likelihood, if he or she were put under restraint, a very great improvement and possibly permanent cure might result; as the law now exists it is quite impossible to do it; you have no means whatever of doing it, unless you chose to swear that such a person is insane. I think such an institution would be exceedingly beneficial, and in fact should be established without any delay."

The class last mentioned has been noticed before that class who combine crime, more or less serious, with a state of intoxication; and it is evident that if the system which we recommend be introduced, there will be different classes of persons for whom different provision would have to be made. For the last-mentioned class, indeed, it would seem that some special kind of reformatory would have to be provided unless it be considered sufficient for the present that a term of imprisonment should be inflicted for the criminal act, and a period of treatment in an asylum be ordered for the purpose of dealing with that condition of drunkenness with which the crime was combined. It may be questioned whether a practice of treating persons guilty of crime under the influence of drink as lunatics might not give rise to the idea that in the contemplation of the law the drunkard is not responsible for his actions. It is therefore obviously desirable to distinguish simple drunkenness however habitual from drunkenness associated with crime, in such a way as to indicate that, in endeavouring to cure the drunkard, the State has no intention of departing from the principle that drunkenness is not an excuse for crime. The danger attending departure from that principle is too obvious to require illustration. We do not, therefore, recommend that drunkards who may associate criminal acts with intoxication should be in any way relieved of any liability under the present law; but that there should be superadded to such liability (particularly in the case of persons committing offences punishable by short terms of imprisonment) a period to be undergone in the reformatory asylum. It is further suggested that it should be discretionary with the magistrates to say whether the imprisonment should precede or follow the period of treatment, the decision to depend upon the condition of the offender in each case.

It

It will now become evident that at least two kinds of asylum will be necessary if the system recommended is to be carried out. It is hardly likely that persons addicted to drink will voluntarily submit themselves to confinement, or that their friends, in the majority of cases, will take action to place them under restraint, if the institution to which they are to be consigned is to be common to voluntary cases and to persons confined by order of the magistrates, and some of whom have been found guilty of crimes. Neither are existing lunatic asylums adapted for the treatment of the former class, the evidence of witnesses pointing to the conclusion that it is almost as inexpedient that inebriates should mix with lunatics as with criminals. Among the classes, moreover, who would be placed in confinement by their own consent or the desire of their friends, there would be a considerable percentage who would be in a position to pay for their own cost and for extra comfort. These persons, therefore (who may be described as voluntary patients, to distinguish them from the class committed by the magistrates), would be placed in two divisions—those, namely, who would pay for their own cost, and those who would be maintained at the cost of the State, and the labour of the latter might be utilised to reduce the expense of their maintenance as far as possible. We, therefore, recommend the establishment of an institution, based somewhat on the lines of existing asylums, for the treatment of these voluntary patients, to which admission should be obtained upon the consent of the inebriate, or at the desire of his immediate relatives, upon sufficient medical certificates, with the provision for release before mentioned.

The other or quasi-criminal class would probably be best dealt with according to the method described by Mr. Read (see answers to questions, 3474—3487), namely, a mixed penitentiary and inebriate asylum. Mr. Read recommends that after twelve, fifteen, or twenty convictions for drunkenness within a year, the offender should go to a penitentiary under sentence of perhaps eighteen months, with a provision that the Government should, upon the recommendation of the authorities, pass him over to the inebriate asylum. "I would," he says, "make the position at the inebriate asylum something that a man or woman would try to work into from the other place; although they would both be costly places the general effect upon the community would be a monetary advantage," and he thinks that both places combined would have a deterrent effect. We are not prepared to go with Mr. Read so far as to require twelve, fifteen, or twenty convictions before sentencing habitual offenders to a term in the establishment described. We think that, as previously stated, a far less number of convictions would be sufficient to justify commitment. In some cases two or three months in the inebriate asylum alone might be found to work as a deterrent; and only upon a certain number of repeated convictions after release should we advocate the longer term suggested by Mr. Read.

In both classes of asylums the treatment must be curative; but, whether in voluntary or in quasi-criminal cases, it is believed that prolonged confinement would act not only as a remedy, but as a deterrent from future excesses.

It may be objected that the change will entail a heavy expense, and it must be conceded that the outlay will of necessity be considerable. Upon the question of expense we applied to the best authority within our reach—Dr. Manning—and his estimate estimate for inmates for the indigent class is about £27 per head annually. (See First Appendix, I.) In his letter communicating that estimate, Dr. Manning points out that it depends very greatly on—

- “1st. The number of inmates, since the staff officers required would serve almost as well for 200 as for 50, the only addition required for the former number being a certain extra number of warders.
- “2nd. The position chosen for the institution and the provision in the shape of fences, &c., to prevent escape. If an island is selected the number of warders will, of course, be less than on the main land, and if the fences are difficult to climb the number required will be less than if the grounds are open and easily left.
- “3rd. The accessibility or otherwise to contractors for provisions, &c. If near a large town, so that there will be competition for the supply, and no large cost in delivery, the cost under this head will be decidedly less than if in an inaccessible situation.”

With corrections and allowances under the above heads, Dr. Manning estimates the cost per head at £27.* This estimate, he states, is for the indigent or pauper class, who, he supposes, will be supported entirely by the Government, and is a liberal one, especially for provisions, medical comforts, &c.; he also states that he has made no allowance for the labour of the inmates, but presumes that a fair proportion will be employed on the farm in raising vegetables and farm produce for consumption, and in keeping the buildings clean and in good repair, some perhaps in erecting new buildings. But in addition to the cost of buildings, and of the staff of superintendents and subordinate officials, it must be admitted, we think, that the State will be to a large extent responsible for the maintenance of the families of those whom it may be necessary to confine for long periods. This obligation must, however, be discounted by the fact that many of these latter already fall directly or indirectly as a burden upon the community. Those who should be the bread-winners of their families contribute but little to their support, and nothing when in gaol, and the added burden to the State would probably be less than might be supposed. But when all the probable cost of the change has been admitted, and it must be allowed that in any case it will be heavy, we are impressed with the fact that as the State derives an enormous revenue from the liquor traffic, viz., for Customs, £823,076, for Excise in beer, £124,867, and for retail and wholesale licenses, £105,630, a certain responsibility rests upon it to see that the traffic is carried on with the minimum of evil to those who contribute so much to the Public Treasury. Out of the large amount (more than a million sterling) derived by the State, directly and indirectly, from the consumption of alcohol, it is believed that something may well be given to diminish the evil effect of it. And beyond this consideration another remains. If there be any truth in our premises or soundness in our conclusions, we are recommending a system which must have a tendency to diminish the evils of habitual drunkenness year by year, to lessen the numbers of those who at present fill our gaols, to save lives that now are prematurely cut off, and to increase alike the social, moral, and material welfare of our people.

* The average yearly cost of a prisoner is £15, for guarding and rations. (See evidence of the Comptroller-General of Prisons, Minutes of Evidence, p. 145; also, First Appendix F.)

Before leaving this subject we would draw attention to the extraordinary unanimity of the witnesses selected to represent the artisan classes in condemning the gaol treatment of drunkenness, and demanding, as a substitute for it, the reformatory treatment here recommended. It seemed no objection to those witnesses that perhaps some of their own class, nay even that themselves, might be deprived by that treatment of their personal liberty for a possible period of a year or eighteen months; neither did it appear to the most thoughtful among them that the hardship which by reason of a husband's or wife's detention might be suffered by his or her family, ought to be considered as an insuperable objection, in view of the reformation of the patient by means of the curative treatment which can only be properly carried out during a protracted detention. We are bound to confess that this unanimity took us by surprise, for we expected that the objections above indicated would have been held very strongly by these witnesses. Instead of that being the case, the "Inebriate Asylum" appears to have been accepted by them almost with enthusiasm. On the other hand we cannot conceal from ourselves that there is absolutely no precedent in Europe, America, or the Colonies for the proposed system of committal to asylums instead of to gaols. The Habitual Drunkards Act of England provides merely for voluntary seclusion; and perhaps that is the principal reason why it is of so little practical value in reducing the evil of drunkenness. All other reformatory systems of which we have been able to learn any particulars, have been either comparative failures, or have a very limited remedial effect; and none of them, as far as we know, provide the unthrifty or the indigent classes with a means of recovering their self-respect, or their value to the community of which they happen to be members, by compulsory seclusion. The absence of any exemplar of the kind of drunkards' reformatory which we recommend, necessarily deepens the feeling of responsibility with which we make the recommendation. But the case of our drunkards is, and must always be, so grave that no scheme of reformation ought to be discarded, because no similar scheme has been brought into successful operation elsewhere.

A few words remain to be said on another aspect of this question. It may be claimed by those who demand the immediate introduction of the Permissive Prohibition System, and by those who would place the Colony under a Maine Liquor Law, that under their method, there will be no room for inebriate asylums. There could be no greater delusion. No repression of the evil of drunkenness, whether by the play of Local Option, or by absolute legislative prohibition, can relieve a community like ours of its large contingent of drunkards. We believe that legislation, political organizations, and the temperance missionary can do much to mitigate the evils of drunkenness, but they cannot, at least within any reasonable time, relieve us of our formidable quota of inebriates, or of the obligations imposed on the state by their existence.

We now come to the consideration of the last method of repression, which we will here treat as falling under the Restrictive Class.

It was to be expected that a subject on which the opinions of intelligent men, both in public and private life, are in such pronounced discord as they undoubtedly are on the question of "Local Option," would also divide the opinions of the many thoughtful and influential witnesses whose views upon this most important but embarrassing question have been elicited during the Inquiry. Accordingly we find that a large number of witnesses, while admitting that the instalment of "Local Option" embodied in the present law has had effects more or less beneficial in preventing the increase of public-houses, are opposed to the extension of the principle; some absolutely and without reservation, others, unless compensation is provided for houses of which the licenses should not be renewed; others, again, and among them the Inspector-General of Police, while in favour of the general principle, think that an extension of it would not induce people to take the trouble of voting. On the other hand, Sir Alfred Stephen is in favour of applying the principle of Local Option to determine the number of houses in each licensing district by a popular vote, and also for the purpose of reducing the number of unnecessary houses by abolishing, without compensation, those in which breaches of the law had been committed. The Stipendiary Magistrates are much divided in their views of the question. (See Epitome of the Evidence on Local Option.) The Comptroller-General of Prisons prefers fixing a high standard of house to the operation of Local Option, and the Inspector-General of the Insane favours the law as it now stands, if the franchise were extended. Bishop Barry is in favour of Local Option and would extend the franchise to the Parliamentary electors, but holds that if the system is extended to renewals, compensation must be provided, which might be furnished partly from a local fund and partly from the Consolidated Revenue. He further thinks that a certain number of years' notice before putting the extended system into force would mitigate the hardship to the licensee, though possibly not to the owner, of premises of which the license should not be renewed. The Rev. R. Sellors and Dr. Jefferis are both in favour of an extension of the principle, and would give a few years' notice rather than compensation. Mr. Shearston also is in favour of full Local Option. And, provided compensation be given for closed houses, both Mr. Thompson (late President of the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association), and Mr. Watson, of the "Paragon Hotel," are in favour of Local Option, and the former, of an extension of the franchise. But another witness, and one whose opinion on this subject is entitled to very great weight—Sir John Robertson—while expressing himself distinctly in favour of the principle of Local Option, thinks that the people take but very little interest in it, and that therefore nothing would be gained by extending the franchise to the Parliamentary electors. The two representatives of the Local Option League expressed the opinions which are tolerably familiar to the public, and seemed to agree in thinking that the form of Local Option provided by the Queensland Act would meet the requirements of the various temperance organizations. The representatives of the artisan classes were almost unanimous in their endorsement of Local Option, probably because it appeared to them to assert a democratic principle; but they had given but little attention to compensation and other difficulties which beset the practical application of the principle.

The mere enumeration of all these discordant, doubtfully expressed, or hesitating opinions will be sufficient to show that the Commission have not succeeded in obtaining by means of the evidence within their reach any solution of the problem which has exercised thinking men for so many years, viz.: How the public voice can be made effectively and yet equitably operative on the drink traffic?

But while we frankly admit that the problem can hardly be advanced a stage nearer solution by any recommendations we are in a position to make, yet we hope that the views expressed by some of the witnesses, when studied in the Minutes of Evidence, will not be without some influence in moulding public opinion.

This

This single question—Local Option—is of itself sufficient to engage the attention of a Commission, and to justify all the labour that could be bestowed in working out and examining its details; but your Excellency's Commission had neither the time nor the materials for an exhaustive inquiry; and the attention of its members was bespoken for many other subjects of investigation which could not be placed in the background or postponed.

Nevertheless, we are not altogether in the condition of Judges to whom nothing is left but the summing up of the evidence. We are able to make a very important and substantial recommendation in restriction of the drink traffic, and we are happy to be in a position to do so upon the evidence of our own witnesses.

But before making any proposition of the character referred to, we would, in as short a compass as possible, give a résumé of our present "Local Option" system, as well as of others now in operation in our neighbourhood and in Canada, accompanied by a brief description (so far as we have been able to learn) of their results.

We will begin with our own. By the Licensing Act of 1882 (which was introduced by Sir Henry Parkes) as amended by the Act of the following year two concurrent methods of limiting and regulating the liquor traffic are recognised. One is by the votes of ratepayers in the City of Sydney and the Municipalities. Of the results of these votes the Licensing Courts are required to take judicial notice. The other is by means of specific objections lodged before the licensing authorities by residents, or the police authorities, against the grant, renewal, transfer, or removal of any specific license for the retailing of liquors. Neither brewers' nor spirit merchants' licenses are within the operation of these provisions. The ratepayers' influence on the liquor traffic is shown by sections 34 of 45 Vic. No. 14 (the Principal Act) and 13 of 46 Vic. No. 24 (the Amending Act), and they describe the mode in which this influence is to be exercised, the effect of the affirmative and negative vote, and the limits of its operation. After the 1st January, 1882, the licensing authorities were prohibited from granting new publicans' licenses, or permitting the removal of such licenses from one public-house to another, in any ward of the City of Sydney, or in any Municipality, whether sub-divided into wards or not, in any case in which the Ward or Municipal ratepayers' negative should exceed their affirmative votes by one-twentieth of the aggregate of votes polled. If that proportion of negative over affirmative votes is not reached the voting is wholly inoperative for the local option period, which is three years from the date of the Gazette notification of the result of the voting. The Polls, therefore, and their operative effect, are triennial. But hotels containing not less than twenty rooms in addition to the minimum statutory number (viz., two sitting and four sleeping rooms for public accommodation) are withdrawn from the operation of the ratepayers' votes. In the City of Sydney the first vote was required to be taken within sixty days after the commencement of the Act (1 January, 1882). The next vote was taken on December, 1885. The third vote will be due in December, 1888. In Municipalities, other than the City of Sydney, the first vote was taken in February, 1882; the second in February, 1885; and the next vote will be due in February, 1888,—in each case the voting being simultaneous with the annual election of Aldermen.

Two questions only are asked of the voters, to which they must answer "Yes" or "No," viz.:—

- (1.) Shall any new publicans' licenses be granted in respect of premises situate within that Ward or Municipality for the period of three years from this date?
- (2.) Shall any removals of publicans' licenses be granted in respect of premises situate within the Ward or Municipality for the period of three years from this date?

If, in any case, no ratepayers' vote shall have been taken pursuant to the Act or the voting shall, for any reason, have been abortive, the vote is to be taken at the next annual election of aldermen; and in those cases the term of three years is to count from the taking of an effective ratepayers' vote.

The voting, by the Amending Act, is required to be taken distributively in respect of each of the foregoing questions, but the prescribed proportion ( $\frac{1}{20}$ ) of affirmative votes is retained, both in respect of the vote as it affects new licenses, and as it affects removals of licenses.

The Officers authorized to conduct the Civic or Municipal Elections, as the case may be, are utilized for the purpose of taking the local option vote, but no scrutiny is required. The result of the voting is certified to the Minister charged with the administration of the Licensing Acts by the Returning Officers, and he causes such results to be gazetted within seven days after receipt of the certificates. The expenses incident to the taking of these votes are paid by the Municipal authorities.

The results of the Local Option Voting throughout the Colony have been collected for the years 1882 and 1885 (see First Appendix W), but the subjoined Table presents those results in such a form that a comparison of the voting for the two years will be simplified. It also shows the comparative percentages of Votes to Voters on the Rolls:—

*The suburban Municipalities comprised in the Local Option voting for 1882, and those comprised in the voting for 1885, have been assimilated as far as practicable, for the purposes of this table, in order that the same areas might be brought into comparison.

From this table it will be seen that while in 1882 the total number of votes polled compared with voters on the citizens' roll was, for the City of Sydney, only 1,040 out of 6,936 voters, or 14.9 per cent.; in 1885 the votes polled were 3,105 out of 7,963 voters, or 38.9 per cent., an increase of city local option voting in the wards equal to 24 per cent. In the country municipalities, i.e., those not included in the suburban list, out of a roll of 31,415 voters, only 9,117, or 29 per cent. voted in 1882, while in 1885, out of a roll of 36,347 voters, 10,079, or 27.7 per cent. voted—a decrease of 1.3 per cent. On

On the other hand, when we come to the suburban municipalities, we find that, while out of a roll of 25,863, 7,878, or 30·4 per cent. voted in 1882, in 1885, out of a roll of 33,617, only 7,524 or 22·3 per cent. voted—a decrease of 8·1 per cent.

The interest taken in the Local Option Vote has, therefore, increased in a somewhat marked degree in the city wards, has slightly decreased in the country municipalities, and has appreciably decreased in the suburban municipalities.

On the whole, it would appear that the interest taken by the ratepayers of the Colony in declaring their opinions, locally, within the limits to which those opinions are confined by the Licensing law now in force, has, when represented in figures, decreased from 28 to 26·5 per cent. of enrolled voters.

But it must not be forgotten by those who would otherwise derive some encouragement from this comparison of the Sydney voting of 1882 with that of 1885, and who might, with some reason, claim from the Legislature that larger measure of influence on the Metropolitan Drink Traffic, which the increasing popularity of the Local Option principle within the city wards would seem to justify,—it must not be forgotten by those persons, we repeat, that, according to the existing system, the vote, under one aspect, has a direct tendency to establish a monopoly in the retail trade, by restraining the increase of public houses in each voting area. The monopolists, therefore, and their supporters, or in other words the representatives of vested interests have a distinct encouragement held out to them to vote “No” in answer to both questions on the voting paper, inasmuch as each grant of a new license, or removal of an outside license to premises situate within the voting area, may augment the competition of trade to their disadvantage, and, in thickly-inhabited areas, would certainly do so. Of course it would be impossible for us to offer, even conjecturally, any estimate of the number of persons, directly or indirectly interested in the liquor traffic, who have voted in favour of Local Option by answering the statutory questions in the negative. We must, therefore, content ourselves with drawing attention to the fact that our present system, if it does not give a direct encouragement to monopoly, at least gives an effect to the influence of vested interests calculated to neutralise the influence of that opinion to which it was the purpose of the Licensing Act to give full and fair play. We shall have to recognise, further on, the same tendency in the Local Option provisions of other countries.

Victorian Local Option comes next for consideration.

By the Act (49 Vic. No. 857) introduced into the Victorian Legislature in 1885 by Mr. (now Sir Graham) Berry, and passed with great difficulty, though not in the form in which it was submitted, Victoria is divided into Licensing Districts, each of which has a Licensing Court, and is coextensive with a division of an Electoral District. For every district the Act provides what is called a “Statutory number” of victuallers’ or liquor licenses. That number is 1 for each 250 inhabitants of a district up to the first 1,000, and a further 1 for each 500 inhabitants over 1,000.

That number must not be exceeded; but exception is made in favour of road-side inns, subject to certain conditions, and also in favour of large hotels containing not less than thirty bedrooms, also subject to conditions. If the number of victuallers’ licenses in any district be below the statutory number it may, by determination determination of the electors, be increased to the statutory number, or to any number below the statutory number. If the number of such licenses is in excess of the statutory number for the district it may similarly be reduced to the statutory number.

Grocers' licenses are subject to the electors' votes in districts on the same principle. And in every case the determination of the electors is effective for three years; but in the case of grocers' licenses, the statutory number is one for each full 500 of the inhabitants of a district.

The number of inhabitants in a licensing district is ascertained in a somewhat arbitrary manner, by multiplying by 5 the number of rate-paying electors on the roll of the electoral division forming the licensing district; the number is then gazetted by the Chairman of the Licensing Court of the district.

The local option vote is obtained on a petition to the Governor-in-Council of at least one-fifth of the electors; and upon the receipt of such a petition from any licensing district, the Governor fixes a day in the month of March for the poll, which is taken by ballot. But to constitute a poll, at least one-third of the whole number of electors on the roll of the licensing district must have voted, otherwise the poll is void.

When a license is discontinued by the operation of these provisions, the occupying lessee and the owner (and mortgagee, if any) of the premises affected become entitled to compensation, which is ascertained by the Licensing Court, and paid out of a Fund created by License Fees, Fines, Penalties and Forfeitures, and, if that fund should be insufficient from such moneys as Parliament should appropriate.

The Victorian Act has only been in operation for some two years. Its efficiency, therefore, in diminishing intemperance has not yet been thoroughly tested, but we are informed that the temperance organisations in that colony have little faith in it, and are already agitating for an amendment of its provisions. (See evidence of Mr. Vale, secretary to the Victorian Alliance.)

Up to the present time the only information we have been able to obtain is contained in the following resumé:—

From a Return, dated 26th August, 1887 (for which we are indebted to the Premier of Victoria), showing the results of the Local Option voting in Victoria, we find that in 1886 there were only ten Licensing Districts in which a vote was taken; that in eight of these districts the vote was void, because less than one-third of the total votes were polled; that in seven of these districts the majority of votes polled were in favour of a decrease of licenses, and in one, of an increase of licenses to the statutory number; that in the two districts where a poll was obtained, the vote was in favour of an increase, to the statutory number of licenses, in Maddingley, and of a decrease to that number in Stratford; also that for these ten districts, out of a total of 6,861 voters, only 1,951 recorded their votes either for or against, average of 28·42 per cent.

We also find that in 1887 there were only nine districts in which a vote was taken, in one of which the vote was limited to grocers' licenses, and this was the only case in which a poll was obtained, the other eight polls being void, for the reason before mentioned; that in eight districts, out of a total of 8,688 voters, only 2,417 recorded their votes, being an average of 27·82 per cent., the number of votes polled not being given in the remaining district, but as the vote was void, and the total number of voters on the roll was 948, the number of votes must have been under 300; therefore, by taking these figures, we get a total of 9,636 voters who have recorded only 2,717 votes, an average of 28.19 per cent., or .23 per cent. less than for 1886.

The Queensland Act, passed in 1885 (49 Vic. No. 18—See extracts in Second Appendix), is undoubtedly the largest advance in Local Option to be found in any of the Australian Colonies. It has, however, been in force a very short time, too short, perhaps, to justify us in predicting for it any considerable measure of success. The following are its principal provisions on the subject of Local Option:—

The colony is divided into Licensing areas, consisting of municipalities or divisions or sub-divisions of municipalities, and the ratepayers are the voters. Not less than one-sixth of the ratepayers in an area may require the chairman of the local authority to take a poll of the ratepayers of such area for or against the adoption of all or any of these propositions.

1. The total prohibition of the sale of liquors.
2. The reduction of licensed houses to a certain number.
3. That no new licenses be granted.

A deposit of £10 must accompany the requisition, and within seven days the returning officer shall cause a notice to be affixed on or near the door of every public-school, post-office, and railway station within the area, or published in a newspaper giving the polling-day; whichever resolution receives two-thirds of the votes in its favour is declared carried.

The voter makes a cross in the space containing the proposition for which he votes.

If the first resolution is carried or adopted, then after the 30th day of June following the polling no person shall sell, barter, or otherwise dispose of liquor within the area, except for arts, manufactures, or medicinal purposes. On the adoption of the second or third resolutions the local authority, upon being notified of the result of the poll, puts them into force within their jurisdiction. The Colonial Treasurer cannot issue a license beyond the number determined in the second resolution. No poll can again be demanded in respect of the first resolution (if carried) within three years, and of the second and third resolutions within two years. If all resolutions are rejected, no poll can be taken within two years; the expenses of the poll are paid out of the municipal or divisional funds. No compensation is given by the Queensland Act.

The following information respecting the working of the Act has been gleaned from the latest official returns:—

From a Return (see First Appendix, Z), furnished by the Chief Inspector of Distilleries, Queensland, showing the results of the Local Option voting in that Colony, we find that in 1886 a vote was taken in nine districts, that the third resolution—"That no new licenses shall be granted"—seems to have been the only one which was voted on; and that although the number of votes recorded was very small, the majority was always in favour of the resolution. That in 1887 the vote was taken in six districts, in one of which the majority was against the third resolution, the majority in the other five being in favour of it; and no more interest seems to have been taken in the voting for that than for the previous year.

The

The following extract is from the Report for 1887 of the Chief Inspector of Distilleries for Queensland :

“ In the Fernvale District the small number of votes polled shows the slight interest taken in the proceedings, and does not show the feelings of the ratepayers of this division. Another phase of this section—which, I think, was not contemplated by the Legislature—is a case in which a storekeeper in a certain township, who was at variance with the local and only publican, determined to open an opposition hotel. The publican, on learning this, immediately canvassed the district, and, under the 3rd sub-section—“ That no new houses were to be opened ”—failed to carry his point in having a monopoly of the business for a term of years. It is also noticeable the want of interest in taking advantage of the powers which “ The Licensing Act of 1885 ” gives in this direction, and for which such persistent demands were made for its introduction.”

The provisions of the New Zealand Act on this subject may be very briefly stated (See also Extracts in Second Appendix) :—

The chairman of every Licensing District every three years appoints by advertisement a day for taking a vote of the ratepayers as to whether the publicans' wine, accommodation, or bottle licenses in such district shall or shall not be increased. The voting papers contain affirmative and negative lines as to increase in publicans' wine, accommodation, and bottle licenses respectively, and the voter strikes out the proposition he intends to vote against. A bare majority decides the question. The affirmation of the advisability of an increase does not compel the Licensing Committee to issue new licenses.

Local option is not in force within special districts.

Of the working of that Act we have no very satisfactory information, but from what we are able to gather, it does not appear to satisfy any party in that Colony.

The Canada Temperance Act of 1878 (commonly known as the Scott Act) as recently amended, is a permissive prohibition Act deserving, we think, the most prominent position in existing Local Option or Permissive Prohibition Legislation. Its principal features are these :—

The second part of this Act prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquor, unless it be for exclusively sacramental or medicinal purposes, or for bona fide use in some art, trade, or manufacture. Sacramental wine is to be sold only on certificate of a clergyman, liquor for medicinal purposes on that of a doctor, and for art, manufactures, &c., on that of two Justices and the applicant. Distillers and brewers can sell not less than 10 gallons of spirits or 8 gallons of beer to licensed druggists or persons who undertake to convey it for sale outside the proclaimed district or beyond an adjoining district which has also been proclaimed. Merchants and tradesmen and manufacturers of pure native wines may do the same, and 10 gallons may be sold by incorporated companies of vigneron without limit of area.

The penalties for offences under this part are, for the first offence, 50 dollars fine; for the second, 100 dollars' fine; and the third and subsequent offences, imprisonment not exceeding two months, principal and agent alike. Possession of liquor prima facie evidence of offence. To bring this into force in any district a petition, signed by one-fourth of the electors qualified to vote at elections of members of the House of Commons for the country or city, must be presented to the Governor in Council. This petition asks that the votes, for and against, of the electors may be taken as to the adoption of the petition, which prays that the prohibitory provisions of the Act may be put in force in the district. Evidence must be given as to the bona fides of the signatories and deposited with the Sheriff or Registrar of Deeds ten days before the petition is laid before the Secretary of State, with a declaration that two weeks previous to such deposit notice was twice given in two newspapers.

When the Governor is satisfied, a proclamation is issued containing all particulars of the petition and fixing the date and place of polling and declaration of the poll, and the date on which, if adopted, the Act will come into force in the district. No polling takes place on the day of election for Parliament or local Legislature. Agents for both sides, one each for polling booths, and two for each side at the scrutiny of votes, are appointed; these make declarations that they are interested for or against the adoption of the petition, and take oaths of secrecy.

If one half of the votes are against the adoption of the petition it is rejected. If more than one half are in favour, it is declared adopted.

An appeal to a Judge for scrutiny of the votes can be made, the appellant depositing 50 dollars.

The ballot-paper contains two spaces, the upper in favour of the adoption of the petition, the lower against. The voter makes a cross in the space containing the proposition which he is in favour of.

Penalties are provided for impersonation and fraudulent practices.

If the petition is rejected, no similar petition can be put to the vote for three years. If it is adopted, an Order in Council issues within sixty days, and the second part of the Act comes into force when the annual or semi-annual licenses expire, provided that date be not less than ninety days after the issue of such Order in Council; if less than ninety days, then on a like day in the following year. An amending Act reduces this to thirty days, when no licenses are then in force. No Order in Council can be revoked within three years, nor unless upon a vote of more than one-half in favour of such revocation, on petition, signed by one-fourth of the electors.

No compensation to the holders of existing licenses who may lose them by the operation of the Act is provided.

Upon the working of the Scott Act we have the evidence of two Canadian gentlemen, Messrs. C. B. Hayes and J. H. Moore:—

Mr. C. B. Hayes states, that the law is evaded by unprincipled people who sell without a license; considers that the law is not enforced, and that the Local Option system under the Scott Act is necessarily a hard one to enforce; is disappointed with the Scott Act. That the fact that persons on one side of an imaginary line can obtain liquor, and those on the other cannot, renders the law inoperative; that it is necessary in order to enforce any prohibitory Act that almost the entire community should be in favour of such prohibition; that it is easier to enforce the Scott Act in the country districts than in the towns.

Mr. J. H. Moore considers that the Scott Act has had the effect of lessening drunkenness, and has been very beneficial to the country; that public sentiment is growing in its favour in Canada. Comparing this Colony with his own country, Mr. Moore believes that the Scott Act is a good one. Having

Having thus briefly reviewed the principle methods by which local public opinion has been made operative in restriction of the traffic in drink, and having, when possible, stated what was known to us of the working of those methods, it remains for us to offer such proposals as—upon a thorough consideration of a subject beset with difficulties and dangers—appear to be most suitable to our circumstances, and best adapted to provide a practical remedy for admitted evils.

In the first place, we will assume that the Legislature will not wholly abandon the principle of Local Option, ineffective though it undoubtedly is, and capable of being misdirected, as we have already pointed out. Our recommendations could be carried out, it is true, independently of Local Option voting; but, it is at least possible that they might be more effectively carried out by an extension of the principle already embodied in our Law.

If these recommendations are, in other respects, thought deserving of consideration and adoption, it will be for the Legislature to decide whether they should be made effective by direct action of the Executive consequent on legislation, or by the agency of the Local Polls.

We begin then by suggesting that the existing law should be amended, so as to extend the franchise for any future Local Option Voting to the Parliamentary elector for the time being. In Sydney the ratepayer and the householder (who ought to have a vote) are by no means convertible terms; but we think that not only should every householder have a vote in all matters connected with the restriction of the drink traffic, but that every person who is qualified to vote for a representative in Parliament ought to have such a vote within his licensing district. For that purpose we would further suggest that Licensing Districts should be made to correspond in area either with Electoral Districts, or with distinct Police Districts, or parts of such Districts within Electoral Districts.

There would be no great difficulty in making the necessary re-arrangement of our Licensing Districts for this purpose; and one obvious advantage in this alteration of the law would be that persons resident or having qualifications in Electoral Districts, but who are not ratepayers because they do not reside in any municipality, would be entitled to vote on subjects which should concern them as much as if they happened to be ratepayers. This proposal in the direction of extending the local option franchise has the approval of nearly all the witnesses examined on this point, and to us it seems to have both equity and common sense in its favour. Moreover, it seems a strange provision of the law which allows a vote to a man only on the condition of his being a ratepayer in a country in which the unincorporated area is said to be to the incorporated more than 150 to 1. A public-house is a good, or an evil wherever it is located; and the issue whether the number of public-houses ought to be increased or diminished is certainly not one which ought to be decided only in incorporated areas.

Simultaneously with the extension of the franchise we would suggest that different issues should in future be tendered to the voters, if our proposed scheme of reduction of public-houses in the City of Sydney, and of controlling the number of licenses in all other districts, be considered appropriate for determination by the voters. That is a decision, as we have already said, for Parliament. We consider, after having given much anxious thought to the matter, that the fixing of a "statutory number" of public-houses for every Licensing District in the Colony, a principle which which has been at various times strongly advocated in England, and been recently adopted in Victoria, is sound and fair, and we recommend its establishment when our licensing law is next remodelled. But we would not, as has been done in Victoria, fix that number according to the population of the Licensing District, but according to the number of parliamentary electors (simply) in the district.

In Victoria the population, as we have pointed out before, is ascertained by multiplying the number of electors on the Electoral Roll of each Licensing District by five. We prefer a simpler plan, and would fix the statutory number by the number of electors.

In the City of Sydney we propose that there should be one liquor license allowed to each eighty electors on the roll. As the electors now number 32,031, that would reduce the number of licenses from 500 (the present number) to 400. According to the Victorian method the statutory number for Sydney would, assuming its population to be 132,846, give only 268 licenses.

The "statutory number" for the rest of the Colony should, we think, be one license for each 100 electors on the roll of the Licensing District; but we would adopt somewhat similar exceptions from the severity of the rule, by excluding wayside inns in thinly peopled districts and distant (so many) miles from one another.

This "statutory number" we would bring into force throughout the Colony on a deferred date, which we think should be five years from the time when the Legislature passed the law declaring the statutory number, or when the votes of the electors brought it into operation. We escape the insurmountable difficulty of "compensation" by this long notice, and we make a fair bargain with vested interests.

But we recommend special provisions for the City of Sydney to bring about the reduction of licenses from 500 to 400, so that only the worst conducted houses and those which are now struggling for existence by retailing bad liquor and having recourse to still more questionable practices, should be weeded out.

To show how public-houses in some parts of Sydney are congested, and how much they must be in excess of the reasonable requirements of the districts we have constructed four plans, the largest of which shows the position of public-houses in Gipps Ward—the position of each being indicated by a pink mark. The other three plans show the positions of public-houses at the Haymarket, King-street, and in the neighbourhood of William and Bourke Streets. These charts may be taken to represent one area of greatest congestion and several areas of moderate congestion. (See plans at the end of this Division.)

The method by which we recommend that the proposed reduction of public-houses in the metropolis by 100 shall be carried out, is as follows:—

A strong Revision Court might be constituted, comprising the Stipendiary Magistrates and Metropolitan Licensing Magistrate, the Mayor of Sydney for the time being, the Inspector-General of Police, the Medical Adviser to the Government, and the Judges of the Metropolitan District Court. This Court should be armed with all necessary powers of inspection and for obtaining evidence, and its first function should be an inquiry into the character, and consideration consideration of the relative positions, of the public-houses in each ward of the city. The reduction should then be proceeded with, and a scheme showing the proscribed houses would then be drawn up and submitted to the Government either for (1) legislative enforcement and consequent departmental action; or (2) legislative embodiment in such a form as to make enforcement consequent only upon local adoption by the Parliamentary electors of the city voting as a whole, and not in wards.

The licensees of the proscribed houses should have the option of surrendering their licenses or of carrying on business (subject to the licensing law in force during the period), for a term of five years. In the first case it might be fair to award to owners and occupants such an amount, by way of compensation, as should be the equivalent of the license fees paid in respect of such houses for the preceding five years. In the second case, no compensation should be awarded, as the term of five years is intended to supersede the necessity of granting compensation.—It is, in fact, the compensation.

This method, it will be observed, provides an alternative. It can be carried out by means of the Local Option vote, or independently of it.

If it should be carried out by means of the Local Option vote, care should be taken that the vote is genuinely representative of the electors' views; and we think that a majority of the electors on the roll should be required to record their votes for or against, to give validity to the voting.

The "statutory number" in Licensing Districts outside the City of Sydney should in our opinion remain a "constant"; but it might be left to the electors to require by petition (as in Victoria) a poll with the view of ascertaining whether the statutory number should in any case be raised, and if so by what number. The effect and duration of such a poll should be the usual term—three years; and the result of the poll would be taken judicial notice of by the licensing authorities.

The polls should, in every case, be made independent of the Municipal elections; and the fixing of place, date, and all other arrangements should be left to the Government; while the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and not the Municipal funds of the various licensing districts, should be charged with the expenses of the voting.

If the statutory number should be found too high or too low for the metropolis or for the suburban or country districts, the Legislature could always be appealed to for a better adjustment.

It is our firm belief, as it is that of a large majority of the witnesses examined by us, including in this number those who spoke as actual customers of the publican, that the number of licensed houses has a direct effect on the amount of intemperance. The report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords on Intemperance already cited by us, is to the same purport. Of all the witnesses who gave us their opinions on this subject, two or three only advocated what they called free trade in the drink traffic, and those could hardly have escaped the "unconscious bias" of their avocations or sympathies. All our evidence, with the small particular exception mentioned, is strikingly unanimous on the effect of this plethora of public-houses in the metropolis. On reference to the epitome of the Evidence on the "Number of Public-houses," or to the Minutes themselves, it will be seen that, outside the sphere of vested interests or sympathies with such interests, there is but one opinion. And it should be noticed that Mr. T. F. Thompson, late President of the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers'

Victuallers' Society, thinks that from 100 to 150 of the lower class houses might well be dispensed with. Mr. Hunt, of the "Oxford Hotel," thinks that there are too many public-houses in the city by at least 200. In the same direction is the testimony of Mr. Watson, of the "Paragon Hotel," Mr. C. W. Roberts, of the "Crown and Anchor." Mr. J. B. Olliffe, of the "Royal Hyde Park Hotel," and formerly a member of this Commission, thinks that at least 100 houses might be done away with without injury to anyone and with advantage to the community. Mr. J. C. Wcale, Secretary to the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association, thinks that in the Metropolitan District the public-houses are too numerous for the population, and that at least 100 and perhaps 150 of them might be dispensed with. Mr. Toohy, M.P., and formerly a member of this Commission, while regarding 830 houses as not too many for the entire Metropolitan Licensing District, thinks that they are in excess within the city boundaries, and should be more evenly distributed. Sir John Robertson, while denying that diminishing the number of public-houses will diminish intemperance, nevertheless thinks that if the number were reduced with the object of raising the standard of the residue and improving the quality of the liquor sold, there would be good reason in such a principle of reduction.

As we claim that our recommendations for reducing the metropolitan number, coupled with our proposals in connection with multiple bars, and for improving the quality of liquors, will of necessity "raise the standard" of public houses, we are encouraged to believe that we have Sir John Robertson on our side.

But, however that may be, we consider that the powerful consensus of opinion on this subject disclosed by the evidence of the representatives of the artisan classes, is alone sufficient to place the burden of proof on those who advocate the continuance of the existing state of things.

We are, nevertheless, familiar with the arguments, accompanied as they have been by elaborately constructed statistics, of those who, like Messrs. Dendy and Poynting before the Select Committee of the House of Lords on Intemperance, are prepared to prove that intemperance does not necessarily vary directly with the increase or decrease of the incentives to it. We do not controvert the able arguments of these gentlemen when applied to the United Kingdom, but we are convinced that, when applied to this Colony, and especially to such a city as Sydney, their conclusions are fallacious, and if carried out to their logical extremes, would be most disastrous.

We prefer on such a point as this the experience of such men as Mr. Chamberlain, M.P., to the opinions of the most accurate statisticians, even if that experience had not been accepted by such a body as the Committee just referred to.

The witness just mentioned gave his opinion in the following terms:—"The enormous number of public-houses, which is clearly out of all proportion to anything like the legitimate wants of the people, must tend to increase the temptation. In the first place, it has its effect on the people; people cannot pass this number of houses without being more tempted than they would with a fewer number. I do not attach much importance to that, but I attach great importance to the number of persons directly interested in increasing the trade. There are 1,900 people in Birmingham with their families, and all the members of their little circle who are under the necessity of making a livelihood out of this trade. If there were only half the number they would do less trade; perhaps not in proportion to the reduction in the number of persons, but still there would be a greater diminution.

Then

Then the number of houses excites competition. Those men living so close together cannot afford to offend their customers in any way, and any demand that is made upon them they must meet, not merely from fear of losing the immediate custom, which they are unwilling to lose, but from fear of losing the whole custom of the man; and there is no doubt that improper practices, such as gambling and such things, are allowed to go on, because the publican, although he may not approve of it, does not like to set his face directly against it."

Before concluding this Division of our Report, we may shortly explain why, in our judgment, the method of reducing public-houses proposed by us is preferable to the local option principle embodied in the Queensland Act; a measure which, it is understood, has been largely accepted by the Local Option League of this Colony.

In the first place, the results of the Queensland Act are not encouraging to those who, above all, desire expedition rather than expediency in dealing with our largely overgrown drink traffic. An Act similar to the Queensland Act might be on our Statute Book for ten years without in any appreciable degree checking an evil which should be dealt with immediately.

In the next place, we doubt whether such a measure as that of Queensland could be passed in this Colony within a reasonably short period; and if passed at all, we doubt if it could be passed without provision for compensation. That question alone is capable of delaying legislation beyond endurable limits; for the comparative facility with which a non-compensation Local Option Act has been carried in that Colony would be no guarantee for a repetition of that good fortune in this Colony.

In the third place, we think the drink question a national one; and not a political question as some members of the Local Option League regard it; still less a local question, to be determined this way in one area, that way in another, and a third way in a third area.

In the fourth place, we are not altogether without some misgivings concerning the probable effects of permissive prohibition in causing a congestion of public-houses along the border of areas from which liquor has been voted out, or in which public-houses are prohibited. (See on this point the evidence of the Canadian witnesses, and of Colonel Ballingall.) Permissive prohibition having (let us suppose) gained the day in Fitzroy Ward, might thereby have merely pushed the drink evil into Gipps Ward, or having gained the day, even for the whole of the Wards, might only have thrust the public-houses into the adjoining suburbs.

This difficulty, it is true, the Local Optionists make light of. "Give us the framework or machinery for prohibiting the drink traffic (they say), and we will soon educate the electors of the Colony, to get rid of it by an almost unanimous vote."

We do not look on the effect of anti-alcohol education or agitation as likely to provide such an early or efficacious remedy as is represented by the Local Optionists. Those who are virtually interested in the drink traffic are a wealthy and a very powerful body, and the weapons of agitation are as familiar to them as to their adversaries. If even they were out-voted in the City wards and were obliged to evacuate their present strongholds, what is there to prevent them from intrenching themselves in the suburbs, or from carrying out the same tactics, which in several of the American States the liquor traffic has found so effective,—the conversion of the drug shop into what is practically a liquor saloon. A powerful organization struggling for existence must, in the long run, outwit any organization which is merely struggling for the triumph of its convictions.

For

For these reasons, and for some among the reasons urged by the Lords Committee on Intemperance against Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Permissive Scheme,* we are disposed to think that the method of reduction which we have recommended is, on the whole, preferable to the Queensland Local Option system, or to any other system the object of which is to transfer to local voters the right to do what hitherto has been the function of their representatives in Parliament, which function, for anything we can see to the contrary, those representatives are still both competent and willing to exercise.

* The following are the provisions of the "Permissive" Bill, and appended to it are some observations of the Committee of the House of Lords on Intemperance:—

"WHEREAS the common sale of intoxicating liquors is a fruitful source of crime, immorality, pauperism, disease, insanity, and premature death, whereby not only the individuals who give way to drinking habits are plunged into misery; but grievous wrong is done to the persons and property of Her Majesty's subjects at large, and the public rates and taxes are greatly augmented.

And whereas it is right and expedient to confer upon the ratepayers of cities, boroughs, parishes, and townships, the power to prohibit such common sale as aforesaid.

At any time from and after the passing of this Act, it should be lawful for or more ratepayers residing in a municipal borough or parish, by notice in writing under their hands, to require the mayor of such municipal borough, or the overseers of the poor of such parish, to take the votes of the ratepayers of such municipal borough or parish respectively, as to the propriety of bringing into operation therein the provisions of this Act.

This Act shall not be adopted within such borough or parish unless at least two thirds of the aggregate number of votes so given as aforesaid be in favour thereof.

If the ratepayers of such borough or parish shall determine in manner aforesaid in favour of the adoption of this Act, it shall be lawful, after the expiration of three years from the commencement of this Act coming into operation, for any ratepayers of such borough or parish again to call upon the mayor of the borough or the overseers of the poor of the parish again, to take the votes of the ratepayers of the borough or parish.

From and after the time limited for the commencement of this Act in any borough or parish, as hereinbefore provided, no license whatever shall be granted or renewed for the sale of alcoholic liquor in such borough or parish; and any person selling or disposing of any alcoholic liquor within such borough or parish shall be dealt with as selling without license, and shall be subject to all the penalties provided for such offence under any Act or Acts of Parliament regulating the sale of alcoholic liquors which may be in force at the time of the adoption of this Act, provided that nothing herein contained shall be held to affect any rules made under the provision of any statute permitting the sale of methylated spirits for use in the arts and manufactures of the United Kingdom."

The Committee cannot include amongst the measures which they recommend, even for local and experimental adoption, the Permissive Prohibitory Bill.

This measure proposes "to enable the owners and occupiers of property in certain districts to prevent the common sale of intoxicating liquors within such districts," and this prevention is to be effected by the adoption of the Act by the vote of two-thirds of the ratepayers, immediately upon which "all sale or disposal of any alcoholic liquor within such district," with the exception only of methylated spirit for use in manufactures, becomes illegal, and liable to the penalties now imposed for sale of such liquor without license.

It is clear that the degree of prohibition aimed at in this Bill, extending, as it does, to all sale or disposal of liquor, would include all wholesale as well as retail dealings; all sales by wine merchants, as well as by grocers; and all sales, also, in refreshment rooms and hotels, as well as in public houses and beer-houses. On the other hand, it is not proposed to forbid the manufacture, importation, or possession of such liquors. It appears to the Committee that this absolute prohibition of sale, but of sale only, of alcoholic liquors is unsound in principle, and likely to prove, in practice, either mischievous or inoperative.

As regards the principle of this measure, it seems neither consistent nor reasonable that the Legislature should forbid the sale of any article of diet, the manufacture, importation, and possession of which it leaves perfectly free. For either the common use of such article is so dangerous to the state that it should, in the public interest, be prevented, or restrained within very narrow limits, and, in that case, its manufacture, importation, and possession should obviously be also prevented or limited on the same ground; or its use is not so dangerous as to justify such prohibition or limitation, and in that case there seems to be neither reason nor justice in making it an offence to sell that which it is no offence to manufacture, possess, or use.

If, however, this measure, whilst directed only against the common sale, would really have the effect of preventing, indirectly, the common use of all alcoholic liquors, then it amounts to a proposal that the Legislature should, while effecting one object, thereby also effect another and an entirely different one. If it be desirable to attempt to prevent by law all common use of alcoholic liquors, any such attempt should be made directly, and should be aimed, if it is to be effectual, against the manufacture, importation, and possession, as well as against the common sale of all such liquors.

The only justification for thus singling out the one act of sale from all those by which the liquor at last reaches the customer, would be that it is necessarily, or even generally accompanied by such evils as to demand and justify its prohibition for the sake of the public welfare. This, however, has not been shown to be the case. There can be no doubt that the great majority of those who purchase and consume liquor are not guilty of intoxication, nor are the places where it is sold by any means so universally the scenes of drunkenness and disorder as to call for their suppression on that ground alone. It does not seem, therefore, either just or expedient that the purchase and moderate use of liquor by the majority of persons should be prevented because there are some who abuse it to their own hurt or that of others.

The mode in which it is proposed to effect this prevention, namely, by the vote of the ratepayers, seems also to be open to serious objection. For, if the common sale of alcoholic liquors be a thing so universally pernicious, and so incapable of regulation as the advocates of the Permissive Bill maintain that it is, then it should be universally prohibited by a general Act of the Legislature; nor should it be tolerated in any particular locality merely because a certain number of the ratepayers desire it. But, on the other hand, if it be not so essentially evil as to justify such universal prohibition, then to make its prevention depend upon the vote of the ratepayers, is to establish the principle that the ratepayers in a given district should have the right to forbid the pursuit of any trade or calling of which they disapproved, even though such trade or calling were—apart from this local prohibition—a perfectly lawful one, and were carried on in other places with the full sanction of the Legislature.

Such a principle once adopted is capable of large and very dangerous extension in practice. It might, if pushed to its full limits, be applied on similar grounds to the prohibition of unpopular places of religious or political resort, as well as to obnoxious occupations. Nor is the granting of such a power to the ratepayers justified by the argument urged in its favour, that it would only extend to the people in a larger degree the power already possessed by the Magistrates, who may now refuse to grant certain licenses in their respective districts. For, apart from the question whether powers which may safely be entrusted to Magistrates may with equal safety be entrusted to the people at large, it is certain that the power of granting or withholding licenses has been given to the Magistrates not for the suppression but for the regulation of the liquor traffic, and that any attempt on their part to use such power not for the regulation, but for the suppression, of the traffic would be inconsistent with the principles hitherto observed by the Legislature.

While for these reasons the measure seems to the Committee unsound in principle, it would, they are persuaded, prove in practice either inoperative or mischievous. It would prove inoperative in all those cases where the district in which the measure had been adopted was continuous with one in which it had not been adopted, and where the mere act of crossing a street might enable those who desired to do so to escape completely from its restraints. It would most probably prove mischievous where such escape was impossible or difficult, by leading to illicit and secret sale and disposal of liquor, and certainly by the incessant agitation and strife which would in most cases result from the absolutely indismissible provision that the adoption of this Act should be subject to revision, from time to time, by further votes of the ratepayers.

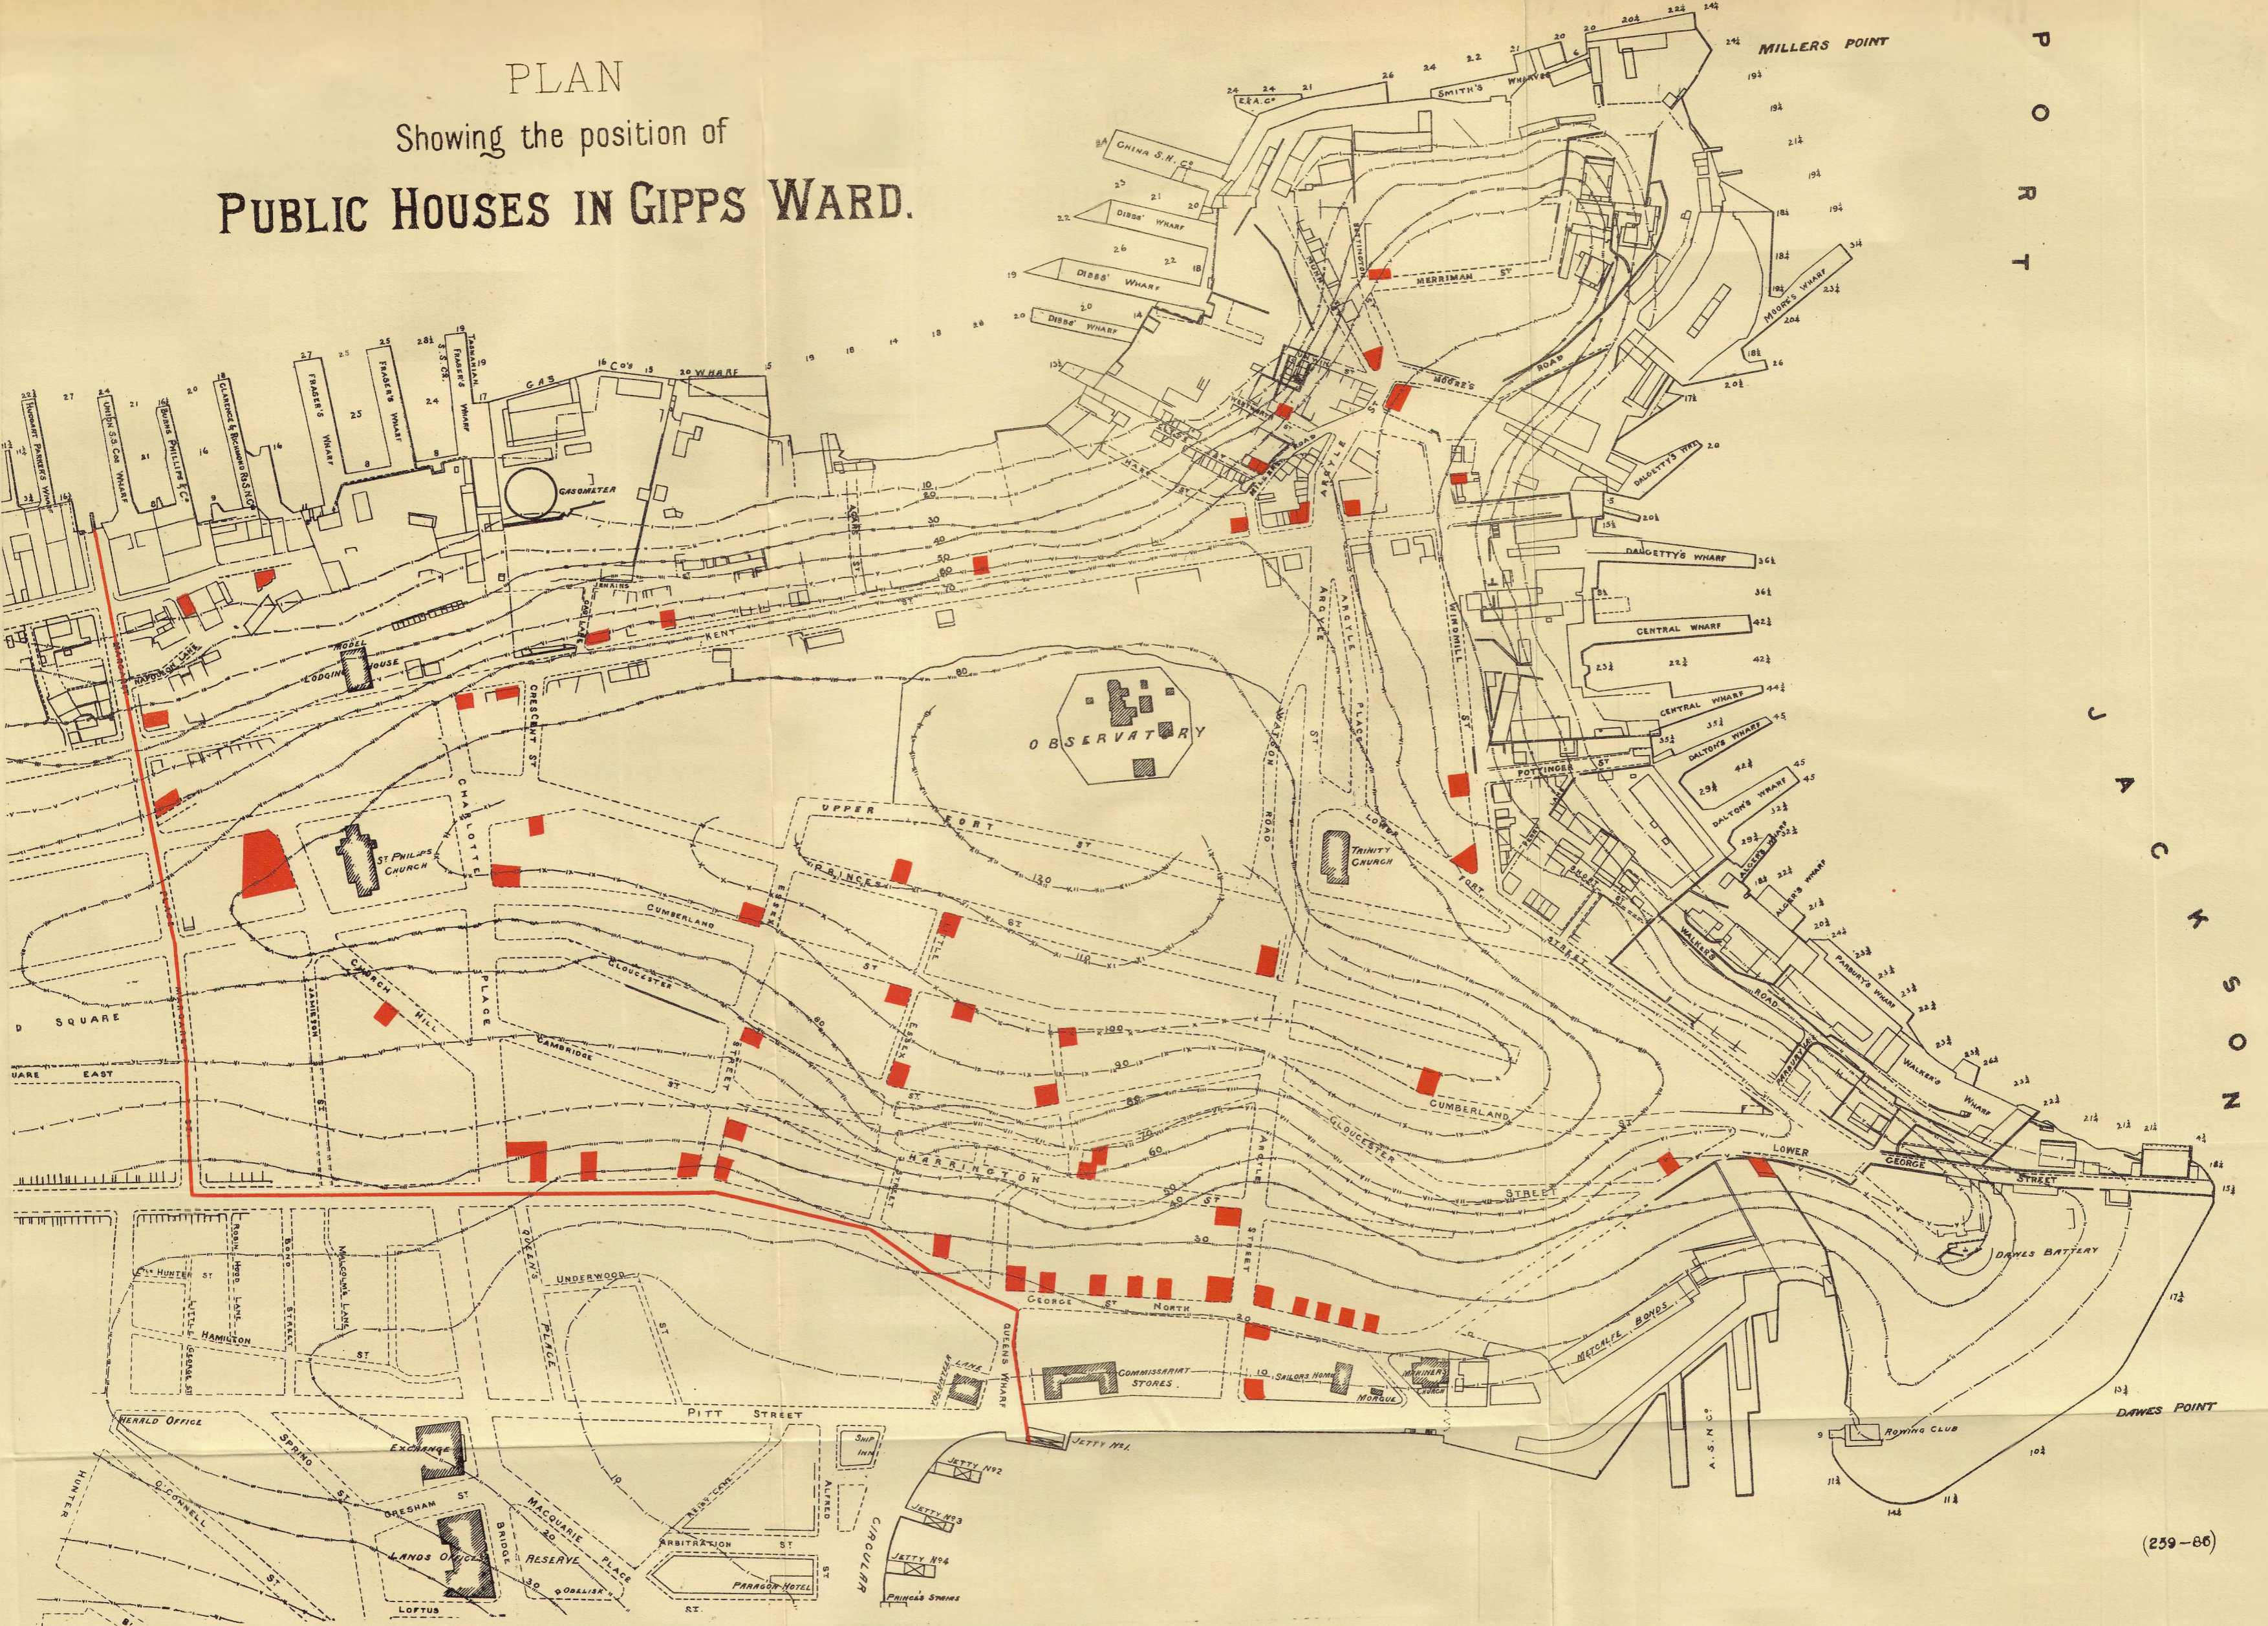

For these reasons the Committee feel that they cannot recommend the Permissive Bill, as a measure either of justice or sound policy, or as likely ultimately to promote the cause of temperance to which its advocates are so earnestly and so laudably devoted.

ARRESTS AND CONVICTIONS.*

We have expressed the opinion (ante p. 31) that the table of relative consumption taken in conjunction with arrests and convictions for drunkenness should afford a much more trustworthy guide as a test of the inebriety of one community when compared with that of another than any Drink Bill. To facilitate such a comparison, and, at the same time, present in a tabular form the statistics of arrests and convictions with their respective percentages to mean population for the years 1885 and 1886, we have constructed the appended table:—

RETURN showing Arrests and Convictions for drunkenness, and percentages to mean population for the Metropolitan District and the Country, for the years 1885 and 1886.

Year.	Locality.	Mean population.	Arrests.	Convictions.	Percentage of Arrests to population.	Percentage of Convictions to population.
1885...	Metropolitan District .....	301,426	14,946	14,023	4.95	4.65
	Country .....	629,505	11,345	9,725	1.80	1.55
	Totals .....	930,931	26,291	23,748	2.82	2.55
1886...	Metropolitan District .....	323,180	15,741	15,252	4.87	4.72
	Country .....	656,760	10,569	8,506	1.61	1.29
	Totals .....	979,940	26,310	23,758	2.68	2.42

From this table it will be seen that the percentage of arrests to population for the whole Colony fell from 2.82 in 1885 to 2.68 in 1886. Similarly that the percentage of convictions to population for the whole Colony fell from 2.55 in 1885 to 2.42 in 1886; also that the percentage of arrests fell uniformly both in the Metropolitan District and in the country generally, but that the percentage of convictions, though it fell both in that district and in the country, rose by .7 for the District in 1886.

Absolutely, i.e., without reference to population, the number both of arrests and convictions has risen in the Metropolitan District from 14,946 arrests in 1885 to 15,741 in 1886, and from 14,023 convictions in 1885 to 15,252 in 1886, while in the country the arrests and convictions have not only fallen absolutely but relatively to population.

Collecting then the statistics of arrests and convictions for these years and the statistics of consumption we are brought to the conclusion that the actual "quantum" of drunkenness throughout the Colony has slightly diminished.

But here it is necessary to point out that although these police statistics are valuable as a criterion of drunkenness, yet, like similar statistics in all countries, they are in more than one respect fallacious, and unless proper allowances are made will be likely to mislead. †

One

* For a valuable table of arrests of females for drunkenness furnished to the Commission by the Government Statistician when this part of the Report had been passed through the press, see ante, p. 45.

† EXTRACT from the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords on Intemperance (1879)

The police statistics of apprehensions and convictions are inconclusive.

In the first place.—They chiefly include the "drunk and incapable" and the "drunk and disorderly." Drunken persons neither disorderly nor incapable can only be dealt with by summons, and in the great majority of cases are not dealt with at all.

On the other hand, the number of convictions is swelled by the repeated convictions of the same persons.

In the second place.—Experienced witnesses agree in attributing the number of apprehensions to the degree of activity of the police and the proportion which the numbers of the force bear to population and area rather than to any other cause. Mr. Chamberlain attributes the number of apprehensions to the "comparative stringency with which the law is carried out; just one turn of the screw would bring in ten times the number."

But this does not entirely account for the immense difference in the number of apprehensions for drunkenness in large towns. For instance: The population of Manchester exceeds that of Birmingham by 8,000, but the number of apprehensions for drunkenness in the former town in the year 1870 was 11,083, while in the latter it was only 2,214.

Mr. Chamberlain asserts that "there is absolutely no law for accounting for the variations of drunkenness in large towns;" and Professor Leone Levi and other witnesses agree with him.

One principal fallacy lies in the fact that both under the head of arrests and convictions, but perhaps to a greater degree under the latter than the former, the figures represent the "cases" or numbers of offences, and do not throw any light on the number of distinct offenders. The Inspector-General of Police and the Inspectors of Divisions all admitted the existence of this misleading factor in the returns; and most of them appeared to be impressed with the impossibility under present circumstances of removing it. Almost all the Stipendiary Magistrates examined admitted that the number of convictions was not a safe guide to the ascertainment of the number of drunkards, and some thought that the number of habitual offenders convicted was so great that they probably represented as much as, or even more than, three-fourths of the total convictions.

It seems no uncommon thing for an old offender to be convicted, and, as a rule, sent to gaol as many as four or five times in the course of one year, and some, it is well known, have during their career undergone as many as from thirty to sixty or even seventy imprisonments. The extent to which the returns of arrests and convictions are swollen in any one year by the repeated appearances of these habitual drunkards—both men and women—before the magistrates, is, however, practically incapable of anything like exact statement. But we are convinced that, in the Metropolitan District, the number of arrests represents about five times the number of individual drunkards. What the proportion might be for the rest of the Colony, we have no means of even guessing. To furnish (in round numbers) 15,000 arrests it is manifest that we must possess in the city and suburbs a most formidable, as it is also a most melancholy, contingent of habitual drunkards. It certainly means a roll of at least 3,000 within those limits of population, for it must not be forgotten that a very large number of persons found intoxicated are not apprehended by the police. The Inspector-General thus (20) stated the rule of his department as regards arrests: "A man is arrested if he is drunk, and is causing thereby an annoyance to citizens; he is arrested if he is drunk and incapable, having apparently property about him which would fall a prey to thieves; and he is arrested if he is drunk combined with any other statutable offence, such as an assault; but if he is in a state of intoxication when he is well able to take care of himself, when he is no nuisance to the public, or when he is in charge of friends, the police will not interfere with him. I may add to that, that I have conceived it to be my duty, both in the police regulations and by orders from time to time, to provide that the police are not on every occasion when there is an infringement of the letter of the law to interfere with persons who are slightly inebriated, or in any other respect guilty of a minor misdemeanour."

If then, we consider the number of inebriate persons who escape apprehension, and the number who are addicted to excessive drinking, but do not, while intoxicated, misconduct or exhibit themselves in any public place, the conclusion seems to us irresistible that the proportion of persons, throughout the Colony, who habitually drink to excess, compared with the temperate or abstinent, must reach a startling figure.

For example: Comparing the towns of Rochdale and Bolton, which have about the same population, the same number of police, and the same climate, in the one case the proportion of drunkards to population is 1 in 40, in the other 1 in 90.

A further illustration of the fallacious character of the police returns occurs in the statistics of the metropolitan district. In the year 1874 there was a very marked decrease in the number of apprehensions as compared with the year 1873; they dropped from 29,755 to 26,155. This diminution Mr. Davies attributes entirely to the more cautious action of the police, in consequence of proceedings taken against the police on their failure in obtaining a conviction against two persons who had been apprehended for being drunk and disorderly.

Then again, the Act of 1872 appears to have had the effect of increasing the number of apprehensions; the licensed houses are cleared at 11 o'clock, and the drunken persons turned into the streets. Drunkenness has been brought to light very much more since the Act of 1872."

figure. We estimate the number of our "inebriates," of all classes and of both sexes, to be not less than 5,000,—a proportion which may well cause consternation, not only among our philanthropists but even among those who derive their living from the Drink Traffic.

By "inebriates," we mean persons who, having three or more convictions for drunkenness during any one year recorded against them, commit the offence of drunkenness; also, persons who are in private habitual "soakers" or "tipplers" to a degree which makes them the helpless victims of drink, although they may have never fallen into the hands of the police. "Inebriates," therefore, as we use the term, is larger than "Habitual Drunkards"—that term being generally limited to its conventional meaning under the Vagrant Act.

In connection with this subject, we invite attention to the returns most courteously prepared for our use by the Governor of the Darlinghurst Gaol, Mr. J. C. Read (see First Appendix, G. 4, 5, 6, and 7), also to the Returns handed to the Commission by the Surgeon of that gaol (see Minutes of Evidence, page 158). From these returns it appears that in Darlinghurst Gaol alone, 5,869 persons were confined during the year 1885 for offences of which drunkenness constituted either the whole or part, and, that of that number, 1,050 were under medical treatment from the effects of drink, and of these last 138 suffered from delirium tremens.

From the Returns furnished by the Governor of the Gaol for the same year, it will be found that the number of distinct prisoners committed for "drunkenness" reached 3,235—2,473 males and 762 females, whose convictions within the year ranged from one to twenty.

As the population of this Colony is almost identical in number with that of Victoria, and as the conditions and climates of both Colonies are in many respects similar, it will not be without interest to compare, so far as is practicable, their arrests for drunkenness, and we are the more impelled to undertake the comparison because the Victorian Government Statist, Mr. Hayter, has stated in his Victorian Year Book for 1885-86, that "in the matter of drunkenness New South Wales far outstrips all the other Colonies of the Group," and that our arrests for drunkenness during a period of five years had been "proportionately more than twice as numerous as in Victoria."*

According to the latest and most authentic information we have been able to obtain, the arrests for drunkenness and offences in which drunkenness was an element was for the year 1886, for the city of Melbourne alone (which contained a resident population at the end of the previous year of 69,774), 10,524. For the same year the arrests for similar offences were in the Metropolitan District of this Colony 15,741; but that district contains a population of 323,180. As we cannot ascertain the arrests for the city of Sydney alone, accurate comparison of one city against the other is not possible, but in the face of the figures we quote, it is difficult to understand how Mr. Hayter could have arrived at the conclusions above referred to. Of course,

* "In the matter of drunkenness, New South Wales far outstrips all the other Colonies of the group in which the offence is distinguished, the arrests for drunkenness there in the last five years having been proportionately more than twice as numerous as in Victoria, which being almost invariably at the bottom of the list, may be set down as the least inebriate of the Australian Colonies. In this respect, however, the year 1884 was an exception to this rule, Victoria having then had a higher proportion of arrests for drunkenness than New Zealand, South Australia, or Tasmania; whilst on the other hand, South Australia, which had for some years prior to 1883, occupied the next highest position to New South Wales, fell, in 1884, below all the Colonies, except Tasmania. In the following list the Colony in which the largest number of inebriates was brought before magistrates is placed first, and that in which the number was smallest last.

Hayter's Victorian Year Book for 1885-6, p. 605.

course, it must be remembered that Melbourne, like Sydney, has a population for the purpose of drink statistics far larger than its "resident" population, perhaps twice as great.

But comparison of arrests is made impossible between the two cities, because the returns of the various divisions of Sydney in no way correspond with those of Melbourne; and, although a man may be arrested in Melbourne as in Sydney for being drunk in a public place, yet it does not appear that offences under the Vagrant Act, in which drunkenness is a factor with us, are in the Victorian returns included in the "Arrests for Drunkenness."

And yet, although we are unable to state definitely that Mr. Hayter is mistaken in his estimate of the drunkenness of this Colony, it would be a remarkable fact if it were true that, of two colonies resembling one another so nearly in population and other conditions, and consuming almost exactly the same quantity of liquor per head of population, one should, nevertheless, be statistically twice as drunken as the other.

Unfortunately we are unable to bring returns of arrests for drunkenness into comparison with those of any other colony, because the data of comparison are not forthcoming, and in many cases the arrests for ascertained areas and populations have not been dissected so as to show what proportion is attributable to "drink offences."

Compared with towns of similar population and conditions (as far as they could be similar), Sydney is unquestionably more statistically "drunken" than most cities in the United Kingdom, but not quite so drunken as Liverpool, and not nearly so drunken as Limerick.

Before leaving this subject we would urge upon the Government the propriety of improving our statistics of drunkenness by providing that they should be collected for Licensing Districts and not for other divisions of the Colony.

THE CLOSING OF PUBLIC-HOUSES ON SUNDAYS— BUSINESS-HOURS ON WEEK DAYS, &c.

We pass next to questions connected with the closing of public-houses. Upon the subject of Sunday closing many witnesses have been examined, and though the evidence obtained from them is often singularly conflicting, the Commission have no difficulty in arriving at a definite recommendation. And, first of all, it must be observed that the administration of the law, as it stands, is most unsatisfactory, and that its provisions meet with wholesale evasion on the part of a large majority of the publicans. From the police evidence we gather that, out of a total of 822 holders of publicans' licenses within the Metropolitan Licensing District in the year 1885, only about 193 observed the law, and that a Sunday traffic in drink was systematically carried on by the remainder. It is not pretended that this result is due to any lack of watchfulness or energy on the part of the police; it proceeds from the adoption by the publicans and their customers of methods which render the detection and conviction of offenders a matter of extreme difficulty. From the evidence of the publicans examined, we find them openly admitting that the law is evaded, while asserting that they are obliged to deceive the police and must sell on Sundays to prevent a falling-off in their week-day trade. To effect this end they have recourse to the employment of scouts who watch the police and give warning when they are in the neighbourhood. Other methods are the admission only of regular customers and their friends, the use of pass-words, and the formation of clubs with a merely nominal subscription. It has also been found that persons are admitted as lodgers on payment of 1s. for a bed which they do not occupy. With this state of things it is very difficult for the police to deal. Warning having been given, their admission is delayed as much as possible, and sufficient time obtained as the witnesses express it, for "putting things straight." Persons found upon the premises fraudulently represent themselves as being lodgers or inmates, and there can be no doubt that a vast amount of perjury is committed in order to avoid conviction. But notwithstanding these conditions, it is considered that the strong current of evidence is against making any change in the law in the direction of Sunday opening. The witnesses who have been examined include not only persons occupying official positions, and who may be regarded in some sense as experts, but a number of representatives of the working classes, of the clergy, and of brewers and publicans. By the advocates of Sunday opening it is alleged that the present state of the law conduces to drunkenness and a far larger consumption of alcoholic liquors than would take place if the houses were opened for a limited time on Sundays. It is asserted that, at present, men take home on Saturday evenings a far larger quantity of liquor than they require, and that the sales on Saturday nights are very large. It is also stated that in this way the evil of intemperance ceases to be confined to the men themselves, but spreads to their wives and families. On the other hand, it may be remarked that the evidence in support of these statements is not very strong; and that it rests principally upon the experience of a class who could hardly be expected to speak without strong, though perhaps unconscious, bias.

A further claim for a relaxation of the law is based upon the sense of a grievance among the people. It is said to be very hard that the poor man cannot get his dinner beer freshly drawn on Sundays, and that he must either go without it altogether or drink it in a flat and stale condition. It may be admitted that the law works a certain amount of hardship in a matter of this kind, but it appears that the inconvenience felt is not of a serious nature; and if the statements to which allusion has been made, with regard to home consumption, be correct, it is obvious that the working classes are not in fact prevented from providing themselves with a sufficient supply for their Sunday needs. It will also be seen from the epitome of the evidence of members of the working classes that this is not seriously put forward by them as a hardship.

It is next alleged that, in addition to an increase of home drinking, the entire closing of the houses causes a consumption of liquor by persons improperly upon licensed premises, which largely exceeds that which would take place if the houses were open during certain hours. It is said that those who enter remain and continue to drink when otherwise they would leave the house within a reasonable time. We do not find that there is much direct evidence of these facts. They appear to rest principally upon conjecture, and conjecture generally concerning the probable conduct of unknown persons under a different set of conditions. It appears to be impossible to say that the persons who at present remain for a long time drinking upon licensed premises would give up the practice if the houses were open for a few hours during the Sunday. It seems more reasonable to believe what has, indeed, been to some extent borne out by experience, that they would come upon such licensed premises if they were permitted to be opened, and remain there as much as at present during the hours of closing. For the affirmative reasons given above, it has been recommended by certain witnesses that there should be a change in the law.

There remains another evil to which allusion has been already made, but which must be regarded from the point of view of general rather than of special considerations. It is the objection to the present state of the law, which is founded upon its undoubted liability to be set at naught and defied, and its tendency to promote or to cause systematic law-breaking. It is impossible to ignore the fact that we are here brought face to face with an evil which, undoubtedly, exists very widely, and the question whether a change ought to be made in the law, and the direction of that change, will depend upon whether the general good effect of the present Act outweighs an admittedly unfortunate result that accompanies it.

In considering this question, it becomes necessary to shortly review the general effect and weight of the whole evidence. As has been said, in endeavouring to come to a conclusion, we have taken the evidence of various classes of witnesses, and the effect of their testimony may be briefly summarized. The evidence of the police must be taken to be, on the whole, adverse to any relaxation of the law. The Inspector-General of Police seems favourably disposed to a limited Sunday sale of liquors, though admitting that it would be a retrogressive step, while the evidence of Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors is almost unanimously against any opening of licensed houses on Sundays. The Stipendiary and Deputy-Stipendiary Magistrates, on the other hand, are for the most part favourably inclined towards opening the houses for a limited number of hours, chiefly with the view of destroying the present custom of secret and illegal sale; and the Comptroller of Prisons also would welcome a modification of the present law. The clergy are, without exception, opposed to the sale of liquor on Sundays, and the brewers and publicans are almost to a man in favour of it. It may be suggested that the evidence of both these classes of witnesses is liable to unconscious bias. The opinions of one or two witnesses possessing an extensive knowledge of the Colony appear to be about equally balanced; and there remains only the testimony of individual members of the working classes. We regard the evidence of this kind of witnesses as of the greatest value and importance; they belong to the class which is most directly concerned in any retention or alteration of the present law; and they are in a position to speak from practical experience of the habits and desires of their fellows. As has been stated, a large number of these witnesses have been examined, and with the consequence that a good deal of conflicting testimony has been given. No other result, indeed, was to be looked for, and in weighing the value of the evidence considerable difficulty has been experienced. We have, however, no hesitation in stating that, whatever the views of other classes may be, the evidence and opinions of the working classes, as presented to us, are in favour of completely closing public-houses on Sundays, as at present. It is true that numerically considered the testimony in favour of a change is strong; but when due regard has been given to the position and representative character of those witnesses who are opposed to Sunday opening, it will be found that the balance of the working class opinion is as has been stated.

The conclusion of the Commission, therefore, is that a sufficiently strong case has not been made out for recommending any change in the law in the direction of relaxing its prohibition of Sunday drink traffic.

The

It remains to consider whether the particular evil of evasion of the law carries with it sufficient weight to override the general conclusion arrived at from the evidence. And upon the answer to this question it must depend whether it should be recommended that the law should (1) be repealed or (2) made more stringent. We believe that the effect of the law as it stands has been, on the whole, beneficial, and that there is no general desire for any relaxation of its provisions. We believe that, in spite of any evils which may attend its operation, it possesses an educative tendency, and that it is largely a question of time to bring public feeling into more complete harmony with the prohibition of the sale of liquors on Sundays. The introduction of any prohibitive law is certain to be met by a good deal of opposition at first, and any loophole which may be left will be taken advantage of to avoid its operation. But it is believed that, as people become accustomed to it, the present opposition will diminish, and that any movement in the direction of giving way to the malcontent section of the community would be a retrograde step in legislation. It is admitted on all sides that the traffic in alcoholic liquors is of a kind which should be discouraged as far as possible, and that every method which can prudently be adopted for throwing obstacles in the way of the sale of them is a step distinctly in advance. Therefore, having got so far as to prohibit the sale of liquors upon Sundays—a prohibition which we cannot regard as entailing serious hardship upon any class—we are unwilling to go back to a condition from which it might require years of fresh education and agitation to again escape. We must on the other hand recognize the undoubted existence of widespread and systematic law-breaking. It is alleged that this is due to the present stringency of the law, and that it would disappear if the law were so far relaxed as to allow of licensed houses being open for a certain number of hours on the Sunday. But it is very far from certain that any material improvement would result from the alteration proposed. We are not disposed to believe that permission to obtain drink at stated times on the Sunday would have the beneficial effect claimed by its advocates, while we are convinced that it would be taken advantage of to carry on a drink traffic at uncertain hours throughout the day. We believe the present law to have had a beneficial operation; and, further, we claim that the people are gradually becoming accustomed to it, and that no sufficient case has been made out for its repeal.

There remains the consideration of other methods for checking the evil which results from evasion of the law. It has been remarked that we have two alternatives. The law can either be relaxed so that there shall be no temptation to break it, or it can be made more stringent, so as to assure the more easy detection and conviction of offenders. We have expressed our unwillingness to do anything in the direction of the first of these: but, as regards the second, we are disposed to think that our law might with advantage be brought into harmony with that which obtains in England in the case of persons found upon licensed premises during prohibited hours. Under the law at present existing in New South Wales, persons found upon licensed premises at unlawful times can only be dealt with if caught in the act of drinking or taking away drink. The English Act (the Licensing Act of 1872) contains the following provisions:—

25. If during any period during which any premises are required under the provisions of this Act to be closed any person is found on such premises he shall unless he satisfies the Court that he was an inmate servant or a lodger on such premises or a bonâ fide traveller or that otherwise his presence on such premises was not in contravention of the provisions of this Act with respect to the closing of licensed premises be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings.

Penalty on person found on premises during closing hours.

Any

Any constable may demand the name and address of any person found on any premises during the period during which they are required by the provisions of this Act to be closed and if he has reasonable ground to suppose that the name or address given is false may require evidence of the correctness of such name and address and may if such person fail upon such demand to give his name or address or such evidence apprehend him without warrant and carry him as soon as practicable before a Justice of the Peace.

Any person required by a constable under this section to give his name and address who fails to give the same or gives a false name or address or gives false evidence with respect to such name or address shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds.

Every person who by falsely representing himself to be a traveller or a lodger buys or obtains or attempts to buy or obtain at any premises any intoxicating liquor during the period during which such premises are closed in pursuance of this Act shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds.

It will be observed that these provisions throw upon the person found upon licensed premises during prohibited hours the onus of showing that he was lawfully there. It is difficult to imagine that their operation could be attended with any hardship; they would not relieve the publican from his special liability; and they would greatly diminish the temptation to the commission of the perjury which, it is certain, is so largely committed under the existing law in this country. At the present time it is to interest of offenders to support the statements of the publican by every means in their power. The burden of proof is cast upon the police, and it is almost impossible to obtain evidence as long as the publican and those found upon his premises support one another. Under the provisions suggested, however, the community of interest would be largely diminished, and, in the majority of cases, it would be very difficult to manufacture the kind of testimony which would be required to demonstrate the innocence of the parties accused. The Commission believe that if the law were strengthened in this way the chief objection to it, which exists in systematic evasion, would be minimised, and that the advantageous effects of complete Sunday closing might be retained without much danger of their being accompanied by the objectionable consequences which are at present put forward as reasons for returning to the practice of allowing licensed premises to be opened on Sundays.

The time at which licensed premises should be compelled to close during week days is a matter which requires but brief notice. From the evidence before us, we believe that we have little to do but express our satisfaction at the success which has followed the adoption of the early-closing clauses of the Act. The testimony of the Inspectors and Sub-Inspectors of the Police points to a striking improvement in the condition of the streets; we are told that when the public-houses were kept open till 12 o'clock, the streets were not quiet before 2 or 3 in the morning, but that now very few people are about after 12 o'clock. There has also been a marked diminution in the number of drunkards in the streets at night. The Stipendiary Magistrates also testify to the benefits of 11 o'clock closing, though some among them would not be averse to a relaxation of the law in particular circumstances. The other witnesses examined have also expressed themselves in favour of early closing and there has been no considerable objection to the present hours except on the part of some of the hotel-keepers who desire an extension of the present hours. Bishop Barry, on the other hand, would prefer that the houses should be closed at 10 o'clock, and a few other witnesses desire to see adopted an earlier hour for closing than 11, particularly as regards the suburbs. Allowing, however, for individual preferences, we may say that the evidence before us points to the fact that the present hours are found to work satisfactorily. Cases of hardship may occur, occur, and we shall presently speak of a class which may deserve special consideration. But the general good effect of the present hours is so well marked that we do not desire to see any immediate change in them. It is stated that there are occasionally complaints on the part of persons frequenting theatres that the hour of 11 prevents them from obtaining necessary refreshment, but it is believed that cases of inconvenience are not sufficiently numerous to make it advisable to provide for them by allowing special privileges in the case of theatres and other places of amusement. The public are accustomed to the present hour of closing, and we do not desire to see any return, however small, to older conditions. On the other hand, we believe that it would not be advisable to further shorten the hours during which the sale of liquors is permitted. The public have accepted 11 o'clock, and are now familiar with it; any discontent which was felt at first has now died away, and there is a quiet acquiescence on the part of all classes. But if we should endeavour to introduce a still earlier hour for closing, it is probable that much of the good now effected would be destroyed. Discontent would be aroused, and the present acquiescence would very likely be exchanged for a resistance to any measure introducing any further limitation, which might lead to a demand for an extension of the hours at present in force. The present hour—11 o'clock—appears to work satisfactorily, and with a minimum of hardship; the people seem to be satisfied with it; and we see no reason for recommending any change.

But in one direction we believe that the hours during which the sale of liquors is allowed might be extended. Allusion has been made to a particular class who undoubtedly suffer a good deal of hardship under the present regulations. The market-gardeners and others, whose business occupations oblige them to bring their goods into Sydney at a very early hour in the morning, must be admitted to suffer great inconvenience from the fact that they are unable to obtain necessary refreshments at the end of what is often a long and fatiguing journey. These men must leave their homes during the night, and in many cases they have to travel many miles in order to deliver their goods at the Sydney markets. They are exposed to all kinds of weather, and often have to wait about for many hours on arriving at their destination. In the English licensing Act already quoted provision is made for these persons under the following sections:—

26. The local authority of any licensing district upon the production of such evidence as such authority may deem sufficient to show that it is necessary or desirable to do so for the accommodation of any considerable number of persons attending any public market or following any lawful trade or calling may grant if such authority think fit to any licensed victualler or licensed keeper of a refreshment-house in respect of premises in the immediate neighbourhood of such market or of the place where such persons follow such lawful trade or calling an order exempting such person from the provisions of this Act with respect to the closing of his premises on such days and during such time except between the hours of one and two of the clock in the morning as may be specified in such order.

Exemption from closing by order of local authority in respect of certain trades

The holder of an order under this section shall not be liable to any penalty for not closing his premises on such days and during such time as may be specified in such order but he shall not be exempt from any other penalty under this or any other Act or otherwise.

A notice in such form as may be prescribed by the local authority stating the days and hours during which the premises are permitted to be open under such order of exemption shall be affixed and kept affixed in a conspicuous position outside the premises and if the holder of the order of exemption make default in affixing or in keeping affixed such notice in manner aforesaid during any part of the time for which his exemption is granted he shall be liable to pay a penalty not exceeding five pounds.

Every person who keeps affixed to his premises any such notice when he does not hold an order under this section shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds.

Any local authority as aforesaid may at any time if it seem fit to them withdraw an order under this section or alter the same by way of extension or restriction as such authority may deem necessary or expedient so however as not to render any person liable to any penalty for anything done under such order before the holder was informed of such withdrawal or alteration.

It may be contended that a provision by which liquor could be sold to particular classes would be liable to abuse by persons not belonging to those classes; and it is possible that in isolated instances the privilege might be abused. But it is hardly probable that any considerable proportion of those compelled to leave the houses at 11 o'clock would wait about until half-past 2 or 3 o'clock, or such other hour as might be appointed. The concession, moreover, is capable of being fenced about with considerable safeguards. Provision might be made by which persons frequenting the places appointed should be liable to a penalty if it were shown that they did not belong to the classes specified, and that the landlord, on proof that he had knowingly supplied such persons with liquor, should be liable to the forfeiture of his license for a second offence. In a community such as ours it is probable that bonâ fide customers would be easily distinguished from those who had no right to use the houses selected to enjoy this privilege. These would be few in number, and the privilege itself would be sufficiently valuable, and the punishment for any abuse of it so considerable, that the landlords themselves would find it to their interest to observe the required conditions. It is not proposed that the special license should be granted to more than one or at most two houses; the hours appointed would not exceed two; and under the circumstances it is probable that the resulting good would outweigh any evil which might be incidental to the suggested privilege.

PRIVATE BARS.

There are, we are told, in September, 1887, no fewer than ninety-four private bars in Sydney, of which eighteen are upstairs bars and seventy-six are on the ground floor—they are all 6d. bars, but it is impossible to distinguish them by any criterion of respectability. Probably, at least three-fourths of them belong to the class of bars which we think ought to be suppressed as providing illicit incentives to drunkenness or because they are disreputably conducted. None of the witnesses examined have been found to speak favourably of this latter class, or to advocate their continuance, while the immense consensus of opinion has been most strongly in favour of abolishing them altogether. The bars to which we would now draw special attention are not of the kind which is known as the private bar in respectable hotels and restaurants. They are not under the direct control of the holder of the license, nor are those who serve behind them in any true sense in his employment. The system, in fact, is nothing but a fraudulent extension or expansion of the publican's license. The method which is adopted is to provide a separate bar in some room in the house, generally upstairs, though sometimes on the ground floor, wholly distinct from that portion of the building devoted to legitimate trading; and according to the evidence there are sometimes as many as three of these additional bars in a single house. They are usually served by two and sometimes three women or girls, who are neither the agents nor servants of the proprietor of the house, but in reality sub-lessees. Sometimes one woman rents the entire bar, and employs the others as assistants; in other cases the business is shared by two or more who work it as partners. The rents which they pay are exorbitant, ranging from £5 to £10 a week, and even to higher higher rates in particular instances, and in some cases the publicans are actually dependent upon these female sub-lessees for the payment of their own rents. The furniture and fittings of the bars are described as being very poor in spite of the high price which is charged for them, and they are said to be dirty and mean in general appearance. There is usually a room connected with or attached to them, and this is furnished with a sofa, a table, and a few chairs, while in some of them there is a piano. In other cases where the room is large it is divided into two parts by a partition, and in this way a second room is obtained. In the bars no stock of liquor is kept, the practice being to obtain it by the bottle from the landlord's bar as required; it is then retailed at the price of 6d. a glass; the glasses are small and the liquor is usually inferior in quality. There can be no question that these bars are not frequented for the purposes of legitimate refreshment. The chief attraction would appear to be the women by whom they are kept, and these as a rule are persons of gay appearance and doubtful character, though they do not appear to be known as prostitutes to the police. The women who keep these bars generally reside out of the house; they have as a rule a circle of acquaintances who are well known to them, and these frequent the bars and introduce friends. Among the ordinary customers at these bars are to be found men of all ages and classes; some of them are said to be frequented by supers and ballet girls from the neighbouring theatres, and it is believed that in several cases they are very little if any better than houses of assignation. The majority of the customers, however, appear from the evidence to be young men.

Of the evil influence of these bars there can be no question. Their real attraction is one which should not be permitted to co-exist with a license to sell liquor. That attraction, of course, is the women by whom they are kept, and it cannot be doubted that if they were conducted by men the inducement to frequent them would be gone altogether. It has been brought to the knowledge of the Commission that a system of "shouting" is cultivated by the females who preside at these bars, which is, perhaps, peculiar to them and shows one of the objects for which they have been established. The customer is frequently challenged to "stand something" for the good of the house. He does so as a matter of course, and a small bottle of champagne, the favourite call, is produced. The "shouter," perhaps, takes a sip, and the "shouted" another sip, and the rest is furtively discharged into a sink, bucket, or other receptacle. In this manner "consumption" goes on satisfactorily to the holder of the license, and without intoxicating the female sub-lessees.

The existing difficulty in dealing with these places arises from the impossibility of proving the relations between the proprietors and the women to whom they sub-let portions of their licensed premises. It appears to be the regular custom for the women to pay a weekly rent to the landlords; but the latter take a receipt from them for wages and are thus enabled to pass them off as servants. Some special provision, therefore, is required if anything is to be done to check what almost every witness has without qualification spoken of as a great evil. Two or three courses may be pursued with regard to these bars. Upstairs bars may be abolished altogether; the number of bars allowed in any licensed house might be strictly limited, and of private bars particularly; or the services of women in bars of the kind contemplated might be forbidden altogether. The Commission are disposed to believe that the preferable course would be the complete abolition of upstairs bars. It has been amply shown that they present opportunities for abuse that are not afforded by bars situated upon the ground-floor. The magistrates, the police, the clergy, and, amongst others, respectable licensed victuallers, are unanimous in objecting to them. They are admitted on all sides to be mischievous in their tendencies, and the more dangerous that their situation renders proper inspection almost impossible. It has hardly been even suggested that they meet any legitimate want; while it cannot be doubted that the large majority of them are nothing better than a fraud upon the licensing laws. They do not in any way resemble the private bars which are commonly established for the division of two classes of customers; and the Commission do not see that any hardship could follow from the total abolition of them. Provision could without difficulty be made to meet the special cases of theatres and places of public resort; but it is believed that the cases in which the regular upstairs bars are commonly respectable are too rare to affect in any appreciable degree the average character of these places.

We recommend therefore, as a simple method of dealing with this question, that the principle of single bars should be adopted, with a provision that the Licensing Court may, in cases of proved exceptional public need, grant a licensee the privilege of a second bar—the privilege to be fenced round by proper safeguards and conditions.

In concluding this the First Part of our Report we desire to express our deep sense of the zeal, accuracy, and unflagging industry of our Secretary, Mr. C. R. Burnside; as also of the punctual and courteous attention of the Parliamentary Shorthand Staff to our somewhat exacting requirements. We also desire to thank the Collector of Customs, the Government Analyst, the Government Statistician, and all other Government officials for the valuable assistance they have given us in the course of our investigation.

EPI TOMES OF THE EVIDENCE. (*)

[QUALITY OF LIQUORS.]

Mr. Hamlet states that the majority of whiskies, brandies, and gins are made up of silent spirit, flavoured with various essences; but that the quantity of essence used is so small that chemistry is unable to detect it; that fusel oil is present in all new whiskies; that in a few years it becomes decomposed by the action of the wood into volatile ether, and is then innocuous; that it adds flavour to the whisky; that these essences would be so diffused in the manufacture of brandies, whiskies, and gins that any deleterious elements they might contain would be rendered innocuous; that one grain of fusel oil in two ounces of wine would exert a deleterious influence on a man; that liquors manufactured from the essences before the Commission are innocuous; that the habit of drinking liquors made from these essences would be pernicious, but no more so than the habit of drinking ordinary liquors not made up from them; that liquors made up from these essences would produce no more cravings for drink than wholesome liquor; that the craving caused by excessive drinking is a part of the physiological action of alcoholic mixtures; that the first effect of alcohol upon the system is to cause an increased circulation of the blood in all parts of the body, and to increase the excitement of the motor nerves, this is accompanied by hot flushing of the face and extremities, and followed by decreased temperature of the body; one of the properties of alcohol is that it will unite with water, in passing through the blood it absorbs the water and causes a certain dryness, a common experience with the drunkard; that it affects the whole system after a time; that it shows its effect on the stomach in a most marked way; that the effect of beer drinking is to create worse results on other organs,—the liver and the kidneys; that the presence of fusel oil even in small quantities is deleterious.

Mr. Watt, Government Analyst, states that in no case has he ever been able to recommend a prosecution for adulteration; that fusel oil is a natural part of spirits, and therefore cannot be considered an adulterant; that fusel oil is in itself deleterious; that one grain of fusel oil taken in a certain quantity of spirit at one time would be injurious; that 2 ozs. of spirit at one time would be, he considers, a large quantity, but that it depends greatly on the individual; that fusel oil is converted by age and disappears; that it is not absolutely known what becomes of it; that it is much more difficult to detect the fusel oil after the white spirit has been made up into brandy or whisky than before; that none but the purest white spirit, free from fusel oil, should be permitted to be imported; that the essences have been made to represent what is found by analyses in liquors, and that if they are used with pure alcohol the result will be, as good a spirit as can be reasonably expected; that the low class liquors would be no more injurious than any other alcohol.

Mr. Fosbery, Inspector General of Police, when examined as to the operation and results of the Licensing Law in suppressing adulteration and the sale of adulterated liquor, says that immense numbers of samples had been taken under all sorts of circumstances; they had been purchased by the Inspector where it was supposed the lowest class of liquors would be sold, and the Government Analytical Chemist had carefully examined them, but (Mr. Fosbery thought) not in one instance had he found any deleterious ingredients such as would warrant a prosecution under the law; that the spirits are frequently of a coarse and inferior character, as is not to be wondered at when we are told that you can purchase whisky at 2s. 6d. a gallon. It is a coarse common spirit, but it does not contain any ingredient which would be deleterious, except as all spirits are deleterious. It seems that it is not worth while, as it was in former years, to doctor up spirits; They are sufficiently potent without adulteration to increase their strength.

Inspector Anderson does not believe that there is much adulteration, but considers that much of the liquor sold is immature and contains fusel oil, and that the brandy imported is of a very inferior quality.

Inspector

* In addition to the opinions epitomized under this head, there is much valuable evidence in the Minutes which has been dealt with in the Report, but which could not be conveniently epitomized.

- 621-2. Inspector Waters considers that a great deal of very inferior spirit is imported ; that the police get possession of bottles containing spirits and often have great difficulty in deciding whether the contents are gin, rum, brandy or whisky ; does not think there is much adulteration carried on, but that the liquors are very inferior.
1204. Sub-Inspector Atwill states that complaints are often made to the police about the inferior quality of the liquor sold, but that nothing deleterious has been found on analysis of it.
- 1431-2. Sub-Inspector Cotter states that no complaints as to the quality of the liquor have been made to him except by those suffering from delirium tremens, who always attribute their condition to the quality and not the quantity of the liquor consumed.
1750. Sub-Inspector Potter's experience was of a similar nature to that of the last witness.
- 1943-51. Sub-Inspector Lenthall, on the other hand, declares that complaints are frequently made to him about the quality of the liquors, and that he has in consequence often taken samples from the houses mentioned by the complainants ; that it would not pay the publican to buy good brandy and then manipulate it when he can buy it ready-made at 3s. a gallon ; this liquor is rough, raw, crude spirit, and in his opinion causes one-half the drunkenness in the city ; he believes the greater portions of the cheap liquors sold are what are known to the trade as "mixing liquors" ; that they are purchased by the wholesale wine and spirit merchants, and brewers who hold spirit licenses, and are blended with other liquors slightly superior, and then sold to the publicans ; that liquors are sold under fictitious labels, the bottles of good liquor being emptied in the 6d. bars, and then filled with cheap draught liquors and transferred to the 3d. bar.
- 2547-8. Mr. Marsh, S.M., thinks that the bad quality of the liquor sold is the secret of the drunkenness throughout the country ; that the publicans, especially in the country, are no judges of liquor, and sell anything sent to them ; that he has often had complaints about it made to him in the country, but not in Sydney ; that not only are the wines and spirits adulterated, but the beer too, which often contains tobacco and other deleterious substances.
- 2604-7. Mr. Buchanan, S.M., thinks most of the liquor sold in the country is atrocious ; that evidence of it could be obtained if clever men were employed for that purpose ; has heard that some publicans keep mixtures for the purpose of stupefying their customers.
- 2890-2. Mr. Addison, S.M., considers the quality of the liquor sold to be bad ; thinks that a great deal of white spirit is used in its manufacture ; that the Colonial beer is good as far as it goes, although that may not be saying much for it ; that it causes a great deal of drunkenness ; and that nearly all the men brought before him for drunkenness get drunk on Colonial beer.
3243. Mr. Yates, D.S.M., says that complaints have been made to him of the quality of the liquors sold ; that he has often expressed it as his opinion that it is the quality and not the quantity of the liquor which causes the drunkenness ; that no case of adulteration has come before him officially.
- 3672-3. Canon Rich has heard complaints about the quality of the liquor sold ; it is described as poisonous and as having the effect of making people unconscious of what they are doing.
3793. Dr. O'Connor, Surgeon of Darlinghurst Gaol, is of opinion that a great deal of drunkenness is attributable to inferior or adulterated liquors.
- 3900-10. Mr. Fowler, Superintendent of the Receiving House, thinks that the liquor sold in low houses is bad ; that it is generally new, raw rum that has such a bad effect on the people who drink it.
- 4693-600. Dr. MacLaurin, Medical Adviser to the Government, thinks the safest form in which to take alcohol is good wine or brandy made from the juice of the grape ; that in whisky, except it is very old, there is always, more or less, fusel oil, which is most injurious, that in the case of white spirit distilled from potatoes, it is almost impossible by any amount of distillation to get rid of the fusel oil ; and he doubts if even age wholly eradicates it ; that he is told that some of the brandies and whiskies imported, are merely white spirits doctored up so as to represent brandy and whisky ; that a great deal of adulteration takes place in them before they arrive here, and that nothing could be worse than such spirits.

Dr.

Dr. Mackellar, M.L.C., late Medical Adviser to the Government, considers <sup>4760-4.</sup> that the liquors sold in the colony are remarkable for the fact that fusel oil is largely present in them; that it is very deleterious, and the chief cause of disease; that crude and young spirits are also very pernicious.

Rev. J. D. Langley has come in contact with some shocking instances of the <sup>5075-9.</sup> effect of adulterated liquor in cases where drugs have been used.

Mr. Toohey, M.P., is certain that there is a great deal of adulteration carried on; <sup>6271.</sup> that liquors are sold by some persons for less than they can be imported for—thinks these liquors consist of white or silent spirit flavoured here; having been so informed by the travellers of the firms who carry on that trade—is of opinion that brewers and publicans do not use the essences for the manipulation of white spirits; that it is done by some of the wine and spirit merchants or some other class of middleman.

Mr. Weale, Secretary to the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers Association, <sup>6590 1.</sup> knows of no adulteration, but often when visiting houses on the business of the Association has tasted very inferior liquor.

Mr. Thompson, Wine and Spirit Merchant, late president of the Amalgamated <sup>6750, 6805.</sup> Licensed Victuallers' Association, thinks that there is such a marked difference between good and bad liquor that no adulteration is necessary by a man who sells bad liquor to compete successfully with one who pays for good liquor; that a great many of the small houses are supplied with very inferior liquor, but can make no suggestions for preventing its importation, that being a most difficult question.

Mr. Spora (a licensed victualler), though admitting that he is not much of a <sup>6907-9.</sup> judge of liquor, thinks that it is the quantity and not the quality of liquor that makes men drunk.

Mr. J. B. North considers that the liquors sold here are largely counterfeited <sup>7247-49.</sup> and doctored; that it is mostly done by the intermediate distributing houses; that a <sup>7255-6, 7263,</sup> very great quantity of low class white spirit is imported and made into brandy, &c.; <sup>7283, 7311,</sup> that he has personally suffered from the effects of drinking only half a nobbler of <sup>7314, 7398.</sup> bad drink, and has seen some of his men suffering in the same way at Katoomba; from what he has seen believes that a great deal of the drunkenness in this Colony is due to the bad drink sold; that there is a large quantity of bad beer manufactured here; that there would be less drunkenness if better beer were brewed; that it has the effect of creating thirst; that he has been told spirits of wine are used for the purposes of adulteration, but has no positive proof of it.

Mr. Selff (a licensed victualler), has been supplied with very bad liquor at <sup>7423-5, 744</sup> several houses, and is of opinion that the quality of the liquor has a great deal to do with drunkenness, and that very bad spirits are imported, especially in whiskies.

Mr. Hunt, of the "Oxford Hotel," believes that there is some very inferior <sup>7532.</sup> liquor sold in the low-class houses, and that it necessarily must be so to make them pay.

Mr. Watson, of the "Paragon Hotel," has had bad liquor offered to him at <sup>7600-1, 7673,</sup> cheap rates—brandy and whisky at 4s. 6d. a gallon, and Lowndes' rum at 3s. 8d. a <sup>7751.</sup> gallon in bond; says that a man once offered to doctor spirits for him, and also to make cheap spirits; and that he has heard some of his customers complain of the inferior quality of liquors in certain houses.

Mr. Rainford, of the "Cambridge Club Hotel," has been informed that <sup>8037-8</sup> inferior liquor is sold in some houses, where they sell for 3d.

Mr. Palmer, J.P., is not aware of inferior liquors being sold, and observes that <sup>8106-7.</sup> analysis has only shown them to be weak.

Mr. Roberts, of the "Crown and Anchor Hotel," has no doubt that there is a <sup>8210.</sup> great deal of bad liquor sold; has never met a "doctorer" of spirits, but believes they exist; says that one man complained about some of his whisky having copper in it; upon which he had it analysed by Mr. Watt, and a minute quantity was discovered, attributable to the distillation worm.

Sir John Robertson is not aware that very inferior liquor is sometimes sold; <sup>8333-4.</sup> but thinks that no raw, immature spirit should be allowed to go into consumption.

The evidence of the representatives of the artisan classes was to the following effect:—

Mr. Pemberton has heard complaints about the adulteration of liquor, and he <sup>8638-4</sup> has known men pass a public-house and go to the next, because they thought they could get better liquor there.

9000-7. Mr. B. Riley is sure that a great deal of adulteration is carried on; has called for drinks and then been unable to drink them because they were so bad; knows bad from good liquor, having been working in a wine and spirit store for nearly a year; has been told by persons in the employment of wine and spirit merchants that spirits are doctored, and that the publican sometimes does it.
- 9575-9. Mr. Watson considers that the beer now sold is inferior to what was sold seven years ago; that the fact of a house being "tied" does not compel a publican to sell inferior liquors; that he has known of forged brands; that inferior liquor is sold under certain brands and capsuled here; has heard of spirits being doctored.
- 9851-9. Mr. Hannon thinks a great deal of bad liquor is sold here; that it is adulterated, as it is impossible to sell good liquor for the price usually paid.
9778. Mr. Long has heard complaints of inferior liquor being sold, and of its rapid effect on the system.
- 9878-82. Mr. Gordon thinks a great deal of adulterated and spurious liquor is sold; that on one occasion a friend of his was rendered helpless by one glass of rum at Hurstville; that that rum must have been adulterated, or else it was a very inferior spirit.
- 9977-9. Mr. Snell has heard people complain that in some houses they are served with liquor so bad that they don't know what it is meant for.
10802. Mr. Talbot has heard men complain of being supplied with bad liquor, and of suffering in consequence.
- 10411-5. Mr. Smith has bought rum, and after keeping it for a day or two has found tobacco in it; has heard many such complaints from others; also that new, raw spirits are sold; has heard men who drink to excess complain that two glasses at a certain hotel have made them sick; that these men could drink five or six glasses at another hotel without any such effect.
10515. Mr. Graham has often heard men complain of having been supplied with bad liquor.
- 10614-8, 10652. Mr. Davidson has heard a great number of complaints about bad liquor being sold; that rum and beer are adulterated; that he has noticed men become intoxicated after taking one or two drinks; he has noticed bad effects immediately traceable to inferior liquor.
- 10999, 11003. Mr. Melhuish thinks that some of the liquor sold is very inferior; and that it is adulterated.
- 11107-8. Mr. Davis states that a large amount of inferior liquors is sold; that a little of it had the effect of making him sick.
- 11198 9. Mr. H. Ford has heard men complaining of the spirits and the beer.
- 11404, 11412 8. Mr. Williams, referring to beer, thinks there is poison in the drink; that the effect of it is to stupefy the head without interfering with the legs; has been told that strychnine was put in it; that the effect on him when he has indulged a little too freely is to cause a numbness all over the body; that he has heard others complain of the same thing.
11578. Mr. Beaney has heard of rum being adulterated, but never knew it to be proved.
- 11825-7. Mr. Law considers that very inferior liquors are sold at some of the 2d. bars; that he has known his friends go to special houses, and also wait until they came to a house where they knew they would get good liquor before they would have a drink.
12644. Mr. Shearston, Sailor's Missionary, believes that the rum sold is a very inferior class of liquor; that men have complained of pains after drinking it, and that their breath smelt like turpentine or kerosene oil.

Mr.

Mr. Simpson states that as far as his experience goes the liquors sold are very bad, and frequently adulterated; that on one occasion he suffered from the effects of taking bad liquor; that in some houses inferior liquor is kept in bottles with first-class labels on them, which have been emptied of the good liquor. 12709-9.

Mr. Wagg often hears men complain of the inferior quality of the liquor sold; that in one house in the city, where trade societies meet, the liquor is so bad that the men are obliged to go to a house over the way for their drinks. 12871.

[CRIME ATTRIBUTABLE TO DRINK.]

Mr. Maclean, Comptroller-General of Prisons, states that a great number (in fact it has been quite a common thing) of prisoners in the gaols tell him that drink was the cause of their crime; that in most cases crimes of violence are especially the result of drink; that a very large proportion of the crime of the Colony is due to drunkenness; that drink is not the incentive in such crimes as highway robberies or burglaries, but that these men generally have orgies at times. -83494

Mr. Reid, Governor of Darlinghurst Gaol, in modification of a former statement, considers that the average number of cases of crime due to drink in that gaol is 92 or 93 per cent., not 99, as before stated; that he has come to this conclusion after consulting the officers in the gaol, and also some of the long-sentence prisoners (see Appendix G, et seq., page 508); they obtained their information from personal knowledge of the prisoners, and from what the prisoners' relatives say when they come to see them; that small assaults, petty larcenies, malicious injuries, &c., are all generally caused by drink; that the London pickpocket steadies his hand with a little drink, and when he takes too much he is caught; burglars and bushrangers also often indulge to brace their nerves. 3551, 3556-8, 3585-92.

Canon Rich, Chaplain to the Gaol, states that his experience among prisoners is, that a very great number make drink the excuse for their crime, but that still a large amount of crime is no doubt due to drink, but not to the extent of 90 per cent.; that some cases of crimes of violence, such as manslaughter, burglary, and bushranging are, no doubt, occasionally due to drink; in cases of rape and indecent assaults drink is very often the cause; instances a case of robbery where the man confessed it was the result of a drunken spree; does not consider drink has anything to do with concealment of birth. 3065-62

Rev. J. D. Langley is of opinion (formed from experience, when Chaplain of Berrima Gaol for a period of two years) that 90 per cent. of the criminality is directly or indirectly the result of drink; that crimes of violence, such as highway robberies, are sometimes indirectly due to drink, but not often; that in very many cases of bushranging, burglary, and manslaughter drink is directly or indirectly the cause, as also in cases of rape; that 90 per cent. is the very lowest proportion of criminals whose crime can be traced to drunkenness; that these opinions are the result of observation and conversation with the prisoners; that they would have no object in making drink an excuse; that intemperance is also the cause of a great amount of demoralization and immorality among all classes. 5600-75.

Rev. R. Sellors is of opinion that all over the world a large proportion of crime is attributable to intemperance; also that a very great deal of poverty and home-unhappiness is due to the same cause. 5823-4.

Judge Wilkinson considers that a very large proportion of crime is caused directly or indirectly by drink—that is to say, it either causes the crime or affords the opportunity; does not know the exact proportion, but would be inclined to say over 75 per cent. 6072-3.

Rev. J. Jefferis, LL.D., thinks that a large proportion of crime is traceable to intemperance, but not to the extent of 93 per cent.; that 75 per cent., however, would not be unreasonable. 6111-3.

Mr. Weale, Secretary to the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association, does not consider that a large proportion of the crime of the Colony can be attributed to drink; that statistics often, when showing an increase in drink, show a decrease in crime (not produced); that this happened in South Australia last year. 6711-3.

Mr. Vale, Secretary to the Victorian Alliance for the Suppression of the Liquor Traffic, says with regard to the amount of crime, poverty, and lunacy attributable to drink:—"With regard to that point, I may state that in our City Police Court it is a common thing to have from 1,200 to 1,400 cases of various sorts 12182.

sorts during a month. About one-half of these would be for drunkenness, or drunkenness and disorderly conduct; the rest would be assaults and robberies, including many robberies from drunken persons. Mr. Call, who is our most experienced stipendiary magistrate, stated a little while ago that nine-tenths of the cases which came before him in the City Police Court were directly or indirectly due to drink. Sir William Stawell, our ex-Chief Justice, stated that, from his experience, he thought 90 per cent. of the criminal cases brought before him were due to drink. In regard to the effect of drink in producing poverty, I may say that the Superintendent of our Immigrants' Home has stated that nearly all the cases which come before him are cases of poverty originating in intemperance. Mr. Guillaume, the Superintendent of the Industrial and Reformatory Schools Department, has stated that at least 90 per cent. of the children left to the charge of the State are the children of intemperate parents. In fact, 90 per cent. seems to be the favourite calculation. Roughly speaking, it means nearly all. Opinions differ with regard to the effect of drink in creating lunacy. I have not seen any statement on the question recently, but Dr. Embling, when he was Superintendent of the Yarra Bend Asylum, said that more than 50 per cent. of cases there were connected with intemperance. Dr. Bowie has also set down the proportion at 50 per cent."

[LUNACY ATTRIBUTABLE TO DRINK.]

3336. Mr. Yates, D.S.M., has been able in many cases to trace the drunkard in the confirmed lunatic.

3788] Dr. O'Connor, Surgeon to Darlinghurst Gaol, says that in 1885, out of 351 persons certified insane, 34 of these could be traced to drink.

3861. Mr. Fowler, Superintendent of Darlinghurst Reception House, says that three out of every five cases of lunacy are due to drink.

4020-3, 4033, 4056-7. Dr. Manning, Inspector-General of Insane, considers the proportion of the permanent inmates in the asylums through drink to be overrated; and states that in 1884, out of 2,450 inmates, only 137, or 5½ per cent. were there through drink, that he believes these figures represent about the proportion of those permanently in the asylums, but not of those admitted; that from 5 to 6 per cent. is the daily average of those permanently insane through the abuse of drink; that for the 10 years, 1869-78, 3,077 persons were admitted of whom 257, or over 8 per cent. were there owing to drink; for the years 1880-4, 2,392 were admitted, and of these 11 per cent. were due to drink. Dr. H. Major, Medical Superintendent of Leeds Asylum, found from the returns of the Commissioners in Lunacy in England, that between 13 and 14 per cent. are due to drink. Dr. Manning explains that admission to English Asylums is readier than it is here, besides which numbers of temporary cases are treated here in the Reception House and country gaols, which in England would go at once to the Asylums. In 1885, out of 362 cases remanded to the Reception House, 211 recovered there—three-fourths of which 211 cases were due to drink; out of 413 cases in up-country gaols 242 cases were cured in them, fully three-fourths of which were also due to drink; also that the habitual use of alcohol to excess alters the tissue of the brain, but alters more readily the tissues of the liver and kidneys, and from being very seldom able to trace the result of drink in the post-mortem room he believes these statistics and opinions to be correct; that it is well known that in England insanity is greater in the south than in the north, although the wages are higher in the north than in the south and more spent on drink; "drink" also is such a short, simple cause, patients too are glad to make the excuse of "drink," as they thereby hope to be discharged sooner; insanity caused by intemperance is more easily curable than that from other causes.

Dr.

Dr. Mackellar, M.L.C., late Medical Adviser to the Government, does not consider that drunkenness leads to permanent lunacy to any appreciable extent, that it is not a potent cause of lunacy, but that large numbers of people become drunkards at the onset of insanity, that is to say, that drunkenness is an early symptom of insanity as are numbers of other excesses, and that it is indicative of an excited state of the nervous system, but not in the least a potent cause of insanity. <sup>4740-9.</sup>

Dr. Tucker considers that insanity causes a strong desire for intoxicants, as well as, that intoxicants cause insanity, it is an effect and a cause; and states that in 80 per cent. out of the 500 to 600 asylums lately visited by him the Superintendents stated that intemperance caused the largest number of cases, but that may include in many places cases of temporary insanity from delirium tremens; that the English Lunacy Commissioners state in their Report that drink makes the largest numbers of insane; that delirium tremens is the first step, and a repetition of attacks may lead in the end to permanent lunacy; that there are two forms, the first delirium tremens and the second dypsomania or permanent alcoholism, the first is temporary and may be cured in a week, the second may take twelve months; that he has never known a woman to recover from dypsomania; that in his opinion at least one-half of the insanity, probably more, is caused by intemperance. <sup>4945-50, 4059-61
4068-4, 5027.</sup>

[GAOL TREATMENT.]

Sir Alfred Stephen considers the fining and sending to gaol for a short period of drunkards is a farce; that after a third conviction they ought to be sent to some asylum and made to work when the fit of drunkenness has past; that in Paris there are receiving-houses for drunkards, which is a very good thing; that men convicted so many times should be deprived of the usual rights of a free citizen; that in Russia they are made to sweep the streets; that inebriate asylums would do a great deal of good if the regulations were stringent and carefully acted up to; that the expense to which the drunkards put this country is enormous. <sup>2280-1</sup>

Mr. Macintosh, M.L.C., L.M., is of opinion that the gaols are made too comfortable for the drunkard; that they prefer to be sent there as they know they will be well looked after—better in fact than if they were outside; that some of them prefer to go to gaol to recover from their spree. <sup>2401.</sup>

Mr. Marsh, S.M., thinks that the present system of punishing drunkards is most ineffective as regards lessening drunkenness. <sup>2470.</sup>

Mr. Buchanan, S.M., considers that the present system of punishment for drunkenness is ineffective; and that the establishment of asylums where drunkards could be compulsorily detained would be a great blessing. <sup>2600.</sup>

Mr. Johnson, S.M., considers the present system of punishment has no effect whatever on habitual drunkards; that an habitual drunkard after a number of convictions should be treated as a rogue and vagabond and sent to gaol for a lengthened period, or better still to a reformatory for a year; that nearly half the cases of drunkenness in the Police Courts are those of habituals; that the present system is most expensive; that they should be made to work in the reformatory; that drunkenness should be treated partly as a crime, and the drunkard sent to a reformatory before he degenerates into a lunatic. <sup>2774-8</sup>

Mr. Addison, S.M., considers that the present system is merely filling the gaols without doing any good to the drunkard; he suggests that all first offenders should be brought privately before the magistrates and discharged and not paraded through the streets and put into the dock with criminals as now; that first offenders on bail should be fined 5s. or detained till the rising of the Court; that the present system should stand for second and third offences, and that after three previous convictions offenders should be treated as vagrants and imprisoned without the option of a fine; that old offenders of confirmed drunken habits should be sent to an inebriate asylum for 1 or 2 years, and that they might be discharged during that term (say after six months) on the recommendation of the superintendent and two doctors in the case of decided reformation. <sup>2373-7.</sup>

Mr. Fisher, D.S.M., is of opinion that the present system of punishing habitual drunkards entirely fails to do any good; that they ought (after say six convictions in a few months) to be confined in some separate place (asylum or prison) and made to work for a considerable period. <sup>3065-9</sup>

Mr.

3336-34. Mr. Yates, D.S.M., considers that the present system of punishment for habitual drunkards is not effective; that the offenders ought to be sent in the first instance to an asylum, and, if not reformed there, to a reformatory, and there made to work; that an average of from three to six persons are daily brought before the magistrates, supposed to be of unsound mind, and in nearly every case their condition can be attributed to drink.

3632-7. Canon Rich considers that the present system of punishment for habitual drunkards is ineffective; that they should be sent to an asylum where they could be kept for a much longer period, and have certain work to perform as a punishment; that they are, however, incapable of doing much work as a rule.

3733-4. Dr. O'Connor, Surgeon of Darlinghurst Gaol, is of opinion that the present system of treating drunkards is no punishment at all; that they are sent to the gaol for medical treatment and do no work, and on their return before the magistrate are discharged, often being locked up again during the next day or two.

4611-13, 4652. Dr. Maclaurin, Medical Adviser to the Government, does not consider the present system of punishing habitual drunkards has any beneficial results; that a drunkard should not be punished criminally, except for offending against the public peace, not for mere drunkenness; that long restraint and subjection to the will of another would have a very beneficial result.

4736, 4767. Dr. Mackellar, M.L.C., and late Medical Adviser to the Government, considers that the present system of punishing habitual drunkards is neither beneficial nor does it act as a deterrent; that the custom of associating habitual drunkards with actual criminals in gaols is very harmful to them, and cannot do any good to those with whom they associate.

4846. Bishop Barry considers that the present system of punishing habitual drunkards is bad; that it produces no deterrent or disciplinary effect upon them; that the punishment should be heavier, more deterrent, and undoubtedly should also aim at their reformation.

5032. Rev. R. Sellors, President of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, considers that the present system of treating habitual drunkards is very unsatisfactory; that they should be sent to some institution where they would not be mixed up with criminals.

6021-2. Rev. J. Jefferis, LL.D., is of opinion that the present system of treating habitual drunkards has no good effect; that an habitual drunkard should be sentenced to a long term of imprisonment, not in a State prison, but in some institution established for the purpose; that they should be subjected to both punitive and remedial treatment.

10690. Mr. Davidson does not consider the present system of dealing with habitual drunkards a reasonable one; that he would be strongly in favour of their being sent to some institution for a long period, where they should be made to work and help to keep their families if they have any; that they ought to be punished and at the same time made to work. Mr.

Mr. Melhuish considers that a reformatory system would be better than a gaol, <sup>1101-2.</sup> and that it would not be an undue interference with the liberty of the subject.

Mr. White thinks that if it were possible to make arrangements for a drunkard's <sup>11073-4.</sup> family it would be better to send him to some institution than to a gaol where they often become worse.

Mr. J. Davis considers that habitual drunkards should be treated in some sort <sup>11100,</sup> of a reformatory; that they should be made to work to support the institution; and <sup>11113-5.</sup> also that their families should receive part of the proceeds of their work; that the State should be liable (to the extent of the £30 license fee) for all drunkards in such an institution.

Mr. Beaney does not believe in sending habitual drunkards to gaol and <sup>11045-51,</sup> mixing them up with thieves and other criminals; thinks that the artizan class <sup>11002.</sup> would be in favour of habitual drunkards being sent to a reformatory rather than to a gaol; that they should be made to work in order to help to support the institution and also their families.

Mr. W. Richardson, temperance advocate, considers drunkenness a disease <sup>12259-60.</sup> akin to insanity, and not a crime; that habitual drunkards should not be sent to a gaol, but to a hospital.

Mr. A. Wagg considers habitual drunkards should be confined in some place <sup>12872, 12877,</sup> by themselves, and not mixed up with criminals in gaols; believes that, taking <sup>12874.</sup> everything into consideration, the public would submit to the habitual drunkard being confined for a long period in some institution for his own good; that no arrangements are made for a drunkard's family who is now sent to gaol.

Col. P. G. Ballingall, Member of the Legislature of Iowa, U.S., does not <sup>13308-19</sup> believe in sending drunkards to gaol; that a reformatory system should be started in New South Wales; that the cost of it would not be more than a quarter of the revenue derived from the licenses, as the institution would be self-supporting, each inmate being obliged to work; that this system would act as a deterrent; that in the case of a man with a family the State could give the family what the man should give, and pay themselves by the man's labour; that the fact of the fines being paid by the drunken husband only further impoverishes the family; that it would not be self-supporting, but would be as cheap as a gaol, and very much more for the benefit of the community.

[INEBRIATE ASYLUMS.]

Mr. Fosbery, Inspector General of Police, thinks the State ought to establish <sup>284</sup> reformatories or asylums for the reception and treatment of habitual drunkards both compulsory and voluntary.

Inspector Anderson considers that the establishment of asylums for inebriates <sup>441.</sup> (compulsory and voluntary) would be a very great advantage to the community generally.

Sub-Inspector Atwill considers the establishment of a penitentiary would be <sup>1116.</sup> the means of saving a number of drunkards who are not altogether hopelessly lost.

Sub-Inspector Cotter thinks that unless the period of detention was a very <sup>1301-2.</sup> lengthy one an asylum would not do much good, but that it would be worth trying.

Sir Alfred Stephen is in favour of the establishment of inebriate asylums; <sup>2244-7.</sup> he sees no more reason why an habitual drunkard should not be sent to an asylum than a lunatic. He considers that drunkards are lunatics.

Mr. Marsh, S.M., thinks that such asylums should be established, not only for <sup>2471 3.</sup> the sakes of the drunkards themselves but of their families; that the magistrates should have the power of sending drunkards there; that there should also be voluntary asylums; and that a drunkard's relatives might be allowed to take the necessary action for placing him in an asylum.

Mr. Buchanan, S.M., considers that the establishment of an inebriate <sup>2612</sup> asylum would be a great blessing, but that there might not be much hope of any permanent reformation.

Mr. Addison, S.M., thinks that after three or more convictions habitual <sup>2877 289.</sup> drunkards should be sent to an inebriate asylum, and detained there for a period of one or two years, or if permanently reformed might be discharged on the certificate of two doctors and the superintendent at any time; that this system, called "Maisons de Santé," has been tried in Belgium, and answers well.

Mr. Fisher, D.S.M., considers that after (say) six convictions in a given number of months, an habitual drunkard should be sent to an asylum for a sufficiently long period, and made to work, so as to make the institution as much as possible self-supporting; that such persons are, to all intents and purposes, lunatics, and should be treated as such; that these asylums should be voluntary as well as compulsory.

Mr. Yates, D.S.M., thinks that the habitual drunkard might be sent to an asylum in the first instance, and, if not cured under that system, to a reformatory where he should be made to work; he considers drunkenness more a disease than a form of lunacy; that the institutions should be both compulsory and voluntary.

Mr. Maclean, Comptroller General of Prisons, considers there is no reason why a penitentiary and an inebriate asylum should not work together; that upon certain conditions sentences might be reduced from the penitentiary to the asylum, but that it is necessary to have exemplary punishment; that penal labour in the penitentiary would no doubt act as a deterrent; and that the cost of such a system would be less than the present one.

Mr. Read, Governor of Darlinghurst Gaol, thinks that the establishment of an asylum would have the effect of reforming numbers of drunkards; that in certain cases they should be subjected to separate treatment on board a hulk.

Canon Rich states that there is a home for fallen women in Sydney; that female drunkards come there and are compelled by the rules to stop a specified time; some stop there as long as six and nine months, and then get out on some excuse and get drunk; that drinking in these cases is due to a craving, not to a desire to drown their troubles.

Dr. O'Connor, Surgeon of Darlinghurst Gaol, thinks that an inebriate asylum should be established; that drunkards should be sent there on the representations of two responsible persons, for a period of (say) at first three and four months, then only liberated on bail; if there was a recurrence of the offence the drunkard should be detained until a decided reform was promised or apparent; the people who had charge of him when on bail should be made liable for his good behaviour; that the fear of being detained for an indefinite period would act as a deterrent; that reformation would depend more on the person's will than anything else.

Dr. Manning, Inspector-General of Insane, states that in America the inebriate asylums were doing a great deal of good; but that they did not touch the lower classes to any extent; that if asylums are established here (and it would be a good thing if they were), they should provide both for rich and poor; that legislation for the treatment of inebriates should be distinct from that for lunatics, because, when the inebriate has recovered his reason, it is necessary to keep him for some months; it is a hardship that he should be shut up with lunatics, and that he would resent such treatment by working on the delusions of the lunatic and making him troublesome; converses almost daily with reformed patients; that all Inebriate Asylum Acts should empower voluntary incarceration as well as compulsory; that there should be two divisions—one for those capable of paying well, and another for those not so well off, and for those who can pay nothing who should be made to work; would not refer to or consider it as a place for punishment. In the case of men offending against the law when in a state of drunkenness they should be sent to gaol first, for punishment, and then to the asylum for treatment.

Dr. Maclaurin, Medical Adviser to the Government, considers that inebriate asylums no doubt do good, but that they are not quite so successful as was at first expected; that there are three classes of drunkards—the habitual drunkard, the man who goes on the spree and gets drunk only occasionally, and the neurotic drunkard, who feels the craze coming on and eventually gives way; the first and third are the cases in which an inebriate asylum would do good; that a man should be punished for any breach of the law committed whilst being drunk, and treated for reformation afterwards; that the knowledge that a man would be sent back again on a recurrence of his drunkenness would, no doubt, act as a deterrent; gives an instance of a man who for sixteen years had an attack of delirium tremens every six months; that there should be provisions to enable responsible persons to place their friends or relations (who give way to excessive drinking) in these asylums, in the same manner as persons are now sent to lunatic asylums.

Dr. Mackellar, M.L.C., late Medical Adviser to the Government, is of opinion that some institution should be established for the treatment of habitual drunkards, on somewhat the same lines as lunatic asylums; that, apart from the benefit to the individual, individual, it would be cheaper for the State; that they should be voluntary as well compulsory; that he objects to the words reformatory and asylum, and would call all these institutions hospitals, as dealing with diseases, and not crimes.

Bishop Barry states that he is aware of the existence of inebriate asylums; <sup>4884, 4846-8.</sup> that in England there is an Act called "Dalrymple's Act," which enables people to be incarcerated in an asylum by their own consent, which, when once given, cannot be withdrawn; knows nothing of the working of it; sees no reason why the habitual drunkard should be treated differently from persons suffering from temporary insanity, their conditions being analogous; that drunkards are certainly capable of reclamation, women, no doubt, being more difficult patients than men.

Dr. Tucker visited an inebriate asylum in San Francisco, and also a place <sup>4997-5002.</sup> that had been one and failed at New York, owing to the inmates being allowed out; that there can be no satisfactory results under twelve months restraint and abstinence; that there is no clause in any of the Acts of the United States with reference to compulsory restraint; there these asylums are voluntary.

Rev. J. D. Langley considers that an institution should be established where <sup>5680-2, 5600-</sup> habitual drunkards might be confined and made to work for the benefit of the community and of their families, and be enabled to recover their physical condition, and be taught habits of self-restraint; that the Church Home is an example of what success might be attained; no doubt there would be many disappointments; that women are far more difficult to reform than men; that an asylum is the only way of dealing with the matter, and that they must be both compulsory and voluntary; that private homes under Government inspection would be much more likely to do good than State institutions; that the moral training in private homes would be much more effectual than the treatment in State institutions.

Judge Wilkinson thinks that in the case of any amendments bearing on this <sup>5901-3.</sup> subject being made, it would be advisable to insert a clause under which any person could bind himself not to take proceedings against those who put him into an asylum for six or twelve months, or for such period as might be necessary for a complete cure; believes there is such a law in America; would have no objection to power being given magistrates to commit habitual drunkards if proper safeguards were also provided as in the case of lunatics at present.

Rev. J. Jefferis, LL.D., states that there is a voluntary inebriate asylum in <sup>6016-23.</sup> South Australia; that such an asylum should be established here, and that the magistrates should have power to commit; that there should be punitive as well as curative treatment.

Mr. Toohy, M.P., considers that an inebriate asylum should be established; <sup>6280-90.</sup> that a magistrate should have power to commit to these asylums instead of to gaol; that fining should be done away with; that drunkenness is a modified form of insanity.

Mr. Hunt, of the "Oxford Hotel," thinks that an inebriate asylum should be <sup>7553-9.</sup> established where an habitual drunkard might be detained for a long period according to his condition; that the magistrates should have power to commit drunkards to this institution; that one in eight or ten might be saved by this means; that none are saved when sent to gaol.

Sir John Robertson states that he once voted against a Bill which provided <sup>8317-24, 8320-32.</sup> for the establishment of an inebriate asylum, but that he would not do so now on account of the increase of drunkenness; that the magistrates should have the power of committal, the right of appeal being allowed; that such an institution should be managed by a committee of gentlemen, and with great moderation, somewhat on the lines of lunatic asylums; that the inmates should be detained for any period up to one year or more, if necessary; that the cost should not be considered, in view of the great benefit to the community; that this kind of detention would act as a deterrent to many in the same way as the "Vernon" acts as a deterrent to boys; that it should be as unlike a gaol as possible.

Mr. Atkinson thinks that, instead of sending an habitual drunkard to gaol <sup>9491-4.</sup> for seven days (at the expiration of which he starts drinking again) he should be sent to an asylum where he could be treated for a longer time; does not consider it would be a violation of the liberty of the subject to detain an habitual drunkard for for six months or a year; that it would be no more unjust than if he were suffering from an infectious disease; that the community would favor magistrates having the power to commit to an asylum habitual drunkards for a period of six months or more.

9322-6. Mr. Watson states, that if he ever became an habitual drunkard he would not object to being sent to an asylum for six months or more, with a view to his reformation; that the knowledge that such was the treatment for habitual drunkenness would no doubt act as a deterrent to some but not to all; that the power of committal to an asylum by magistrates, of drunkards three times convicted in one year, would be going too far, as he personally knows one man who every Friday and Saturday gets more or less drunk, and on Sundays pulls himself together and goes to his work on Mondays, and this man he does not consider an habitual drunkard.

9001-8. Mr. Gordon thinks habitual drunkards ought to be sent to some sort of reformatory; first for his own good and next for the good of the community; that it would be a charity to shut such men up for six months or more where they would be properly cared for; that the sensible portion of the working classes would be in favour of such a law; states a case of a friend of his who might have been cured by such an institution.

10440-1. Mr. Smith thinks that if provision can be made for a man's family while he is detained in an asylum for six months or more, he sees no objection to his being in an asylum; that there is nothing despotic or tyrannical in such treatment, and that it would, no doubt, act as a deterrent to some.

10683-00. Mr. J. Davidson would be in favour of habitual drunkards being committed by a magistrate to an asylum for any period up to twelve months; that there would be no very great objection to such a plan, as an habitual drunkard is of no benefit to anyone, but rather a nuisance; that in the case of a man with a family being committed, some arrangement might be made for the family and the man made to work at the asylum, and so help to support the institution and his family.

11435-9. Mr. Williams states that there are hospitals for inebriates in England; that it would be obnoxious to the community that magistrates should have the power to commit habitual drunkards to a reformatory or asylum unless some provision was made for the man's family.

12159-61. Mr. Vale, Secretary to the Victorian Alliance for the Suppression of the Liquor Traffic, states that an asylum was established in Victoria, but that it has been unsuccessful, owing to a charge of four guineas a week being made by the doctor in charge; that there is a law which allows persons to be sent to such an institution by a Judge on the evidence of a medical man that restraint is necessary, which can be put in force either by the person addicted to drink or his friends and relations. An habitual drunkard can be sent to gaol under the Police Offence Statute; but that no provision has been made for the support of the man's wife and children whilst he is shut up—none is made if a man is sent to prison; that they would in most cases be committed on the action of their wives or relations, who, it is presumed, would not do so unless some provision could be made for those dependent on the husband.

12372-7. Mr. Wagg thinks that habitual drunkards ought not to be sent to gaol to mix with criminals, but to some place by themselves; that no provision is made for the wives and families of habituals who are now sent to gaol; that, taking all the circumstances of the case into consideration, the public would tolerate a law permitting a magistrate to convict an habitual drunkard, and send him to an asylum for a long period of (say) six or nine months.

13460-2. Mr. Knapp, Secretary to the Local Option League, considers that if inebriate asylums were established they would go a long way towards curing the disease of drunkenness; that he has been told that the cures in America average 70 to 80 per cent.; that they should be compulsory as well as voluntary; that habitual drunkards should be treated as lunatics, not as criminals.

13575-6, 13584. Mr. Hayes, a late resident in Canada, knows of private inebriate asylums, but not public ones; that they are very successful, and that he has been told by inmates that have come out that they have no further desire to drink; that he frequently attended at an asylum in the town where he lived. Mr.

Mr. Fosbery, Inspector General of Police, is in favour of the houses being<sup>91-5.</sup> strictly closed; but thinks it not unreasonable that people of the class who do not keep cellars should be able to get what they require on Sundays; looks upon Sunday opening, however, as retrograde legislation; at the same time he thinks the present Act went beyond what the people were willing to bear, as is shown by their getting drunk illegally. If they are to be opened, would open them from 12 to 1.30, or 1 to 2; but would prefer to have them closed if possible.

Inspector Mackay considers that there is a very great improvement in the<sup>559-60.</sup> way Sundays are kept under the new Act, and that opening the houses on Sundays, even for a minute, would undoubtedly be retrograde legislation.

Sub-Inspector Atwill thinks that opening for a short time might have the<sup>1027 30, 1109.</sup> effect of removing what is called the poor man's grievance; but that it would be fraught with evil, and that the houses would be full of people for the rest of the day, as the publican would shut the doors on them, although he might not let any more in; that it would only be an advantage to a few respectable people, the majority being a worthless lot, and who would get drunk; thinks that the Police ought to have greater powers if the houses are opened; that if he could enforce Sunday closing at least twenty-five houses in his division would close for good.

Sub-Inspector Cotter does not think that opening the houses for an hour or<sup>1325, 1331, 1342 d.</sup> so would prevent illicit drinking for the rest of the day; that it would be easier to administer the Act if an hour or two morning and evening were allowed, and the other provisions of the English Act adopted; that if any concessions are made additional facilities for punishing the law-breaker must be given; that full Sunday closing would be better if it could be enforced.

Sub-Inspector Larkins does not see any particular harm in opening for an<sup>1600-1.</sup> hour or two in the day-time, but does not think the people require it, and states that it did not stop illicit drinking under the old Act.

Sub-Inspector Potter would not be in favor of opening the houses at all, as<sup>1735.</sup> under the old Act the back and side doors were open all day, when the houses were allowed to open from 1 to 3 p.m.

Sub-Inspector Lenthall thinks Sunday closing a hardship on the poorer classes; <sup>1806, 1902.</sup> that the houses might be opened for a short time if some of the provisions of the English Act were adopted.

Inspector Camphin considers it would be beneficial to open the houses for an<sup>2053, 2110, 2122.</sup> hour in the middle of the day as a compromise to some, and that it might lessen illicit drinking, as those who wanted to drink might wait till they could do so lawfully, and that also heavy penalties should be inflicted on the law-breakers.

Sir Alfred Stephen considers that the inconveniences caused by Sunday closing<sup>2205-9.</sup> are not so great as to countervail the good resulting from entire Sunday closing; and therefore, although the provision for opening for an hour or two is not a bad one, yet it is a dangerous one; and while admitting there may be hardship in some cases, considers it best to retain entire Sunday closing.

Mr. Macintosh, M.L.C., L.M., considers it impossible to keep people out of<sup>2307-8, 2333.</sup> the public-houses on Sundays, and that therefore it would be better to open for one hour and after that close entirely, not even allowing inmates and lodgers to be served; prefers however entire Sunday prohibition if it were practicable.

Mr. Marsh, S.M., appeared to be uncertain as to his opinion. He once<sup>2504-5.</sup> thought that public-houses ought to be opened for an hour or two, but since he has<sup>2590-3.</sup> heard that an attempt to close the houses in England was being made, and that they were closed in Scotland and Wales, his opinion has undergone some little change; he also states that it is a hardship to the working man; that the men will have their drinks, Sundays or no Sundays; and that he would be in favour of opening for a certain time on Sundays, but no drink to be consumed on the premises.

Mr. Buchanan, S.M., disapproves of the Sunday prohibition clause, and<sup>2627</sup> considers that the houses ought to be opened for an hour or two.

Mr. Johnson, S.M., is in favour of opening for one hour, from 1 to 2 p.m., and<sup>2739, 2793, 2799.</sup> after that making the law more stringent.

Mr. Addison, S.M., would like to see as little trading as possible on Sundays; <sup>2896, 3000.</sup> but that he has come to the conclusion that it is necessary to open the houses for two hours in the middle of the day, with a view to destroy the present system of secret and illegal sale; regards the opening of the houses as a desperate remedy.

Mr. Fisher, D.S.M., is in favour of entire closing, but thinks that the opening of the houses for one hour might have the effect of lessening the infringements of the law; that if the people will drink, it is better that they should get drink legitimately.

3290

Mr. Abbott, S.M., is in favour of strict Sunday closing, and thinks that the police should be empowered to carry out the present law as it stands.

3419-23.

Mr. Yates, D.S.M., would not be opposed to the houses being opened from 1 to 2, thinks that there would be less illicit drinking if the houses were allowed to open for an hour; and that there does not appear to be any difference in the numbers of drunkards brought before the magistrates on Monday mornings.

3502.

Mr. Maclean, Comptroller of Prisons, considers the present law ought to be modified; that it is very hard on that class who are not drunkards and on those who move about on Sundays; that the present law will never be carried out; and that the houses might be opened for one hour.

3743-6.

Canon Rich is strongly in favour of entire Sunday closing, and the law as it stands being enforced; has never heard any complaints about the houses being closed.

4001.

Mr. Powell, Collector of Customs, is in favour of the English practice of opening for certain hours on Sunday, and considers that the great amount of illicit drinking that goes on is evidence of the necessity to open the houses under restrictions.

4364-5.

Bishop Barry believes in entire Sunday closing, and that the law ought to be enforced; that it is no doubt a hardship to some, but the balance is in favour of the good done by the closing.

5271-4.

Rev. F. B. Boyce states that the Local Option League is in favour of entire Sunday closing, and the insertion of a clause like that in the English Act with reference to the onus of proof; that the convictions for Sunday selling in 1881 were 527, and in 1882, under the new Act, 238.

5590-3.

Rev. J. D. Langley states that he is in favour of Sunday closing; that the law is not observed, and that the provisions of the English Act which place the onus of proof on the publican would be a solution of the difficulty; that every facility should be given to the police to enable them to detect and convict the offenders.

Mr. Clark is in favour of the insertion of a clause putting the onus of proof on the publican, as in the English Act; is not certain as to whether the customer should be exempt, but considers he would be more likely to give truthful evidence if he were not liable to be punished.

Rev. R. Sellors, President of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, states that although the law is to some extent evaded the good results are most marked, and that he would on no account advocate the law being altered in the direction of partial opening; that this refers to the country towns as well as Sydney; is in favour of opening the houses for accommodating the travelling public, but not for the sale of liquor.

Rev. J. Jefferis, LL.D., is in favour of entire Sunday closing; he does not consider there is any desire among the order-loving portions of the community to have the houses opened for a time on Sundays.

Mr. Toohey, M.P., absolutely condemns total Sunday closing; and considers that it does a great deal of harm by causing people to take home on Saturdays more than they otherwise would, also that those who do get into a house now stay there and drink more than they would if they were allowed to get their drink legally, and come and go as they pleased during certain hours; he is in favour of the houses being opened from 1 to 3 p.m., and from 8 to 9 or 10.30 p.m., which he considers would have a good effect eventually.

Mr. Olliffe, M.P., of the "Royal Hyde Park Hotel," is in favour of the houses being allowed to open from 1 to 3, and for the closing to be made absolute for the rest of the day and the law to be enforced; that, as the law now stands, trade is improved to the detriment of the public, as people take home on Saturday nights more than they would consume on a Sunday.

Mr. Weale, Secretary of the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association, states that that society is in favour of having the houses opened from 7 to 9 a.m., 1 to 3 p.m., and 8 to 10 p.m.; but that he himself is in favour of only one opening, viz., from 1 to 4 or 5 p.m.; that if a reasonable time were allowed the law might then be strictly enforced.

Mr. Thompson, late President of the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association, wine and spirit merchant, is of opinion that it would be very much better to regulate the traffic than prohibit it; that if a poll were taken as to opening from 1 to 3 p.m., the Parliamentary roll being used, the majority would be in favour of it; that drunkenness would be lessened 20 per cent. if the houses were opened from 1 to 3; that he has no sympathy with the wishes of the A.L.V. Association as to Sunday opening, but is of opinion that it would be beneficial for the authorities to allow houses in certain places of public resort to open from 3 to 5, or such other hours as might be most convenient for the public, that is, in addition to the mid-day opening before mentioned.

Mr. Spora, licensed victualler, is in favour of the houses being opened for <sup>6887.</sup> one hour in the morning, two in the afternoon, and one in the evening.

Mr. Hilder, traveller for Messrs. Tooth & Co., personally is opposed to Sunday <sup>7102-4.</sup> trading; states that Messrs. Tooth & Co. are opposed to the law being broken, but that does not imply that they consider that a man should not be allowed his dinner beer; that he also thinks that every working man ought to be allowed to get his beer for dinner.

Mr. North states that he is in favour of entire Sunday closing. <sup>7341.</sup>

Mr. Self, licensed victualler, states that he is a member of the Association <sup>7481.</sup> that petitioned the Government to open the houses from 8 to 10 a.m., 1 to 3 p.m., and 8 to 10 p.m., and that he considers that it would have the effect of doing away with a great deal of drunkenness; and that the law might be made more strict during the prohibited hours.

Mr. Hunt, of the "Oxford Hotel," is in favour of the houses being opened <sup>7616.</sup> for the same hours as in England, that is, two hours in the morning, two in the afternoon, and from 7 to 10 at night.

Mr. Watson, of the "Paragon Hotel," states that the majority of his customers <sup>7685-7</sup> are in favour of partial Sunday opening; that he is in favour of opening in the morning, at mid-day, and for an hour or two in the evening, and that after those hours the bars should be closed to all lodgers, travellers—in fact to every one; speaking for himself he is in favour of Sunday closing.

Mr. Smith, of the "Burrangong Hotel," states that he would not open his house <sup>7847, 7875-8.</sup> on Sundays if the law were altered, but that there would be less drunkenness if drink could be obtained legally on Sundays; that when once a man gets into a house he drinks more than he otherwise would, and also that more drink is taken home on Saturday nights than used to be the case. The result is a great deal of harm is done to the wives and families, and the men are incited to go on drinking on Sundays.

Mr. Rainford, of the "Cambridge Club Hotel," states that personally one <sup>7928, 8002-5, 8010-12, 8055-0.</sup> opening (say from 1 to 3) would suit him; that his Association are in favour of opening from 1 to 3 and 8 to 10; that he thinks it would lessen drunkenness if the public could get what they want legally; that the general opinion of the public is in favour of limited Sunday opening; that he sells very largely on Saturday nights for Sunday use both beer and flasks of spirits, and is of opinion that more drink is consumed now than would be consumed if the houses were opened for stated hours; that publicans, by refusing to sell on Sundays, lose their week-day customers.

Mr. Roberts, of the "Crown and Anchor Hotel," thinks that it would be a wiser <sup>8174, 8180-01.</sup> plan to open between 1 and 3 on Sundays; that he has not noticed any great increase in Saturday night's sales; that the opening for a few hours would have the effect of putting a stop to illicit drinking.

Sir John Robertson considers that if the houses were opened, at any rate for <sup>8305.</sup> the sale of beer, for one hour, between 1 and 2, it would have the effect of lessening drunkenness, as the public would not require to provide themselves with flasks; also, that the closing of the houses causes quarrels, &c., in the families of working men, who take home quantities of drink on Saturday nights; also, that there is no necessity to allow spirits to be sold during that hour.

Mr. Gray is of opinion that the majority of men at Mort & Co.'s are in <sup>8482, 8485.</sup> favour of entire Sunday closing.

Mr. Pemberton is of opinion that the majority of the men at Hudson Bros. <sup>8653, 8661.</sup> are in favour of entire Sunday closing.

Mr. J. Akrill is in favour of total Sunday closing, and says that as a body the <sup>8931-4, 8968.</sup> working men are also in favour of Sunday closing. Certainly their wives are.

Mr. Riley, from Farmer & Co.'s, states that the people with whom he associates are in favour of retaining the law as it stands at present with regard to Sunday closing.

9067.

Mr. Paul, of the Railway Department, is of opinion that the majority of the men with whom he is connected are in favour of retaining the law as it stands as regards Sunday closing.

Mr. Hoyle is of opinion that if the houses were allowed to open for one hour, and if for any offence before or after that hour the license were cancelled, it would have the effect of stopping Sunday trading; that this opinion is held by many, but that the majority are indifferent; believes, however, that the majority are in favour of Sunday closing, if it could be strictly enforced; personally, is in favour, under existing circumstances, of Sunday opening; that it would lead to less drinking.

Mr. Smith, from Cameron's Tobacco Factory, considers that the present Act has caused a great deal of intemperance in the city and suburbs; that nine-tenths of the people with whom he mixes are in favour of Sunday opening; that Sunday closing has caused a great deal of intemperance among families; that many of the men at Cameron's lose time on Mondays; that however, if the present law could be strictly enforced, there would be less drunkenness.

Mr. Morris thinks that the majority of the men at Cameron's are in favour of opening on Sundays; believes that two-thirds of the working men throughout New South Wales are in favour of opening on Sundays for a portion of the day.

Mr. Atkinson, from the Government Printing Office, thinks that the general opinion is that the present law is objectionable, and that if the houses were opened for an hour on Sunday, from 1 to 2, it would prevent a great deal of the drinking now carried on in private houses; that more liquor is taken home on Saturdays at present than otherwise would be drunk on Sundays if the houses were opened for a time.

Mr. Watson thinks that the majority in the Government Printing Office are in favour of opening the houses from 1 to 2, or 2 to 3 p.m., and from 9 to 10 p.m. in the evening; that closing the houses on Sundays has had the effect of causing a greater consumption of liquor, because when a man gets into a house now he stays there and drinks more than he otherwise would; that he has heard a publican boast that he sells more Colonial beer on a Sunday than he does during the week.

Mr. Hannon considers it a hardship that the houses should be closed on Sundays; is in favour of the houses being opened from 1 to 3 p.m.; that the closing of the houses leads to a great deal more drunkenness than there would be if the houses were open; that the people going in illegally drink more than they would if they could drink legally.

Mr. Long thinks that the majority of the men at Lassetter's are in favour of Sunday closing, but that there are a number of men who would like the houses opened for an hour or two; that the majority of the people in the locality in which he lives (Waverley) are also in favour of Sunday closing; that if the houses were opened for an hour or two it would not stop the illegal sales during the rest of the day; gives his experience to that effect under the old Act; that no doubt more is drunk now by those who get into a house than would be drunk if the houses were opened for a short time; but that the majority of the general public are in favor of the law as it stands.

Mr. Gordon is of opinion that more liquor is drunk under the present Act than was drunk when the houses were open for a short time on Sundays; that the houses should be opened for one hour at mid-day and one hour in the evening, between 1 and 2 p.m. and 8 and 9 p.m.; but that if Sunday closing could be strictly enforced he would be in favour of it.

Mr. Liston thinks that the majority of men employed at Dixon's Tobacco Factory are in favour of the law as it stands.

Mr. Sharp, from Dixon's Tobacco Works, considers that opinions are very much divided there, some wanting the houses opened for one hour in the morning, one at mid-day, and one at night, and others that the houses should be kept shut; his own opinion is that they are best shut; states also that a man living opposite to him used to get drunk five Sundays out of every six; thinks the law ought to be made more stringent and be properly enforced; that the inclination of the more intelligent portion of the community would be to keep the houses closed.

Mr.

Mr. Smith, from M'Murtrie, Kellerman, & Co.'s, objects strongly to the opening of houses on Sundays, but thinks the majority of his fellow-workmen are of opinion that the houses should be opened for a certain time. <sup>10938-9.</sup>

Mr. Graham states that the men in the Sydney Morning Herald Office were almost unanimous in wanting the houses opened for certain hours on Sundays; they think it better to be able to get their liquor legally than illegally. <sup>10495, 10504.</sup>

Mr. Dunshea, from the Sydney Morning Herald Office, states that the majority of the men are against the present Act as to Sunday closing; also that they desire that a special house (to be named) should be licensed to sell liquor to printers for one hour after 11 o'clock both on Sundays and week-days. <sup>10557, 10563-5.</sup>

Mr. Davidson, from Flood & Co., thinks that the majority of wharf labourers are in favour of the houses being opened from 9 to 11 a.m., and from 3 to 4 p.m.; that the taking of drink home on Saturdays does a great deal of harm. <sup>10613-4, 10623.4.</sup>

Mr. Sayers is of opinion that the majority of wharf-labourers are in favour of opening the houses on Sundays from 12:30 to 3 p.m., or even till church time. <sup>10302-10.</sup>

Mr. O'Connor, from Anthony Hordern's, is of opinion that the majority of his fellow-shopmen are in favour of the houses being opened for some part of Sunday. <sup>10920-6.</sup>

Mr. Melhuish is of opinion that the majority of the men at Anthony Hordern's & Sons are in favour of having the houses opened on Sundays for the same time as in England, that is from 1 to 3 and from 6 or 7 to 10 p.m.; that the majority of working-men are in favour of Sunday opening. <sup>10958-60, 10973, 11025.</sup>

Mr. White states that some of the men working with him in the Corporation works are in favour of Sunday opening. <sup>11078.</sup>

Mr. Davis, from the Corporation works, thinks that the prevailing opinion among his fellow-workmen is that the houses should be opened for a time on Sundays; as they consider it would lessen drunkenness, as the men would take their glass and then go away. <sup>11097.</sup>

Mr. Ford, from Dalgety & Co.'s wharf, thinks that the majority of wharf-labourers are in favour of Sunday opening; that it might be beneficial to open from 1 to 3 p.m., as the men might then not drink so much afterwards. <sup>11148-9, 11160-2.</sup>

Mr. Beckett, from Dalgety and Co., does not think the majority of wharf labourers want the houses opened on Sundays; that he himself is of opinion that it would be better to open the houses on Sunday than have the present illegal traffic; but that it would be best to strictly enforce the law as it stands. <sup>11282, 11289, 11347.</sup>

Mr. Williams, from the Albion Tailoring Company, thinks that the majority of his fellow-workmen are in favour of Sunday opening; that there would be less drunkenness on Sundays if the houses were opened; that they should be opened for the English hours, or from 1 to 3 and from 6 to 9 p.m. <sup>11304-8, 11402.</sup>

Mr. Beaney considers Sunday closing has been a great boon to the working man; has not seen so much drunkenness under the new Act as under the old one; thinks that if the houses were opened for an hour or so there would be more drunkenness than there is now; is of opinion that the present law should be retained and enforced. <sup>11501-5, 11567-7.</sup>

Mr. Russell (a cabman) thinks that the houses ought to be opened for an hour or so, as it is impossible to prevent the law being evaded. <sup>11728-40.</sup>

Mr. Law (a cabman) thinks that the houses should be opened for a short time for the sale of liquor to be drunk off the premises. <sup>11821-4.</sup>

Mr. Davis, Secretary to Federated Seamen's Union, is of opinion that nearly all the Members of his Union are in favor of the houses being opened on Sundays; that more drunkenness is caused by men getting illegally into houses than there would be if the houses were opened; that the men would prefer certain hours between church hours. <sup>11883-4, 12400-3.</sup>

Rev. W. Bradley, Chaplain to the Bethel Church, thinks the majority of sailors are in favor of Sunday opening; but that if the law were strictly enforced, judging from the improved character of the men, they would vote for their being shut, and kept shut. <sup>11960-8.</sup>

Mr. W. Richardson, Temperance Advocate, states that he has frequently taken a show of hands on Sunday closing at his gatherings, and his hearers are generally unanimous in favour of its continuance; that the working man is in favor of Sunday closing. <sup>12309-11.</sup>

- 12524-7. Mr. Atkinson, a member of the Seamen's Union, is in favour of opening for one or two hours on Sunday; thinks that it would do away with much of the drunkenness which occurs now; but that it would be to the advantage of the working man if the houses were kept strictly shut when shut.
- 12708-13. Mr. Shearston, Sailors' Missionary, thinks the majority of sailors are in favour of having the houses opened on Sundays; but that the wives of the wharf-labourers looked upon Sunday closing as a very great blessing.
- 12733, 12764. Mr. Simpson states that the majority of the Sydney Progressive Carpenters' Society are in favour of retaining the present law; that he is in favour of strict Sunday closing.
12843. Mr. Wagg states that the majority of the members of the Sydney Progressive Carpenters' Society are in favour of the law as it stands, and that some would like to see it more strictly enforced.
- 12882-6. Mr. Spencer states that the majority of the members of the United Plasterers' Society are in favour of the opening of the houses on Sundays for four hours; that it would in a great measure do away with the drunkenness that now takes place.
- 13154-6, 13172-3. Mr. More is of opinion that there is more drunkenness now than when the houses were open for a short time on Sundays; that if the houses could be rigidly closed, would be in favour of their being so; that the majority of the Stonemasons' Union are of the same opinion as himself.
- 13210, 13213. Mr. Ware is of opinion that Sunday opening would be better than the present state of things; that the taking home on Saturdays of quantities of beer leads to intemperance and Sunday drinking, and also demoralizes the wife and family.

[EARLY CLOSING.]

- 120-2. Mr. Fosbery, the Inspector-General of Police, considers that the 11 o'clock closing has been wholly beneficial although it may have caused some slight inconvenience to those whose occupation keeps them out late at night; that there being so many difficulties in the way of granting night licenses it would be better to leave matters as they are.
- 3 15, 410. Inspector Anderson states that early closing has effected a most marked and beneficial change; knows of nothing that has effected so great a change previously during his thirty-two year's service in Sydney; would be in favor of a large number of houses closing at 10 o'clock, and is certain that thereby a similar and corresponding improvement would be effected.
610. Inspector Waters considers that the 11 o'clock closing has had a most beneficial effect.
804. Sub-Inspector Mackay considers that the 11 o'clock closing has caused very great improvement in his division, and states that he would like to see the public-houses closed at 10 or 10.30.
- 1025, 1112. Sub-Inspector Atwell considers that the early closing clause has worked the best of all the clauses in the Act of 1882, and that the effect has been most beneficial.
- 1273, 1404. Sub-Inspector Cotter considers that early closing inflicts no hardship on anyone, and states that he would rather allow some concession on Sundays than all the public-houses to remain open after 11 o'clock on week days.
- 1505-8. Sub-Inspector Larkins considers that early closing has effected a wonderful improvement, but not so marked in the suburbs as in the city; that it would be better to close the houses at 10 o'clock in the suburbs.
- 1671-3, 717. Sub-Inspector Potter considers that the present hour for closing is very satisfactory and works well, and states that when the houses were kept open till 12 it was 2 before the streets were quiet, and that now there are very few people about at 12 o'clock.

Sub-Inspector

Sub-Inspector Lenthall considers that the 11 o'clock closing has had a great deal to do with the diminution of the number of drunkards to be seen at night; that it has worked well and that it should not be altered. 1785, 1956-7.

Inspector Camphin considers that the 11 o'clock closing has been very beneficial; that there is a very great improvement visible in the state of the city at night under the present Act. 2057, 2128-30.

Sir Alfred Stephen is very decidedly in favour of the 11 o'clock closing, but sees no objection to certain public-houses in the vicinity of theatres and other places of amusement being permitted to remain open for the benefit of playgoers, special precautions being taken against any misconduct arising from such a privilege; as a general rule, however, he considers that the present hour should not be departed from, or as little so as possible, and then only under special conditions. 2260-3.

Mr. Macintosh, M.L.C., L.M., thinks it would be an advantage to close all public-houses at 10 o'clock. 2398-99.

Mr. Buchanan, S.M., considers that the present hours are quite sufficient, and would not lengthen them on any account. 2657-9.

Mr. Johnson, S.M., considers that the hours for selling should not be lengthened, and that there is less drunkenness at night owing to the 11 o'clock closing. 2790, 2880.

Mr. Addison, S.M., considers that 11 o'clock is quite late enough for all ordinary houses to be open; but considers that the large hotels should be permitted to remain open till 12 o'clock, and those near theatres till 11.30 p.m. on payment of extra fees for the privilege. 2894, 2920-2.

Mr. Fisher, D.S.M., considers that early closing has made a marked improvement in the city and done a great deal of good. 3029.

Mr. Abbott, S.M., considers that 11 o'clock closing is of no great advantage to either the public or the publicans, and that the hour of closing might be slightly extended. 3232.

Mr. Yates, D.S.M., considers that 11 o'clock closing is very beneficial, and that it should not be altered. 3451-2.

Mr. Maclean, Comptroller-General of Prisons, considers that there is a marked improvement in the state of the city at night, owing to the 11 o'clock closing; but that the improvement is not so marked as it was when the Act first came into operation. 3501.

Bishop Barry would be in favour of the public-houses being closed at 10 o'clock at night. 4897.

Rev. R. Sellors considers early closing a benefit to the community. 5849, 5911.

Rev. J. Jefferis, LL.D., considers 11 o'clock closing has had some beneficial tendencies but would prefer closing at 10 o'clock. 6065-0.

Mr. J. M. Toohey, M.P., considers 11 o'clock closing most beneficial and that it works admirably. 6312.

Mr. Olliffe, M.P., of the "Royal Hyde Park Hotel," considers that public-houses should be permitted to open half an hour earlier for the purpose of supplying early arrivals with refreshments, and to keep open for half-an-hour later at night to provide for the wants of theatre-goers, and to put a stop to the sly-grog selling that goes on in oyster-shops and other places. 6484-92.

Mr. Thompson, late President of the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association, considers early closing has been an advantage. 6767.

Mr. Spora, of the "Australian Inn," thinks public-houses ought to be allowed to be open from 5 o'clock in the morning till midnight. 6970-1.

Mr. J. B. North considers that the hours of opening are quite long enough, and that early closing has effected a most decided improvement in the condition of the streets at night. 7306-70.

Mr. Self, of the "Star Hotel," thinks it would be better to allow the public-houses to be opened half an hour earlier in the morning and also to keep open a little later at night, as he has to keep open to let his lodgers in, if they have been to the theatre, but he cannot do any trade, which he considers a hardship. 7422.

Mr.

7524. Mr. Hunt, of the "Oxford Hotel," considers 11 o'clock a very good hour for the majority of public-houses, but that for large "family hotels" some concession ought to be made; that it has had a very beneficial effect on the condition of the streets at night.

7744-9. Mr. Watson, of the "Paragon Hotel," would prefer the hours being extended half an hour in the morning and half an hour at night.

7891-75. Mr. Smith, of the "Burrangong Hotel," considers that early closing causes people to frequent houses of ill-fame for the purpose of obtaining drink, and states that he has been to such places for that purpose himself; that when the houses were allowed open till 12 o'clock there was never any trouble in getting the people out; and that there was less drunkenness under the old hours than there is under the present ones.

7879, 8019. Mr. Rainford, of the "Cambridge Club Hotel," considers 11 o'clock closing is too early; that the law is now evaded to a great extent which was not the case when the public-houses were open till 12 o'clock.

The evidence of representatives of the artisan classes was to the following effect:—

8041-2. Mr. J. Akrill, from Messrs. Goodlet & Smith's, considers that less time has been lost owing to early closing, and that it is a great advantage to the men and their families generally.

8094-6. Mr. Riley, from Messrs. Farmer & Co., considers 10 o'clock would be a much better hour for closing public-houses than 11.

9744-0. Mr. Long, from Messrs. Lassetter & Co's., states that for some time he was night watchman there, and he then saw what a special boon early closing was; that under the old Act the streets were never cleared until 3 o'clock; that his experience has been that the 11 o'clock closing brought about a wonderful improvement in the condition of the streets at night.

10510-22. Mr. Graham, from the Sydney Morning Herald Office, states that the majority of the men employed there are in favour of the public-houses being allowed to remain open until 11.30 p.m.

10658-60. Mr. Dunshea, from the Sydney Morning Herald Office, considers that public-houses should be allowed to keep open until 11.30 p.m., and that a special permit should be granted to particular public-houses in the vicinity of printing-offices and other places where work is carried on all night.

10626-28. Mr. Davidson, from Messrs. Flood & Co's Stores, considers 11 o'clock quite late enough for the public-houses to be open, except on Saturdays, when they should be kept open till 12 midnight.

11127. Mr. Davis, a corporation workman, has noticed a great alteration in the conduct of persons in the streets owing to the 11 o'clock closing, and considers it has been most beneficial.

11990. Rev. W. Bradley, Chaplain of the Bethel Union, thinks that 11 o'clock closing has been very beneficial.

12662. Mr. J. S. Shearston, Sailor's Missionary, states that the closing of public-houses at 11 o'clock has been most beneficial to the men-of-war's-men; that they now go on board to sleep instead of sleeping on shore; and that it is a noticeable fact that fewer men go on board drunk now than formerly.

82780-7. Mr. Simpson, a member of the Sydney Progressive Carpenters' and Joiners' Society, believes that the majority of the members are satisfied with the 11 o'clock closing of public-houses.

[LOCAL OPTION.]

167-112, 562-6. Mr. Fosbery, Inspector-General of Police, considers the principle of local option correct, but thinks that the people take very little interest in it.

681-0. Inspector Waters thinks that the local option clauses of the Act have not closed any houses, but have prevented any increase and also stopped removals; that an extension of its principles would not do any good; that no interest is taken in the subject; that it would be better to empower the Bench to regulate the licenses as they thought necessary; says that in one City ward only was a vote given in favour of an increase of licensed houses.

Sub-Inspector

Sub-Inspector Atwill considers that local option has done good in preventing an inordinate increase of houses, and also the removal of licenses from one place to another; that there is a great deal of apathy about it; that he is not in favour of full local option, and has not considered the question of compensation; that one effect of local option has been to enhance the value of public-house property considerably.

Sub-Inspector Cotter thinks that local option ought to be made to apply to all new houses, whatever their size; but he would not apply it to renewals without compensation.

Sir Alfred Stephen is in favour of local option as applied to new licenses and removals, but would not apply it to renewals without compensation; thinks that the people should have the power of determining the number of houses for any given district; also that it would be just for the people, by a large majority, in any district where there are more houses than necessary, to abolish those whose licensees had been proved law breakers, and without compensation.

Mr. Macintosh, M.L.C., L.M., says that the present Local Option Act has had very little effect, owing to the apathy of the people; is in favour of local option being limited to new licenses and removals, not renewals; considers that the franchise should be enlarged and made compulsory; also, that the districts or wards should be enlarged to counties or large districts, as it is not merely those resident in the wards who are interested; and that all men and women over the age of 21 should have a vote.

Mr. Marsh, S.M., thinks there is a great deal of apathy displayed in voting; that the franchise ought to be extended at least to Parliamentary electors; in fact would extend the vote to all residents.

Mr. Buchanan, S.M., thinks the local option provisions have had a beneficial effect; but would not be in favour of their extension to renewals without compensation.

Mr. Johnson, S.M., is of opinion that the vote is often misapplied by being given to increase the value of existing houses instead of a bonâ fide wish to lessen the liquor traffic; and is not in favour of its application to renewals without compensation.

Mr. Addison, S.M., thinks the present system works well but would extend the franchise to the Parliamentary roll; would not extend the vote to renewals without compensation; is in favour of extending the franchise to women, and would give publicans a number of years notice (in lieu of compensation) before applying local option to renewals.

Mr. Fisher, D.S.M., approves of the principles of local option as applied to new licenses and removals but not to renewals without compensation; but thinks there is very little general interest taken in the subject.

Mr. Abbott, S.M., approves of the principle of local option; thinks that the franchise should extend to the electoral lists and also to women; but would not apply the principle to renewals, with or without compensation, or to large houses.

Mr. Yates, D.S.M., is not opposed to local option; would extend the franchise to women and residents of districts; also to renewals with compensation, and thinks that a number of years notice would go a great way towards compensation.

Mr. Maclean, Comptroller-General of Prisons, is not in favour of local option; would fix a high standard for houses in special districts, and only allow such houses.

Dr. Manning, Inspector-General of Insane, is in favour of local option as it now stands, but would be in favour of extending the franchise.

Mr. W. Noble, Temperance Lecturer, states that, as a citizen, he is in favor of local option; and that, as a teetotaler, of prohibition; thinks that a direct vote of the people in each locality should be taken every year, but would prefer every three years; that it is necessary to educate the people up to local option and prohibition before the law is enforced; that in Maine a temperance revival had been going on for years previous to the passing of the Maine Laws.

Bishop Barry approves of the principle of local option, and believes that it can be made to work efficiently; that the franchise might be extended to the Parliamentary electors, but would not extend it to women until they were electors; if applied to renewals compensation should be granted; that both owner and occupier of a public-house should be entitled to compensation; that a certain number of years' notice before putting the Act into force would mitigate the hardship to the licensee but not to the owner; that the compensation fund might be supplied partly from the local rates and partly from the Consolidated Revenue.

Rev. F. B. Boyce states that the objects of the Local Option League are to obtain an Act of Parliament by which the people will be empowered to vote in every locality for the prohibition of the liquor traffic; thinks that the vote should be taken on the Parliamentary roll, and says that many members of the League are in favour of its extension to women; that the majority of the members of the League are opposed to compensation; that the Local Option League would accept the three questions on the ballot-paper as in the Queensland Act; that the local option vote should apply to all licensed houses.

Rev. J. D. Langley is a prohibitionist, but considers that this Colony is not yet ripe for prohibition, and that it must be educated up to it; that local option is the next best system; is not in favour of compensation, but thinks it would be fair to give a monopoly for three years or more, granting no new licenses during that period, when a vote should be taken as to how many and which public-houses should be shut up.

Mr. G. D. Clark, editor of the New South Wales Good Templar, is also a prohibitionist, but accepts local option as an instalment; considers that a vote, if successful, should be in force for three years; but if it failed the people of the locality should have the right to demand another vote within the three years; that the vote should only be taken on the petition of one-sixth of the people in the locality; that the vote should be taken on the Parliamentary Electoral Roll, and that women also should be allowed to vote; that at the end of a period of three years' local option a fresh vote might be allowed on the petition of a majority of voters; that there are no good reasons in favour of compensation.

Rev. R. Sellors states that the Australasian Methodist Church has expressed its approval of local option as at present in force here; is personally in favour of having the power to veto the traffic, that is, that it should apply to renewals; would prefer to give compensation rather than not have the power to veto the traffic; that three or four years' notice to quit would be an equivalent to compensation; that the franchise should be extended to the Parliamentary electors' and to women.

Rev. J. Jefferis, LL.D., is in favour of local option, and considers that a three years' monopoly would be a fair compensation; that a Permissive Local Option Bill would be a very wise piece of legislation, and that there is a very large and increasing section of the population in favour of local option.

6742, 6707.

Mr. Thompson, late President of the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association is in favour of local option with the extension of the franchise; would give compensation where the houses were closed.

Mr. North is in favour of local option, so that the people might say whether they would have any public-houses at all, or only a certain number; thinks that the franchise should be extended to the resident adults, and also to women; and that compensation should be given unless there should be at least five years' notice, and a monopoly during that time.

Mr. Watson, of the "Paragon Hotel," is in favour of local option, either full or limited, by a fair majority of the householders in a ward, but with compensation.

8342-8.

Sir John Robertson is strongly in favour of the principle of local option, but thinks the people take no interest in it, and will not vote; that nothing would be gained by enlarging the franchise to the Parliamentary electors; would be in favour of at least a two-thirds majority of the people of each district.

12055.

Mr. Vale, Secretary to the Victorian Alliance for the Suppression of the Drink Traffic (speaking for Victoria) says that the fact that one-third of the electors on the roll in any district in that Colony must vote to constitute a poll destroys vote by ballot; that the fact of the publicans and the friends of the liquor traffic abstaining from voting makes the law virtually a dead letter.

Mr. Knapp states that the Local Option League advocates the extension of the local option vote to renewals; considers that the franchise should be extended to the Parliamentary electors; that the right of the people should extend to local prohibition, and that local option should be by direct personal voting; that at present the League only aims at abolishing public-houses; that with reference to the extension of the franchise in Sydney the number of ratepayers in 1885 was nearly 8,000; that the adult population for the same period was about 40,000; and that therefore if the 8,000 voted for local option they would override the majority of 32,000 adults; also, that numbers of people are disfranchised by their landlords refusing to allow them to pay the rates, the landlords, in many cases, having an interest in the liquor traffic of the district.

The majority of representatives of the artisan classes examined were in favour of local option in some form, but apparently because it was a democratic principle rather than from any consideration of its general bearings or its probable operation.

Mr.

Mr. T. K. Abbott, S.M., thinks that there are 50 per cent. too many public-houses in Sydney. 3220.

Mr. Yates, D.S.M., considers that there are too many public-houses. 3399.

Mr. Fowler, Superintendent of Darlinghurst Reception House, is of opinion that there are far too many public-houses in Sydney. 3393.

Dr. Manning, Inspector-General of Insane, thinks there can be no doubt as to there being far too many public-houses. 4096-7.

Dr. MacLaurin, Medical Adviser to the Government, considers that the public-houses in Sydney are too numerous. 4583.

Dr. Mackellar, M.L.C., late Medical Adviser to the Government, considers that there are too many public-houses in Sydney. 4773.

Mr. G. D. Clark is of opinion that there are, undoubtedly, too many houses in the city and suburbs. 5758.

Rev. J. Jefferis, LL.D., thinks there are too many public-houses in Sydney. 6101.

Mr. Toohey, M.P., referring to the number of public-houses in the metropolitan licensing district, considers that 830 are not too many for the wants of the population, but thinks that in some places they are too much concentrated; that they are in excess within the city boundary, and should be more evenly distributed over the city and suburbs. 6340-8.

Mr. J. B. Olliffe, M.P., of the "Royal Hyde Park Hotel," considers that the number of public-houses is in excess of the present requirements, and sufficient for the next three years; that at least 100 houses might be done away with without injury to anyone, and with advantage to the community. 6403-6, 6301.

Mr. J. C. Weale, Secretary to the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association of New South Wales, thinks there are too many public-houses for the population within the Metropolitan Licensing District; that in some places they are too thickly situated; that at least 100, and perhaps 150, might be dispensed with. 6549-51, 6670.

Mr. T. F. Thompson, late President of the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association, thinks there are too many public-houses; that from 100 to 150 of the lower class houses might well be dispensed with. 6789-91, 6768-71.

Mr. T. J. Hilder, traveller for Messrs. Tooth & Co., thinks that there are not too many houses; that they are fairly distributed throughout the wards; that fewer houses in one place would answer the same purpose; but that the fact that they are all paying shows there are not too many there. 7152-6.

Mr. J. B. North is of opinion that in some places in the country there are too many public-houses; for instance, at Katoomba, where the population is only 500, there are three public-houses, and there is another to be opened. 7301, 7339.

Mr. W. Selff, a licensed victualler, thinks that there are too many public-houses, especially in the locality where his house is situated. 7445.

Mr. C. W. Roberts, of the "Crown and Anchor Hotel," considers that there are too many public-houses, especially in the suburbs, where they are found at almost every corner. 8230.

Sir John Robertson considers that reducing the number of public-houses with the view of lessening drinking is ridiculous as more people would assemble in the houses left, and consequently there would be more drinking; but that if they were reduced with the idea of raising the standard of the houses and the quality of the liquor sold, that would be a good reason for so doing. The

Mr. Charlesworth, from Messrs. Hudson Bros.' Works, thinks there are too many public-houses in Sydney.

Mr. Talbot, from Messrs. M'Murtrie, Kellerman, & Co.'s boot factory, thinks there are too many public-houses here.

10390-8.

Mr. C. E. Smith, from the same factory, thinks there are too many public-houses in Sydney generally, although there is only one at Summer Hill where he lives, and which is quite enough.

Mr. Davidson, from Messrs. Flood & Co.'s stores, thinks there are too many inferior public-houses in Lower George-street and Miller's Point; that they should be reduced by a system of distance, one from another, not as they are at present, almost next door to one another.

Mr. Collins, a journeyman tailor, considers there are too many public-houses in Sydney generally; that they might be reduced by one-third. 11363, 11375-6.

Mr. Beaney, from Messrs. Mitchell & Co.'s stores, thinks that there are far too many public-houses in Lower George-street, near the Circular Quay and that the number might be reduced to two or three in that locality; and that by reducing the number of public-houses those remaining might be better conducted and lead to less intemperance. 11594-606

Mr. Russell, a cabman, thinks that public-houses are too numerous in Sydney. 11726.

Mr. Davis, secretary of the Federated Seamen's Union, considers there are far too many public-houses in the neighbourhood of the wharves; that fifteen can be counted in one locality. 11826-7.

Mr. W. More, a stonemason, and a member of the Trades' Union, thinks there are too many public-houses in the locality in which he lives, but that he does not think that intemperance would necessarily be lessened by their reduction. 13175-9

Mr. J. Ware, a member of the same society, considers there are too many public-houses in Sydney, and that the number should be reduced. 13200-2.

Colonel Ballingall, a Member of the Legislature of Iowa, thinks there are a very great number of public-houses in Sydney, but does not think that their reduction would necessarily mean a reduction in intemperance. 13332-4.

Mr. Knapp, Secretary to Local Option League, thinks that by reducing the number of public-houses to some statutory number, the incentives to intemperance would be lessened, and states that he has been told by men that they have had sufficient resolution to pass two or three houses, but when they have to pass twenty or so they find the temptation too strong. 13396-8.

Mr. C. B. Hayes, lately from Canada, states he has seen a very large number of public-houses in Sydney, a very much larger number than there would be in a town of similar size and population in Canada; that chemists are permitted to sell spirits on a doctor's prescription in Canada, but this practice is seldom abused. 13567-8, 13636.

[PRIVATE BARS, UP-STAIRS BARS, OR CAFE BARS.]

Mr. Fosbery, Inspector-General of Police, states that these bars are sublet to attractive females, who have the reputation of being women of loose character. 80-3

Inspector Anderson believes that these bars do more harm than Sunday-selling; has seen men and women behaving disgracefully in places connected with them, and that the women in them are not always of the best character; that they are sublet; that the respectable hotelkeepers object to them; that they ought not to be permitted; would not object to them if there were no barmaids; considers that one refusal of a renewal on this account would do more good than 100 heavy fines. 418-27, 455-6.

Inspector Mackay says that there have been one or two in his division; that they are principally frequented by young men about 18 or 20 years of age; is of opinion that they are sublet, but cannot prove it; there are three women generally in these bars, where 6d. is charged for all drinks; and he is strongly opposed to them. 896-90.

Sub-Inspector Atwill can trace a great deal of drunkenness to these bars; they are sublet, but the women who conduct them are in some bars paid £1 a week so as to appear to be servants; that in a certain case the lessee of the bar stated he did not care whether the bar was kept respectable or not as long as he got his rent; this woman and man were both fined; says that some houses have three or more of these bars; that he does not object to two bars on the ground-floor, or elsewhere, as long as gay women are not allowed to keep them; some houses have five up-stairs bars.

Sub-Inspector Lenthall says that there are about thirty-five* of these bars in the city, principally kept by women; that these women have a fast appearance, but are not known as prostitutes to the police; they are supposed to rent the bars from the landlords; these women pay so much a week, and the landlord takes a receipt for wages to make it appear that they are servants; is not aware of their being used as assignation rooms; has never seen other women than the barmaids there; that the price of liquor in these bars is 6d., and is of opinion that these bars when kept by women are decidedly objectionable; thinks they ought to be abolished; that private bars are altogether distinct from the up-stairs bars before-mentioned; that men of all ages frequent them.

Inspector Camphin considers these bars to be most undesirable places, and that the people conducting them are not of the best character; thinks they ought to be abolished, especially those conducted by women; says that the girls conducting them have a gay appearance, but he has never seen women of loose character in them; the bars would be harmless but for the employment in them of women, and that the inducement to frequent them would be gone were they conducted by men.

Mr. Macintosh, M.L.C., L.M., says that numbers of these bars exist, and that they are the main cause of young men going wrong to the extent they do; that they are a great evil, although some may be a convenience.

2539, 2553-6

Mr. Marsh, S.M., knows nothing of such bars; sees no objection to all bars being on the ground-floor; thinks also that landlords ought to apply for permission to establish a second bar; as far as he knows the Inspectors have never brought the existence of these bars before the Bench.

Mr. Buchanan, S.M., has been told up-stairs bars are sublet to women of doubtful character, which he thinks is most undesirable; is entirely opposed to such a system; no up-stairs bars ought to be allowed under any circumstances whatever; thinks that there should be a separate license for every bar, and that every facility should be given to the police to visit and inspect them.

2819-20

Mr. Johnson, S.M., is aware of the existence of up-stairs bars, and is decidedly opposed to the practice of employing women to serve behind bars.

2894-5, 2905-6

Mr. Addison, S.M., does not think there are any hotels in the city with more than three bars; would not allow any up-stairs bars, as they take away the chance of police inspection; all bars should be on the ground-floor, and an extra fee of £10 charged for each extra bar; the fact of subletting would be a good ground for refusal of renewal if proved.

3034-6

Mr. Fisher, D.S.M., thinks that these bars are a mistake as a rule, but that they might be one of the privileges of first-class and well-conducted hotels, and that there should be a fee for each extra bar.

3255

Mr. Abbott, S.M., thinks that it would be better to allow no up-stairs bars owing to the difficulty of inspection; ground-floor bars are readily open to inspection.

3365-7

Mr. Yates, D.S.M., objects to more than one bar, and thinks that that one should be on the ground-floor; the multiplication of bars leads to drinking, and gives greater facilities for drinking; thinks the law should be amended so as to prevent the multiplication of bars.

3742

Canon Rich objects to private and up-stairs bars.

4861

Bishop Barry would certainly be in favour of abolishing up-stairs bars presided over by women.

5283-5

Rev. F. B. Boyce considers these places very bad, and that only one bar should be allowed to each house, and that as public as possible.

Rev.

* This was in 1886; the number has now largely increased.

Rev. J. D. Langley is in favour of abolishing these bars, and of having bars <sup>5646-8</sup> only on the ground-floor; believes private bars to be a very mischievous element; the young learn to drink in them, and afterwards visit the public bars.

Mr. Clark would only allow one bar to each house, and that on the ground- <sup>5754-5</sup> floor, and as close as possible to the street door.

Rev. R. Sellors considers one bar sufficient; objects to up-stairs bars presided <sup>5851-6</sup> over by women; and believes that every bar should be open to the view of the public.

Mr. Toohey, M.P., thinks that the manner in which these bars are conducted <sup>6209-12</sup> ought to receive the serious attention of the Commission; admits that some bars may be a great convenience to people who want a first-class glass of liquor, but that if it is proved that they are badly conducted then only down-stairs bars should be allowed; knows nothing of the subletting, and has been unable to get any information on that point; does not think that having them on the ground-floor would be a radical <sup>6237</sup> cure of the system now carried on; considers that strict supervision by the police is all that is necessary; that if up-stairs bars are done away with the bars will only be removed down-stairs; and if private bars are done away with the privilege of getting good liquor will also be done away with.

Mr. Weale, Secretary to the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association, <sup>6633-8, 6640</sup> says that the removal of all up-stairs bars was one of the first matters considered by his Association; that his Association objects to the subletting of bars, whether up or down stairs; that it is necessary to have a 6d. and a 3d. bar, in order to simplify the trade, and to keep separate two classes of people.

Mr. Ouliffe, M.P., of the "Royal Hyde Park Hotel," believes some of these <sup>6826-41</sup> bars are sublet to females, and that some are conducted in a disgraceful manner; would not be in favour of these bars unless they are under the strict supervision of the police; considers the majority of them at present are carried on for purposes contrary to the Act; that some are a convenience to the people.

Mr. Hunt, of the "Oxford Hotel," thinks that it is necessary for large hotels <sup>7532-3</sup> to have two bars, but not up-stairs bars, which he does not consider necessary, and which are in many cases very badly conducted, being sublet to women, who are not always of the highest character.

Mr. Watson of the "Paragon Hotel," states that it is necessary to have two bars; <sup>7714-18, 7723</sup> that he does not approve of up-stairs bars; that no extra fee should be charged for extra down-stairs bars; that he would not abolish up-stairs bars altogether, but only those that were sublet to women and badly conducted.

Mr. Smith, of the "Burrangong Hotel," does not consider it necessary to have <sup>7818-9</sup> more than one bar, whether up or down-stairs.

Mr. Roberts, of the "Crown and Anchor Hotel," is in favour of two bars on <sup>8260-1</sup> the basement floor; that he will not express his opinion about up-stairs bars, except that they should be under the management of the licensee, and that they are a convenience to some people.

Mr. F. E. Watson, from the Government Printing Office, has been in these <sup>9595-9</sup> bars; does not consider them decent places for the resort of young men; that they are sublet to women; are not a necessity, and ought to be abolished.

Mr. Dunshea, from the Sydney Morning Herald Office, thinks that all up-stairs <sup>10580, 10589</sup> bars should be abolished; has been in them, and seen and heard sufficient to make him believe that but for these places some of the houses would have to close.

Mr. Russell, a cabman, has never proved that anything wrong occurs in <sup>11760-62</sup> these bars; that no women except the barmaids are allowed in them; that there are forty or fifty of them in the city; that the bars are sublet; that the women do not live in the house.

Mr. Law, a cabman, says that his opinion of these bars is a very bad one, <sup>11768, 11806</sup> although he generally goes there for a good glass of liquor; he knows that some of them are sublet; they are all called private bars.

Mr. Richardson has no personal knowledge of these bars, but believes numbers <sup>12346, 12354</sup> of respectable citizens have been shocked by being decoyed into private bars presided over by women; that he was informed that there were women there with whom arrangements might have been made; that the dresses were unbecoming; and that some of the girls sat on the men's knees, and threw their arms round their necks.

Mr. Knapp, Secretary to the Local Option League, took an office next to the <sup>113409, 13478, 3480.</sup> "City Bank Hotel," which he found to be anything but respectable; young men and girls could be seen at all hours of the day going into dormitories together; the head head bar-woman was a known prostitute—in fact the place was nothing better than an assignation house; says that these bars have a disastrous effect on young men; that there should only be one bar allowed, and that one open to the public view; that a bar is worse than a parlour.

Mr. Fosbery, Inspector-General of Police, has been officially informed of the establishment of clubs with a subscription of 10s. per annum, for the purpose of evading the Act and enabling the members and their friends to obtain drink at any time; that there have been no reports by the police against these clubs; that they are not the outcome of the present Act, but might have existed under any Act; thinks however that there are not more than half a dozen in Sydney; but that they are likely to increase.

Inspector Waters has never heard any complaints about these clubs, nor has he any knowledge of any workingmen's clubs being established in his division, for the mere purpose of obtaining drink at any time.

957-8.

Inspector Mackay has no knowledge of any "drinking clubs" in his division.

1430-41.

Sub-Inspector Colter states that there is a club in his district, the subscription to which is 10s. 6d., and that drinking is carried on there on Sundays by the members and their friends; does not think clubs ought to be allowed to compete with public-houses, or that any exceptions should be made in favour of clubs.

1557.

Sub-Inspector Larkins knows of no "drinking clubs" in his division.

1749.

2145-7.

Mr. Macintosh, M.L.C., L.M., considers that these "drinking clubs" do a very great deal of harm to the young men of the Colony; that a higher license fee than that for a public-house should be imposed on them; that these clubs are more frequented on Sundays than on week days.

2718-21.

Mr. Buchanan, S.M., has heard of these "drinking clubs" being established, and thinks that they should be treated as ordinary sly-grog-shops.

2835.

Mr. Johnson, S.M., is not aware of any "drinking clubs" having been established.

2957, 3000-2.

Mr. Addison, S.M., has no knowledge of any of these "drinking clubs" being established.

3123-9.

Mr. Fisher, D.S.M., has heard of "drinking clubs" being started for the purpose of obtaining drink on Sundays, and thinks that if the public-houses were opened for a short time on Sundays these clubs would at once close.

3215-7.

Mr. Abbott, S.M., believes the Licensing Act has been the cause of the introduction of a number of "drinking clubs," but knows nothing about them officially.

3490.

Mr. Yates, D.S.M., has heard of these "drinking clubs" being started, and considers all clubs should be licensed.

5614.

Rev. J. D. Langley has no knowledge of any "drinking club" being started in his parish for the purpose of evading the Sunday closing clauses of the present Act.

Mr. Weale, Secretary to the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association, has heard of the establishment of these "drinking clubs," and also states that he brought the fact of their existence under the notice of the police, who, however, cannot interfere.

6704-6.

Mr. Thompson, wine and spirit merchant, and late President of the Amalgamated Licensed Victuallers' Association, knows that a number of these "drinking clubs" have been started in the city and suburbs for the purpose of evading the early and Sunday closing clauses of the Licensing Act.

6830-4

Mr. Olliffe, M.P., of the "Royal Hyde Park Hotel," is aware that there are a number of these "drinking clubs" in the city and suburbs; that they increase the facilities for drinking, and are the result of Sunday prohibition.

7315-6.

Mr. North has no knowledge of these "drinking clubs," and would be totally opposed to them.

7459.

Mr. Self, of the "Star Hotel," has no knowledge of the existence of any "drinking clubs" in his district.

7563-6

Mr. Hunt, of the "Oxford Hotel," knows of the existence of two "drinking clubs"; that one of them adjoins an hotel with which the members have access; thinks that these clubs should be licensed.

Mr.

Mr. Watson, of the "Paragon Hotel," has heard of several of these <sup>7720-31.</sup> "drinking clubs"; that they have sprung up since the passing of the present Act, and for the purpose of evading it; that the cost of membership is merely nominal, and that they are always open.

Mr. F. Smith, of the "Burrangong Hotel," is aware of the existence of some <sup>7964.</sup> of these "drinking clubs," and thinks them perfectly legitimate.

Mr. Roberts, of the "Crown and Anchor Hotel," has heard of the establish- <sup>8257-8.</sup> ment of these "drinking clubs"; considers that they ought to be licensed; and that it is an injustice to the publicans that they should not be.

Mr. Ford, from Messrs. Dalgetty & Co.'s wharf, states that a club called the <sup>11220-2.</sup> "Buffaloes" used to be held in the "Lord Nelson Hotel"; that some of his men lately joined it and told him about the spree they had there on Sunday nights.

Mr. J. Vale, Secretary to the Victorian Alliance for the Suppression of the <sup>12111-4.</sup> Liquor Traffic, states that in the Victorian Act there is a clause defining a club, and that they shall consist of not less than fifty members, no one of whom shall have more interest in the club than another; that they would also have to get a certificate from the Licensing Court, which would not be granted if it were known or suspected that the club was being started for the purpose of obtaining drink only; that there are only two or three working men's clubs in Victoria.

[BREWERS' OR TIED HOUSES.]

The custom of brewers and wine and spirit merchants holding an interest in public-houses is the result of keen competition, and thereby the necessity of their having an interest in the trade in order to maintain and if possible increase their own trade. The system is as follows: A man has £300 to £400, and is anxious to get into a house; he goes to a broker who tells him of a house, the cost of which is £800 to £1,000 and that if he will put down his £400, a certain brewer or wine and spirit merchant, as the case may be, will advance the rest on security of a bill of sale over the premises and any other security that is thought necessary, with a condition that all liquors are to be purchased from the said brewer or spirit merchant, and a transfer signed in blank (which is stated to be of no real value).

Sub-Inspector Atwill states, with reference to this system, that there are a <sup>1039, 1100.</sup> number of houses held in this manner in his division; that he has been told by publicans that they have been forced to sell on Sundays in order to meet their liabilities, and that often, the price paid being far in excess of the value of the business, they have been forced to realize and leave the business, by the people in whose hands they were; that they have to sell whatever is sent to them often to the detriment of their business.

Sub-Inspector Potter states this system prevails all over the city; that the <sup>1044, 1047.</sup> licensees leave the hotels poorer than when they started; and that in one case he knew a licensee to be encumbered with half the debt of his predecessor.

Mr. Macintosh, M.L.C., L.M., considers that a larger number of houses than <sup>2301, 2302, 2328.</sup> formerly are held in this way; also that in some cases the brewer leases a house and puts a man in, taking a bill of sale over the whole of the property, as security, and a condition that he (the brewer) supplies the house; that this is also done by persons who are not brewers; that the result of this system is that men of no means get into houses and that they have to break the law in order to meet the enormous expenses they have to pay, besides having to fill their houses with boarders.

Mr. Addison, S.M., believes that a great many houses are held under this <sup>2028, 2030, 2531.</sup> system; that they are being perpetually transferred to men who appear to be the servants of brewers; that they are generally second class houses, and used principally as a means of increasing the brewer's trade

Mr. Toohy, M.P., states that any publican can at once return any beer which <sup>6170, 6180, 6224, 6374.</sup> he does not consider good, and that, by the conditions under which his firm and others sell, they are obliged to take it back; that the system of advancing money commenced about ten years ago; that it exists in England, and he thinks in all British communities, and is as follows:—The brewer advances money to assist the publican to take an hotel conditionally, on his giving the whole of the trade of the hotel to that brewer, and paying a fair rate of interest for the money, in fact always bank interest. The publican wants to take a house worth £800; he has £400, and the brewer advances him the remainder; that it is beneficial to the publican, because where a man has a large sum of money invested he is desirous that his business should should progress; the brewer, on the other hand, desires to get his money back and see a good trade done; and is, therefore, not likely to supply inferior articles, particularly as it is in the power of the publican to transfer his obligation from one brewer to another; that it is an advantage to the public and is a system that ought to be encouraged; that it is impossible for the brewer to force the publican to transfer against his will on the blank transfer held, as the publican can always go to the Court and say he wishes to withdraw the transfer.

Mr. Hilder, traveller for Messrs. Tooth & Co., does not think half the houses in the City are "Tied houses," and says that it is usual for the publican to pay two-thirds, and the brewer to advance the other third, taking as security a bill of sale on the lease, furniture, and stock, &c., or a mortgage on any freehold property which the publican may own; that there is a condition in the bill of sale that the publican must deal with the brewer; a blank transfer is also given, which is only of use in the case of a publican absconding; that it is necessary for both applicants for a transfer to appear before the Bench, and that a publican can at any time refuse to complete it; that very few freehold of public-houses are held by brewers.

Mr. Smith, of the "Burrangong Hotel," considers that the fact of a house being "tied," is against good honest trade; that the publican may be forced to give up his business, making the best terms he can, and another man takes his place, and the same thing occurs again.

8033

Mr. Rainford, of the "Cambridge Club Hotel," states that if bad beer is sent out from a brewery it can always be returned, whether from a free or "tied" house.

8097

Mr. Palmer thinks that "tied" houses deteriorate the status of a man's house; that it places the publican in the position of a servant to the brewer.

Mr. M. Joseph, hotel broker, does not consider a house "tied," except where the brewer holds the freehold and leases it, or is the leaseholder with power to sub-let; states that the publican is not under the control of the brewer when money has been advanced on his house, &c., as the publican can transfer his liability from one brewer to another at any time; that the blank transfer is in reality worthless, as the publican can refuse to transfer at any time; that the only way a brewer can go to extremes is by enforcing his bill of sale and putting a bailiff in; that the whole of the securities of a brewer are not of much good, as the security over the lease is of no value to the brewer, and the blank transfer can be revoked at will by the publican; the only case in which a blank transfer is of value is when the publican absconds, and even then the Bench are not bound to accept it; that his view of a "tied house" is where the brewer holds the freehold and sub-leases it for a term to a publican, tying him down to deal with him, which if he fails to do he can be ejected; that he has only known of one case where a bond was taken to insure the publican dealing with the brewer.

Mr. Vale says that in Victoria the system of tied houses works thus: "A man comes from the country with a little money (say £300) and he has an impression that keeping a public-house is a nice easy way of getting a living. He goes to a brewer or spirit merchant. The brewer puts him into a house, takes the money he has, and advances the rest. In (say) six, nine, or twelve months, usually in a very short time, the man who has invested his £300 is glad to get out, minus the money which he put into the concern. Therefore he is interested in deceiving the incoming tenant as to the nature of the business, and so another victim is secured. The majority of these brewers' houses do not pay, they are only kept going by the ruining of the successive tenants"; that the brewer cannot appear as having an interest in the lease; he can only advance the money on the understanding that the licensee deals with him; that this system keeps up the price of good-wills artificially.

Mr. Fosbery, the Inspector General of Police, considers that Colonial wine licenses have their advantages; that no doubt some of these wine-shops are used for selling bad spirits; that the wine sold is too new, and is seldom if ever asked for in country public-houses; but that the consumption has increased in the city among the better classes.

431-2, 508-11.

Inspector Anderson considers that the Colonial wine-shops in his division are fairly well conducted; that some are very beneficial to the public; that no complaints have been made as to the quality of the wine sold.

Inspector

Inspector Mackay states that there are 15 Colonial wine-shops in his division, 830-40. but only two of them sell wine by the glass.

Sub-Inspector Atwill states that, with the exception of two or three, all the 1072-8. Colonial wine-shops in his division have proved a great evil.

Sub-Inspector Colter states that there are five Colonial wine-shops in his 1250-64. division; that they are generally well conducted, and carried on in conjunction with a grocer's shop.

Sub-Inspector Larkins states that there are five or six Colonial wine-shops in 1473-4. his division; that they are well conducted, but do very little business; that some grocers hold Colonial wine licenses.

Sub-Inspector Lenthall considers that the wine sold in Colonial wine-shops 1385-8. is good, pure, Colonial wine; states that a few convictions have been obtained against wine shop-keepers for selling spirits.

Mr. Macintosh, M.L.C., L.M., states that he has seen more demoralization 2311-6. about the wine-shops in the country than about public-houses; that the very worst description of spirits is sold in them; that those in Sydney are generally conducted by foreigners; and that they are not, in his experience, a well-conducted class.

Mr. Marsh, S.M., thinks that in the country all sorts of liquors are sold 2486-8. under the cover of these licenses; but that he has no knowledge of its being so in Sydney, although he has a strong suspicion that it is so.

Mr. Johnson, S.M., thinks Colonial wine licenses a great curse that these 2785-8. wine-shops degenerate into places where very bad spirits are sold, and are simply a cover for sly-grog selling; that these licenses are applied for by small shopkeepers and greengrocers, and it is most undesirable that they should be licensed.

Mr. Fisher, D.S.M., states that he has heard no complaints about these 3185-6. licenses.

Mr. Abbott, S.M., considers that most of the Colonial wine-shops in the 3251. Colony are also sly-grog shops.

Mr. Yates, D.S.M., thinks Colonial wine licenses ought to be abolished; that, 3360-70. apart from other accommodation, it is a bad system and leads to illicit trading in spirits of the worst description.

Rev. R. Sellors thinks that Colonial wine licenses have proved a great curse; 6050-8. that the wine sold has a large quantity of spirit added to it.

Mr. Watson, of the "Paragon Hotel," considers that Colonial wine-shops 7740-3. are not required, and that all descriptions of liquors are sold in them and not those of the best quality.

Mr. Smith, of the "Burrangong Hotel," considers that Colonial wine-shops 7963. are generally badly conducted.

Mr. B. Palmer thinks that drunkenness might be lessened by the encourage- 8121-2. ment of the sale of Colonial wines, but has no knowledge as to the manner in which Colonial wine-shops are conducted.

Mr. F. E. Watson, from the Government Printing Office, does not think 9503-4. spirits are sold under cover of Colonial wine licenses, but that the wine is strongly fortified with spirit.

Mr. Vale, Secretary to the Victorian Alliance for the Suppression of the 12037-8, 12172. Liquor Traffic, thinks that wine licenses ought to be abolished; that frequently they are simply a cover for sly-grog-selling.

Mr. Shearston, Seamen's Missionary, considers that Colonial wine-shops do a 12691-4. very great deal of harm by supplying children with wine, there being no limit of age with regard to them; that the Colonial wine-shops are the nurseries for the public-houses.

[BARMAIDS.]

Sub-Inspector Potter considers a public-house bar the last place a woman 1725-6. should be employed in; that a clause prohibiting their employment would be beneficial.

Sub-Inspector Lenthall does not think the calling itself would lower any 1807-71, 2019-18. respectable young woman in the estimation of her friends, but would not like to see his own daughter in a bar.

- 2103-5, 2173. Inspector Camphin is decidedly against their employment; thinks that their presence induces young men to visit the bars, which leads them into drinking habits.
2453. Mr. Macintosh, M.L.C., L.M., is not against barmaids being employed; thinks respectable girls would act as a check on the coarse behaviour of young men.
- 2503-71. Mr. Marsh, S.M., thinks it would be interfering with the liberty of the subject to prohibit their being so if they choose; that it is a dangerous calling; that only married and matured women should be allowed, certainly not young ones.
- 2725-6. Mr. Buchanan, S.M., does not approve of barmaids but does not think it would be prudent to interfere with their employment.
- 2902-3. Mr. Addison, S.M., does not approve of the employment of barmaids; thinks they act as decoys to young men.
- 3141-3. Mr. Fisher, D.S.M., considers there is a good deal of evil attached to the custom; would allow them to be employed in first-class hotels but not in low-class ones.
- 3231-3. Mr. Abbott, S.M., considers it a dangerous calling; that it would no doubt be an advantage to the community to prohibit their employment.
3415. Mr. Yates, D.S.M., is opposed to their employment, and considers it adds to the attractions of the place.
- 3633-9. Mr. Read, Governor of Darlinghurst Gaol, has known cases of barmaids being in gaol, suffering from delirium tremens; thinks that the occupation tends to demoralize them.
- 3740-1. Canon Rich considers that it is very undesirable occupation for women to be engaged in; that it tends to their demoralization; that they also act as decoys and induce young men to drink who otherwise might not do so.
- 4003-5. Mr. Powell, Collector of Customs, is decidedly against the employment of barmaids but does not consider it a subject for legislation.
4506. Mr. Noble, temperance lecturer, would not permit the employment of barmaids.
- 4837, 4900. Bishop Barry would not permit the employment of barmaids, and considers it is a most undesirable position for a young woman to be placed in.
- 5279-80. Rev. F. B. Boyce, on behalf of the Local Option League, objects to the employment of barmaids, and states that the Local Option League was the means of bringing in a Bill for their abolition two and a-half years ago, which was defeated by one vote in the Upper House.
- 5523-8, 5542. Mr. Booth, Temperance Lecturer, is in favour of prohibiting women from being employed as barmaids, and states that none are employed in the States of America. Thinks this employment more degrading than the employment of women and men together in factories.
- 5629, 5614-6, 5602-3. Rev. J. D. Langley considers that the employment of women in bars is more demoralising than the mixed employment in factories; would not permit the employment of women, even those in the family of the publican; that it is degrading the womanhood of our colony.
- 5576-7. Rev. R. Sellors thinks bars most undesirable places for women to be employed in on account of the language often used by those under the influence of liquor.
- 6063-9. Rev. J. Jeffris, LL.D., thinks it is a most undesirable employment for young women.
- 6873-88. Mr. Olliffe, M.P., of the "Royal Hyde Park Hotel," sees no harm in women being so employed as long as they are respectable and well behaved; thinks factories far worse places than bars.
- 7230-1. Mr. Hilder, traveller for Messrs. Tooth & Co., does not approve of young girls serving behind bars, but thinks if they were altogether done away with some of them might lead worse lives.
- 7374-75. Mr. North is decidedly against the employment of women or girls in bars; thinks bars worse than factories; thinks that no woman, whether wife or daughter of the publican or not, ought to be allowed behind a bar.
- 7491-3. Mr. Self, of the "Star Hotel," thinks barmaids quite able to take care of themselves; allows his daughters to serve.
- 7627-9. Mr. Hunt, of the "Oxford Hotel," sees no objection to the employment of young women as barmaids; treats them as his own daughters.
8272. Mr. Roberts, of the "Crown and Anchor Hotel," sees no objection to their employment.

All the witnesses from the artisan classes, who were asked about barmaids, were against their employment, with the exception of Sharp and Melhuish, whose ideas are here given.

Mr. Sharp sees no reason why a respectable woman should not be employed<sup>10180</sup> in a bar, but would not allow one of his own daughters to be so.

Mr. Melhuish sees no harm in their employment.<sup>11032</sup>

Mr. Vale, Secretary to the Victorian Alliance for the Suppression of the<sup>12176-8</sup> Liquor Traffic,—A great deal of apathy shewn in Victoria on this question.

Mr. Richardson, temperance advocate, has no experience on this subject, but<sup>12344-8</sup> is of opinion that their calling is a dangerous one, not only to themselves but to young men, and states that a return from Melbourne shows that 50 per cent. of the women of ill-fame had been barmaids.

Mr. Shearston, Sailor's Missionary, thinks barmaids ought not to be employed,<sup>12697-8</sup> as hearing the language of half drunken men tends to debase them, and states that they are employed to visit the men-of-war and other steamers and distribute cards; that they wait about the Macquarie-steps for the same purpose when the leave-boats are expected from the men-of-war in port.

Mr. Knapp, Secretary to the Local Option League, states that he petitioned<sup>13463-72</sup> Parliament, in connection with the Women's Christian Temperance Union, for the abolition of barmaids; that some six years ago he went into a bar where there were more barmaids than necessary, and saw small rooms partitioned off, and young men going into these rooms with their arms round the women's waists.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON EXCESSIVE USE OF INTOXICATING DRINK, &c.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE.

MONDAY, 8 MARCH, 1886.

Present:—

A. OLIVER, Esq., M.A., PRESIDENT,  T. COLLS, Esq., J.P.,  J. M. TOOLEY, Esq., M.P.,  F. ABIGAIL, Esq., M.P.,  S. H. HYAM, Esq., J.P., M.P.,	JOHN DAVIES, Esq., C.M.G., J.P., M.P.,  J. B. OLLIFFE, Esq., M.P.,  R. FOWLER, Esq., J.P.,  G. WITHERS, Esq., J.P.,  N. MELVILLE, Esq., M.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Edmund Walcott Fosbery, Inspector-General of Police, called in and examined:—

1. President.] You hold in your hand a copy of the report of the Department of Police for the year ending 1885? Yes.
2. The portions of that report which concern this Commission are the several paragraphs which deal with the question of intemperance, and the figures as to apprehensions which you give for a period of five years. I have not seen the reports for the preceding years, but I suppose that the reports for 1882, 1883, and 1884 deal with the same subject? I probably touched upon the subject in my annual reports, but I could not be certain.
3. And you have given figures showing arrests? I think I have; I could produce them on a subsequent occasion.
4. Taking your figures in this report, the first point which I observe is that they apply to the Metropolitan District? Yes; the reason for that is that I am always anxious to give in my report early in the year, and the statistics for the whole Colony would not be available until very late in the year, in the Registrar-General's returns, and I could get the Sydney figures specially taken out from the various police stations.
5. These figures then are compiled from the returns of the various stations? The various watch-houses.
6. There will be returns I presume before the Registrar-General which will enable you to complete the figures for the whole of the Colony? Undoubtedly; the Registrar-General publishes annually criminal statistics from information obtained from my Department. The figures are complete for all the previous years.
7. I suppose they are not made up in any way with respect to Licensing Districts? No.
8. You could not adjust the figures to the Licensing Districts of the Colony? No.
9. Taking the figures for the year 1881, they would represent in the third column the arrests for drunkenness, or when drunkenness forms a part of the charge for the year preceding the passing of the Licensing Act? Yes.
10. That Act was passed at the end of 1881, but did not come into force before 1882? It was assented to on the 19th December, 1881, and came into force on the 1st January, 1882.
11. I observe that the paragraph of the report immediately following the figures is in these terms:—
“Even taking into account the increase of the population, the number of apprehensions does not exhibit any improvement, notwithstanding the advantage obtained by the decrease in the number of licensed houses and the suppression of many low drinking-shops.” Did you take any percentages from these figures? I did not go into the figures in detail.
12. I have taken the trouble to run out the percentages, and I find that the percentages of these figures in connection with the population of the Metropolitan district, which I obtained from the Registrar-General, represents 6·12 per cent. for 1881, 4·9 for 1882, 5·3 for 1883, 5·21 for 1884, and 5·28 for 1885; so that you see for the last three years the percentage of arrests for drunkenness in proportion to the population has been what may be called very uniform? I have said that the figures exhibit no improvement.
13. I do not say that you are not correct? I am not at all surprised to see these figures; but I think I said that, allowing for the increase in population, which I took in round numbers, no improvement was exhibited.
14. You are correct: they do not exhibit the improvement which most people would suppose would be the result of the Licensing Act? Instead of there being any improvement there is the reverse. The percentage is ·07 against the previous year.
15. But you notice at the same time that there is improvement as against the percentage for 1881: the year when the present Licensing Act was not in force the percentage is larger? I do not think there is anything in this report contradictory of my opinion that the operation of the new Act has been beneficial.
16. I merely show you these figures as sustaining your opinion that there has been no encouragement within the last few years? No encouragement.
17. The figures in the first instance are encouraging in connection with the statistics prior to the new Act coming into operation, but they have since gone backwards? Yes.

E. W.
Fosbery, Esq.
8 Mar., 1886.

H. W.
Fosbery, Esq.
8 Mar., 1886.

18. 4·9, for instance, was a good year; 5·3 was not so good; and so on, up to 5·28? We have been continually going backward since the first year.

19. Though the decline is really small? Yes; but the difference between 1882 and 1885 is '38 per head.

20. Now with regard to the arrests themselves: Am I right in supposing that in this first year, 1881, the police passed by no drunkards whom they found; that they did not send them home, and that they were always charged? I think I had better state the rule of the Department as regards arrests of drunkards in public places. A man is arrested if he is drunk, and is causing thereby an annoyance to citizens; he is arrested if he is drunk and incapable, having apparently property upon him which would fall a prey to thieves; and he is arrested if he is drunk combined with any other statutable offence, such as assault; but if he is in a stage of intoxication when he is well able to take care of himself, when he is no nuisance to the public, or when he is in charge of friends, the police will not interfere with him. I may add to that, that I have conceived it my duty, both in the police regulations and by orders from time to time, to provide that the police are not on every occasion when there is an infringement of the letter of the law to interfere with persons who may be slightly inebriated, or in any other respect guilty of a minor misdemeanour.

21. These instructions I presume are in possession of the whole of the police, and they act upon them? I have no reason to doubt that they obey their instructions.

22. This is a general order? I should prefer to put in presently the regulation dealing with the subject.

23. I presume that in this Colony there is no arrest for mere drunkenness; that is to say, that if it is not in a street or a public place, or is not combined with some other offence, it is not lawful—I will not say it is not—I believe it is a moot point; but as a matter of fact the police do not take action in such a case, do they? A man can be arrested for mere drunkenness; I have explained that.

24. I will take this case: suppose a man is drunk in his own paddock? That would not be a public place.

25. That is what I mean by mere drunkenness. I am assuming that drunkenness in a public place would be drunkenness with an aggravating circumstance. In England the aggravation consists in this: that a man is drunk wherever he is—in a street, a public highway, or any other place of public resort in connection with the definition of a public place; but I am anxious to ascertain if you think the law justifies the police in arresting for drunkenness a person who is seen drunk in his own paddock? If he is not drunk in a public place the police would not be justified in arresting him. I think the statute runs—"any person being found drunk upon any highway, street, road, or public place."

26. And the definition of a public place is afterwards made clear by a special enactment? A place to which any one can go with or without payment.

27. Then these arrests are for statutable drunkenness? That is so; here is the paragraph of the regulations to which I have already referred. It is paragraph 14, and the portion to which I referred runs thus:—"Offences which are of a trivial character, and seem to be committed by a law-abiding citizen in ignorance, should be dealt with discreetly. A caution will in some instances be all that is necessary, and will have the desired effect. For minor offences the extreme course of apprehension and incarceration should be avoided where it is clear that a summons will ensure the offender being duly dealt with by a Magistrate."

28. These figures on the face of them take no note of second or subsequent offences. I presume that some of the persons included in these arrests would be old offenders; but I presume also that it is not possible to dissect these figures so as to show which are and which are not second or subsequent offences? I should say it would be impossible. Unless the offenders were recognized; they might give—as they frequently do—wrong names; they are frequently so drunk that they do not know their names.

29. We frequently see in the papers charges against persons who are designated "an old offender," "an old identity," and so forth. I have been told that some of these persons have been for 30, 50, and 60, and even over 100 times arrested for drunkenness? It is very probable. Of course an incorrigible drunkard would be likely to constantly fall into the hands of the police.

30. And are there no means of ascertaining how many of the persons included in these figures are old offenders? I should say that it would be impossible.

31. Could it not be ascertained from the records of the gaol? They would not show it, because in the majority of cases the offenders pay a fine and do not go to gaol.

32. You think the majority pay fines? Undoubtedly.

33. Have you any means of knowing what the fine generally is? I think the maximum is 20s. or seven days.

34. But have you any idea of the punishment which is generally inflicted upon a drunkard? I do not know it sufficiently to say with authority.

35. Do you know what is generally supposed to be the penalty for drunkenness? I think they let an offender off for the first offence. I do not know whether that is done in Sydney, but it is commonly done in the country; but I could not speak with authority on the subject.

36. Then there are no means of finding out from these figures, or from any figures which we can get, who of this large number are old offenders—incorrigible habitual drunkards—and who are not? I think it would be almost impossible. You would require to get the police to identify them.

37. I have heard of cases in which offenders are returned to the lock-up within forty-eight hours, or perhaps three days of their liberation—sometimes in a less time. I should be glad therefore if there were some means of finding out the probable proportion of these habitual drunkards who so fearfully swell these figures? Perhaps when it becomes the turn of the officers in charge of stations to be examined, they might be able to give you some information.

38. Do you think that the Magistrates would be able to give us any information, seeing that these offenders continually appear before them? They could only give you the general impression which you appear to have yourself.

39. I suppose that, for the same reason, it will be difficult to get these figures dissected into male and female? There would be no difficulty about that; in fact, I have the information myself, and should be very happy on another occasion to give it you.

40. Have you had any special opportunities of noticing the effects of intemperance upon the young? I have had my eyes open, as every police officer ought to have, and I have seen it increasing; when I came here twenty-five years ago the young were among the most temperate people on the face of the earth; they are now taking to habits of intemperance pretty generally among the idle and disorderly classes.

41. By using the word "young," do you mean persons under twenty-one? Between fifteen and twenty.

42. Have you noticed habits of intemperance growing in persons under fifteen, or do you take fifteen as the

- the minimum? I do not think I can go further than that; I have not noticed intemperate persons under fifteen; they may exist, but I have not seen them.
43. Do you think that the arrests for intemperance here are more numerous in the city than in the suburbs: these figures of course take in the whole of the suburbs? They take in the whole of the Metropolitan Police District.
44. Do you think the intemperance in the city is greater or less? How; as regards population?
45. Yes? It would be difficult to answer that question; I think there would be more drunkenness in the city than elsewhere, because people sometimes come to town to get drunk.
46. Do you know the proportion between the public-houses in the city and in the suburbs, roughly speaking? I only know the number of licensed houses for the Metropolitan District.
47. You cannot divide them between the city and suburbs? It could easily be done.
48. I ask this because I have been told that there are more public-houses in the city than in all the suburbs combined: do you think that is a statement of fact? I think it is.
49. The figures representing the decrease of public-houses are, I presume, got from the same source as the other reports? No; I think from the Treasury, or from the District Inspector's records.
50. With regard to the evasions of the Sunday prohibition law, you say in your report:—"The law prohibiting Sunday trading is extensively and systematically evaded, and such precautions are taken as render detection and prosecution by ordinary methods a matter of extreme difficulty. The police officers in charge of the various divisions have supplied me with information—which I believe to be thoroughly reliable—from which I learn that out of the 822 holders of publicans' licenses in the Metropolitan District only 193 observe the law, by closing their houses for the sale of liquor to customers other than lodgers on Sundays." We should be glad if you could tell us what these precautions are—that is, the precautions taken by publicans which render the law inoperative? Many of them employ scouts to give notice when any one supposed to be a police officer is approaching; many more only supply liquor to customers who are well known to them, or to friends who are brought by such customers.
51. As the law stands then, do you think that these precautions are such as to render police action inoperative? As the law now stands, I do; and unless the system is introduced of employing informers wholesale to go to the various public-houses, and induce the licensees to break the law in order to get a case against them; but I am not prepared to go that length.
52. That is to say, you are not prepared to go in for the wholesale manufacture of common informers? No.
53. Nor to use your own staff for the purpose? Certainly not; because, in the first place, the men would be demoralized, and I very much doubt if they would obey orders if directed to do it. When the present Act came into operation the zeal of one or two members of the force outran their discretion, and they went into public-houses in what I can only call a disguise, and ordered liquor, not for the purpose of consuming it themselves, but to see other people drink, so that they might lay informations. That, however, met with my condemnation and with the disapproval of the Minister.
54. You spoke of the police disobeying orders if directed to do anything of that kind: do you mean that they would refuse to carry out your instructions because they might think they were being used for an improper purpose, or because they would sympathize with the law-breakers? No; I believe that they would consider themselves degraded by the duty, and would prefer to give up their employment rather than undertake the office of common informers.
55. But supposing that the law were made as strict as, I think, from recollection, it is in England, they would not then, I presume, refuse to carry out instructions? As far as I know what the law in England is, it throws on the landlord the onus of proving that persons assembled on licensed premises during prohibited hours are there for a lawful purpose.
56. Do you know whether that provision is in the recent Act, Lord Aberdare's Act? I am told that it is the law at present, but I cannot speak from my own knowledge.
57. Do you know whether the same liability is incurred by the person being supplied with liquor as well as by the person supplying it, or is only the person who supplies the liquor punishable? I am not aware.
58. Do you think it would be a proper amendment of our law to introduce into it a similar provision to that which has been in force in England for some time? I do not see that there would be any impropriety in it, but the question is rather one of policy than of police administration. I may mention, in parenthesis, that there are many old officers from the London Metropolitan Police now serving here, who might afford information as to the working of the Act in London. They are recently from London. It is thirty-four years since I was there, so that I do not know anything about London public-houses.
59. Do you think that the exemption in the present Act of a certain class of people—lodgers and inmates—acts on the whole beneficially or otherwise: do you think it is taken advantage of? I do not think it is taken advantage of, but I think that any further legislation in a prohibitive direction would be an infringement of the liberty of the subject. If I am travelling and stay at an hotel in the country for two days, one of which is Sunday, I should consider it a monstrous interference with my liberty if I could not get a glass of sherry.
60. Do you think that people fraudulently represent themselves to be inmates and lodgers for the purpose of evading the law? Undoubtedly.
61. Then, as a matter of fact, people take advantage of the law in that way; they represent themselves to be other than they really are? I think I can go further than that. I think the present Act has increased the practice of turning public-houses into lodging-houses for the working classes, who take lodgings there in order that they may get drink whenever they want it without restriction.
62. Are you aware officially that a great many drinking clubs have been instituted since the present Licensing Act came into force? Yes.
63. Clubs apparently only or chiefly for the purpose of retailing liquor? Yes; with a subscription of 10s. per annum in some cases.
64. The members of these clubs have evaded the Act because the clubs are exempted I presume? Yes.
65. Do you think that practice is limited to Sydney and its suburbs, or do you think it pervades the country generally? I have heard of one or two in the country.
66. What I should call drinking clubs? Yes, although it is hard to draw a distinction between one club and another; only that we are conscious that these clubs are organized solely for the purpose of enabling their members to procure drink when they require it.
67. The statement has been made to me over and over again that the Licensing Acts are responsible for a large number of drinking clubs that had no existence before? I do not know of a large number. 68.

- E. W. Fosbery, Esq.
68. Well, a considerable number; I am told that there are at least twenty or thirty in Sydney? I doubt that; I do not think there are half a dozen; I have had police attention drawn to several of them.
69. There is a class of public-house, I do not know what name it goes by, but it pays a reduced license fee in consideration of its giving accommodation to people: have you had under your notice many instances of these being resorts for mere intemperance, or are they generally what their name denotes, accommodation houses, that is to say houses where people can get victuals as well as drink? The section under which those houses are licensed was introduced into the Act at my instance, because I frequently found, when travelling over the Colony, that there were accommodation houses the proprietors of which could not afford to pay a £50 license fee, and which became sly grog shops or shanties; but by the imposition of a reduced license fee the houses would be open to the inspection of the police, and the evil of having sly grog shanties on the roads would be done away with.
70. Do you think that if the fee had remained at £30 those houses would have continued shanties? I am satisfied of it; I know dozens of them in the country where the landlords have refused to sell drink on any pretext whatever; they said they could not afford to pay the license fee, and that they never kept anything in the house. Of course I knew that that was untrue; but they said that if they were allowed to pay a reduced license fee, they would keep a moderate amount of drink for travellers, which they could not otherwise afford to do.
71. I suppose those houses are in the country districts chiefly? Yes.
72. There are none in the Metropolitan District? No, there could not be; they must be at least 10 miles apart.
73. I suppose there are hardly any in the county of Cumberland? None; in fact there are very few in the country I think.
74. Do you think that the operation of the colonial wine licensing system has been beneficial or otherwise? Well, it has its advantages; wine shops are frequently shanties for the sale of bad spirits, but there must be some outlet for a colonial product like wine, and if people could be induced to take it temperately, it would undoubtedly be beneficial. The Licensing Benches however, will usually listen to remonstrances from the police that these houses are conducted as shanties, and will refuse the licenses.
75. I suppose you are aware that the sale of colonial wine has not increased as was expected when it was determined to issue colonial wine licenses? I do not know anything about that.
76. It was hoped that the wine licenses would encourage the consumption of a less alcoholic drink; I suppose you are aware that they have not had that effect? I am not aware of it, but I am not surprised to hear it.
77. One cannot say then that the liking for colonial wine has been encouraged by the small license fee, which is only £3, and by the cheapness of the wine itself? I do not suppose that any gentleman at this table ever heard a man in a country public-house call for a glass of colonial wine.
78. It has largely increased in the metropolis? Among the better class.
79. I have understood that in the neighbourhood of Wagga Wagga and some other places, colonial wine is drunk largely by preference when it can be got good; it is not so much a question of drinking colonial wine, as that the wine made and passed into consumption is such as the people will not drink when they can avoid it? It is sold when too new.
80. Are you aware of a practice in the city of letting portions of licensed premises as separate bars? I am; lot to attractive female bar-keepers.
81. What class of people are they let to? I will not go further than to say they are attractive female bar-keepers.
82. They are licensed I presume? They are in licensed houses, and, by a compact with the landlord, they take liquor from him and the profit they make goes to themselves. That difficulty would be met, if there was an amendment of the law, by prohibiting a licensed publican from having more than one bar.
83. Is it not a fact that some of these females are of dissolute character? They have the reputation in some cases—I will not make the statement general—of being women of loose character.
84. Do you think that the disqualifications imposed by law, on certain persons who are not permitted to hold a publican's license, are too slight; might they be increased with advantage? In what direction?
85. At present I think the Act says that no publican's license shall be granted to an unmarried woman, not being a widow? I imagine that is the only disqualification in the Act.
86. Of course that does not compel the granting of a license to any other person, but do you think that the disqualifications might be increased, or do you think not: under the old Act there was a variety of disqualifications: the 8th section provides that

No license shall be granted or transferred under this Act to any person holding office or employment under the Government nor to any constable or bailiff nor to any licensed auctioneer nor to any person actually serving any sentence for any criminal offence nor in respect of any premises of or in which any constable or bailiff is the owner landlord or proprietor or has any interest?

I do not know why that was omitted; I think it was a very salutary provision.

87. At page 3 of your last annual report you say—"That the respectable temperate citizen should be debarred from obtaining liquor at all on the Sabbath is generally considered a grievance; but it is impossible to disregard the fact that the opportunity of Sunday leisure, following immediately upon the receipt of wages on the Saturday, induces a large number of the working classes, who are without sufficient self-control to withstand the enticements of unscrupulous vendors of liquor, to dissipate their earnings in drink, whereby numerous families are deprived of their means of support, and the bread-winner is himself demoralized, if not ruined. The hundreds of letters I receive from wives thus miserably situated bear melancholy testimony to the prevalence of such a state of affairs—my inability to afford relief being a constant cause of anxiety and regret." From this quotation am I right in drawing this inference, that you think the fact of the public-houses being wholly closed on Sunday leads some classes of people to secure a large quantity of liquor on the Saturday? No.

88. Then the legitimate inference is, that if the public-houses were open for any time on the Sunday it would give to a large number of persons having what you call "the opportunity of Sunday leisure"—? No, you misunderstand my meaning; I will explain it. I think there are a large number of people who want a drink during their Sunday leisure, and the mere fact that they can only obtain it in an illicit manner is to some no doubt an additional incentive to seek it; and having once gone to a public-house in the morning, it may be that, apart from their own inclination, an unscrupulous landlord might be induced to keep them until they drank to excess. I think a good deal of liquor is laid in on Saturday night, but that that is a disadvantage, because a large class of the community have so little self-control that when they have liquor by them they cannot abstain from drinking it.

89. What I have heard in common with a great many people, and I should like your opinion upon it, is that the result of the prohibition against obtaining liquor on Sunday causes a great many people to lay in a large stock on the Saturday; that they exhaust their stock on the Saturday night, become crapulous on the Sunday morning, and go to Manly Beach and other places, where they get many people to give them drink? I think my previous answer would bear out that to a certain extent.

90. Do you think that is the tendency of the prohibition now? I think that is one of the tendencies.

91. Against that of course we must, as reasonable men, balance any advantages of the Sunday closing: do you consider that there are counterbalancing advantages? I should be very glad indeed if the public-houses were strictly closed and no drink sold on Sundays, but we are not a community of total abstainers; and though it may seem like retrograde legislation, it has always appeared to me to be not unreasonable that people of all classes who cannot afford to keep liquor in their cellars, and who, if they lay it in on Saturday night, may as you say consume incontinently, should be able on the Sunday, if a relative comes to see them, to have a can of beer with their dinner as well as the wealthier class who draw champagne from their cellars. From this answer you may infer that, under certain limitations, I am inclined to the opinion that it would be perhaps better to allow the public-houses to be opened a short time on Sundays, but I cannot conceal from myself the fact that this would be a retrogression in legislation.

92. From your experience, having had opportunities of observing the habits of the people, do you think that the absolute prohibition of the sale of liquor on Sunday has been, as one might say, beyond the moral standard of the people? I think it is pretty evident that the enactment went beyond what the people were willing to bear, because they get their drink in an illicit manner.

93. Mr. Withers.] That is less injurious to the community? I think it is more injurious to the community that a man should be made an offender by Act of Parliament, because there is no real offence in taking drink on Sunday—it is only made so by Act of Parliament.

94. President.] I presume that, first of all, that view of yours is in the interest of the average working man who wishes to get something to drink with his Sunday dinner? Something to drink during the day.

95. Would you be one to open public-houses on Sunday as under the old law, during several hours of the day? No, I think I should make the hours more restricted; probably an hour in the middle of the day would be sufficient, say from half-past 12 till half-past 1, or from 1 till 2. I wish you to bear in mind, however, the qualification I made previously, that if the public-houses were kept, as some friends of mine who have held licenses in this city have kept them—that is, have locked their bars on Saturday night and not opened them until Monday morning—I should prefer to see them closed.

96. I suppose you would allow such a practice as you have mentioned to be optional with the publicans themselves? Undoubtedly.

97. Then this question will almost follow as a corollary from what you have said: you think that by permitting the opening of public-houses for a short time on Sunday, the working classes whom you mention in your report, would be encouraged to be more temperate; in other words, that if their legitimate requirements on the Sunday were met, they would abstain from those Saturday night accumulations we hear so much of? I think it would do away with the laying in of liquor on Saturday nights, and with the practice indulged in by a large number of people of passing almost the entire Sabbath in a public-house, and it would further do away with the immorality that is engendered by making a large number of the community law-breakers; those are the advantages.

98. You say, in the before quoted paragraph in your report, that you have received hundreds of letters from the wives of intemperate people, all pointing to the intemperate habits of their husbands? Yes, I receive complaints from women of their husbands passing their Sundays in public-houses, whereby their wages are dissipated.

99. I want now to ask you a question regarding a matter on which you may be able to throw some light. I have been told that the practice of taking drink home on Saturday night causes many wives to become drunkards; that is to say, they see drink for the first time brought into the house, and after a while they participate in the drinking of it and become just as intemperate as their husbands: can you give me any idea whether that statement is founded on fact or not? I cannot give any opinion except to say that it is most reasonable to suppose so, but I know nothing that would confirm it.

100. You are aware though that intemperance is increasing among women? Unfortunately intemperance is increasing among the female portion of the community in all classes.

101. It is among girls and boys? Yes, I believe so.

102. As to these boys and girls, do you think that they have been used to seeing the drink brought home on Saturday night, and their fathers and mothers using it, and becoming themselves intemperate in consequence? I do not think so; I think they learn their evil habits out of doors; they have too much leisure and too much money.

103. In another paragraph of your report, you express the hope that the gradual extinction of the licenses now held by men who evade the law may in time effect some improvement. What do you mean by the words "gradual extinction"? Since the Act came into operation, the number of public-houses has been reduced from 851 to 822, notwithstanding a large increase in the population.

104. I see it is the spontaneous extinction of them? By the refusal of licenses; and as the licenses refused have generally been held by those who kept ill-conducted houses, I am in great hopes that the improvement may extend still farther. Many publicans are among the best citizens of the Colony, and I suppose it will be to their interest, as well as to the interest of the community as a whole, that the evil-doers should be rooted out. I may mention that many respectable licensed publicans have complained to me that by their strictly closing their houses on Sundays their profits have considerably fallen off; some of their neighbours unblushingly keep their houses open, and their customers tell them that if they will not sell them drink on Sundays as others do, they will give their week-day custom where they get their Sunday drink.

105. This statement, as to the very large number of law-breakers among the publicans, I presume is the result of the reports of your officers? Each of the Licensing Inspectors made a confidential report to me from their observations, and it is not difficult to tell which houses are evading the law and which are observing observing it. I have every confidence in the figures being correct. We cannot go to church on Sunday morning without seeing large numbers of men coming out of the laues at the back of public-houses wiping their mouths, and it is not a very distant conclusion that they have been inside for liquor.

106. It shows in rough figures that three out of four publicans evade the law. Do you think there is that proportion in the country too? It is hard to say; I dare say that at roadside inns, where there is practically no supervision, and travellers are passing and repassing, the Act is not so rigourously enforced as it would be anywhere else.

107. Of course you have given your attention to the local option provisions of the law? Yes, superficially; I have not gone into the question as deeply as I might do.

108. Probably you have gone into the question deeply enough to answer this question: do you think these provisions are effective as showing the opinion of the people? I do not think they are; the principle is good enough if you can get the voice of the people, but they will not take sufficient interest to make it sufficiently marked; only a very small proportion vote.

109. Do you think that if the range of local option were extended to the electorate instead of being confined to the municipal voters it would be more effective; and supposing we could construct effective machinery, do you think the people would record their votes? They do not vote very numerously in the municipalities.

110. Do you think they would vote more numerously in the parliamentary electorates? I doubt it; I think the people pay very little attention to it.

111. Have you ever come across any other proposal for obtaining what we may call a plebiscite than by getting the people to vote in the municipalities or in the parliamentary electorates? No; I think the people generally think their interests are safe in the hands of the Licensing Board which has been created by law to administer the Act, and they leave it in their hands.

112. But I gather that, in the present state of the law, local option is ineffective? I think so, but you will get better evidence than mine on that point.

113. About graduated packet licenses; I have heard that there are great complaints as to the operation of that form of license,—that it encourages drinking on a very large scale by persons who are not passengers? Undoubtedly.

114. And have you had any complaint? I have; I have noticed it myself too.

115. With regard to the accommodation in the houses, do you think that our statutory accommodation is sufficient or insufficient? I think the provision is defective in not specifying the number of cubic feet of air each person shall have; they have the right sized rooms, but they have half a dozen beds in them; in many cases the publicans have knocked two rooms into one, and then put a number of beds in; the accommodation for the public therefore has not been increased very much.

116. The lunacy which has resulted from intemperance I suppose has not come under your notice except casually? The Inspector-General of Insane tells me I am mistaken in thinking that so large a proportion of the lunacy existing is due to intemperance.

117. What has been the working of the provision in the Act with regard to the adulteration of liquors? It has been carefully acted upon; we have had immense numbers of samples taken under all sorts of circumstances; they have been purchased by the inspectors where it was supposed the lowest class of liquors would be sold, and the Government Analytical Chemist has carefully examined them, but I think that not in one instance has he found any deleterious ingredients such as would warrant a prosecution under the law; as a matter of course the spirits are frequently of a coarse and inferior character, as is not to be wondered at when we are told that you can purchase whisky at 2s. 6d. a gallon; it is a coarse, common spirit, but it does not contain any ingredient which would be deleterious, except as all spirits are deleterious I suppose.

118. The result of the analysis has been to negative the existence of any deleterious mixture in the liquors which have been examined? It seems that it is not worth while, as it was in former years, to doctor up spirits; they can get it so cheap it is sufficiently potent without adulteration to increase its strength.

119. Are your remarks directed to spirits and fermented liquors, or to wines? It has chiefly been spirits.

120. Do you think the alteration of the law, so as to close the houses at 11 o'clock, has been beneficial? I think it has been wholly beneficial.

121. By "wholly beneficial," do you mean that there have been no disadvantages? I think there has been some public inconvenience at times; there has been some inconvenience to those whose occupations have kept them out late at night, and who may have required refreshments after 11 o'clock.

122. Then you would not agree with any alteration of the law that went back to the old system? No; and I foresee so many difficulties in the way of granting night licenses that it appears to me to be better to leave matters as they are.

123. Have you ever been acquainted, in Victoria or elsewhere, with the operation of grocers' licenses, and off licenses? No.

124. You would not suggest, then, that we should introduce any of those licenses which are common in England, for the sale of liquor in less quantities than two gallons to be drunk off the premises? Well, I should not see any objection to allow a person, instead of going to a public-house, buying three or four bottles of wine at his grocer's.

125. Do you think any decrease of intemperance would result from the establishment of ale and beer houses—that is to say, where fermented drink alone was sold? It would be hard to say; if there was sufficient inducement to make the people take light beers, as the Germans do, in preference to the drink they consume now, it would certainly decrease intemperance; but as long as a man hankers after spirits he will get them. The fact is, that the evil of intemperance is of deeper root than anything that can be eradicated by statute. In what are called "good times," when people have plenty of money and plenty of leisure, we expect a corresponding increase in the drink bill.

126. You know that the Germans are an exceedingly temperate race in their own country? They drink more than the English, but it is a kind of drink it does not affect them as the Englishman's drink affects him.

127. You do not think, then, that it is possible to transplant habits of that kind into the Colony—that is to say, to substitute some other drink for the spirits which are so much in use now? It would be a bad world indeed if we could not see our way to effect improvements in every direction; that is one in which no efforts should be spared to carry out, if we could induce the people to take a lighter kind of beverage.

128. Do you not think the climate would be in favour of the consumption of a lighter kind of drink? Everything is in favour of it. It is a thirsty climate; that is another ingredient in the habits of the people. During the lifetime of many here the habits of the people have changed. I can recollect when those who were well-to-do and had cellars of their own never thought they had dined properly unless they rose from the table in a state of exhilaration that was by no means becoming. There has been a very great improvement as regards one class.

E. W.
8 Mar., 1886.

129. Mr. Colls.] Have not some of the leading hotelkeepers waited on you with reference to the private bars upstairs? They have; a deputation of licensed hotelkeepers came to me; they said that their Society had taken up the matter, and they were anxious, if possible, to get some evidence. I pointed out to them that unless some one who was concerned in it found it worth his while to make a disclosure as to the agreement, it would be almost impossible to attempt to prove any offence.

130. Has it come under your notice that storekeepers in the country supply bottles of spirits and charge for them as vinegar or soft goods? I have heard that it is commonly done.

131. I suppose that you are aware that small winegrowers in the Albury district make a lot of white spirits from the hulls and dispose of it and drink it? That is pretty well checked, although the practice no doubt does obtain to a certain extent. - Of course it is illicit distillation.

132. Mr. Davies.] Did I understand you to say, in answer to the President, that during the first year of the existence of the present Licensing Act there was a decrease in the number of apprehensions as compared with the previous year? Certainly.

133. Do you remember what the numbers were? 13,949 in 1881, and 11,842 in 1882.

134. How do you account for the great reduction in the number of apprehensions as compared with the previous year? By the introduction of the new legislation.

135. How comes it then that there was an increase in the following year under the new Act? Because the Act was better observed while it was new—before people found out methods of evading it.

136. Is it not a fact that the police showed a greater desire to enforce obedience to the law during the first year than they did in subsequent years? I think not.

137. You think not? I am sure that is not so.

138. Have you not, in answer to a question put by the President, answered my question affirmatively in substance? Certainly not; I was not asked a question of that character.

139. Did not the police, during the first year of the existence of the new Act, enforce more obedience to the law on the part of publicans and others connected with the drink traffic than they did in the previous year? When the new Act came into operation they enforced its provisions.

140. Did you not say something just now about over-zeal and indiscretion on the part of the police during the first year? I referred incidentally to an isolated case in which some policemen, in disobedience of orders, went into an hotel in what might be considered disguise in order to prevent some improper evasion of the Act—that in this way they tried to get a conviction and were reprimanded for so doing.

141. How many cases of that kind came under your observation? I think only that one of that character; there may have been others no doubt; but directly that case was brought under my notice I prohibited the practice in future.

142. Is it the practice to give promotion or some consideration to officers of the police who bring up a larger number of cases than others do? It is a libel on me to say so; I have seen it asserted several times in the newspapers and elsewhere; it is a libel on me to suppose that I would promote a man because he brought up a certain number of cases; there is not the smallest shadow of foundation for the assertion.

143. Then it is not so? There is not the slightest shadow of foundation for it.

144. How do you account for the non-observance of the law by publicans during the last three or four years? I have just assigned the reason,—because people have found means of evading the Act. When an Act of Parliament is first passed—even a Land Act—people are not aware how they can drive a coach and four through it, but they get clever as time goes on.

145. Did I understand you to say, in reply to the President, that it was a matter of public notoriety that men were drinking in public-houses on Sundays—that they have been seen coming out wiping their mouths? Yes.

146. What were the police doing? Looking on. What could they do?

147. Have they not the power to prosecute? If they have evidence; but the fact of seeing a man coming out of an hotel and wiping his mouth is not evidence; you may draw your own inference and your conclusion may be a just one, but that is not evidence to bring before a Court of Law.

148. Have not superior officers power to go into hotels in which they believe that the law is being violated? Certain officers have.

149. Do they do so? Frequently; otherwise there would not be such a large number of convictions as there are.

150. Did I understand you to say just now that three-fourths of the publicans have been convicted for openly violating the law? No; what I said was that my officers report to me that three-fourths of the publicans do not observe the Sunday-closing provision.

151. Is it not a fact that three out of four of the publicans have been convicted for violating the law? I know nothing of that; I should say certainly not.

152. I see that in your report you state—"The law prohibiting Sunday trading is extensively and systematically evaded, and such precautions are taken as render detection and prosecution by ordinary methods a matter of extreme difficulty. The police officers in charge of the various divisions have supplied me with information—which I believe to be thoroughly reliable—from which I learn that out of the 822 holders of publicans' licenses in the Metropolitan District, only 193 observe the law, by closing their houses for the sale of liquor to customers other than lodgers on Sundays." If that is the case, only 193 of the whole body of publicans obey the law? So we believe.

153. Am I to understand that the others are all violators of the law? In the regard stated.

154. That is Sunday trading? Yes.

155. Is there no means of checking this open violation of the law? There are two modes: one, the application of the English law here; and the other, the employment of a host of informers, a method which I do not feel justified in adopting.

156. When you say "informers" do I understand you to mean detectives? The men would be employed for

E. W. Fosbery, Esq.
8 Mar., 1886.

for the purpose of detection. They would worm their way into a public-house, ask the landlord for a drink at the bar, pay him for it, and then lay an information against him. This is a method which I do not like, because it seems to me that there is some shadow of immorality in enticing a man to commit a breach of the law and then prosecuting him—the prosecutor being a participator in the offence.

157. Is not that the way in which you get convictions under the present law? No.

158. How do you secure them? By the inspectors and officers under the Act being changed to divisions where they are not known. They catch the offenders in flagrante delicto—serving liquor and receiving payment at the bar.

159. Then I understand that there are 600 publicans against whom you cannot obtain convictions by applying the means you speak of? I have already stated that the precautions taken by those who evade the law are of such a complete character that they almost act as a preventive to the police obtaining the information necessary for a prosecution.

160. It is not the want of additional police? Oh dear no!

161. I understand from your report that there has been a large increase in the strength of the force? There is the same increase almost every year—forty or fifty men for the entire Colony.

162. It is not owing to the want of policemen that the law is not enforced? If we had more men we might not hear of so many complaints from unfortunate wives, and from people living close to hotels, as to scenes of drunkenness and disorder on Sundays. If we had men enough to be able to station a man at each house to take down the names of people who entered it, and so forth, it might act as a further check, but we have not the men for that.

163. Have you ever represented to the Colonial Secretary that it is desirable to have more police? The demand for police is greater on Sunday than on any other day in the week. All the churches require to be protected from annoyance, and all the places of public resort are so crowded that the policeman's life on Sunday is certainly not the easiest—it is his hardest day's work.

164. With reference to Sunday drinking, has not the number of convictions on Mondays under the new Act been greater than it was under the old Act? I cannot give you that information; you may be able to get it from the Superintendent of Police.

165. How do you account for the decrease in the number of public-houses in the Metropolitan District? Simply because the police have opposed the granting of licenses, on the ground that the houses do not come up to the requirements of the Act; that the applicants are not of good character, or have been convicted. By this means the Licensing Board have been enabled to refuse licenses; hence the number of public-houses has decreased.

166. It is not by any particular operation of the new law? It is under the new law that the reduction has been made.

167. I understood you to say that it was simply owing to the action of the police? I did not; I said that it was owing to the police filing objections to the granting of renewals, which they could not do under the old Act.

168. As far as your judgment goes, are the houses superior in class now to what they were under the old law? Most undoubtedly; there has been a marked improvement both in town and country.

169. When you refer in your report to the reason of a certain class frequenting public-houses being that they have leisure and money, I suppose you refer especially to the labouring classes? I do not know that any distinction can be drawn as to the class of people who frequent public-houses. I refer generally to the class of people who go to public-houses—they may be artisans, labourers, or clerks.

170. Do not you think that there would be more drinking by this class if the public-houses were open on Sundays? I certainly do. I think that there would be more at general places of resort; but, as I took some pains to explain to the Commission just now, I think that there is something to be said on both sides of the question. I endeavoured to show as clearly as I could the advantages as well as disadvantages of Sunday closing; but I spoke guardedly, saying that, as far as my own personal opinion went, I should be glad if the public-houses were all strictly closed on Sundays.

171. You are aware that under the old Act the public-houses were opened from 1 to 3 p.m. on Sundays? Yes.

172. What was the outcome of that? I think that it was chiefly with a view to put a stop to Sunday drinking that the new Act was designed.

173. Was there more drunkenness on Sundays under the old law than there has been under the new one? I think that there was more open drunkenness under the old Act on Sundays than there is under the new Act.

174. Is it not a fact that under the old law drinking was carried on almost continuously all the day on Sunday in most of the public-houses? There is not much difference now from the state of things which then existed.

175. Do I understand you to mean that drinking goes on all day on Sundays now? Undoubtedly.

176. And the police are powerless to go in? They are not powerless to go in, but owing to the precautions taken they are unable to obtain the evidence necessary for a Court of law. The difficulty is not as to the knowledge that the thing is done, but as to being able to prove it.

177. You say that you know that drinking is carried on on Sundays, and there is no power on the part of the police to prosecute? I did not go to that length, because there have been a large number of prosecutions and convictions. I only referred to the minimum of the cases and the maximum of the difficulty. If we did not get convictions sometimes it would be a bad case indeed.

178. Does it not strike you as being extraordinary that the police should know that drinking is carried on and yet they are powerless to prevent it? It is difficult to obtain legal evidence—you must prove that the drink has been bought and paid for. If a publican has a certain number of customers, say twenty or thirty, and they form themselves into a kind of a club—all being well-known to the publican—how is a stranger to get in and prove it against them, except he acts as an informer? Directly a policeman or any one who looks like a policeman is seen, these people are engaged in some harmless occupation far away from the drink. Of course the policeman is not likely to get evidence under such circumstances.

179. It is impossible to secure convictions? I have suggested that we should adopt the English law, which provides that, where people are found in a public-house in this manner, the onus of proof that they were there for a lawful purpose is thrown on the landlord. This is one direction in which there certainly might be greater stringency in enforcing the law.

180. Have you recommended any remedy to the Government for the defects in the law? I made a great great many recommendations when the Bill was under consideration. I thought that the Bill as drawn and passed was a good one, and I really cannot see any way of improving it, except in the directions which I have indicated.

E. W.
Fosbery, Esq.

8 Mar., 1886.

181. What was the nature of the recommendation which you made to give the police sufficient power to secure convictions? I made no recommendation except that which I now make, as regards throwing the onus of proof on the landlord.
182. You stated, in reply to the President, that it would be impossible to give the number of convictions in individual cases for drunkenness—that some persons had been convicted thirty, forty, or 100 times? It would be almost impossible to get the detail out of the watchhouse books; the name of (say) John Smith might occur several times, and you would not be able to establish the identity of the individual. Certainly the past record would not be sufficient for the purpose, but it might be made so for the future.
183. Is it not a matter of public notoriety that a number of offenders appear at the Police Courts over and over again to answer the charge of drunkenness? It is notorious.
184. And you say it is not possible to get a return showing how many times these persons have been convicted? It would be scarcely possible; it might be tried.
185. Are you aware of a number of licensed houses in the city being in the hands of the brewers? I do not know it of my own knowledge; it is commonly reported that such is the case.
186. Is it known to the police? They know it the same way as I do, I suppose.
187. Do not you know that it is the practice for brewers to sell the good-will and stock-in-trade of houses to the publicans, and to get from them their signatures to transfers in blank? I should think it very probable, but I do not know it of my own knowledge. I have never seen any such document.
188. Are you not aware of your own knowledge that a number of public-houses are in the hands of brewers—that they are their property? It is a matter of common notoriety. I believe it to be the case in England and all the world over, that brewers own the businesses and that their nominees conduct them. As to the terms of the agreements between the brewers and the licensees I can have no knowledge.
189. Do you think it desirable that brewers should have control of a number of public-houses in this way? I really cannot see that it matters much who has control of them.
190. Do not you see the undesirableness of brewers holding the licenses of a number of public-houses? The licensees are responsible under the law for all acts just as if the houses were their own property.
191. Do you think that the inspectors of the licensing districts will be able to give us any information on the point? They might not. I do not know whether it comes within the sphere of their duties to inquire as to who the owner of a public-house or of the business may be.
192. You say that the character of the houses has improved? There has been a great improvement.
193. You are aware that, in some hotels, bars are sublet to gay ladies who receive a certain amount of pay, and who sell liquor at a higher price, and thus make large sums of money? I do not know that they sell liquor at higher prices, but they make money by the sale of it.
194. There is no provision in the present Act to reach those persons? There would be if it could be proved that there was any agreement on the part of the landlord to sublet his business. In that respect, of course, it would be contrary to law.
195. Do you know how many houses there are which have bars sublet? I could not say.
196. Has there been any attempt at prosecution? We have not had a shadow of evidence beyond what has been stated to me about individual cases.
197. From your report we gather that vice and drunkenness appear to be on the increase among the boys and girls of the city? Yes, that is my opinion, not only from observation but from reports made to me.
198. I was going to ask you how you get the information? I take an interest in the subject, and from time to time question particular officers, and I have many individual cases brought under my notice and I observe it in the streets.
199. Have you had any statistical information from your officers? No; it is only given to me in the way I have indicated.
200. Have the police taken any special precautions to put it down? They are always using their best efforts to ameliorate this unhappy state of affairs in every direction.
201. Do you attribute the increased drinking among boys and girls to the increased facilities for obtaining liquor? No; I think it arises from the habits of the young being less under control than they were in former years. I think they are allowed too much latitude, too much leisure, and can earn money too readily; in fact, some young people who work at the factories at machine work, if they are clever hands, can earn men's wages.
202. What do you consider men's wages? I believe it is not unusual for a young lad to earn £2 a week and more.
203. With reference to the 232 deaths from drunkenness or excessive drinking, how do you obtain that information? Every inquest that is held is attended by some member of the police force, from whom I get a report containing a sketch of the case, probably with the evidence as published in one of the newspapers, and his own observations in the case. I examine every one of these reports personally; it seemed to me an awful thing that 232 cases in one year should occur in which people have met with violent deaths owing to intemperance.
204. Does not that strike you as a very large percentage of deaths from that cause? It strikes me as a grievously large number.
205. That leads me to ask a question with reference to the class of liquors sold. You have already answered some question asked by the President with reference to that, and I understood you to say that the cheapness of the liquor sold in the city was a cause of the large consumption? No; I said that I took it that it was not worth while for people to adulterate liquor to the extent they used to do, because they were now importing a coarse whiskey or other spirit made from potatoes and other substances—in fact, I believe they can make whiskey out of anything—and it is sold in bond at half a crown a gallon. I have heard of proof spirit being sold as low as that.
206. It pays the ordinary duty, does it not? Yes.
207. Then it becomes as expensive as the other, does it not? No; spirits such as people who value their health take cost more than that—about 12s. 6d. a gallon.
208. Independently of the duty? Yes.

H. W.
Fosbery, Esq.
8 Mar., 1886.

209. Is there not a large quantity of white spirit imported and sold in Sydney? I could not say. The Customs returns will give that information. There used to be a large quantity, but now it comes in the form of inferior coarse whiskey or brandy.

210. Have you had any of that inferior spirit examined by the Government Analyst? Yes, I have had hundreds of samples examined, the particulars of which the Government Analyst will give you himself.

211. All kinds of liquor? Yes, taken at different places, and under circumstances which you would imagine would bring to light anything bad. They have been obtained late at night, in the lower class of public-houses and roadside inns, as well as in the best hotels.

212. And in almost every case there has been no proof of the addition of deleterious substances? Nothing that amounted to a breach of the law. Some of the liquor was deleterious enough, but not sufficient to bring it within the meaning of the Act.

213. President.] It was not made deleterious by the mixture of foreign substances? No.

214. Mr. Davies.] With regard to local option, I understood you to say, in answer to the President, that you had not paid much attention to that subject? No. I do not like to express an opinion on any subject which I have not carefully considered. I think that if you could get the voice of the people, it would be as proper a means of determining that as any other matter; but when the question is taken up in only a half-hearted fashion, I am not sure that you do get the voice of the people.

215. Then you favour the principle of the people having the right to say whether there should be any public-houses or not? I am in favour of the principle that the voice of the people should decide everything.

216. Then I understand you that you are in favour of the principle of local option? Undoubtedly.

217. Do you regard the present operation of the law as being ineffective? Yes.

218. With regard to that paragraph of your report in which you speak of the hundreds of letters received by you from wives, complaining that their husbands squander their means in public-houses—does that state of things prevail to a large extent in Sydney? Judging by the letters I receive, I should say that they would not be written unless there was sufficient cause. They are written in such terms as to leave no doubt that they came from broken-down, wretched, and ruined people.

219. That is with regard to habitual drinking—not the ordinary Sunday drinking? I refer to the Sunday drinking. Most of the letters have reference to that, Sunday being a day of leisure.

220. From your report, I gather that there are a number of publicans who comply with the law by closing their houses absolutely on Sunday? Yes, about 200 of them.

221. Mr. Warby, at the corner of Pitt and King Streets, is one of those, is he not? I could not say. I should prefer not to mention names. A large number of hotel-keepers have told me that under no circumstances do they open their bars on Sunday. One I know, who some years ago had the largest bar trade in Sydney, used to lock up his bar on Saturday night and never open it again until Monday morning.

222. Then it is a fact that there are a number of publicans who close their bars on Sunday, and pay proper respect and obedience to the laws? Yes.

223. Have you any objection to furnish their names? If the Commission directed them to be furnished they could be furnished; but if my opinion were asked, I should say that it was very inadvisable to do so. By the exhaustive process, the balance would be the evil-doers, and the police would be called to account for daring to take away their reputation. It would be a highly immoral proceeding, and would place them in a very awkward position indeed.

FRIDAY, 12 MARCH, 1886.

Present:—

ALEX. OLIVER, Esq., M.A., PRESIDENT,	N. MELVILLE, Esq., J.P., M.P.,
T. COLLS, Esq., J.P.,	S. H. HYAM, Esq., J.P., M.P.,
J. M. TOOHEY, Esq., M.P.,	F. ABIGAIL, Esq., M.P.,
G. WITHERS, Esq., J.P.,	R. FOWLER, Esq., J.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Edmund Walcott Fosbery, Esq., Inspector-General of Police, recalled and further examined:—

E. W.
Fosbery, Esq.
12 Mar., 1886.

The Witness said: Before you ask me any questions, you will allow me to read a little memorandum in reply to a question asked me on the last occasion, to the following effect: In dividing the figures for drunkenness as given in my report, I find that for drunkenness there were 11,876 apprehensions, of which 9,336 were males, and 2,540 females; for habitual drunkenness there were 69 apprehensions, of which 27 were males and 42 females; for drunkenness and disorderly conduct there were 3,001 apprehensions, of which 2,138 were males and 863 females.

224. President.] What is meant exactly by habitual drunkenness? It is defined in the Vagrant Act in these words: "Every habitual drunkard having been thrice convicted of drunkenness within the preceding twelve months."

225. Then the habitual drunkards mentioned by you are habitual drunkards as defined in the Vagrant the Act? Yes.

226. Mr. Withers.] You said in your previous evidence, that the closing of the hotels on Sundays had been the cause of the establishment of a number of working-men's clubs? I said that I believed that there were several such clubs in existence.

227. Have those clubs necessitated any extra supervision on the part of the police? They have required police observation.

228. Have any disgraceful scenes or any arrests been made at those places? No; on the contrary; in one case in which I made special inquiry the police alleged that they had seen no drunkenness or disorderly conduct in connection with the club.

229. You would not then regard those clubs as any great evil arising out of the change in the licensing law? I consider it an evil that any club should be established for the purpose of enabling or encouraging people to meet together to drink, but those clubs might have existed under the previous law or any law.

230. President.] They are not the outcome of the present law at all? No.

231. Mr. Withers.] Then you simply mentioned their existence as a fact, and not with the view of showing that any special evil had arisen? My statement was made in reply to a question from the President; I did not refer to the matter myself.
232. Do you apprehend that they will increase to any extent and become a serious evil in facilitating the drinking customs of the people? I do.
233. Up to the present, however, they have given no trouble? No, no conspicuous trouble.
234. With regard to the closing of public-houses on Sunday, and to the laying in a stock of liquor on Saturday nights for consumption on Sunday, do you think that it is a greater evil to have the public-houses closed than to have them open on Sunday? I gave a very guarded answer to a similar question before. I think it would be beneficial to have all public-houses closed efficiently on Sunday.
235. Do you think that the danger arising to mothers and other members of families from drink being taken into their homes on the Saturday night is greater than the evil arising from the opening of public-houses on Sunday? It is impossible to say how far the evil to which you refer has extended; it is merely a matter of opinion; but if the closing of public-houses on Sunday had that effect, it would be a considerable public danger.
236. Is it impossible to say at the present time whether the custom is in excess of what it would have been if the hotels had continued open on Sunday? It would be impossible to arrive at any opinion with accuracy on that point.
237. You suggested the opening of hotels for a limited period on Sunday? I said that there was a good deal to be urged in favour of allowing them to be opened for a limited period on Sunday. There is a good deal to be said in favour of it.
238. Do you think that the provisions of the law in regard to the inspection of liquors and the cleanliness of the houses have been carried out to the extent required? I think the law has been very efficiently complied with in those respects.
239. With regard to beds and the cleanliness of the houses generally? I think that there has been considerable improvement in that regard.
240. I have been led to believe that the law with regard to the inspection of liquor has been almost a dead letter? The general impression is the same as your own, but the Minister of Justice has repeatedly brought the matter under my notice, and I have been most careful in directing the licensing inspectors to take sufficient samples of liquors on all proper occasions, and I have every reason to believe that that duty has been performed thoroughly and completely.
241. Would it not be wise to require all hotels to be closed on the day of polling for a general election. No doubt opportunities would be found for supplying liquor, but it seems to me that it would be as desirable to close public-houses on polling-days as on Sunday, if not more so—I think it is the practice at present in Victoria? It would no doubt have some advantages, but it would be almost impossible to enforce such a law—it would be very generally evaded.
242. There would be nothing to prevent people from giving liquor to their friends and having it somewhere handy? There would be nothing to prevent a supporter or friend of one of the candidates from providing a considerable private stock and dispensing it with a generous hand to the electors.
243. It is said that the worst evils arise from the sale of bad drink, and I am convinced that good liquor does not injure people to any great extent: do you think that the inspection of liquors could be carried out more effectively; for instance, has the Inspector power at present to call for all the open bottles in a bar? Yes.
244. All the open bottles that are being used in the bar? Undoubtedly; that is how the samples are obtained. The person obtaining the sample points to a certain bottle or cask and says "Give me a pint of that liquor," and he pays for it. If you have Mr. Watt, the analytical chemist, before you, he will tell you what I have told you already, and which is confirmatory of your view, namely, that there is a great deal of undoubtedly bad liquor sold and consumed, and that it is injurious; but bad though it be, it is not adulterated or so deleterious as to bring it within the meaning of the statute.
245. When a sample is taken from an open bottle, is another sample taken from a bottle which has not previously been opened, of the same brand and bought from the same merchant? No doubt.
246. In order to see who is responsible for any adulteration, the merchant or the publican? They have tried every method, that among others. They have even gone to the lower class of drinking-shops late on Saturday nights, when liquor is greatly in demand, and have taken samples of liquor which appeared to them to be suspicious.
247. I asked the question in order to see whether care was taken that the publican should not be held responsible for any adulteration caused by the merchant? Undoubtedly it is.
248. I suppose the police are pretty conscious, as in fact you have stated, that the majority of hotels are open on Sundays? Certain signs are given at the door, and friends are admitted in numbers, but the police have not sufficient power under the Act to enable them to prosecute the offenders. I believe that the officers have not sent in their reports in regard to that matter without conscientiously informing themselves of the grounds on which they are based.
249. Have you ever heard of any disgraceful proceedings in connection with the so-called temperance demonstrations down the harbour? No, I cannot say that I have heard anything unusual or special in regard to them.
250. Have you heard that a good deal of immorality takes place in connection with harbour picnics, whether temperance or otherwise? Yes, I have heard too frequently of immorality and ruin arising out of harbour picnics.
251. Of course immorality would be present to some extent whether there was drink or not at such gatherings? Well, I think that drink is an adjunct to the immorality that occurs, and a cause of it.
252. Mr. Melville.] With regard to Sunday selling, it appears that there are a number of persons holding licenses who openly evade the Act: are there no means at the disposal of the police to bring the provisions of the Act to bear upon them? Yes. That is evident from the large number of convictions obtained; but, as I explained on a previous occasion, the precautions taken by those evading the law are so very well matured that, except by the employment of informers, and the other means which I suggested, I doubt whether there could be any stricter enforcement of the Act than we have at present.
253. Seeing that you employ detectives to enforce other laws, what objection can there be to employ detectives to enforce this Act? There is a wide distinction between the two. Detectives are employed to detect crime which has been committed; an informer is employed to take part in the commission of an offence, and then to give evidence in support of a conviction.

E. W.
Fosbery, Esq.
12 Mar., 1886.

E. W.
Fosbery, Esq.
12 Mar., 1886.

254. I do not put the question in that light. There are some 600 persons who are in the habit of breaking the law; is there any valid reason why detectives should not be employed to detect them? I am afraid it would have a very demoralizing effect if we were to employ informers. We could only get men of doubtful character to act as informers.

255. I am not speaking of informers at all. You say in your report, which I believe to be absolutely correct, that a large number of people are ruining themselves by Sunday drinking; you told us that people get into the public-houses, and the publicans offer them inducements to remain. Can there be any objection to employ detectives to discover the offences thus committed, without employing any informers at all? You do not see the difficulties. The detective would have to be a person perfectly unknown to the landlord and his customers, or else his services would be useless. If he went in with the other customers he would have to get evidence to secure a conviction, and we should have to change the so-called detective on every occasion. He would soon be identified, and then he would not have any chance to get in. But I have mentioned before, that the landlords of the houses have a general rule of only admitting their well-known customers, or one introduced as a friend.

256. Then, in the event of the Legislature allowing liquor to be sold for one hour on Sundays, as partially suggested by you, what means would then have to be taken to prevent the sale of liquor during the prohibited hours? The same as at present. It may reasonably be argued that if the people can purchase their can of beer some time during the Sunday, they will not be induced to break the law by purchasing liquor during unauthorized hours.

257. If the houses were opened for one hour, would you not require some additional means to detect any evasions of the law which might take place during the prohibited hours, seeing that the law is at present so successfully evaded? We should still have to put in force the means that we possess. I have suggested, however, that a provision of the English law should be extended to this Colony. The onus of proving that persons who are on his premises during prohibited hours are there for a lawful purpose should be thrown upon the landlord.

258. Do you think that the opening of public-houses on Sundays would put an end to the present undue consumption of liquor on Sundays? No, I fear not. It might improve it in one direction, but it would make it worse in another.

259. Have you had an opportunity of gaining knowledge as to the working of the Victorian Act? It has been so short a time in operation that I have had no report upon it at all.

260. Have you heard anything of the licensing laws in the State of Maine, in America? Only what have been made known to the public generally.

261. Do you think the extension of the hours for the sale of liquor on week-days would be any advantage? A very great disadvantage. The closing of the houses at 11 o'clock has been a great success. I think I may say something further in regard to the question you were just asking me. The Act is not inoperative, notwithstanding the very unfavourable figures I have adduced. When a publican has been fined a certain number of times his license becomes forfeited, and that is a very serious matter indeed to him. And the result of the law has been, that a large number of unworthy men have been removed from being in the position of holding licenses, and a considerable number of public-houses have been closed.

262. I believe you favour the principle of the people regulating the sale of liquor by vote? I believe the people should rule everything, when you can take their voices fairly.

263. Do you think it would be an advantage if the law were so altered as to extend the local option vote to all Parliamentary voters. The voters have power to say—(1) whether they want any public-houses, and—(2) how many houses they will have? The principle is absolutely correct, if you could ensure its being worked properly.

264. Do you think it would be wise to allow wives and unmarried females to vote in the matter of local option? No doubt the principle is correct.

265. Do you arrive at that conclusion from the facts brought under your knowledge as to the injury that females have suffered through the drink traffic? No, but from the fact that both sexes are equally interested in the matter.

266. Are you not of opinion that they are more interested? I do not think so; all members of the community of reasonable age ought to be equally interested.

267. From your report I gather that a great number of wives have written to you, complaining that the law in no way protects them from the consequences which their husbands are bringing on them by drinking to excess. Does it not strike you that these females have a claim outside the broad principles of democracy you have laid down? I do not think they have any great claim beyond that of the other sex. Many husbands complain to me of the drunken habits of their wives.

268. You speak of the enticements held out to persons by the "unscrupulous vendors of liquor"—what am I to understand by that? The allurements of what they consider good company, cheerful rooms to meet in, and occasionally the blandishments of a good-looking barmaid thrown in.

269. That is what was in your mind when your report was written? Yes. I might mention a few other things. The people get away from the squalor and noise of their own homes, they meet with congenial company, and they are hilarious from the effects of drink, and they think they are having a fine time until they find themselves in the lock-up.

270. When these unscrupulous vendors of liquor applied for the renewal of their licenses, have the police taken steps to prevent the renewal of the licenses? I am glad you have asked the question, as it will enable me to say that this matter has been brought by me prominently under the notice of the Minister of Justice. As you are aware, objection may be taken to the issue of licenses under the Act, on various grounds, which the Act specifies, and the Act goes on to say—"Provided always that upon any application whether for the grant of renewal removal or transfer of a license any objection whatever not being a frivolous or vexatious objection may be taken which appears to the Licensing Court or Magistrate to be sufficient." Under that provision, the licensing inspectors objected to the renewal of a number of licenses. I will read the report on the subject. (See Appendix.) These papers have been laid before the Minister of Justice, whose Under Secretary will no doubt be able to say what action has been taken.

271. Was the action of your inspector taken by your directions? It was.

272. Can you give the Commission any information as to the quality of the liquor sold in the country districts? I am continually having cases of marked liquor sent down for analysis, from places where it is supposed that adulterated liquor can be obtained.

273. Do you know whether the system known as "lambing down" is still carried on in the Colony? It is still very prevalent, but it is not carried on to the extent that it was formerly; I may mention in this context that there is more injury done to the community by sly grog shops than by public-houses.
274. Did I understand you to say that a provision, if inserted in the law, enabling licences to be issued at a reduced fee would have the effect of getting rid of these shops? It would have a tendency that way; upon railway works and in the remote parts of the country it is a very common thing for people to increase their incomes by selling liquor, and it is very difficult to obtain a conviction.
275. Has not some of the liquor which has been obtained in Sydney for analysis been found to contain deleterious ingredients? Not sufficient to bring them under the operation of the Act; there are traces of fusel oil which are always found in what are called coarse spirits.
276. Can you tell us whether any steps have been taken to inspect the liquor sold in the wine and spirit stores? That would come within the Chief Inspector of Distilleries.
277. It has not been done by your order at any time? I think not.
278. I gather from your answer that you are under the impression that the Act confers the power to do it? Yes, there is power to obtain samples for analysis, but I am not certain that it has ever been used.
279. Have you any objections to do it? I should have no objection whatever.
280. The procuring of the sample is the main point; it will not do for an officer to walk in, in uniform, and say "We want so-and-so"? He would have to show his authority; and he would point to a particular cask and say "I want a sample of this."
281. Will you cause instructions to be issued that, as far as possible, samples of liquors shall be procured from all the wine and spirit stores in Sydney, and analyzed by the Government Analyst, so that we may get a report in due time? I shall most undoubtedly obey any request of the Commission in that regard, but I doubt whether the Government Analyst could find time to do all the work. There would be many hundreds of samples, and the process of analyzing is a tedious one.
282. Can you in any way assist the Commission, through your officers, in making discoveries as to the manufacture of spurious spirits in the city? I will make inquiry about it.
283. Can you make any suggestions as to the establishment of reformatories or asylums where persons addicted to drink might be made sober people? I think that if inebriate asylums were established, and they were properly conducted, they would work only good.
284. Do you favour the voluntary or the compulsory system? I believe in both—a mixed system. Many people who cannot abstain from taking intoxicating liquor come to me and tell me that they would voluntarily go to such an asylum. Many families are ruined because the heads of them will persist in drinking; and I think that it would be a beneficial act on the part of the State to cure them against their will, just as it would cure them of small-pox or any other disease.
285. If I understand you rightly, you believe that it would be wise on the part of the State to establish an asylum of the kind? I do.
286. With regard to the young people who, according to your report, are seen about the streets under the influence of liquor, do you think that it would be advisable to raise the age of persons to whom it is lawful to supply liquor? At present it is illegal to supply liquor to any person under the age of sixteen years, and I do not think it would do much good to raise the age, nor would it in operation be advantageous I think. There are many working lads who might take a glass of beer without hurting themselves, and I suppose that if they wanted it they would say that they were eighteen years of age, although they might be fourteen years only.
287. In your report you say mere boys and girls are commonly seen in the public streets at all hours of the day more or less under the influence of liquor—Have any steps been taken by your officers to secure convictions against the publicans who supply liquor to such young persons? I have no doubt that the returns—which could be produced if desired—would give that information. The officers in charge of the divisions could give more valuable information on the point than I can, because they can speak with certainty.
288. Are we to understand that the present Licensing Act is an improvement on the one which it superseded? In my opinion, decidedly yes.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Inspector Robert Anderson called in, sworn, and examined:—

289. President.] You are in charge of No. 1 station in the Metropolitan Division? Yes.
290. What is the range of that station? It is the Central Division, it extends from Hunter-street and Margaret-street to Liverpool-street; it is bounded by College-street on the east, and by Pyrmont on the west, including Pyrmont.
291. How long have you been in charge? For over eleven years.
292. Before being in charge of this station, were you employed in a similar capacity? I had charge of No. 4 division of the Northern Division for about seven years.
293. I presume, then, that as you have been in charge of this station, you have submitted certain reports to the Inspector-General of Police, with reference to the number of apprehensions for drunkenness, and for other offences of which drunkenness formed a part. Are you familiar with the last report of the Inspector-General of Police? I have only seen what appeared in the papers.
294. You have not seen the report itself? No.
295. Did you furnish any figures to the Inspector-General? Only the usual returns—the criminal statistics.
296. Are those statistics framed independently of your station? The officers under my direction assist in framing them.

Inspector R. Anderson.

15 Mar., 1886.

- Inspector
R. Anderson.
15 Mar, 1886.
297. But you are responsible for them? Yes.
298. You are able to give us the statistics for No. 1 Division? Yes, with regard to drunkenness, but I have not them with me now.
299. I am speaking with reference to the table on page 2 of the report? Yes.
300. You see there for five years the total apprehensions for all causes, and in the third column the apprehensions for drunkenness, or for offences of which drunkenness forms a part? Yes.
301. I suppose you are familiar with the various characters who are included in this report of the charges of drunkenness? Yes, generally speaking.
302. Is the list composed mainly or principally of old offenders? There are a great many old offenders, but not so many in my division now as formerly. A great many of the old buildings have been pulled down and new buildings have been erected, so that a great many of that class of offenders have been removed.
303. The Central Police Court is in your division? Yes.
304. Your offenders go to the Central Police Court? The cases north of King-street are tried at the Water Police Court.
305. And the others at the Central? Yes.
306. Have you any idea, in round numbers, how many of this total represent the quota for your own division? I have made some memoranda as to drunkenness. I find that in 1881 the drunkards—that is, the drunk, the drunk and disorderly, and the habitual drunkards, in my division—numbered 4,948. In 1882, after the present Act came into operation, there were 4,119, showing a decrease of 829. Last year the number was 3,149.
307. Could you fill in the papers for 1883 and 1884? Yes. You will see that there is a large decrease every year.
308. Does last year exhibit a decrease? Yes; the number was 3,149.
309. So that, as far as your division of the city is concerned, we may gather that the apprehensions for drunkenness, for habitual drunkenness, and for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, represent a decrease rather than an increase in late years? The decrease last year from 1881, the year before the Act came into operation, is 1,799.
310. Apparently then, the decrease is not carried out in the other divisions? There has been no increase in my division; on the contrary, there has been a decrease. As I said before, a good many old buildings have been pulled down and stores have been erected. I went to some trouble in the collection of figures which will perhaps throw some light upon the matter. I only received my summons on Saturday night, and I have not therefore had much time to obtain information. I have had two men employed in getting out the arrests from 12 to 3 o'clock on the morning in 1881, and during the same hours in 1885.
311. Mr. Davies.] What day do they refer to? Every day—all the year round. The number in 1881 was 843, and during the same hours last year 163, showing a decrease of 680.
312. President.] The erection of these new buildings to which you refer has involved a sort of eviction of the people? Yes; but that would not account for the whole of the decrease in my division. Buildings having been condemned by the municipal authorities—a good many persons have been driven out of the slums. Another return which I have had prepared shows a decrease in the number of persons who have been arrested for drunkenness on Sundays. In 1881 the number was 838; last year the number was 126, showing a decrease of 712; that decrease, together with the decrease of drunkards arrested between 12 and 3 a.m., accounts for 1,392 of the decrease of 1,799.
313. Mr. Tookey.] Do you not attribute the greater proportion of the decrease in the arrests on Sunday to the cause accounting for the decrease in the arrests between 12 and 3 a.m.—that is, the removal of a class of persons who have given considerable trouble to the police? I think that by far the greatest change has resulted from the 11 o'clock closing.
314. But do you not think that the removal of the poorer class of persons from your division, to which you have already referred, will account for a great many of the decrease in the arrests on Sunday between 1881 and 1885? It will of course account for some.
315. President.] Could you give us any further information as to the effect of the 11 o'clock closing in your division? It has effected a most marked and beneficial change. I never knew anything to effect such a change in Sydney during my thirty-two years' experience in the Force.
316. Do you think that the greater number of arrests between 12 and 3 o'clock was caused by the houses being opened after 11 o'clock? There is no doubt about that.
317. What are the offences in which drunkenness forms a part of the charge, in addition to those which you have already mentioned? Generally speaking, riotous behaviour.
318. What would the other arrests be for? I could not say what the return is made from; I took only the cases of the drunk, the drunk and disorderly, and of the habitual drunkards.
319. Coming back to the old offenders, you are pretty familiar with that class? Yes.
320. Have you any idea of what proportion of second or subsequent offences would be found in these figures? I could not give you any definite information upon that point. I have no doubt there are a great number who have been apprehended three or four times.
321. To what number do you think the arrests for 1885 would be reduced if the old offenders were deducted? I could not give you any definite information on that point.
322. We think it is probable that these figures may include the arrest of A B C or D (say) for perhaps the fiftieth time, and therefore it would not be fair to the community to represent these as the arrests of so many individuals? Of course not; but I could not give you any reliable information on the subject.
323. The same difficulty has been experienced by all inquirers into the subject of intemperance. These figures cannot be dissected, so that the community is represented as being really more intemperate than it is. Do you think it possible to dissect these figures in any way— from the gaol records, for instance? I say that the Inspector-General would be the only person who could give you the information.
324. He doubts the possibility of our obtaining the information? It might not be possible. For instance, a stranger, say a sailor, might be locked up at my station one day, at Newtown next week, and at North Shore the week afterwards.
325. Take the case of a notorious drunkard in Durands' Alley or any other slum—are there no such slums in your division? Not so bad as Durands' Alley in the old times. The worst localities I have are Fowler's Square, Washington-street, and streets off Bathurst-street.

326. Are there no people residing there? Not many; I would not like to fix a number, but I do not believe there are fifty of the resident population of my division who are habitual drunkards.
327. That shows pretty clearly that your division has been pretty well cleared out of the old offenders; I would not say that.
328. How many divisions are there in the Metropolitan District? There are seven officers in charge of divisions. There are the four city divisions, and then there is Mr. Larkins at Newtown, Mr. Potter at Redfern, and Mr. Cotter at North Shore.
329. Has the decrease of public-houses in your division been large? There has been a decrease of twenty-two since the Act came into force.
330. What class of houses were they? They were most of them a small class of house, with one exception—the Post Office Hotel in York-street—that was a large house; but it has been pulled down; Gardner & Co. are going to erect stores on the site.
331. Can you tell me what number of houses has been discontinued on account of the licenses not being renewed? I think about half of the number I have given.
332. Was the refusal to renew in those cases generally owing to the character of the house, or to any other reason? There was one owing to the character of the house—the house was in a dilapidated condition.
333. With regard to the houses now in existence, do you think there has been an improvement in their character—for instance, as to the accommodation? I think there has been a decided improvement in the houses generally. The accommodation, of course, was increased in all the houses, and a great many of the smaller houses had to make considerable additions; but I think there has been a great improvement generally, not so much in the smaller houses as in the larger houses.
334. As you are a man of large experience, what answer will you make to this question—The number of public-houses having decreased, do you think there has been, in your division, the same consumption of liquor? I do not think so.
335. Do you think there is less liquor consumed in the fewer houses? I am satisfied that there is much less liquor consumed, and it is due to a large extent to the closing of the houses between 11 and 12 o'clock. I know that that simple fact has affected the publicans considerably. I used to be about the largest drinking-places between those hours, and they were nearly always full and doing an immense business.
336. Do you think there is in your division any considerable amount of evasion of the prohibition against Sunday trading? There is a good deal in some of the lower houses.
337. It is in the lower houses? The small houses. The large houses give me very little trouble.
338. I suppose the lower class of public-houses is generally in the smaller streets? Yes; on the west side of the town and Pyrmont. There are not many houses on the eastern side of George-street which give me much trouble. I may mention that I have 145 public-houses in my division. I had 167 when the present Act came into force.
339. Have you proceeded against any of the Sunday liquor-sellers? I have.
340. Have you obtained convictions? On that point I have prepared some information. During the four years immediately prior to the passing of the present Act I had 673 convictions against publicans.
341. That, I suppose, was for all sorts of breaches of the law? Chiefly for Sunday selling.
342. Selling during prohibited hours? Yes, on Sunday, and after midnight on other days, but chiefly on Sunday. There were other offences, such as permitting gambling, though not much of that, and permitting disorderly conduct. There were 641 convictions, twelve cases were dismissed, and twenty were withdrawn; the proportion of dismissals being less than 2 per cent. During the four years since the passing of the present Act, namely, 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885, there were 280 cases.
343. For the whole of that period? Yes.
344. Mr. Toohy.] The figures you gave first have reference to 1881? Yes, and to the three previous years. I have taken four years prior to the passing of the Act and four years subsequently, for the purpose of making a comparison. During the former period there were 673 cases. During the latter period there were 280 cases. In 197 cases there were convictions; forty-six cases were dismissed, and thirty-seven were withdrawn. The dismissals amounted to over 16 per cent.
345. President.] Do you consider that the means of obtaining convictions were as great during the first four years as during the second four years; that is to say, had you the same facilities under the old Licensing Act as you have under the present Act? No, we had not the same power of entry as we have under the present Act.
346. Do you consider that the law is much evaded by publicans in your division? Yes. I classify my hotels in this way. I put them into three divisions. In the first I have thirteen first-class hotels with large accommodation; one or two of these do a little selling on Sunday, but very little. There are fifty second-class hotels; that is, hotels where there is a very large bar business done, or where there is pretty fair accommodation for the public; thirty-eight of these observe the law, and twelve do more or less business on Sunday.
347. You mean by that that they evade the Act? Yes, more or less, and thirty-eight, as far as we know, observe the law. I have eighty-two third-class hotels, of which seven observe the law and seventy-five do business more or less on Sunday. That is the class of houses we have all the trouble with in my division. They vary considerably however; some of them will try and sell for two or three Sundays and then leave off for a while.
348. Very nearly one-half then of the publicans in your division evade the law? More than one-half. About fifty-seven observe the law, and eighty-nine break it. Some of the eighty-nine, however, do very little business on Sunday.
349. Then considerably more than one-half evade the law? Yes.
350. What precautions do those publicans take to escape detection? They take the most extraordinary precautions that it is possible to conceive. In some cases the publican admits all the customers himself, and he will admit none but regular customers, and then only one at a time. In other cases, the publicans have touts out in all directions, watching for the police, and at the approach of one of the inspectors appointed under the Act, who are as well-known as I am, a signal is given before he gets within 200 yards of the house, and of course if the inspector asks for admission, all signs of the consumption of liquor are removed, so that there is no evidence on which to found a prosecution with any chance of obtaining a conviction. In one case, a publican's wife used to carry out liquor in a pocket in front of her. Well, it would not do for a constable to take hold of a woman and search her for liquor under those circumstances; at all events, I should not ask him to do so. We try every possible means of detection. We change the men, getting strange men from the other divisions, but the law-breaking publican seems to have an instinctive knowledge of a policeman. No matter how he may be dressed, they know him. In the case of those publicans who take the precaution of admitting only customers they know, it is impossible for a policeman to get in. Sometimes an officer gets in along with a number of others who are admitted, but if the publican is summoned, he produces three or four witnesses who swear in direct opposition to the constable. A stranger, a very respectable young fellow, who came here with high credentials, and who was 5½ years in the Irish Constabulary, got into a public-house with six others one Sunday morning. The publican himself went behind the bar and served four of the men, but when he came to the constable and asked him what he would have, the constable said, "Nothing: I am a constable." Two of the men who had been served with liquor went out and got over a back fence, where they were detained by Sergeant Flaherty, who was in waiting, and who obtained from them their names and addresses. One said that he lived at Parramatta, and the other that he lived in Kent-street. Summonses were taken out against them, but they could not be found at the addresses they had given. When the case against the publican came on for hearing, the publican swore that he went behind the bar to tell the men that he could not serve them. His wife also, although she was not present at all, swore that there was no liquor served, and three of the men who were there were called and swore that no liquor was served. The solicitor who conducted the defence did not impugn the testimony of the constable in the least, but simply said, "I have a certain defence to make." The perjury committed during the last two years has been something shocking.

351. And was that his defence? Yes, that no liquor had been served.

352. What was the result? The case was dismissed.

353. Mr. Toohy.] Do you believe that all those persons committed perjury, and that the constable did not? I believe that the constable told the truth. The solicitor did not question him upon his evidence.

354. President.] Were the two men who left the house drunk? No; they were sober, as far as I know. I did not see them myself.

355. Is that a common case? There have been many cases of somewhat similar nature. Our men simply go in plain clothes, and if they are asked to drink they must refuse. We are handicapped in that way. Only last Thursday I employed another young man who had been highly recommended, and who had been five years in the Irish Constabulary. He managed to get into a public-house with some others, but because he wore a cap like those worn by ships' stewards, a great defence was made out of the circumstance. It was said that he wore a sailor's cap and was deceiving the publican. The solicitor for the defence enlarged upon that for a considerable time; in fact, it was his great defence. We send the constables out in plain clothes, but we never attempt to disguise them. I dare say that if we disguised them as soldiers or sailors, or coal-heavers, we might get a conviction in many cases where we cannot get one now, but I should not like to resort to anything of the kind.

356. Mr. Fowler.] It has been tried? Not by me. I never send a man dressed otherwise than in plain clothes. Of course it would be no use a man's going in uniform.

357. Mr. Toohy.] Does not the infraction of the law by unworthy publicans cause it to be evaded by others who are desirous of keeping it? Yes, in many cases; of that I am satisfied.

358. Because they would lose their week-day trade if they did not serve on Sunday? Yes.

359. President.] Do you mean in the same class of low houses? No.

360. Do you mean to say that when the keeper of a low-class house systematically evades the law, his example is likely to be followed by a publican of good reputation? It has been so, I can assure you.

361. Mr. Toohy.] In order to protect their trade? Yes. I may mention that at one time—I think it was in the latter part of 1883—Mr. Dillon, Stipendiary Magistrate, announced from the Bench that those publicans who systematically evaded the law should have the renewal of their licenses refused. I and other officers had those publicans who had been conspicuous for breaking the law closely watched, and at the annual licensing meeting in June, 1884, we opposed the renewal of the licenses of a number of them. I opposed ten, five at the Water Police Court and five at the Central Police Court. At that time, as far as we could see, there were only about seventeen publicans doing anything like a large Sunday business. I opposed ten of the worst; but I am sorry to say that the Magistrates would not entertain our objections, because we could not prove three convictions. Strong evidence was given in all those cases. In one case, in which the publican had had his license only two months, the evidence was that he had been convicted of allowing gambling in his house, that a prosecution for Sunday selling was pending against him, that a continual stream of people used to enter and leave his house on Sundays, some of them being of the vagrant class; that two of that class had been found in his house very much the worse for drink; but still he got a renewal of his license. At the Central Police Court the Magistrates asked if there were any convictions, and I said there were some, but not three. In the first case I had at that Court, the evidence was that the publican had two convictions recorded against him, one for selling on Sunday, and the other for allowing gambling in his house; that a large number of persons used to go in and out of his house on Sundays; and that persons had been seen to enter sober and to leave the worse for drink; but the license was granted.

362. President.] Do you think there is any disinclination on the part of the licensing Magistrates to refuse the renewal of a license? I should be sorry to attach any blame to the Magistrates. I believe they think they have not the power to refuse unless there are three previous convictions recorded against the publican, but I hold that under the latter portion of section 36 of the Act they have that power. If they have not that power I think they ought to have it, because if the publicans who systematically break the law knew that they would be liable to lose their licenses they would soon cease to break the law.

363. You speak of the systematic evasion of the law, and you draw attention to the objections which may be taken under section 36. Of course the systematic evasion of the law is not one of those objections in the terms you use. Now, do you not think it probable that the Magistrates consider that systematic evasion of the law applies only to cases where there have been convictions for breaches of the law? They evidently take that view.

364. Of course the Magistrates may refuse for any cause not being frivolous or vexatious: do you consider your objection to come within that class? On such evidence as I have mentioned, yes.

365. But in those cases there is no evidence of the first class, that is convictions—We cannot assume, for judicial purposes, that the law is broken unless there is a conviction; the proper evidence of a breach of the law is proof of it, and the proper proof is a conviction; is that not so? Yes.

366. The cases you mention are not those in which you can show that there have been convictions, but in which you can show very strong proof without conviction? Yes.

367. What is the nature of the proof you have brought before the Magistrates; have you done more than say this, supposing you are appearing yourself:—"This man, your worships, has not been convicted, because he is too clever to be caught, but he is constantly evading the law"—What do the Magistrates say to that? They ask if we have any convictions to show.

368. Then they come back to the convictions? Yes.

369. And they will not take your objection as one of a frivolous or vexatious character? They simply ask for convictions; I do not know what they may think. But I think the Act is clear enough: "Provided always that upon any application whether for the grant renewal removal or transfer of a license any objection whatsoever not being a frivolous or vexatious objection may be taken which appears to the Licensing Court or Magistrate to be sufficient." I think that gives them the power; if it does not, it should be made clear. I know that I have done my very utmost, and I could not do more than I have done, unless those publicans who watch the police in the systematic manner I have described, are refused the renewal of their licenses. Many of those publicans are men of good character, and I could not say anything against them, except that they do business on Sundays.

370. Mr. Toohy.] If such evidence as you propose to give were accepted, would it not place too much power in the hands of the inspectors? Perhaps you will allow me to explain further. In June, 1884, there were only about seventeen public-houses doing much of a business on Sundays. After the magistrates refused to entertain the objections of which I have spoken, the law-breaking publicans were jubilant, while the others, and I may mention it to their honor, were dismayed. At the time I speak of, I had more complaints from the respectable hotel-keepers than from any other class in the community. They were very deeply grieved, as I was myself. The following Sunday there were about forty public-houses doing business; afterwards the number increased to eighty or ninety, and, as Mr. Toohy remarked, many were doing it in self-defence.

371. Mr. Fowler.] How many licenses have been cancelled in your division? I cannot tell you just now; I think the number is eleven.

372. President.] Could you ascertain for us the actual number of licenses which have been cancelled, and for what reason? Yes.

373. With regard to publicans of bad repute, the Magistrates do not consider the character you give certain publicans as amounting to bad repute? No, because the houses are well conducted on week-days.

374. But they are ill conducted on Sundays? I do not know that you can say that a man is of bad repute because of that.

375. No; I only ask you whether the reputation they have of selling on Sundays is regarded as amounting to bad repute; you do not think so? No; the objection is that, owing to the systematic manner in which they watched the police, we were certain that they were doing a large Sunday business.

376. In those cases you say that you are practically foiled by the cunning of the publicans? Yes; without resorting to means which I should be sorry to see resorted to in a British community we cannot get convictions.

377. Do you think that the section in the English Licensing Act which throws upon persons found in a licensed public-house the onus of proving that they are there for a lawful purpose would facilitate the obtaining of convictions? Yes; but I hold that the publican should also be liable under that section.

378. It could hardly apply to the publicans? I think that section would help us very materially. I think also that it would be better if the Magistrates were not bound down in any way. I may say that the provision in our Act as to three convictions leads to a great deal of perjury. A publican may be three times convicted, and yet not deserve to lose his license. The offences may be very simple ones; for instance, his servant may serve a man before 6 o'clock in the morning, or his wife may serve some one after 11 o'clock at night; those would be very simple offences. I should like to see that provision struck out of the Act altogether, and the Magistrates allowed full power to act according to their own discretion; I would not tie their hands in any way. A simple man might be convicted three times and have his license cancelled in consequence, while against another man who gave us a great deal of trouble we might never get a conviction at all.

379. Mr. Fowler.] When there have been two convictions, numbers of publicans sell out, do they not? Yes; that is the stage in which I like to get them, because they observe the law after that.

380. Mr. Withers.] Do you not think the effect of abolishing the provision relating to three convictions would be to make the publicans more lax as regards selling during prohibited hours? I do not think so. We have no trouble with them after 11 o'clock. The seventy-five houses that I have mentioned as doing business on Sunday are not open ten minutes after 11 o'clock.

381. You admit that the closing of the public-houses at 11 o'clock has been of public advantage? It has done more good than the Sunday-closing provision, in my opinion. The streets now at 12 o'clock are as quiet as possible; whereas formerly 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning used to be the time for withdrawing men from special duty in the vicinity of some public-houses.

382. President.] Then, in addition to some such provision as that in the English Act to which I have referred, you would give the Magistrates larger discretionary powers? Yes.

383. Would it be an unrestricted discretion? Yes; I am sure the Magistrates would not be guilty of any act of injustice, and I am satisfied that nothing else will put down Sunday selling.

384. Mr. Fowler.] How are they restricted at present? By the provision as to three convictions. I feel sure the Magistrates imagine that, unless there have been three convictions, they have no power to deprive a man of his license, on the suspicion of doing business on Sunday—however strong.

385. President.] But there are numerous objections upon which they can refuse the renewal of a license. The same objections may be taken in the case of removal or transfer as in the case of a new license, and there is a whole list of objections which may be taken. If your view were adopted, there would be no need to specify any, because the matter would be left to the uncontrolled discretion of the Magistrates? Under the old Act I had a great many licenses cancelled, under the general objection that the houses were badly conducted. I had thirteen refused at one licensing meeting under that objection.

386. You produced evidence? Yes.

387. Then that was not evidence of a conviction? No.

388. There had been convictions, but it was not so much a matter of convictions as of bad conduct.

Inspector R. Anderson. You could bring that in of course under the present law; evidence of drunkenness, or dissolute habits, or being of bad repute, would cover the whole object? No, there are many publicans who sell on Sunday who I do not consider to be men of bad repute. It is a matter of what evidence the Magistrates will act upon; they refuse to act upon anything but convictions.

15 Mar., 1886.

389. You would like them to act upon your statements of fact, after such inquiry as they choose to make? We see as many as eighty persons going into a public-house in an hour on a Sunday, and we see some come away worse for drink, and this is going on whilst other houses are doing no trade at all. I think it is common sense to say that those houses are doing business.

390. Mr. Davies.] Under the old Act or the new Act? Under the new Act.

391. President.] When you object to a renewal and you state that in the case of this house eighty men have been seen going in on a Sunday, some coming out worse for liquor, does the Magistrate refuse to take any notice? Yes.

392. They absolutely refuse? In one case there were two convictions. Some were going in sober and coming out worse for liquor.

393. That was a sworn statement made to the Magistrate? A sworn statement made by one of our sergeants.

394. Then no notice was taken of it? The renewal was granted.

395. Was this at a special licensing sitting? It was at the annual meeting for the renewal of licenses.

396. Mr. Toohey.] In 1882 or 1883? In 1884. When we failed in these objections, that was the time when all the difficulty commenced.

397. Mr. Butler.] Do you remember who was on the Bench? I think Mr. Addison was Chairman at the Water Police Court, and Mr. Clarke at the Central. I do not blame the Magistrates; I believe they thought they had not the power to refuse a license except when there had been three convictions. Mr. Dillon said distinctly from the Bench that those who watched the police, and against whom there was evidence of evading the law, would not get their licenses renewed.

398. Mr. Davies.] Mr. Dillon had left the Bench? I am sorry to say that he had left the Bench before these cases came on.

399. President.] Do you think the total prohibition of liquor-selling on Sunday has a tendency to increase drunkenness on Saturdays, and to send many people to the suburbs on Sundays in quest of liquor? I could not say, because my attention is solely directed to the centre of the town.

400. Are you aware, or are you not, that there is a great influx of drinking people into the suburbs on Sundays? From what I have heard; but my attention is taken up with the town—I never go further than Pyrmont.

401. Do you think that in your district the operation of the Act has been to extinguish the worst classes of houses and to encourage the better class? I am thoroughly satisfied that it has that effect.

402. Have you any suggestion to make with regard to the punishment of drunkenness—do you think the punishment under the Act is sufficiently severe? I think so.

403. Do you think the punishment which is inflicted now is a deterrent? I question whether it is very much.

404. It is seven days or 20s. for the first offence? Yes.

405. You would not be prepared to increase the severity of the law? No.

406. With regard to drunkenness amongst youth, have you noticed any increase in juvenile drunkenness? Very much.

407. In your division? Well, there are not so many living in my division, but a great many come into it. I have frequently noticed young lads and young girls the worse for liquor. I believe I am correct in saying that when I joined the Police Force, thirty-two years ago, not one in a thousand of the native boys ever tasted any kind of intoxicating liquor.

408. And now? I am sorry to say that a very great many mere boys are now in the habit of drinking. I have seen them frequently standing at bars—mere boys, seventeen or eighteen years of age.

409. Mr. Toohey.] Yet drink was much more easily procured then than it is now? I do not know.

410. They were not so much restricted? There was an Act in existence then which I should like to see in existence now. I have mentioned the improvement which has been effected by the closing of the houses at 11 o'clock. I should be very glad to see the eighty-two houses I have mentioned closed at 10 o'clock. I am satisfied that if they were closed at that hour we should see an improvement corresponding to that which has been caused by the closing of the houses at 11 o'clock. When I joined the Force only a certain number of houses were allowed to be kept open till 12 o'clock, the others closing at 10 o'clock.

411. President.] Have you many dancing saloons in your division? There are three or four at the present time.

412. Are they a source of much mischief? I could not say much against those I have at present. I have them kept under close observation, and if there is anything wrong I take proceedings against them and get rid of them. No doubt they are a source of great evil.

413. Mr. Toohey.] Do you not think the initiation of picnics down the harbour has a tendency to increase drunkenness and immorality amongst youth? I have no doubt that some of those promiscuous gatherings where the youth of both sexes meet do lead to drunkenness.

414. President.] Have you noticed any increase of female drunkenness? Yes, amongst young people.

415. I speak of adults? No, I cannot say I have. It is only within the last eight years that I have seen young women seventeen or eighteen years of age rolling about in Sydney the worse for liquor.

416. Do not women form a fair proportion of the apprehensions? No, I think not so much as one-fourth.

417. What do you think would be the proportion of juveniles under eighteen or nineteen? Well, not a very large number, because, although they may be the worse for liquor we do not lock them up. I think it would be a great pity to lock them up, especially young girls, when there is any one to take charge of them. If we see an unfortunate girl in that state, we would rather allow her friends to take her away than lock her up.

418. There are in some of the hotels double bars or up-stairs bars? Yes; I took a note of that. Those bars do more harm than Sunday selling.

Inspector
R. Anderson.

419. Will you give us a description of them? There are thirteen of these bars in my district. Some of them I should be sorry to say a word against, but, from reports which have been made to me and from what I myself observed, some of them are very bad. Last Saturday night fortnight I saw, at a place where there is a sort of balcony over the street, a man and a woman come out of a bar and behave in a most disgraceful manner. Last Saturday night I went into one of these places, and I found in a little bar a woman grandly done up, with a young fellow, lahdi-dahing over the counter, and there were two other females sitting with two men, and two other women in a back room, evidently waiting for more men.
420. What class of women do you consider they belong to? I do not think their characters were by any means good.
421. You thought they were dissolute women? I have no doubt in my own mind that they were.
422. Mr. Toohy.] Do you not think that, if proper representations were made, the Magistrates might refuse the licenses of such houses? I do not think so. There ought to be no bar up-stairs at all. None of the respectable publicans would object to that.
423. President.] You would recommend that the licenses of the publicans should be restricted to a single bar? No, I would not care if they were down-stairs. I think two bars, a public and a private bar, quite enough. I have no objection to private bars, but I would have no bars up-stairs.
424. Mr. Withers.] There would be no objection if there were no barmaids? I have watched the people go in, and I am sure it cannot be the amount which they spend in drink that pays.
425. Mr. Toohy.] I suppose they are small additions like the old Prince of Wales Café? Yes; in the case I have referred to there were five barmaids and three visitors.
426. President.] Are these bars let? I believe they are. They deny it; but I have no doubt that there are several of them let. I have been informed that an up-stairs bar was let for £12 a week. Many of the leading hotelkeepers have complained about this class of houses.
427. Is there any Sunday business done in the up-stairs bars? Not very much. They may have their own favourites, but they do very little.
428. Are you aware of any so-called clubs having been established in your division for the purpose of evading the law? No, I do not think there are any.
429. Clubs with a nominal charge for admission? No.
430. Have you had any experience of the packet-licensing system? No, that does not come under my supervision. The water-police could give you any information on that subject.
431. Are there any colonial wine licenses in your division? Yes.
432. What have you to say about them? They are very fairly conducted; there are none I could say much against.
433. I suppose you have had some experience of the liquor trade in other parts of the world besides in this Colony? I have been in other parts.
434. Do you think the establishment of houses for the sale of light beers would be an advantage or not—do you know the ale and beer houses in England? Yes; they are numerous.
435. Some people think they are really established in the interests of temperance—do you think it would be a useful kind of license to have here? I believe it would. I was two Sundays in London four years ago, and I noticed that in the beer-houses I could see very little drunkenness.
436. You know that the Germans are said to drink a large amount of beer, though they do not get drunk; do you think that the use of beers such as they drink should be encouraged in this Colony? I think it would be well worthy of a trial—we might have ale and porter licenses. Many of the third-class houses in my division ought to have nothing but ale and porter licenses, and they ought to close at 10 o'clock. I believe it would lessen drunkenness very much.
437. Do you think that in this climate the natural inclination of a man who is hard-worked and thirsty is to quench his thirst with light ale, or with some intoxicant such as whisky and water? For the working-classes I think beer is the best beverage. I have a pretty extensive observation of the working-men about the wharves, and beer is their favourite drink; some drink rum.
438. No gin? No.
439. And not whisky? No; the favourite drinks with them are beer and rum.
440. That is to say, the liquor that has the least alcohol and that which has the most? Yes.
441. As you have paid a large attention to the subject, I will ask you this: Do you think that the institution by the State of Asylums for Inebriates would be an advantage? I think it would; I have often thought so. I have known men who ought to have been put under some control to prevent them from ruining themselves and their families. I think it would be an excellent thing—it would be a grand institution.
442. Do you mean an institution to which they could go voluntarily, or to which their families could send them? I mean an institution to which they could go voluntarily, or to which they might be sent.
443. I suppose you have no practical knowledge of the working of them? I have read of some which have been established in America, and which have done a vast deal of good.
444. Do you think that much of the drunkenness that we deplore here is caused by bad and unwholesome liquor; that is to say, liquor which has been adulterated by some foreign substance, and liquor in such a state that it is unripened and too new? I do not believe there is much adulteration. There are spirits sold which have not been matured; I think that is about the worst that can be said.
445. It has not come under your notice that much drunkenness has been caused by adulteration? I do not think it is.
446. Do you think that much drunkenness is caused by unwholesome liquor? Much of the whisky, rum, and brandy is not good; it contains a quantity of fusel oil.
447. But brandy if made from the grape ought not to contain fusel oil? I believe that much of the brandy that is imported is of a very inferior kind.
448. This is the last question that I will put—it has reference to a matter which divides public opinion intensely—it is as to the efficacy of local option. From your knowledge of the people and their habits, do you think they will submit to any measure which will prevent them from getting any liquor at all within your division—do you think they would submit to a law which would prevent them from getting liquor not merely on Sundays but on all days of the week? I am certain that we have not arrived at that stage yet.
449. Then in what direction do you think legislation ought to proceed to reduce intemperance? I think that the number of licensed houses ought to be still further reduced.

Inspector
R. Anderson.
15 Mar., 1886.

450. Then you think there are too many in your division? Yes; for instance, there are eleven public-houses around the Theatre Royal. Can any one say that they are all required?
451. That is in several streets? In King and Castlereagh Streets.
452. When the renewal of the licenses is applied for, is no objection taken on the ground of the houses not being wanted? The Act does not authorize that objection to be taken. I think we cannot object to a renewal on that ground; at all events, we never object to the renewal of a license on the ground that the house is not required. I objected to the renewal of the licenses of two of these houses on the ground that they had not the necessary accommodation, but the owners got them patched up so as to comply with the Act. That was at the last annual licensing meeting. One of the houses was in King-street, and the other was in Castlereagh-street. In that locality the licensed houses are too numerous—out of all proportion to the requirements of the people. I have noticed that when a public-house was established where it was not required, there has always been an increase of drunkenness in that place.
453. Mr. Colls.] I think I understood you to say that you are Inspector of Hotels in your division? Yes.
454. I see that by the Act the hotel-keepers are compelled to have a certain space of air in each room? Yes.
455. When you go through these hotels do you ever notice how many beds there are in each room? I do not trouble the large hotels.
456. I am speaking of the small places? If any one went to ask for a bed in one of the small hotels he could not get one—they are mere drinking-shops.
457. If half a dozen people went for accommodation? They could not get it.
458. Still they are allowed to hold a license? I have summoned them; but they get it all patched up before the summons comes on, and there is an end of the matter.
459. Does it ever come under your notice that a great deal of drinking is carried on in houses of ill fame? I have banished them from my division. I believe there are only one or two in the whole of it. I have no doubt, from what I have heard, that there is a deal of drinking in those houses.
460. You have been led to believe that drink has been sold in those houses? Yes.
461. You are under the impression that these up-stairs bars are re-let by the hotel proprietors? Some, I believe, are.
462. And the parties who serve in them are not the best of characters? No. I may mention that one of the women that I found in that place last Saturday was refused a publican's license, on the ground of character.
463. Of course you go round and test the liquors? I have not done so lately. It has been done at various times, but we have found nothing to complain of except that the spirits have been of an inferior class.
464. You spoke of a number of houses close to the theatre: have they all private bars? Four of them have private bars up-stairs.
465. One each? Only one upstairs. Of course they have a public bar also.
466. Have you anything to complain of with regard to the wine-shops? Not in my division. At present there is really nothing to complain of.
467. The keepers of the shops restrict themselves to the sale of wine? Yes.
468. Mr. Withers.] You have admitted that the closing of public-houses at 11 o'clock at night has been a great advantage, in the way of reducing the drinking customs of young people who are disposed to remain out late at nights? Yes.
469. You have evidence of that in the fact that public-houses have frequently to be cleared at 11 o'clock of a number of persons who otherwise would remain till midnight or later? Yes.
470. It is admitted that in most of the public-houses drink is sold on Sundays—Is there ever any disorder at these houses, compared with what there was when the houses were allowed to be open? There is no disorder, or very little, about the houses which do business on Sundays.
471. I suppose it is quite the reverse, as the business is done in secret? It is done as secretly and quietly as possible.
472. Have you had to arrest any drunken men in public-houses on Sundays since the new Act came into force? As far as I know, I do not think that we have arrested one.
473. Was it not a common thing under the old law? Yes. I devoted my time yesterday to looking over my books, and I found that on Sunday, 10th April, 1881, thirty-two "drunks" were arrested and locked up in my division. For the first two years under the present Act I had an average of about only one "drunk" per Sunday. I cannot speak positively as to the exact average, because I did not go into the figures very closely, but I know that the smallness of the numbers was a matter of common remark.
474. These "drunks" would be a nuisance to children going to Sunday School, and to other persons who might be passing the premises? Yes.
475. Admitting that the law relating to Sunday trading is broken, you say that no such disorder comes under the notice of the police now? Not in the houses. Sometimes you will see people the worse for drink who are behaving themselves in a disorderly manner, but nothing to the extent that you would have before. If you were to take a walk around my division on a Sunday you would find things very quiet; you would rarely hear any disturbance; still you would see people admitted into public-houses to get drink.
476. Occasionally you see drunken men about the streets on Sundays, and you presume that they have got drunk at public-houses? Yes.
477. Is the new Act, as far as the Sunday closing is concerned, an improvement on the old Act? It is a vast improvement; I think that during the time it has been in existence it has done a vast deal of good.
478. The old Benches of Magistrates were disposed to grant licenses more freely than the present Licensing Courts are? Yes, they were more ready to grant licenses—some of them.
479. Do not you think that it would act as a deterrent to habitual drunkenness if persons addicted to it were employed on some public work for a short time instead of being fined? For the second offence, I would approve of the offender being made to sweep the streets, or put to some other kind of work which would have associated with it a certain amount of degradation. I would not increase the fines.
480. Suppose the Government were to determine to cut a road along the sea-shore between here and Newcastle, do not you think that it would be a good thing to sentence habitual "drunks" to a week's or a fortnight's hard labour on such work, and thus relieve the law-abiding section of the community to a certain extent of the expense of supporting them. I think that all "drunks" ought to do something to maintain themselves.
- 481.

481. Would it not be better to adopt this plan, and let the wives and families of the offenders have the benefit of the money which otherwise would be paid in fines? The plan is worthy of a trial. I have heard that it is adopted in America; there the "drunks" have to act as scavengers. I do not think that a man deserves much consideration if he gets drunk after having been once punished for the offence. An increase of the money penalty will not have much deterrent effect. Inspector
R. Anderson.
15 Mar., 1886.
482. Do you think that the plan which I suggest would have a deterrent effect? Yes.
483. And that it would be more equitable to the unfortunate families and to the public, even if the offenders were allowed a small sum of money for the time that they worked? I do.
484. Is the provision of the law which forbids publicans to supply liquor to habitual "drunks" ever acted on? In country districts it is; but it would be impossible to apply it in Sydney.
485. Are you not aware that the space in the bars of many of the hotels is so limited that they become crowded, and it is impossible to go in with a friend to transact any business? Many of them are simply drinking-saloons.
486. Do not you think that in such cases discretionary power ought to be given to the Magistrates to allow a room up-stairs to be converted into a bar. If barmaids were precluded from serving at private bars established under such circumstances do not you think that the bars would be of service to the public? I would not object to a bar up-stairs, so long as there were no females employed there. You would not have any of the work that is going on now in connection with these private bars if there were barmen only in attendance. I would be inclined to give Magistrates very great discretionary powers—that ought to be made quite clear. I know that there is nothing which reduces drunkenness so much as the refusal of the Licensing Courts to renew licenses. I know that one refusal to renew a license has more effect than twenty or even 100 heavy fines—I am thoroughly satisfied of that.
487. You know that there are a number of assignation houses in the city? Yes.
488. I suppose that a quantity of drink is consumed in these places? I have heard so; I have no doubt that there is.
489. There is no provision in the law to get rid of these places, unless the habitués become an open nuisance by reason of their conduct? I may be permitted to point out a serious defect in the Act with regard to these places. Under the 30th section of the old Act, shops, houses, rooms, and all places of public resort, were included in what is now the 87th section, which applies only to licensed houses. Under the old Act we could reach all places where prostitutes assembled, but we are powerless now except in the case of public-houses. There is a vile den in King-street where a large number of prostitutes assemble nightly. There is nothing to hinder any man from opening a place where 100 prostitutes might assemble—there is no law which could touch him. I did more under the 30th section of the old Act to thrash rascality out of the city than by any other means.
490. What section of the present Act is the nearest in effect to that section? The 87th. If the words "also every keeper of a shop room or place of public resort" were introduced into that section, it would be a most beneficial improvement.
491. You say that as the law stands you cannot deal with these places? I tell you that there is a vile den in King-street, and I can do nothing in the matter.
492. There are a number of such places, are there not? Only one in my division, and I should be glad if I had the power to get rid of it.
493. Are you aware that young girls who get under the influence of liquor at parties and balls—respectable gatherings, Mayor's balls, and the like—are taken to these places by men who induce them to leave early, on the pretence that they will see them home? There is no place of that class in my division. There are eating-houses to which prostitutes go after 11 o'clock. Our hands are greatly tied for want of the provision to which I refer.
494. Mr. Colls.] You cannot demand admission to these places? No.
495. Mr. Withers.] A good deal of inquiry was made by the President with regard to the old vagrants who put in an appearance so frequently at the Courts. I suppose the same thing occurred under the old law? Yes, just the same as under the new law.
496. Mr. Colls.] Have you had many cases of sly grog selling in your division? A good number. I had one about two months ago in connection with one of these places where disreputable characters assemble, and a fine of £30 was imposed.
497. Do not you think that imprisonment for six or twelve months would have a more deterrent effect than a fine? It might; I am satisfied that it would in the country districts.
498. Mr. Fowler.] I understood you to say that there was a difficulty in securing convictions in almost clear cases? Yes.
499. Can you suggest any means by which the defaulting publicans may be reached? I cannot see how you can reach those who adopt the extreme caution of admitting regular customers only.
500. Do not you think that you could reach them if the onus of proof that people were assembled in the hotels for a lawful purpose were thrown on the licensees instead of the police? I have heard such terrible perjury committed in the Courts that I am satisfied that they would swear that no drink was supplied.
501. You do not think that that would have any effect? It might, but I really think that it would only lead to further perjury. My great remedy is refusal to renew the licenses. It is only a small fraction of the publicans in my division, I am proud to say, who resist the law in that way.
502. Have you ever heard of the police visiting public-houses and obtaining samples of the liquors sold? Under the old Act, I sent men on various occasions to get samples of liquors from hotels where I thought that the stuff sold would not be very good, but I have not done so under the new Act.
503. Has it been done at all under the new Act? Yes; Inspector Lenthall has obtained samples on various occasions.
504. What did he do with them? He sent them to Professor Watt.
505. Have you heard the result of the analyses? I do not think that in any case anything in the shape of adulteration was discovered. There were very inferior and new spirits, containing fusel oil; I think that was the extent of the adulteration.
506. Mr. Hyam.] Were you in the Colony at the time when licenses to sell colonial wine and beer were issued? No.
507. Do you think that it would be advisable to issue such licenses now—licenses under which spirits could not be sold? I believe such a system would be beneficial—I am sure it would, especially in the case of the smaller public-houses. I firmly believe that it would have a tendency to lessen drunkenness—at all events it is worthy of a trial.

- Inspector R. Anderson. 508. You say that you have frequently visited the colonial-wine houses? Yes.
- 15 Mar., 1886. 509. Do you think that these houses are beneficial to the community or otherwise? I feel sure that some of them are—those where a glass of good, wholesome wine can be obtained. Take Mr. Wilkinson's establishment, off George-street. I have been there two or three times, and, judging from the class of people whom I have seen there, and from reports which have reached me, I believe that good, wholesome wine is to be obtained there. Places of that kind must be very beneficial, I think.
510. There are some wine-shops in Clarence-street—have you ever visited them? I have been at the doors; I have had them under observation, and such like.
511. As a rule, do they sell a fairly good sample of colonial wine at these shops? I have never heard of any inferior wine being retailed in them—I have never had any report to that effect.
512. You seem rather to object to the discontinuance of the private bars at public-houses? I should not object to them if they were down-stairs.
513. You think it desirable that there should be bars where friends could go and have a drink and talk on business matters, without having to talk before every Tom, Dick, or Harry? Some of the private bars have very little accommodation—not so much as they ought to have.
514. Is it not a fact that in those private bars a higher price is charged for drinks than at ordinary bars? They are called sixpenny bars.
515. Is not the drink supplied at these bars usually of a better quality than that supplied at the ordinary bars? Yes. I would not allow any barmaid to be employed in a private bar, excepting, it may be, the daughter of the publican. I am satisfied such a rule would do good.
516. Do you object to the employment of barmaids generally? I would not object to them in public bars, where you can see everything that is going on, but I would not have them in private bars, except, as I said just now, they were daughters of the licensees. I know that many young men have been ruined in these dens. Only the other day a worthy citizen told me that a nephew of his and other young men had been ruined by their being robbed at these places, and by their expenditure on presents to these barmaids. The mischief in connection with these private bars which has come under my observation is something overwhelming.
517. Although the number of apprehensions for drunkenness is very large, I suppose that it has come under your notice that a great many drunken people are not arrested? A great number.
518. I suppose the police are allowed a certain amount of discretion: if they see a man, even though he is considerably under the influence of liquor, going along without creating any disorder or annoying any one they do not arrest him? I gave my men strict orders not to arrest any man or woman for drunkenness if he or she is able to go away, or if any respectable person offers to take care of him or her.
519. From that we may infer that there are a great many more people who drink to excess than is given in these figures? There is no doubt that a great many people who get very much the worse for drink are not arrested.
520. Mr. Toohy.] You told us, in answer to Mr. Withers, that you thought it would be a wise thing to make "drunks" do hard work instead of fining them? Yes, for a short period.
521. That applies, I presume, to what are known as regular "drunks"? I would not apply it to the first offence.
522. Nor the second, if the time intervening between the two was considerable? There again I would leave large discretionary power in the hands of the Magistrates.
523. You say that thirty-two years ago the habit of drunkenness in youth was utterly unknown here? It really was.
524. Has the habit of intemperance in youths, as far as you have been able to observe, been increased by some influence outside the actual retailing of liquors—have not other associations brought about the existing state of things as much as the sale of liquors or beers has? I would not undertake to say.
525. From your experience what do you think? Most of the young lads and girls whom I have seen drinking are those who are engaged in tobacco factories and places of that kind. At the time I speak of there were no such factories in existence.
526. And no big picnics either? No.
527. You say that on April 10th, 1881, you had a large number of arrests? Yes, there were thirty-two arrests for drunkenness in my division.
528. The previous day being Saturday, was there any peculiar circumstance about it to account for such a large number of arrests for drunkenness on the Sunday? The number of arrests was generally large at about that time; sometimes there were twenty-five; but the largest record which I noticed in my books as I looked through them yesterday was that which I have mentioned. I cannot remember any special circumstance to account for it.
529. Then really the record is not very exceptional? Oh yes it is; there have seldom been so many arrests as that on a Sunday for drunkenness.
530. With regard to the existing Licensing Act, you point to the decrease of drunkenness in your division as being very vast indeed, and you attribute it entirely or partly to the Act; you say that the decrease in the number of houses in your division has been twenty-two, and that many worthless people have been evicted from houses which have been pulled down to make room for new stores: do not you think that these two things combined have had a greater influence towards the decrease of drunkenness than the existence of the new Act? I am certain that they have not.
531. Had the new state of things not taken place—had houses of squalor and vice remained on the ground, instead of its being covered with stores, drunkenness would have decreased by the influence of the Act, not to so large an extent but to a certain extent? Yes, in a degree corresponding with the limitation of the opportunities to get drink by the earlier closing of the public-houses during the week and their total closing on Sundays.
532. Do not you know that a criminal will always be a criminal—that these people would get drink in spite of your influence or your efforts to carry out the provisions of the law? I prevent them in a great measure. If I find that I cannot do it in any other way, I station a constable at the door of the public-house. None of this class will go in while he is there. I had two men stationed at one house yesterday—one at the back and the other in front. I have not given leave to one of my working "beat" men on a Sunday for the last two years, because I employ all the men I have in this way. I say to the licensing inspector—"Where you see a house doing a large business plant a constable at the door; we will try to prevent the drinking if we can do nothing else."

533. Practically you find it impossible to carry out the Sunday trading provision in its integrity? With some of the houses we cannot do it unless we adopt other means which I should be sorry to see resorted to.
534. In view of the fact that drunkenness has decreased in your division, and that the decrease is mainly attributable to the 11 o'clock closing provision, to the diminution in the number of the houses, and to the alteration of the circumstances of your division, do not you think that it would be better for the police and the public if the public-houses were kept open for a certain length of time on Sundays, to enable people to get drink if they want it? Seeing how matters stand, and hearing so many complaints on that score, I think that it would be better to allow the houses to be kept open for half an hour or an hour, to enable the working-classes to get their beer.
535. Are you not aware, even in your division, that the provision of the law which empowers grocers to sell wines and spirits has produced drunkenness in private families to a much greater extent than existed under the old Act? No circumstance of the kind has been brought under my notice. When the Act first came into operation, I had some complaints from married women that their husbands brought home beer on Saturday night, intending to keep it for Sunday, but they drank it during the night.
536. Grocers have now the privilege of selling eleven bottles of beer and one of brandy—in many cases they sell a single bottle of beer—and I want to know whether you are not aware as a matter of fact that this has a tendency to create drunkenness in private families where it would not have existed under the old Act? I have heard of nothing of the kind.
537. With reference to local option, you say that it would have the effect of lessening the number of houses, and that that would diminish drinking? I am satisfied that if you diminish the number of houses, you will diminish drinking.
538. If they were limited to a certain extent would not the drinking be forced into a few houses—would not the people drink the same? I do not think so.
539. I think Mr. Tom Punch has a house in your division—you remember the election and the local option vote—as a matter of fact, if the influence of the publicans were exercised would it not always be sufficient to enable them to win? That was an exceptional case—I have no doubt that it was through Mr. Punch's influence that the vote was carried in that ward—but the public do not take an interest in the local option vote to the extent that I expected they would do.
540. If local option were obtained to-morrow, and if the publicans desired to increase the houses, they have the power and influence to do so—take the Cook Ward for instance? They certainly have influence, but that is a contingency which is not likely to arise.
541. Could they not increase the number of houses now? The publicans in some wards might do so, but I question whether they could do so in other wards. With reference to women holding licenses, I think the present law is clear upon that point. A widow can hold a license, but the magistrates have granted licenses to wives living apart from their husbands—a most undesirable class to whom to give a license.

FRIDAY, 19 MARCH, 1886.

Present:—

ALEX. OLIVER, Esq., M.A., PRESIDENT,	S. H. HYAM, Esq., J.P., M.P.,
T. COLLS, Esq., J.P.,	F. ABIGAIL, Esq., J.P., M.P.,
G. WITHERS, Esq., J.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Inspector George Waters called in, sworn, and examined:—

542. President.] Of what division are you in charge? No. 3—Darlinghurst.
543. Will you favour us with a rough sketch of the limits of that division, so that we may form some idea of its extent? It includes the Outer Domain, and passes along College-street to Oxford-street, up Oxford-street to the east to Riley-street, along Riley-street to Cleveland-street, taking the east side along Cleveland-street, to the east again to Bourke-street, and along Bourke-street as far as the Governor's stables.
544. How long have you been in charge of this division? Eleven years. I may say that it brings in South Botany and La Pérouse, and that it goes right round the coast to Watson's Bay.
545. Have you any rough idea of the population of the district? No.
546. Mr. Withers.] Have you not some special duties in connection with Botany at different intervals throughout the week? I am supposed to visit there once a week. I go along the Bunnerong Road, and sometimes along the Long Bay Road. I was at the Coast Hospital the morning before last.
547. President.] I apprehend then that your district includes the whole area between the waters of Port Jackson and Botany? Yes.
548. You will be able at some future time to provide us with your contingent of the Inspector-General's figures with reference to the apprehensions for drunkenness? Yes.
549. In these apprehensions for drunkenness have you had many old offenders? Yes; some of them are brought in perhaps once a week.
550. Are they men or women as a rule? Principally women.
551. If they are brought in once a week, how is it that the Magistrates do not give them a longer sequestration? If they are brought up and are twice convicted they get a longer sentence; if they are three times convicted within twelve months they are liable under the Vagrant Act.
552. Do you think you always get at them under the Vagrant Act; you are able to identify them as old offenders, and when they are found drunk in the street you proceed against them under the Vagrant Act? They must be thrice convicted of drunkenness, and must then be found behaving in a riotous manner; but some people are never riotous when they are intoxicated.
553. Then they always were proceeded against under the charge of simple drunkenness? Yes.
554. What punishment do they generally get? Perhaps seven days.
555. As much as that? Yes.
556. They do their week, come out, and then go back again? They sometimes go back again the same day if they have any money.

Inspector
Waters.
19 Mar., 1886.

- Inspector Waters.
19 Mar., 1886.
557. I suppose that in your district there would be about 2,500 apprehensions for drunkenness—perhaps less? About 2,000.
558. Bearing in mind what you have just said with reference to the number of old offenders, by how much would you reduce that number in order to find out something like the number of offenders, instead of the number of offences? I think the number would have to be reduced by about one-fourth.
559. That would reduce the figures by about 500? Yes.
560. The returns do not show that fact in any way? No; it is a very difficult matter to separate them in such a way as to show it.
561. Do you consider that your district has been more or less temperate since the passing of the Licensing Act of 1882? There has been a very large increase of population since 1882. There has been a very large increase in the number of disorderly persons. Ten or twelve years ago Woolloomooloo was quite a different place as compared with what it is now; they are altogether a bad lot.
562. Mr. Abigail.] That is Woolloomooloo? Yes.
563. President.] What proportion do you think this depraved class—what you would call the larrikin class—are of the population of your district? They are not very numerous, but they are very troublesome.
564. Would you think that there were 1,000 of the rowdy class? No.
565. I mean not only the rowdies, but the possible rowdies—what may be called the rowdy class? I believe that the removal of 150 would clear them all, men and women, out of the place—that is what we may call larrikins.
566. You have told us that population has increased: what is your opinion as to whether the new Act has been beneficial or otherwise in reducing intemperance in your district? It has done very little in that way, except on Sundays. During the first twelve months after the passing of the Act we had an average of one arrest for drunkenness on Sunday; since then the average has been three.
567. How many public-houses are there in your district? 173 I think.
568. In how many of these do you consider break the law is broken on Sunday? About 120 of them I suppose at the least. There are 173 in the whole division, and I do not think that more than thirty-three or thirty-four observe the law.
569. That makes nearly 140 law-breakers. Have you succeeded in obtaining convictions against any of those 140? Yes; in 1882, the first year after the passing of the present Act, there were ninety-eight prosecutions, in fourteen of which the cases were dismissed. In 1883 there were 109 prosecutions, and sixteen were dismissed. The amended Licensing Act came into force on the 2nd May, 1883, and during the first four months of that year there were twenty prosecutions; within the remaining eight months there were eighty-nine, making 109 in all. In 1884 there were 113 prosecutions, of which fifteen were dismissed. In 1885 there were seventy-three prosecutions, of which fifteen were dismissed; making a total altogether of 393 prosecutions and sixty dismissals.
570. Were many of these convictions subsequent convictions—that is to say, were any publicans charged with second offences? Oh yes, and with third offences.
571. How has that affected the in-licenses? It has not affected them; there have been 350 transfers since the Act came into operation.
572. What is the history of those transfers, are they the result of the convictions? Very often. Frequently when a publican is twice convicted he transfers his license before he can be convicted a third time.
573. Mr. Abigail.] How many licenses have been cancelled? A license cannot very well be cancelled now. A publican may be disqualified if he has been three times convicted, but the license still remains good.
574. President.] Do not the Magistrates refuse renewals in such a case? If a publican is twice or three times convicted he takes the earliest opportunity of transferring his license; then if he makes application again we bring the convictions against him. Of course if he is three times convicted he is disqualified, without our bringing him before the Court. Previously to the passing of the amended Act the house could be disqualified also.
575. Mr. Abigail.] Are there many publicans holding licenses in your district who have been disqualified? Not that I am aware of.
576. President.] Well, you say that, in consequence of the large growth of population, it would be difficult to institute a comparison showing whether the houses have increased relatively to the population or not. You have 173 public-houses, but you do not know the population. I presume there has been a steady increase in your particular division of the number of public-houses? No; I could easily tell you the increase. There have been some conditional licenses granted for large houses, but none of them are finished yet. There were three granted a month or two ago; one for Watson's Bay, one for Waverley, and one for Paddington, but none of them are opened yet, although the one at Watson's Bay is nearly finished. There was a removal from Castlereagh-street to Dowling-street, Woolloomooloo, about a month ago, to a house licensed many years ago, but that has nothing to do with the new Act. Local option, which has always been against new licenses, was last year in favour of removals but not of new licenses, and there has not been a removal since.
577. What has been the result of that, with reference to the question I asked as to the increase or decrease of the number of public-houses? There has been an increase of one, as far as Woolloomooloo is concerned.
578. Can you give us the number of the public-houses licensed in your division before the passing of the present Act? About the same as at present—there is very little difference; one or two have been closed.
579. Then we are justified in assuming that the effect of the Act has not been appreciable in that respect? It has not closed one house; it is a check upon the opening of new houses, owing to local option.
580. Coming back to the Inspector-General's report, with regard to the arrests for drunkenness—have they increased since 1882? They have increased, and, as I mentioned before, disorder has increased in the neighbourhood as well.
581. But apart from that question, are there more arrests now; have there been during the past year more apprehensions for drunkenness than in 1881 or 1882, before the Act was passed? I cannot give you the exact numbers now.
582. But you can do so at a future time? Yes.
583. Would you kindly furnish us with the information at the earliest opportunity? Yes. There is no doubt that there has been a large increase this year.

Inspector
Waters.
19 Mar., 1886.

584. What other agencies besides the public-houses are there which promote drunkenness in your district? I had seven or eight private persons convicted of sly grog selling about eight or nine months ago.
585. Is sly grog selling carried on to a large extent do you think? Not perhaps to a large extent, but there is a difficulty in detecting it. I managed to obtain the services of a couple of strangers, and they discovered about ten cases, in seven or eight of which convictions were obtained.
586. What class of houses are they in which sly grog selling is carried on—are they houses of bad repute? One was a tobacconist's, but there is no doubt that they are improper houses.
587. They are houses of ill fame, you think? There is no doubt of it. Sly grog selling has been discovered to be carried on in one or two oyster saloons also.
588. But you do not think that the illicit sale of liquor is large? I do not think so.
589. Have you any up-stair bars in your division? No; we had one, but the person who held the license left the house, and the person who came in after him did away with the up-stair bar.
590. Now, with regard to Sunday selling, have you any difficulty in convicting publicans who are guilty of that offence? Very great difficulty.
591. To what do you attribute it? All I can attribute it to is hard swearing.
592. That is to say, the persons who are prosecuted commit perjury? I cannot say that it is anything else.
593. Have you prosecuted in many cases? In every case. In one case a man was seen coming out of a public-house with a bottle of rum, and he and others swore that he took it into the house with him. In another case, a man was seen coming out of the public-house with two bottles of ale, and he also swore that he took them in with him.
594. What did the publican say? He said that the man took the ale in with him, or that at any rate he did not supply it to him. In another case, a man came out with three bottles of ale, and a lodger in the public-house swore that he gave it to him out of his own private stock; that when the person came inside and the landlord would not serve him, he took compassion on him and gave him three bottles of ale. There are dozens of such cases.
595. Then, I suppose, you consider that the law is defective? It is defective if it is intended to close public-houses on Sundays—it is almost a complete farce.
596. You consider that the mere power of entry is not sufficient? That is right enough, so far as it goes.
597. But you think it is not sufficient: have you anything to propose in order to make the law more effective? I was under the impression, and we were all under the impression until lately, that the Bench would refuse to grant renewals, but it appears that they will not.
598. You mean that the Bench would refuse renewals upon such evidence as you were prepared to give? Yes; and I believe that it was quite sufficient in many cases.
599. Why did the Bench refuse to act on the evidence you offered? I could not say.
600. Was it because you had not legal evidence of convictions? Yes, because we did not prove convictions; they remarked that they wanted convictions; but that is nonsense, because a case of three convictions has to be dealt with in another way.
601. You could not give evidence of convictions—that is the first quality of legal evidence—but you gave sworn testimony as to what you or your officers had seen? Yes.
602. And that was disregarded? Yes. I gave evidence in one case of ninety-four persons having been seen entering a public-house, and eighty persons leaving within two hours on a Sunday morning, but that evidence was ignored. In a case against one publican, the objections were that he was a drunkard, and that his house was badly conducted; and I think twenty-three respectable tradesmen in William-street came forward to give evidence that they had seen him drunk; that he used sometimes to shut up his house in the middle of the day, and that he had been seen running about naked in front of his bar; but that evidence was not considered sufficient. I may mention that no depositions are taken in these cases; what takes place is not recorded—not even the names of the witnesses recorded.
603. As I understand, then, you make a certain statement of facts, which you offer to substantiate by evidence, and the Magistrates refuse to hear it? Yes; they say, "We want convictions."
604. The Court at which you prosecute is the Water Police Court, is it not? Yes. The cases I have mentioned occurred in 1884. Last year I tried it again; I had only three cases, and in two of the cases I had petitions from the inhabitants of the locality in support of my objections. One publican was charged with being an habitual drunkard, or with being constantly drunk.
605. Of course you are aware of section 36 of the Act. I should like to draw your attention to these words: "Provided always that upon any application whether for the grant renewal removal or transfer of a license any objection whatsoever not being a frivolous or vexatious objection may be taken which appears to the Licensing Court or Magistrate to be sufficient." Is the attention of the Bench called to that provision? Yes.
606. Then they must have held your objection to be frivolous or vexatious? Yes. They sometimes tell us that they will not act on the surmise of the police.
607. Have there been many cases in which the Magistrates have refused to pay attention to your objections? I have had nine or ten, and the other inspectors have had several.
608. But you have had nine or ten, and can you say that in all those cases your objections were valid objections, such as you have mentioned? Somewhat similar.
609. Are there many houses kept by females in your district? Very few, but there are some.
610. Do you consider that the provision of the Licensing Act requiring the closing of public-houses at 11 o'clock on week-days has had a beneficial effect? Yes.
611. Do you think that any advantage would be gained by extending the hours by (say) half an hour or more in particular localities, say, for example, in the vicinity of the theatres—It has been frequently stated to me that the theatre-goer cannot obtain a drink when he leaves the theatre at 11 o'clock—Do you think there is any ground for extending the hours in the neighbourhood of the theatres? I am not now well acquainted with theatres; I have not been in town after 11 o'clock at night for the last ten years.
612. Do you think that many workmen are tempted by the early hour of opening to go into the public-houses and take nips, and thereby to make themselves inclined to take more during the day? I think 6 o'clock a very reasonable hour.
613. Do you think the effect of the public-house being open is to attract the working-men? It is possible. I know that there are always two or three people hanging about the doors of some of the public-houses of a morning long before they open.

Inspector
Waters.
10 Mar., 1886.

614. Mr. Withers.] I suppose that is a convenient time for them to get in, as your men will be away changing their beats? It is to some extent. There are persons waiting about the doors of the public-houses at half-past 5 in the morning.

615. President.] Do you think it would in any way reduce the consumption of ardent spirits, and thus diminish intemperance, if houses which sold light fermented liquors were encouraged—I am now speaking of something like the English ale and beer houses—are you acquainted with them in London? Yes.

616. Do you think that class of houses should be encouraged here—houses limited to the sale of fermented liquors, and those of a limited strength? I think not. They would not be satisfied with the liquor sold at those houses. If there were no other houses, the establishment of houses of that class might have a good effect. As far as I can recollect of the beer-houses in England, it was considered that a very low class frequented them.

617. Then you do not think any good in the cause of temperance would be done by having a special kind of license? I do not think so.

618. Do you not think there would be a demand here for that kind of beer which is drunk largely by the Germans and Americans, but which does not intoxicate them? I am afraid they would not take to it here.

619. Do you not think it is because they cannot get it? They can get lager beer anywhere.

620. Do you attribute much of the drunkenness in your district to the bad quality of the liquor sold? I think the sale of very inferior liquor has something to do with it.

621. Do you know as a matter of fact whether much bad liquor goes into consumption? Yes, it must. In putting down the Sunday trade sometimes we get possession of small bottles of spirits, and we have very great difficulty in deciding whether it is gin, rum, brandy, or whisky.

622. You think then that a great deal of this stuff is consumed? Yes. I do not say adulterated, but very inferior spirits. Inspector Lenthall made a raid on a number of public-houses, and examined the beers and spirits.

623. Did the result show that there was much adulteration? No, I believe not.

624. Is there much drunkenness amongst the youth in your district? There is drunkenness amongst youths under twenty.

625. Is it increasing? No, I do not think it is increasing.

626. Do you think that the closing of public-houses on Sundays has been wholly advantageous—Has the system any disadvantages? No doubt it has been a check to some extent, but I am afraid it will not be a check much longer. The publicans seem to sell and do as they like on Sundays now.

627. Then, though it is prohibited by law, you think that the law is a dead letter practically? To a certain extent it is.

628. You say that 140 out of 173 openly disregard the law with regard to Sunday selling, so that the law may be said to be nearly a dead letter? Nearly a dead letter.

629. Do you know of any way in which the law could be made more effective? The English Act casts upon persons found in public-houses during prohibited hours the onus of proving that they were there for a lawful purpose—Do you think that would be a good amendment of the law to make here? When I was in England the inspector used to place in front of a house which was supposed to be doing a Sunday trade an officer with a memorandum book and pencil to take down the number of persons seen going in. That appeared to be sufficient for a conviction.

630. When were you in England? I left in 1854.

631. You say that the effect of the local option voting was to close some of the houses in your district? It did not close any, but it prevented any increase. One or two of the houses were closed when the Act first came into force, in consequence of their being unable to get the requisite accommodation.

632. Did it stop removals? Yes.

633. Do you think that good would result if the principle of local option were extended? I do not see very well how it could.

634. Of course there is only one way in which it could be extended, and that is by its application to renewals? I do not think it would work fairly.

635. What do you mean when you say it would not work fairly? It might do a deal of harm in some quarters. I do not believe in local option at all; I would rather have a properly constructed Bench that would feel an interest in the town, and see that everything was properly regulated, and grant or refuse licenses as they thought necessary. No one appears to take any interest in the local option vote. In Fitzroy Ward two or three more votes would have enabled the public-houses to be increased in that district.

636. You have several municipalities in your district—do you think there is the same apathy in all? There is one ward in Paddington in which for three years they have been in favour of an increase in the number of public-houses. I have had four applications for licenses, but the Magistrates refused them, but the local option vote was in favour of the granting of new licenses.

637. You consider that local option as now conducted is a failure? It will become that in time; we have had a second local option vote taken, and the people seem as lukewarm as ever on the subject.

638. Do you think that local option ought to be extended or abolished? Either the one or the other; it should be properly carried out or abolished.

639. Do you think the local option vote should be extended to others besides the ratepayers? No, I do not think so.

640. You would not give it to all voters? No.

641. You think it is sufficient if the ratepayers can vote? I think so, if it was only the interest of some one to see it properly carried out.

642. Mr. Withers.] Do you mean to force the voting? If there is a candidate in the field, he generally finds some way of bringing up the voters because he has an interest in it, but no one takes any interest in the local option vote.

643. President.] It is generally stated that the publican votes with the local optionist to keep up the monopoly? No doubt about that.

644. Then you have local optionists and the publican polling together? Yes; as a rule, however, the publicans do not believe in local option.

645. Mr. Abigail.] It is a personal vote given for personal interest? It is given merely to protect their own interest.

646. President.] Do you think that the punishment for drunkenness is sufficient? I do not think that the punishment will ever decrease it in any way.

Inspector
Waters.

19 Mar., 1886.

647. Do you think the punishment insufficient, or are you of opinion that it is not a matter of punishment? I do not think it is a matter of punishment.
648. Then you do not think any punishment would act as a deterrent? I do not.
649. Have you had any experience of inebriate asylums? No, none whatever.
650. Mr. Withers.] Would it not deter these persons—not only habitual drunkards but also those who get drunk occasionally—if they were compelled to work for a week or two at some public works in the town? I believe that if anything would have a deterrent effect that would.
651. Is it not a fact that the families of men who are constantly being arrested for drunkenness are very much impoverished? No doubt of it.
652. I suppose that in many instances the penalties inflicted by the Court make things worse? They add to the distress of the families.
653. Do you find sly grog selling to any extent in connection with the oyster saloons? I have had about three of them up for it; these were places in the back slums. We have very respectable oyster saloons about Oxford-street; they are well conducted, and are fit for any gentleman to go into. I have had one conviction from Oxford-street; the man was there for about a fortnight only.
654. The Inspector-General told us that working-men's clubs have been established with a view to getting drink on Sundays: are there any such clubs in your division? There are two, but I believe several more are to be established.
655. It is known to you that they are established for that purpose? Yes.
656. Have you any trouble in connection with these institutions? No. There is one in connection with the Sir Joseph Banks Hotel; it is called the Bywong Club, I think, and it seems to be very well conducted.
657. Have you made any arrests in connection with it? I never heard any complaint about it.
658. Is it conducted on anything like the same principles as ordinary clubs in the city? I think so. I have not been there, and of course I cannot say, but I have not heard any complaint about it. There is another similar club at Coogee; I have not heard any complaint about it.
659. The clubs to which you refer are, I presume, the resort of persons in pretty fair circumstances? Yes; I understand that members have to be balloted for.
660. They can hardly be regarded as working-men's clubs? No.
661. Do you know of any of these working-men's clubs in the city, Woolloomooloo, Surry Hills, Paddington, or other populous places? I am not aware of the existence of any in my district.
662. Are there not a number of assignation houses at Surry Hills? Yes.
663. I suppose a lot of drink is consumed in these places? Yes; the convictions which I have had for sly grog selling have been nearly all in connection with houses of that description.
664. You do not think that there is any hardship in depriving the general public and persons who visit the theatres of the right to get drink after 11 o'clock? No.
665. They are young people only who would be likely to go into hotels after that hour? Yes, and then, as a rule, when they have already had too much.
666. You say that you have secured 393 convictions for evasion of the Sunday closing provision? Yes.
667. Are there not many publicans who have never been convicted? Of course. There have been as many as 350 transfers of licenses. Some of the houses are constantly changing hands. Some have changed hands ten times, others seven, eight, six, and down to once; some of them change hands every month or so.
668. There are a number of publicans who have never been summoned? Yes.
669. And you have no reason to expect that there will ever be occasion to summon them? There are a few who do not break the law at all—at any rate we have no reason to believe that they do; they have never concerned us since the Act came into force.
670. Do you often see "drunks" coming out of hotels on Sundays? Not often; sometimes we do. We have gone into houses and found drunken men in them, and on the landlord turning them out, they have been locked up. In these cases the publicans have been brought before the Court.
671. Under the old law, "drunks" used to hang about the public houses and become a nuisance to passers by? Yes.
672. Do you think that the young people in your district have become more intemperate in their habits? The number of those who drink is increasing—there is no doubt about that.
673. Do you think that the French law, under which a person who is twice convicted of drunkenness within a certain period, is deprived of his civil rights, would have any salutary effect here? It would have a great effect.
674. Mr. Abigail.] You spoke of a properly constituted Bench being an advantage if it were called into existence: can you describe what you mean by that? A Licensing Bench or Board.
675. Would you have one central body, or local bodies? I would have a central body for the Metropolitan District.
676. How would you have it constituted so as to make it efficient? It would have to be composed of men who would be independent of every one, but perhaps responsible to the Government.
677. Do not you think that the present Licensing Magistrates are independent men, and responsible to the Government? Quite right; but they have not the local interest or knowledge which I think they ought to have. We have to deal with one Magistrate to-day, and some one else the next day, and so on.
678. Would you favour a special class of police being charged with the duty of supervising the licensed houses throughout the country? I do not think that they would keep things down as they are now.
679. You think that there are no means which can be devised to improve matters? Not as the Act stands at present.
680. Can no means be devised by amended legislation to prevent 120 out of 173 publicans breaking the law continually without being brought up? They have been brought up, but still that does not stop the breaking of the law. I got 393 convictions, but they have not stopped it, nor are they likely to.
681. Do not you think that it might be stopped if we had different men to administer the Act in the Metropolitan District? No; I have no fault to find with the way in which the Act is administered, although we have found very great difficulty since the amending Act was passed.
682. In what way? Before the Act was amended not less than three Magistrates could deal with the cases, but under the amending Act one Magistrate can deal with them, and it stands to reason that one man will not take the responsibility that three sitting together would.
683. Has the amending Act been beneficial, or otherwise? Not beneficial.

Inspector
Waters.
19 Mar., 1886.

684. It has given greater facilities for the evasion of the law? Yes. Another great check—although we cannot blame the Magistrates—is the appeals which are made to the Quarter Sessions, where perhaps one half of the cases get upset.

685. You have stated that on one Sunday ninety-four persons were seen to enter, and eighty to leave, one hotel, and that although evidence to that effect was tendered to the Bench when the renewal of the license was applied for, it had no effect? None whatever.

686. You have been told by the President that, under the English law, if a man is found in a public-house during prohibited hours he is held to have broken the law, until he proves to the contrary—Do not you think that, if that provision had been in force here, you would have had a very fine haul in the particular case to which you have just referred? Yes; but you see here is the difficulty,—we saw them going in and coming out, but we did not see them inside.

687. If such a provision had been in force, would you not have been able to take possession of this house when you found that the people were inside? The whole ninety were not in the house at one time; they went in in twos and threes and sixes at a time; this was in 1884, when we were getting evidence to object to the renewal of licenses.

688. Did you state to the Bench that people were seen coming out of the house with bottles of liquor in their possession? No; not when we were objecting to the renewal of the licenses, because when persons were seen leaving with drink the parties were summoned at the time.

689. President.] Am I right in supposing this state of facts: the licensee of the house from which persons were seen leaving with bottles of liquor asked for a renewal of his license, and you objected to the granting of it on that ground? No; when we see persons coming out of a public-house with bottles we stop them and bring them back to the hotel; if the landlord shuts the door, we call him out and tell him what we have seen, and then we issue a summons.

690. What did you do when the application for the renewal was made? We tendered evidence as to persons going into the hotel, but not as to their having been seen coming out with bottles in their possession.

691. Could you not have tendered that evidence? In all cases where summonses were issued we could give that evidence; in some cases we had two convictions.

692. I understand that people who have broken the law to the extent of admitting as many as ninety persons to their houses on one Sunday have got their renewals? Yes.

693. You have attempted to prevent their getting the renewals, but the Magistrates have entirely disregarded your objections, because you did not have convictions? Just so.

694. Some of these were cases in which you could have given evidence of men having been seen coming out with bottles in their hands? Oh no, because if we saw that we should have summoned them at once—the publicans.

695. You would not wait until the applications for the renewals were being dealt with? No; we summon the publicans at once for breach of the law.

696. And people who have been guilty of this breach of the law still hold licenses? Yes.

697. You say that you would like to see the licensing authority differently constituted? I would.

698. Would you propose to give them unrestricted discretion? That is exactly what I would like to give them, so that they could grant indulgences, or whatever you like to call them. I would give them power to revoke licenses, and to allow hotels near places of amusement to be kept open half an hour or so after the usual time, if they thought proper to do so. I would give them almost unlimited power.

699. Would you give them such discretionary power as, after making inquiries of the police respecting an application for a renewal of a license, to refuse it without assigning any reason to the applicant for so doing? Things would not be done in that way. Of course he would get notice of the objections, and he would be summoned before the Court to answer certain charges.

700. The reason why I ask you the question is this: under the old law in Scotland—the law of 1828—the Magistrates had the power to refuse a license even though no conviction or offence had been proved against the publican—there was no limit whatever to their discretion? That would be going too far. Before the Act of 1862 was passed here the Magistrates had very large powers. The publicans had to appear before the Court every year. That was perhaps a hardship. Applications were dealt with in this way: the Chairman called out the name, and asked “Is there any objection?” “No.” “Granted.” Or, if it was stated that “he keeps a disorderly house, and drunken people are constantly about it,” the decision would be, “Refused for a month” or something of that sort. It was rather a summary way of doing things.

701. Mr. Abigail.] It is stated that there are some houses in your district which are kept by women? Yes—widows.

702. What is the general character of those houses? In some cases they are conducted as well as, if not better than, those which are kept by men.

703. Is that so generally? Not generally, but in some cases.

704. Are there many hotels which have billiard, music, and dancing licenses at the same time? Oh no; some have licenses for billiards.

705. None of them for dancing? No; unless they get permission from the Bench, and then it is for one night only, the object being stated—birthday parties, and such like.

706. Are there any dancing saloons in your district? There is one in Short-street, but I believe that it is to be closed from to-night. It was more a private than a public saloon, and was well conducted. There is one defect in the present Act. You may visit certain public-houses as often as you like on Sundays, and you will find dozens of people playing cards—three or four in one room, and five or six in another, and we cannot do anything to prevent it.

707. Cannot the publicans be prosecuted? At one time publicans were fined for allowing cards or dice to be played on the premises, but now it is held that they are not liable unless the play is for a stake, and we cannot prove that, as we never see a sixpence about.

708. Have orders been issued from the Inspector General's Office to the inspectors in the various suburbs not to be very stringent in administering the Act? The Inspector General issued an order when the Act first came into operation to the effect that it was to be administered with caution.

709. Do you know whether during the first year that the Act was in force it diminished drunkenness or convictions generally? I cannot say; the figures which I have relate to Sundays only. A couple of months months of the year elapsed before the Act was properly in force. During that year—1882, there were 112 “drunks” arrested on Sundays; in 1883, 147; in 1884, 128; and last year, 182.

710. You have stated that in 1884, 113 publicans were proceeded against? Yes.

711. And in 1885, seventy-three only? Yes.

712. Does the difference arise from the fact that they have been keeping the law better? We could not detect them; it will decrease again—probably by half in another year.

713. And yet trading on Sundays will be carried on? It will be carried on as usual.

714. Are the police entirely powerless—are they not able to cope with the violation of the law? There is no way of doing it; no publican need be caught if he lays himself out to violate the law.

715. He will send out scouts? He need not do that even.

716. How will he evade the law? Suppose he allows half a dozen men to enter the house, he will satisfy himself as to who they are before he will serve them. As soon as they have taken one drink they can have another, and if they do not want it they must clear out, and then another batch can be admitted. If there happens to be a stranger who is not known to the party, or about whom the publican has any suspicions, he says to him “We do not serve liquor on Sundays.”

717. Then regular customers are supplied? Yes, and persons who are vouched for by them.

718. Do you know whether the people who get drink in this way are residents of the district in which the hotel is situated? It just depends: sometimes they stroll away perhaps for a mile and go to an hotel where they are known.

719. Or where they are vouched for? Yes.

720. The police cannot suggest any plan, I suppose, except these private police? They are in plain clothes. As a rule I have eight or ten of them out every Sunday.

721. And they are so well known that they cannot secure convictions? If a stranger managed to get into a house they would not serve him unless they were satisfied who he was—unless there was some one to vouch for him.

722. With your long experience in connection with this matter could you not suggest some plan—some new legislation—which would better enable the police to secure convictions, so as to force publicans to keep the law? The only plan I could suggest would be to carry out the 36th section. The plan would be, I think, to refuse a renewal of license to those who had been proved to have broken the law during the year.

723. Have not the Bench under the present law a wide power in that respect, if they chose to enforce it? Yes, there is no doubt about it.

724. You would prefer that they should listen to objections brought forward by the police? Yes, and I think they should take evidence, as the Minister for Justice for the time being suggested should be done.

725. Your experience goes to prove that they have not done that? They have not investigated one case. I have been in the witness-box, but they have not investigated one case thoroughly.

726. Only in cases where you have secured convictions? That is a matter for another Court altogether.

727. President.] Have you ever communicated this state of facts to the Minister of Justice, as to the declination of the Bench to accept evidence? After the first licensing day which was held in the Water Police Court, and then adjourned to the Central, Inspector Anderson and I drew up a report and signed it. That report reached the Minister of Justice.

728. Mr. Abigail.] You sent a united protest to the Inspector-General of Police as to the manner in which the Bench were dealing with cases? Yes; pointing out what we had done, and how we were treated.

729. What was the outcome of it? The Minister of Justice wrote a minute.

730. Mr. Hyam.] I understood you to say there was only one dancing saloon in the whole of your district? There are pavilions—at Watson's Bay and at Coogee, for instance.

731. But I allude to places where young people congregate night after night and dance until 1, 2, and 3 o'clock in the morning? I have none of those in my district.

732. Are you aware that such places exist in the city and suburbs? Oh yes; I had a bad one in Crown-street at one time, but it is done away with now.

733. These places I suppose are not only snares to the young, but those who attend them are liable to be led into habits of drunkenness? There is no doubt about it.

734. And in the interests of the Colony these places should be suppressed? Yes, or licensed. In fact the city is a long way behind the suburbs in this matter, because there they license these saloons, and can shut them up when they please. The Waverley pavilion, for instance, has not been opened since the celebrated Bondi row.

735. Do you think it is desirable that these places should be licensed at all? If they are to be countenanced.

736. But should they be allowed to exist? If they exist at all they should be licensed.

737. But is there any necessity for them? I can see no necessity for them—carried on in that way.

738. Do you think the present licensing system under the supervision of the Stipendiary Magistrates is any improvement upon the old system of unpaid Magistrates? I cannot see it. I think that very little improvement was required under the old Act.

739. I have had no opportunity of judging myself; but I desired to ask you and other police officers whether you think there is any improvement under the present system? When we have a Bench of five or six Stipendiary Magistrates no doubt there might be an improvement upon the old system; but nevertheless I would rather go back to it.

740. I do not refer to the system which came into force after 1881; I am alluding to the system in force at present? Quite so.

741. I suppose it has come under your notice that there are many persons found drunk in your district who are not apprehended? We do not apprehend any one for simply being drunk; they must be either unable to walk, or noisy, or something of that kind.

742. This Commission has to inquire into the drinking habits of the people, and we want to find out by what means they can be diminished. It has come under my observation that there are a great many persons in a state of intoxication or of semi-intoxication who are not arrested, summoned, or in any way brought to justice. Perhaps there is no necessity for it? No doubt there are persons in that position.

743. As to Sunday selling, I suppose it has also come under your observation that a great many publicans who break the law by Sunday selling have regular scouts posted at different corners of the streets—men who know the police as well as the police know each other, and that these men are constantly kept for the purpose of telegraphing and letting the publicans or those inside know when the police are coming; for that reason I suppose you find great difficulty in procuring evidence against the publicans? In procuring anything like satisfactory evidence.

744. Can the police go into the drinking clubs? No; they are supposed to be conducted on the same principles as the Australian and other clubs.

745. Is it possible then that these so-called clubs might be formed and might carry on a sort of debauchery without the police having any knowledge of the fact? An attempt was made in one place to form a club; The entrance fee was one shilling and the parties signed their names, which made them members; but it broke down; it did not pay under those conditions; but I have no doubt that before long they will increase largely.

746. Mr. Colls.] You say that you have 173 hotels in your district; are they up to the legal standard of accommodation? Yes.

747. Suppose a family of four or five persons went to any one of these houses, could they get accommodation for the night? At very few of them. The new Licensing Act has had one effect, which perhaps was not intended. It has compelled the publican to have so many bed-rooms, and, having these spare rooms, he cannot afford to keep them empty, and strangers arriving by train or water do not go far to look for hotel accommodation. They therefore offer inducements to young men living in respectable private boarding-houses, paying one guinea or 25s. a week, and, rather than have their rooms unoccupied, take these men in at perhaps 18s. per week, which has had the effect of driving hundreds of young men to lodge in public houses who, under other circumstances, would not have thought of doing so.

748. These bed-rooms were supposed to contain so many cubic feet of air, intended for one person: have you not known of rooms with that quantity of air containing four or five beds? I could not say that. In the small houses the rooms are generally small, and there is not room for more than two beds in a room.

749. Have you many wine licenses in your district? A good many.

750. Have they been a trouble to you in any way? Some of them.

751. Have you obtained convictions against any of the holders of these licenses for sly grog selling? Against one of them. As a rule the wine licenses are held by respectable tradesmen—grocers, for example.

752. I have seen ale and brandy exhibited in grocers' shops? They have spirit licenses.

753. What quantity can they sell? Two gallons.

754. Nothing less? No.

755. Are not smaller quantities sold and charged for as vinegar? Yes, I believe so; only the Act is very defective upon that point—there is no punishment provided for a grocer if he likes to sell a bottle.

756. It has come under your notice that that has been done? Oh yes; as a rule, they run the risk of being refused a license.

757. You say you have known of private bars in your district? I do not think there is one now.

J. ROSEBY, Esq., J.P.,

S. H. HYAM, Esq., J.P., M.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Alexander Mackay, Inspector of Police, called in, sworn, and examined:—

Inspector
Mackay.
22 Mar., 1886.

758. President.] What is your division? It is towards the southern part of the city.

759. Will you give us an idea of its boundaries? The south side of Liverpool-street, from Riley-street to Darling Harbour, up Oxford-street, along the western side of Riley-street to Cleveland-street.

760. Then you connect with Inspector Waters? Yes, at Riley-street; then along Cleveland-street to the Newtown Road, taking in Victoria Park; then along Parramatta Road down to Glebe Point, taking in the whole of the Glebe.

761. How long have you been in charge of that division? I shall have been six years in charge of it on the 10th of June next.

762. You were in the service I presume long before that? Yes, I have been twenty-eight years in the service. I joined my division as a constable.

763. Have you been in Sydney chiefly? I have been the whole of the time in Sydney.

764. You are well acquainted then with the working of the old licensing law? Yes, I have had something to do with all the licensing laws ever since I came here.

765. Then you have officially been instrumental in framing the returns of drunkenness in your division for the Inspector-General? I was asked a question with regard to that matter—I was asked whether I knew any publicans in my division who would not sell a glass of liquor to a customer on Sunday, and my answer was that with the exception of two I did not know any who would not do so.

766. But with regard to the returns of drunkenness, do you furnish them to the Inspector-General for his annual report? Yes; I returned two out of 178 as the number of publicans who I believed would not serve customers on Sundays.

767. Is 178 the total number of public-houses in your division? Yes, at present; I had only 176 last week, but two new licenses have been granted since for houses which were closed, and which have now been re-opened.

768. Then your division contains 178 public-houses now? Yes.

769. I suppose you have not with you now the returns you furnished to the Inspector-General showing the number of arrests for drunkenness? Yes, I have them here.

770. Will you begin at 1881 if you please? I have a return of the number of drunkards brought in on Sunday.

771. I want, if you please, the total number of arrests for drunkenness during the year 1881 in your division? I have not got it.
772. But you can give us a duplicate of the return which you furnished to the Inspector-General? Yes, decidedly.
773. That is what we want. Has there been an increase in the number of public-houses from 1881 to 1885? There has been a large decrease in my division.
774. Will you kindly tell us what it amounts to? In 1882, the year the present Act came into operation, I had 269 public-houses; since then I have lost seventy, owing to the Redfern District being separated from mine and being made into a separate district.
775. Has the decrease been owing to that only? No. Nine public-houses have been transferred to Mr. Waters; they are in Riley-street and Oxford-street.
776. In addition to the others? No, they were included in the 269.
777. But they are within your district, are they? Yes.
778. Mr. Davies.] Are they not now included in Mr. Waters' division? Yes, he has to look after them now. The exact number at present in my division is 178.
779. President.] Practically then the effect of the Licensing Act upon your division has been almost nil? Almost nil.
780. It has closed very few public-houses, if any? It has closed a number—there have been fourteen cancellations; some of those, however, were lapsed licenses. Seven of the houses in respect of which the licenses were cancelled have been re-opened, under the provisions of the 16th section of the amended Act, by which the landlord or agent may apply to the Licensing Bench for a new license.
781. What I want to get at is, the effect of the Act in your division with regard to early closing; but it appears that that is difficult to get at, owing to the fact that a number of houses have been withdrawn from your inspectorate, and for other reasons not connected with the operation of the licensing law. Can you tell me how many houses have been closed in your division by the operation of the Licensing Act alone? Since the withdrawal of the seventy-nine houses from my division I cannot tell you, because I have the figures for the whole division including the seventy-nine; but altogether there were fourteen licenses cancelled, and seven of the houses thereby closed have been re-opened.
782. That leaves seven closed? Yes.
783. Have there been any publicans who left the business because it would not pay? I have not heard of any.
784. Have there been none do you think? I do not think there have been any.
785. Then may we say in round numbers that the effect of the operation of the Licensing Act in your division has been to decrease the number of public-houses by seven? Yes, there have been seven cancellations. One or two of the licenses cancelled had lapsed. For instance there was one in Regent-street, near the railway bridge, which was closed in consequence of the land on which it stood being resumed by the Government for railway purposes.
786. That case has no connection with the Act? No.
787. Mr. Colls.] I suppose that some of the licenses were cancelled because the houses were not up to the requirements of the Act as regards accommodation? No; a large number out of the 269 houses in my division had to provide additional accommodation when the Act came into force. Some of the publicans rented an adjoining house into which they opened a door from the public-house, but many of them afterwards, I am sorry to say, let the adjoining house to a tenant, until the police found it out.
788. President.] What is the class of houses in your division? Very low indeed, excepting those in George-street, which are commodious houses; and although the licensees of these sell during prohibited hours, we do not say that the houses are badly conducted on that account. If I were asked the question, I should say that they are fairly conducted although they do that. Some are worse than others.
789. I suppose that many of them are low pot-houses? Yes, the lowest of the low.
790. I understood you to say that only two publicans in your district observed the law? Yes, and those two are doubtful.
791. As a matter of fact, then, a citizen who was inclined to break the law would have no difficulty with any publican in your division—he could obtain liquor in any public-house he liked? I think he could—that is my impression.
792. No doubt you try to enforce the law against those who break it? I do, and I think I have been tolerably successful. I can give you some statistics to show what I have been doing. In 1882, the year the Act came into force, there were sixty-six convictions for Sunday selling, and nine cases were dismissed. For selling during prohibited hours, that is before 6 o'clock in the morning and after 11 o'clock at night, there were sixteen convictions and no dismissals. For supplying liquor to drunken persons there were nine convictions and three dismissals. In 1883 there were forty-nine convictions for Sunday selling and two dismissals; for selling during prohibited hours, twelve convictions and four dismissals; for supplying liquor to drunken persons, one conviction and two dismissals. In 1884, for Sunday selling there were forty-seven convictions and five dismissals; for selling during prohibited hours there were eight convictions; for supplying liquor to drunken persons there were two convictions and one dismissal. For 1885 and up to the present date, or rather yesterday—
793. Have you not the figures for 1885 alone? No.
794. But in order to make a comparison we ought to have the figures for the twelve months of 1885. Were the figures for 1886 included in the Inspector General's report? No, he got none of these figures—he does not require any of them; what he wants are the criminal statistics of the Colony.
795. The Inspector General has told us that he made up the statistics relating to drunkenness from returns furnished to him by his officers. It is clearly to be seen from the figures you have given that, although the diminution in the number of convictions has been small, yet there has been a diminution from 1881 downwards; and if in the figures quoted for 1885 allowance is made for the three months of 1886, the number of convictions for Sunday selling will be brought down from fifty-six to less than forty-seven.
796. Is it a fact that the convictions for drunkenness have decreased in your division? Last year, strange to say, although there was a large increase in the convictions for drunkenness in the other divisions there was in my division a decrease of 343, that is for simple drunkenness; but there was an increase of 111 in the convictions for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, compared with those of the previous year.
797. Then, although the public-houses in your division are of a low class generally, the number of convictions for drunkenness has decreased rather than increased? Yes, in my division for 1885.

Inspector
Mackay.
22 Mar., 1886.

Inspector
Mackay.
22 Mar., 1886.

798. Do you think the disorderly conduct is to be accounted for by the character of the houses or by the character of the persons offending? I should say that it was owing to the character of the persons who were drunk and disorderly; it would depend on a man's temperament.

799. Will you kindly prepare your figures so as to show the convictions for 1885 up to the end of that year and let us have them? I will.

800. Speaking of Sunday selling, do you often find that you are foiled by the precautions taken by the publicans? Yes, we always have been.

801. What steps do you take against a man whom you know to be a breaker of the law? I am not so well up in that matter as some of the licensing inspectors, of whom there are three besides myself. They generally go out on Sunday—morning, noon, and night—in plain clothes, each accompanied by a constable who may not be well known to the publicans, and he mixes with the people who are going into a public-house, and having obtained admission in that way, he sees the drink supplied. That is the way in which a conviction is obtained; but it is very hard to obtain a conviction, because the publican brings eight or ten witnesses, who were in the bar at the time, and who swear that they are lodgers. The first word they say, when they are questioned, is that they are boarders or lodgers.

802. Nevertheless you do get convictions? Yes.

803. Then you think there is a large amount of perjury? Very much; I have never known so much perjury since I have been in the Colony as there has been since the passing of the Licensing Act.

804. Do you attribute any improvement in your division to the earlier closing of public-houses? Very much. I should like to see the houses closed at 10 or 10-30 p.m. The town is a great deal quieter than it used to be. It would be an improvement to the city if the houses were closed at 10 or 10-30 p.m.

805. Have you many places of entertainment, such as theatres and concert halls, in your division? No.

806. Are there any dancing saloons? There are a few; one was closed on Saturday night last. There was a very large one in Harris-street, Pyrmont, but the lease has run out and it has been closed.

807. What is the influence of these dancing saloons—is there much drink consumed in them? I do not know that drink is consumed in the dancing saloons; I dare say that during the intervals the dancers go out to the public-houses to drink. Girls and young lads get drunk, and they come out of the dancing saloons and fight in the streets. These houses cause a great deal of trouble.

808. Have you observed any increase in drunkenness among young men? Very much.

809. During what period—during the last six years? Longer than that; for the last ten years. Our young men are very much given to drink. When I first came to the Colony a native would scarce ever be seen drunk; the only liquor they cared for was gingerbeer and lemonade.

810. That is your impression as a man of common sense who uses his eyes? Simply that.

811. To what do you attribute the increase of drunkenness in that class? I think it is to be attributed to the too hurried amendment of the Licensing Act.

812. You mean the Act of 1882? The Act of 1882.

813. But do you think that would have the effect of increasing drunkenness amongst the juvenile portion of the population—you know it has only been three years in operation? Of course I do not say that it had this effect on the juveniles before 1882. I attribute the whole of the present state of the city to the too hurried amendment of the principal Act. The principal Act came into force in 1882, and when it had been in operation one year it was amended. If any one will look carefully through the two Acts, he will find that the whole of the amendments were intended to relax the provisions of the principal Act in favour of the drink-seller.

814. I do not agree with you—some of the amendments were intended to make the law more easily enforceable—was it not the case with regard to the packet licenses? I do not refer to packet licenses. But take the constitution of the Licensing Bench. Instead of having three Magistrates to sit and try offences under the Act, there is now only one. No matter how strong-minded a Magistrate may be, three are better than one, especially when there are four or five lawyers in favour of defending the publican.

815. Then you think the authority created by the amending Act not so good as that which was created by the original Act? That is what I mean. Under the principal Act a publican could not appeal if the fine was under £5, but now he may appeal no matter what the amount of the fine is. The effect of that has been that appeals have gone to the Quarter Sessions and they were upset. The same class of evidence was brought there by the publican, and the swearing was so strong that the Judges give the benefit of the doubt in favour of the weight of evidence. It is quite certain that the publican can bring twice as much evidence as the police can; a publican can generally bring seven or eight witnesses, where the police can bring only one or two.

816. I gather from what you say that it would be better to have a special authority to deal with publicans' offences than to have them dealt with by the Stipendiaries, who have so much work to do that they cannot give that attention to the business that a special authority would? I think so. I do not wish to say anything against the Licensing Magistrates. The whole of my dealings are with the Magistrates at the Central Police Court. Better men than some of them could not sit on the Bench; there could not be better Magistrates than Mr. Dillon, Mr. Clarke, Mr. Abbott, and Mr. Buchanan.

817. You have mentioned the permanent Magistrates; have you any objection to the deputies? Well, they have not had the experience of the other men. Mr. Dillon was a splendid Magistrate. I believe that if he had remained on the Bench, and the principal Act had been continued as it was, we should have suppressed a great deal of the work that is now going on, such as Sunday selling and other breaches of the law. He frightened them. He told the publicans one time that if they did not conduct their houses better he would refuse to renew their licenses.

818. When you are objecting to the renewal of licenses do you find any difficulty in getting the Magistrates to take notice of your objections? We tried that three or four years ago, and they took no notice of it, although I believe that if we had been assisted as we had expected it would have helped us a great deal.

819. When you have objected to renewals, have the Magistrates told you that they declined to accept any surmises of the police; in other words, that unless you had convictions to show they would not take your statement? Yes.

820. Have the Magistrates refused to go into evidence to enable you to prove your statements? Not with me. Last year I objected to five or six renewals, and they took the whole of my evidence.

821. They considered the case? Yes.

822. With what result? They granted the license after all the evidence was given. I had a very strong case against a woman who keeps a house at the Haymarket. She came out of Inspector Anderson's division into Campbell-street, opposite the Market-square. She was keeping her house so badly in the other division, that that she was afraid that if she went anywhere else she would be unable to get a license. She therefore got a man to let her use his name, and the license was transferred from the original holder to this man, for the woman's benefit. Young prostitutes and larrikins are continually at the house. Last year I opposed the renewal of the license because of the way in which she conducts her house, but she got the better of me. I also summoned her, but she got the better of me on each occasion. When I opposed the renewal of the license I showed that it was held for her by a dummy, and I thought I had a strong case, but as soon as the evidence was given the license was granted. That was the strongest case I had.

Inspector
Mackay.

22 Mar., 1886.

823. You say that the man gave her the use of his name? Yes; his name is over the door. We call that a "dummy." The woman swears that she is only a servant, and that the man is paying her so much a week. The man went and swore the same, but we believe different.

824. Had you any evidence against her of selling on Sundays? No; strange to say, there is no complaint against her on that score. She is not nearly so bad in that respect as some of the others. She keeps the house in the name of a dummy, who is never seen there. If we call and ask where is Mr. So-and-so, no matter how many times a day, we are always told that he has just gone out. The man was living seven streets away from the house. That is not the only case. There are several others, but they best us, I am sorry to say.

825. Your impression is that the Licensing Bench have a disinclination to refuse the renewal of licenses unless they have direct evidence of convictions? They must have direct evidence.

826. Do you think there is much Saturday drunkenness in consequence of the closing of the houses on Sundays—do you think that, in consequence of this, people take liquor to their houses on Saturdays and drink too much of it? I do not think so.

827. You do not think that it has had the effect of making the customer of the publican obtain his liquor in anticipation of Sunday? I do not think so.

828. Do many people go out of your district to other places to obtain liquor on the Sunday? No, I rather think they come from other districts to mine; I know that they come from Sussex-street and the Glebe.

829. Are you acquainted with the Licensing Acts of any other countries? Yes; I was in the police force in Scotland many years ago; I was there when the Forbes-McKenzie Act came into force.

830. Do you think the habits of the people here, as far as they have come under your notice, testify to a love of ardent liquor as against beer? I do not know.

831. Do you know what they drink? The majority drink beer—there is a large amount of beer consumed.

832. Yes, but we are inclined to think that a large amount of the drunkenness does not result from beer: do you think the drunkenness is to be attributed to the indulgence in spirituous rather than in fermented liquors? I do not know.

833. When people ask for a threepenny glass, is not that rum? They ask for rum, brandy, and other spirits.

834. You do think there is a large consumption of distilled liquor? No doubt of it.

835. Have you ever formed the opinion that people would be more temperate if they indulged less in spirituous liquors, and drank mild beers in preference—you know the German lager? Yes; I heard of it.

836. It is mild, and some people think harmless? Yes, so it is said.

837. Do you think it would be any advantage if any encouragement were given to houses selling liquor of that kind? No doubt if they do not keep from it altogether, it would be better if the people take a mild liquor. We have a very nice mild wine in the Colony, but the people do not take to it—they prefer strong drink.

838. What do you ascribe that to? They must have got a taste for it, and do not care for anything else.

839. Have you many colonial wine-shops in your division? Yes, about fifteen.

840. Are they much patronized? I think they are most patronized by families purchasing a bottle occasionally; there is very little drinking at the bar; there are only two shops in my division that sell wine by the glass.

841. Have you any suggestion to make as to the hours of closing—do you think any alteration should be made? I should most certainly recommend that the houses should continue to be closed on Sundays.

842. You would adhere to that? Decidedly so.

843. What do you say with regard to the hours on week-days? I think they are reasonably fair. If any alteration was to be made with regard to the hours of closing, I should propose that it should be 10.30.

844. You would? Yes.

845. It has been suggested that an extra half-hour should be allowed in the interests of the people who attend the theatres, so as they can get a glass when they leave; what is your opinion? My opinion is that when people go to the theatre they ought to purchase what they require before they go, and take it when they return.

846. Mr. Davies.] Have you a return showing the number of convictions for drunkenness on Sundays? No, I have not kept them separate. I can show the number of arrests; I have returns of the number of arrests from 6 o'clock on Sunday morning to 6 o'clock on Monday morning. For 1881, the year before the present Act came into force, the number was 311 for drunkenness, and 101 for being drunk and disorderly; in 1882, the year that the principal Act came into force, there were only ninety arrests for drunkenness, and thirty-two for being drunk and disorderly—that was the first year of the operation of the Act; in 1883, the year when the Act was amended and its provisions relaxed in favour of the publicans, 120 were brought in for drunkenness, and fifty-eight for being drunk and disorderly; in 1884, there were 103 for drunkenness, and thirty-nine for being drunk and disorderly; in 1885, there were eighty-four only for drunkenness, and thirty-eight for being drunk and disorderly.

847. I understood you to say that no more than two obeyed the law with regard to Sunday closing? As I have said, I only know two who, I think, would not sell a glass of liquor on Sunday, and they are doubtful. One is an eccentric old man, and he obeys the law more from eccentricity than anything else; he would not sell on Sunday to his own brother. The other is a very respectable man, whom I have known for twenty-five years, and I am told that he would not sell on Sundays. Some of the sub-inspectors who go out on Sundays know more about it than I do.

848. What is the general character and conduct of the houses in your district now, as compared with their general character and conduct under the old Act? Some of the houses in George-street, although a glass of liquor may be sold in them occasionally on Sundays, are fairly well conducted. 849.

- Inspector Mackay. 849. Has there been any marked improvement in the conduct of the houses in your district, under the new Act, as compared with the old one? No, I think they are worse.
- 22 Mar., 1886. 850. Worse than under the old Act? Yes, especially those in the back parts of the city, where they are away from police supervision.
851. Then you attribute it not to the law but to the want of police supervision? I would not say that exactly; we are doing all that we can to put a stop to it; my return shows what has been done. If there were 500 policemen out the publicans could beat us. Last week I met a very respectable ex-publican at the Glebe, who said to me, "I see there is a Commission sitting to inquire into the working of the Licensing Act." I said, "Yes." He said, "I could defy all the police in your division to catch me, that is if I chose. I should simply let in five or six of my known customers at a time, turn the key in the door, serve them and let them out, and what could you do?"
852. In what respect would you suggest that the present law should be amended in order to make it more effective for the prevention of Sunday selling? I believe in the law being made more restrictive—not in its being made more lax in favour of the hotel-keeper.
853. What would you suggest in the way of restriction? I think that a suitable Licensing Act if strictly administered would stop a great deal of drunkenness.
854. In what respect does the present Act fail? In the respect which I have just stated,—that the publicans get into the habit of watching the police. I do not know of anything which would make matters better, except we take the English law for it.
855. President.] Do you think that, in respect of making the Act more effective, the publicans will be more deterred from breaches of the Act if they think that their renewals will be jeopardized, than they would if the Act were made more stringent, so that convictions could be obtained against them more readily; in other words, which would be the better deterrent—the consciousness that they will lose their licenses, or that they would be fined, or perhaps imprisoned—which would you prefer? I would suggest both most decidedly. I am of opinion that convictions should follow the house as well as the publican.
856. Mr. Davies.] As under the old law? Under that the house was affected for three years only. In my division, several houses which were closed in that way have been re-opened. One in Albion-street, which has been closed for three years, was re-opened last week. If the convictions were to follow the house, there would be a great deterrent in this way. At present, when a publican has been twice convicted, he applies for a transfer and out he goes; he goes into another house, and commences there without a scratch against his name.
857. By that means he evades the intention of the law? Of course he does, but if the convictions against him remained with the house the next tenant would be more careful; he would say to himself "I must be very careful; there are already two convictions against the house, and if I am convicted once I shall lose my license."
858. Would it not be a great hardship to the owner of the property if the house were to be disqualified for all time as you suggest? I consider not, because, as I have suggested to many owners of public-houses with whom I have conversed on the subject, they could protect themselves to a certain extent by being more careful in drawing out the leases. If it were made a condition of the lease that it should be cancelled on the lessee being once convicted, I think that it would act as a great deterrent.
859. Coming back to Sunday closing, is there a very marked change in the way in which Sundays are kept now, as compared with the way in which they were kept under the old law? Very much; notwithstanding the large amount of drunkenness and larrikinism in the back-slums of the city, Sundays are better kept now than they were under the law of 1881—the order of the city is much better. I could not on any consideration advocate the re-opening of public-houses on Sundays.
860. Would you favour their being opened part of the day? Not a minute of the day; I believe in restriction. If you relax the provision it will be retrograde legislation, in my opinion. I am most decidedly in favour of absolute Sunday closing.
861. You speak from personal knowledge of the good results of the present law? From my personal knowledge, and my experience in the city and in the police force.
862. As the result of Sunday closing, you say that, notwithstanding the increase in the population, the arrests for drunkenness have been less under the new law than under the old law? Much less.
863. As to the closing at 11 p.m. on week-days, do you find any great improvement? A great improvement. When the hotels were open until 12 o'clock we could not get the streets quite free from people going home until 2 o'clock in the morning. Now they are turned out at 11 o'clock. I have no complaint to make against the publicans in this respect—they do very little business after 11 o'clock. On the whole, I think that the 11 o'clock closing provision answers very well.
864. You regard it as a great improvement on the old law? I do, indeed.
865. With regard to the opening of hotels at 6 in the morning, is that any advantage? Some of the publicans opened before 6, and I had them convicted. In Scotland hotels are not opened until 8 o'clock, but I do not advocate that here.
866. You think that 6 o'clock is a sufficiently early hour for hotels to be opened? I would not, by any means, open them earlier; I think that that is a very fair hour. We have no difficulty in this respect, except that some of the publicans open at an earlier hour—half-past 5 or so. They send out men to watch for the police. We see men going in and out before 6 o'clock.
867. What number of police, including officers, are there in your division? Eighty-three, all told; there are three sub-licensing inspectors, besides myself.
868. There are 178 licensed houses in your division? Yes.
869. During last year, as compared with the previous year, there was a decrease of 300 in the arrests for drunkenness? Yes; strange to say, that occurred in my division, but in other divisions there were increases. There was an increase of 111 under the head "drunk and disorderly" last year, as compared with the previous year.
870. Have you paid any attention to the question of local option? I have given it very little thought. I am in favour of it, but I am afraid that you would not get the people to take as much interest in the matter as they do in general electioneering matters.
871. You are of opinion that if it were the law at present it would be almost inoperative? As far as I can judge, from conversations which I have had with citizens on the subject, I am afraid that they would think very little about it. Of course I exclude members of temperance bodies, who take a great interest in the question.

Inspector
Mackay.

22 Mar., 1886.

872. You would rely more on restrictive legislation than on local option? Yes. Local option might have the effect of closing a great number of the low public-houses which we cannot get at in any other way.
873. Have you any records showing the number of deaths which are attributable to excessive drinking of intoxicating liquors? No.
874. You have no recollection of any particular number in your division? No. We glean such information sometimes at inquests, but I have kept no record of it.
875. In reply to the President, you stated that there is a large amount of drunkenness among the youth of the Colony? I am sorry to say that there is.
876. About what age? From sixteen to twenty, and twenty-two.
877. Both sexes? Yes. I may mention a case of a respectable shopkeeper in George-street, not forty yards from my station, who has a boy fourteen years of age. The lad is perhaps a little wild, but he helps his father in his trade. He has got into the habit of going to a public-house in Parramatta-street, where he gets drunk; his mother has found him there on several occasions, lying drunk on a sofa, and on another occasion she found him lying drunk in the parlour. The publican does not turn him out, but puts him away in one of the spare rooms until he gets sober. Of course he is unfit for his work on the following day. The father and the mother went to the publican last week to question him about the matter, and they found that the boy had run up a score of 15s. for drink. I have issued a summons against the publican, and the case will be heard next Friday. He will be charged with supplying liquor to a person under the limited age—sixteen years.
878. Considering that the youths of the country have taken to drinking as you state, do you think that the limit ought to be reduced? I do not know that there could be a better limit than sixteen years. Some lads are almost men at sixteen; they are tall and manly in appearance, while others at the same age are very diminutive and boyish in appearance. It would be hard for the publican to judge the age of the youths, because the Act says "apparently." One person may apparently look old, and another of the same age very young. I do not know that any improvement could be made as to the age.
879. You would not recommend a reduction to fourteen years? If you reduced the limit to fourteen years, that would allow the publicans to supply liquor to boys of sixteen. If any alteration were made it ought to be to eighteen years.
880. Have you had many complaints from parents and friends with reference to youths taking drink? I have had several publicans punished for the offence.
881. Were they young people to whom the liquor was supplied? Yes; parents are very dilatory in coming forward to give information. The whole case would rest on the youth, unless his parents came forward and stated that he had been drunk, and that he was supplied with the liquor at a particular public-house.
882. Are not some of the houses in your division very badly conducted? There are not worse in the world I believe.
883. They are mere drinking shanties? Yes, they exist for no other purpose.
884. You say that the Licensing Bench do not pay as much attention to cases now as they did during the first year when the Act was in operation? I have explained that one Magistrate deals with the case now, whereas during the first year they could not be dealt with by less than three Magistrates.
885. Then your complaint is against the amending Act? Yes, I think that the principal Act was amended too soon; it had been in operation a year only when it was amended. The Licensing Act which came into force in England in 1872 was not amended until 1874, and the amendments made were to restrict the provisions of the principal Act. Here the amendments made were to relax the provisions of the principal Act instead of restricting them. The Act was relaxed in favour of the publicans. I say that unhesitatingly.
886. Are there in your division any bars sub-let to gay females? There have been one or two, but I do not know that there are any now. There was one in Parramatta-street which was sub-let, but we could not prove it.
887. What was the general character of the house? It was and is badly conducted. The bar is still in existence, but I cannot prove that it is sub-let.
888. Is it the resort of prostitutes and people of low fame? I cannot say that it is the resort of prostitutes, but young men from eighteen to twenty-one years of age frequent it very much; whenever they are in the house they are to be found at this bar up-stairs.
889. Is there more than one female in the establishment? There are two or three girls, and a person always at the bar up-stairs. I am strongly opposed to there being more than one bar in connection with a public-house, and that bar ought to be down-stairs, so that the world may see what is being done.
890. Have you taken any steps with regard to the house to which you refer? We cannot—we must have a case before we take any steps; I wish that we could. We cannot prove that the bar is sub-let; we only surmise that it is so from the character of the women there, and of the young men who frequent this bar. It is a sixpenny bar; down-stairs the price of drinks is 3d.
891. Have you any suggestions to make with reference to future legislation, so as to make the law more effectual than it is at the present time? This far I would go: I would assimilate our law to that of England, which makes the publican accountable for persons found in his house. Then we could take action in such a case as that which I have described—where we see as many as half a dozen people going in and out of an hotel at one time. The section which there is in the old Act, making the publican liable to a penalty if people were seen going in and out of the house promiscuously, would be a great help towards stopping Sunday selling. Under that section I have secured many convictions myself. I have not gone near the houses, but from the opposite side of the street have seen people going in and out promiscuously and have then taken out summonses. The offence was one which the publicans could not deny having committed, and I think that if the provision were in force now it would make the publicans more careful.
892. Under the old Act the hotels were open from 1 till 3 o'clock on Sundays? Yes.
893. Would you advocate going back to that system? By no means. I approve of restrictive legislation entirely; once the public-houses are shut, I say keep them shut.
894. You have stated that there is a large amount of perjury in connection with cases under the Licensing Act? I never know of so much perjury being committed during the fourteen years that I have been at the Court. There is more perjury committed in connection with the Licensing Act, I think, than there is in connection with any other Act in the Statute Book.
895. And the opening of the public-houses on Sundays would not get rid of that? Oh dear no. If you allowed

- Inspector Mackay. allowed the houses to be opened at any time during the day the publicans would get their rooms filled with people during that time, and when the hour for closing arrived they would shut the doors, and the people would be kept inside drinking for any length of time.
- 22 Mar., 1886. 896. You say that there was a larger amount of immorality and drunkenness in connection with Sunday trading under the old law than there is under the new one? Yes.
897. Mr. Colls.] Has there been a large increase of population in your division during the last two years? It has largely increased; we know that by the Electoral Roll which we have to make up.
898. Are the hotels in your division up to the standard in accommodation—that is, number of rooms and air space? Every one of them. We see to that every quarter when we inspect them.
899. Suppose that a party of three or four persons from the country wished to get a night's lodging at an hotel, at how many of the hotels in your division could they be accommodated? My station being near the railway station I come in contact with a large number of people from the country, perhaps more so than any other officer. I am constantly being asked by people where they can get a bed, what public-house I would recommend, and that sort of thing. Strange to say, although I direct them to what I regard as respectable public-houses, they cannot get accommodation. The usual statement of the publican is, "We are full." They do not care about taking in lodgers for one night; if they have lodgers at all, they are weekly boarders.
900. Could the publicans give the accommodation if they chose to do so? I think so.
901. Many of them? Yes; the largest number would be in George-street. There are Wood's Hotel at the Haymarket and Smith's Hotel in Regent-street where accommodation may be had. I do not think that any respectable person would be refused accommodation at Wood's Hotel if it were available. Of course they must be very cautious as to who they take in, otherwise they might have robberies in their houses every night.
902. How many houses do you think there are in your division which could not give the accommodation? All of them with the exception of ten; there may be ten out of the 178. The rooms are in the houses, but the publicans do not care about taking in lodgers.
903. Do not some of them take weekly boarders at a low rate, so that the men may spend the balance of their wages in drink? I fancy they do.
904. Have you been troubled much with sly grog selling in your division? Not much.
905. Have you had any cases? I have had two or three persons fined during the last two years. I had the keeper of an oyster saloon fined £30, and also a woman who keeps a gay house.
906. I am given to understand that there is a great deal of drink sold and consumed in these gay houses? Yes, and at high prices; 5s. for a bottle of beer, and 10s. for a bottle of brandy.
907. I suppose it is difficult to get cases against these people? It is very difficult. There is not so much difficulty in getting cases as in proving them, for the reason that we can get no one to come forward and admit having been in such houses.
908. Do not you think that imprisonment without the option of a fine would check sly grog selling? The fine is very heavy—£30. I am afraid that you would not get the Legislature to pass a law providing for imprisonment without the option of a fine.
909. Are there many places in your division where inducements are held out to young people to spend money—skittle alleys, dancing saloons, and the like? There are very few dancing saloons now; we have been trying to put them down, but the people surrounding them do not complain very often, otherwise we should be more successful. They are afraid that if they make complaints the frequenters of the saloons will damage their property. Not long ago I closed one which used to exist at the corner of Abercrombie and Cleveland Streets. After the habitués of the place came out of it at night they indulged in frightful cursing and swearing, and kicking up a riot in the street, and I got some of the neighbours to complain, whereupon I summoned the keeper and he was committed for trial at the Quarter Sessions. On his promising to close the place he was let off; it only cost him his defence at the Police Court.
910. Is it your duty to take samples of spirits? No; of course I could do so, but the duty is performed by Mr. Lenthall, who is chief inspector under the Licensing Act.
911. I suppose you sometimes get complaints about the quality of liquors sold? We sometimes hear of men being drugged.
912. Are there many stores in your division where they sell two gallons of liquor? There are some spirit merchants, but I have no trouble with them. I do not think that any one of these sells less than the stipulated quantity. I have confidence in them that they would not sell less than the quantity allowed.
913. You think that the number of young people from sixteen to twenty who take intoxicating liquor is increasing in your division? Yes.
914. As fast as the population is? Yes; I am sorry to see that the young people are getting so fond of drink.
915. How many of the so-called private bars are there in your division? There are two houses which have them; I consider that both houses are very badly conducted.
916. Where are these bars situated? Up-stairs, and in one case it is a back room.
917. I suppose you are aware that in some of the hotels where these private bars exist there are plates with "Miss So-and-so, lessee," written upon them? There may be such places in my division, but I do not know of them.
918. Mr. Roseby.] I understood you to say that of all the public-houses in your division you did not think there were more than ten who supplied accommodation to casual visitors to the city? They could do so if they liked, and I am surprised to find that they do not. I believe there are about nine or ten houses which would give such accommodation if the person asking for it were respectable. The houses in those cases are large; they might have eight or nine rooms independently of the number required by the Act; they thus have greater facilities for supplying the accommodation. The other small houses have simply the rooms required by the Act, and a bed-room for the landlord.
919. Did you not hint just now that you thought the accommodation provision was largely evaded by the landlord's sub-letting a portion of his licensed premises? That is so in small houses. When the Act came into force there were not the requisite number of rooms in these houses. They required to have two sitting-rooms and four bed-rooms, for the accommodation of the public, independently of the landlord's sleeping and sitting-rooms. They would require at the least five bed-rooms. But in many cases the landlord would require three or four bed-rooms for his own use, independently of the four for the use of the public. In cases cases where a dwelling-house was next to one of these hotels, they found that the quickest way was to lease it and open up a door from the hotel, making it appear a portion of the public-house. We found in the course of the first year that the door opened up in this manner was afterwards bricked in, and the dwelling let to a tenant. That being so, you will see that the houses would not have the required accommodation for lodgers. I have a man summoned now—I expect that the case will be heard in a fortnight—for doing this very thing at the Glebe.

Inspector
Mackay.
22 Mar., 1886.

920. You spoke of a number of low pot-houses; would no complaint of the police against such houses be entertained by the Licensing Magistrates, with a view to their being closed? Of course we bring forward no complaint; except with regard to renewals since the present Act came into force the Magistrates have taken no notice of these complaints. Of course if a man has been three times convicted we can deal with him independently of his renewal.

921. But that form of conviction is evaded by the licensee transferring his interest to another house after his second conviction? Yes.

922. You say that there are a number of houses which are the resort of larrikins and prostitutes, and young persons who drink, and that nevertheless there is no provision under the present Act by which you can deal with them? Not to close them.

923. You would recommend that in any new legislation the police should have the power to indict a house for being of that character? If you could get the Magistrates to support that view; but the Magistrates will not close a house upon an assumption. We can only speak of the characters we see going into the houses, and of their low conduct in and out of them. I do not know that a Magistrate would be inclined to shut up a house because it is frequented by these characters—at least they do not do it.

924. I understood you to say that there were only one or two houses in your division which would not supply drink on Sunday? That is my opinion.

925. What course would you suggest should be adopted to bring these flagrant violators of the law to justice—the quantity of convictions you have been able to secure is insignificant in comparison with the number of violations of the law? I can show a large number of convictions.

926. You say that there have been fifty in the course of a year; but if there are 178 houses in your division, almost every one of which sells liquor on Sunday, you must see that in the course of twelve months there must be a very large number of violations of the law? You can account for that by the way in which they evade the police.

927. What means would you suggest should be adopted for the punishment of these flagrant violators of the law? I would make them responsible for the persons seen going into their houses.

928. Would you make the fact of persons being seen going in and out of a house sufficient proof that the law was being violated? That a man was keeping his house open for the purpose of selling liquor. That is so in England. I have been speaking to one of my men who is recently out from home; he had a good deal to do with the working of the Licensing Act, and he tells me that they can apprehend a man found upon the publicans' premises if he refuses to give his name and address. There they punish both the publican and the persons found in his house. That we cannot do here unless we find a man drinking, but even then they give a wrong name and address, and the summons cannot be served.

929. As to your statement relative to the increase of drunkenness among the young during the last eight or ten years, do you think that the employment of gay girls at bars is accountable for any of that increase? I do not think so. In my division very few bar girls are employed.

930. From your extensive experience, do you think that young women should be employed in serving liquor? I think young women might be better employed than at the bar of a public-house; I would rather see a man there than a young girl.

931. Then you think that young girls should not be employed to sell liquor at the bars? I would rather see the bars in charge of men.

932. Or the wives of the licensees? Or the wives of the licensees.

933. Dancing rooms are not allowed in connection with public-houses? No.

934. I suppose they are sometimes established in the neighbourhood of public-houses? They get very near a public-house if they can.

935. Are there any in your division now? None now. There was one opened for the last time in Harris-street, Ultimo, last Saturday night. The lessee and the owner of the premises requested me to send two constables. He was afraid that the people would break in if the house were closed against them, and that they might destroy the property; but he reconsidered the matter, and allowed them in for the last time. Strange to say, few complaints are made by the neighbours, although the people frequently come out of the room and quarrel. The police make a great many arrests at the door. You see the persons who complained would have to go to the Police Court, and perhaps to the Sessions. That would mean a considerable loss of time and business. Men do not care for that over a dancing-room affair; most of them regard it as a frivolous matter.

936. Many houses, in your opinion, are carried on by dummies—that is, by persons who are not the bond fide proprietors? With the exception of the case at the Haymarket, which I mentioned in reply to the President, I do not know of any. I expect, however, that an application for a transfer will be granted on Tuesday next, and the house will then be in the hands of an apparently respectable man from Fiji. The woman of course may get another house, and place Dick, Jim, or Harry, in charge.

937. Do you know whether the wine and spirit merchants hold bills of sale over some houses, and whether the men who conduct them are simply their agents? I do not know that; it has been said that it is so, and I believe it to be the case, but I am not in a position to prove it. It was largely done before the Act came into force, but since then that sort of thing has been kept from us more than before.

938. Mr. Hyam.] You have been many years at the Central Police Office? Yes.

939. You are aware that a great number of the persons who are apprehended for drunkenness are old offenders? Yes.

940. And are brought up week after week, month after month? That is so.

941. Do you think that state of things exists now? Not so much as formerly; these people are dying out. If you were in my station on Saturday night you would be surprised to see the number of young persons who are brought in, and charged with riotous behaviour and drunkenness—young girls and young men.

942. I know that when I sat upon the Bench we saw old offenders week after week? Oh yes; Betty McCluskie would be up more than thirty times in a year.

- Inspector Mackay.
22 Mar., 1886.
943. You are opposed to the opening of houses on Sunday? Yes.
944. Do you think they should be opened at no time on Sunday? I think it would be retrograde legislation. The houses are closed now, and I think it would be decidedly a step in the wrong direction to re-open them.
945. Do you think the present law is an improvement upon the old law, which was administered previous to 1881, when I sat upon the Bench? I am glad you asked me that question, because since the Act came into force I have said to some of my men and to others that I considered it cumbersome. I was of opinion that a few amendments of the old Act would suit the requirements of the Colony. I think, for instance, that we might have been given power under the old Act to stop the Sunday drinking. The closing of the houses on Sunday and at 11 o'clock at night are good provisions of the new Act, but I think that the other provisions of the old Act, as to transfer and other matters, were working very well. The Act might have been amended in three or four particulars. I consider, however, that the present Act is cumbersome in comparison with the old one. There are some grand provisions in the new Act, but they are all evaded. There were no such evasions under the old Act, and I think that a few amendments would have sufficed.
946. You think it desirable, in the interests of the Colony, not of the city alone, that we should have an Act similar to that in existence in England? I am not thoroughly conversant with that Act, but I approve of its provisions with regard to Sunday selling.
947. That is to say, that the onus of proof should rest with the publican and with the persons found in his house, and not with the police? Yes. If we do not adopt some provision of that kind, things will continue as they are at present.
948. You may remember that in years gone by a great many prostitutes used to frequent certain public-houses in the city? A great number.
949. Does that state of things exist now? Yes.
950. To as great an extent? Yes. I am inclined to think that there are more now than under the old Act. At the time you are speaking of most of the women were what are called "old stagers"—imported prostitutes—that is, imported from the other Colonies and from England. Now, I am sorry to say, it is the young native girls who are mostly to be found there.
951. And there is a good deal of prostitution among them? A wonderful amount.
952. Do you think that the present Act deals as effectively as the old Act with cases in which prostitutes are found in public-houses? If I remember rightly, the word "knowingly" was inserted in the amended Act; that is to say, the publican cannot be prosecuted unless the women are in the house to his knowledge. The same with regard to dice—you would have to prove that the publican was present when the dice were being thrown.
953. You think, then, that the present Act should be amended? It should be amended and made more restrictive, or it should be repealed and a new measure should be introduced.
954. You are aware that a great many persons who are seen under the influence of liquor are not apprehended? A great many are never locked up. I tell my men not to interfere with an intoxicated person if he is going home quietly and if he is not disturbing any person. I do not approve of taking him to the lock-up under those circumstances. What is the use of it?
955. I asked the question with a view to showing that there is a great deal more drinking going on than the drink records show? Yes, that is so, although the matter you refer to does not come under our cognizance.
956. But you have noticed what I refer to? Oh yes; it is an every-day occurrence; a lot of people get home drunk without coming under our notice, and very rightly so too.
957. Mr. Colls.] Have you any of these drinking clubs in your division? I have a club which they call the "Buffaloes"; it meets at a public-house.
958. That is not the kind of club to which I refer—I mean the common drinking clubs, where a man, by giving his name or a card, can go in and get what drink he pleases on Sunday or at any other time—You have none of those? No.

FRIDAY, 26 MARCH, 1886.

Present:—

ALEX. OLIVER, Esq., M.A., PRESIDENT,	R. FOWLER, Esq., J.P.,
T. COLLS, Esq., J.P.,	G. WITHERS, Esq., J.P.,
A. HUTCHISON, Esq.,	J. DAVIES, Esq., C.M.G., J.P., M.P.,
J. ROSEBY, Esq., J.P.,	N. MELVILLE, Esq., M.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Atwill, Sub-Inspector of Police, called in, sworn, and examined:—

- Sub-Inspector Atwill.
26 Mar., 1886.
959. President.] What are the boundaries of your division? They extend from Macquarie-street, along Hunter-street, to the waters' edge, taking in Balmain, and to Barranjoey, including Manly Beach. My division extends as far as the Hawkesbury.
960. Then from the boundaries of Inspector Anderson's division, that portion of the city which is bounded by Port Jackson, as well as Balmain and the country as far as the Hawkesbury, makes up your division? Yes.
961. Then, as a matter of fact, you have most of the shipping? I have a large portion of the shipping.
962. How long have you been in charge of that division? Since 1882.
963. That is to say, since the new Licensing Act came into operation? I was here before that.
964. Do you furnish to the Inspector-General the materials on which part of his annual report is based—I mean the apprehensions for drunkenness in your division? I do.
965. I should like to know what the number of apprehensions for drunkenness was during the years 1882, 1883, 1884, and 1885? I have made out a list. During the year 1881 (the year before the present Act came into force) I had 1,454 apprehensions for drunkenness in my division—that is, for simple drunkenness—and 627 for drunkenness and disorderly conduct. In 1882 there were 1,562 apprehensions for simple drunkenness, and 436 for drunkenness and disorderly conduct. In 1883 there were 2,386 apprehensions for simple drunkenness, and 505 for drunkenness and disorderly conduct. In 1884 there were 2,620 apprehensions for simple drunkenness, and 460 for drunkenness and disorderly conduct. In 1885 there were 3,237 apprehensions for simple drunkenness, and 491 for drunkenness and disorderly conduct. The apprehensions apprehensions for Sunday drunkenness—that is, between 6 o'clock in the morning and 12 o'clock at night—not including what we call Saturday night drunkenness—were, in 1881, 268; in 1882, 139; in 1883, 179; in 1884, 196; in 1885, 245, or within 22 of the number in 1881, before the Act came into force.

Sub-Inspector
Atwill.
26 Mar., 1886.

966. You do not know the population in your division? No.

967. So far, then, as the returns are a guide, you are under the impression, I presume, that drunkenness in your division is on the increase? Yes, largely on the increase.

968. Both simple drunkenness, and drunkenness and disorderly conduct? Yes, and the figures I have given do not nearly represent the actual amount of drunkenness. There are many people who go about in a state of drunkenness, but whom the police cannot swear to be drunk.

969. In other words, the returns do not show the amount of intemperance? No, nor one-half. A great many more people get drunk than are arrested.

970. Are the apprehensions for drunkenness and for drunkenness and disorderliness confined to any particular class—are they principally confined to the sailor class? No; our native youths between the ages of sixteen and twenty are becoming greatly addicted to drunkenness; gambling also is predominant among them. A great cause of this is the up-stair bar in licensed houses; they are the ruin of the youths of this city. Many of them are the sons of men in good positions in society, and they come down from these up-stair bars after drinking there, not completely drunk, but in such a condition as just to be able to take each other's arm and make their way home without affording any cause for police interference.

971. I suppose you will not be surprised to hear that the returns from your division are more startling than those from the other divisions? You must remember that there is a large amount of shipping in my divisions. Sometimes when a large ship comes into port with a crew of 200 or 300 men, as many as 100 of them will get drunk in one night.

972. Do women and young people figure largely in your returns? The drunkenness is chiefly among the labouring class and the sailors.

973. How about women? There are not so many women apprehended in my division for drunkenness as in the other divisions, particularly the division of Mr. Waters, which includes Woolloomooloo.

974. And young men of the ages you mentioned, between sixteen and twenty? There is a large number of young men arrested for drunkenness.

975. Now, with regard to the up-stair bars, you trace to them a great deal of the drunkenness among young men? Yes, a great deal.

976. Will you give us a short account of your experience with regard to them? Well, a lady takes one of these bars, and agrees to pay the landlord a certain sum, say £6 a week, and the landlord makes an agreement with her by which he has to pay her £1 per week, so as to make it appear that she is a servant or employée of his, though she is in reality the proprietress of the bar. I had a case in connection with the "Golden Age" some time ago. The landlord wanted to raise the rent on a lady who had an up-stair bar, and she said to him—"I am not able to pay you more than £3 10s. a week, and keep the place respectable." The landlord said—"I don't care about the respectability; you give me £5 a week, and I don't care what you do." I said to her—"What did he mean?" "Well," she said, "I meant that I could not keep the bar respectable if I paid him more rent, but I would have to put up with anything in that way and get more girls into the bar. The landlord said that he did not care. I asked if that was the prevailing impression among landlords who let up-stair bars, and she had not the slightest hesitation in admitting that the customers were cajoled by the women in the back rooms. She did not say what was done, but those bars are the great evil in connection with public-houses at the present time.

977. Have you any objection to give the name of the person you mention? I have an objection. The woman was prosecuted by me, and fined £30 for selling liquor without a license in an up-stair bar. The publican was fined £5. The same bar is still carried on, but another licensee is in possession of the house.

978. Are there many of these up-stair bars in your division? There are a few on Church Hill, but the most of them are in the body of the town.

979. Could you approximate to the number—have you twenty? No, not nearly that number. There are some hotels which have two or three bars. I think there are three bars in a house on Church Hill. In the "Golden Age" there is an upper bar. When I speak of an upper bar, I mean a bar up-stairs.

980. They are sometimes subtle to a woman? Yes, always.

981. Who is colourably an employée of the landlord? Only colourably; she is sole proprietress.

982. Does your experience concur with the statement made to you by the lady whose name you have not mentioned, that these upper bars are of the class indicated, viz., places of resort for dissolute characters? I believe that the constituents of the upper bars are what we call our respectable young men.

983. They meet persons there, so in that respect they become places of assignation? A woman was punished not long ago, or rather she was refused a license. Some girl swore that she managed bars in three or four places about York and King Streets, and a house in Myrtle-street, and that after the bar was shut the young men went and spent the Sabbath-day with her and some other women.

984. To what class do they belong? To the better classes—young men whom you do not see drinking long glasses of beer in the bar down-stairs.

985. Are there any dancing saloons in your district? There is one little place in Balmain, but it is not of any great importance.

986. No more? No.

987. Has there been any decrease in the number of licensed houses in your district lately? Some four houses were shut up; the number has been made up again, by the new houses that have been opened, to about the same number that there were in 1881.

988. What has been the general effect of the local option vote in your district? The people as a whole have not paid much attention to it.

989. Have they been for or against it? They have been nearly all against an increase of houses.

990. Whilst we are on this subject, tell us your opinion of local option? I think local option does good. It prevents my district and others from being inundated with public-houses, which we do not want. It prevents men from transferring their licenses from places in which they do not want to remain, to other parts where they think they could carry on a more profitable business. I think it has done good.

991. As far as its being an indication of the opinion of the ratepayers is concerned, do you think it has been effective? They have not given so much attention to it as it was expected they would.

- Sub-Inspector Atwill.
26 Mar., 1886.
992. There is a great deal of apathy on the subject: have you any ideas of your own as to the extension of the principle? I think that the local option we have is the thing that is wanted. I think, however, that no people should have a right to say that we should not have this or that.
993. On principle you are against it? I am against full local option.
994. Whether with or without the compensatory principle? I do not know about that. I am not quite educated as to what compensation might mean. I think full local option savours of what people might call tyranny.
995. Your attention may have been called to a peculiar effect which local option has had, viz., that it causes the publican and the local optionist to vote in the same way? I know one thing that the present local option system has done, and I do not know whether in this respect it has done good; it has raised the value of public-houses to an enormous extent. I remember that a house, which before 1881 could be got into for £300 or £350, now costs about £2,000; I think it has been very greatly in favour of the owners of public-houses. Men have to give large bonuses to get into the houses, and large bonuses to get out. I think it has had a bad effect in that way; it has raised the value of the houses too much.
996. Will you point out how you think that it is pernicious? Suppose I am a poor man who has by economy managed to put together £250, and I determine to take a public-house; I go to a broker, and I find that in a 3rd class street there is a 3rd class public-house, which can be purchased for £650; I have only £250, but the broker, or the wine and spirit merchant, or the brewer, accepts me with that amount. I am a man lifted out of the ranks of the working-classes; I enter the public-house; as soon as I open my door there is a debt of £450 over me. I pay my landlord on Monday morning, and I meet the bills of the brewer and of the spirit merchant at the end of the month; I am a stranger in a 3rd class street, having a strong competition to contend with; I find myself heavily handicapped, and in six months I am forced into the market poorer than I started by £200. I am forced into the market, so that those who have trusted me with their money may realize. I think that local option has raised the value of low public-houses, so that poor men who might embark in the business and make a living at it are not able to touch it.
997. That might be a subject of regret of itself, and it might not be wholly a matter of regret. Do you think that the enhanced value of the houses induces the publicans to break the law? I do, and I will tell you why. It was only last week that I was sent for by a widow in this town, whose son is a drinking man; she sent for me to see what I could do. I said—"I can do nothing, why do you give him any money?" She keeps a small shop, and she said—"I cannot keep it from him; he takes a tin of jam or a few eggs and goes to the public-house and gives them to the publican, and he takes them." I do not think a publican would do that if he was in a position to carry on business in a respectable way. I said to the woman—"You do not think the publican would take these things and give him drink for them?" and she said—"Yes, he does," and she mentioned the name of the publican. I think that if a publican was not handicapped by a big rent and other things which I have spoken of he would not do such things. He must have some means of paying his way. I think that the landlords of the small houses, being handicapped with debt, resort to stratagems and break the law in a way they would not if they were in a better position.
998. If you carry the restrictive process a little further, and increase the monopoly, the very evil you speak of must be enhanced; that is to say, if the tendency of the local option system is to restrict the number of public-houses and to raise the value inordinately, any further progress in that direction would have a proportionate effect in bringing about a proportionately large injury? Yes; but we might have a proportionately large number of men of means, who would lift the trade above its present position and make it respectable. Most of the men who take public-houses in my district are men who have worked at the gasworks or at some other works for years—men who are not business men, and who are not fit for business. When they get the house, they depend principally on their own class for support. These men, perhaps, would not be publicans if things were carried to the extent you speak of.
999. You are speaking of a house worth £600? Any house is worth that.
1000. If a house was worth £2,000, one of these men could not get it? No. No doubt these men trust men of their own class when they have not got any money, and do many things which would not be done if the house was taken by a man of means in the first instance.
1001. What experience have you had of the breaking of the law on Sundays in your district? We have some men who never break the law—we have never seen the public going in and out of their doors on Sundays.
1002. How many of these publicans are there in your division? About fourteen altogether.
1003. How many of the publicans in your district are law-abiding, and how many of them break the law? I do not know how many are strictly law-abiding, but there are about fifteen houses that we have never had any trouble with.
1004. Have you prosecuted any publicans for Sunday selling? Yes, a good many.
1005. What convictions have you obtained? A fair number of convictions, and a fair share of dismissals.
1006. Dismissals from the causes stated by the other inspectors I suppose—the precautions of the publicans? From the preponderance of evidence. I have seen officers who I have never known to tell me a lie contradicted in the witness-box. The public have gone up and sworn directly against their evidence. I had a very low public-house in my division, and not one of my officers could catch him. One evening I dressed myself in black, to go to church, and I did not look much like a policeman. The publican used to stand in the street, in his shirt-sleeves, and invite people in; but I managed to pass him and got into the house. When I entered, his wife was filling a long glass of ale for a man. I said—"You will not deny when you go to Court that this gentleman was seen drinking a glass of beer?" I tasted the remainder in the glass after the man had drunk the beer, and I said—"You will not deny when you go to the Court that I tasted this beer?" The publican was summoned, and they actually swore that what that man was served with was tonic water.
1007. I presume that the police in no case can have any possible object in laying an information unless on good grounds? Not the slightest, nor any feeling about the case being dismissed, further than this: that an officer, knowing that he has good and truthful men, feels it rather acutely that those men should be sworn to be perjurers in the presence of the general public. It is of no interest to us what is done with a case, be it dismissed, withdrawn, or otherwise dealt with, so long as we feel that we have done our duty; but as a fact we bring very few cases before the Licensing Bench now. There is a section of the principal Act which has had a serious effect; I thought at the time that the Bill was before Parliament Parliament it would act as it has done. I refer to the provision for punishing persons found drinking in public-houses on Sundays. The effect of it is this: Jack Smith says to Tom Brown—"I have had my drink; I will stop outside and watch for the 'traps'—you go in and 'get yours.'" Thus the publicans who evade the law have enlisted in their favour the whole of the drinking public as scouts against the police. If this provision were not in the Act, these people would not care about the publicans or the police. In front of the hotels where the law is not observed you will see people walking up and down; in fact we have known a publican to send out his scouts to the station, to see in which way the plain-clothes men have gone. We are watched by every one looking for drink, as well as the publicans and their servants. Speaking for myself, I say that Sunday is the most miserable day I have; I would rather do the other six days' duty. We see hundreds of men passing out of public-houses; we know that the law is broken—we see a lot of half-drunken men in the streets—and we cannot make a move.

Sub-Inspector
Atwill.

1008. Are we to understand that you express the opinion that only the person who serves the drink should be punished, and not the person who partakes of it? Yes. I lost a case before the Judge the other day. A gentleman came to me and said that some one was being murdered at Hanney's public-house. I went there, and saw two men who had been fighting; they were both bleeding. One of the men was in the act of drinking a large glass of beer at the counter. I summoned the publican for serving a man whilst he was in a state of intoxication. The decision of the lower Court against the publican was appealed against—rather, I should say, the case was reheard. It is not an appeal at the Quarter Sessions; the appellants call perhaps seven or eight witnesses who never appeared in the lower Court. The conviction was quashed, on the ground that the liquor was not served by the licensee herself; the Judge said that she was not accountable for what was done by her servants in her absence.

1009. Are you sure about that? Yes.

1010. At what Court was that? The Quarter Sessions before the last; Mrs. Hanney was the appellant.

1011. Then you give that as one reason why you think that the Act makes a mistake in punishing the customer as well as the publican? I have always held that opinion; I think that we have been severely handicapped by the provision, as we have a lot of people watching us who otherwise would not do so. In the Act of 1882 it was provided that the police could summon a publican for delaying admittance to a constable who believed that the law was being broken. In the amending Act the provision was altered so that the delay must be wilful. From what we have seen we may believe that there are fifty people in a bar, and we walk up and knock at the door; the publican says—"Who's there?" and we answer "Police"; he says—"I have to run up-stairs to the Mrs. for the key." Before we are admitted of course the people inside are scattered all over the place—some in the water-closets, and others under beds—I have found as many as eight men under one bed at an hotel in Kent-street. To secure a conviction we have to swear that the delay was wilful. How can we swear that? This provision has also handicapped us.

1012. Have you experienced much delay in getting admittance? Yes, great delay. At one place I did not wait very long; but I went around to the yard, and I saw at least forty men there, and half that number between the front of the house and the yard. We had no means of getting into that house while the people were there—not the slightest. The publican would be sitting at the door himself, and he would see us from the back as well. People on the verandahs opposite actually watched for us coming. The publican to whom I refer ran a course like this for three years; he often boasted about it, and dared us to catch him. He said—"I don't care how soon you catch me—I have made enough." As a fact he made more money than any other publican in my division on the Sabbath-day; I am sure that 300 people were supplied here with liquor every Sabbath-day, and we could not touch him in any way. I say candidly that I am not able with the men I have—and I have good men who have stood by me faithfully—to contend with the publicans as the law stands.

1013. Have you any other statutory remedy to suggest? There is another thing to which I should like to refer—that is, gambling in hotels. I am sorry that I did not bring some letters which I have received lately. Some people may think that the playing of dominoes in a public-house is a harmless thing; but I am sure that many men take three or four drinks who would have been quite satisfied with one, and would have gone away after taking it, if it were not for the dominoes on the counter. We cannot take any action in the matter, because we never see any stakes being played for. On no consideration ought gaming of any kind to be allowed in a public-house. I may tell you that we have actually seen publicans playing fan-tan in chinese gambling dens. When they do that, what will they not do in their own houses? A woman who described herself as a coal-lumper's wife came to me the other day and said—"You know me; you see my children bare-footed, and you see the condition I am in; this is Sunday morning, and I have not seen my husband since yesterday morning; he is in that hotel, spending money in gambling." With another officer I went to this hotel on Thursday night last, at about the closing hour. I said to the other officer with me—"I see a blind down on this window; if there is any gambling at all it is here." I got in and went into the room. The moment I got in, the publican ran round the bar and I followed him. The gas was immediately turned out. I suppose there were fifteen men in the house at the time. In the room to which I referred I found cards scattered all about. I am quite satisfied that the poor woman's story was true.

1014. Did you find her husband there? I did not know him. Scarcely a week passes without complaints of the kind being made by wives. I am constantly being appealed to in this way: "Can't you bring my husband out of that public-house—he is there all day?" We cannot do it.

1015. Have you been in the habit of opposing many applications for renewals? Yes; in 1884 we opposed a good many, but the Magistrates were against us. I opposed the application of the publican to whom I referred just now—the man who did such a large trade on Sundays for three years and made so many drunkards. The Magistrate said to me—"You have no convictions against the man." I said that we never could get a conviction against him; I have done my best, and all that is left for me to do now is to give evidence here as to what I have seen in connection with this house." The Magistrate said—"Well, you know we cannot take police surmises." I felt that a great deal, because it was not a surmise.

1016. Is that the general expression? That was the expression. We were told to go and get convictions. The Magistrates might as well have told us to go and stop the tide as to get convictions against some of the publicans.

1017. I suppose you proceeded no further? No; every one of us was out of Court by the Magistrates' ruling.

1018. Have you noticed any difference as regards strictness in the administration of the Act—I mean the principal Act and the amending Act? No.

- Sub-Inspector
Atwill.
26 Mar., 1886.
1019. I mean the Act of 1882? Of course if an officer of police who brings a just case into Court, and he brings it forward truthfully and uprightly, and if, after he does this, the case is thrown out of Court, he is very likely to have some little feeling against the Magistrate—naturally enough he will think that the Magistrate ought to have known as much as he did. Therefore I should not like to say anything in that way. There are feeble men and strong men in every department. I may say this,—that it would be much better if, in dealing with these cases, there were two Magistrates instead of one. I think that the minds of two men are stronger than the mind of one man in giving a decision against a publican. I do not think it wise to place one man in a position of that kind. Of course there is the expense to be considered and all that kind of thing; but where the interest is so great—where the publicans will do anything rather than get a conviction against their licenses—I think the minds of two Magistrates are better in giving a decision than the mind of one. Suppose, for instance, a Magistrate has given a just decision—he has seen the demeanour of the witnesses and of the police, and he knows the ins and the outs of the case—immediately he gives the police a conviction the solicitor asks him to state a case. The case is stated, and in the Court above it is found that the decision of the Magistrate is quashed. That has a serious effect on the mind of that Magistrate in dealing with a similar case on a future occasion. The case of Mrs. Hanney is one in point. She was summoned for serving a drunken man. No human being would have believed at the time that the decision could be upset. The man was bleeding, and it took three men to carry him from the public-house to the station. He and another man were fighting; they both pleaded guilty on the following morning, and the man who was locked up said he did not know where he was when he woke up in the police station. Mrs. Hanney was summoned for serving that man with drink, and the conviction of the Magistrate was quashed.
1020. We have had some evidence as to the superiority of special Licensing Magistrates and Licensing Courts over the ordinary Magisterial Courts—what is your opinion? I think we have some excellent Magistrates, but I would not like to particularize them.
1021. Some people are under the impression that the whole administration of the Licensing Act, and the punishment of offenders under it, would be better and more satisfactorily conducted by special Licensing Magistrates—do you understand me? I do, thoroughly.
1022. Then what is your opinion—have you thought of the matter? I could not form any idea on the subject.
1023. Are the packet licenses under your supervision? No, under the supervision of Mr. Donohoe; we leave them to the water police.
1024. And as to theatres? I have none in my division.
1025. With regard to the hours of closing, do you think that the present limitations are beneficial? I think so. It is the portion of the Act of 1882 which has worked the best. The whole Act was worth that provision to the police, and to the quietness of the town.
1026. You mean the 11 o'clock closing? Yes.
1027. And would you add the Sunday prohibition? The Sunday opening might have the effect of removing what is now called the poor man's grievance; that is to say, if the houses were allowed to open for two hours, or for any period during the day; but if we want more drinking, more gambling, more poverty, we shall relax the law in this respect; otherwise we shall leave the law intact. The jugs might come in the usual way at the dinner-hour, and be filled and taken away as they used to; but I say unhesitatingly that, in my division, immediately you opened the houses they would be filled from back to front. When the hour to close arrived, they would shut the door in the constable's face, and although they might admit no more, those who were already in the house, would remain there drinking until 12 o'clock at night. I would never make such a concession to the publicans—it would be fraught with evil, and things would be far worse than they are now. You never see the man who spends the Sabbath-day with his own family looking about for public-houses in which he can get drink—parading the streets and standing in by-ways and alleys waiting for an opportunity to get into a public-house; it is people in lower walks of life who are seen waiting to get into public-houses on Sunday. I have two well-known institutions in my division—the Model Lodging-house and the Lodging-house at the A.S.N. Company's stores. Many men who are out of employment go there. The men who ask you for 6d. for their bed spend it with the publican on Sunday; they sleep in the Domain; they manage to get money somehow, and they drink it away on Sunday. This is the class of men who would fill the public-houses on the Sabbath-day if they were opened. You would not find there the man who has a well-regulated home, and who looks after his wife and children; they do not want the public-houses opened on Sunday. If they were opened in my division, they would be opened for the sake of a lot of worthless people; coal-lumpers and wharf labourers, who work hard during the week, would get drunk on Sunday.
1028. Are there then in your division very few of the class who would like to see the houses opened for an hour or two on Sunday, to enable them to get a little beer for their dinner? The married men among the wharf labourers and coal-lumpers might send for their jug of beer at 12 o'clock. In many cases in my division the licensees are men from among their ranks. These people support their friends after they become licensees. I do not think, however, that they want the public-houses opened on Sunday for the particular purpose of carrying liquor to their houses.
1029. But suppose the license only authorized the consumption of liquor off the premises, would you be of the same opinion? I say that the man who is able to take drink away from the premises at 12 o'clock on Sunday is able to do so on Saturday night. I do not see why the law should be relaxed for an hour or two on Sunday, on account of the clamour of a lot of worthless people. If they were all people who were not in the habit of getting drunk, I would say let them have the privilege which they ought to have in this respect; but the clamour comes from worthless people, and not from the class of people I speak of. I hardly think that the concession ought to be made.
1030. Then you think that the consulting of the interest of a problematical few would be attended by positive mischief to a great many? I say that the opening of houses on Sundays would do a great deal of mischief, unless the police had larger powers—unless when the houses were closed they had the power to enter and see who were upon the premises, and to punish the publican for allowing any one to be there; if that were done, I think the houses might be opened.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. A. Atwill, Sub-Inspector of Police, called in and further examined:—

1031. Mr. Davies.] What is the general character of the city now on a Sunday compared with its character prior to the passing of the present Act? I think the character of my division is no better than it was in 1881. Sub-Inspector
Atwill.

1032. It has not improved? Not in the slightest.

1033. As far as you can judge, what is the cause? I attribute the cause of all this to the low public-houses that are supplying drink on the Sabbath-day.

1034. And you have already told the President that the law is defective with regard to Sunday selling? Yes, it is defective. I think I said that we are not able to enforce the provisions of the Act, owing to the way in which the publicans watch the police.

1035. Can you suggest to the Commission anything whereby the law may be made more effective? I may state what I think has caused the Act to be so defective. When the Act reached us in 1882, I said unhesitatingly that it was a good Act. If we had five or six men of keen perceptibility, able to analyze evidence and scan the tactics of witnesses, as Mr. Dillon was, there is no single purpose for which the Act was passed which would not have been fulfilled. Immediately afterwards there was an amending Act passed which strangled—I say it strangled the principal Act, and at the time this amendment was made the publicans themselves were a sort of quasi-police. The principal Act said that after three convictions a publican's license was liable to be cancelled; but it said more,—that if these three convictions were obtained on the same premises the public-house should also be liable to disqualification. At that time the landlords were making out the leases to publicans in such a way that after the second conviction they could put their tenants out; and I may add that they did put them out. The amending Act says the publican will suffer, on the third conviction for an offence on the same premises, the loss of his license, and the license shall revert to the landlord, or to the person who is in receipt of the rent. Well, that provision strangled the Act.

1036. In your opinion, then, the amending Act destroyed the operation of the principal Act? Yes; I say if we had strong-minded men, who neither regarded the threats of lawyers nor were dismayed at the quashing of convictions, the principal Act would have fulfilled everything expected from it.

1037. With reference to the closing of public-houses at 11 o'clock? I say the Act is worth that one clause alone—it is the greatest boon this city ever received from the Legislature; we have had better order—the police are better prepared to take care of the people's property at 12 o'clock at night now than they used to be at 3 o'clock in the morning before.

1038. In that particular the Act is a very great boon to the city? Yes.

1039. Are there many houses in your division in the hands of brewers? Yes. There is the house known as "Trickett's Hotel" in the hands of Burrows and Gleeson. A man named Hennikey gave about £900 for the place; he came to me shortly afterwards and said it was not the kind of house he had been led to expect, and for which he had paid this large sum. He asked me what to do in the matter. I replied—"What do you expect me to do for you?" He said—"They are forcing me into the market to realize."

1040. The brewers? No; the spirit merchants. The man said—"I am not able to meet my engagements. The house is not equal to my anticipations; my takings are not so great as the bills of Trickett showed were being taken. When I went in I had a little credit from the spirit merchants; they find now I am not able to get on, and so they are forcing me into the market." So it has an evil effect. Suppose I have £200 in my pocket and a house is worth £650, the brewer takes me in for £200, and a debt of £450 stands over me when I open the door of the house; I am in a third-class house in a third-class street, and among strangers; I cannot buy the best drink; I have to sell what drink is sent to me; I must sell, for I have no chance; my constituents are poor people; they come in and look round the shelves for the longest glass of drink for the least money. At the end of the month, according to the stipulations I have made, I have to meet the brewer; meanwhile my taxes become due; I have to keep a servant or two. At the end of the month I cannot meet my claims. If I were a good man who wanted to preserve the Sabbath intact I cannot do so, I have to watch the police, like a thief or felon; I have to sell whatever I can on Sunday to keep the roof over my head. If the Act of 1882 had been framed as I have suggested this class of public-house would have been stamped out long ago. If we could prevent them from selling on the Sabbath, half of these houses would disappear in six months.

1041. How many brewers' houses are there in your division? I have the "Pier Hotel" which was in the hands of Burrows and Gleeson. Mr. Peterson got "Mann's Hotel" the day before yesterday; he told me he had given £2,000 to go in, and he got, I think, £1,000 credit from Mr. Tooth. The "New York Hotel" and "Trickett's Hotel" were Burrows and Gleeson's; they have all been in the hands of the brewers, with the exception of some very large hotels, at one time or another.

1042. President.] Were they not always in their hands? I really do not know.

1043. Mr. Davies.] Is there as large a proportion of houses in the brewers' hands now as there was under the old Act? I am sure there are more now in the hands of brewers and spirits merchants than there were then.

1044. Are you aware of the practice of having transfers signed in blank? I believe that Burrows and Gleeson, as far as I can hear from the people, never allowed any house to be transferred to any one except in blanks. Once I went to the "Pier Hotel" to see about a billiard license. The publican did not have the license in his possession—the brewers will not let them have it; nor did he have his publican's license. So I told him—"If you do not have it soon I shall summons you; you are supposed to always have it on the premises." He went and got it.

1045. Do you favour the principle of allowing brewers to take a number of houses in the way you have described? Well, I am in favour, if it could be managed, of every man commencing business on his own bottom, and carrying it on and disposing of it of his own free will. I think if a man makes or breaks himself

29 Mar., 1886.

- Sub-Inspector himself in the business, he should do it of his own freewill. I do not believe any man has a right to be forced into taking a house through a misrepresentation, and then, because he cannot meet his claims, to be forced at a great loss into the market to satisfy his creditors.
- Attwill.
- 29 Mar., 1886.
1046. Are not the efforts of the police in bringing home convictions against publicans who violate the law frequently frustrated by the fact of the brewer having the transfer license in blank, and, as soon as two convictions are made, transferring to some other person? The brewer never allows a man to be convicted three times—they transfer as soon as the second conviction occurs. The publican then begins anew, just as if no convictions had ever been made against him for violating the Act.
1047. This is where the police are defeated? Yes; if the publican finds there are two convictions against him he does not wait for the third—he transfers at once. I cannot say the evil arises out of the fact of the brewer having the blank form over the publican's head.
1048. Do you think it would be conducive to the general well-being of the trade, as well as of society itself, if the brewers were prohibited in future legislation from having control of houses? I am perfectly certain that if a brewer's business was confined within the walls of the brewery—if the license of the spirit merchant was restricted to his cellars, with nothing whatever to do with the publicans of the city, I am sure things would be on a far better footing.
1049. Do you know any spirit merchants who are not brewers having charge of houses? No.
1050. President.] Do you think the practice you described just now gives rise to or encourages the publicans to keep inferior drink? I think it does. Publicans do sell inferior drink—the poor ones simply because they are obliged to sell whatever is sent to them.
1051. Have you heard of what are called threepenny drinks? Oh yes.
1052. Is this drink the outcome of this practice? The threepenny whisky, the threepenny beer, and the threepenny brandy are, I believe, the outcome of this state of things. I may state that an officer went into a house the other day and saw some drink invoiced at per gallon, one lot at 35s., and another lot at 3s. 6d. or an equally ridiculous low price.
1053. In bond? Yes; but I am not positive as to the figures. I asked him what his opinion was on this question, and he said he believed that a large portion of the one was mixed with a small portion of the other, and that was the reason why they could sell such cheap drink. And the publicans will tell you that they could not possibly keep their houses open if they were to sell good drink for 3d. a glass.
1054. Mr. Davies.] Do you think the present licensing fee of £30 per year is sufficient? I do not think it would make much difference if the fee was more or less than that amount. The fee is a fair one. Even a fee of £60 would not prevent the kind of publicans we would like to rid ourselves of from managing to get the money for a license just as easy as they do at the present time.
1055. What proportion of the 332 deaths which occurred last year in your division was the result of excessive drinking? I cannot say; the Coroner's office could give that information. I think what is most to be deplored is the number of people who become insane for a time through drinking colonial beer. I think insanity is prevalent among these people.
1056. President.] Do I understand you to say that the excessive drinking of colonial beer produces insanity? Yes; I think it drives people mad sooner than any other beer they can drink.
1057. Mr. Davies.] Have you any figures to show what number of such persons in your division have been arrested and put under restraint? We made out a month ago a return of the number of persons who went to the Receiving-house at Darlinghurst, and of those wholly insane who were transmitted from there to Callan Park. It was forwarded to the Inspector-General, for the information of the Government.
1058. It has not been sent to the Commission? I do not think so.
1059. Was it confined to drink? That was not the question; it was to show the number of persons who were sent to Darlinghurst temporarily insane, and also the number of persons who were sent to Callan Park permanently insane.
1060. You said that in your opinion a large number of persons were smitten down through the use of colonial beer? Yes; a larger number of persons suffer temporary insanity from this cause than from any other.
1061. Can you furnish the Commission with a return of the cases which have occurred in your own division? No, we do not know the number. You see we arrest a man for being in the horrors; he is perhaps remanded three or four times, and in three weeks or so he comes back all right. Then, again, we send another man on—we are not able to trace the cause of his insanity. It is impossible to ascertain whether it is the effect of excessive drinking, or whether the disease is hereditary and is developed by drinking habits. Dr. Manning is the best authority on this subject. Most of these people I have found to be beer-drinkers. There is some sort of saltiness in the beer which compels men to drink one glass after another, and increases rather than allays their thirst. It creates a great thirst; the men keep on calling for long drinks of this beer, and they soon get the horrors. Their nerves are unstrung, the desire for drink is still strong upon them, and the best thing we can possibly do for them is to lock them up.
1062. Have you a larger number of this class than of the others? Yes, of delirium tremens cases.

1065. Do many of these cases happen? Yes, every Saturday and Sabbath-day. I think it was only last night that a woman appealed to the police to bring out her husband. My men have not power to do it; but if the publican were fined for having the man there we could meet the difficulty. There is another thing in the Act which does a great deal of harm: we go into a public-house during prohibited hours and find men drinking at the public bar; if these men are not described as lodgers or travellers the publican is liable, and if a lodger, he is liable for drinking at the bar. We know that sometimes these people live within 100 yards of the public-house. For instance, a man was drinking the other Sabbath-day in Patten's public-house; he lived only just across the street, yet Patten kept him there all the night; and when he was brought into Court swore he was a lodger. The man perhaps was never in there before or since; the publican saw fit to shut him up and bring him into Court, when the case came on, as a bona fide lodger. The Act should say that a man is not a lodger who stays at a house one night and goes away in the morning.
1066. Then I understand that you favour further restrictions in any future legislation? I do.
1067. President.] At this stage I should like to ask you your opinion of a clause in the Victorian Licensing Act which was expected to have a marvellous operation. It is in the new law which has just been brought into force. "The bar on the premises of every licensed victualler shall during the hours in which the sale or disposal of liquor to the public is prohibited have every door by which admission is gained thereto whether from inside or outside the premises shut and locked and if any such door be found open or if any person other than the licensee his agent and servant be found therein during any such hours as aforesaid it shall be taken to be prima facie evidence of a sale of liquor during such hours. The licensed victualler on whose premises any contravention of the provisions of this section occurs shall be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act and shall be liable to a penalty of not less than five nor more than twenty pounds." What do you think of that? I can instance a case in which that provision would have no effect. There is a publican who it was reported to me was selling on Sunday, but no matter how closely he was watched he could never be detected. One Sunday, after coming out of church, I went to his place, thinking I might discover something. I went in by the back yard and through a room into the cellar, where I found enough bottles of liquor to stock a good-sized bar. He had in fact, though not strictly speaking, a bar in his cellar, and there he used to supply customers. He could not be fined under that section.
1068. I understand you to mean this—that although the burden of proof would rest on the landlord, he would find plenty of proof? Yes, he would find plenty of places in his house which could not be called a bar.
1069. But the section I have quoted presumes that the law has been broken if the door is not kept locked? Exactly, but I think that would hardly meet the case. The best provision that can be put into the Act is one making the publican amenable for every person except bona fide lodgers or travellers found in his public-house during prohibited hours.
1070. But suppose people who are not lodgers or travellers swear that they are? In London a policeman is furnished with a book, and instructed to take up his stand on the side of the street opposite to a certain public-house, and to note down the number of persons he sees going in and out of the public-house. The book is produced in Court, the policeman swears to the correctness of the record, and that evidence is enough to cause a publican to lose his license.
1071. But in England, though not in Wales, Sunday drinking is permitted during certain hours? Yes, I know.
1072. Of course all that the Legislature can do is to throw the burden of proof on somebody, and if that somebody brings a sufficient amount of proof to purge himself what can be done? It does not matter whether it is perjury or not, you cannot conclusively say that the man is guilty—that would be too great a hardship? With the exception of one or two in my division, wine-shops have proved a great evil.
1073. You mean colonial wine-shops? Yes; with the exception of one or two, I do not think there are any which are confined to the sale of the drink which is licensed to be sold in them. Not long ago, a man named Michel was fined £30 for selling liquor without a license at one of these places. A great many drunkards used to be found at his place, and at last, after carefully watching him, it was discovered that he used to put something into the coffee, and when we went in we found that the larger portion of what was in the cup was rum. I secured a search warrant, and returned just in time to find a case of liquor packed up ready to be sent to some captain in the Fijis. The case contained a quantity of absinthe, a most maddening drink, French brandy, and English rum. The man was fined £30 and had his license cancelled. Last month I had to go into the witness-box and swear that a wine-shop kept by a man named Anderson was a common brothel. Every Italian, Frenchman, Norwegian, or other foreigner who has had a wine license in my division has never confined himself to the sale of the liquor he was licensed to sell. On behalf of the publicans, I would say that these wine-shops make almost as many people drunk as the public-houses; that is in my division; I do not speak for other officers. They are nearly all in the hands of foreigners, and there is no limit to what they will do once they have obtained a license. A few licenses at Balmain are held by respectable grocers, who sell wine by the single bottle only, and against whom I have never heard a word said, but in Sydney, where the wine-shops are kept by foreigners, hardly a single one observes the law.
1074. Mr. Colls.] You have told the President the number of licensed public-houses in your division; the number you gave was 141? Yes; I made a mistake; the number is 131.
1075. Can you tell us how many of these houses are up to the standard for accommodation? They are all up to the standard; they all have the accommodation required by the Act, but in some it has been obtained by dividing large rooms into smaller ones by means of low partitions, sufficient to screen the occupants of one compartment from those of another, but not extending as high as the ceiling.
1076. How many of the 131 houses could accommodate a family? Very few.
1077. Do you think there are ten? No mother or father would think of taking their children into some such places to listen to the swearing and other noises in the house.
1078. How are these houses occupied? Some take in lodgers, but others do not; they say it does not pay, and, unfortunately, I am sorry to say, many of our young men who used to live in respectable boarding-houses have lately gone to live in public-houses.
1079. I suppose the publicans give them board and lodging for fifteen or eighteen shillings a week, and secure the remainder of their wages by means of the sale of drink? No doubt of it.
1080. Have you any shilling clubs in your division? Not one.
1081. As to oyster saloons, how are they conducted? Fairly well, but we believe that they sometimes supply bottled porter, though we are unable to detect them.
1082. These co-operative stores, have you any of them? I have none of them.

- Sub-Inspector Atwill.
29 Mar., 1886.
1083. Do you know of any small grocers' stores that retail spirits? No.
1084. You have said that there is a great deal of drinking among young people; do you make many apprehensions of young people? No; as I have said, they do not go far enough for the police to interfere. They leave the public-houses in what they call a jolly mood, and take each other's arms home. But most of these youths frequent the up-stairs bars; they don't go into the lower bars, where they can be seen by the public.
1085. Do not you think the dancing places down the harbour are a great attraction to young people, and a great cause of drinking? I do, and I think a great deal of it has resulted from the doings of the free-thought crowd—they are doing an immense amount of harm. No doubt, when a number of people, freethought or otherwise, congregate together, others who are not connected with them join them. When a number of youths, whose parents have no control over them, see a steamer at the wharf on Sunday with a number of people and a band on board about to go down the harbour, they say to themselves we may as well go and see what it is like, and next Sunday they are ready to go again, and so the gatherings increase. There is a dancing place at Chowder Bay conducted by the man who keeps the "Oxford Hotel," and a great many people go there on Sunday, but what the proceedings are like I cannot tell you. Mr. Cotter would be able to give you that information.
1086. Mr. Withers.] I was surprised to hear you say that there has been no improvement in the conduct of the persons who keep public-houses since the present Act came into force? I think that in 1885 my division stood about the same as it did in 1881.
1087. That is statistically? Yes, and as to the number of half-drunken people about the place. The number of persons apprehended for drunkenness on Sunday in 1885 was within twenty-two of the number arrested for the same cause in 1881.
1088. Has there been any considerable increase of population in the district which ought to be allowed for in making a comparison? No, there never will be an increase in my division; there will be a decrease, because the houses are giving way to stores.
1089. You very rarely I presume arrest people at the public-houses for drunkenness on Sunday, owing to the drinking being carried on secretly? Yes, we arrest people about the public-houses.
1090. That would lead us to suppose then that drinking is carried on in your division as openly as before? It does not follow because a man is arrested near a public-house that he got drunk there, because he may have walked from another public-house, and when a man is under the influence of drink he is not particular as to what part of the street he sits or lies in.
1091. But there are not the same brawls about the public-houses that there used to be? No, because the publican takes care not to give rise to any complaints which will bring the police about his place, but it does not follow from that that he does not serve as much drink as before. They will say to you straight—"If I don't serve my customers on Sunday they will not come to me on Monday," and a man with a feeling of that kind will not keep a customer outside.
1092. Then from what you say, I gather that you are conscious that there is as much drinking carried on now on Sunday as formerly, if not more, only that it is carried on more secretly? I think there is more drinking now than there was five years ago, only it is more secret.
1093. Do you think that the Sunday drinking is as great a nuisance to society as it was under the old Act, or is it confined more within the walls of the hotels? I am not inclined to think that the drinking customs of the people are any less on Sunday now than they used to be.
1094. Then, with regard to Sunday selling, you do not think that the present Act has effected any improvement? I think the present Act is a failure, so far as the enforcement of it by the police is concerned; owing to the way in which we are watched by those interested.
1095. You stated, in answer to a former question, that the only way to put down this sly grog selling—for such it really is—would be to arrest any one found in a public-house who was not a bona fide lodger or traveller? To summon them.
1096. I suppose there would be little difficulty in proving that people found on the premises were not bona fide lodgers? The onus of proof would rest on the publican. If there were fifteen or twenty persons in a public-house which only contained four bed-rooms for the use of lodgers it would be clear that the most of them could not be lodgers. Again, a policeman going into the house might know that five or six of the persons there were residents of the neighbourhood, and the landlord could not say that they were lodgers.
1097. I did not quite follow you when you were referring to the evils brought about owing to publicans being in the hands of the brewers; I presume that the publicans really hold the licenses—the brewers do not hold them? The landlord must have a license.
1098. I do not know whether you stated the objections to the brewers having the publicans in their hands; will you just mention the principal objections? Well, say that eight or nine persons each obtain a publican's license; they are supplied with liquor by a brewer, who takes the risk of their being able to make the business pay and of his getting back his money as well as the profit on the drink.
1099. But the same thing is done by nearly every wholesale firm; most of them have a lien to some extent over retail dealers? The brewers are practically money-lenders, and but for them many of the men who now take public-houses would not do so because they have not sufficient means.
1100. Then I gather that the great objection to the practice is that the publicans are in a dependent position, and so may be forced to take liquors which are not pure? They have told me that they have to sell liquor which does not tend to increase their business, because men who are in the habit of drinking know when they are supplied with good liquor, and if bad is supplied to them they will go elsewhere another time.
1101. That, I should imagine, would be the principal objection to the practice, although one would think that it would be to the interest of the brewers to promote the business of the publicans who are in their hands? One would think so, in order that they might get back their money; but I have heard publicans say that they liked to be in a position to buy their own liquor, and not be obliged to take whatever was sent to them, so there must be something in it.
1102. How do you ascertain that these men are so much in the hands of the brewers? I often ask them, when they are transferring their licenses, what they are giving for the houses.
1103. Is there a registered mortgage as a rule, or a bill of sale? The business is transacted through the brokers; I do not know what the security is.
1104. You know the Civil Service Co-operative store: is there a private bar in connection with that. I have never been there since the place changed hands.

1105. Do you know whether liquor is retailed there? I do not know whether it is retailed to any but members. Sub-Inspector
Atwill.
1106. Have you had an opportunity of observing whether much evil arises from stores like that supplying liquor along with groceries and other things? I have heard it said that the practice of supplying liquor along with groceries has led in many cases to drunkenness in houses, but I am not in a position to say anything on that point from my own knowledge. 29 Mar., 1886.
1107. Are you aware whether many working-men's clubs have been established since the present Licensing Act came into force? There have been none in my division.
1108. You think they can get drink easily enough from the publicans? Yes. I do not think the Commission will regard it as a confession of weakness on the part of myself or my men if I say that they can get it in spite of us.
1109. Well, you think that if the Sunday selling provision could be strictly enforced it would be a great boon? Yes; it would raise the status of every public-house in the city, and numbers of houses would close of their own accord. A number of the third-class houses in the lower streets, with third-class customers, would be compelled to close if I could make the Sabbath-day to be observed.
1110. It is the Sunday trade that supports them? It is the Sunday trade—it is that which is keeping open a good many houses in my district. If I could manage to keep them closed from 11 o'clock on Saturday night to 6 o'clock on Monday morning, twenty-five houses in my division would be closed within six months.
1111. You would not be in favour of extending the hours in the evening? I would not give them a moment; 11 o'clock is quite late enough.
1112. I suppose that the closing at that hour has brought about a reform in the city? It has been a wonderful reform—it has done more good than any one could give expression to. The closing of the houses at 11 o'clock gives the police time to look after other matters. That is the time when thieves and burglars begin to raise their heads, and the police now have time to look after the safety of people's property. Before the present Act was passed the people were never at home—they were wandering about the streets till 3 and 4 o'clock in the morning; now scarcely a person is seen in the streets after midnight.
1113. You think 6 o'clock quite early enough to open? Quite early enough. Many a man who has been at the public-house on Saturday and Sunday, and who girds himself up to go to work on Monday, would probably never go to work that day if he got into a public-house at 5 o'clock.
1114. I suppose that at about a quarter to 6 is a time when men get into hotels, when the police are changing their beats? We send men out in plain clothes at that hour, to watch the houses. If the publicans open at that time, it is only to let their known customers in. We have not very much to complain of with regard to the selling of liquor before 6 in the morning and after 11 o'clock at night.
1115. Would you suggest any mode of dealing with a drunkard who was a source of expense? The President had a conversation with me before the meeting of the Commission, and I say with him that a penitentiary ought to be established for drunkards who are not altogether lost. It would be the salvation of many, who are in a fair way of being lost, if they could be kept away from drink for twelve months.
1116. Do you not think that those people ought to be put on some public works after a second conviction—do you not think that would terrify them? I do not think they would work. And would not the cost of supervision be more than the value of the work which they would do? I should say a penitentiary before public works. I believe in putting them under the eye of the public, so that their friends can see what the punishment is and take warning. If we could bring back the old days, and could put stocks in the street and put a man in them now and again for twelve hours, leaving him a loaf of bread to eat if he liked, that would do some good.
1117. Many acts of violence are brought about by drink? Yes.
1118. What do you think of the flogging penalty? I do not like it. I have seen one man flogged, and I do not wish to see another flogged. Flogging is nearly the last resource in dealing with a human being. To fine a man five shillings, however, is a farce.
1119. You think that the closing of the public-houses on Sundays would tend to lessen the drinking habits of the people? It certainly would. They ought to restore to the Act that clause which made property as well as the landlord amenable. Under that provision the owners of the houses became a sort of quasi-police, they assisted us. I closed a few houses here, and it did more good than if I had got forty more police to assist me.
1120. How many convictions disqualified a house? Three.
1121. The owner of the property could have a clause in the lease that if there were so many convictions—? That is precisely what they were doing. As regards the selection of publicans, we might have a man with an excellent character sent to us, but the publican would find out whether he was a dummy. They could get information from quarters from which we could not get information. The owners were as good as a body of police. They used to come and see how the license was going on, before he had been long in the house. Since that clause has been abrogated, they have not cared what sort of men they let their houses to.
1122. You said you had 131 houses in your district? Yes.
1123. Are they all up to the standard of accommodation? Every one.
1124. Do you say that many of them will not accommodate lodgers? Yes.
1125. Are they not bound to do it? Yes, but they say they are full.
1126. They are simply drinking-shops? Yes. If it were not for the fact that we go to the houses sometimes there would hardly be any accommodation—I mean in the shape of clean beds—there would hardly be a thing for any one to wash his hands in up-stairs. When you see the bar you see the best of the house.
1127. You think there is a lot of that kind of thing going on? There is not one house in every ten to which a family could be sent from the country.
1128. Mr. Roseby. Have you ever noticed in one instance how many persons go into any one house during the day—I have heard you say that you have seen nearly forty persons at one house? I saw forty-five persons in Patten's Yard at one time, and half as many in Princes-street, sauntering up and down whilst the police were there.
1129. That would mean that there were at one time between sixty and seventy persons hovering around one public-house? Yes.
1130. Have you ever set a man to watch a house for a day to ascertain to what extent the law is outraged? We set a man to go to this house and others, in 1884, at the time when we raised the objections. I was prepared to swear that I believed that this man served over 300 people every Sabbath. The Magistrate said, "We cannot give credit to the surmises of the police. How many people have you seen going in and out of church?"

Sub-Inspector church?" I said I did not think that question was relevant. I said—"What would take those people to the public-house unless they went to drink?" "We want you to bring convictions not surmises." I said—"If we could get convictions we would not bring these surmises." I have been at the house of that publican at all hours of the night. We were watched at all hours back and front.

Atwill.

1131. You gave the President a return of the convictions for drunkenness which have taken place in your division, but I understood you to say that those convictions did not represent anything like the large amount of drunkenness there is in your division? No, I do not think the figures I gave the President represent anything like the number of persons who were half-drunk during that time, and who were not arrested or summoned.

1132. You particularized some instances in which poor mothers and wives have come appealing to you to go and try to get their husbands out of the public-houses—have you no power to go and take a man out of a public-house? We have no power, unless we are asked by a publican, to order any one out who is not drunk.

1133. The man is entirely in the hands of the publican? The man is entirely in the hands of the publican. Not long ago a gentleman came from the country, and he was reported to have £600 in his pocket. In the country they were inquiring for him everywhere, and his family were in great trouble about him. We at last found him in a public-house, with only about £100 in his possession—he had never seen the daylight once after he had gone in. I suppose that if we had not redoubled our diligence we should not have found him until the money was all gone. I know of a case in which a man who had a large sum in his possession spent all his money in a public-house.

1134. I understand you to say that in your opinion drunkenness amongst young people is largely on the increase? It is increasing.

1135. Do you attribute the large amount of drunkenness among young people to the up-stairs and private bars? To the up-stairs bars; they are frequented by the sons of a number of our respectable citizens. I believe they are working an infinite amount of evil amongst our native youth.

1136. Hence you would strongly support the limitation of every public-house to only one bar? I would not. Take for instance the Water Police Court. The police who attend that Court are not all teetotallers; I am not a total abstainer. If I go out of the Court with my brother officers to get a glass of beer and a little of something to eat, I do not want to go to the same bar where people are drinking against whom I may have to give evidence. But I object to any bar out of sight of the public; I object to places where those gay women are kept—they are an evil. The woman I have referred to, who applied for a license, said that she was a Dublin girl, and I found that she was kept by a jeweller. The woman who applied for Trickett's Hotel managed three upper bars, one of them in King-street. Her own servant came and swore, when I objected to her having the license, that she was a woman of doubtful character. The girl swore that she had carried up the woman's breakfast when she was lying in bed with strange men, and amongst others with a man whose house was wrecked, his poor wife having to send a lawyer to get the man out of that woman's thralldom. I do not know what may happen in those up-stair bars, but they are gay women who keep them. Kate M'Vickers could take a house and keep a servant, and she could take a man and keep him all the day on Saturday and Sunday, and ruin him. These bars have a serious effect upon the business of those publicans who have no upper bars. Some of them are not doing nearly so well as those who have the upper bars. There is a house in Castlereagh-street where a man was paying an enormous rent, yet by letting an upper bar he was able to get his house rent free and have something to the good. I do not say that there should be a law to prevent publicans from having more than one bar; you cannot take away the social life of the public; there must be places to which persons can resort out of the way of the public.

1137. Would you favour the still earlier closing of the public-houses? I would not; I think 11 o'clock fair to all parties.

1138. In your opinion, is there any increase in female intemperance? Not in my division; I have not very many.

1139. It is principally sailors and lumpers, and those kind of people? Yes; sailors, lumpers, waifs, and others who come where they think they can get drink more easily than in other places.

1140. How many houses have you had closed? I think I have had five closed.

1141. Have any of these been re-opened? Not one.

1142. Have there been any new licenses granted? Yes, five or six; two at Narrabeen and two at Balmain, and one is being erected. I have about as many as I had in 1881.

1143. Did the people in those localities petition against the granting of those licenses? Some of them did.

1144. Were the petitions considered by the Licensing Bench? They were, and the Bench said that the principle of the Act of 1882 was to support the erection of good houses and the closing of small ones, and that they believed that if they encouraged the erection of a superior class of houses it would have that effect. They said that in Balmain there was hardly a house that would accommodate a family, and that the erection in that suburb of two houses containing sixty or ninety rooms each would have a tendency to shut up the smaller ones, the public being benefited thereby. That is the principle on which the Magistrates acted.

1145. Were the applications opposed or favoured by the police? The police objected to the houses as not being required.

1146. And notwithstanding the opinion of the people and the objection of the police the licenses were granted? You are aware that the Magistrates have the power. Those houses did not come under the local option clause.

1147. Do you think the people in the locality ought to have the privilege of saying whether a license shall be granted in their neighbourhood or not? They have the right to do that by petition.

1148. But notwithstanding that they have exercised that right, and that the police have objected, the licenses have been granted. Do you not think that the people's voice ought to have such potency that the licensing of a house should be refused when the majority of the people in the locality oppose it? I have always been of opinion that local option as it is, if the people were not so apathetic, is a good thing; but to go further, and to give people the right to say you shall not do this or that savours of tyranny.

1149. Mr. Colls.] In your division have you known people to be walking about with carpet-bags, looking for accommodation? People have come to me and asked where they could get a comfortable home for a week, and I have been at my wit's end to find them a place. I have taken a lady and gentleman to Dalveen's on Church Hill and asked them to give them a private room, and they did, but I could not do it now. I think there are six bars in that house now.

1150. The private bed-rooms have been turned into bars then? It has a frontage to George-street and another to Charlotte Place. Sub-Inspector
Atwill.
1151. Have you any houses of ill fame in your district? There are one or two.
1152. Has it come under your notice that beer and spirits are sold there? Respecting one of these houses, a gentleman who was never later than 1 o'clock in going home said to me—"You know Atwill that I was in the habit of going there." And he said—"Well, I have seen three cases of champagne opened at £1 a bottle between the time I went in and midnight." But we could not touch them. 29 Mar., 1886.
1153. Are they still in existence? The woman is in existence, but not the house. A gentleman came to me and said—"Will you assist me to get my sister who is of tender years out of that house?" I had never received a complaint about the house for three years, although there were people who were very particular living all round. The woman never allowed the slightest noise. If she wanted girls, she would send a letter to them. It was always a dull silence at that house. I was glad to get a chance to interfere, and I went and knocked at the door. It was opened by the woman herself, and I said—"Are you Mrs. Miller?" she said, "Yes." I then went in, and the first thing I saw were two glasses half-full of champagne. I said to Mrs. Miller—"A man has applied to me about a girl of tender years who is detained here, and I have come to take that child away." I went through the bed-rooms, taking the gentleman with me, and in the first room I found this lady in bed with a man.
1154. The girl you were seeking? Yes, but she was not a girl of tender years. She said to me—"Do you know why he has brought you here?" She then added—"He lives on me and my sister, and because we refused him the price of a suit of clothes, he is venting his spite by bringing you here." I said to the lady who kept the house—"I have often been intending to come here, and I intend to indict you now." In three weeks she was clean out of the place. I have only one existing in my division. There is not one of those that does not buy largely and sell dearly. I believe they all buy from the spirit merchants.
1155. You spoke of a house having six bars? One of my sergeants told me there were six bars. I know there are five.
1156. Are any of them conducted by females? The lower bar is conducted by a man. The last time I was there the two upper bars were conducted by women.
1157. You mean up-stairs bars? Yes.
1158. How many of such bars are there up-stairs? Three.
1159. Mr. Hutchison.] You opposed the granting of new licenses, and the people petitioned—you thought that these licenses ought not to be granted? We said in fact that there were plenty of public-houses in the suburbs—more than were required for the general public.
1160. You said that the people had the right of petition? Yes.
1161. Would it have been a right thing if the petition had been heard? It was heard.
1162. Would it have been a right thing if it had been acted upon? We always allow our judgment to be secondary in such matters. Often we may feel that if we had been in the Magistrate's place we should have done so and so; we may feel that in our opinion he was wrong, but we must give way—our judgment is inferior to the Magistrate's.
1163. You have told us that once upon a time there were Magistrates who did their duty better than others? I never said so, I think.
1164. What you said amounted to that? If I was asked, I said that the old Bench served our purpose well—that the old Bench always gave us satisfaction—but I never said that the present Bench did not.
1165. You said that you could not get convictions? Owing to the preponderance of evidence.
1166. You have said that to you local option would savour of tyranny? Yes, full local option.
1167. At the same time you have admitted that to a great extent you are ignorant of it? Yes, as far as compensatory provisions which have never been propounded are concerned.
1168. Suppose we suggest that a Local Option Act be passed not compelling a vote to be taken simultaneously all over the Colony—in fact, necessitating no vote to be taken—but simply that, if the people themselves desired by an overwhelming majority that a vote should be taken they should be allowed to vote, where would the tyranny come in? Local option would not take a phase of that kind.
1169. But that is full local option? What I understand local option to mean is this: that the people in a particular locality should have the right to say whether or not a license should be granted for a certain house, and whether or not the license of an existing house should be renewed. Suppose that there were twenty houses in this street, that the people living in the locality should have the right to say whether or not the licenses of five, seven, ten, or more of those houses should be renewed; that is what I understand full local option to mean. Suppose my inclinations were to run in the direction of becoming a publican—that I intended to keep a respectable public-house, and that I did so, I say that I think it would savour of tyranny if my father, it might be in conjunction with the neighbours, had in their power to say to me "we will stamp you out next licensing day." But suppose that I had an hotel at Woolloomooloo and I wished to have the license transferred to the more respectable neighbourhood of Potts's Point, I should say that the local option which would say "you must stop where you are" would be a good thing.
1170. You say that there is a great amount of apathy in connection with the present Local Option Act? Yes, and I think that it is a pity.
1171. Do not you think that this is owing to the fact that a large proportion of the people living in the district have no vote because the landlords pay the rates? I am afraid that if you gave the tenants the right to vote not many of them would avail themselves of it.
1172. But are you not aware that there is apathy, on that account? It is not apathy, but the fact of the thing not being in their way. Probably it might be better if the tenants had the right to vote, as the thing would spread, and it might help to save the district from having more public-houses.
1173. You believe in the present Local Option Act if it were acted upon? I do thoroughly.
1174. You said something about shaming the people? Some punishment which would bring shame to the people.
1175. Not to the sellers? No, I do not know how you could shame them.
1176. President.] Would you extend the application of the principle of local option to renewals? I would not.
1177. Mr. Hyam.] Have you any knowledge respecting the English Licensing Act? A little.
1178. It is a fact that the brewers in England have some power over most of the publicans—by liens or mortgages? I do not know. I do not think that the large establishments in London are in the hands of brewers.

Sub-Inspector Atwill,
29 Mar., 1886.

brewers. When they change hands—and it is seldom that they do—the transactions are bond fide, and represent large sums of money. You could not buy out some of the London hotel-keepers for £35,000, I suppose. There some men are born and die in the same house—the interest in the business descends from father to son.

1179. I know that certain houses in London are allowed to sell only certain brewers' ale and porter—I imagine such houses must be in the hands of the brewers? Very likely they are; otherwise I do not see how the publicans could be restrained in that way.

1180. How long have you been in the Colony? Close on twenty-two years.

1181. Do you remember the time when wine and beer licenses were issued here? No.

1182. Do you think that it would be an improvement if such licenses were issued now? I do not. I doubt whether the licensees would confine themselves to the sale of wine and beer only. We cannot confine the colonial wine licensees to the sale of the drink for which they are licensed—there is a departure from it in every instance. There is hardly any man whose taste is limited to two kinds of drinks.

1183. There are some wine-shops in Balmain—are they well conducted? Yes.

1184. Do you know of any retail wine-shops there? Wine is retailed in bottle by Mr. Rae and two or three others. We have never had any complaint about the wine-shops in Balmain. I am sure that Mr. Rae, for example, would not serve with wine a man who had the appearance of drink on him.

1185. You have said that some houses at Balmain were licensed recently in direct opposition to a petition from the people? Yes.

1186. Have not the two houses in question very large accommodation? Yes; one 100 rooms and the other sixty.

1187. Is it not a fact that houses of that class were absolutely necessary in Balmain? The Magistrates said that there was not an hotel in Balmain at which they could get a luncheon. I reported Dick's hotel as being among the respectable hotels of the city. The Magistrates said—"There may be many respectable houses, but you can get nothing to eat in them."

1188. Is it not a fact that there was a counter-petition signed by many influential people residing at Balmain? There always is.

1189. Is it not a fact that there was a counter-petition signed by many influential people? I think that there was a counter-petition against the police objection and the objection of the people.

1190. Presuming that public-houses are necessary, it is your opinion that at least one of these houses is necessary in Balmain? I never said so.

1191. I ask your opinion? I think that if houses having such accommodation as it was professed these would give were established, you would not hear of people coming to Sydney and walking about with their carpet-bags, not being able to find accommodation. Such houses cannot be kept as drinking-shops; they must be maintained in such a way that families from the country can be properly accommodated.

1192. You are aware that one of the applicants was a man of most exemplary character? Both were—one especially, Mr. Cohen, he was never convicted, and I do not know that any complaint was ever made by the local police against his house, either in respect of Sunday trading or trading during prohibited hours. I think that I stated this in his favour at the time. The other applicant was a private citizen—a builder—who no doubt made application to erect the house more on a spec. than with a determination to make it the kind of house that it was represented that it would be; I do not know whether the building was ever commenced.

1193. But the other house is in course of erection, and in an advanced stage? Yes.

1194. Are there any dancing saloons in your division? One, and that is in your suburb. Complaints were made against it two or three times, and the local police warned the proprietors that if they did not abate the nuisance they would be proceeded against at common law. They did so. There is another slight affair in some little room over there.

1195. Do not you think that it would be a good thing if dancing saloons were abolished altogether? I think that dancing saloons and drink have made a large portion of the prostitutes.

1196. You believe that the saloons create a deal of drinking? Yes, I believe that they have caused a great deal of evil. I know that many men, or rather boys, have been separated from their wives through these dancing saloons. I have heard of cases in which young wives, only three weeks married, have seen their husbands dancing in these saloons; this has aroused feelings of jealousy which have led to entire separation. In these cases neither man nor wife was properly developed before marriage—they were never intended for housekeeping at the time when they were married.

1197. Do you think that the drinking habits of the people in your division are on the increase or the decrease? I think that they are on the increase. There is always a large number of people coming and going in my district; the shipping has increased tenfold during the last ten years, and the people associated with it will drink. Not long since I was sitting at my window on a Sunday, and I saw four or five native youths—sons of men in easy circumstances—go into the same public-house three times. I could hardly believe that these youths would go to a public-house on a Sunday or on any other day. There is more drinking among native boys of from seventeen to twenty-one now than there ever was. I say that a good deal of this drinking is created by the existence of the upper bars—not in my division particularly. I know that the youths go to these bars; there is some evil influence which attracts them to the places, and when they are in there they must drink. Twenty-two years ago I don't think that we had one native boy up for drunkenness in a twelvemonth. I used often to say—"No matter what may be said about the natives of the Colony, they show the people from home an example of sobriety which they might well follow." Now it is the very reverse.

1198. Among which class—those from home or the natives—do you think there is the most drinking? The natives do not drink to the same beastly extent as the others. Home-country people will get drunk, but the native can put such a guard on himself as not to get locked up; the other men will drink until they fall. As regards the habit of drinking it is equally divided.

1199. Are not the natives more readily intoxicated than people from the old country? I think not; I believe that they have quite as strong a constitution, and that they carry drink better.

1200. You say that the young people drink more than they used to do? I think that the habit has increased wonderfully, and it is still increasing. At the Balmain Court to-day a boy who stood not much higher than the table was brought up for drunkenness—he was found lying drunk on the road on Saturday. It was appalling to hear the boy plead guilty, and I said to the Magistrates—"He is only a youth, and I should like to see his father before you give a decision." His poor father then stepped forward and said—"Nobody in this Court can be more astonished than I am to hear that my boy was found lying drunk on the road." Nevertheless the fact remains. I do not say these things as an abstainer—I have told the Commission that I never was an abstainer. I say that, in the interests of the drunkard, of the drunkard's wife and family, of the young men who will have to control the destinies of the Colony when the men who are now doing so are no more, there should be a wholesome check put on the drinking habits of the people. I may never have an opportunity of saying this again. After thirty years' experience as a police officer, I say that, in the interest of the rising generation, if they are to be saved from the humiliation of knowing that their fathers or mothers had been seen reeling out of this or that hotel, or had been confined in this or that lock-up, a wholesome check must be put on the drinking habits of our youths. No father who has reasonable sense can walk the streets without feeling anxious care about his own, as his boys and girls who are going to school must fall into this society by and by. What is to become of the people under such a state of things? There ought to be a wholesome check, and it will be put on only by legislation. People may tell you that you cannot make men sober by legislation, but give us an Act of Parliament under which we can close every public-house on Sundays and we shall do all the good possible.

Sub-Inspector
Atwill.

29 Mar., 1886.

1201. Can you suggest any means of putting a stop to Sunday selling? I say that I would stop it by one section. I would say to the publican—"You are licensed to sell drink on six days of the week; if you are found selling drink on Sunday you will be regarded as a sly grog seller, and you will be fined £30. If you repeat the offence your license will be cancelled, and you will never get another license." With such a law as that you would soon stop the Sunday selling.

1202. It seems to be a hard matter to secure convictions against people who break the law by selling liquor on Sunday, and do not you think it would have a salutary effect if the onus of proof rested on the publican as to the people found in his bar? It would; but I tell you that we must have a telling clause—it must not be left in that way; you must have a provision under which you can say to the publican, "if a thing is proved against you such will be the consequences." The police have no interest in the publicans' Act only to enforce it. If a policeman secured convictions against every publican in the Colony he would get no credit—he would simply be told that he had done his duty rightly as policeman. There must be a penalty which will strike terror into the publicans. If the houses are closed absolutely on Sundays the publicans will have the very same chance, because more money will be spent during the week—it will be spent in another way.

1203. Suppose a policeman entered a house and found a number of people there drinking, would it not be better if the publican were compelled to prove that the men were lodgers or otherwise? No doubt of that. I can go around my division and in forty-eight hours I can tell exactly, or very nearly so, how many lodgers every publican has, and I know that the publican who does not keep any lodgers has no business to let as many as twenty or thirty, or even five enter his house during prohibited hours or on Sundays. We know that the man who can entertain only fifteen lodgers has no right to say, the whole of the rooms in his house being found full—that all the persons are lodgers; immediately you determine to punish a man for being found drinking on the premises, he will come up as a witness for the publican, in order to avoid his own punishment. As I said before, things would have been very different if that section had been omitted from the Act. The men always come forward to give evidence in the publicans' favour, in order to avoid being punished themselves. When the Act was being passed, I said that if that clause was allowed to remain in it, it would be sufficient to damn the whole Act. If it were not for that clause you would not see gentlemen hiding under beds, or secreting themselves to the number of five or six in a water-closet, with the door shut. They would stand their ground like honest men, and would say to the publican—"You have broken the law by serving drinks to us, and you must take the consequences."

1204. Mr. Colls.] Have you had any complaints about the quality of the spirits sold in the licensed houses in your division? We have; but invariably when I have received these complaints, I have reported the matter to the inspector whose duty it is to obtain samples. We have not in a single instance found anything deleterious to health. I have had a report about a house in respect to which people have said—"We have been knocked stupid by drink from the third shelf." They came and showed me where the bottle was. The inspector has had liquor taken from it; but nothing deleterious to health was found—it was merely a bad description of spirit.

1205. Do you think the sample was the same as the drink supplied? I do not know. A sailor once came to me and said, to use their term—"I was shanghai'd at that place. I took a glass of drink, and I never knew where I was until I found myself on board another ship." I do not know whether in that case the sample was the same. I remember two gentlemen coming from Melbourne. They took a stroll on the North Shore. They were brothers, and when they became thirsty one of them expressed a desire to have a drop of whisky or gin. The gentleman who told me said—"After that we walked about half a mile when my brother became ill; he got down, and got worse and worse." The poor man was brought over here, and I am under the impression that he was afterwards taken to the Reception-house.

1206. Mr. Withers.] Did he recover? Oh yes, I think so.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Inspector Cotter sworn and examined:—

Sub-Inspector
Cotter.
2 April, 1886.

1207. President.] Your district is on the North Shore; what is its extent? It is the portion of the Metropolitan District which is across the water, extending from Milson's Point to Hornsby, but it does not take in Manly side of Middle Harbour. There is a separately defined police district of St. Leonards, which is my district. The Manly District of course is included in the Water Police District.
1208. Can you tell us how many apprehensions you have had since the passing of the Licensing Act in 1882, to the end of 1885? Yes, except those for 1882—I was not there then—I was in the country.
1209. I mean apprehensions for drunkenness, and offences in which drunkenness forms a part? Yes; in 1883 there were 147 apprehensions; in 1884, 210 apprehensions; and in 1885, 279 apprehensions.
1210. You have contributed so far, I suppose, to the Inspector-General's Report? Yes.
1211. Have you any shipping? No.
1212. Any theatres or places of amusement? We have some music-halls.
1213. At Chowder? Yes.
1214. You spoke of Middle Harbour being in your district; is there one at Clontarf? Yes, but it is not in my district.
1215. There is a public-house at Chowder? Yes, a large hotel.
1216. Is that the only picnicing resort in your district that has a public-house? Yes.
1217. Have you any figures to show the number of public-houses since you took charge of your district in 1883? I have the number at present there.
1218. Not for previous years? No; I can ascertain them. I cannot give them with certainty from memory.
1219. How many public-houses have you now? Twenty-one.
1220. What is the population of your district? The increase in the Electoral Roll this year is 1,019. I think the population of St. Leonards is between 13,000 and 15,000.
1221. Do you mean adults? No, the whole population.
1222. Only 13,000? It may be 15,000, but that is not for the entire district.
1223. Well, what is the population of the whole district? 20,000 at least.
1224. Then, as a matter of fact, you have about one public-house per thousand of the population? A little less.
1225. What was the effect of the local option vote in St. Leonards last year? In all the municipalities, and in all the wards of municipalities, it was in the negative; some municipalities are not divided into wards, but throughout the district the vote was in the negative.
1226. Do you, with your experience of three years, consider that drunkenness is on the increase—I do not speak of drunkenness which has culminated in any offence ending in apprehension—is drunkenness generally on the increase? Yes, the use of intoxicating liquors is increasing.
1227. I do not mean exactly the use of intoxicating liquors: is intemperance increasing? Slightly, though not very strikingly.
1228. I suppose you go among the inhabitants a good deal and notice their habits? Yes.
1229. Is spirituous liquor or beer the favourite drink? Both.
1230. What is taken generally as an alcoholic stimulant? Whisky is largely drunk, then rum, next brandy and gin.
1231. How would you describe these houses—are they of a high or low character? They are of the middle class. Some houses are low, but they are not so bad as I hear they are elsewhere. I have three or four low houses which sell on a Sunday.
1232. How is the public-house at Chowder conducted? Although it is in my district, it is arranged that the Sydney police shall attend there on holidays. I believe it is fairly conducted now. Once, in 1883, its license was taken away for allowing larvikins to assemble there.
1233. You occasionally visit the place on other days I presume? The hotel has only been re-opened a few months.
1234. Does the tenant, Mr. Thomson, take any boarders? I do not know of my own knowledge. I am informed he does.
1235. You consider, then, that this house is tolerably well conducted? What I have heard leads me to conclude it is well conducted, except on holidays, and then the fault is that of the visitors, not of the licensee.
1236. Do you notice any increase in the use of intoxicants among the females in your district? No.
1237. Or among young men? I observe now, in the streets and elsewhere, more young men who appear to me to have been drinking than I did two or three years ago.
1238. Drinking habits are on the increase among young men? I fear there is no doubt about it.
1239. Have these young men any incentives to drinking such as exist in other parts of the metropolitan district—are there any dancing saloons? Yes, three.
1240. Do young men and women resort to the dancing saloons? Yes.
1241. And you think that habit leads to increased drinking? Yes. I frequently observe young men going from the dancing saloon to the public-house; they leave the girls outside in the dark, and bring out drink to them.
1242. I presume you have no up-stairs bars? No.
1243. Do you consider that you have any places of ill fame? No; prostitutes come over sometimes from Sydney.
1244. The young men are not tempted then by prostitutes to drink? No.
1245. Is the drinking class much reinforced by visitors from Sydney—the people who drink to a limited extent? Yes, but probably not the actual drunkards. There is only a fair proportion of the drunkards who come across from Sydney. I think our drunkenness is our own sin chiefly.
1246. Of the residents? Yes.
1247. Have you had any convictions under the Licensing Act against any of the twenty-one public-houses? Yes.
1248. How many for selling on Sundays? In 1883 there were three convictions; in 1884, twelve convictions;

- convictions; and in 1885, four convictions. For selling during prohibited hours on week-days there were four convictions in 1884, and three convictions in 1885.
1249. Have you had any of these houses disqualified whilst the disqualification clause was in operation? When there have been two convictions against them they have generally transferred their license. Sub-Inspector
Cotter.
2 April, 1886.
1250. Have you had any cases of two convictions against one man? Yes; speaking from memory, there have been double convictions against William Waterhouse, Royal Hotel; Patrick Stevens, Fig-tree Hotel; Mrs. Alchin; Alexander Sim, and Michael Eviston.
1251. Any convictions for permitting gambling? Yes, five in all.
1252. Mr. Abigail.] The other convictions I suppose were for selling during prohibited hours? Yes.
1253. President.] On week-days? Yes, such as for selling at 12 o'clock at night.
1254. Are you aware that any of these houses are owned by brewers? Several are reported to be owned by brewers, but I do not know myself that they are.
1255. Have you known any instance of liquor being adulterated in those houses? No.
1256. We are acquainted with the fact that some spirits go into consumption that cost 2s. 6d. in bond—does any find its way into your district? Yes, white spirit.
1257. Not white spirit—I mean branded brandy or whisky; it is not introduced as white spirit—it is introduced as some kind of liquor: does any go into consumption in your district? I think it probable that some does.
1258. In the low houses? Yes.
1259. Have you any colonial wine houses? Yes.
1260. How many? About five; I have not a list of them.
1261. Are they well conducted? Yes.
1262. No complaints have been made to you about them? No.
1263. Are they kept by males or females? All by males.
1264. Are those males foreigners or Englishmen? I do not think that there is one kept by a foreigner. In 1882 a foreigner did hold a colonial wine license, but it was transferred. Those who have colonial wine licenses are mostly grocers, and they are respectable persons; they combine the sale of wine with something else—it is not their only business.
1265. Then I understand that the majority of the public-houses are well conducted on the week-days, and that the licensees are also law-abiding? The majority of my houses are well conducted—better than is the case elsewhere I believe.
1266. Have you had no cases of flagrant violation of the law with regard to Sunday selling? Oh yes.
1267. I mean cases in which as many as thirty, forty, and even eighty people are seen to enter a public-house? It is not so bad as that. The way the Sunday business is managed in my subdivision is this:—The publicans of course know the police, and it is therefore difficult for us to detect them. Six or eight—or perhaps ten or twelve persons of disreputable appearance enough are admitted one or two at a time. The premises are frequently entered by the police, but the visit results in nothing.
1268. Then the streets I presume are not often troubled with drunken or drunken and disorderly persons? There is a fair share of them, especially on Saturday nights. Many people of the working and middle classes come to Sydney on that night, and some of them come back already drunk and riotous, so that it is not very easy to distinguish between the drunkenness which takes place at North Shore and that which takes place in Sydney.
1269. Generally what is your impression as to the working of the Licensing Acts in your district—is it satisfactory? No.
1270. Do you think there are any deficiencies in the law? There is no denying that it causes a great deal of hostility to the cause of law and order, and a great deal of perjury.
1271. Do you think then that the Act is harsh; say, for instance, with regard to Sunday closing: you admit that to be beneficial—do you think that it works harshly in any other respect? I think that it is a great pity that the community will not accept it in its integrity and abide by it. I do not know that on the whole it is very harsh.
1272. In other words, do you consider it a harshness that a man who wishes to have beer with his Sunday dinner should be unable to obtain it unless he procures it on Saturday night? I should like to be satisfied that the quality of the beer is injured by its being kept from the night before, and of that I am not satisfied. I think there may be a good deal of cant in the complaint of harshness, just as there is the other way.
1273. Well, you see no harshness in the closing of public-houses on Sunday: do you consider it to be a hard thing that they are closed at 11 o'clock on week-days? No; I can speak quite positively as to the week-days. I think that the hours of closing on week-days inflict no hardship, and that the present law in that respect ought to be retained. When in the country I observed that rows and murderous assaults and offences of that kind arising from drunkenness were in most cases attributable to the fact that men were made drunk between the hours of 11 and 12 o'clock at night. If the matter rested with me, I would much rather allow some concession on Sunday than I would allow public-houses to be open after 11 o'clock on week-days.
1275. You mean to say that if a man is seen going into a public-house, the burden of proof that he was there for a legitimate purpose should rest on him? I would not say so with regard to one or two persons—that would appear to me to be erring on the other side—but when a number of men assemble in the vicinity of a public-house, and are seen to go in and out until they become more and more under the influence of liquor, no reasonable man can doubt that the law has been broken by the publican, and I think that such evidence ought to be taken notice of as proof that the law has been evaded. Men have frequently been convicted of stealing when they have been found coming away from a barn or other place where corn is kept, and having corn in their possession, though the owner could not say that the corn was his. And there is a case in the English law books, where it is laid down by the Judge that the fact of a man coming away under the influence of liquor from a London dock where liquor was kept was evidence that he had stolen the liquor. Well, it appears to me that when a number of men assemble in a sober condition in the vicinity of a public-house, and after going in and out a number of times, are manifestly under the influence of liquor, such a fact ought to be taken into consideration as affecting the renewal of the license.

- Sub-Inspector
2 April, 1886.
1276. Let me suppose a case by way of illustration. A is seen going into a public-house, to the best of your belief sober; you see him an hour afterwards coming out of the public-house, to the best of your belief either intoxicated or partly intoxicated: would you make that a specific offence against the publican? No, I think one case would not be sufficient, because there might be a mistake; but say that the same thing occurred in the case of A, B, C, D, and a number of others, then I would make it an offence. I do not want to be unjust to the licensee.
1278. But if you made the offence conditional on a certain number of persons being seen to be under the influence of liquor on leaving a public-house, you would have to furnish proof with regard to each of those persons? I would not suggest that that should be relied upon, as evidence in a case in which a publican is charged with having sold liquor during prohibited hours, but I think that the Bench ought, in dealing with renewals of licenses, to take cognizance of the fact that people have been seen entering and leaving the house Sunday after Sunday.
1279. Now I see what you mean. If evidence of the kind you mention were tendered to the Bench on the occasion of an application for renewal of the license, you think the Licensing Bench ought to take notice of the fact that a number of persons had been seen, on such and such an occasion, entering in an apparently sober state, and coming out the reverse of sober? Yes, that that should be made a ground for refusing the renewal of the license.
1280. But the refusal of the renewal of the license under such circumstances would be a much heavier penalty than that inflicted for any specific offence under the law? The case would seem to me to come under the head of the objections already provided for, namely, that the good order of the neighbourhood is affected by such a state of things. However, I have come to the conclusion that if it were taken cognizance of, there would soon be an end to any serious Sunday selling.
1281. Do you find any difficulty in persuading the Magistrates—I mean do you find that they take in any way a hostile view of the Licensing Act? With regard to convictions, my opinion has always been that the conduct of the Magistrates has been attentive and dispassionate, judgelike, in the manner that judicial functions ought to be exercised; but I have not always been satisfied with the result of my objections to new licenses.
1282. That is what I wanted particularly to ask you. Other inspectors have told us that the Licensing Magistrates have refused to be guided by what they called the surmises of the police: has that been your experience—have the Magistrates refused to accept any other evidence than a record of convictions? I objected only in the case of one publican, that of a man named Thompson, to a renewal, the ground of objection being that the place was a resort for larrikins and prostitutes—not on any ground specified in the Act. Mr. Dillon was Chairman of the Bench at the time, and the evidence established that degrading scenes took place in the grounds, &c., attached to the house, and it also came out that Thompson had assaulted a sergeant of police on one occasion. The Bench refused the renewal of the license.
1283. What is your opinion with regard to the system of local option—do you think it ought to be extended, or are you satisfied with it as it is? I would make the local option vote applicable to all new houses, whatever their size or character. Many new public-houses are built for the sake of the bar trade only, and the extra accommodation is provided merely in order to allow of a license being granted irrespective of the local option vote.
1284. Then you think that an inordinate number of rooms have been built in order simply to obtain exemption from the local option vote? Yes. There is a greater probability of having respectable men in the larger hotels, because they are careful about running risks, but, at the same time, I would exempt no new house from the operation of the local option vote.
1285. Would you extend the local option vote to renewals? Not unjustly; but that affects me little. I think I should if compensation were granted, but not otherwise. I should do what was just, at all risks, so far as I was capable of conceiving what justice was.
1286. Have you had experience in other parts of the country besides Sydney? I have. I was stationed in the Newcastle district; I was stationed, immediately before I came to Sydney, at the Barrington Gold-field; I was stationed at Young; and at Tuena, between Bathurst and Goulburn.
1287. Then you have had a large country experience? Yes.
1288. How many years has it extended over? My service extends over nearly twenty-four years, about twenty of which I spent in the country.
1289. Some of it in pastoral districts? The greater part of it in pastoral districts.
1290. During the time you were in the country, you must have had ample opportunities of seeing the way in which the publicans conducted their houses? Yes, under the old law.
1291. Now, as briefly as you like, give us an epitome of your experience? Well, the small publican in the country is usually a much better man and keeps a better house than the small publican in Sydney. Sometimes he is a mere vampire, but not very often. He fleeces the station workman and knocks down his cheque, and in my time he used to sell on Sundays and at all hours. At Young, from 1863 to 1868, the houses were very bad. Many of them—those on the gold-fields especially—used to keep women of low character, and miners and shearers and country workmen used, as the phrase goes, to be “lambled down.”
1292. Have you had much experience among the “lambing down” publicans? Yes. It can be epitomized very briefly. A shearer, or a station workman, or a farm labourer, when he got his cheque, used to go and very frequently give the landlord his cheque, he being at the time in such a condition, as the saying is, that he could not see daylight. He would scarcely be sober again until the cheque was disposed of. When it was disposed of, which would be according to the publican’s conscience, pretty well, the publican would say to him, “Come, Bill,” or “Tom, your cheque is pretty well up”; and if he was a kindly disposed man he would say to the man—“There is £1 for yourself, and a pair of trousers,” and tell him that if he wanted a job Mr. So-and-so wanted a dam sunk, and that if he would apply he might get the job. Bill would then pick up his swag and go away.
1293. You are giving us an epitome of facts that have come under your notice? Yes, which I have gathered from the talk of working-men to myself.
1294. But have you not seen it? Not the whole process, but I have been told of it so frequently that I can have little doubt of the truth of what I describe. I cannot recall a case in which I actually saw any one hand a publican his cheque.

1295. Mr. Withers.] I suppose it would be one man's work to watch a performance of that kind? Yes, and we did not watch them so closely in those days; those were the bushranging and cattle-stealing days.
1296. President.] But what I wanted to elicit was something of your own personal experience, such as this, that men have come to you and said—"I went into such and such a house with a £60 cheque, and came out with a bottle of rum and a pair of trousers"? They took it as a matter of course.
1297. They did not complain that they had been robbed? No; they have said—"I got £25 for such a work, and I have knocked it down with so and so." I sometimes asked how long the money lasted, and, as I have said, it depended on the conscience of the publican.
1298. I suppose there would be a good many victims of this "lambing down" process: do you think that the practice does not exist now? Not to nearly such an extent as it did. When I left the interior the drinking habits of the people were not nearly so great; "lambing down" had almost become a thing of the past. I have heard of it taking place in the back country—I mean in the north-west and south-west.
1299. Does it not follow the flocks and herds? I dare say.
1300. I want to ask you this as my last question—Do you think the establishment of homes or asylums for people of irretrievable drunken habits would be an advantage? I am afraid not. It might be in some cases, but I think that in the majority of cases in which the habit of drunkenness is thoroughly established there is nothing for it but actual restraint.
1301. But I mean restraint—such restraint as this, putting a man for from one to two years in a place where he will be treated medically for drunkenness? It would be worth trying.
1302. You know that such places exist? Yes.
1303. Do you think such a system could be beneficially imported into this Colony? Yes, if the restraint were sufficiently long to break the habit and perhaps remove the desire for drink. I think it often might result in the saving of a drunkard. You know, of course, the provisions of the English Licensing Act. It is more liberal than ours with regard to the hours of opening, but its provisions with reference to persons found on the premises and the admission of constables are more stringent than ours. It allows any constable to enter a public-house. Here there are so few, comparatively, who have authority to enter that it is difficult to attend to their other duties adequately, and at the same time to exercise a proper supervision over the public-houses.
1304. You think the right to enter ought to be enlarged? It might be extended to senior-constables, who are non-commissioned officers. Pretty well all of us have been senior-constables; I think they should have a right to enter, on good grounds.
1305. A senior-constable on his own motion? Yes, having reasonable cause to suppose that an infraction of the Licensing Act is going on. I think that such authority might be extended to them; or that the Inspector-General or the Superintendent might authorize them.
1306. That is so now. The senior-constable requires authority; but you say that he ought to have power to enter without the necessity to obtain such authority? Yes, in England they trust an ordinary constable.
1307. Mr. Abigail.] You have spoken of the English Act—are you conversant with it? Only by reading.
1308. Have you read any cases recently tried where landlords have been convicted through people being found on their premises for whom they could not possibly vouch? I have not.
1309. You know that there are provisions in the Act empowering such convictions? Yes.
1310. Do you think that it would be beneficial to have such provisions in the Licensing Act of this country? Yes, I think that it would be a very good provision if we always guard against its being oppressively used. Persons found in public-houses, not being members of the family, lodgers, or travellers, might be required to prove that they were not there in contravention of the Act. That is another thing which would prevent Sunday selling; but care would have to be taken that such a provision was used prudently, no scope for oppression being allowed.
1311. Suppose that was one of the provisions of our law, and one or two persons were found on licensed premises, the landlord being unable to show that they were lodgers, you would not punish the landlord? Yes. It was the ingress and egress of persons that I was referring to before—persons who do not remain on the premises, but who get their drink and leave. I think the provision in the English Act is a wise one. If we are going to enforce the law some change should be made. It should either be made more acceptable to the community, or else whatever is not over-oppressive or morally wrong should be done to carry it out.
1312. You say that, of the twenty-one public-houses in your district, in only three or four is Sunday selling carried on? There are more I have no doubt; there are only three or four that every one can see carrying on a Sunday trade.
1313. You do not doubt that the other seventeen keep the law? I have heard suspicions expressed respecting all except two or three of them.
1314. Does the general character of the houses justify you in believing that the other seventeen houses keep the law? I believe that eleven or twelve sell, six or seven occasionally, and that about four sell habitually. As regards the rest I have not been able to ascertain that they sell at all.
1315. You tell us that after two convictions the publican sells his license, for fear of its forfeiture? Yes.
1316. Do you think that the transfers are in all cases bona fide? Yes; I have been glad to get rid of a Sunday seller and get a better man into the house.
1317. Does it follow that a better man succeeds him? The occupant of the house may have been a dummy in some cases, and the broker or proprietor will put in a better man next time.
1318. Have you heard anything about brewers holding blank transfers signed, from those whom they put into these houses? I have heard it said that that is the custom.
1319. I understand you to be in favour of the principle of local option? Yes.
1320. Would you extend it to all parliamentary voters? Yes, I would. I think that if a man has a voice in regard to the election of Members of the Legislature, he might have a local option vote.
1321. You said there were some music halls in your division? Yes.
1322. Attached to the public-houses? No.
1323. Are they near them? Yes.
1324. You had experience of the old Act, when the houses were open on Sundays? Yes.
1325. Do you think that if we were to revert to that practice, and the houses were to be opened for two hours on Sundays, at mid-day, that would prevent illicit drinking at that part of the day? It would have no effect on my side at all. There are two classes who wish to evade the law. If the houses were open for two hours in the morning, the habitual drinkers would get their liquor.

Sub-Inspector
Cotter.

2 April, 1886.

- Sub-Inspector Cotter.
2 April, 1886.
1326. I mean at mid-day? At mid-day it would have no effect. There are two classes—persons who have been drunk over-night and who want a drink in the morning, and business men and others who are not regular drinkers. These latter say—“I rarely drink, yet I cannot get a glass of ale when I want one.” Respectable people want to be able to take a glass whenever they feel inclined to do so; the bar-drinking class want a drink as early as they can get it in a morning.
1327. I see from the list of convictions, that between 1884 and 1885 there was an increase of sixty-nine in the number of convictions of drunkards? Yes.
1328. I suppose that is an indication of the general growth of drinking habits in your district? To some extent; there is an increase in the population, and the people generally are well off. Their being so well-to-do causes a great deal of drinking.
1329. You say that the working of the Act is not satisfactory? No.
1330. Can you tell us how it might be worked satisfactorily? It would be very much easier for us, speaking from our own point of view, to deal with the poor drunkard than with the rich publican, with all the influence which he has at his back. I think that we might enforce such a measure as the English Act, having provisions granting concessions in some directions, whilst enabling us to deal more strictly with the publicans in other directions; we might then provide for the Act being rigidly carried out.
1331. President.] What concessions do you mean? It would perhaps be less difficult to administer the Act if a couple of hours were allowed for the houses to be open on Sunday mornings and evenings, and the other provisions of the English law were adopted; but I would not concede anything as to the opening of the houses, unless the law was made like the English law in reference to prohibited hours. My own opinion is, that unless it is made more dangerous and difficult to break the law no concession should be made; but I think that a certain amount of concession, accompanied with the acquirement of additional facilities for punishing the law-breaker, might lead to good results.
1332. Mr. Abigail.] Would you give the Bench power to compel the forfeiture of a license for a first offence, if it was an aggravated one and the house had a bad character? If the offence was of a casual character I would not; but if it was an offence which involved badmindedness I would. I think that to forfeit for a first offence as a rule might be going too far.
1333. Suppose a publican supplied drink to fifty men on a Sunday, would you forfeit his license for that? Not for one offence. If there were fifty different cases against him he would lose his license under the present Act.
1334. But if a man was convicted of selling to forty or fifty people? That would be a barefaced infraction of the law; but I would not take away a publican's license merely because he had let some man have a glass of whisky during the prohibited hours.
1335. You spoke about opening the public-houses for an hour in the morning and an hour in the afternoon—if that was conceded would the drinking be confined to those hours? No.
1336. Then what benefit should we derive from granting that concession? We should get this advantage,—that if some such concessions are made, liquor-sellers may have less objection to our applying the screw more tightly with regard to the enforcement of the law—we might have a chance of getting the law observed.
1337. President.] Do I understand you to say that if the publican got a little more liberty to sell he would not mind a little more restriction? Yes.
1338. Mr. Hutchison.] You are favourable to the restrictions contained in the English Act? Yes.
1339. But only provided that we allow the publican to open his house for two hours on Sundays? I think that with no more means of enforcing the law than we have now, no good at all would be done by granting two hours in the afternoon; I know they would carry on in precisely the same way at other times.
1340. You would apply the present English Act then so far as obtaining convictions is concerned, but you would insist on the houses being entirely closed on Sundays? No; I think that a practical law might be made by taking the English law both ways, by taking its hours of selling, and also obtaining its better facilities for getting at the publican if he breaks the law.
1341. I understand that the people who want this accommodation are comparatively few? No, all classes want drink one way or another. I say that very few have complained to me of wanting their dinner beer, but many have complained of not being able to get a drink in the forenoon. There are drunken workmen—carpenters and so on, but many gentlemen who come over from Sydney on Sunday afternoons complain that they cannot get a drink of anything they like. There are the two classes that complain to us.
1342. Would it be well to relax the law as to full Sunday closing, provided it could be thoroughly enforced, in order to accommodate the classes to whom you refer? Full Sunday closing would be better if it could be enforced.
1343. And you think the English Act would help you? Yes, but I doubt its ever getting into law; I expect that if we get the English law in one direction we shall have to take it another.
1344. That does not follow: if we maintain the full Sunday closing and adopted the provisions of the English Act with regard to convictions, would that enable you to carry out the law? Very probably.
1345. You think it would? My idea is founded on the notion that there would be great difficulty in getting a law passed in which some concession was not made. I think that if you were to press on the trade in one way you would have to concede to it in another way; for this reason, the difficulty of carrying out the law, as it is, is increasing constantly.
1346. But we want to find a remedy, and I am asking you if we had the English Act do you think you could carry it out? I think entire Sunday closing much better if practicable under the law, whatever law we might have—that is if the law could be enforced.
1347. You said that you had three convictions for Sunday trading in 1883? I find that I made an error; one of the convictions was for some other offence; it was before my time.
1348. In 1884 you had sixteen convictions? Yes.
1349. Were they for Sunday trading? Nearly all.
1350. Last year you had seven convictions—were they principally for Sunday trading? Yes.
1351. Then you have more trouble with the publicans with regard to Sunday trading than with regard to selling liquor after prohibited hours? Yes; the publicans give us very little trouble after hours.
1352. I find that among these convictions some were double? Yes.
1353. In each case of double conviction a transfer took place I suppose? Yes.
1354. Does your division extend to the present railway works? No, it extends near them.

Sub-Inspector
Cotter.

2 April, 1886.

1355. Did not the presence of the railway workmen increase the drinking in your division? It made no difference that I perceived. You see that Hornsby is 13 or 14 miles from my main station at St. Leonards. The constable at Lane Cove reported that the presence of the navvies made but little difference there, as they usually went to Ryde; those lower down went to Sydney by the Hawkesbury steamer.

1356. I understood you to say—and you seemed to feel strongly on the subject—that it would be a good thing to make local option refer to every house? Yes, I am very decided as to that—every new house.

1357. You mean absolute prohibition to the extension of the trade? Yes, unless the community desired it.

1358. Would you make the vote effective for three years? I have not thought as to the time. Perhaps three years might be too long; in rising localities perhaps it might happen that another hotel would really be required before the expiration of three years.

1359. I understood you to say that you would make the vote apply to all houses? Yes.

1360. You said that you would allow no extension of the trade? I mean no new houses of any kind at all, unless the local option vote was in favour of them. I would be content to leave the time for which the vote should apply to the Legislature—I would not tie myself to three years.

1361. You said that you were in favour of the principle of local option being applied to renewals, provided that compensation was given? Yes.

1362. You also said that you were somewhat affected by it—what did you mean by that? I did not mean that I had any personal interest. I was referring to a case in which the local option vote was over-ridden: that was the case of Mr. Thompson, of Chowder Bay. Then there are two new public-houses on the Military Road—large houses, which could not be licensed were it not for the fact that they contain twenty rooms in addition to those prescribed by the Act. The local option vote for the ward in which they are situated was in the negative, but the vote does not apply to hotels which have that number of rooms. These houses have few or no lodgers; the rooms are there; they are furnished. The houses were built at great cost, no doubt, but they do merely the bar trade like other houses; the bar trade is, after all, the inducement.

1363. President.] Do not you think that they were built in the hope of something else? I think that the bar trade is the inducement; I have no doubt of it myself, although I could not make it apparent as an obvious fact. I have no doubt that the bar trade is the inducement in connection with all the houses in my division.

1365. Reverting to the right of police to enter hotels, would you like to have it extended? Yes, to the senior constables.

1366. No further? I think not, because in connection with our police force we always have a number of young men coming and going. Although I have had no experience of the London police, I believe that there are more men join the force with the view of remaining in it than with us. I would not entrust young constables with the right to enter hotels, as, owing to the frequent changes which are made, we can have no actual knowledge of some of them; we cannot be sure that they would exercise such power judiciously.

1367. Are not the police on the whole a trustworthy body of men? As a body they are very trustworthy.

1368. And to be believed? Yes, as a body.

1369. You feel it keenly when the veracity of yourself or your men is questioned? Yes. During my long service in the Force, the only instance I know of in which a constable has been fairly fixed for perjury was that of Mahood.

1370. Suppose that it were enacted that the license should be for six days in the week only, do you think that that would enable you to enforce Sunday closing? I have my doubts about it. There is one thing which you must bear in mind: you must not press the publican so far as to make his position less dangerous as a seller without a license, because he is not so easily caught. It is a point of honor with those whom he supplies with liquor in defiance of the law not to give evidence against him—if they give evidence at all, to depose that there was no drinking.

1371. But suppose that he was found supplying liquor on Sunday, there ought to be no difficulty about proceeding against him? If a workable law, giving the license for six days in the week, could be made, I say that it would be a good thing. My ideas with regard to Sunday selling are modified by the notion that it will be impossible, or at any rate very difficult, to enforce complete Sunday closing.

1372. Provided it could be enforced it would be desirable? Yes.

1373. President.] You are aware that the present Act allows any constable to enter an hotel, provided he has an authority from a Licensing Magistrate or the Superintendent of Police—as a matter of fact is that authority ever given? I have never known the Superintendent of Police to do so. It always seemed to me that the authority was not intended to be a general one—that the authority was to be given for a specified house and a special occasion.

1374. What has been the practice with regard to it? I never applied to the Superintendent for authority for any of my men, because I thought the provision too doubtful—that there was the danger of the above construction being put upon it.

1375. Do you think that a general authority would be advisable? The Superintendent of Police, a Stipendiary Magistrate, or an ordinary J.P., might be entrusted with the power to give the authority to any member of the Force, the authority to remain in force until it was revoked. I think that that would be an additional means of carrying out the Act. At present the only officer in addition to the inspector who can enter an hotel under authority is a sergeant. The senior-sergeant of my division is at present laid up with a broken collar-bone, therefore I am the only officer who can exercise the authority.

1376. Mr. Roseby.] In your opinion, do the Magistrates pay sufficient regard to the representations of the police as to the character of applicants for licenses—I understood you to say that some one who had been convicted had obtained a license in your district, notwithstanding that his previous license was cancelled because he allowed larrikins and prostitutes to assemble at his house? That was the case of Mr. Thompson, of Chowder Bay.

1377. When he applied for another license you represented that to the Magistrate? Yes.

- Sub-Inspector Cotter. 1378. Notwithstanding your representations, the license was granted? The history of the case is this: when the occurrence to which you refer took place, I was not in the district, but I heard of it from other constables and objected to the renewal of the license, on the ground that, on holidays, the place was the resort of prostitutes and larrikins, who carried on disgraceful scenes. Mr. Dillon was the Chairman of the Bench on that day, and the objection was successful. Some time afterwards Mr. Thompson again applied for a license, but I objected to the application, on the ground that the previous license had not been renewed, and that meanwhile a local option vote, which was in the negative, had been taken, and the objection prevailed on that point. Mr. Thompson then applied for a conditional license for a large hotel, and his application was supported by a petition signed by some thousands of people. Mr. Addison, who was the Chairman of the Bench, said that a petition signed by between 2,000 and 3,000 people had been presented in favour of the application, and, considering the numbers who seemed to desire it and the character of the hotel to be built, he would grant the license. That is what occurred.
- 2 April, 1886. 1379. In the prosecutions which have been entered against publicans for infractions of the law, have you found that witnesses for the defence have perjured themselves to a great extent to get the publicans out of the difficulty? I have no moral doubt that in nearly all defended cases perjury was committed.
1380. It is said that there is more extensive perjury in connection with these cases than was ever known before? One of the indictments against the Licensing Act is the amount of perjury which it has fostered. There is a numerous class who are against the law, or perhaps this would not be the case. They have become skilful in concocting spurious defences, and supporting these in the witness-boxes by testimony which is not true. The Police Court solicitors will tell you that, but of course not in relation to cases in which they have been engaged.
1381. How many of the twenty-one publicans in your district could provide decent accommodation for a respectable man and his family? All the hotels have the number of rooms prescribed by the Act, but none of the publicans would care to see you except you came as a bar customer, or went into the parlour to take some drinks.
1382. They do not lay themselves out to give respectable accommodation to the public? No; the proprietors of the large hotels would take you, but they would not want you; they would prefer that you went somewhere else.
1383. So that if a respectable traveller were to go to you, you would have a difficulty in getting him accommodation if he asked you to make him a recommendation? He would be accommodated as a favour if I made a request on his behalf. Some of the publicans are kind-hearted in their way, and they would accommodate a traveller, but as a rule they would sooner not have him in the house; they prefer people who will go to the bar and call for drinks. At some of the hotels you can get bread and cheese or a sandwich; they are very good in this way. At Mrs. Darton's "Albert Hotel," which is quite a nice place, you can get a snack and a good glass of beer; at Walsh's "Royal Hotel" there are a good many lodgers.
1384. The return of arrests for drunkenness in your district does not represent anything like the actual drunkenness, does it? Oh dear no. A man must be decidedly drunk before a policeman is justified in interfering with him. I always tell my men that if a man is able to go home, or if there is no fear of his being injured or of his injuring any one else, they must let him alone. I do this on the ground that I think that the law ought to be construed in favour of the individual rather than against him.
1385. I suppose that the majority of young people among whom you say intemperance is increasing never go far enough to put themselves in the power of the police? The young Australians rarely do as to drink; you will see them with flushed faces and fishy eyes, and hear them talking loudly. The charges usually made against them are riotous behaviour and using obscene language.
1386. I suppose that a large proportion of these offences are attributable to drink? Beyond doubt they are. Such offences as indecent behaviour—making water in the streets—and riotous behaviour, like shouting and threatening to fight, are no doubt in the majority of cases attributable to the exciting influence of drink.
1387. You have stated that you do not notice any particular drunkenness among the female population in your district? Not more than in other communities. There is drunkenness among families, but I do not feel justified in saying that it is increasing; there are no decided indications of its increasing—not more than I have noticed in many country districts.
1388. You have in your division a smaller proportion of public-houses than there is in any of the districts which have been brought under our consideration? Very much smaller I believe.
1389. Would you desire to have the proportion increased? I think that if we were rid of all but the reasonably large and well-conducted hotels, it would be a great blessing.
1390. You think that there are more hotels in your district than the legitimate requirements of the community demand? I have no more public-houses than can do well—if that is the test; but I think that the legitimate wants of the community could be satisfied with half of them.
1391. You think that one hotel for every 2,000 inhabitants would be ample? I should like to see good houses in the hands of respectable men, who would be able to do an honest trade; I should like to take the competition of the pot-house away from these.
1392. There are in your district several low pot-houses? Yes; there are some very nice small houses, and several mere pot-houses.
1393. Where the low and depraved usually resort? Yes, I would foster the respectable publican, and strike out the mere vampire.
1394. President.] Did I understand you to say that you think that one hotel for every 2,000 inhabitants would be sufficient? I think it would. A great deal would depend on the locality; for example, a house at a corner in the city and another half a mile away would hardly be sufficient. I think that half the number of public-houses distributed judiciously would meet the wants of the population. All that they supply are the drinking wants. Frequently I think that the population would be better without too ready facilities for getting drink.
1395. I am not going to find fault with your opinion, but I wish to draw your attention to the fact that in the Victorian Licensing Act, just passed—a measure which was largely considered a local option measure; at any-rate one which was promoted by many local optionists and friends of temperance—one of the most important provisions is that there shall be one hotel for every 250 of the population up to 1,000, and for every 500 over 1,000 another hotel? I do not think that nearly that number is required.
1396. Are you giving consideration to the fact that at least one-half of the population of North Shore come to Sydney daily, and that probably they satisfy their wants to a large extent in Sydney? They do to a great extent, no doubt; they do quite as much drinking in Sydney as they do at North Shore I suppose.
- 1397.

1397. Mr. Withers.] I understand you to say that the present Act would be a good one if all the conditions were enforced, and especially if the rivalry existing as to Sunday selling could be done away with? Yes. My opinion is that we should try to get the trade into the hands of respectable men, and that they should be free from undue competition. I think that more care than is taken, ought to be taken in licensing people originally.

Sub-Inspector
Cotter.
2 April, 1886.

1398. You have very little difficulty with the publicans except as to Sunday selling? Nothing else is worth mentioning.

1399. Do not you think that if the right of entry were extended it would have a good effect? Yes, if put in judicious and trustworthy hands—and they are not necessarily confined to any special rank in the service; as a rule, the men who reach the rank of senior-constable are tried men.

1400. And you think that that would effectually put a stop to the Sunday trading? I would not say "effectually," but I think that there is a probability that it would.

1401. Do not you think that many of the publicans sell liquor on Sunday simply because they are afraid of the competition, on other days, of other publicans who do not scruple about violating the law? They are bullied into doing so. A man comes up and says—"Mr. So-and-so, give me a drink." If the publican says "no," the other man uses bad language and says, "Well, I'll go to Mr. So-and-so, and if he will give me a drink I will give him my custom on week-days."

1402. Then I suppose that many of the publicans are really desirous of closing on Sundays? I have no doubt that a fair proportion of them are.

1403. And that the police know that they desire to close on Sundays? Yes. It is particularly the case in small localities like Willoughby or Lane Cove. If there is only one public-house, it is usually respectably conducted; but if there are two, both begin to sell on Sundays more or less, because the competition for the week-day trade pits one against the other. This causes a good deal of Sunday selling, but by no means all of it. Some of the publicans would sell on Sundays in any case.

1404. You believe that the closing of public-houses at 11 o'clock at night has been a great boon to the public and the community? Yes; a quarter of an hour's drinking between 11 and 12 always appeared to me to have more effect than half an hour's or three-quarters of an hour's drinking at any other time. In all probability they had had enough by 11 o'clock, and it was between 11 and 12 that they got too much. Then, with working men, when they are out drinking at an hour when they are usually in bed, the drink seems to have more effect on them; at all events they seem to get more idiotic or violent between 11 and 12 than at any other time. I noticed this particularly in the populous Newcastle, Lambton, and Wallsend districts.

1405. It has been said that perjury is made a handle of against the working of the Licensing Act—I suppose that there was always hard swearing in the Police Courts, even before the Licensing Act came into operation? Hard swearing is very much more common now than it used to be; it seems to me that it is a greatly increasing evil.

1406. But the allegation that perjury is committed does not apply to cases under the Licensing Act any more than to other cases? No; but they seem to be getting more practised at it in connection with cases under the Licensing Act. Suppose a publican gets out of a difficulty, you will hear the neighbours, who know the precise facts, say—"Didn't so-and-so get out of such a thing cleverly?" People who years ago used to be horrified at or very much dissatisfied with such a state of things, now look on it as a matter of course—they regard it as mere cleverness.

1407. Does not it apply to all classes of cases? I am a bit exercised in my mind as to whether the Licensing Act is not responsible for a great deal of it in other cases, and whether it did not get a great impetus from the Licensing Act.

1408. I suppose people think it a pardonable thing when the object is to get a publican off from the charge of selling a glass of beer? Yes.

1409. With reference to the bush hotels, is it not a fact that some of them are so badly conducted—that there is so much disorder, so much dirt and vermin, and generally uncomfortable surroundings—that people of somewhat refined tastes prefer to get a blanket and sleep away from the buildings? I have heard of about half a dozen such instances during my time, but this Licensing Act did good work in abolishing most of these houses—houses which had only a room or two—which were full of vermin—in which there was no furniture and no flooring. The Act has had an excellent effect on country houses of this class, because in the country the inspection has been vigorous and reasonably successful.

1410. The Act is more easily administered in the country than in the city? There are not so many Sunday customers in the country as there are in the city, and the country publicans have not been so successful in defending cases brought against them; they have had no Slatterys, Leviens, or Robertses, to defend them.

1411. The police get to know more in the country from the chit-chat among the people—it is not a difficult matter to find out what so-and-so had for his dinner yesterday? It is a very difficult matter here to get information respecting violations of the Licensing Act; but in the country, if you like, you can soon find out what somebody living 5 miles away had for his dinner yesterday.

1412. North Shore is a beggarly place in which to get anything to eat, is it not? Precisely so. None of the publicans want you unless you want drink. We think Walsh's and Mrs. Darton's hotel, where you can get a sandwich and a good glass of beer, and civil treatment, something exceptional.

1413. I suppose that your intercession would be of some advantage to a person wishing to get accommodation? If I were very civil I might get him treated with a little warmth. Many of the publicans have facilities for entertaining people if they chose to do so.

1414. You are quite sure that the police, as a rule—I am certain there are exceptions to it—are not eager to make arrests with a view to promotion? Quite.

1415. I presume that the number of arrests for drunkenness does not really represent one-half of the cases of drunkenness? They do not represent one-tenth, because a person who in ordinary conversation would be said to be drunk, would not be said to be drunk by a policeman who has any conception of his duty. My instructions to my men are, not to arrest a man unless his feet and his faculties are affected by drink. Although a man might be drunk in the ordinary sense, if he were able to take care of his purse and his person I should leave him alone, and, as far as my influence would have any effect, the constables would leave him alone; but if a man is in such a condition that he cannot avoid staggering against people and inconveniencing them, or annoying them by his conversation, or if he is lying helpless on the road and is in danger of being run over, then the police take charge of him.

- Sub-Inspector
Cotter.
2 April, 1886.
1416. You would not be in favour of having the public-houses opened for longer hours than at present? No.
1417. You think that it would be desirable, in the interests of a large majority of the publicans who are now suspected of Sunday selling, to enforce absolute closing on Sundays? Yes; or, if the houses are to be opened during a specified time, that the law should be rigidly enforced in that respect at other times.
1418. Mr. Colls.] Are all the hotels in your division up to the standard? Yes.
1419. The accommodation is generally taken up by boarders? There are boarders in a few of the houses; the Royal Hotel has, perhaps, a dozen boarders.
1420. I suppose that people from the country do not go the North Shore to look for accommodation? In the first instance they seek it in the city.
1421. Have you ever been appealed to by country people who wanted accommodation for a night or so? Those who have asked me where they could get accommodation have been respectable people who have been belated. It was not until recently that boats ran to and from the city all through the night; before that people were frequently belated.
1422. Do you say that it would be impossible for people who might miss a boat to get accommodation at North Shore? I have not said that it would be impossible, but sometimes it would be very difficult. The publicans do not care about providing accommodation.
1423. I suppose that a great many of the working-class board at most of the houses? Not a large number. The boarders who are liked are men with means, more or less—warehousemen, clerks, and small business men, or large business men if they can get them; it is only in the small houses that labouring men board.
1424. Has not the population at North Shore increased during the construction of the tramway? No; the workmen were mostly Sydney men.
1425. Are there any oyster-saloons at North Shore? One in connection with a fruit-shop.
1426. Have you ever heard of sly grog selling in these places? I have heard it said that there was a suspicion that grog was sold in the fruit-shops and oyster saloons, but as far as I could ascertain there did not appear to be much foundation for the suspicion.
1427. Have you had any convictions for sly grog selling? Not at North Shore.
1428. Have you had any convictions for supplying liquor to boys and girls under the prescribed age? No; young men from sixteen to about twenty-four are troublesome. No doubt, sometimes liquor is supplied to youths under the prescribed age.
1429. I suppose that you are aware that good well-conducted hotels are very necessary? Yes, I want them; it is the respectable publican whom I should like to encourage.
1430. Have you ever taken samples of liquor from the hotels for analysis? I believe that the district inspector has.
1431. Have complaints been made to you as to the quality of liquor sold? No.
1432. No man suffering from the effects of drink has made a complaint? I do not think that I should be correct in saying that no one had imputed shakiness or delirium tremens to bad liquor. Nearly all persons afflicted in that way do so; they usually attribute their condition to the bad quality rather than the quantity of the liquor which they have consumed.
1433. Have you had any cases in which husbands or wives have applied for prohibitions against publicans? Yes; fathers against sons, husbands against wives, and wives against husbands.
1434. Have you had many of such cases? I should say about a dozen during the three years and a half that I have been at St. Leonards.
1435. Were the prohibitions granted? Yes; some at the Water Police Court, and some at St. Leonards.
1436. President.] Does not the reluctance of the publicans to supply people with food and accommodation arise from the fact that the publicans do not regard the people as bona fide travellers? I refer to ordinary cases.
1437. Considering the position of North Shore and the possibility of people being belated, do not you think that it would be a wise thing to increase the obligations of the publicans, so as to make them supply victuals to any one applying for them, be he a bona fide traveller or not—at present the obligation is limited to bona fide travellers? I think that it would be well that the publicans should be under obligation to supply meals or beds.
1438. Mr. Colls.] I suppose that the Licensing Magistrates cannot get a meal when they go to St. Leonards? There is a club of which a number of Sydney lawyers are members. Some of them have told me that the reason of their being members was that they were sure of getting a luncheon—they did not know where to get it elsewhere. I have taken some of the Licensing Magistrates to the hotel of Mrs. Darton—who is an educated lady—and having told her who they were, have asked her to provide food for them, and she has done so.
1439. Are there any clubs where drink can be procured on Sundays? Yes, by members and their guests.
1440. Have you any idea as to what the amount of the subscription is? I am told that the subscription to the club, to which I refer is half a guinea a year. There is a code of by-laws and a regular mode of election.
1441. You are aware that drinking is carried on there on Sundays? Yes. I think that there ought to be no exception in favour of clubs; I do not see why clubmen should compete with the publicans.

MONDAY, 5 APRIL, 1886.

Present:—

ALEX. OLIVER, Esq., M.A., PRESIDENT,	J. ROSEBY, Esq., J.P.,
T. COLLS, Esq., J.P.,	R. FOWLER, Esq., J.P.,
A. HUTCHISON, Esq.,	J. DAVIES, Esq., C.M.G., J.P., M.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Inspector Larkins sworn and examined:—

- Inspector
Larkins.
5 April, 1886.
1442. President.] You are in charge of the Newtown division? Yes.
1443. Will you describe the boundaries? It is bounded on one side by Botany; by George's River along to Saltpan Creek, across by Haslem Creek, and around by the Parramatta River to Balmain, including Leichhardt; and then around by Camperdown to the Missenden Road or the University.
1444. Your district contains a good many municipalities? Fourteen or fifteen.
1445. How many years have you been in charge? Six years on the 1st of June next.
1446. How many public-houses are there in your division? 107. 1447.

Inspector
Larkins.

5 April, 1886.

1417. Has there been that number during the whole of the time that you have been in charge? No; there were ninety-eight in 1880, and now there are 107, and I think that three have been done away with in the meantime.

1448. What is the class of the houses—are they large or small? Some of them have very good accommodation; they all contain the standard accommodation.

1449. Are they respectably conducted as a rule? They are all well conducted, so far as the observance of the Act is concerned, except as to Sunday-selling.

1450. Compared with the class of houses in the city I presume that they are small? Out of the 107 there are about fourteen or fifteen first-class houses; the others are of a medium class—not of a very high standard as to the accommodation.

1451. Are they closed on Sundays and during prohibited hours on week-days? I have nothing to complain of on week-days. I do not think that out of the 107 houses you can find one open at five minutes past 11 at night. There are about fifty in which no trade whatever is noticeable on Sundays; we have never had any complaint respecting them, and have no reason to believe that any trade is carried on. About thirty apparently do a small trade on Sundays, but no complaint is made about them, and about twenty-seven give us a good deal of trouble.

1452. Are the twenty-seven of the class called pot-houses? The majority of them are; some are of the best class—the hotels at Sandringham, Sans Souci, and Tom Ugly's Point, liquor is sold in those hotels on Sundays—they are a good class of houses, and are well conducted on week-days. We have good reason to believe that they sell liquor on Sundays; the licensee of an hotel at Sans Souci was convicted, and, I believe, the license cancelled, but the house was re-opened.

1453. Are there any dancing saloons in your division? About four.

1454. Do they give you much trouble? No.

1455. Is much drink consumed in them? None on the premises; I am not aware that any drink is consumed during the time that dancing is carried on. There are only two of them which cause much trouble.

1456. I suppose there are no upstairs bars in your division? No.

1457. Are there any houses of ill fame? None that I am aware of.

1458. Have you a return showing the number of apprehensions for drunkenness in your division? Yes; but first of all I may tell you what I estimate the population of the division to be. The calculation is a rough one, based on the general electoral and the municipal rolls. The rolls for the electorates of Newtown and Canterbury contain 18,777 voters, and there are about 14,675 voters on the municipal rolls of the various boroughs. These figures show a very large increase over 1880. A large portion of the Balmain and the Glebe electorates are also included in the division, which is about 10 miles square. I multiply the number on the rolls by three only, so as to make allowance for cases in which the same names appear on both rolls. In 1880, 315 people were dealt with for drunkenness; in 1881, 462; 1882, 421; 1883, 525; 1884, 527; 1885, 636.

1459. To what class do these people belong? Generally to the working-class.

1460. Do they belong to the class who get drunk on Saturdays and Sundays and drink very little through the week? No; the generality of these people get drunk periodically.

1461. I suppose that there are not as many habitual drunkards as there are in the city? There are very few.

1462. I imagine that when these people can take care of themselves you let them do so? Yes, the police do not interfere with people who can get home.

1463. Can you give any idea as to the number who would be considered irreclaimable drunkards? I do not think that there would be more than a dozen.

1464. Then, in your district, with a large population compared with the number of public-houses, there appears to have been a steady increase in the habits of intemperance from 1882? Yes.

1465. Among residents? As a rule they are residents; but when the Illawarra railway was in course of construction, there were the navvies.

1466. I suppose there is very little drunkenness at the picnic houses, Sandringham, Sans Souci, and such places? Very little; on holidays there is nothing to complain of—things are remarkably quiet; it is too far from the city for the rougher class of people to go there.

1467. Then people do not go to those places for the purpose of drinking? No; the visitors are usually families out for a holiday.

1468. There has been an increase of nine in the number of houses since you took charge of the division: do you consider it a satisfactory condition of things compared with the increase of population? I think there are quite sufficient if not too many public-houses already; the houses are not fairly divided among the municipalities; I think that there are enough in every place, but in some places there are too many. In Newtown, for example, there are about twenty-three houses.

1469. Those are old houses? The majority of them.

1470. Have any houses been discontinued during the time that you have been in charge of the division? About three.

1471. What has been the result of the local option vote in your division? In general it has been against an increase in the number of houses.

1472. Do you think that I shall be right in saying that out of twenty places in which a local option vote has been taken, eighteen or fifteen have been against an increase? I think you would. I can furnish you with a return showing in detail the results of the two local option votes which have been taken.

1473. Are there many colonial wine shops in your division? Five or six.

1474. Are they well conducted? Yes. There is very little business done in them; colonial wine is sold at some grocers' shops.

1475. Have you observed any increase in the habits of intemperance among young people or females in your division? No. I have a return showing the number of people under twenty who have been arrested and dealt with. In 1880 there were 10; in 1881, 19; in 1882, 16; in 1883, 13; in 1884, 37; in 1885, 15. There is no noticeable increase.

1476. Do those figures represent the whole of the cases in your division? Yes; as, although some of them may be dealt with in the city and others at Newtown, they are all recorded in the books at Newtown.

1477. Have you any trouble in getting convictions for Sunday-selling? A very great deal.

1478. I suppose the publicans use the same precautions as those in Sydney do? Yes.

- Inspector Larkins.
6 April, 1886.
1479. Do you send out any men in plain clothes? About ten every Sunday.
1480. What places do they generally watch? All around. I change the men about.
1481. Did the presence of the navvies working on the Illawarra line add to the intemperance of the division? A good deal. They were not near any public-house for a great portion of the time, consequently a great deal of sly grog selling was carried on, as the sly grog sellers follow the men.
1482. Do you know whether any of the houses in your division are owned by brewers? I only know it by repute. I should say that twenty are owned by brewers; of course I do not know it as a fact. There are twenty-eight houses which have not changed hands since I have been in charge of the division.
1483. With regard to the local option vote, from your observation do you think that there has been much apathy about it? A great deal.
1484. Do you know why? I could not say; people do not seem to take an interest in it, except in very few instances.
1485. Do you think that the reason is because the effect of a local option vote is so peculiar; if the people had a large power of control over the public-houses within their limits, do you think that their apathy would disappear? I could hardly say. In some instances where a new license is applied for, the existing publican became very active to protect himself against an increase, and on the other hand the applicant is active. I suppose that not a third of the people who enter the polling-booths take the trouble to record a vote on the local option question.
1486. If, instead of being limited to ratepayers, the local option vote were extended to parliamentary voters, do you think that the apathy would be diminished? Do you think that the extension would have any appreciable result? I do not think that it would be diminished.
1487. In point of fact you think that the people are apathetic on the subject? Yes. I should say that at present the voting power is in the hands of the most intelligent portion of the public property owners and others who have an interest in the various municipalities.
1488. Do you think a publican should vote on a matter which concerns himself? No; he should not be allowed to decide whether or not there shall be an increase or decrease in the number of licensed houses.
1489. He has, according to law, a vote to perpetuate his own monopoly? Yes.
1490. Can you suggest any amendments to make the local option vote effective and more equitable? I cannot offer any opinion.
1491. Do you think the people should have the local option vote? I do not see why they should not.
1492. Has anything suggested itself to you to remove the present apathy of the people on this question? No, unless the vote be taken with the municipal vote; but often there are no contests.
1493. Would you make it more compulsory and extend the voting power? The former might be done, but not the latter.
1494. Should it extend to renewals? I am very doubtful as to the advisability of doing so. At present people do not appear to be voting for anything, and most people look on the local option vote as a farce.
1495. You have nothing to suggest? Undoubtedly, if it applied to renewals, I would bring all voting power to bear, because publicans and brewers would be materially interested. In a few instances that I know, where some activity was shown for the increase of public-houses, the vote was carried because the people exerted themselves. At Leichhardt, where a new house was built, the vote was in favour of an increase so that this house might obtain a license.
1496. Have you traced any felonies or grave misdemeanours in your district to drinking habits? Yes; there were two murders last year, one at Camperdown, and the other was one of our own men, Constable Hara.
1497. Is there a preponderance of bad liquor dispensed in the houses? Yes; as regards the three-penny drink.
1498. Can the Licensing Act be amended so as to simplify the obtaining of convictions? I think if the onus of proof that people were within their houses for lawful purposes were thrown on publicans it would assist us materially.
1499. If a man went into a public-house at Newtown, Marrickville, or elsewhere in your district, and asked for quarters for himself, and perhaps for his wife and family, could he get them? Yes; but the publicans are not anxious to give accommodation.
1500. Is the accommodation taken up by boarders? No.
1501. Then they have empty rooms, and in spite of that they would venture to refuse a man any sort of accommodation? Yes; and we cannot prosecute then unless we can prove that they had spare accommodation on the occasion. Accommodation can be got at a few houses such as at Sans Souci where families stay, but I do not suppose that the 107 houses in my district have in all 107 boarders.
1502. Is it a fact that the Stipendiary Magistrates, on the occasion of their periodical visits, can scarcely get a bite of bread and cheese in the houses? Yes, except in a few instances. In Newtown, where there are twenty-three houses, I do not suppose, except in one or two instances, you could get any refreshments except at their own dinner-hour.
1503. Has the effect of the Act been marked in clearing the streets and freeing the district from noise, rows, and riots at night-time? Not so marked as it has been in the metropolis; at the same time it has effected a wonderful reformation.
1504. Do you think 11 o'clock on week-days is a proper hour for closing? No, I think they might be closed at 10 o'clock, especially in the suburban houses.
1505. Have you any theatres or places of entertainment except dancing saloons? Sometimes there are concerts in the various halls.
1506. Would you open the houses during any time on Sundays? No, I do not see any necessity for an extension of the hours of selling, nor do the people, except in a few isolated instances, seem to require it.
1507. Did the houses keep open late under the old Act? Yes, all night in many cases; hardly one of the 107 houses in my district is open five minutes after 11 o'clock; except a few people hanging about to finish a game of dominoes, there is very little business after 10 o'clock; 10 o'clock would be an admirable hour for suburban houses to close.
1508. Have you many houses in the hands of improper people? I think those people who sell on Sundays should not be allowed to hold a license.
1509. Have you attempted to stop these renewals? Yes.
1510. With any result? No; it is useless to prosecute unless we have the best evidence. We see numbers of people going into houses on Sunday and in many instances coming out drunk; the police are watched from the door and often the balcony of the hotel; frequently publicans deliver the liquor through their back windows; and inside

Larkins.

5 April, 1886.

inside I have often seen seven and eight persons, who were not lodgers, seated on chairs. It is useless to go to a Court with this evidence, and it has been ruled in an adjoining division that we must come with evidence of the most convincing character.

1511. Is there much domestic misery in the district in consequence of drinking habits? Yes.

1512. And crime? Yes.

1513. Are many complaints made to you? Frequently women have complained that their husbands are drinking on Sundays in the houses I have described.

1514. What do they suppose you can do for them? Stop the selling.

1515. Do you ever attempt that duty? Yes; but it is of little use to do so, as if you stop the practice at one or two houses, the people can easily get their liquors at a third or a fourth house.

1516. What is the value of the Magistrates' orders in preventing drunkards from getting drunk? It is a good provision where it is applied to a country town which has only a few houses, but it is of no use whatever in the metropolis and suburbs.

1517. Mr. Davies.] Was the new Act in the first year of its operation any improvement on the old Act? Yes, it effected a wonderful reformation.

1518. Was there a decrease in the arrests for drunkenness? Yes; in 1881 there were 462 arrests, while in 1882 the arrests numbered 421.

1519. And, on the passing of the Amending Act, there was a gradual decrease? No, they have gradually increased; but the increase of population and police would, I think, more than account for the increase of persons charged with drunkenness. I have three times as many police now as I had 1881.

1520. Is the increased number of arrests at the present time attributable to the increased population, or to defects in the Amending Act itself? To the population; there were 636 arrests last year, as against 421 in 1882.

1521. And the population increased proportionately? Yes, perhaps even more so.

1522. Is any social reform attributable to the new Act? Yes. I do not know what state we should be in if the old Act had continued in operation.

1523. There has been some alteration during the last few years in the way Stipendiary Magistrates deal with licensing matters? For the first year or two, three Magistrates used to sit; but under the Amending Act only one presides. This practice is not so beneficial as the previous system; for it appears we require stronger evidence now to make out a case. There has been a failure in the administration of the law in this respect.

1524. What has been the increase in number of public-houses? About nine.

1525. How many licenses have been cancelled under the present law? About three.

1526. How many applications have been refused? Sixty-five; under the old system there would have been at the present time 100 more public-houses.

1527. President.] Were those refusals mainly in consequence of the local option vote? No; on objections of the police that the houses were not required, and sometimes on objections by residents. I have eleven applications now for new licenses.

1528. Mr. Davies.] What is the general character of the applicants? Good.

1529. And the real ground of objection? That the houses were not required in the locality, and that peace and good order were likely to be disturbed by their institution.

1530. Do the people generally protest against the granting of new licenses? No; sometimes about fifty or sixty support an application.

1531. Is that the exception or the rule? In nearly all cases, as many people petition in favour of as they do against an application; in fact people will sign petitions both for and against an application, if they are asked in a plausible way to do so, and I am quite satisfied that unless the old Act had been repealed we should have there now twice 107 houses.

1532. Then the apathetic exercise of the local option vote has done some good in that respect? Yes; though apathetic at elections, they are not so apathetic when people are applying for new licenses.

1533. Do the people declare against the granting of licenses to small and large hotels alike? Yes, it matters little as to the size of the hotel, for they would not average more than one boarder each.

1534. An application would not be admissible when the people have declared against an increase? Yes, if the place has thirty-three rooms; and these are not exceptional cases.

1535. Were there any houses of exceptional size and accommodation among the sixty-five applications refused? Yes.

1536. Have you much drunkenness on Sundays? No, very little.

1537. How many arrests for drunkenness on Sunday have you made since 1880? In 1880, 29; in 1881, 35; in 1882, 16; in 1883, 21; in 1884, 23; and in 1885, 29.

1538. There has not been much increase in that respect? No.

1539. The increased population would account for that? Yes, and the increased police too. In 1881 I had twenty police; now I have about sixty-five.

1540. How many persons suffering from delirium tremens have been arrested and sent to the Receiving-house? The number of arrests on the ground of insanity—I cannot tell you how many were induced by drinking—were as follows:—In 1880, 12; in 1881, 26; in 1882, 31; in 1883, 28; in 1884, 22; and in 1885, 26; and the number of those cases sent to the Receiving-house were, in 1880, 7; in 1881, 17; in 1882, 21; in 1883, 17; in 1884, 15; and in 1885, 18. The majority of cases were caused by excessive drinking.

1541. Have you any bars occupied by or sublet to gay ladies? No.

1542. What is the character of licensees now as compared with former times? There are twenty-eight houses which have not changed hands since the passing of the new Act. One, I think, has held a license for about fifty-six years, and another for about thirty-five years. Twenty-seven houses changed hands once; twenty houses twice; eleven houses three times; five houses five times; three houses six times, and three houses seven times.

1543. Has there been a general improvement in the conduct and character of the houses? Yes, a marked improvement.

1544. Mr. Colls.] What experience have you had in the police? Nearly twenty-four years in Sydney.

1545. Have you had no experience in the country? Not very much.

1546. Is George's River included in your division? Yes, it is the boundary.

- Inspector Larkins. 1547. I suppose the population there has increased in consequence of the construction of the Illawarra Railway? It has increased, from various causes, all over the division. I do not think that the construction of the Illawarra Railway has been the principal cause. For instance, at Leighardt, I dare say there are now 8,000 people, whereas six years ago there were hardly as many hundreds.
- 5 April, 1886. 1548. Have there been many cases of sly grog selling on the railway line? Yes, I have had three convictions for sly grog selling and one for distilling spirits. The latter was at Gannon's Forest, near George's River. One of the convictions for sly grog selling was on the other side of the river, in the Liverpool district.
1549. How many of the houses in your division have accommodation for travellers? All of them have four furnished rooms for the accommodation of the public.
1550. Do you think that they could accommodate any one who wished to stay there for a night or a few days? I do not believe that they would; the landlords do not want to accommodate people.
1551. Have you any oyster saloons in your division? There are two or three oyster-shops in Newtown, but they are not the same as the oyster saloons in the city.
1552. Have you any of those shilling clubs in your division, which are formed with the object of supplying drink to members on Sundays? No, not one. There was a German club at Drutt town or Enfield, off the Liverpool Road, which was carried on as a colonial wine-shop, and in connection with a large vineyard.
1553. Have you any skittle alleys or bowling saloons? There are a few skittle alleys.
1554. Connected with hotels? Yes.
1555. Do you think that those publicans who cannot accommodate the public should have a general license? Certainly not; I think they should be punished for refusing to accommodate the public. But, as I said before, we must have proof that when they refused they had available accommodation.
1556. Of course the houses are up to the standard required by the Act, or they would not be licensed? Yes; they are inspected every quarter.
1557. Have you had any experience of the working of the licensing law in England? No.
1558. You are of opinion that some houses are built with the required accommodation, but only for carrying on a bar trade? Yes, and some of these houses containing thirty-two rooms that are now being put up are simply for a bar trade. At the last quarterly meeting a license was applied for for a house at Summer Hill. I opposed it, on the ground that it was not required, and that it would be likely to disturb the neighbourhood, as there was a very good house within  $\frac{1}{2}$  a mile of it and near to the railway station. The landlord of the existing house went into the witness-box and said that the house in regard to which application had been made was required. I asked him how many rooms he had in his own house, and he said twenty-six. Then I asked him how many boarders he kept as a rule, and he said that he never had more than six; I remarked that he would hardly induce the Bench to believe that another public-house was wanted when he could not get his own house filled.
1559. Do you ever inspect the hotels to see how they are furnished? Yes.
1560. Are they furnished in a proper manner? Some of them are poorly furnished; there are a couple of beds in some of them, and a couple of chairs and little bits of tables, just sufficient to comply with the Act, and from one quarter to another there is never a lodger in them. Very few people go from Sydney to the suburbs to find lodgings. A few houses have proper accommodation.
1561. How many do you think could accommodate a family? I do not believe that there are four in the whole division that are used for purposes of lodging by the public. I do not say that the other houses have not an occasional lodger, but there are only about four which are generally used for the purpose.
1562. President.] Are many of the large houses, those with upwards of thirty rooms, the property of the applicant for the license? Yes, there are two in course of building now.
1563. That is to say, that a man goes to the expense of building rooms to bring the house outside the local option vote, with the intention of applying for a license in his own name? Yes, he would get the license in his own name.
1564. I mean that the houses are not built as a speculation by builders? As a rule they are transferred afterwards; first of all a conditional license is applied for.
1565. With the intention of transferring it afterwards? Yes.
1566. Then is not the house transferred at a very unnecessary price, consequent on the cost of building so many rooms, when nothing but a bar trade is to be done? Yes.
1567. Does the price of the transfer bear any proportion to the cost of the house? Yes. I dare say that the cost of building one of those houses would be from £2,000 to £2,500; they are not built in an extravagant way.
1568. What would be paid for the goodwill? It would depend on the situation. If the house were in a good situation the owner might get £800 or £900 for a ten years' lease, and he would get from £5 to £7 or even £10 a week as rent.
1569. Then, as a matter of fact, it is a speculation? Yes.
1570. Then, as there is no demand for the accommodation in the usual way, is the transferee in the habit of taking boarders? There are no boarders in the hotels in my division as a rule.
1571. Mr. Colls.] Have you not heard the Police Magistrate, when sitting at Newtown, complain that there was no hotel there where he could get anything to eat? Yes; on one occasion I had to send for some bread and cheese for him. A license was granted for a house at Newtown containing thirty-three rooms, and the Magistrate remarked that such a house would be a great improvement on the low class of houses round about. I have not seen any improvement however. The fact of the matter is, that it would not pay to prepare luncheon for the public in those places, because there would be nobody requiring it.
1572. Do you not think that hotels ought to be prepared to supply luncheon and accommodation for any traveller? In nine cases out of ten if lunch were prepared there would be nobody to eat it.
1573. But if a gentleman ordered lunch at an hotel surely the landlord ought to be able to supply it? He could not do so at a moment's notice; if he had an hour or two's notice I dare say he would.
1574. But do not you think that such houses should only have a beer license, or a beer and wine license, and not a general license? Yes. I think there are too many public-houses in some municipalities.
1575. But you are in favour of the existence of well-conducted houses? Certainly, but what I meant was this: if there was an hotel at Newtown conducted on the same lines as the Royal Hotel in Sydney, there would be no one to patronize it. There is no necessity, in places like the suburbs, for such accommodation as a large hotel usually affords, because the residents have their own homes, and people do not come from Sydney

Sydney to get accommodation. I do not think that it is at all necessary that they should have that accommodation.

Inspector
Larkins.

1576. President.] Then you think that the accommodation is a sham? Yes; in three-fourths of the houses in my division there is no necessity for any public accommodation beyond what the family of the publican requires.

5 April, 1886.

1577. Mr. Colls.] But do you not think that they ought to be prepared to accommodate any person who requires accommodation? They do not, and there is nothing in the Act to compel them to do it. If you go into most of the houses and ask for some lunch, you will not be able to get anything but bread and cheese, if you get even that.

1578. President.] What Mr. Colls means is this, and I am disposed to agree with him,—that where there is no demand for accommodation, the State should not compel a publican to provide it—that if the people only require drinking-houses, they should have only drinking-houses: it is a case, not of the law as it stands, but as it should be? I quite agree that every house that is licensed ought to be in a position to accommodate the public.

1579. Then comes the question of granting licenses for the sale of liquor only to houses which are below the class of hotels. That is the course that has been followed in England. A general licensee has to provide accommodation for lodgers, but there are also houses for the convenience of those who only want to drink? Three-fourths of the public-houses in my division are for drinking purposes only. I went on one occasion to two or three public-houses to ask them to accommodate a man who lived out George's River way, but the answer I got was that the houses were full.

1580. Mr. Hutchison.] Do you think that the Licensing Magistrates are induced to grant new licenses by the plea that the houses are large and respectable, whereas the extra accommodation is a bogus thing after all? Yes; the plea is that the house being a large one, must be an improvement on the existing houses and tend to shut up the inferior houses, but they are used for drinking purposes only, like the rest.

1581. President.] Some inspectors have pointed out that as there is no travelling public requiring accommodation, those publicans who have the accommodation sometimes under-bid the lodging-houses and take in young men as boarders? It is not the case in my division—I do not know a single instance of the kind.

1582. Mr. Hutchison.] In some instances these larger houses are positively sublet—do you know of any such instances? I think there is none.

1583. I mean that portions of the house are actually cut off and occupied by families? I have none of that description. The business pays well enough, in spite of the unused accommodation, without subletting.

1584. Mr. Colls.] Do you know of any case in your division where an adjoining house has been rented by a publican, and a door broken through the dividing wall, in order to comply with the Act while the Inspector is inspecting the premises, the door being afterwards closed and the adjoining house relet? No.

1585. You have had no such case in your division? No.

1586. Have you ever known persons from the country inquire for accommodation at public-houses in your division? Sometimes an odd person travelling through has asked me where accommodation could be obtained, and I have recommended him to certain houses, but he has not been able to get accommodation there. On the Liverpool Road there are one or two very good hotels, but the publicans have told me that not one person in a month applies to them for a bed. Those houses have the necessary accommodation, and are clean and well kept.

1587. How far up the Liverpool Road does your division extend? To Druiitt-town. I also go up as far as Bankstown.

1588. Are there good houses along that line? There are two or three good houses on the Liverpool Road. They are well conducted, do not sell on Sundays, and can provide travellers with any refreshment they require.

1589. Mr. Fowler.] I suppose your meaning was, when you said that the majority of the houses in your division could not supply travellers with refreshment, that they could not do it unless they received reasonable notice? Yes.

1590. Because if refreshments were prepared the chances are that there would be no one to partake of them? Yes, and they would be wasted.

1591. How often have samples of liquors been obtained from public-houses in your district, for the purpose of analysis, since 1882? I cannot tell you; I have obtained none myself.

1592. Who has obtained them? Mr. Lenthall.

1593. Does he obtain them personally, or by some of his officers? On several occasions he has got one of my men to go with him.

1594. Has it always been the same man? No; he usually telephones to me when he is coming out, and I leave orders for a man to accompany him.

1595. How often has that occurred? Two or three times.

1596. During the last three years? Yes; but Mr. Lenthall may have been out on many occasions without my knowledge.

1597. Do you know from what houses he has obtained samples? I do not.

1598. You spoke of the practice of playing dominoes for drink: do not you think it would be well to prohibit the playing of dominoes in public-houses? Yes.

1599. I suppose there is a difficulty in proving that people are playing for drinks? Yes; they are a great inducement to people to hang about bars and drink.

1600. You are decidedly of opinion that the opening of public-houses for an hour on Sunday would not be a public benefit? I do not see that it would do any particular harm, but the people do not appear to want it. When the public-houses used to be open for two hours on Sundays very little business was done. Publicans have told me that they would not take half-a-crown during those two hours, while they would take £10 at night.

1601. And when the houses were allowed to be open for two hours on Sunday, you used to have many convictions for selling during prohibited hours on that day? Yes, it was easy to obtain convictions then. Publicans thought it hardly worth while to defend a case, because the fine would not be more than 5s. or 10s., according as the Bench was constituted.

1602. Then, do you think that the law ought to remain as it is, and that the sale of liquor on Sunday should be entirely prohibited? I do not see why the houses should be open if the people do not require it.

1603. Mr. Roseby.] You remarked that you had noticed during the last few years an increase of drunkenness among young people? I have given the numbers of young people arrested for drunkenness.

1604. But those numbers, I presume, do not represent anything like the actual number of young people whom you have observed under the influence of drink? Of course not.

Inspector
Larkins.
6 April, 1886.

1605. The police only take a man up when he is hopelessly incapable of looking after himself? Yes; and of course there is a great deal of disorder brought about by drink when men are not actually drunk. When a partially intoxicated man is arrested for riotous behaviour he is charged with riotous behaviour only.
1606. Then I gather from what you say that nearly all the cases of riotous behaviour, obscene language, and similar offences, are the result of drink? There is no doubt of that. Generally all the cases of riotous behaviour—those in which young men are the offenders particularly—are brought about by drink.
1607. Then is it not your opinion from your own observation, though your figures do not show it, that there has been an increase of drinking among young people? I think there are more young people to be seen now about public-houses than there used to be a few years ago.
1608. There are twenty-seven public-houses in your division which you call low—really bad houses? I call them troublesome houses on Sundays.
1609. Have you ever taken notice how many persons have been seen entering and leaving some of those public-houses on Sundays? Not for the whole day. I recollect one house which, about three months ago, as many as 100 persons were seen to enter and leave within two hours. I had the publican summoned; and several witnesses swore that not six persons went in and out.
1610. Then you think that Sunday selling has been the cause of a large amount of perjury? There is no doubt of it.
1611. In all your years of experience of the police, have you ever known as much perjury in connection with other matters as in connection with Sunday public-house opening? No.
1612. There are in your division, you say, 107 public-houses? Yes.
1613. And you estimate the population at 65,000? Yes.
1614. You believe that the proportion of the public-houses might be considerably reduced in the interests of the public? Yes, in some places.
1615. For the good order and wellbeing of the community you do not think they ought to be increased? No, certainly not.
1616. But rather decreased? Yes.
1617. How many do you think would serve the legitimate wants of the public in your district? In Newtown there are twenty-seven; but I think that half that number of well-regulated houses would amply supply the wants of the people of Newtown.
1618. You think that, in proportion to the population, your district is more than amply supplied? I am sure it is.
1619. With reference to the hours of opening—would you prefer that the houses should be opened earlier than 6 o'clock in the morning or later than 6 o'clock? There is no necessity to open earlier in a morning, and I think there is nothing to be complained of as regards the time of opening. We have no complaint of anything happening in consequence of the houses opening at 6 a.m.
1620. You think that 10 o'clock at night is quite late enough for the public-houses to be open? Yes.
1621. In regard to local option, you think the people should have a right to say whether they will have the houses or not? Yes.
1622. Mr. Hutchison.] Considering the population, you have a larger proportion of public-houses in Newtown than in any other part of your division? Yes; the population of Newtown is more concentrated than that of any other part of the district.
1623. Then what would apply to Newtown as regards the reduction of the number of houses would apply to all the other parts of the district—I know you would except Burwood? There are only two or three I think in Burwood? The houses there, as far as my observation goes, are a class that give no trouble to anybody.
1624. You have a good deal of difficulty in getting convictions for Sunday selling? Yes.
1625. There is so much hard swearing against the police that you do not get convictions? It is almost impossible. A case occurred the other day in which a man was found coming out of a public-house with a bottle of liquor in his possession. The publican swore that the man had brought the liquor in with him, and of course we got no conviction.
1626. With regard to conditional licenses, have you not, as a policeman, a strong objection to them? I have objected to every one.
1627. Do you know that when one of these licenses is secured it has a marketable value? Oh yes.
1628. Did you take any steps against that club that has now ceased to exist? No; I had it under observation; it was a German club, and the parties frequenting the place seemed to be so respectable that there were no complaints from the neighbours.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Inspector Potter called in, sworn, and examined:—

Inspector
Potter.
9 April, 1886.

1629. President.] Your district is known as the Redfern District? Yes.
1630. Will you describe it? It is between Cleveland-street and Botany, from the north to the south; it is bounded on the east by Bourke-street, and on the west by the Newtown Road to Darlington, and up to Macdonaldtown.
1631. How long have you been in charge of it? Only since last September; the district was then cut off from another district.
1632. Then you have not been in charge a year? No.
1633. Where were you previously? I was in No. 4 District, Lower George-street Division, for two years, with Inspector Atwill.

1634. Then you know nothing about the progressive intemperance, or increase in apprehensions—you can only give us information as to the present year? Yes, I am prepared to give that.
1635. Can you give us the number of apprehensions for drunkenness this year? I cannot.
1636. Can you give us the number of convictions for Sunday trading? Yes. I have prepared a list of prosecutions under the Licensing Act from the first of the year up till Wednesday last. Inspector
Potter.
9 April, 1836.
1637. What is the number of convictions up to date? There have been seven prosecutions and four convictions; two were dismissed, and one was withdrawn. Two of the convictions were for Sunday selling, and two for other offences under the Act.
1638. Up to September, 1835, the returns for your district will be included in the returns furnished by Inspector Mackay to the Inspector-General? Yes.
1639. How many houses have you in your division? Sixty-nine—sixty-one kept by men, and eight kept by females.
1640. How many wine-shops? Three. One license was recently granted at Darlington. But they are not wine-shops in the ordinary sense of the term; the shops are kept by grocers, and they sell wine merely for the convenience of their customers. The wine is sent out with the groceries—it is not drunk upon the premises.
1641. There are not many large hotels at Redfern? Very few.
1642. Have you any picnic resorts, like the "Sir Joseph Banks' Grounds?" No; the grounds you refer to are just out of my district.
1643. To what class of houses do these sixty-nine belong? I should call them medium—a very average kind of house; some of them are frequented by a very rough class.
1644. Are they much under the control of brewers? I think most of them are; I think that is pretty generally the case throughout the city, from what I have seen.
1645. What would be considered the average value of the good-will of a good house? I could not say; it is impossible in many cases to get at the truth; I believe many of the licensees come out of the houses poorer than when they entered them; the brewers and brokers close upon them.
1646. I suppose that is because they are handicapped by a heavy good-will, which they are unable to pay off? It is.
1647. They never get out of the hands of the brewer? No; I know of one case where a publican was encumbered by one-half of the debt of the preceding licensee; it was an arrangement that he should pay one-half of the debt before he could obtain the license.
1648. The debt is handed down from one transferee to another? Yes.
1649. What kind of liquor is sold in your division—is it of a fairly good, or is it of an inferior class? I do not know; Sub-inspector Lenthall generally goes round and procures samples; I am not acquainted with the result of the tests.
1650. What is generally drunk? Colonial beer is largely drunk.
1651. How are the houses kept by women conducted? The houses, taking them generally, are fairly conducted, if you except the Sunday trading, and that depends upon the locality in which the house is situated.
1652. Have you found any difficulty in obtaining convictions for Sunday selling? Yes; I have had a great deal of trouble, except in one case where the publican pleaded guilty. It is generally a very difficult matter, because the publicans generally bring up interested witnesses who, I could swear, commit perjury.
1653. Have you only instituted two prosecutions for Sunday selling? That is all this year.
1654. Yet you have had two convictions? Yes; one man pleaded guilty.
1655. Do I understand you to mean that you might have had many more prosecutions ending in many more convictions, but for some obstacle? Yes.
1656. And what is that obstacle? It is to get to the main point upon which the prosecution rests. You may see any number of persons passing in and out of the house, but the Bench have ruled that you must prove the delivery of the liquor. You may find glasses stowed away under chairs and sofas, and you may see beer-slops upon the table, but that will be of no use.
1657. If you saw the froth upon a man's mouth, would that not be some evidence that liquor had been supplied? It has been ruled that under the 98th section delivery must be proved.
1658. What course have you taken to obtain convictions? Officers have gone about in plain clothes, and have endeavoured to get into houses as they have seen other persons do.
1659. But the publicans know you, I suppose? Yes. Many persons in the locality, when they know that the police are coming, will take the trouble to leave their homes in order to warn the publicans. Then there are scouts outside. The publican will stand at the door himself, and leave the management of the business to some member of his family. The signal is given, and you might save yourself the trouble of going in.
1660. Then you know that unless you have the best class of evidence it is of no use to go into Court? Unless I can prove delivery I know that it is of no use. In one case against a publican, in Erskine-street, it was proved that seventy persons passed into a house within a certain time, but the Bench said that proof of delivery must be given.
1661. Have you any suggestions to offer for an amendment of the law which would facilitate convictions? If it is intended to keep the houses closed on Sunday, I think that, as in England, the fact that the police have seen persons passing in and out of a house should be evidence of its having been kept open for the sale of liquor. That would be only just, because many publicans, if they do not keep their houses strictly closed, do not outrage public decency; others, again, sell to all and sundry; and others close altogether. It is unjust that the man who closes his house altogether should stand by and see a neighbouring house taking from £30 to £40.
1662. Out of those sixty-nine licensed publicans how many break the law systematically and how many keep it? According to a return made out recently there were thirty-eight who trade on Sundays, twenty-four who do not, and seven whom I could say nothing about, they having recently come into the district. I divide the Sunday traders into two classes,—those who sell to their customers quietly, and those who keep their houses in such a manner as to cause a public scandal.
1663. Do you consider that the fact of their being largely under the control of the brewers causes them to break the law? Such is my impression. If you speak to them on a week-day, they will tell you that they have to sell on Sundays to prevent their customers from going elsewhere on the other days of the week. They say also that if they did not sell on Sundays they would not be able to live, as they have so much to pay; but if they are brought up for Sunday selling they deny it.
- 1664.

Inspector
Potter.

9 April, 1886.

1664. Do you think their pecuniary necessities have much to do with their soliciting people to buy liquor on Sundays? I do.

1665. You think then that the publican himself takes the initiative in the matter? Yes. I successfully opposed the granting of a license to a publican who had been in my district, and who had sold out, but wished to open another house at the Glebe. I informed the Bench at the Central Police Court that the man had been in the habit of standing outside his house on Sundays and touting for business.

1666. Have you any idea of the number of people who enter any of these houses on Sundays to get liquor—we have been told that as many as fifty people or more are accommodated in some districts? I have seen from thirty to forty go into one house during the forenoon between 9 o'clock and 1 p.m. I have had to put constables in streets to clear the men away from the corners, because persons going to places of worship were annoyed at seeing people going into public-houses.

1667. It is your opinion that the majority of the publicans in your division tempt people to purchase liquor on Sundays? Many of them do. They keep a watch, and they let it be known that drink can be got at their houses. When I have gone into a house, I have seen a score of men escaping by the back doors and windows.

1668. Do you think the total closing of the public-houses on Sundays beneficial to the general public? I do indeed.

1669. You do not think it would be wise to resort to the old system under any form? No.

1670. I suppose you have had a large experience? I have been thirteen years in the force at Sydney.

1671. In regard to week-days, do you think the hours mentioned in the Act sufficient? I approve of them.

1672. You have no theatres or other places of amusement in your division? There is a Foresters' Hall which has been opened for concerts, and there are four dancing halls.

1673. You think the hours for selling liquor could not be improved? I think not.

1674. What has been the result of the local option vote in your division—has it been in favour of limiting the number of houses or otherwise? I am informed that it is against the increase of the houses, but I have no personal knowledge of it.

1675. Have any houses in your division been done away with in consequence of the local option vote? No. One house has been refused a license because it was not wanted; it had been closed in consequence of the bad conduct of the late landlord.

1676. Have you opposed many applications for renewals in your district? Three, I think.

1677. Successfully? Yes. I opposed an application for a license for a house in Raglan-street, on account of the character of the man. I opposed the opening of a wine-shop in a locality where I thought it would be productive of harm; I also opposed the reopening of the house I have referred to.

1678. With regard to accommodation—are there any houses where two or three travellers or a family could take up their residence for a short time and be well accommodated? They all have the accommodation in accordance with the law, but it is seldom that any one applies.

1679. Could a family going there get accommodation? In one or two of the larger houses.

1680. They would be received? I could not say.

1681. Do you know whether they give accommodation to any one who requires it? There are not many who seek accommodation in my district—it is too far from the railway and the wharves. There are one or two houses which could accommodate travellers, but not many of that class. A publican with a small family might have ample accommodation, but he might sell out to a man with a large family, and then all the accommodation might be taken up.

1682. Is the accommodation in the houses often used for lodgers? Some of them stay so long that I am almost inclined to think that it nullifies the law.

1683. You mean that they are actually inmates? Yes. Some time ago I prosecuted two publicans for not having the requisite accommodation, but the case was adjourned for a fortnight, and in the meantime they brought their houses up to the standard.

1684. Have you many large houses containing twenty rooms and upwards? I do not think so.

1685. Any applications for new houses? Yes. The two best houses are those of Mr. Ivory, in Wilson-street, and Mr. Cooke's, in Cleveland-street.

1686. Do you think, from your experience, that there is any increase in the drinking habits of the people in your division—do you consider that during the last five or six years there has been any large increase in intemperance? There may be in some places, but it is too much the custom to gauge this question by the number of persons locked up.

1687. Is the habit of intemperance growing? I think it is amongst the rising generation. Young people are seen in public-houses much oftener than they used to be formerly.

1688. You rarely see them drunk, I presume? What are called the larrikin class do not often get drunk, though they commit acts of violence. I think that drunkenness is getting more general amongst them.

1689. Do you think it is getting more general in the homes of the people? One often sees young children running with beer-jugs from side streets to the public-houses, and I have even had complaints from men of their having found their wives drunk when they came home.

1690. Do you think such complaints were common five years ago? I should not like to say. At that time I was in the Central Police Station. Complaints were made then, and I have sent constables to attend to the quarrels caused by such drunkenness.

1691. An impression exists that, owing to the prohibition of the sale of liquor on Sundays, the head of the family takes liquor home on the Saturday night, and that this leads to intemperance in the family—do you think there is any ground for the impression? I do not. If a man is determined to get liquor on Sunday he can get it. I know it has been said that they do take home supplies of liquor, but I have never seen anything of the kind.

1692. You do not think that Sunday prohibition leads to the laying in of supplies on Saturday nights? I do not, because I know that men who have the means to provide themselves with supplies if they chose are as anxious for a drink on a Sunday as any poor man.

1693. I suppose that as there is no difficulty in getting drink on Sundays, there is no necessity to provide a supply beforehand? Exactly so.

1694. If the law were more strictly enforced in regard to Sunday closing, do you think there would be a tendency on the part of the people to take liquor home on the Saturday? If the law was strictly enforced on the Sunday publicans would not dare to open; I think people can get vessels which will keep liquor over the Sunday; most people would not thank you to give them liquor on Sunday which had been taken home the night before.

Inspector
Potter.

9 April, 1896.

1695. Have you any upper bars? No.
1696. Any dancing saloons? Four.
1697. How are they conducted? Moderately well; of course as far as their relation to the street is concerned they are well-conducted, because if a person frequenting a saloon commits himself we summon him for a breach of the Police Act, or for loitering on the foot-way; saloons are chiefly under the control of the various Councils who grant the licenses.
1698. Do saloons lead to intemperate habits? I would not like to say so; very often they lead to worse than intemperance.
1699. Have you any houses of ill fame? Not particularly; there are some houses under suspicion.
1700. Do you think the principle of local option is beneficial to your district? I would not like to speak too decidedly; it is known that publicans in certain districts will side with the temperance party.
1701. Do you approve of the system, in itself, of delegating to residents in a locality the right of saying whether they shall have so many and no more public-houses, or, if they think fit, none at all? I think the people should have a voice in the matter of regulating, and, if necessary, of abolishing public-houses.
1702. Do you attribute much crime to intemperance? I think I am within the mark in saying the greater part of our crime can be traced to drink, such as robberies, violent assaults, and so on.
1703. Have you known, within your own knowledge, of intemperate habits leading to lunacy, permanent or temporary? Yes; it is a common occurrence to see persons brought up under the Lunacy Act for medical treatment, and remanded from time to time to the Receiving-house, or sent to Gladesville or Callan Park.
1704. Are you aware of any case of delirium tremens ever terminating in permanent lunacy? I cannot say.
1705. Mr. Hutchison.] Do the colonial wine licenses held by grocers permit them to sell any other sort of liquor? No, only Australian wine. If the last application for a colonial wine license was meant to be used for the purpose of a wine bar I should have opposed it.
1706. You believe most public-houses in your district are in the hands of brewers? Many of them are.
1707. Is there any difference in the way the thirty-eight public-houses you spoke of sell on Sundays? Some publicans serve but very few people, apparently their usual customers, in such a way that no great scandal, as far as appearance is concerned, takes place; but there are others who sell to all, and do not care in what way the drink is taken. There are twenty-four houses which observe the Sunday clause, thirty-eight which sell on Sundays, and seven I was not able to report upon.
1708. You have only opposed three applications for licenses? Yes.
1709. Of course they were for new licenses? No; I successfully opposed three applications to transfer.
1710. Mr. Roseby.] What is the population in your district? I am not in a position to state. It includes Waterloo, Alexandria, Redfern, and Darlington.
1711. Waterloo and Alexandria are noted for being densely populated? Yes; I stated that to the President.
1712. There is a very large proportion of poor struggling people living there in small tenements? Yes; the districts are thickly populated, particularly in the small side-streets.
1713. Do you think the sixty-nine houses sufficient to supply legitimate requirements—would it be beneficial to have any more? If any application was made to increase their number I should consider it my duty to oppose it in every way.
1714. Do you think the population, dense as it is, would be better off if they had less public-houses? Yes.
1715. How many public-houses do you think would legitimately supply their reasonable wants—would half the number do? If the houses were not so close together in many places—if they were located in the various centres in proportion to their population—we could do well with twenty houses less than we now have.
1716. You do not consider the hours of sale should be extended? No.
1717. Would you like to see the houses closed at 10 o'clock? No; the present system works very well. Under the old Act, when the houses closed at 12 o'clock, it used to take us until 2 o'clock to get the streets comparatively quiet; but now by 12 o'clock very few people indeed are in the streets.
1718. Is not your district, especially Waterloo, somewhat notorious for the extent of its larrikinism? Greatly so.
1719. Do these public-houses tend to promote this kind of crime among the youth? There are some houses where the larrikins are allowed to stay, and after they have had some drink—although not drunk—they create a deal of mischief.
1720. The arrests you make for drunkenness do not nearly represent the whole amount of drunkenness? No.
1721. These young people do not usually get helplessly drunk—they get fighting, noisy drunk, though not in a state to be arrested? It leads to what is called larrikinism—they have drink in them; and in the city it is just the same.
1722. Is intemperance increasing among the native-born young men? Yes.
1723. Does it also affect young women? Not in the same degree, because as a rule publicans will not allow any girls to go into their houses; they may go in some cases to the side parlours, but the publicans who study their own interests will not allow females to go to their bars, because it gives the house a bad name.
1724. Have you many barmaids in your division? Not many; it is principally in the city that barmaids are employed.
1725. Do you think that young women ought to be allowed to sell liquor at public-house bars? I do not; I think that a public-house bar is the last place where any young woman ought to be.
1726. Do you think that the law ought to prohibit their employment? I do; I think that such a provision would be beneficial.
1727. You do not know it of your own knowledge, but I understand you to say that the local option vote in your division was against the increase of public-houses? I am informed so on good authority.
1728. Do you think that the principle of local option—that is allowing the people themselves to say whether they will have any public-houses or not—is a good one? That is my definition of local option.
1729. With regard to demented persons who have come under your notice, I suppose that after they are dealt with they pass from under your observation, and therefore you cannot say whether the mental derangement is permanent or temporary? No; I told the President I was not aware of that.
1730. Mr. Withers.] You said that in your district—and I suppose the same thing occurs everywhere—there are people who give information to the publicans of the approach of the police? I do not find that to be particularly the case in my district; I was speaking generally.

Inspector
Potter.

9 April, 1886.

1731. What class of men are they who do that sort of thing? Mechanics and persons who are otherwise respectable. They have a common interest with the publican, because if they are found drinking they are liable to a fine.

1732. I was wondering whether it was done by a lower class of people who received some consideration from the publican for their services? That is so in some instances.

1733. I suppose the Sunday trading causes the police more trouble than anything which occurs in connection with public-houses on week-days? Yes, because we are morally bound to see that the law is carried out, while there are others who are determined to evade it, and consequently the Sunday trading is a perpetual misery to the police. I speak feelingly, because I know it from bitter experience.

1734. And Sundays, I suppose, are the only days on which the police are watched? We have more responsibilities on Sundays than on week-days. I may say that some of the houses in which the largest amount of business is done on Sundays are the best conducted on week-days. I have known publicans who sold all day on Sunday to close their houses on week-days directly the clock struck 11.

1735. You would not open the public-houses for an hour on Sundays? No; I speak from experience of the old Act, which allowed public-houses to be open from 1 o'clock till 3 o'clock on Sundays, but the side doors used to be open all the rest of the day.

1736. When the old Act was in force, used there not to be a number of arrests made for drunkenness and disorder which occurred in the vicinity of public-houses? Yes, in such places as Sussex-street particularly. I have known at least a dozen persons to be brought to the Central Police Station for drunkenness on Sunday before the church bells had ceased ringing.

1737. There are no drunkards arrested now in the vicinity of public-houses on Sundays, are there? Not many as a rule.

1738. That I suppose is because the drinking is carried on secretly? Few persons get drunk in the public-houses on Sundays, though you will often see persons who are muddled with drink going in and out of different public-houses. I have seen men go into public-houses with little children whom they were taking for a walk.

1739. That shows that the provision of the present Act with regard to Sunday closing is an improvement on the provision in the old Act, inasmuch as it prevents the trouble and annoyance which used to result from the presence of drunken persons in the streets? Yes.

1740. Do you think that some publicans who break the law by selling on Sunday are induced to do so by the example of other publicans in their neighbourhood? I have known publicans who kept their houses closed on Sundays for some time, afterwards open them because they saw their neighbours doing so.

1741. We know that there are some publicans who desire to close their houses entirely on Sundays—are there any in your division? Yes, and they are men whom I respect.

1742. Do you think it would be advisable to have a provision leaving it to the option of publicans to open or close their houses on Sundays? I think it would be injudicious—it would bring the law into contempt.

1743. Then, if the provision as to Sunday closing were rigidly enforced, you think the present Licensing Act would be a good one? Yes, if it were so amended that the police could rigidly enforce it.

1744. Mr. Colls.] Are the new railway works at Everleigh in your division? Yes.

1745. I suppose they have been the means of considerably increasing the population in that locality? I do not know that they have; many of the men employed there have been living in Redfern for some years.

1746. Are there any public-houses near the works? Yes, there are public-houses near the works where the men can obtain liquor if they require it.

1747. You say that you have eight females keeping public-houses in your division—are they widows? I think so.

1748. I suppose you do not object to widows keeping public-houses, if they conduct them properly? No, the law allows widows to hold a license. There are some females in the city holding licenses who are not widows, but they obtained them before the present Act came into force, and of course their rights were preserved. In some cases a widow may be able to conduct a house better than a man—at any rate with greater circumspection.

1749. Have you any drinking clubs in your division? I have not heard of any.

1750. Any oyster saloons? Yes, there are several.

1751. Are they well conducted? Yes; they are not connected with public-houses. There is one not far away from a public-house, but I do not think it has any connection with it.

1752. Have you had any cases of sly grog selling in your division? No.

1753. Do you know of any cases in which grocers or others have sold single bottles of spirits? Not in my division—the grocers who hold wine licenses are all respectable men.

1754. Do you think that a beer and wine license only would be sufficient in the case of those houses which have no demand for accommodation from the public? I would not recommend it, though for all practical purposes it might be done, because there are many houses which could not afford the accommodation if it was required. The rooms are there, but if a person wanted accommodation they might not be ready; and, where I am stationed, people very seldom ask for lodgings.

1755. Do you inspect the houses which contain so many rooms? Yes, frequently.

1756. Are they furnished? Yes, but sometimes very poorly.

1757. Are there many beds in each room? I have noticed two in one room.

1758. Out of the sixty-nine houses in your division, to how many could you recommend a respectable family requiring accommodation? It would depend on the class of persons. A labouring man might be content to stop in any house in Redfern; but I do not think that there are more than a dozen to which I could recommend thoroughly respectable people.

1759. Has any complaint ever been made to you as to the quality of liquor sold in the public-houses? No special complaint. I have heard remarks, such as "So-and-so sells bad stuff," but the very next day you would see the person who had been making the remark in the same house; so that you cannot depend upon people who make such complaints.

1760. Have you had any cases in which husbands have applied for prohibitions against wives, or wives against husbands, or fathers against sons? One or two; the last that I know of was about six weeks ago, when a man got a prohibition against his wife.

1761. A prohibition order applies to all publicans? I think so; one name may be mentioned, but if other publicans are warned, the prohibition applies equally to them.

1762. Mr. Davies.] You are of opinion that the present law is a very great improvement on the old one? Yes.

1763. And that the good order in your division has been promoted by recent legislation? As I said before, there is a very great improvement on week-days, and if the law as to Sunday closing were made more simple, nothing better could be desired.

1764. In future legislation you would favour further restrictions being put on the traffic—on the licensing of public-houses? I would favour a clear definition of "open for sale" being made; so that the police would not have the difficulty which they now have of proving that a public-house is open for the sale of drink.

1765. So as to assimilate the law with that of the old country? If persons were found in a public-house the publican should be liable for their being there.

1766. You have said that the closing of public-houses at 11 o'clock has worked a great reform? Yes.

1767. Would you favour earlier closing in some parts of the city and suburbs? Of course I would be pleased with anything which would tend to the good of the community, but I do not think that the public at large would be in favour of the public-houses being closed at 10 o'clock.

1768. You do not think that any great advantage would accrue if the houses were closed earlier? I do not think so; the present arrangement has turned out very well. I think that 11 o'clock is quite late enough, but I cannot suggest that an earlier hour be fixed.

1769. Mr. Hyam.] Do not you think that it would be better, in the interests of the law, that people found drinking in a public-house should not be amenable, as they are at present: do not you think that in many cases they swear they are lodgers when they are not so, in order to avoid being fined themselves, and not to protect the publican: if the law were altered as I suggest, do not you think it likely that you might get many of these people as witnesses against the publican? At times I have thought that it would be advisable to alter that part of the law, inasmuch as the interests of the customers are the same as those of the publican. It stands to reason that the people would not be in the house unless they were allowed to enter it, and if the publican chooses to open on Sunday, he ought to take the whole of the burden. At present, knowing that they are liable to be fined if they are caught drinking in the public-house, it is to their interest to watch for the publican, as it is for the publican to watch for them. But I should be very sorry to have to depend upon such people as witnesses.

1770. My observation is that the people have a dread of being summoned? That is not my experience of this particular class of persons; they are most willing to appear as witnesses; some of them will lose almost a day's work to come up and swear against the police in the clearest cases. I do not think the change which you suggest would facilitate convictions beyond the fact that the people would not have the same interest in protecting the publican; their usual statement is that they are lodgers, but whether the relieving them of liability to a fine will cure the evil I am not prepared to say; at present if we summon a publican for selling liquor on Sunday, we also summon the men found drinking in the house.

1771. Mr. Hutchison.] Suppose ten men confessed to having obtained drink on a Sunday, and you got a conviction against the publican, would you then have an action against the ten men? If I got a conviction against the publican I would be independent of their confession. I should be afraid to risk a case on any such confession; if we did not see them drinking we could not prove the case.

1772. Have you ever simultaneously prosecuted the seller and the receiver of the liquor? Yes; I might qualify my statement by saying that it stands to reason that men could not get into a house unless the publican allowed them to do so; some publicans say—"They will come in," but there is no proof of men having broken open a door to get in.

N. MELVILLE, Esq., M.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Sub-Inspector Walter Ellison Lenthall called in and examined:—

1773. President.] What office do you hold? I am District Inspector under the Licensing Act for the Metropolitan District, and Inspector of Theatres.

1774. I presume you have been so since the Act came into force? Yes, since January 1st, 1882. I am appointed by the Governor with the advice of the Executive Council.

1775. Then you are the inspecting officer for the whole of the Metropolitan District? Yes.

1776. What are your duties? They are defined by the Act. I have returns to make, general inspection with the other officers, the giving of certificates as to the completion of premises, the inspection of liquors, and the same duties as the other officers in regard to the enforcement of the Act.

1777. Are all your duties specified in the Act? Yes.

1778. And no others are imposed upon you? No others, except of course that, being an inspector of police, I have to act as a member of the force at any time when I may be called upon to do so.

1779. Do you assist the police in regard to prosecutions? No; the prosecutions are conducted by the officers in charge of the several divisions in which the cases occur.

1780. Have you any special supervision over packet licenses? I have; and I endeavoured to enforce the Act, but found that no penalty could be enforced.

1781. I suppose you have been in office as an inspector for the last four years? Four years last January.

1782. In that capacity you must have had a very large experience of the operation of the licensing law? I have; it has been my study.

1783. All over your district? All over the district. I may say that my district now is not so large as it was. When the Act first came into force my district embraced the whole of the county of Cumberland; but since the Amending Act of 1883 was passed it has been reduced to the Metropolitan District of Sydney.

Inspector
Potter.

9 April, 1886.

Sub-Inspector
Lenthall.

12 April, 1886.

- Sub-Inspector Lenthall. 1784. Have you had under consideration the report of the Inspector-General? Not particularly; I have read it.
- 12 April, 1886. 1785. What is your opinion of the operation of the Licensing Act in checking intemperance—I want you to answer this question generally—Do you consider that the operation of the Licensing Act has been effective in repressing intemperance? I think it has had a very great effect in repressing intemperance. The closing of the houses at 11 o'clock no doubt has had a great deal to do with the diminution of the number of drunkards that used to be in the streets late at night.
1786. What about the closing of the houses on Sundays? Sunday closing, in my opinion, has only been partially operative; some publicans obey the Act, and others sell on Sundays, almost with impunity; through the deficiencies of the Act we cannot prevent them from doing so. Large numbers of persons are seen going into public-houses on Sundays, and the moment a member of the force is seen approaching, before he can enter, every sign of drink which is necessary to procure a conviction is removed. I have myself frequently entered public-houses and found numbers of people inside, but I could see no sign of drink, although we know very well that they go there for nothing else. No steps whatever can be taken unless the drink is found fairly in front of the people in the house. The only way the police have been able to obtain evidence has been when some constable who has been unknown has gone in and seen the drink served.
1787. You have not been prosecuting? I have in some few cases; but I am too well known to be able to get into any of the public-houses without being recognized.
1788. This is what you know from your attendance at the Courts? Yes.
1789. Your opinion is that it is extremely difficult to obtain convictions for Sunday selling? Extremely difficult.
1790. And a larger number of persons prefer to break the Act than to respect its provisions? A great number break the law. I might mention the case of a publican in Woolloomooloo; he purchased a house there, and for some months he used to come to the police station on Sundays and ask the police to keep a look-out over his house when he and his wife were going out. But he came to my office one day and said that he could not stand it any longer; he had not sold liquor on Sundays, but other houses did so, and they took more money on a Sunday than he took all the week, and he said that he took less at that time than he did when he entered the house. He said that if the other publicans observed the law he would be glad to do the same. That is the case with a great number of publicans in Sydney, from what I have heard.
1791. I presume that it is your duty to report quarterly, in the terms of the 10th section of the Act, on every licensed house in your district? Yes.
1792. Therefore, before you can report, it is necessary to visit the houses? No; I get the reports from the officers in charge.
1793. You do not visit them? I visit them when there is any complaint.
1794. You say that the reports are furnished by the inspectors? No; they keep their divisional records of all the public-houses; the books are sent to me, and I correct my reports every quarter and place them before the Bench.
1795. You correct your report from the others? Yes, taking the other reports.
1796. Then you are the channel for their reports? Yes.
1797. Would it be impossible for you personally to visit the houses? There are 824 public-houses in the Metropolitan District, and it would be almost an impossibility to visit the whole of them myself during the three months, in addition to the other duties that I have to perform.
1798. It is part of your duty also to report as to the accommodation, and as to the character of the licensee? As to the way in which the premises have been conducted, and the class of customers who frequent them.
1799. That also you obtain from the same source? From the same source. I could scarcely report that from my own knowledge in every case.
1800. It is impossible then for you personally to examine and report upon 824 public-houses? Yes.
1801. Does any difficulty arise practically from your not being able personally to examine the houses? No. I think the administration of the Act in that respect is about all that could be desired. Whenever there are any complaints in regard to any of the public-houses, proceedings are taken by the officer in charge.
1802. But you are responsible I presume, for your report? Yes.
1803. No objection has been taken, I presume, to the fact that your reports are not the result of personal observation—you are merely an official channel for the reports of the other officers? Merely an official channel for the information of the Bench and the public.
1804. As a result of your experience of the working of the Act, are you of opinion that the Act could be beneficially amended so as to facilitate convictions? I think it could be, in many ways. The provisions of the English Act with regard to the sale of liquor during the prohibited hours and on Sundays might be adopted. They make it penal for any one to be found on licensed premises during prohibited hours. I think if that were done here it would put a stop to the sale of liquor at such times. Where we saw a number of persons going into a public-house on a Sunday, we should only have to follow them and ask their business, and prosecute them if they are there without lawful excuse. The English law makes it penal for any one not a lodger, inmate, or traveller, to be found on licensed premises during prohibited hours.
1805. If a man is found on licensed premises during prohibited hours, he has to prove that he was there for a legitimate purpose? Yes.
1806. Do you think that closing the public-houses on Sunday is a hardship on any class? I think it is on some of the poorer classes, who are in the habit of taking their beer on Sundays the same as on any other day. A little before 11 o'clock on Saturday evening, the bars are crowded with people bringing jugs and bottles for their Sunday supply. A large quantity of liquor is therefore consumed in the home which might not be stored up in the same quantity if they could get it at the public-houses on Sundays. I cannot speak positively and say that the present practice of Sunday closing has been so very good, because the police have not been able to put an entire stop to the sale of liquor on Sundays. There is an immense quantity of liquor consumed; and when three or four men sneak into a public-house on Sunday, knowing the difficulty of getting supplied, whilst they are there they take a very much larger quantity than they would do if they were able to get it at a certain time. I think that the adoption of the provisions of the English Act would put a complete stop to the sale of liquor during prohibited hours.
1807. Do you consider that Sunday closing leads people to provide themselves with a supply on the Saturday night? I am sure of it.

1808. You are speaking from your own knowledge? From what I have seen and what I have heard. Sub-Inspector 1809. If it is so easy to get liquor on Sunday, why should they get a stock in on a Saturday? Because the Lenthall.
difficulty with a great number of people is that they live close to the public-house, and they do not like to be seen sneaking in on Sunday. Very often women require liquor, and they would not like to be seen going into the public-houses on Sundays. There are hundreds of men walking from public-house to public-house on Sundays until they are stupified with drink. 12 April, 1886.
1810. Is that the way in which a large number of the residents of Sydney spend the Sunday? Yes; until some of them get into the lock-up. They are men belonging to the lower classes.
1811. I understand you to say that those who lay up stores of liquor get it for their families? Yes.
1812. Then that means that the wife has begun to follow the intemperate habits of the husband? I cannot say that I have seen any amount of drunkenness of that kind, but on Saturday nights, around Woolloo-mooloo and in Sussex-street, a great many jugs and bottles can be seen going to the public-houses just before they close.
1813. Do you think they take more than a supply for the night? A supply for Sunday I believe—we do not see it going on to the same extent on any other night of the week.
1814. I suppose you have a general knowledge of the police divisions of Sydney? Yes.
1815. Is it true that in a large number of cases there are up-stairs bars? I should say that there are about thirty-five of these bars.
1816. These are chiefly in the most thronged parts of the city I suppose? Yes.
1817. Who keeps these up-stairs bars? They are kept principally by females.
1818. What kind of females? Well, in consequence of a deputation that waited on the Inspector-General in reference to the letting of these bars, I went round one night with Senior-constable Carberry to a number of houses where there were up-stairs bars. Senior-constable Carberry has a knowledge of nearly all the fast women about the town. In no case, however, did he recognize behind the bars any female who was known to be a prostitute, though they had a very fast appearance.
1819. Were they alone? No; there were generally a couple—in some bars three. They rent the bars from the landlord, but there is great difficulty in proving it. I have heard that the women pay so much a week, and the landlord takes a receipt for wages paid to them. The landlord also takes 5 per cent. on their sales, so that they are his servants and selling for his benefit. We must prove that the landlord is allowing an unlicensed person to sell otherwise than for his benefit, or we cannot get a conviction.
1820. Has any prosecution ever been instituted? Yes; there was one against a man in Lower George-street. The barmaid gave information against him, and he was fined for it.
1821. You do not remember the name? No, but I will let you know.
1822. Was there any appeal? I almost forget the case. I did not conduct the prosecution. I entered the fact in the licensing book.
1823. How many up-stairs bars did you visit in company with Senior-constable Carberry? Twelve or thirteen, between 8-30 p.m. and 10-30 p.m.
1824. The people who kept them were fast-looking women? Yes.
1825. Over dressed? No, dressy.
1826. Who were the customers? Principally young men.
1827. Of what class? The clerical; I beg your pardon—I mean clerks, not divines.
1828. Were there other women there besides the keepers of the bars? I have never seen any women in these bars other than the barmaids.
1829. Did you see anything to suggest there were rooms for assignation? I do not think they are used as assignation houses, for I have not seen prostitutes visiting them. I have seen nothing to make me believe they are assignation houses.
1830. Do you think they have any connection with places where appointments can be made? No; I think if any prostitution is done at all, it is done by the barmaids in other houses after the bar is closed.
1831. What is the incentive to go up-stairs to these bars? I do not know, except that generally a sort of lewd flirtation is carried on there.
1832. With barmaids of superior attractions? Sometimes. My remarks do not refer to every barmaid; for instance, the Metropolitan Hotel used to have an up-stairs bar, which was respectably conducted, and was used for the accommodation of travellers and visitors.
1833. Mr. Abigail.] It had male attendants? I do not think so, and certainly not for some little time past, because there was a prosecution in connection with that bar, where it was proved that the barmaid served liquor after hours, and which ended in a conviction.
1834. President.] Is the price of liquors high in these bars? I have never paid for any in them. I believe it is generally understood by the people that the price of all liquors in a private bar is not less than sixpence. These up-stairs bars, as far as my opinion goes, are certainly objectionable. I hold that no bar should be allowed to exist above the ground-floor of an hotel. Most people agree with me that every bar should be readily accessible to the public. In some of these upper bars I have heard that some not very creditable scenes have been enacted. Numbers of private bars—for instance, the one at Roberts's, where there are male attendants, and many others—are open to the street, and in them no scenes of the kind occur which repeatedly distinguish up-stairs bars.
1835. We are told that the females who keep these bars are in the habit of giving large sums weekly for that privilege? I have heard of as much as £15 a week being paid by them, but how true it is I do not know.
1836. If that sum is paid for the bar—perhaps there being two in the house—the profits must come from some undisclosed source—unless, it may be, they have some very good drinkers? I do not know how they can get the money, except they make a little extra by selling champagne, which they do very often.
1837. But the clerical class do not take champagne? Some do; I have seen many men shouting champagne who could not afford to do so any more than myself.
1838. We have been told that the price of a bottle of champagne is always £1 a bottle? I dare say it is.
1839. And you have neither seen nor heard anything in connection with these bars leading you to believe they are, not in themselves necessarily brothels, but a kind of appanage to brothels? On that point I cannot speak so clearly as I believe some other members of the force will be able to do.
1840. You think these bars should be abolished? Most decidedly.
1841. I suppose, although they may not be connected with brothels, you know what the natural inference is likely to be if they make from £10 to £15 a week? I am sure I do not know how they make the money; and I cannot see there is any actual prostitution, but there may be. 1842.

- Sub-Inspector
Lenthall.
12 April, 1886.
1842. As inspector of theatres, what is your opinion of the provisions of the Act in regard to internal communication? I have had three prosecutions under that clause. The Supreme Court decided that if persons came out into the open air and go from the theatre to the public-house, and vice versa, it is not internal communication within the meaning of the Act; and, since the decision, there have been, at the entrance to the stalls in the Theatre Royal, and to the dress circle at the Opera House, an opening, in one case of about 2½ feet by 7½ feet, open to the sky, and in the other case, a small bridge connecting the theatre with the bar. I have never known of any scenes having taken place in these bars.
1843. From your knowledge of the class of people who frequent some portions of the theatres, do you consider the proximity of public-houses leads to much unseemly conduct? No; the occupants of the cheaper divisions of the Theatre Royal and Opera House go out into the street and have the choice of three or four public-houses within short distances. The dress circle people at the Opera House just pass through to the up-stairs bar; at the Royal, they go either to Eastway's or to the "Metropolitan," and do not seem to patronize the houses immediately adjacent to the theatre so much as they do others.
1844. Are the houses adjoining the Theatre Royal well conducted? Fairly well.
1845. They used not to have that reputation? No; under the old Act they well deserved their low reputation.
1846. Have you any knowledge of dancing saloons? No; I do not like to visit those places, as it is scarcely within the scope of my duties to do so.
1847. Do you think the people who frequent places of public entertainment undergo any hardship by reason of the closing hour? No, and I should be very sorry to see any alteration in the closing hour.
1848. In saying that, are you giving us what I may call the police view of the question, or the view of one who has been keeping his ears open and listening to the complaints of respectable people? I have heard but few complaints about the closing hour; for if they want a drink they can always go out during the intervals, and if a man goes out during each interval he has had quite as much as is good for him by 11 o'clock.
1849. You think if a man wants drink he can accommodate himself before that hour, and you do not think it necessary to keep open public-houses in order that a stream of people coming from the theatre can accommodate themselves afterwards? It is very seldom that the theatres are open after 11 o'clock. The performances at the Theatre Royal, as a rule, are over by from a quarter to ten minutes to 11; last Saturday night it was not over till a quarter past 11, as the piece was a long as well as a new one. The performances on first nights are generally a little later than usual.
1850. Do you include operas? Yes.
1851. I have often known operas being played after 11? Not of late.
1852. Because they have not been playing a long class of operas—merely operettas? Yes.
1853. What is your experience in regard to packet licenses? I have failed in any prosecutions I have had, simply because the Act does not provide a penalty for the person selling.
1854. But there is a penalty in the amending Act? Yes, for selling alongside the wharf, but you have to prove that the sale is made with the master's privity and consent. I summoned Captain Skinner once for serving alongside the wharf; I had gone down into the saloon of his steamer about a quarter to 11, and had seen the steward sell two drinks and receive the shilling; I spoke to the captain, who declared he knew nothing of the matter, and that the steward was selling without an order from himself; in the Court it was proved that the master did not know of the sale, and the steward swore that he had sold the liquor without the master's knowledge; the case was consequently dismissed; then I wanted to summon the steward, but the Magistrate said—"What is the good? You can only summon him if you can prove it was done with the master's privity and consent; that is disproved, and therefore you can take no further steps."
1855. You think it was a kind of seesaw between the master and steward? Yes; if the relationship of master and servant had existed between the steward and licensee, then the master would have been liable for the acts of his servant.
1856. I will just remind you of the language of the Act in this respect, because you rather surprise me. The amending Act states—"Any sale of liquor made by the master of a vessel who holds a packet license or by any of the officers or crew of such vessel with such master's privity or consent while such vessel is at any wharf anchorage or moorings or while such vessel is plying between places within any harbour of the Colony shall subject the master officer or member of the crew selling such liquor to a penalty not exceeding five pounds for the first and not exceeding ten pounds for the second or any subsequent offence. And every sale of liquor on board such vessel under the circumstances aforesaid shall be deemed to be a sale by the master until the contrary be proved."—Under these circumstances you prosecuted the master? Yes.
1857. And you say that to evade the penalty the steward, or somebody else, said—"I was the man who sold the liquor, and the captain knew nothing about my action,"—and upon that the Bench of the Water Police Court dismissed the case? Yes.
1858. Mr. Davies.] It is questionable whether you could not proceed against the steward under another clause of the Act? He would have to be selling in an unlicensed place then.
1859. President.] How do you propose to remedy this weakness in the Act? It is very difficult to form an opinion on this question, and for this reason: there are a number of boats trading to ports in New Zealand and Queensland which pass beyond our jurisdiction as soon as they are 3 miles off our coast. Not long ago the steward of one of Howard Smith's boats was charged with embezzling certain moneys—the proceeds of the sale of his employers' liquor. They used to serve him with liquor out of bond and expect him to return a certain sum of money to them. They did not hold a license, but the captain did, and the steward (who was not licensed to sell liquor) was committed for trial for the embezzlement. I wanted to prosecute them for selling spirits without a license. I did not think I could summon the steward, because he sold in a licensed place. Once they get beyond our jurisdiction nothing can be done; they take their liquors out of bond, and pay no duty on whatever liquors are drunk during a passage. The only steamers which are really amenable to law are those trading to and from ports within the Colony.
1860. Is it a fact that people who are not passengers go aboard the Newcastle boats after 11 o'clock simply to get drinks, and then create scenes of the most extraordinary character? I have not seen anything of that kind. Although I have frequently gone on board these boats between 10.15 p.m. and 11 p.m., I have never seen signs of disorder; I have seen crowds of people there.
1861. You have seen drinking going on there? Yes, frequently, but I have never found the master there, and, as I said before, it is useless to summon him unless I have a complete case.
1862. Then practically on these vessels there is an open violation of the law? Yes, and no special penalty

- is provided in the Act. The holder of a packet license is not entitled to more consideration than a licensed publican. A master should be held answerable for the acts of his steward.
1863. But that might be avoided by the owners taking out the license? The Act says the only person who can hold a license is the captain.
1864. It only says they shall authorize the master; it does not say the master shall be the only applicant? The Bench of the Water Police Court held that if a master applied for a license it must be only granted in his name. The notice of application says:—"I, being master of the vessel conveying passengers between and do hereby give notice that I desire to obtain and will at the next Licensing Court to be holden at apply for a license."
1865. You would put the holder of a packet license on the same footing as a publican? Precisely.
1866. You think that would effectually remedy these open violations of the law? Yes.
1867. Do you think it is a reasonable provision that no drink shall be sold until the vessel has cast off? Yes, for the publicans in the neighbourhood of the wharves have to pay a heavy license fee—much heavier than the fee for a packet license, and besides they have to maintain the accommodation required by the Act. It would not be fair, under these circumstances, to allow a steamer lying alongside the wharf to enter into competition with them.
1868. You are obliged to report specially about the accommodation of public-houses? Yes; we see that the proper accommodation is kept up.
1869. Do you consider that the accommodation prescribed by the Act has reference to a state of things which has now no existence; for instance, a public-house is required to have a certain number of rooms of a certain size, but we have been informed by nearly every inspector that the demand for the accommodation, at all events in the city and suburbs, has ceased, and that the accommodation provided is often used for what may be called an improper purpose, namely, to underbid lodging-houses in price, so as to get somebody or anybody to lodge in the public-house—young men especially. The object, of course, of prescribing the accommodation was to provide for the supply of a want which a licensed victualler is expected to meet, that is, to provide every traveller with reasonable food and lodging, but we understand that the public do not ask for that food and lodging in the case of a majority of the public-houses, but still the accommodation has to be kept up? There is a large number of houses in the Metropolitan District—the smaller class of houses—which contain merely the accommodation required by the principal Act, and which are certainly not very inviting looking places for any one but a rough working man to stay at; and if we summon the licensees for not keeping their houses in a proper state, the answer is that the accommodation is quite good enough for the class of persons who frequent the house, and so it is, but very few of them accommodate the travelling public.
1870. Has the necessity for providing this accommodation any tendency to diminish the number of public-houses? It certainly has not had that effect; I thought when the Act came into operation that it would have had the effect of shutting up one-third of the public-houses, but it was wonderful to see how the publicans set to work and in some way or other managed to squeeze out the required accommodation.
1871. I suppose that a very small percentage of the licensees of public-houses in Sydney are ever asked to accommodate travellers? I cannot say for certain, but I should think not; the most respectable of the travelling public go to the larger hotels; I have often been asked by travellers who have come into town late at night where they could get a bed, and upon my word I have been at a loss to tell them.
1872. Of course the class of people who go to the larger hotels are those who are pretty well supplied with money; but do the poorer class of people get accommodation in public-houses? No; I think they generally go to boarding-houses.
1873. Mr. Hutchison.] As a matter of fact, the tendency of your evidence is to show that the licensees are not licensed victuallers, but mere grog-sellers? The larger number of the smaller houses are simply grog-shops.
1874. President.] And still they have to provide accommodation? Yes, they have to comply with the requirements of the Act.
1875. And in many cases, having the accommodation, they underbid the lodging-house-keepers so as to get a few clerks and that class of people to lodge with them? They may, but I scarcely think a respectable clerk would lodge at any of those houses. Generally speaking, a clerk has to keep up an appearance that would be incompatible with the surroundings of a low class public-house.
1876. Some time ago there was a complaint made by a gentleman from Victoria, which formed the subject of a Parliamentary paper? Yes; I have the paper here.
1877. The general result, if I remember rightly, was that a number of samples of liquor were obtained and submitted to analysis, which proved them to contain hardly anything deleterious? Nothing except traces of fusel oil and slight traces of metals, which Mr. Watt stated might owe their presence to the worms and pipes through which the liquor passed in the process of manufacture.
1878. What metals were they? Lead and copper, and I think also slight traces of iron, but I am not sure.
1879. Was that in beer? No; in rum and brandy.
1880. I cannot see how traces of lead could be found in those liquors; I could understand their being found in beer, owing to the lead pipes through which it passes: do you produce the document? Yes. (Document produced—vide Appendix.)
1881. What are its contents? It is a report on wines and spirits. It contains a letter from Mr. Waters, dated 9th September, 1881, which is followed by a number of reports from the Chief Inspector of Distilleries, and also from Mr. Watt.
1882. Have you any papers of a date subsequent to 1882? Yes; a return moved for by Mr. Abigail in 1883, of white spirit imported, with the names of the importers. (Document produced—vide Appendix.)
1883. Are those all the returns you have—all the printed returns? Yes.
1884. You have obtained some samples of liquor since this Commission was appointed? Yes; here is a list of them. Two of them have been analyzed. The analyst's report of the remaining fourteen will be ready this day week; Mr. Watt is busy with them now.
1885. How did you obtain those samples? They were obtained from the different bonds.
1886. How did you get the samples mentioned in the report you have produced? None of my samples are there. They were obtained by the police and by Mr. Barney before the new Act came into force. Before this Commission was appointed I obtained 239 samples from different public-houses, wherever I could hear of any complaint as to the quality of the liquor.
1887. Do you think the samples taken fairly represent the kind of liquor that is supplied to the public? I do.

Sub-Inspector
Lenthall.
12 April, 1886.

- Sub-Inspector Lenthall. 1888. In all the houses? Yes; I can only speak from my own experience.
1889. You do not think they are selected samples? I do not think so, because they were taken from different places, and in a confidential manner, by direction of the Colonial Treasurer.
- 12 April, 1886. 1890. Mr. Davies.] What personal knowledge have you of those samples? I have no personal knowledge.
1891. President.] Can you say of your own knowledge that they are fair samples of the liquor usually sold? My own knowledge only extends to what I have done myself.
1892. That is with regard to these recent samples? Yes, what I have collected for the Commission.
1893. And you took them out of bond? Yes, with one exception, and that I got from Macdonald, Smith, & Company.
1894. The first I see is a sample of sazerac, the price of which in bond is £2 3s. 6d. a gallon; Mr. Watt describes it as a "genuine brandy, of high quality, containing 42 per cent. of alcohol by weight. There were no metals or admixture of any kind." The next is a very different article. It is called Durand's, it is from the Argyle bond; owner, A. Hilder & Company, price in bond, 3s. per gallon. Of this Mr. Watt says—"This sample contains 52 per cent. of alcohol by weight, traces of lead, copper, zinc, and iron, probably an artificially made brandy; of low quality, but not adulterated with deleterious materials?" That last statement is explained more fully by Mr. Watt, in his letter to the Minister for Justice.
1895. Mr. Hutchison.] Was Mr. Watt aware of the market value of the samples when he analyzed them? Yes.
1896. President.] Mr. Watt, I believe, is the Government Analyst, and always makes the analyses for the Government, does he not? Yes, or by his assistants. A number of samples have been analyzed by Dr. Rennie, others by a young man who came out from Somerset House, and who had been trained in the Inland Revenue Department, where he was employed in the laboratory. He examined 124 samples. Dr. Hamlet is now doing those which I obtained for the Commission. I may also mention that I have here an extract from the Melbourne Argus, dated 17 January, 1884, containing a report from Mr. Emerson M'ivor, who analyzed five samples of brandy and three of gin, with almost exactly the same results as those shown in the report of Mr. Watt.
1897. But those samples were obtained in Victoria? Yes; I only mention the fact to show that the liquors sold elsewhere are much the same as those sold here.
1898. The sixteen samples of liquor which you obtained, and which you now produce, consist of rum, whisky, and brandy? Yes; at different prices.
1899. And they represent, I see, about six different firms of importers? Yes.
1900. I see that there is a considerable difference in price between the highest, £2 3s. 6d. a gallon, and the next at 17s. a gallon, the prices I presume in both cases being those in bond? Yes; the samples at 17s. are Martell's and Hennessy's.
1901. Is 17s. a gallon the average price of brandy in bond? No; 9s. or 10s. is about the average price in bond.
1902. Can you tell us which of these classes of spirits is mostly in consumption in public-houses? I can scarcely do that. With regard to the cheap brandy which publicans use, which is called mixing liquor, I had great difficulty in finding out its whereabouts, because few merchants in town liked to own that they used such stuff. It was only by getting the bond mark that I found it out.
1903. Do you know anything respecting the importation of white spirit—whether it is now imported in large quantities, as it used to be, or whether it is made into brandies and whiskies before it comes here? I am told that there is not so much imported now as formerly.
1904. Not under the name of white spirit? Not under that name, but the cheaper sorts of liquor are simply made up articles, white spirit, coloured and flavoured.
1905. Then you think that they are nothing but white spirit manipulated? You may say that the whole of these samples, when they came first from the still, were simply white spirit.
1906. But white spirit is what is generally made in Germany or Russia from rye, and there is an immense exportation of it to all parts of the world, to England especially; it used to come out here a few years ago, honestly branded, and known as white spirit, but there is very little of it imported now as white spirit; it comes in the form of these essences; you cannot tell us then which class of these spirits goes most into consumption at the public-houses? I cannot; most of them are bought by the wholesale wine and spirit merchants, and I believe, from what I have heard, that they are blended together.
1907. By the spirit merchants? Yes, and then supplied to the publicans. Here are two samples obtained from the Sugar-refining Company—one is white rum, said to be 57 over proof, and it is 2s. a gallon; the other is the same liquor, only coloured with burnt sugar. It is what is usually known as Queensland rum.
1908. I see here the reports of only two analyses, the best and the worst? Yes; the rest will be ready on Monday next.
1909. These spirits bear the same duty as the imported spirits? Yes, exactly the same.
1910. And you say that these are mixing spirits manipulated by the spirit merchants themselves or by the brewers? Even by the publicans themselves.
1911. Is it within your knowledge that the publicans manipulate these compounds? Yes. I may say that I received instructions from the Inspector-General to take samples from the wine and spirit merchants, but I scarcely think the extent of the order was realized, because there are 150 wine and spirit merchants in Sydney, and if I were to take half a dozen from each, they would mount up to something like a thousand samples. Mr. Watt can only analyze about ten or twelve samples per week, and it would be years therefore before the analysis was completed. I have taken 239 samples, and a large number have also been taken from the country. They are analyzed and reported upon by Mr. Watt. They were taken from a low class of public-houses, from wine and spirit merchants, and from colonial wine-shops, at all times—at election time, or on the occasion of race-meetings, for instance, when, if there were any bad liquor, it would be most likely to be served out. I thought the Commission might accept these reports. You would have the prices of the different liquors in bond, and you would be able to form a better idea of the quality of the liquor sold to the publicans.
1912. Mr. Fowler.] Over how long a period did the taking of these samples extend? Ever since May, 1882.
1913. President.] And you have the results of the analyses? The papers are with the Minister of Justice; the results would be included in my official reports.
1914. Mr. Fowler.] How many have you taken within the past month? Sixteen, as the result of the instructions of the Commission; only two of these have been analyzed.

1915. Can you give any suggestions as to how we can get samples of the average liquor supplied at the low class public-houses to which people mostly resort in order to get drunk? I have already done that.

1916. How do you get the samples? The plan I adopt is to walk straight behind the bar; I generally have a constable with me; I tell the publican that I am going to take samples of the liquor, and I always search through the bar to see if I can find any laudanum or stuff of that kind, or to see if there are any hidden bottles. Most of the leading brands of capsuled bottles I have had analyzed; but I have also taken samples of the different liquors they have on the counter ready for serving. This liquor I take out of the taps or out of the decanter or bottle, as the case may be. I have to tender payment; sometimes they will take it, and sometimes they will not. I seal up the bottles, or if the publican chooses he can do so himself; I take them immediately to Mr. Watt, who sees that the seals are intact when he receives the samples; he afterwards presents his report. I do not ask to be served with liquor—I go in and take it.

1917. You do not taste it? It would be of no use to do so.

1918. Not even to see what the taste of the stuff is? I do not think I should do any good by doing so; I could not tell merely by the taste whether there was any deleterious compound in the spirit.

1919. Then you think that you have obtained samples of what is ordinarily served in public-houses? Yes, I have.

1920. And you feel sure that in going to the public-houses you have obtained the best and the worst? I look everywhere in the bar for liquor. In no case has it been reported that there has been any admixture in this liquor of anything mentioned in the Act; in fact I do not think it is worth the publican's while to adulterate with anything when he can buy such liquor for 2s. or 3s. per gallon out of bond. The publican gets the liquor already mixed to his hand, and he has no need to risk spoiling the appearance, if not the taste, by adding anything else to it. I know very well that there are brands of liquor sold in town which are not what they are represented to be, that is to say, the liquor the bottles contain is not that of the maker whose name appears on the label. I think in April last a complaint was made that the Lammernuir whisky was being forged. I went to Galbraith's store in King-street, and I took a sample which I obtained from the agent of the manufacturer—a bottle of the genuine brand. Upon analyses by Mr. Watt, it turned out that the spirit from the bottle with the forged label was equally as good a whisky as the other, and that it was 1 per cent. stronger.

1921. He can only test it for fusel oil and foreign substances? Yes. I think there are some men in town who are considered experts in the trade, who would give an opinion as to these different samples which I have obtained. In November 1883, I had a complaint of bad liquor being sold at a house in King-street. I went there, and walked behind the bar as usual. The house was then kept by a man named Edward Perkins, and it was at the corner of King and George Streets—I said—"I am going to take samples of liquor; where is your draught brandy?" He said "There it is in the Martell bottle." I said—"Where is the pale brandy?" and he brought out a bottle with Hennessy's label. I said—"Where is your draught whisky?" and he brought me out a bottle bearing Walker's label. He said—"What are you doing this for?" I said—"I am taking this to get it analyzed." He then said—"What is the use of taking both of these brandies; they come out of the same cask. I have a lot of pale brandy in the cellar, and to make the dark brandy I put in some sugar to sweeten it and some burnt sugar to colour it. That is done everywhere; and since you make us close at 11 o'clock we have to put in more water to make it pay." The result of the analyses was that there was no mixture of any foreign ingredient in the brandy, that is beyond the colouring and sweetening.

1922. Mr. Fowler.] The colouring is sold in Sydney, is it not? Yes, both the colouring and the essences. I may say that a short time ago I took samples from all the brewers round about Sydney, of both ale and porter. I submitted them to Mr. Watt, and they were specially examined for picric acid.

1923. Were they not examined for glucose and sulphuric acid. No. I have taken many samples of Colonial and English ales from the public-houses, and I think that is the proper place to go to if you want to find out what is being served to the public. It is scarcely of any use to take samples from the brewers, unless anything is discovered which you might trace to a brewery. There is no doubt that glucose is a large ingredient in the average colonial beer.

1924. Are there any analyses which bear out that supposition? There are.

1925. You mentioned experts just now. What gentlemen would you suggest might be engaged in that capacity? Well, there is Mr. Alt, of the firm of Alt & Co.

1926. But he is not dissociated from the business? No; I should not consider him an expert if he were. I could tell you whether a thing was good or bad, but I might not be able to tell you what the value was.

1927. Mr. Atelville.] Do you know of any persons in Sydney who make a livelihood by going round to different publicans putting the liquor right for them? Not to the publicans.

1928. Do they go to the wine and spirit stores? I have heard of a person who was largely suspected of doing that.

1929. Will you oblige the Commission by making such inquiries as will lead to the discovery of such a person, in order that we may examine him? I have for a long time past been trying to discover whether there was such a thing as liquor-doctoring in Sydney; I have heard of it in London, but not here.

MR. ABIGAIL IN THE CHAIR.

Sub-Inspector W. E. Lenthall re-called and further examined:—

1930. Chairman.] I understand that since the last meeting you have obtained a number of samples of beer? Yes; fourteen. I produce a list of them.

1931. Were those samples obtained from public-houses? Yes.

1932. Will you describe what they are? There is one sample of Tooth's colonial ale, taken from Warby's "Liverpool Arms." That ale is sold at 2d. a pint, and is the cheapest ale sold in Sydney that

Sub-Inspector

Sub-Inspector
Lenthall.
30 April, 1886.

- Sub-Inspector that I know of. There are three samples of English ale, one sample of Tooth's colonial porter, and the remainder are samples from the leading breweries of Sydney. I have taken as general a collection as I could of the beer usually sold in Sydney.
- 30 April, 1886. 1933. You have stated that Tooth's colonial ale is sold at 2d. a pint: what is the price of the other samples? All the other colonial ales are sold at 3d. a pint.
1934. Those samples have all been sent to the Government Analyst? Yes; they were delivered to him on the 22nd of April—the day after they were obtained.
1935. Mr. Roseby.] I understand that you have been connected for a good number of years with the Police Department? Twenty-six.
1936. And for the last four years you have been the principal Licensing Inspector? District Inspector of the Metropolitan District.
1937. Then your district is confined to the metropolitan area only? Yes, since my appointment.
1938. You exercise no supervision whatever over hotels beyond the boundaries of the metropolis? Certainly not.
1939. Considering your position, you have no doubt taken an active interest in everything relating to licensed public-houses: have you ever seen a pamphlet issued by the Licensed Victuallers' Association, giving directions for the manipulation of beer and spirits? I never did.
1940. Such a document came into my hands some four or five years ago, and I have been trying to find it in order to lay it before the Commission, but I thought, considering your position, you would be likely to have seen it? The only thing in that line I have ever seen was a report of a lecture delivered by Mr. Eli Johnson some years ago.
1941. The pamphlet was sent to me in a confidential manner, and I understood that it was circulated among the members of the Licensed Victuallers' Association—however, are all the publicans you know members of the Licensed Victuallers' Association? That I cannot say; I have no means whatever of knowing beyond what I have seen in the newspapers.
1942. I thought that in your position you might out of curiosity, perhaps, though not officially, have ascertained that? I never thought it my place to inquire, and I scarcely know how I could get the information. The only way in which I could get it would be by making inquiry of the Association itself, and it might be considered a piece of impertinence on my part if I did so.
1943. Have you ever had complaints made to you by persons as to the quality of the liquor supplied to them in certain public-houses? Frequently, and in every case I have obtained samples of liquor from the house in reference to which the complaint was made. And not only have I taken samples of liquor from houses with reference to which complaints have been made to me, but I have also taken samples from houses which, from their surroundings, I thought were places where the worst quality of liquor might be sold.
1944. And you have generally taken the samples yourself? Not generally, but always. I do not ask the publicans for samples, but I go behind the bar and take them myself, as the Act empowers me to do.
1945. Have any of the persons who have complained to you accompanied you to the public-house where they had been supplied with vile, infamous stuff, and pointed out to you the bottle or decanter from which it was taken? No, they have not done that, and generally speaking it would hardly be politic to do so, because the person would probably complain in the first instance to the publican, and if there was anything wrong with the liquor it would probably be put out of the way immediately. I have always, therefore, allowed a little time to elapse before taking a sample from any house concerning which I have received a complaint. As I before stated, I do not think it is worth while for any publican to manipulate his liquors when he can buy stuff ready made to his hand. Generally speaking a publican is not an expert at manipulating liquors, and he will not go to a bond and buy first class liquor and then manipulate it. Bulk brandies such as Martell's and Hennessy's are 17s. a gallon in bond; but the publican can get what he wants for 3s. a gallon. That liquor is rough, raw, crude spirit, coloured and flavoured, and it is most unwholesome, to say the least; it is that sort of liquor which in my opinion causes one-half the drunkenness which occurs in the city.
1946. Then you think that that liquor requires no manipulation at all at the hands of the publicans? The only manipulation it gets is this,—that it is about 4 per cent. over-proof, and the publican after paying 3s. a gallon for it and 12s. duty reduces the strength to 16 per cent. under-proof, and thus makes 20 per cent. profit at once.
1947. Then the liquor of the quality of which complaints have been made by customers has really not been doctored, but is this crude, vile spirit which you say can be purchased in bond at 3s. a gallon? Yes, that is it; it is the bad quality of the stuff—it flies to the head. For instance, that rum at 2s. a gallon which I obtained from the Colonial Sugar-refining Company is, I believe, from what I have heard, a well made article, but it is new and fiery, and requires to be matured by age before it will be wholesome enough to drink.
1948. Are large quantities of this immature spirit sold by publicans to their customers? I believe that the greater portion of the cheap liquors sold are what are known in the trade as mixing liquors. They are purchased by the wholesale wine and spirit merchants, and brewers who hold spirit licenses, and they are blended with other liquors of a better class, and the blend is sold to the different publicans.
1949. Has it come to your knowledge that a large quantity of liquor is sold under fictitious labels? That is done. At the last meeting of the Commission I mentioned an instance in which that had been done with Fergusson's brand, but the liquor turned out to be of as good quality as that sold by the maker whose label had been used, and it was 1 per cent. stronger. In March, 1883, I was taking samples of liquor from Noonan's "Mariners' Hotel," in Lime-street, and when I asked Noonan to show me his draught whisky he showed me some whisky which had been put into some of Walker's bottles. I obtained a bottle of genuine Walker's whiskey from the agents, Mason Brothers, who have the trade-mark registered here, and also hold a power of attorney from the Walkers of Kilmarnock, and took both samples to Mr. Watt for analysis. Mr. Watt's report was that the two liquors were certainly not identical, but that there was nothing deleterious in the liquor I had obtained from the public-house. Mason Brothers wanted me to lay an information against the publican, but the Inspector-General thought it was a private wrong, and that it was the place of the firm to take proceedings.
1950. Did they take proceedings? They did not. Many of the manufacturers have not complied sufficiently with the Trade Marks Act to enable them to prosecute. This was the case in regard to Fergusson's whisky; the manufacturer had not his trade-mark registered here, nor had he given a power of attorney to any one.
- 1951.

1951. But is it not a fact that a large quantity of liquor is sold which is not the genuine production of the manufacturer under whose label it is sold? Most certainly. I mentioned last week the case of a man who was selling in a threepenny bar what purported to be Martell's and Hennessy's brandy and Walker's whisky, but considering the price of those leading brands, no publican can afford to sell them at 3d. a nobbler. The bottles are first emptied in the private or sixpenny bars, and are then filled with the cheap liquor and transferred to the threepenny bars. Sub-Inspector
Lenthall.
1952. So that you believe it to be a fact that those vile compounds made of the spirit you speak of, which can be purchased at 2s. or 3s. a gallon, are being sold as the genuine brands of Hennessy and Martell? Of course I am not sufficiently behind the scenes to state positively what is done, but I believe that is done; publicans do with spirits as the grocers do with tea—they mix two or three different sorts together.
1953. But there is this difference,—that the blend of tea may not be injurious to the health of the consumers, whereas the blend of inferior spirits may have a very deleterious effect? I cannot say that exactly; I should be sorry to drink the liquor, and I may say the same of the cheaper sorts of tea. There is many a pound of rubbish sold as tea which I should be sorry to drink.
1954. Ought there not, in your opinion, to be some vigilant means taken to ensure that consumers get what they ask for and pay for? I believe that that has been done to a large extent in Melbourne. I have not read the Act, but I know that prosecutions have been instituted for breaches of the Trade Marks Act, and that very heavy penalties have been inflicted. A publican there can sell almost anything he likes out of a decanter, but if he sells any but the genuine liquor from bottles bearing the brands of manufacturers he is liable to a penalty. Our Act does not touch publicans to the same extent.
1955. So much for the quality of the liquor that is sold: now, with reference to the general working of the present Licensing Act—is it your opinion that the existing provision as to the hour of closing is a good one? Yes.
1956. You do not think that there should be any alteration? Certainly not. The present provision works exceedingly well, and, as I said before, I should be very sorry to see it altered.
1957. If closing at 11 o'clock has been so beneficial to the good order and general comfort of the city, would not better results follow if we closed at 10 o'clock? No; at 11 o'clock most people think of going home, but at 10 o'clock numbers of people only begin to think of sending out for their supper beer; it would inconvenience many people, particularly evening parties, if we were to close hotels at 10 o'clock, and moreover, it would be too great an interference with the liberty of the subject.
1958. The extra room provided in hotels for the accommodation of the public is nothing but a mere farce? In the majority of cases it is so; very few publicans have more than the bare accommodation required by the Act.
1959. Very few persons from the country with their wives and families could get comfortable accommodation in Sydney? Very few indeed, and especially so the hard-working and middle-class—the farmers and others.
1960. Ought there not to be a better state of things in vogue? All the small houses which contain but just the accommodation required by the Act should, in my opinion, only be allowed to sell colonial beer and wine; I think we should turn them into beer-houses; hotels used for the accommodation of the public, particularly travellers, should be given a spirit as well as a beer and wine license, but at a higher fee. Such a system would bring about a reduction in the amount of drunkenness. At the present time it is not unusual for three men to turn into one of these small public-houses at the end of their day's work; each man shouts; the first two drinks are long beers; the third man wishes to shout, he cannot stand another long beer, and so he asks his friends to have something short, a drop of whisky or rum; well, this glass of short stuff taken on the top of two beers completely stupefies them.
1961. Have you noticed of late years an increased liking for drink among the young people? During my twenty-six years' connection with the force I have only been in Sydney about eight years. The amount of drinking which is carried on now by the younger portion of the community is greatly in excess of what was done when I was stationed in Sydney twenty-four to twenty-six years ago.
1962. The present Act prohibits a publican from supplying drink to a person under the age of sixteen years: do you not think the age should be increased? I would fix the age at eighteen years—the same age as for billiards.
1963. Have we not far too many houses in proportion to the legitimate requirements of the population? Most certainly. As regards one class of public-house, I think we have a third too many—they neither pay the people who keep them nor the people who supply them, and the only people they pay are the landlords.
1964. Are there many houses in Sydney with private bars? With the exception of the small houses, every hotel has one. A private bar is generally understood to be a place where you can get a superior brand of liquor at a cost of 6d. a drink. The up-stair bars, which I stigmatized the other day as improper places, are very distinct from private bars. In the majority of houses the private bars are most respectably conducted. For instance, there is the "Royal Hotel," which has nothing but a private bar. Then Roberts's Hotel, at the corner of Market-street, has a private bar, where sixpenny drinks are sold, and another bar where 3d. is charged for the drinks; and the same in regard to nearly all the respectable houses.
1965. Have not the up-stair bars, presided over by barmaids, an injurious influence in cajoling young people into drinking habits? Not so much as you might imagine. Numbers of young men visit them; but as against that, I always see a very much larger number of men considerably older in years, and men too whom you would not expect to see there.
1966. It is stated that a number of sons of our respectable citizens go there, and out of the public view booze and do God knows what: has it come under your observation that these bars have an injurious demoralizing influence upon such men? I do not think they affect the younger men so much as the older men. I do not visit a bar continuously, and my visits are rather brief, so I can scarcely tell you how many young men go to them.
1967. Is the vending of drink behind a bar a proper vocation for a girl? Very large numbers of highly respectable young women, who I know have led most blameless lives, are employed in this way, and they seem not only to keep themselves respectable but they win the respect of the people too. I have known several of them to marry very well indeed, and I do not think the calling of itself would lower any respectable young woman in the estimation of her friends.
1968. Is it not a very dangerous business for a girl to be engaged in? I must say that I would not like to see my daughter in a bar.

- Sub-Inspector
Lenthall.
80 April, 1886.
1969. Surely you would not like to see a friend's daughter there then? There are many harmless callings which young women follow which are not regarded in a favourable light by some people, even though they lead in them very blameless lives.
1970. In view of the danger likely to arise from the surroundings of an ordinary bar, is it a place where young girls should be permitted to vend drink? In the more respectable places, where they are well looked after, I do not think there is very much harm in any young woman who is of age and can do as she likes employing herself in this way. It is the employment of young women in up-stairs bars we condemn. Many of these women, if they are bad, have led bad lives before they took to the calling. In places like the "Royal Hotel," "Metropolitan Hotel," and "Oxford Hotel," where several barmaids of tolerably matured age—from twenty-four up to twenty-eight—are kept, I do not think there is any cause to complain. The girls get tolerably good wages, and they certainly have long hours, and it is not all play.
1971. If girls must be employed, you would limit their hours of labour as well as their age? Yes, and I would not allow any young woman under age to be a barmaid.
1972. Has the local option vote had a beneficial tendency in preventing an increase in the number of houses in the city and suburbs? Most certainly. I reported on that point in August, 1883. Where the vote was in the negative, unless the number of rooms were thirty, the Bench had no power to grant licenses, and consequently many people who otherwise would have applied have refrained from doing so.
1973. Have many houses been licensed by Magistrates, notwithstanding the vote was in the negative, because they had this extra accommodation? Yes, but they have refused far more than they have granted. The Bench seem to encourage, for the accommodation of the public, the building of houses which cannot be used for other than residential hotels—they will not license mere drinking-shops. Last week they granted two conditional licenses over at North Shore; one was for a house on the road to North Willoughby, and both are to contain thirty-three or thirty-four rooms. It would not pay a man to invest £2,000 or £3,000 in a house of this sort if his object was to keep it as a mere drinking-shop.
1974. Mr. Inspector Cotter thinks there are one-third too many houses in that district, and notwithstanding his opinion the Magistrates have thought differently? So far as supplying the public with drink is concerned I agree with him that twenty-one houses are far too many; but then you must remember houses are often put up in places where there is little population but the travelling public. Take the block of ground on which the "Royal Hotel" stands, and you will say seven or eight houses are certainly not required for the inhabitants of that block; but these houses accommodate very large numbers of people from the country and travellers.
1975. Is it a proper thing for the people to say whether or not they want public-houses in a locality? I have not considered this subject; my attention has been confined to the working of the local option clause and of the Licensing Act itself.
1976. The clause has had a beneficial influence in preventing the issue of new licenses? Yes.
1977. And in your opinion the principle is a right one? Yes; but if it were extended to renewals very few people would invest, as they do now, several thousand pounds in a business which they conduct respectably, if the chances were that they would be refused a renewal of their licenses.
1978. The Sunday closing clause is very generally broken throughout your district? Systematically.
1979. And all endeavours on the part of the police to see that the law is carried out have proved almost futile? Yes. The precautions the publican has to take are very simple; he has simply to put away the drink, and when I go into the room I am helpless and am laughed at, and in one instance I was told to go to hell and come back after dinner.
1980. Mr. Fowler.] Since May 1882 you have taken 239 samples of liquor: is that sufficient for the purpose of analyzing the quality of the drink in 822 houses? You must remember that a great number of samples have also been taken from the country. Only a limited number can be analyzed. Mr. Watt cannot always take samples from me. Wherever there was a chance of getting adulterated liquor, or where complaints have been made of the sale of bad liquor, I have taken samples.
1981. Chairman.] Can you say, of your own knowledge, whether any of these, and how many, were in the hands of the brewer? I can show it by the papers which I now produce. (Paper handed in. See Appendix.) This return is only for three months and a half. Out of 155 transfers there are eighty-eight bills of sale to brewers only. What they have done with the wine and spirit merchants I cannot say. Those bills of sale represent a money value of over £50,000. The amounts of the bills of sale range from £100 to £4,000. The return gives the name of the publican, the name of the brewer, the address of the publican, the amount of the bill of sale, the date on which the transfer was made, the division to which it is attached, and the sign of the house.
1982. I observe that in the metropolitan district there are 824 licensed houses? Yes.
1983. You say that that number is one-third too many to meet the requirements of the public? Yes; that is, as at present constituted. I consider that the small houses should have only a wine and beer license. Make them legally what they are in fact—mere drinking-shops—and only allow them to sell colonial wine and beer.
1984. Supposing that were done, would that lessen the drinking of ardent spirits, and lessen drunkenness? I think it would, because the cheaper sorts of liquor are the only kinds which are sold in those houses.
1985. Have you any knowledge of the time when there were a large number of beer-shops in existence in the Colony? No, and I have been here thirty-four years. There were two sorts of licenses before 1862—the 10 o'clock and the 12 o'clock licenses. I do not know that there have not been any such houses as those of which you speak in my time.
1986. What is the general character of the wine-shops? They keep very good colonial wine—pure wine.
1987. Only colonial wine? Only colonial wine. There was, in the Colonial Wines Regulation Act of 1862, a provision which was repealed by the Licensing Act, prohibiting a wine-shop keeper from having any spirits on his premises, under a penalty of £50, and any constable had power to enter and make a search without a warrant.
1988. Have there not been a number of convictions obtained against wine-shop keepers for selling spirits? Some—not any large number.
1989. Can you tell us how many wine licenses there are? I could if I had known you were going to ask the question. I think there are about eighty.
1990. In reference to the brandy at 3s. a gallon, have you any knowledge of how much of that passes through the Customs? I have not.
1991. You do not know whether it is largely used in connection with many of the houses you have referred

- referred to? I think that can be ascertained from the locker of the bond—he has a record of all the liquors that are taken out of bond.
1992. You are rather in favour of the opening of public-houses for a certain time on Sundays? Yes.
1993. With the restrictions already mentioned? Yes, if some of the provisions of the English Act are adopted.
1994. You have had some experience of the opening of public-houses on Sundays under the old Act? Yes, but at that time the police had no power of entry, and the fines were very small. I have summoned a publican, and he has been fined 1s. and 2s. 6d. costs. That had not a deterrent effect.
1995. Do you think the present penalties sufficient? I think they are. A man was fined £20 last week—that is a very heavy fine.
1996. That is not imposed for a first offence, is it? The amount of the penalty is in the discretion of the Magistrate; it is not to exceed £20.
1997. Has it been inflicted for a first offence to your knowledge? Not for a first offence—only in aggravated cases.
1998. You say that the present Act provides that drink shall not be supplied to any one under sixteen years of age: is that adhered to? I cannot say. I have not seen youngsters drinking, but I have seen them intoxicated. Where they were served I could not say. I have seen girls eleven and twelve years of age drunk at some of the harbour picnics. The drink in those cases was generally supplied by their male companions.
1999. Mr. Withers.] For a purpose I suppose? Yes.
2000. Chairman.] You have read the Inspector-General's report? Yes, I have read it.
2001. The Inspector-General says that a large number of deaths which have been the subject of Coroner's inquiries have been caused through drink? I have no doubt of it.
2002. You are conversant with that portion of the English Act that you have referred to which gives the police power to enter the licensed houses during the hours when they are supposed to be closed, all found on the premises being held to be lawbreakers until they prove the contrary? Yes.
2003. Do you think that would materially assist the police? It would put a stop to illicit trading, with very few exceptions.
2004. Can you offer any suggestions as to the improvement of the administration of the Act—would you have the Bench as it is at present? I think the Bench works very well—I do not see that any improvement can be made in that direction. There is one matter with regard to the wholesale wine and spirit licenses which I may mention. Under the principal Act spirit licensees and brewers are upon exactly the same footing, but in the amending Act they inserted a clause making it penal for any brewer to sell less than two gallons of one sort of liquor at one time; but that was not extended to the wine and spirit licensees, and they can sell a single bottle or even a glass. That is contrary to the spirit of the Act, but there is no penalty provided, consequently no proceedings can be taken.
2005. Have you obtained any information as to any persons who are engaged in doctoring or manipulating spirits? I have not; I have been making inquiries; it is a difficult matter; I may be able to find out something shortly.
2006. Mr. Withers.] This cheap beer of Tooth's, I think it is called Tooth's stringy, is it not very detrimental to the health of those who drink it? I have taken samples and marked them, and asked the Analyst to see if there was any difference in the quality of the different samples.
2007. You have reason to believe that the beer at 2d. a pint which you have sent in for analysis is detrimental to the health of the working-classes? I cannot say that it is more detrimental than any other sort. I was assured by a man at Warby's, where I took the sample from, that it was exactly the same beer that the other houses sold. There is a great run on it, and they sell it in what are called "long sicevers."
2008. Do you think that drinking colonial beer is as detrimental to the health of the working-classes to the extent I have described? I have seen men who appear to be saturated and rotted with it. Those are men who do nothing but drink—complete soakers.
2009. Do you think those men are rotted by taking this beer? I should think the quantity they take must be injurious.
2010. You do not think it is so much the quality as the quantity? I should not think it is as injurious as the worst class of spirits.
2011. You spoke about two classes of licenses,—one for the sale of wine and beer, and the other for the sale of spirits? Yes.
2012. Do you think any proposal of that kind would work? I believe it works very well in England; and I believe there is a third kind of license, there the holder of which is not allowed to have a glass on the premises—you can only send and take away the liquor in a jug or bottle.
2013. You are evidently of opinion that in first-class public-houses young women are not subject to any greater temptations than they would be at temperance picnics, or in other public businesses? I do not say temperance picnics in particular—I say any public picnic. Barmaids are so much before the public, and they have so little spare time, that they have not the same opportunities as other classes have. A barmaid can keep herself pure if she likes. There is greater need of legislation in another direction—for the suppression or regulation of many dancing saloons—they are nothing more nor less than preparatory schools of vice.
2014. Are assignation-houses at all numerous in the suburbs? I have heard of them.
2015. Do you think it likely that any evil effects arise from Salvation Army demonstrations? I really cannot say; I have not much knowledge about the Army.
2016. Do you think that there is more temptation for young women employed in respectable hotels than there is for women in connection with the Salvation Army demonstration in our streets? I cannot say, because I have never attended a Salvation Army demonstration.
2017. From general observation what do you think? Any young woman attending any public place or occupying any public position can behave herself respectably and be respected if she likes.
2018. Chairman.] Are you aware that in the report of the Shops Commission in Victoria, it was stated that a large portion of the girls that went wrong were from public-houses? I do not know that. I knew most of the girls who used to parade King-street five years or five and a half years ago, and very few of them were or had been barmaids; some of them were.
2019. Mr. Colls.] You are not in favour of up-stairs bars? I am entirely opposed to them; all bars should be on the first floor, and be open and accessible to the public.

- Sub-Inspector
Lenthall.
30 April, 1886.
2020. Do not you think that barmaids should hold a certificate of good character from a Police Inspector or some other authority? It would scarcely be possible. If the police had to give any certificate of the kind I am afraid that it would have to be of a negative nature—"we don't know them."
2021. Do not you think that it would be a good thing if it were possible—you know that great games are carried on now? Yes, and we have done what we can to stop them.
2022. Are you under the impression that many of the keepers of small houses are not capable of judging the quality of liquor which they sell? I do not believe that there is one publican in the list which I have handed in who is not forced to take whatever liquor the person to whom he has given the bill of sale chooses to send him.
2023. He has no idea of what sort of stuff he sells? I don't suppose he has.
2024. It has been stated in evidence that lumpers have bought into hotels - I suppose they would not know what sort of liquor they sell? There are numbers of labouring men who have saved from £100 to £150. They wish to go into public-houses, and perhaps they have to pay a premium of £500. They hand over this ready cash and give bills of sale for the balance. They have to pay interest on that and take their liquor from the holders of the bills of sale. The majority of this class of publicans are scarcely able to make a living; they resort to Sunday trading, and immediately there is a second conviction, down comes the holder of the bill of sale, who insists on a transfer. As far as I can ascertain, this is about the system.
2025. Do not this class of publicans drink the same liquor as their customers? Yes; you will see them taking it from the same bottle; I do not believe that they have any idea of the quality of the liquor.
2026. You have had some experience in the Albury district? Yes; eleven years.
2027. You know that a great deal of German brandy is made there? Yes, there are many vigneronns who hold small still licenses. A man must have a vineyard of 2 acres to entitle him to apply for a still license.
2028. What has been the result? When the first liquor is being run off, I have seen a German take half a tumbler of the hot fiery spirit—worse than anything that I have shown the Commission—and toss it off. It has been the cause of two or three suicides. A man named Howard used to make a large quantity of this liquor. He took to drinking it himself, and the consequence was that one day he took up a gun and blew his brains out. There is a heavy penalty for selling the liquor, except under certain restrictions and payment of duty; and although we never could catch them at it, we knew that the vigneronns used to sell it to some of the publicans.
2029. I suppose they bought it to mix it with other drinks? We knew that they did, although we could not prove it. I had seven cases at one sitting of the Court, and I think that I was successful in nearly all of them.
2030. You know the people who go to the small vineyards get what they want? Yes, there used to be any amount of drinking of both German brandy and colonial wine.

J. ROSEBY, Esq., J.P.,	G. WITHERS, Esq., J.P.,

N. MELVILLE, Esq., M.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Inspector W. Camplin called in, sworn, and examined:—

- Inspector
W. Camplin.
19 April, 1886.
2031. President.] You are chief detective? Yes.
2032. How long have you held your present position? Five years. I have been in the detective department twenty-four years, and for four years previously I was in the general police.
2033. In the performance of your duties I suppose you have a number of assistants? A number of detectives.
2034. But you are acquainted with the leading facts in every case? As a rule.
2035. Do you think that the intemperate use of liquor is an incentive to much of the crime which is committed in the Colony? I think so; it is the primary cause of a great deal of crime.
2036. Can you define the class of crimes which you can trace to drink? As a rule, where men are assaulted and robbed at night they are under the influence of drink.
2037. Then the condition of the victim is often an incentive to the crime? Very often. Then robberies from the person in houses of ill fame are generally traceable to drink.
2040. Are there any other criminals whom you would class as temperate men? Very often you will find that men who commit nice forgeries—the forgery of bank notes for example—are temperate men.
2041. I suppose that there is little or nothing in the way of spurious coinage here? Very little. Another class of cases which are attributable to drink are assaults by husbands on their wives.
2042. What is your experience of cases of rape, which have occurred so frequently of late years—do you think that the young men (for they are young men as a rule) who commit these rapes are incited to the commission of the crime by taking drink? I have no doubt of it, although I cannot state any particular case which has come under my notice.
2043. Take the Woolloomooloo case for example? They were all young fellows who were connected with that; they belong to a class whom you may see going about, half a dozen or a dozen together, from one public-house to another.
2044. I suppose that they do not get actually drunk? They get into such a state that they will fight or commit any act of violence, no matter what it is—they are just fit for anything.
- 2045.

Inspector
W. Campbin.
19 April, 1886.

2045. Do you think that it is drink which incites the larrikins to assault Chinamen and other harmless people? I think so, as a rule; the leader of the Woolloomooloo gang was all right until he commenced to drink again; directly he did he became as bad as ever, and he is now serving a sentence for assaulting a policeman.
2046. I suppose you would not attribute bushranging to drink? No; generally I think that the bush-rangers have been very temperate men; I have heard it said that O'Malley used to drink very heavily.
2048. You think that as a rule cases of assaults by husbands on their wives are attributable to drink? Yes.
2049. So that when the Judge and the Magistrates say, as they often do, that three-fourths of the crime is traceable to drink, you would be disposed to agree with them? I would; many cases of petty larceny from shops are attributable to it; people get partly drunk and then go on a pilfering tour; they do not care whether they get into gaol or not—they soon become reckless.
2050. Do you think that the intemperate use of liquor is as common as it was twenty-eight years ago, or more so? I do not know.
2051. Are the people made more criminal by the excessive use of intoxicants? I see more drinking among the youths than I did in former years; it may be because they are more numerous.
2052. If more drink is taken by the juvenile classes, I suppose there are more small crimes? I think so.
2054. Do you think that the restrictions in the present Licensing Act have had any effect on crime? I do not think so, because on Sundays, when there ought to be less drinking, there appears to be just as much as ever, according to my observation.
2055. Do you think that there is much drinking in private houses? I have heard of plenty of cases.
2056. I suppose that in the performance of your duties you have met with cases which have surprised you? I have.
2057. Do you think that the closing times now provided by law have been beneficial? I think that the closing at 11 o'clock at night has.
2058. What is your opinion as to Sunday closing? I think that it would be a beneficial thing if the public-houses were opened for an hour in the middle of the day; it would be so to some people—at any rate they would consider it so; I mean persons who are desirous of getting beer for their dinner and would not care about getting it on Saturday, and would not care about breaking the law to get it.
2059. You consider then that there is a class of persons who refuse to break the law? Yes.
2060. And that the present law is harsh upon these people? Yes.
2061. If, on the other hand, the houses were opened on Sundays, do not you think that there would be a corresponding increase of drunkenness? I scarcely think so, because many persons will go in in the morning now, who would probably defer their visit if they knew that they could get supplied at dinner hour.
2062. You think that the class who go to the public-houses in the morning, in violation of the law, would defer their indulgence until the authorized time? I think that they might.
2063. Have you traced any increase of crime to the bars on the steamers? No.
2064. You know that for some years past the Newcastle steamers have become the resort of some of the greatest larcenists in the Colony? A number of robberies on the Newcastle steamers have been reported to us during the last couple of years or so, but I do not know that they are traceable to the bars.
2065. You said just now that robberies from the person were usually attributable to the drunken condition of the victims—do not you think that unrestricted drinking on the Newcastle steamers has a tendency to make more victims for these pilferers? There is no doubt of that.
2066. A person who goes on the steamer a little the worse for drink gets more drink, lies down, and then he is at the mercy of any designing person? Yes.
2067. The fact is that they cannot take care of themselves after repeated doses of liquor? No doubt.
2069. Your strong impression is that robbery generally is much simplified by the condition in which the victim is? Yes.
2070. Mr. Colls.] Have you had any experience in the country? A little.
2071. In what parts have you been? I have travelled in the western and southern districts; I was never stationed there.
2072. Then of late years you had no control over hotels? I never had any except during the first four years I was in the police force.
2073. You consider the closing at 11 o'clock is a great improvement? Yes.
2074. It saves a great deal of trouble to the police? Yes.
2075. Can you give us any idea of what transpires on holidays at the dancing saloons down the harbour? I have nothing to do with them—my duties do not take me there.
2076. I suppose you know that a great deal of drinking goes on there? I know by report that there is a great deal of drinking amongst the boys and girls.
2077. Can you give us any information about up-stairs bars? I have been in some of them. I do not think they are very desirable places.
2078. I suppose you think the people who conduct them are of objectionable character? Undoubtedly. The girls appear to be dressed for the purpose of enticing young fellows to drink.
2079. I suppose you have seen a great deal more of this in the city than in the country towns? I never saw any of it in the country.
2080. What towns have you been in? Bathurst and Goulburn.
2081. I suppose you know that there is scarcely an hotel in those towns at which a family could not get accommodation? I think they could.
2082. Those cafés or up-stairs bars are quite new institutions here? They have only come into existence within the last year or two.

Inspector
W. Camplin.
19 April, 1886.

2083. Have you had any experience of the clubs in the suburbs and different places? No. There is one at Botany, but I have never been there.
2084. Mr. Roseby.] During your twenty-eight years' experience in the police force you have had large opportunities for observing the effect of the drink traffic on the community? Yes.
2085. Your occupation has taken you into all sorts of society? Yes.
2086. You say that you believe that three-fourths of the crime of all kinds is caused through drink? Traceable to drink.
2087. In your opinion, are there sufficient public-houses in the city and the country generally to supply the wants of the people? I think so.
2088. Do you think that there are too many? I think so, judging from my own neighbourhood—Woolloomooloo; I think that we could do with a great many less.
2089. Do you think that there are twice as many as there ought to be? I know that you can stand at any corner of Oxford-street and see five public-houses. There can be no necessity for all of them; one, or two at any rate, would be sufficient to supply the wants of the people within that distance. There are a great number of public-houses which I do not think are required.
2090. You think that the wants of the community would be amply served if we had less than half of the present number? A great many less, at any rate.
2091. You say that years ago there were not nearly as many young people given to habits of intemperance as there are now? Yes.
2092. Do you think that the publicans are careful enough in supplying young people with drink? I am sure that some of them do not exercise that amount of care which they ought to do.
2093. Do you think that the age of young people—it being sixteen years now—whom publicans are allowed to supply with drink ought to be increased? I should think that it ought to be increased to eighteen years.
2095. Then you do not think that it would be a wise thing to dispense with steamer bars altogether? Not altogether.
2096. In what way would you restrict the use of these bars? I should say that no person under the influence of liquor ought to be supplied.
2098. You think that it would be a great hardship on those people? I do.
2099. Your special business does not give you any control over hotels? None whatever.
2100. Do you think that the people residing in a particular district ought to have the right to say whether there should be any more public-houses or a less number of them in their midst? I think that they ought.
2101. You think that the up-stairs bars have a bad tendency? Some of them—I do not say all.
2102. In view of the effect which these bars have on the people who frequent them, do you not think that they ought to be done away with? I do, particularly where they are conducted by females.
2103. Do you think that young women ought to be allowed to serve drink at the bars of public-houses? If I were an hotelkeeper I certainly would not employ barmaids if I could help it.
2104. Would you allow your own daughter to serve at one of these upper bars? I certainly should not like a female relative of mine to serve at one of them.
2105. I gather from your observations that you think it would be wise to have these bars attended to by men only? I think that, however good and prudent a young girl may be when she enters a bar, it will be found that from hearing the language of half-tipsy men she will eventually become more or less tainted.
2106. Mr. Hutchison.] How do you account for the large increase of drinking among the youth of the population? I cannot do so, unless it arises from the facilities offered to obtain drink in public-houses.
2107. Do you think that if full Sunday closing were enforced it would be beneficial to the community as a whole? That is a question I can scarcely answer.
2108. In view of the effects of drinking on Saturday night after the men have received their money, do you not think that Sunday closing, if it could be carried out, would be a great gain? I do.
2109. Then it is only as a sort of compromise that you would give the hour? There are persons who must be considered—although it is my opinion that if the houses were closed altogether on Sunday it would be beneficial.
2110. You say that the opening for an hour on Sunday would to some extent solve the problem: do you not think there would be much difficulty in closing them after that hour? Not if the penalty were made heavy; in fact, if they do not obey the law, you might cancel their licenses.
2111. Are you aware that the police have great difficulty in proving violations of the law? That perhaps could be altered.
2112. Would it not be a gain to remedy the existing law in that particular, and to keep it in force? I think that if a number of persons were seen going into a public-house, that should be sufficient proof of drinking.
2113. And you would apply that to the present Act? I would—I think it a great oversight that it was not so applied.
2114. You remember the working of the old Act? I have had nothing to do with the working of the licensing law.
2115. Mr. Davies.] Have you any knowledge of the reduced number of arrests for drunkenness in the first year of the operation of the present Act, as compared with the last year of the operation of the old Act? No; except from reference to the Inspector-General's report.
2116. Did you not furnish portions of the returns upon which that report is founded? No.
2117. What are your duties on Sundays? The same as on week-days—the detection of crime generally.
2118. Have you made any arrests or taken any action in connection with the infringement of the licensing law on Sundays? No; my duties do not tend in that direction.
2119. I gather from your answers that you are in favour of entire closing on Sundays? Personally I am,

2120. You believe it would be a great boon to the community if that law were strictly observed? Yes; but I think that if under the circumstances the houses were allowed to open in the middle of the day, that would satisfy a large portion of the community.

2121. You know that the old Act contained a provision of that kind? I do.

2122. Are you not aware that there was more drunkenness then than under the new law? I do not know that. The penalties under the old law were not so heavy; a publican might be fined 10s. or 20s., he did not care very much for that. If you were to make the penalties very severe, it would not be worth a man's while to run any risk.

2124. Is there anything like the same amount of open drunkenness? I see a great deal of it.

2125. Do you see anything like the proportion which existed under the old Act? I could not give you an opinion; no doubt there was a great deal of drunkenness under the old Act on Sunday, and I see a great deal of it now.

2126. What is the general character of the city under the new as compared with the old Act? I could scarcely answer a question of that sort; my duties were never connected with the licensing law, therefore I have paid no attention to the matter.

2127. And you have not even noticed whether the change has been good or bad? I cannot say.

2128. What is the general state of the city after 11 o'clock at night, as compared with its state after that hour under the old Act? I think it is much better.

2129. Then you are in favour of the early closing of public-houses on week-days? Yes.

2130. And you think that that has brought about a great improvement? I think so.

2131. Have you any suggestions to make to the Commission for an amendment of the present law, so as to make it more effective in checking drunkenness and crime? I think the suggestion I have made with reference to proof of the sale of drink would if adopted have a very beneficial effect. I would apply that not only to Sundays but to selling after hours on week-days. It is impossible for a constable to get into a house to prove sale.

2132. Are there many up-stair bars conducted by gay females? A number of them.

2133. What is their general character? They are places one would not approve of. The girls mostly have a very gay appearance.

2134. Are there many of these bars known to the police? There might be half a dozen that I know of; I do not visit them except for a special purpose in connection with my duties.

2135. Can you recognize any of the women as loose women? I have not been able to do so up to the present time.

2136. Have you observed the kind of persons who appear to frequent these up-stair bars? As a rule, they appear to be young fellows who are clerks or who follow some employment of that sort.

2137. Have you observed a large amount of drunkenness among the better class of people in the community? I have observed a considerable amount; I could not say that private drinking is carried on to a great extent, but cases have come under my notice.

2138. So that there is not only drinking in public-houses, but in private houses? Yes.

2139. Is the drunkenness among the youth of both sexes increasing? I think so—I think I have observed more.

2140. Has there been much increase during the past three or four years? More than I have noticed in former years.

2141. What would be the lowest age in both sexes? From fifteen upwards.

2142. Do you know how these young people are employed during the day? A great number do not follow any employment; they are more of the larrikin type—you see them going about Woolloomooloo by the half-dozen.

2143. Are not some of them employed in factories? Some of them may be employed in tobacco factories.

2144. Have you any knowledge of the number of deaths clearly traceable to drunkenness which took place last year? No.

2145. Have any cases come under your own observation? None that I can remember at the present moment.

2146. Mr. Colls.] Have you any idea of the number of public-houses in Woolloomooloo? I could not say how many there are.

2147. Are they hotels in which a family or a man of small means could find accommodation? Very few of them, I think.

2148. Half a dozen? There might be half a dozen which could accommodate families.

2149. You stated that you had travelled a good deal throughout the country? In former years.

2150. Do you approve of liquor being sold on railway stations? When I was in the habit of travelling there were no railway bars.

2151. Mr. Withers.] I suppose your duties take you into the streets at all hours of the day and night? Yes.

2152. I understand you to express the opinion that, as far as you could see, the early closing of public-houses had been instrumental in producing a great reform in the conduct of the city generally during the evening? Yes, I think so.

2153. We have been told that the police have been able to devote greater attention to the protection of property, instead of having to look after persons who are unable to look after themselves? I believe that is the case—that is quite correct.

2154. And do you not consider that a very important improvement? Certainly.

2156. Then you approve of the present Act in that respect? Yes.

2157. I think you have expressed reasons which are against the entire closing of public-houses on Sunday? I think it would be a good thing if it could be properly carried out. I think if you were to make the penalties heavy you would not have so many people breaking the law.

2158. You think that greater power should be given to the police to arrest persons whom they suspect of breaking the law? Yes, I think the proof ought to be made easier.

Inspector
W. Camplin.

Inspector
W. Camphin.
19 April, 1886.

2159. You think that the police ought to have the right to follow any man into a public-house and to inquire into his business? I do not think it is necessary that the police should follow people into public-houses; but that if I am standing at a street-corner and see fifteen or twenty persons go into a public-house, I think that ought to be sufficient to justify the Magistrates in convicting. I would lay the onus of proof on the publican.

2160. You think then that you ought to have power to make a publican appear at the Police Court on the following morning to answer for the persons who may have been seen going into his house? Yes.

2161. And you think that would be a check on the admission of persons to drink on Sunday? Yes, I certainly think so. For instance, there are some small public-houses in Woolloomooloo; you will see fifteen or twenty persons going into those houses on Sunday, and you know that they must be going in for the purpose of drinking, because the landlord does not keep lodgers.

2163. But there are some licensees who are Members of Parliament, and who are in every way respectable men; they may have many persons visiting them in the course of the Sunday for the purpose of having a chat; it would be necessary therefore that the police should exercise some discretion? The hotelkeeper could show that the persons did not come to his house for drinks.

2165. And the publicans who close may frequently be led into opening their houses from a feeling of rivalry? Exactly; and they might be caught and punished, though they may not do half the trade which other publicans do who have been in the habit of keeping their houses open on Sunday.

2166. Do you think that the majority of publicans desire to close on Sunday? No doubt the reason which you have mentioned induces a number of publicans to sell on Sunday who otherwise would not do so.

2167. You have to arrest a number of persons on serious charges, and you have them under your observation for some period? Yes.

2168. Do you think that the ultimate ruin of these persons has been brought about by drink? In a number of cases.

2169. Would that be so in the majority of cases? Yes.

2170. Would not those upper bars be a convenience to gentlemen wishing to transact business matters quietly, were it not for the surroundings which are brought about by the employment of women? I do not think that any person wishing to carry on a legitimate trade would have one of those upper bars, unless for the convenience of gentlemen in such a case as the Opera House, where persons might wish to go out of the dress circle to get a drink.

2171. And but for the presence of the women you think those bars might very frequently be the resort of men who simply desired to have a friendly chat upon business matters? Yes, but I think that in the case of the majority of customers you would find that the inducement would be gone, if you were to take away the females.

2173. These private bars would not be any evil or any trouble to the police if men were employed in them? No; I think that the employment of women does a great deal to induce young fellows to drink, to say the least.

2177. Do you think that the provision in the present Act relating to Sunday closing is preferable to that of the old Act? Yes, if it were properly carried out.

2178. The larrikins are a great nuisance about the lanes and back streets of the city? Yes.

2180. You think they are a greater trouble to the police now? Yes; and not only that, but they are becoming more dangerous; they will attack the police now, whereas they would not do so in former years; the first thing you get now is a stone.

2181. I suppose the majority of these youths average from sixteen to twenty-five years of age? Younger than that.

2182. And I suppose they do a great deal of drinking in the public-houses in the course of the week? Yes, and particularly at night-time.

2183. Mr. Melville.] I presume you have a fair knowledge of most of the hotel-keepers in Sydney? I know a good number of them.

2184. Do you know any who have been convicted of crime? I cannot remember any at this moment.

2185. But you would not be positive that there are none? No, I would not.

2186. Where are those houses situated which you have observed to violate the law most? Principally in Woolloomooloo; about William-street and the lowest parts of Woolloomooloo.

2187. From your experience as a detective officer, what is your opinion as to the character of the neighbourhood in which those houses are situated? It is generally rather low.

2188. I suppose you know some hotels the proprietors of which do not open on Sunday? A number.
2189. Where are they situated? About King-street; Moore's hotel and Roberts's hotel do not open.
2190. But I am referring now to places not in the centre of the city? I know one or two; there is one in Liverpool-street which does not open.
2191. Do you know of any in any other district? No, I do not, except the large hotels. A great number of the small public-houses sell on Sunday.
2192. Do you know of any public-house having a large population immediately surrounding it which opens on Sunday? I am not in a position to give that information; I have not paid that attention to the matter which might be paid by another person.
2193. Where do you reside? In Liverpool-street.
2194. Do the hotels in your immediate vicinity sell on Sunday? They do.
2195. Do you know of any hotels in any other locality the proprietors of which do not sell on Sunday, the population being as dense as in your neighbourhood? That is a question I cannot answer.
2197. Can you tell the Commission whether the shortening of the hours for opening and the restriction as to Sunday selling provided by the present Act have had a tendency to increase the value of property in the neighbourhood of hotels, or have they lessened the value? I do not know as to that; the matter is one in which I have not made any inquiry.
2198. Have you been called upon to assist in the discovery of sly grog shops? No.
2199. Not during your long experience? No. I have detected illicit distillation, but no sly grog selling.
2200. President.] What has your experience been in regard to illicit stills? Some years ago I was the means of seizing an illicit still in a store in Lower George-street.
2201. Mr. Davies.] In Hamilton lane? Right opposite the Mariners' Church.
2202. President.] Is that the only one? Yes, that I was engaged in the seizure of.
2203. Mr. Davies.] Thames? Yes.
2204. Mr. Melville.] There was one at the Glebe too? I had nothing to do with the discovery of that one.
2205. Have you any reason to suspect that sly grog selling goes on in the Arcades? I have heard nothing of it.
2206. Have you any knowledge of the existence in the city of working-men's clubs? I have heard, but I know nothing of them. I would not visit them unless I had a special reason for doing so.
2207. President.] There is a provision in the law which prohibits the assemblage on the premises of a publican of prostitutes, thieves, and drunken and disorderly persons, and persons of notoriously bad character? Yes.
2208. Are you aware whether that prohibition is effective or not—do bad characters, especially thieves and people of that class resort to public-houses of low character? Yes, very often. I suppose when it comes under the notice of the police they prosecute; I cannot mention any special cases.
2209. Do you think we have in this Colony the class of publican who encourages bad characters to resort to his house and, in point of fact, helps them frequently in the disposition of stolen property? I cannot name any of that class.
2210. I presume if such a state of things existed it could hardly escape your knowledge? I think it would hardly come under my notice.
2211. Then these publicans are not open to the reproach of encouraging thieves and bad characters, and assisting them perhaps in the commission of crime? Not as a body; there may be instances of such practices—I know of none.

J. DAVIES, Esq., C.M.G., J.P., M.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Sir Alfred Stephen, G.C.M.G., C.B., called in and examined:—

2212. President.] You are aware, I presume, of the objects of the Commission? Not exactly.
2213. It is an inquiry generally into the alleged increase of the habit of intemperance now considered to prevail in the Colony, and we are commissioned to submit recommendations based upon the results, and it is also an inquiry into the operation of the licensing laws, with a view of submitting recommendations for their amendment. The scope of the Commission is therefore very large. In the course of your judicial experience, which I believe extended over thirty years, you must have formed opinions on the subject of intemperance, which we should very much like you to share with us? In the course of my judicial experience, having sat on the Bench of this Colony for over thirty years, and having had considerable experience of the effects of drunkenness in the sister colony of Tasmania, where I was an officer of the Crown for over twelve years, I have formed very strong opinions on the effects of intemperance and on the subject of the licensing laws generally. I was examined before a Commission appointed in the time of Sir Charles Cowper, whilst he was Colonial Secretary; it must be nearly thirty years ago. A great number of witnesses were examined; I remember that Mr. C. McClerie, J.P., and two or three clergymen were examined before the Committee. I had sat on two or three circuits a short time before, at which I had calculated the effects of intemperance and its operation upon crime; and I shall be very glad if I can, before the close of my examination, refer the Commission to that evidence. I mentioned a number of cases that I had tried, for what crimes, and how many of them were the immediate or indirect result of drink. My experience subsequently has been to the very same effect as that which I stated then, viz., that a very large—a preponderating proportion of crime was, as I have stated—directly and indirectly the result of intoxication:—in the cases of small crimes very frequently; but in those of the greater greater crimes, particularly crimes of violence, almost universally. That was my experience. I have observed and read a great deal since, and my persuasion is exactly that which I had formed from my experience as a Judge. It is not merely that crime is caused directly by drink, but that it is the cause where the perpetrator has nothing to do with drink, except as the man who takes advantage of it. Drink is frequently the occasion of crime in this way, that the person robbed or injured is himself drunk, and so affords the opportunity and the temptation to the commission of crime. Robberies occasionally take place in the parks. For instance, a person is robbed whilst lying drunk; people in that condition are of course an easy prey to the thief. I cannot state one single transaction or state of things existing in the Colony in which there is anything wrong, anything blamable, anything criminal, that takes place, but drink has something to do with it. Cases of indecent exposure of the person, cases of attempted rape, and other offences, are the direct result of drink. A drunken fellow goes into the Park and opens his trousers; he is in a beastly state of excitement, and persons are terrified and shocked at the exhibition. Then as to wife-beating, and the various miseries that result from unhappiness in married life, I believe that almost every case of the many—not scores, but hundreds—that exist in this town are invariably the result of drink; and in this particular class of cases the horrible results are such as to shock any one. The sufferings of the unhappy victims of drunkenness are enough to make any man shed tears. Not one week of my life elapses but I have some unhappy woman or some unhappy children coming to me with a tale of misery; and I say deliberately and without any exaggeration that not a week passes that some tale of distress is not told to me, some account of unhappiness and misery and privation, the result of drunkenness on the part of a husband—sometimes on the part of the wife, but much more generally on the part of the husband. I heard yesterday a tale of distress from a respectable married woman, a lady by birth, and well educated—such a tale of horror, the result of her husband's intemperance, as I shall never forget. I could hardly state what the facts are without in some way leading to a suspicion as to who the parties are. It is painful to remember that all this misery, in nine cases out of ten, is in the present state of the law irremediable. It is absolutely without remedy, and there can be no remedy unless the Bill now before the Legislature should pass. It was deep reflection on these things that made me finally, after many years' consideration, introduce that measure. In the case to which I have referred the woman cannot escape. She has twice endeavoured to get away from her husband. She has children, and she—not her husband—is maintaining the children. The house is his, and she is his slave; he has a right to the bed-chamber in which she sleeps, and he has a right to her person. The horrors which she has told me of are enough to shock any man.

2214. I would ask whether the drunkenness you are speaking of is the result of drinking at public-houses or of private tipping? Of that of course I have no means of knowing personally, but from statements which have been made to me I have no doubt that it is in almost every case the result of drinking at public-houses. I of course know of some cases where the drink has been taken at the persons' own homes. One of the most horrible cases that I know of was one in which a man had determined to kill a comrade. He invited the man to his own hut, got a keg of rum in, got more or less drunk himself, made his victim drunk, killed him in the night, and cut him open. The perpetrator was afterwards tried and hanged. I can mention another case of a different kind that was tried before me. Two men who were drinking together quarrelled, and in the course of the night one killed the other. Certainly 95 per cent. of the drunkenness is the result of drinking in public-houses.

2215. The crimes of burglary and robbery on the highway I presume are not the result of drink? I do not know even that. In the first place, the victim in a case of highway robbery is often more or less drunk, and thus affords an opportunity for the commission of the crime. In many cases men who commit criminal acts are excited by drink. I may mention a case which occurred not long ago, in which a constable was the victim. There was no direct evidence, but, as far as we could gather, the man was riotous, and the constable interfered and was killed. Strange to say, the Jury persisted in returning a verdict of manslaughter instead of murder, although the case was clearly one of murder.

2216. I suppose that in the various charges which you have delivered on circuit, you have dwelt upon the subject of drink as an incentive to crime? I dare say I have.

2217. I think I remember one case at Bathurst. If you have ready access to these charges we should be glad to obtain copies of them? If I can find them I will give you copies of them. The first case I ever tried in Brisbane was the case of a squatter who, whilst labouring under delirium tremens, shot his own friend, mistaking him for a robber. One of the first cases that I tried when I came here in 1839 was that of a man who shot his own wife in a fit of drunkenness, without intending to kill her. Being drunk, he did not know that the gun was loaded. That was at a harvest home. My life as a Judge is a horrible retrospect of crime, of wickedness, and of incidents springing more or less from that cursed vice of intemperance.

2218. Do you think that the habit of drinking has increased, or is increasing, or do you think that it was always at the same high level? As to a comparison of the drunkenness of one time with that of another, I could not give an opinion.

2219. That question is almost at the foundation of our Commission—the question I mean as to the increase of intemperance? I believe, but without sufficient data to justify me in expressing a decided opinion, that drunkenness is very much on the increase. I believe that drunkenness, among young men especially, is on the increase from private drinking, and especially that the practice of drinking to excess springs from the habit of what is called “nobblerizing,” and the habit of drinking at irregular intervals. If five or six persons go into a public-house, each of whom requires one drink, No. 1 will treat the other five, and afterwards each of the other five will treat all the rest; so that each man drinks six glasses instead of one glass.

2220. That is what they call “shouting”? That is the practice of “shouting.” I think that a great deal might be done by the Heads of Departments to prevent intemperance. They ought to say that any man who did that should lose his office, because it is laying the foundation of a habit which is not easily broken through. They get into the habit of drinking during the day, and they slide into drunkenness. I was told the other day of a very sad case of two young men who got into the habit of drinking, and took drink home to their own houses, so that there is a new temptation to the indulgence in drink. Among gentlemen drinking is, I think, rare. It is less than it was in my young days, when I saw many young men tipsy at parties. You never see that now; that is, among the better educated classes of the people.

2221. Have you noticed that drinking has extended to the females of families? I do not know that it has any more than among the males. I know one or two distressing instances of men whose homes are broken up in consequence of the drunkenness of their wives.

2222. Amongst those who have confided their troubles to you, are there not some men? Yes. I know a respectable respectable mason who consulted me as to whether he had any remedy with respect to his wife. He said—“If I get drunk and ill-treat my wife and do not provide for my children the law will punish me; but,” he said, “I go home—as I have done for many weeks—and find my wife helplessly drunk and my children crying or wandering about—in some cases the clothes and bedding having been sold for drink—yet I have no remedy. If I beat my wife of course the law touches me.” I said to him—“There is no remedy but such as it pleases God to send you, unless the law is altered.”

2223. Apart from offences cognizable by the criminal law, you think that drink is at the bottom of an immense deal of domestic misery, for which you propose to provide a remedy? My hope is that if a man knew that his wife could get entire separation from him on account of his drunken habits, he might have enough love left in him to abstain from drink rather than lose her society and her usefulness. I have great hope in that as a result of the Bill now before the Legislature if it passes. Of course that incentive will operate only among the better classes of drunkards. There are many drunkards who I think would be restrained by the feeling that if they continued in their bad course they would put it in the power of their wives to separate themselves from them; but at the present time there is no redress under the law. There must be neglect of children or beating them, or desertion, before the law can step in. If none of these things exist,—if there is no adultery, no desertion, or no beating, there is no redress.

2224. Then you think that if habitual drunkenness became a ground for dissolution of marriage, the effect of there being such a ground would be some deterrent? To what extent I do not know, but I am very hopeful that it would have a tendency in that direction.

2225. You are probably familiar with our licensing law, and the limited system of local option which the Legislature provided two or three years ago? Yes.

2226. At present you are aware that the principle of local option is limited to new licenses—it does not affect renewals. Have you formed any opinion on the subject generally? I think it wise, and I also think it just, that the inhabitants of any locality should have the power to say there are too many public-houses in their district—too many for proper refreshments; that the existing number is too great for any reasonable purpose, and can only be made profitable to the publican by being ruinous and detrimental to the community. In other words, I think that the inhabitants should have the power to say whether there are enough public-houses or not, and whether the increase of the public-houses would or would not tend to drunkenness and consequent injury to society, without any countervailing or counteracting good. Therefore, I strongly support the expediency, the wisdom, and the justice of giving that power to the inhabitants of the district. But I would not extend it to renewals;—simply on the ground, that, however desirable, it would be unjust to deprive existing houses of their licenses without paying compensation. I hold justice to be the first thing to be considered between man and man in the community.

2227. Your idea, I take it, would be that there should be a definite number of houses, proportionate to the population of the district? Proportionate to the requirements of the district.

2228. But not an ascertained number, as they have in Victoria. Would you leave it to the discretion of the Bench? I should say that the Bench might have the power, in the first place, to say how many licenses there ought to be for the reasonable requirements of the neighbourhood; but I think also that the power should be rather in the hands of the people themselves.

2229. That is the power to determine the number? Yes; being the parties most interested, they are the best judges.

2230. Would you give them unlimited power: suppose they said that there should be none at all? That I should say would be unjust; because it would necessarily involve the putting down of existing public-houses, the licenses of which are in a measure guaranteed, that, so long as they do not allow improper persons to assemble in their houses, so long as they are properly conducted, the licenses shall continue. It is not so said by law, but it is an understood thing, and is, I think, a just thing. I think that the owners of such public-houses have a right to expect that the understanding will be respected. I need not say that I hold it to be wrong to do good to the community at large, by doing a distinct injustice to any individual whatever.

2231. I gather that you are in favour of local option as a principle, but that you would not be willing to extend it so that it might affect vested interests, unless compensation were provided? I hold it to be unjust, and therefore wrong, to deprive a man of that which the law has decidedly guaranteed to him, unless he is guilty of breaches of the law.

2232. By inference I assume that you are not in favour of any form of prohibitory legislation such as they have in Canada and the United States? If the inhabitants of a district said that no public-house was wanted—that they would be better without it—if a large majority so held, I should say that they ought to have the power to so determine, but not to the injury of vested interests.

2233. So that if there happened to be a larger number of public-houses than the people said were wanted, you would not give voters the power to get rid of them except by compensating the licensees? Always on the assumption that the houses are conducted in such a way as not to be amenable to the law.

2234. Legitimately conducted houses? Yes. I think that the present system is imperfect. I have always thought that there should be, first of all, licenses for particular houses—let them be conducted by whomsoever you may, but I would have certain persons licensed. I would allow no man to keep a public-house unless he were licensed; I would license a class of men whose character could be depended upon; I would have them examined as you examine a physician, a surveyor, or a lawyer; they should be men who could be depended upon to keep public-houses properly, and they might go from one public-house to another if they pleased. For example, I see no reason why public-house A should necessarily be kept by publican A, or public-house B by publican B. There would be a licensed class of publicans as well as a particular set of licensed public-houses. I think that I am right in saying that under the present law you licensed the public-house; it is kept by anybody or everybody that the owner chooses to put into it.

2235. I think that you laid it down as the law many years ago that a publican's license was a personal license to be exercised at a particular house: I do not think that the law is altered in that respect? I would license A, B, C, to conduct the business of a public-house, and allow them to go into any public-house that was licensed, it being required of them that they should register the places which they were conducting. I would license them as you license a cabman, who is not licensed for a particular cab but as a cabman. I think that the distinction which I indicate should be drawn; at present it is not done, I think.

Sir Alfred
Stephen,
G.C.M.G.,
C.B.

7 May, 1886.

2237. Mr. Hyam.] You would grant a certificate to a man as being competent to hold a license? As a fit person to hold a license.

2238. It would not follow that he must occupy an hotel? Not necessarily.

2239. Mr. Abigail.] He would be qualified to accept the transfer of a license? Yes.

2240. President.] I presume that you would require that a register of these persons should be kept at the various Licensing Courts? Yes. As I understand the law, at present the house is licensed, and any person may go into it, whether he be fit or unfit to conduct it.

2241. Mr. Hutchison.] As I understand you, if I went into a public-house and sold drink without being personally licensed I should be liable to punishment—I must personally be licensed? I understand from what has passed at the Board in conversation, that no man who is not of good character is allowed to keep a public-house. I think that in the present state of feeling in the Colony we do not look upon drunkenness as I think we ought to look at it—as a crime. I think that on the part of a large proportion of the community drunkenness is considered a palliation. If a man commits a crime when under the influence of drink, and he is tried, the Jury usually recommends him to mercy because “the poor devil was drunk.” I hold that this is a wrong state of things, and that it ought to be corrected. I never sentenced a man more because he was drunk, but I gave him the full measure of punishment just as if he was sober. That is well-known law, and I hold it to be consistent with morality; but I do not think that that is the feeling of Juries. Generally it is very much the reverse. I do not think that it is a wholesome state of feeling in respect to drunkenness; and, generally, I think that every man in a public position who is found drunk should be punished just as you would punish a drunken fellow who committed some offence in the street. I think that there ought to be a regulation that any person who is drunk when on duty, or ordinarily drunk, he occupying a public position, should be turned out of it forthwith. I recommended this many years ago to the then Colonial Secretary, and my recommendation was almost laughed at. I would do the same with respect to gambling. If such a regulation were enforced we should have less men ruined by one vice or the other.

2242. President.] Speaking under correction—I think that simple drunkenness is not an offence? Exactly so.

2243. It must be in the street or a public place, but you would make it an offence in a man's house—anywhere? I am now speaking of what could be laid down by the Heads of Departments as a regulation, rather than as something which should be provided for by an Act of the Legislature. The Heads of Departments should invariably punish men severely for drunkenness, and drunkenness in high life should be discouraged and punished just as much as in low life. I have no hesitation in saying that we should begin at the top of the ladder. I have seen men in public positions here in a beastly state of intoxication, and as far as I could judge I have not found that these men have been thought any the worse of. I am not by any means saying that there are not other vices which ought to be equally discouraged, but I say that there is a kind of feeling with regard to drunkenness which does not prevail with regard to other vices—men seem to think very little of it; but if we are right in saying—as I hold we are—that it is the cause of an enormous amount of evil of every kind—in social, commercial, moral, religious, and in every department of life that you can think of,—that it is almost ruinous to the community in the long-run—then we ought to punish the vice at the first beginning of it.

2244. Are you in favour of the establishment of inebriate asylums? Certainly I am.

2245. You are aware that they exist in the United States, and in South Australia and Victoria? I know that there are some in the States, but I was not aware that there were any in the Colonies.

2246. In some cases the system is compulsory; you may get a man put into an inebriate asylum almost by the same process as you can get him into a lunatic asylum? They are lunatics.

2250. Unfortunately there is not a great demand for colonial wine, which is much stronger than the beer which I describe as lager beer. You would be in favour of a system of licensing people to retail beer containing a very small percentage of alcohol? I think that it would be desirable; if a man really wants refreshment he does not want spirituous liquor at all, as far as I can judge; it is on spirits that men get drunk; I have never known in my experience a wine-drinker who has been a confirmed drunkard, nor have I known violent crimes to be committed by men under the influence of wine; they are always associated with the drinking of horrible, inflammatory spirits; the brandy-drinker, the gin-drinker, the whisky-drinker—these are the people who commit crimes. It may be retorted upon me—“Oh, you say that because you do not drink spirits, but you drink wine.” People may take whatever advantage they please of this; I am a drinker of wine, and I shall continue to be so; I am advised that without it I could not keep my health, which at the present moment, I am happy to say, is remarkably good. But I never get drunk. I should like to say that, in all licensed public-houses, whether they be for the sale of light beer or light wine, or anything else, I hold it to be important that men should not be allowed to remain tippling; public-houses are for the purpose of refreshment, not for the purpose of getting drunk, nor are they for the purpose of allowing men to drink more than is desirable or good for them; I would make it imperative on a licensed victualler, if two or more persons, not being actual lodgers, were in his house for more than a certain length of time, to prove that they were not there for the purpose of tippling; I would throw the responsibility on him. A year ago I introduced a clause to that effect in a Bill which was before the Legislative Council, but the provision was struck out by the Assembly.

2251. Mr. Roseby.] As this is a very large and important question, upon which the members of the Commission would like to hear your views, and as you have another engagement for this afternoon, would you you favour us with your attendance upon some future occasion? I will come as often as you like, but I should be glad to have some questions sent to me beforehand, so that I may study them instead of answering offhand as I have been doing.

Sir Alfred
Stephen,
G.C.M.G.,
C.B.

7 May, 1886.

2252. So far no other members of the Commission besides the President has had an opportunity of interrogating you? Let me say this. There was laid before the House of Assembly, in June last year, a return to which I wish to draw your attention at once. In that return it is stated that out of 2,450 persons confined in the lunatic asylums—1,498 males and 952 females—there were 95 males and 42 females who were there in consequence of the use or abuse of drink. It is a very striking fact that out of 2,450 persons in the lunatic asylums 137 should be there in consequence of drink. Now comes the number of criminals who were made criminals by drink. According to a return from the gaols, in July 1884 there were 2,302 prisoners in the gaols, of whom there were 1,191, or more than one-half, whose crimes were traceable to drink. That shows that the evil is of very great magnitude. In the Sydney gaol alone, of 892 prisoners—and there ought never to be more than 600 there at any time—there were 366 whose incarceration was directly traceable to drink, and 236 whose incarceration was indirectly traceable to drink. Add the two numbers together, and you have a total of 602 drunkards out of 892 criminals.

2253. Mr. Withers.] Did I understand you to say there were only 2,302 prisoners in all the gaols of the Colony in 1884? Yes.

2254. Considering the large expenditure laid out upon our gaols, I should have thought that the number was much larger? However large the expenditure may be, it is of very little importance compared with the other incidents of crime—the injury done, the misery caused, the loss of property, the waste of time, and the waste of money upon drink.

2255. Mr. Hutchison.] Do you think that the revenue derived from the drink would anything like meet the expenditure it causes? I cannot tell you that—I cannot even offer you an opinion upon it. But you cannot put life in one scale and money in the other. I know this,—that if proper measures were taken to put down drunkenness—that is the drinking of more wine and spirits than is good for any one—you certainly would have to put on taxes to make good the deficiency in the revenue. The revenue derived from drink is unquestionably large, and that is one of the arguments used in England against teetotalism, because if there was no drinking there would be a considerable diminution of revenue, and the people would have to be taxed in some other way.

2256. But with the reduction of revenue there would be a corresponding reduction of the expense caused by drink? Yes; but the expenditure is very small compared with the misery—that is incalculable. There are the Benevolent Asylums; you have to consider how many are there also as the result of drink.

2257. Mr. Withers.] You referred to the excessive number of prisoners in Darlinghurst Gaol: how is it that the prisoners are not better distributed, seeing that we have built a number of gaols of considerable dimensions in various parts of the Colony? Simply because there are not sufficient gaols in which a proper system of discipline can be carried out. We want larger gaols and better discipline. But my opinion is, that if you could succeed in putting down drunkenness to a large extent there would be plenty of gaol accommodation.

2258. Mr. Hutchison.] In addition to the views you have already expressed with regard to local option, the Commission would be glad if, next time you came, you would give us a general sketch of what you would suggest as a remedy for the evils of the present licensing system? I will do what I can. I think you will find it impossible to go through a single street of this city without, wherever you see a public-house on one side, seeing another on the opposite side, not far away from it. They cannot all be wanted.

FRIDAY, 14 MAY, 1886.

Present:—

ALEX. OLIVER, Esq., M.A., PRESIDENT,
T. COLLS, Esq., J.P.,
A. HUTCHISON, Esq.,

G. WITHERS, Esq., J.P.,
J. DAVIES, Esq., C.M.G., J.P., M.P.,
J. ROSEBY, Esq., J.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Sir Alfred Stephen, G.C.M.G., C.B., re-called and further examined:—

Sir Alfred Stephen makes the following statement:—

“My first evidence was given before a Select Committee of the then one Legislature of this Colony in August, 1854, of which Committee Sir Charles (then Mr.) Cowper, Mr. Plunkett, A.-G., Mr. Allen, Mr. (now Sir Henry) Parkes, Captain King, Dr. Douglass, Captain Mayne, and others were members. The resident physicians of the Insane Hospitals, the gaol surgeon, the clergymen of the two Destitute Asylums, the Sydney police magistrate, and other witnesses, were with myself examined. The whole subject of intemperance, its causes and results, was exhaustively gone into. I stated that at the last four Circuit Courts over which I presided there were sixty-six convictions for crime—(acquittals excluded)—of which thirty-one were directly or indirectly caused by drunkenness. But that in the case of crimes with violence, the proportion of drunkards was greater; being twenty-one out of twenty-seven. Five of these were murders. I must add that there were two other cases of homicide, the result of drunkenness; in which, from difficulties of proof, the prisoners were acquitted.”

Sir Alfred
Stephen,
G.C.M.G.,
C.B.

14 May, 1886.

2260. President.] Are you satisfied with the provisions in the new Licensing Act with regard to the hours of closing: I will ask first, do you approve of the provision which requires public-houses to close at 11 o'clock on week-days instead of 12 o'clock as formerly? Most assuredly; I cannot understand why a man should feel aggrieved or inconvenienced because he cannot obtain liquor after 11 o'clock.

2261. The provision has never, so far as I know, been regarded as inconvenient to any persons but those who attend theatres and other entertainments—it has been said that 11 o'clock is too early an hour for them? As to that I cannot express an opinion, because I rarely go to theatres, and when I do I go straight home

Stephen,
G.C.M.G.,
C.B.

14 May, 1886.

home after the performance is over; but I should think that people after sitting for some hours at a play or musical performance, both of which are perfectly innocent amusements, may really require refreshment; and if they are not rowdies and bad characters, I think they have a claim to consideration. It is difficult, however, to distinguish between the class of persons who go to theatres, and who really require refreshment, and the rowdy class of persons who are very glad of an opportunity to get drink at any hour.

2262. It has been suggested that the demands of theatre-goers might be met, by the Licensing Court endorsing the license of certain publicans in the neighbourhood of theatres and concert-halls with a permission to keep their houses open to a later hour? That would seem to be a not undesirable modification of the rule; because I presume that the permission would not be granted except to publicans who could be trusted.

2265. Mr. Davies.] That was under the old law? Yes; I am speaking of the time when publicans were allowed to sell during certain hours. The publican, I ought to say, had his revenge by publishing a caricature of me in the character of an unpaid policeman. I may add, however, that that did not make me very unhappy. Some publicans, I know, are highly respectable men, who would no more think of deliberately breaking the law than, I hope, I would; but there is another class who, if you gave them an inch, would take an ell. In the abstract, I do not think that a provision for opening public-houses for a couple of hours on Sunday is a bad one; but it is a dangerous one, because of the excess to which it tends.

2266. President.] But it is said that there would be no such evils as you apprehend, because it is proposed that the liquor sold should not be drunk on the premises? As to that, I do not believe, notwithstanding all that is said about the poor man's beer, that if a man really wants that kind of refreshment on Sunday he could not as easily get it on the previous evening. This is a statement which should be borne in mind, with reference to the abstract question of partially opening public-houses on Sundays.

2267. Having regard to what you say now, are we not justified in inferring that your opinions have undergone some change since 1878 on the subject of Sunday closing? No. I think it is better to close public-houses the whole day on Sunday.

2268. But in 1878 you were of opinion that between 1 and 3 o'clock they might be open for the sale of fermented liquors? Yes; but I say now that, upon the whole, it is nevertheless better to leave them as they are. I admit the hardship in some cases, but after my observation and experience I do not think that the inconveniences are so great as to countervail the good resulting from entire closing.

2270. Now, to come to another matter which is very interesting, and which is touched upon in the evidence you gave in 1878. In answer to a question, you pointed out that when the Bill for the sale of colonial wine was before the Council, you drew a clause which was not, for some reason, put into the Bill, to this effect:—"Any person found on the premises in a state of intoxication shall be presumed to have been there unlawfully drinking unless the contrary be shown by the defendant." You say that you also drew a clause, which was passed, to punish tipplers, whom you defined to be "persons remaining on the premises tipping or drinking two hours or upwards." With reference to this matter, we have been told that the efforts of the police to secure convictions for breaches of the law in respect to Sunday selling have been foiled mainly by the want of some such provision as that, which is not in our law, but which is said to be in the English Act. I have often referred to the clause in that Act, and it is to this effect: If any man is found during prohibited hours in any public-house, prima facie he is considered to be guilty of being there for an unlawful purpose. Therefore the burden is put on him to prove the contrary. I want to ask you whether you would be in favour of a provision in that direction? Most assuredly; and further, that if a man were seen leaving a public-house drunk it should be incumbent on the publican to prove that he had not been tipping in his house, or that he had remained in it in spite of the efforts of the publican to get him out. Then there should be a subsidiary provision that a man should be liable to punishment for refusing to leave a public-house when told told by the publican to do so. We frequently hear of cases of that kind. A man gets drunk and he will not leave the public-house; he wants more drink; the publican is often assaulted because he refuses to supply more drink. I say that a man who does this ought to be punished severely, because he tempts the publican to commit a breach of the law, while he himself is committing a breach of it by getting himself into a state of beastlihood, if I may coin such a word, which makes him fit for all manner of wrong doing.

2271. We have a provision in our law making it penal for a publican to serve a drunken man with liquor, and you think that there ought to be a correlative provision to that—some provision which would make it penal for a man being in a condition of drunkenness to remain on licensed premises in spite of the publican? I should make it distinctly punishable. To-day I saw a woman in a beastly state of intoxication carried past my house by two policemen; she had evidently got drunk at a public-house down the street, a few doors from my place. A publican must know when a person has had too much liquor; he knows that every additional sixpence is so much added to his abominable gains.

2272. There is, as you are aware, a provision in our Act which has been in various Acts for years past, in favour of bonâ fide travellers and lodgers being supplied with liquor. This provision has been found to work immense mischief: people perjure themselves by declaring that they are lodgers or travellers, and it is feared that the publicans do much the same. This wrecks the practical efforts of the police to get convictions for offences on Sundays.

2273. Has it ever occurred to you how that could be remedied? That question may require some thought before an answer is given. My present impression is that you might require the publican to prove that the person had been in his house as a lodger for twenty-four hours at least. I believe that the provision which is in the Act, which exempts the publican who bonâ fide believes the man whom he serves to be a traveller or a lodger is a very dangerous one. Every publican who wishes to sell unlawfully—I speak only of the bad class—will believe the man to be a bonâ fide traveller, just as many other people believe things which it is to their interest to believe. I think that that is a bad provision.

2274. Do you think in cases of violation of the licensing law, with regard to the supply of liquor during prohibited hours, that the penalty should be made applicable to both the publican and the person whom he serves. Some witnesses have expressed the opinion that the publican only should be punished, in order that the tippler himself should be able to give evidence? That might be met by enacting that the tippler should be indemnified against all penal consequences on his giving evidence. Nevertheless, in the first instance I would punish both.

2275. As the law stands both are punishable, but it is said that the result of that is that the publican has no difficulty whatever in getting any quantity of evidence—we say nothing as to the quality of it—from persons who were in the house on the occasion in question, that the persons served were inmates of the house or bonâ fide travellers, so that the police say that they have no chance, or an infinitely small chance, of getting convictions in most outrageous cases of violation of the law. The Inspector-General told us that out of 820 public-houses there is only a small proportion, less than one-fourth, in which the law is kept? A good deal might be done, by the adoption of a measure to punish the publican for every drunken man who leaves his house. But the tricks resorted to by the publicans to prevent constables from entering their doors are something extraordinary. The use of the word “nip” is a warning that constables are near, that danger is nigh; on a publican hearing the word “nip,” he immediately shuts his doors; if any person knocks at the door, the answer is—“This is a respectable house—there is no admittance here.” Of course, the publican could not think of breaking the law! He has men about on Sundays who take good care to give him timely warning of the approach of a constable, others to warn him that the person knocking is not known. Two or three constables have told me that it is of no use for them to go in plain clothes, because the publicans take care to find out all about their visitors. In the lane next to me there is a set of abominable public-houses, and abominable noises frequently occur in them; I have asked for additional police protection, and once or twice it has been afforded me, but the noises still continued just the same. More constables are required; we have not a sufficient number of constables for the protection of the city, much less to find out offences against the Licensing Act; and the latter is as of much consequence as the other, because, according to my experience, almost all crimes spring from drunkenness.

2276. Do not you think that it would be a strong deterrent against violation of the law by publicans, if we were to make it a ground of objection to the renewal of a license by or on behalf of the residents of the neighbourhood, that people had been seen going in and out of the house during prohibited hours in greater numbers than there could be lodgers: instead of fining the publican, would it not be better to provide for the forfeiture of his license—if you see a number of people going in and out of a public-house, there is strong presumptive evidence that those people are there for the purpose of getting drink, but at present you cannot give evidence like that. In such a case, do not you think that there ought to be some ground for objecting to renewal of the license? I think so, because the loss of his license would be a greater punishment to him than the penalty. It is of the deepest importance to society at large that drunkenness should be put down. I think that an infraction—even what may be deemed of a light kind by the publican—should not entail a fine merely, but the loss of his license; it should be the strong, the over-powering interest of the publican himself to see that the law is strictly obeyed. I have no doubt that the fine paid in the case I speak of was not one-fourth of the profits made during the day by the illicit selling; but, if he were told “You will lose your license on that being proved against you,” I think it would make him more cautious. You have here tremendous issues. Here is the liquor, the drinking of which in itself is not wrong, the drinking of which in reasonable quantities may be very beneficial, but the drinking of which in excess, and especially by a person who is partially intoxicated, I say the effects of which may be simply murder, robbery, rape—any kind of crime; and, where the habit exists, destruction of all domestic peace, and of good conduct in a man as becomes a citizen. Well, this being so, I think a man who undertakes so dangerous a trade should be made, as it were, a guardian of his own and the public safety, and if he offend in what may be deemed a small degree, notwithstanding that he could make out a good case for himself, he should lose his license.

2277. The police have said over and over again that though they object to the renewal of a license, on grounds such as I have mentioned, they cannot prove that any violation of the law has taken place. They have seen people to the number of 80 or 100 going into and out of a house, in groups of five, six, and eight; and whenever they make this the ground of objection to a renewal of the license, they are met with this answer from the Bench—“We cannot pay any attention to the surmises of the police.” Do not you think that a case of strong suspicion, certified to by a certain number of the residents in the neighbourhood, should be

Stephen,

C.B.

be made the ground of objection to the renewal of a license? That is a difficult question to answer, because suspicion simply should never be equivalent to evidence; but as a habit, a repute, according to the Scottish law, is a very good reason for adjudicating a man to be a thief, so, a general impression on the part of the neighbours that the law is habitually violated ought to be a perfectly good ground for refusing that man a renewal of his license. We must have licensed men who are omni exceptione majores—who are utterly free from suspicion of all kinds—we cannot have any other men as publicans. The issues are too important for the people; it is not like licensing a man to deal in figs, or raisins, or butchers' meat.

2278. If the publican knew that this might have afforded an effective ground for objecting, would he not take good care in the future that there were no such visits to his house on Sunday? I should think so, if he calculated his risks rightly. I have perfectly good reasons for knowing—though I can never prove—that a certain public-house is the resort of utterly bad characters, and I have very good reasons for knowing that the rows which take place in my neighbourhood—which ought to be a decent neighbourhood—spring from that public-house. I could never prove a single thing against that man, and if I were asked I should say “I have never myself seen an improper thing in the house—I do not go there, but I have seen drunken people come out frequently.” It is not in my way to look at this place—I am always doing some work or other—and my servants—very respectable girls—complain of the atrocious language which is used by the low class of women of the town. There ought to be a watch-house at the bottom of Francis-street, for there is very great difficulty in carrying people a long distance.

2279. In 1878, Sir Alfred, when you last gave evidence on this subject, you stated as your opinion that the punishment of fining habitual drunkards was a ridiculous one? Simply a farce.

2280. And you suggested other means of punishment, one of which was, I think, incarceration; and, as to that suggestion, I would like to ask you whether you have considered the question of inebriate asylums, homes or refuges for drunkards, as being perhaps cheaper to the State and more effective to the individual than the present system: we fine now, and if the fine is not paid it is so many days in gaol; some persons have been fined sixty or seventy times: what do you think about that matter? I think that the system of fining for drunkenness, as I have seen it myself in practice at police-offices here more than once, is simply a farce; a man is found beastly drunk by a constable, next morning he is fined forty shillings, “or in default forty-eight hours,” or so many days; I do not know whether he pays the fine or not; it is folly! Either it is a crime or not. If punishable, it is punishable because of the dangers to which the State is exposed by drunkenness; otherwise, why should I not get drunk, if my character was not anything to me?—But drunkenness is a crime, in my opinion, because of its inevitable tendency to wickedness. The drunkards come up to the police-courts in batches, and are sent away as a matter of course. I have heard such a sentence as punishment till the rising of the Court; and sometimes a man is let off because it is the Queen's Birthday, as if it were excusable to get drunk on that or any holiday. The first case I tried here was a man who shot his wife dead on the spot in a harvest-home; another case was a man who shot in his own house a friend whom he mistook for a bushranger. I go, therefore, on the ground that drunkenness is a crime because it leads to these things. If the man had been sober, this woman would have been saved. I have no doubt that if we could shut up some of these people after three convictions—perhaps the second—in an asylum for a considerable period it would do good; but I believe the reformation of a drunkard to be the most difficult thing imaginable—it is hopeless unless after a considerable period of detention—and then the expense to the people must of course be considered, as well as the difficulty of sending them there. If a wife could send her husband to an asylum—I know many such cases which are painful and very distressing—it would be a very great service, but I think that he would half-kill her when he came out. I think that inebriate asylums would do a great deal of good if the regulations were stringent and carefully acted up to. I read in a book not long ago of a very good system which is adopted in Paris: drunken people are taken at once—not to a gaol—but to a special receiving-house for drunkards.

2281. There is a punishment under the French law about which I would like to ask your opinion. After the second or third—I forget which—but on some subsequent conviction, a drunkard is declared in France by the law to be incapable of bearing arms for two years, that of serving on the Juries, or of giving a vote. Do you think that any personal scheme of that nature would be any use? Of course it would. Men convicted so many times of drunkenness should be deprived of the usual rights of a free citizen. On one thing I wish strongly to express my opinion, and I hope that it will not be lightly regarded elsewhere. I hold it to be worse than folly to be sending a person to gaol for drunkenness for a short time. I had a return sent to me—I laid it before Parliament—of men and women, especially women, sent to gaol over twenty, thirty, and forty times for drunkenness. I hold that to be perfect folly. The moment that a person is convicted three or four times it is plain that the habit is formed and we know that a habit when once formed is almost irretrievable; so I think that every person who has been sent to gaol three times for drunkenness should be sent to an asylum, and should be made to work there when the fit is over. Is this Commission aware of the enormous expense to which drunkards put this country—that a drunkard is attended carefully by a medical man—and when he is in delirium tremens, that he requires strong physical support?—The expense is perfectly astounding. I am told that when a man is found drunk in Russia he is sent to sweep the streets.

2282. Then you would be in favour of some additional scheme of a personal character, such as those mentioned in the French law—that, for example, of disqualification from exercising the franchise? Yes, I would deprive him of all that. The exemption from service on Juries, I think, would be no punishment; and I would not—I hope it will be understood that I am not making any reflection on the publicans themselves—I would not have them on Juries at all, simply on the ground that the publican's business is to be in his public-house. He ought to be a guardian of public order, and you cannot take him away from his work. I would disqualify him from being a jurymen, for that reason. With regard to publicans serving on Juries—they are probably as shrewd a class of men, and as respectably conducted as any other—but I have observed that, in those cases of crimes of violence where there ought to have been a conviction, which has not taken place, that there have been a number of publicans on the Jury. Where a person has been found guilty of a crime which ought to be severely punished, and there is no fair ground for a recommendation to mercy, there has been a recommendation to mercy, and there have been publicans on those Juries. Whence I take for granted that they are a remarkably kind-hearted body of men, but that, seeing the rows which take place in public-houses they get used to it, and they do not think there is much in a man knocking a fellow down and half-killing him. It seems that any one accustomed to the rows and blackguard language common in a low class of houses does not think much about it. If a man commits an offence whilst under the influence of drink, the publican's natural sentiment of kindness prevails, and he thinks the man very much to be pitied. I do not think that publicans are a desirable class for trying criminal cases. I say that, without any reflection upon them as to their moral constitution and natural tendencies as men.

Sir Alfred
Stephen,
G.C.M.G.,
C.B.

2283. Instead of giving them the right of objecting, you would exclude them? I think that they ought to be in their houses, which ought not to be entrusted to their wives and daughters. 14 May, 1886.

2284. Mr. Hutchison.] I am exceedingly anxious to have your views on the local option question a little more clearly; you say that the publicans are up to all sorts of tricks, and are under great temptations to make money; I find that out of 822 publicans only 193 are reported to be law-abiding; if those who violate the law were voted out of existence, would you consider that an injury had been done them for which they ought to be compensated? You begin with the fact that out of four men three break the law; and then, because that is so, you say—"We will put down not the three only, but the one also who does not break the law" at the option of the public at large. I hold that to be unjust.

2285. Not necessarily—local option may have two points, one being how many houses shall there be, and the other, shall there be any? Yes.

2286. Would it be unjust if the people took away by vote the licenses of the law-breaking publicans, and allowed those of the law-abiding publicans to remain? No, certainly not. I held it to be a perfectly just and wise principle that the inhabitants of a given area should be entitled to say by a large majority that such or such a number of public-houses are enough for the district, and if there were more public-houses than the number voted for, then that the persons to retire should be those who had broken the law. If you deprived those of their licenses who had a certain number of convictions recorded against them I think it would be perfectly just. If there are fifty public-houses in a district and only forty are required, then ten of them ought to be excised, if you can prove that there has been any violation of the law; but if you cannot show that they have broken the law—not as a matter of mere guess or surmise—then I hold that it would be unjust. I think that every man who holds a public-house, especially when he holds it for many years, has a sort of freehold in his business. He is encouraged to sell, however injurious to the public it may be; but it is not injurious to the public for a man to sell good refreshments. But I hold that selling to excess and making a man drunk is a crime of very considerable magnitude against society.

2287. President.] Would you, in the case put by Mr. Hutchison, disqualify the house as well; because to disqualify only the licensee would not be very satisfactory to a local optionist? Yes. That is what I mean.

2288. Mr. Hutchison.] It is admitted that there are more houses than the public require—why should we not do as Mr. Bruce did in 1872, suspend the issue of all new licenses pending a vote of the people, and let that vote be postponed for three years as some compensation to the lessees, and then submit them entirely to the public vote, would that be a fair compensation? I do not know. Of course, by diminishing the number of houses you increase the profits of those that remain, but I should hardly regard that as compensation. I would rather that every publican had a good income. It would not then be so well worth his while to break the law.

2289.] I propose a suspensory Act, under which there shall be no further increase in the number of the houses? The plan you suggest seems to me complicated—I do not understand how it would work.

2290. If it becomes a question of monetary compensation, those who are in favour of local option ask where the money is to come from? A man who has done no wrong should be compensated if his license is taken away. Those who conduct their business properly, as many do, are entitled to compensation. I know a publican not far from me who would not break the law, and who would not allow a man to get drunk on his premises for all that you could give him.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

The Hon. John Macintosh, Esq., M.L.C., called in, sworn, and examined:—

2291. President.] You are a member of the Licensing Board? Yes, I am the Licensing Magistrate for the Metropolitan district.

2292. I presume that you attend all the meetings of the Board? Yes, I have attended pretty regularly since my appointment—four and a half years ago—twice a week almost every week.

2293. Have you read the last annual report of the Inspector-General of Police? Not particularly.

2294. Would you be surprised to hear that the number of apprehensions for drunkenness has increased, although the number of public-houses in the Metropolitan District has slightly diminished? No; I should think that the few houses which have been closed would have no effect upon the number of apprehensions, because they were nearly all in first-class positions, and they were closed in order to make room for some other business. As instances, I may mention the "Emu Inn," Punch's Hotel, at the corner of Pitt and King Streets, and another hotel at the same corner.

2295. Were you an active member of the Magistracy in licensing matters under the old Licensing Act—what used to be called the tipping Act? No, I hardly ever sat upon the Bench on licensing days.

2296. Are you able, notwithstanding that, to express an opinion as to the present licensing system as compared with the former system, which was in vogue down to the year 1881? My opinion is that the present Licensing Act is very far superior to the one which preceded it, but it has brought into existence certain evils which did not exist before, at any rate to the same extent. For instance, take the case of those hotels which give the police the most trouble; they are owned by needy persons who have all that belongs to them hypothecated to money-lenders of one description or another; the Act compelled them to increase their accommodation, but the increased accommodation has not been made to answer what I regard as the legitimate purpose of an hotel, which is to provide a temporary home for travellers, as well as to supply refreshment to those who require it. The reason is, because the extra accommodation has been used to keep permanent lodgers, so that the particular class of houses to which I am referring might rather rather be called licensed boarding-houses than licensed hotels. So far as I can learn, the prices paid by the lodgers are from 15s. to 18s. a week. Well, no one who goes to what is properly called an hotel would get board and lodging temporarily for such prices; he would expect to pay more and get superior accommodation. I have no doubt, however, that the owners of the class of houses of which I speak find that it pays them to take lodgers for 15s. or 18s. a week, because of the trade they do with them and their friends. It is those houses which give the most trouble to the police, and it is almost impossible to obtain a conviction, because when the police are admitted the strangers present are let out by the back way or disposed of somewhere, and those who remain are lodgers, so that although the signs of liquor having been served are apparent enough, there is no evidence upon which a conviction can be obtained. It is from that class of houses that the drunkards come, to a great extent.

2297. Can you tell us where those houses are? They are in all parts of the town, but principally in the back streets in Woolloomooloo and on the roadsides. I have seen people admitted to them on Sundays, in the ordinary way, without the least attempt at concealment; and it cannot be prevented, because the police cannot be everywhere. It would not be right to refuse the publicans a renewal of their licenses—although it is in the discretion of the Magistrates to do so—on mere suspicion, for that is all the evidence against them amounts to, there being no actual proof. The only opportunity the Magistrates have of dealing with them is when, after transferring their license—which is very often done, especially when they have one or two convictions recorded against them—they make application for the transfer of another license to themselves. In such cases the Magistrates refuse to grant the transfer, even though the party applying may have no convictions for an infraction of the Act recorded against him. They consider, on the reports of the police, and sometimes also on the evidence of inhabitants of the locality where the applicant formerly kept a public-house, that he is not a fit person to hold a license. That is the chief means the Licensing Bench has of improving the class of persons who keep public-houses.

2298. To what class of the population do the permanent boarders in public-houses belong? To the operative class, generally speaking.

2300. Then we are to understand that the new Act, in requiring a standard of accommodation, has created a class of people whom you describe as boarders in public-houses, and who occupy the accommodation to the prejudice of the regular travellers? Yes, to a larger extent than prevailed before; because the publicans who carry on that kind of business are mostly needy persons who are indebted to brewers and money-lenders, and they have to exert themselves to the utmost to make ends meet. The same state of things existed under the old Act, but it has been intensified by the present Act, and in my opinion it accounts to a large extent for the statement in the report of the Inspector-General of Police.

2301. Are you able to say whether a larger number of public-houses now belong to brewers in proportion to the total number of public-houses than was the case under the former Licensing Act? I am of opinion that a larger number of public-houses are in the hands of money-lenders now than there were under the old Act. Some of the money-lenders are brewers. It is an evil, or is thought to be an evil, which it would be very difficult to cure or prevent.

2302. Does the brewer absolutely lend money? The brewer leases a house, puts into it a man of no means or comparatively small means, supplies the furniture and the usual stock-in-trade of a publican, and then takes a bill of sale over everything. The bill of sale may remain in force for years, and the publican has to live upon the margin of profit left after paying rent and interest and other expenses. I have no doubt that some of the brewers make an arrangement with the publican that he shall obtain his supplies from them because they have enabled him to start business. But those who assist publicans in this way are not all brewers.

2303. Do you think that this practice or this relation between the publican and the brewer is in itself an evil? It is an evil, but not more an evil than an ordinary money-lender's business.

2304. Is there not a similar practice and relation in other trades; for instance, do not many importers of soft goods and wholesale grocers do the same thing? Not to the same extent, nor is the effort on the part of the shopkeeper so great to make a living as it is on the part of the publican; the former class of persons again do not lease their places of business, nor are they bound to deal with the merchant who has advanced goods to them.

2305. Do you approve of the provisions of the present Act with regard to the accommodation prescribed; for instance, do you agree with that provision which requires stabling to be provided in the city of Sydney? No, I do not think that is necessary, because travellers do not now come to Sydney from the country on horseback, or with a horse and buggy, and there are livery stables for those who want to put up horses. Stabling is not required in either the city or the suburbs, unless it is at first-class family hotels.

2306. And you think that the other accommodation, the number of rooms, in many cases, merely allows the publican to keep boarders? Yes, to a large extent. Looking at the large number of public-houses in Sydney, as compared with the population, one would think that there would be ample accommodation for travellers; but in many cases when a stranger goes to a public-house to ask for accommodation he is told that the place is full—that is because of the lodgers who are there; so that although we have such a large number of public-houses in Sydney there is not sufficient accommodation for travellers.

2307. Can you suggest a remedy for that state of things? It is very hard to suggest a remedy, because a large number of our people desire to obtain refreshment of the spirituous kind, and we know that whenever there is a demand a supply is sure to be forthcoming. It seems to me impossible to keep people out of public-houses on Sundays, because those who are fond of drink will do anything to obtain it, and the necessity of the publican is such that he will do anything to increase his trade. Although, therefore, I am strongly opposed to the sale of liquor on Sunday, I think it would be well to allow public-houses to be open for a couple of hours on that day, and to prohibit the sale of liquor to lodgers as well as to others during the rest of the day.

2308. But if by some means the boarders could be removed; that is to say, if the temptation to keep boarders could be taken away from the publican, you think the present prohibition against Sunday selling would be effective? I would prefer the entire prohibition of Sunday selling which now exists, but I think it is impracticable, because the publican cannot be prevented from keeping lodgers. For instance, two or three score men come to Sydney from the Prospect Reservoir on Friday or Saturday night, and stay at public-houses until Monday or Tuesday. They are lodgers for the time being, and they and their friends will enable the publican to do a roaring trade on Sunday; and at the present time that cannot be prevented.

2309. Do not you think that in a healthy condition of things there would be no boarders—I mean that if there were fewer public-houses, and those of a better class, there would be no necessity to take in boarders? Not if you could keep the publicans to their legitimate business, which, as I understand it, is that of providing a temporary home for travellers.

2310. Has it ever occurred to you that the license fee might be increased with advantage? I have often thought that it might be decreased with advantage in some cases; or are you confining your question to the city of Sydney?

2311. I am speaking of Sydney chiefly? If it were possible, I think some system of classification ought to be adopted with regard to the hotels in Sydney. An hotel like the "Royal Hotel," for example, ought to pay the maximum fee, say £100, and there should be a decreasing scale down to (say) £20. It is not fair to charge all alike. For many country hotels, at some of which I have stayed, I think the £30 license fee is too high. In some of those places the whole stock, including furniture, does not amount to £30, and yet they are respectably conducted and afford excellent accommodation of its kind. If the license fee were lowered for that class of house we should get rid of a great curse in inland towns, the grog shanty. I have seen far more demoralization about the wine-shops in the country than ever I have seen about public-houses.

2312. But there is a low license fee for the wine-shops? Yes, but spirits of the very worst description are sold there. Not more than ten or twelve years ago, at a wine-shop between Gundagai and Yass, I saw a dozen men lying about in as beastly a state as I have seen men in during my life.

2313. Were the spirits there colonial brandies? I did not patronize that particular house—I simply saw the people lying about outside the place. There was a small ditch or dyke near the house. The people were lying about mad drunk, and it was no common spirits which made them drunk. I have witnessed similar scenes in other parts of the country, and there are very many wine-shops where you can get whisky or brandy if you only ask for it in a proper manner.

2314. With regard to the city and suburbs, would it be beneficial to establish houses for the sale of light beer such as lager beer? I have not considered this subject much.

2315. Mere taverns, with no pretence to accommodation, on a low license to supply nothing but light colonial wines or light beer? That idea is now carried out in some of the wine-shops; for instance, the holder of a wine license frequently is the keeper of a lodging-house. Foreigners, of whom there are large numbers in Sydney, especially Italians and Frenchmen, not only keep a wine license, but they also provide lodgings for their countrymen; and in my experience I have not found them a well-conducted class. These people will not work at manual labour; they obtain their livelihood as hawkers or wine-sellers, and many devote themselves to gambling.

2316. What is your opinion of the local option provisions of the Licensing Act in their practical effect? There has been no effect whatever of any significance; neither in the city nor in the suburbs have the people, as a whole, been earnest in this matter, and unless there be some special reason—unless there be some popular man who wants to get a license for a house—the people will not really take the trouble to vote on local option in municipal elections; and even then the owner of the house must exert himself in bringing up as many voters as possible, in order to give some assurance that an increase in the number of public-houses is required. Altogether the people have given very little attention to this question, and in many instances the persons who do vote for an alderman do not take the trouble to vote on local option at all. Then, again, the vote, such as it is, encourages the Magistrates in their efforts to prevent any increase in the number of houses in some of the wards. Where there is no aldermanic election in a ward the people trouble themselves but to a very little extent to vote on this question. And it must be borne in mind that it is only one class of persons who have a vote. The franchise is confined to the householder, leaseholder, and owner; and where the landlord happens to pay the tax himself or hands it over to the Town Clerk, the name of the householder does not appear on the roll, and of course he has no vote; so it is hardly fair to judge of the effect of the local option vote until you have the same franchise as in the Parliamentary elections.

2317. Then you think that if the range of voters were increased there would be more enthusiasm in the matter? Not unless facilities were given to the people to vote. I am afraid, unless they were run up in a cab, that not many people would lose an hour's work to record their vote. You must provide a way for them to register their votes at not the least inconvenience to themselves. I do not think that many will vote until it is made compulsory; in some countries it is compulsory, and those who do not vote are fined.

2318. Suppose they could vote against the renewal of houses, would they roll up? No. There is only one class of people—possibly slightly increasing every year, but increasing very slowly—who, seeing the evils of the drink traffic, would vote.

2319. Are you in favour of local option as a principle? Yes, if the adult population had the franchise; at the same time I do not think it is proper or just that a section of the people should have the power to say there shall be no more public-houses in their ward or in their county. We must consider the interests of the country as a whole, and it might be necessary for the accommodation of travellers, and there should be houses in that particular ward just as houses are required in the interior for the convenience of the people in that ward. It does not rest on the people of a ward to say that there shall be no renewal of licenses there. I hold that the vote should not be taken in such small areas as wards, but rather in counties or in large districts. It is one of the greatest evils which prevails that the vote is taken in small districts.

2320. You think, then, that those who reside in the neighbourhood of Petty's Hotel, or Pfahler's Hotel, should not be allowed to say that those hotels should not be there for the accommodation of persons travelling by sea or rail to this city? I do not think that they should have this power; I think that the County of Cumberland should have the power to decide a question of this sort, for it is a national matter.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

The Hon. John Macintosh, M.L.C., called in and re-examined:—

The Hon.
J. Macintosh,
Esq., M.L.C.

17 May, 1886.

2321. President.] A recent Licensing Act constituted for the Metropolitan Police District a Court of seven; a large number of duties and powers were conferred upon that Court; the Amending Act gave a large number of those powers to licensing Magistrates: do you consider the change a beneficial one? Yes; I think the Amending Act gave considerable facility for getting through the business; for instance, offences could be tried as they arose, and could be dealt with among the offences of the day.
2322. Then you do not agree with some critics of the Amending Act who declare that it was a step in the wrong direction? No.
2323. You hold the reverse view? Yes; there could be no difference in the adjudication, and it facilitated the business of the Courts.
2324. The Amending Act of 1883 abolished the power of disqualifying a licensed house—do you consider that a good provision? It was a very good provision in so far as it gave a discretionary power to the Magistrates. The disqualifications arose chiefly through the tenants conducting their houses in an improper or an illegal manner. They were called upon to show cause after three convictions why the license should not be cancelled. This class of cases now comes into the category of new licenses: the decision is discretionary with the Magistrates. But there is no disqualification of the premises. If a case is flagrantly bad the Bench can disqualify a house. Frequently the license is transferred to another person, and that has a good effect in many cases, because many landlords are introducing clauses into their leases to the effect that upon the complaint of an Inspector or upon conviction the lease shall be cancelled. Although the disqualification of the house is taken away, there is yet sufficient discretion, in my opinion, in the hands of the Bench.
2325. Some witnesses before the Commission have spoken regretfully of the repeal of this portion of section 73, and have expressed a desire that it should be restored to the Act: I gather from your evidence that you are opposed to the restoration of that provision? I do not consider it necessary, seeing that the Bench has a discretionary power.
2326. But, in the case of houses practically belonging to brewers, they would have to be very careful as to the persons to whom they let their houses if such a provision were in existence? It may be so. A case occurred at Darling Harbour not long since. The license was cancelled, the house belonging to a gentleman who did not reside on it. The house remained unlicensed for upwards of twelve months. Only very recently the owner of the premises was granted a license, which he has now transferred to a most respectable man, and there is a clause introduced into the lease to the effect that no brewer shall have anything to do with the house. If the inspector lodges a complaint against the conduct of the house the lease is to be cancelled.
2327. I want to ascertain your opinion upon the question as to the interest held by brewers in licensed houses—first of all, whether you think it is an advantage to the community or to the licensee or not, and then as to the results of the system? My opinion of the system is that it is a bad one. But it will be very difficult to break through. It has prevailed in the mother country for a very long time; in Sydney also for a considerable period. In this connection I should prefer to use the term money-lenders instead of brewers, because there are many persons who are not brewers who have an interest in public-houses. These persons make a trade of buying the furniture, stock-in-trade, and license of a public-house and leasing the premises. These persons sometimes hold half a dozen houses. They select as good men as they can get to take the houses; but generally speaking they are needy men—men who, in my opinion, are not at all fitted to keep an hotel. The men are of good character in the ordinary sense of the term—the police make inquiries and find that they have committed no crime—still, considering that an hotel should be a home for the traveller, and that any amount of property should be considered thoroughly safe in the custody of the publican, I do not think these men are fitted to be hotel-keepers; especially seeing that many of these persons connected with money-lenders make their hotels common lodging-houses. They have lodgers at the rate of from 15s. to 18s. per week; and although the persons who pay this rate may be as a rule of good character, there are nevertheless individuals who frequent these houses who have not the best of characters, and who have a lot of companions of the same order. The licensee has to pay a high rent, and he has very little or any capital of his own. In order to recoup himself, therefore, for the high rent, he commits offences against the Act which publicans in a better position would not commit. Most of the offences tried at the police office are by the class of persons I mention—that is a very large proportion of them.
2328. Mr. Abigail.] There can be no doubt then that you are opposed to brewers being permitted to hold any interest in public-houses? Not more so than other persons who are quite as objectionable—wine and spirit merchants for instance.
2329. Then I will apply the question to any persons engaged in the wholesale trade of liquor? I am opposed to that; but I am just as much opposed to other classes of persons trafficking in public-houses.
2330. Do you know that a large number of public-houses are in the hands of brewers? I know it positively.
2331. And you think that it is productive of great evil? I think it tends to a larger proportion of infractions of the law than we should have if the men keeping hotels were men of better means, and would not stoop to selling during prohibited hours.
2332. The brewers place men without means into their houses for the purpose of distributing their liquor? The public-house interest is quite a trade to certain persons.
2333. Do you think that if a brewer puts a man into a public-house, he will allow that man to go elsewhere for the liquor he requires? It is contrary to human nature to expect so.
2334. You say you think there will be some difficulty in curing this state of things: do you know that the Victorian Act recently passed has a clause in reference to this very matter? I have not seen the Victorian Act, but I feel positive that whatever Act may be passed it would be evaded.

2335. Do you know that in Victoria it is a misdemeanour for a brewer to have control of any public-houses? It might be a misdemeanour, and the punishment may be very heavy, but I feel certain that whatever punishment may be enacted, the Act would be evaded. That has been proved in the older countries.

The Hon.
J. Macintosh,
Esq., M.L.C.

17 May, 1886.

2336. Do you think the Act would be evaded to any appreciable extent? Yes.

2337. To the extent of perhaps forty and sixty cases in three months? The trade would take another channel.

2339. But if it could be carried out it would be beneficial? Yes.

2340. I understand you to say that you are in favour of the amending Act? Yes, so far as it goes; I do not think there is anything very much to be complained of in the Act.

2341. Are you aware that, under that Act, when one or two convictions have been secured against the holder of a license he transfers it to some one else in order to avoid the forfeiture of the license? Yes, in numbers of cases; but the publican who transfers under those circumstances is very seldom granted a license again. In my opinion this has the effect of improving the class of persons. When a man transfers his license, we almost invariably get in his place a man without blemish.

2342. Do I understand you to say that the Licensing Bench receive objections other than actual convictions? The Inspector is compelled by the Act to report upon each application. He may report, for instance, that a crowd of persons have been seen going in and out of the house on Sunday, and that touters have been employed, but that it has been impossible to obtain a conviction. That is one of the objections frequently urged against persons who have transferred their houses, even without a conviction, and the Bench has almost invariably refused a license. There is discretion with reference to the granting of a license, but, in regard to renewals, a refusal is not practically discretionary. In the cases to which I have referred, in which there were no convictions, we felt morally certain that the law had been infringed, but there was simply suspicion to go upon, and we thought that it would be a disastrous innovation to refuse a man a license upon suspicion.

2343. Suppose an inspector were to make a report of the kind you have named, would the Bench consider an objection of that kind? They cannot act upon it. We attempted to act upon our moral convictions. The matter was taken into consideration by the Bench, and some correspondence took place with the Minister of Justice. The Bench thought it a dangerous innovation to refuse the renewal of a license upon suspicion that the law had been infringed.

2344. Do I understand you to say that a communication was made from the Minister of Justice to the Bench as to how they should administer the Act in this particular? I think so—I think about two years back.

2345. Did it not set forth that the Bench had no power to refuse a renewal upon grounds other than a conviction? The police filed a large number of objections, such as you have stated; we were about to act upon them, but after consideration we found that it would be illegal to do so.

2346. Does not the 5th sub-section of sec. 10 of the principal Act give the Court full power to decide upon objections? The police having no convictions, the Bench desire to carry out not only the letter but the spirit of the Act, but they did not feel justified in refusing a renewal when there was no conviction.

2347. But when there has been one conviction the Bench has given effect to objections of this character? Not in the case of one conviction. The Act says two or three, and we must construe the amending Act as liberalizing the principal Act, because it obliterated the convictions which had been obtained prior to its passing.

2348. Last week yourself and Mr. Marsh had cases of this kind under consideration and you said that you would reconsider them if further application were made;—have you any recollection of what actually took place? It was brought under the notice of the Bench that several public-houses in Sydney had two, three, or more bars upon their premises. Some houses had actually a bar in each street, the bar fronting the principal street being connected with the second bar by a sub-way. One license was sufficient for the two. Then there are other houses which have bars up-stairs. They are out of sight, and the young men who frequent them remain there a considerable time. I am not at all certain that their morals are in any way improved. Most of these houses have billiards and other games which are harmless in themselves; yet young men are enticed away from home, and their morals are not improved. These bars are not opened on to the street, and they are one of the main causes of young men going wrong to the extent they do.

2349. These bars are presided over by females? Yes.

2350. Mr. Davies.] What, in your opinion, has been the effect of the new Act? I think it has effected considerable improvement. It is an advantage to have the administration of the law placed in the hands of a small body of Magistrates, because they become better acquainted with those who keep public-houses and those who are applicants for licenses than the Bench under the old system used to be.

2351. Then you are in favour of the present constitution of the Licensing Board? Yes.

2352. And you consider it a great improvement on the former system? I do; because under the old system the publicans used to beat up Magistrates on one side, and the abstainers used to beat them up on the other, so that they generally consisted of what may be termed two parties. I do not think that any of the Magistrates who now compose the Bench have a particle of feeling one way or the other—their only desire is to administer the law for the benefit of the public.

2353. I presume, from previous answers that you have given, that the Bench are perfectly aware of the fact that in many cases brewers and wine and spirit merchants have control over licensed houses? The fact occasionally crops up in connection with transfers; sometimes a postponement is applied for because the terms have not been arranged. The Bench are perfectly cognizant of the fact, but hardly in an official manner.

2354. Have not objections frequently been filed by the police against an applicant, on the ground that he is the dummy of a brewer or wine and spirit merchant? There have been such cases, but not a large number.

2355. And have not the Licensing Bench in every case in which such an objection has been filed granted a transfer? No.

The Hon.
J. Macintosh,
Esq., M.L.C.

2356. Can you mention a case in which it has been refused? I cannot mention one; but that is only one objection. I am perfectly certain that transfers have been refused to persons against whom that objection has been filed; not that objection alone, but that among others. Where the objections have been overruled there have no doubt been reasons for overruling them. Besides, it is not illegal to stock a public-house or to lend money on it.

2357. But does it not defeat one of the provisions of the Act, when two convictions have been obtained against a publican, for a brewer's dummy to be put forward to obtain a transfer of the license? No case has come before the Bench in which a dummy has been put forward. There are a good many of the class of what I call needy persons, and I may know privately that they are dummies, but I have no official knowledge of it. Their characters are good, and the Bench have no right to make further inquiries.

2358. Have not the police inspectors frequently given evidence that an applicant for a transfer was simply a brewer's dummy? Not frequently. There have been one or two instances, but I am not aware that ever a license was granted to a person whom the police swore to be a brewer's dummy.

2359. Have you any recollection of a case in which a license has been refused under circumstances of that kind? I cannot particularize any case; the cases are so numerous, and no record is kept of the evidence; but in the cases in which licenses have been granted in spite of objections, there may have been sufficient reasons for overruling the objections.

2361. But are you not of opinion that the object of the transfer is simply to defeat the spirit and intention of the principal Act? There is no doubt of it; but then you must bear in mind that the police are glad to get rid of the man who has infringed the law and to get a better man in his place. If, when a publican applies to have his license transferred, the police at the same time call upon him to show cause why his license should not be cancelled, the Bench invariably hear the case of the police first, and if the license be cancelled, of course there is nothing to transfer.

2362. You have said already that the fear of forfeiture of the license has a greater influence in compelling obedience to the law than any other penalty? Yes, but the other penalties are very heavy; they amount to £3, £4, and £5.

2363. But they are nothing compared to the power of forfeiture? No, because forfeiture involves a very heavy loss of rent and the risk of a loss of capital, both to the publicans themselves and to those they are connected with.

2364. What is your opinion of the amending Act as compared with the principal Act? I think that the amending Act, so far as it goes, is an improvement on the principal Act.

2365. Has it assisted to make the administration of the law more efficient? Yes; formerly, no offence under the Act could be tried but by the Licensing Magistrates, but now they are tried like ordinary offences which come before the Stipendiary Magistrates.

2366. Do you think that is an advantage? It must be an advantage, both to offenders and to the conduct of business in the Courts.

2367. But do you think that it is an advantage to the public, whose interests are more concerned than those of any individual? I do not think that the public are injured in any way. The Stipendiary Magistrates constitute the Bench in both cases. I do not see that the morals of the people have suffered in any way by the change; an infringement of the Act has now become what may be termed a general offence.

2368. As to the morals of the people not suffering, are you aware that the convictions for crime and drunkenness have increased since the passing of the principal Licensing Act? I do not think that the passing of any Act will have the effect of lessening the number of convictions. I explained this day week that, in my opinion, one of the causes of the increase of drunkenness is to be found in that provision of the Act which compelled publicans to increase their accommodation; because, in order to make use of the extra accommodation, many hotels have been turned into common lodging-houses, and the lodgers and their friends have probably added to the number of offenders. In this state of things, if we had six times the number of police we now have, it would be impossible to prevent the sale of liquor on Sundays.

2369. You are aware that there are fewer public-houses now in the Metropolitan District than there were under the old Act? Yes, but the public-houses which have been closed have been mostly good houses which never gave any trouble to the police. They occupied important sites, such as street-corners, and the sites have been acquired for other purposes by companies and syndicates. Very few new public-houses have been licensed, because a license now is worth four or five times its nominal value. There is a good-will now attaching to a house, without counting either stock or furniture. If a conditional license is granted for a house on a certain piece of land, that land immediately increases in value.

2371. You are aware, I presume, that during the first year of its operation the Licensing Act was very rigidly administered, both by the Bench and by the police? I am aware that it was considered to be very stringently administered; I do not know that it was. People had not then got into the way of evading it, as they have done since.

2372. Well, as to Sunday trading, the provision on that subject seems, from the evidence we have already had, to be a dead letter? It is difficult to obtain convictions for Sunday selling, because liquor may be consumed in public-houses by the inmates. Besides that, it is difficult to obtain proof of illegal selling.

Some

Some public-houses which do a roaring trade on Sunday will have as many as three touters—one up on a verandah, another inside the door, and a third on the pavement. The police are well known, and as soon as one of them is seen approaching, warning is given, and all signs of drinking are cleared away. With the limited powers they at present possess it is almost impossible for the police to prove a case.

The Hon.
J. Macintosh,
Esq., M.L.C.

17 May, 1886.

2373. But the Bench, I understand, refuse to convict even when the police prove that fifty or sixty people have been seen entering and leaving a public-house? The Bench have never refused to convict when it has been proved that persons have been seen drinking in a public-house or bringing drink away with them.

2374. But we have the statements of the superior officers of police that the Bench have refused to convict, although they have had evidence that seventy, eighty, and even one hundred people have been seen going in and out, simply because no one had been seen drinking? The Bench can only follow the law.

2375. But there is no evidence stronger than circumstantial evidence? The Bench are of opinion that it must be proved that people have been drinking.

2376. But if people are seen coming out of a public-house wiping their mouths, and in such large numbers, surely that is strong evidence? The fact of a person wiping his mouth is no proof that he has been drinking. For instance, a person will sometimes go into a public-house and bring out a bottle full of water, in order to annoy the police, and a person might wipe his mouth for the same reason. I think you are casting unmerited blame upon the Bench. If you wish to make it an offence for a man to be seen leaving a public-house wiping his mouth, or for a number of persons to be seen leaving a public-house, you must alter the law so as to meet the case.

2377. But one of the strongest proofs that you can obtain against a disorderly house is that persons of bad repute are seen going into or leaving it? A publican is a citizen as well as other people, and you cannot prevent people from going to see him or his lodgers. You must make that penal if you want to obtain a conviction, otherwise than on proof that persons have been drinking in the house.

2378. Well, we have had evidence of such a case as this:—A number of persons have been seen drinking in a public-house bar on Sunday; the police lay an information against the publican, and then the persons who were seen drinking come forward and swear that they were not there drinking at all, in direct opposition to the evidence of the police, and the Bench in that case also dismiss the information? That may be; policemen are not always the best of characters. It would be very hard to convict on the evidence of one or two policemen when a dozen persons, some of them respectable, swore that they were not drinking. No doubt the policemen may be speaking the truth, but we must go by the law of evidence. In some cases I would believe the police in preference to civilians, and in other cases I would believe civilians in preference to the police. Each case must be decided on its own merits.

2379. Would it not be prima facie against a publican that men were in his bar? You cannot convict a man on prima facie evidence—you must have proof of the commission of the offence.

2380. Then, so far as Sunday trading is concerned the law is defective? The law is such that it can be tolerably easily evaded by publicans and by those who frequent their houses on Sundays.

2381. Have you any idea what proportion of the 822 publicans in the metropolitan area obey the law? A large proportion of them have never been prosecuted; and, as far as my observation extends, a large number close their houses entirely on Sunday; in fact they conduct their hotels exactly as other people conduct their business. There are others again to whom Sunday is their best day. I have heard, for example, that in Woolloomooloo where one publican evades the law and does a roaring trade on Sunday other publicans in the neighbourhood are stimulated to do the same. The fact is, in many cases that if a publican will not serve on Sunday people will not go to him on Saturday, so that he is compelled to break the law.

2382. Have you seen the report of the Inspector-General of Police for last year? I have glanced at it.

2383. Have you seen that out of 822 publicans only 193 observe the law? That is a matter of suspicion only, not of proof.

2384. But the Inspector-General bases the statement on the reports of his officers? I do not consider that all reports are true. If there are only 193 publicans out of 822 who observe the law I think it is a reflection upon the manner in which the police discharge their duty.

2385. In one paragraph of his report the Inspector-General says this:—

“The law prohibiting Sunday trading is extensively and systematically evaded, and such precautions are taken as render detection and prosecution by ordinary methods a matter of extreme difficulty. The police officers in charge of the various divisions have supplied me with information—which I believe to be thoroughly reliable—from which I learn that out of the 822 holders of publicans’ licenses in the Metropolitan District, only 193 observe the law by closing their houses for the sale of liquor to customers, other than lodgers, on Sundays.”

You do not believe that? I should require some proof of it. The Inspector-General of Police is an excellent officer, and no doubt desiring to see an improvement in the law he has put the case as strongly as he could, but it is merely a matter of opinion—there is no proof.

2386. Are you in favour of the absolute closing of public-houses on Sundays? Unless the law is to be made more effective, I think it would be better to allow the public-houses to be opened for an hour on Sunday, and to compel them to be absolutely closed during the remainder of the day against lodgers as well as against the public.

2387. Then you would simply revert to the old law, which allowed public-houses to be open from 1 o’clock until 3 on Sunday? I think from 1 to 3 would be too long; I think one hour would be sufficient, say from 1 to 2, so as not to infringe upon the church hours.

2388. Are you aware of the large amount of drunkenness that resulted from the old law? Yes.

2389. And of the large number of arrests which used to be made on Sunday in consequence of the public-houses being open? Yes, but they were open at night, and the law was not so stringent then as it is now, neither were the punishments so severe. A publican could infringe the law many times, and only be fined half-a-crown or 5s., especially if he could beat up a Bench to try the case.

2390. Have you heard any clamour on the part of the people for the opening of public-houses on Sunday? I have heard some express a desire to see them opened, and I have heard others again say that they would not care if all the public-houses in the country were shut. But the public-house interest, I may say, is a matter of great indifference to the people generally—you cannot get them to give definite and decided opinions with regard to it. You will find even total abstainers opposing a public-house one day, and another day speaking in favour of one. You cannot even get people to go and record their votes for or against public-houses, so that the Bench are left a great deal to their own judgment.

The Hon. J.
Macintosh,
Esq., M.L.C.

17 May, 1886.

2391. What is the general character and conduct of the people now on Sundays as compared with their character and conduct under the old law? I think, upon the whole, that there is an improvement.

2392. Is there much difference noticeable? Yes.

2393. Any very great change? There has been a considerable change for the better in the moral tone of the people. The publicans themselves—I refer to what may be termed the hotel-keepers—are much improved, but the common lodging-houses are quite as loosely conducted at the present time as they were in those days.

2394. Do you see now anything like the drunkenness which we used to see under the old law, when the houses were open on Sunday? No, I think that the morality of the people generally has improved several degrees since the present Act was passed in 1882.

2395. You have a firm conviction that this Act was a step in the right direction, and conferred a great boon upon society? Yes.

2396. What is the general character of the people who are to be seen in the city now any evening after the houses are closed? Very much the same as formerly—there is not a vast deal of difference; an occasional drunkard may be seen, as in the olden times. On the whole, I think that an improvement has been effected, chiefly by the higher moral standard of the people. Just as much spirits and liquors are consumed per head now as was ever consumed in the Colony. I have not seen any statistics; I simply form my opinion as I pass through society.

2397. Would you advocate extended hours of sale on week-days? I would shorten the time of sale by an hour if I exercised despotic power.

2398. Would it be to the interest of the people to shorten the hours? I think so; it would be to the interest of the people to abolish public-houses and do away with grog altogether, and if we fixed the hour of closing at 10 o'clock, we would shorten the time in which the weak could be tempted.

2399. It would be an advantage to close at 10 o'clock? There could be no injury, and I think that it would be an assistance to those who are easily tempted to go into hotels.

2400. Is there as much open drunkenness now as under the old law? I have already stated that the moral standard of the people has been raised a little. There is not the open drunkenness—the open squalidness generally which prevailed some years ago, and amongst drinkers I notice an improvement too, but at the police offices quite as many persons are convicted, perhaps twelve times during a year. These drunkards go to gaol—many of them purposely—to recover from a spree. They are better treated there than they would be outside. Many are loafers; they loaf upon the people during the week, and a glass or two of grog soon affects them, and it inevitably results in their being boarded free for a month or two. I think that if they were not so well looked after, clothed and fed in gaol as they are, they would have some dread of being sent there; at the present time they have no dread whatever of going there. I have seen Black Maria discharge a load of a dozen or more inside the gaol, and they step out of the cage just as if they were stepping out of a carriage at their own door. I can always tell a stranger—a man who is convicted for the first time—for he looks about him. The old hands, however, just step airily down the stair as if they were in their own house—they do not show the least concern, and I have no doubt that the Magistrates consider that they are inflicting severe punishment when they send them there. I find that the drunkards are under the impression that the Bench shows them a considerable amount of kindness in giving them long sentences, which means to them simply the putting in of so much of their time in very favourable lodgings.

2401. What remedy would you suggest in order to remove the defects in the present law in regard to Sunday closing? It is a difficult question to deal with, because in order to get at the particular class of law-breakers the publicans, unlike any other tradesman, must be placed under a ban. His house would require to be opened instantly to the police, and the portion of his premises which is licensed must be under a ban so far that no spirituous liquors whatever shall be drunk there by any one, no matter whether they be lodgers or visitors, during prohibited hours. That would be one remedy, but whether Parliament would enact such a law I don't know. The publican should be under a ban so far that no visitor should be allowed into any portion of the house which is licensed, and the bar should be absolutely kept shut during those hours.

2402. Would you assimilate our law to the English Act, so far as putting the onus of proof upon the publican? I am not familiar with the English law. No law that Parliament can enact will stop drinking habits to any large extent. It is the moral sentiment of the people themselves—their abhorrence of the custom which will put down drunkenness; and so long as the publican does not lose caste among the people by any infringement of statute law there will be very little improvement whatever. The moral law will have a far more beneficial effect upon the conduct of publicans than the statute law.

2403. You are of opinion that the more numerous the publicans are, and the greater the facilities for drinking, drunkenness will be encouraged and increased? Many publicans possess the quality of gathering round them persons, and thereby they induce drinking habits among the people.

2404. If we had twice as many public-houses would there be increased drunkenness? I do not think that it would increase much, and only a few publicans would derive much benefit from the extension. One great evil at the present time is the necessity to keep so many rooms. In places where lodgings for working-men are not required these rooms are kept quite empty; in other places the people are packed several in a room; these houses are not hotels, but merely licensed common lodging-houses.

2405. Are you aware that the greater the facilities are for drinking, the greater the drinking, the drunkenness, and the crime? No.

2406. You are not aware? I do not think it follows that if the public-houses were trebled it would bring about an increase in our drinking customs. Only certain individuals would get the trade, and we know that every tradesman endeavours to get as much custom as he can, and the principal effect from any increase would be increased drinking habits among the publicans who canvassed for custom. I do not think that this question should be taken into consideration at all. The spirit of the law is to license public-houses and to endeavour to lessen the drinking habits, and this has been carried out as far as the law will allow by the Stipendiary Magistrates.

2407. As the spirit and intention of the law is to lessen the drinking habits and customs of society and clearly to lessen the number of public-houses, does it not follow that if we increase the trade there will be greater facilities for drinking and for the commission of crime? I say that if publicans were to increase largely in number and canvass for custom, then probably the drinking habits of the people would increase.

2408. Do not you recognize that the publican follows a very exceptional trade, requiring special regulation? It is an exceptional trade. An hotelkeeper ought to have a tolerable amount of capital and keep a good house, and I say that it is the endeavour of the Bench, as far as in them lies, to create this class of public-house. I have known the Bench to grant a conditional license simply because the house is of a good class, with twenty or thirty rooms, in localities where possibly some persons would hold that no house was required. The bar alone will not support such a house—it must be a thorough hotel.

The Hon.
J. Macintosh,
Esq., M.L.C.
17 May, 1886.

2409. I presume that no man in the community is better aware than yourself that the drink traffic is the source of all kinds of mischief to society—drunkenness, misery, and crime? It is a source of very great evil to society, but not so much as you imply. I know that many of our greatest criminals are most temperate persons; and I know too that very many of them have never drunk any intoxicating liquor at all.

2410. I think you will find that the percentage is very small? I know very well that the percentage of temperate criminals is considerable. I have had a good deal to do with prisoners during the last ten or twelve years; and living as I do, near a Temperance Hall, I have invariably asked them whether they would take the pledge before they left for the country, and frequently they have told me that they had never drunk any liquor in their lives, nor did they appear to be persons who would drink, and they generally had a little money in their pockets. A few shillings or pounds, according to the length of their service and their disposition to reform, are generally given them upon their release from gaol. A number have taken the pledge at the Temperance Hall, but a large number stated to me that they never had been drunkards, and I also know that many of our young larrikin rascals are not drunkards.

2411. Is there not a large amount of drinking and drunkenness among our young people at the present time? A large number are addicted to the habit of drinking, but the greater proportion of the worst characters among our young men are not drinkers at all, though they indulge in other equally evil propensities.

2412. Is not drunkenness increasing among our young lads and girls from sixteen years up to twenty years of age? Some years ago when I used to sit on the Bench very regularly I found that drinking habits were practised by quite young people—boys and girls under twenty years of age; in fact the great bulk of our criminals are young.

2413. You are not in a position to speak authoritatively as to what is going on now? No. I notice that when the coach is shooting its cargo of criminals into Darlinghurst Gaol, the larger proportion are by no means young; they are simply the old Johnny Warder lot, who go there just as gladly as we go to our homes, and I believe that is the only home which many of them have. I am inclined to think that if the discipline were more stringent many of these people would endeavour to avoid a visit to the gaol.

2414. The drunkards you speak of and these Johnny Warders would not be able to sustain in their present style the 822 public-houses we have in the metropolitan area? The Johnny Warder lot do not sustain many houses; they loaf upon others, and though they are not large contributors to the support of publicans their short-comings figure very largely in the reports of the Inspector-General of Police.

2415. The same persons are convicted frequently? Yes.

2416. What is your opinion on the question of local option? I am in favour of local option, but I do not believe in the kind which prevails here now. It seems to me that a small body of people—a clique—can secure a vote either for or against any extension of the liquor traffic. A ward represents but a small area, and in my experience I have seen several wards worked in this way to obtain a public-house, and I have also known three or four individuals to work other wards to prevent the introduction of another public-house. If two or three energetic individuals take it into their heads to prevent any new houses being opened in a ward they will succeed; and again, two or three energetic publicans can be just as successful in running up voters to vote for an increase in the number of houses. I do not think that the local option vote is of much use at all at the present time. The opposition is given not to a principle but to one or two individual publicans. Much trouble is gone to in order to prevent a certain publican obtaining a license, and equal zeal is shown on the other side to obtain a license. I hold that the voting power should be exercised by the whole adult population, and I would even go so far as to give a vote to every male and female above the age of twenty-one years. The vote should be taken, not in wards, but either in police districts or in electoral areas.

2417. Then I understand that you transmit the power to control the liquor traffic from the Bench to the people? No; the people have the power now in a certain form, because the Bench has never, to my knowledge, accepted an application to increase the number of houses in any locality where the vote was given in the negative.

2418. Are you willing to transmit from the Bench to the people the right to control the liquor traffic? It is in the hands of the people now.

2419. But not in the extended form you have foreshadowed? The Bench has no power whatever; it has simply to administer the Act, and if the vote was against any increase then it does not entertain any application for a license.

2420. I am asking your opinion, not as a Magistrate, but as a prominent citizen—Are you in favour of transmitting the control of this traffic from the Bench to the people in the extended form you have described? I am in favour of local option, and would extend the franchise, so far as this traffic is concerned, to the adult population, and enlarge the districts, so that a clique of a few individuals could not bring about a vote either for or against any increase in the number of houses. I would also make it imperative, except under excusable circumstances, that every vote be registered.

2421. What has made licensed houses so valuable, so far as bonuses are concerned—the principle of local option? No; local option has had very little to do up to the present moment with either the increase or decrease of public-houses. The Act itself is of a restrictive character. The spirit of the people, the spirit of Parliament, was to decrease the number of houses, and the spirit has been given expression to by the Bench as far as the law allows. Our population has increased during the last four or five years; it has spread itself from the city into new localities, and thereby it has lessened the number of public-houses in the city. For instance, as soon as twenty or thirty families locate themselves in a new suburb a public-house is required for the accommodation of the general public. It is argued in favour of such applications that it is out of the question to go to such a locality, because you can get neither refreshment nor a bed. If the Bench approve of the class of house for which a license is asked, and think that it is not likely to become a drinking evil, it grants a conditional license.

2422. But where the local option vote is taken and the people declare against any more public-houses, the law provides that the Bench shall have no discretion in the matter except in regard to very large hotels with twenty or thirty rooms? The Bench is guided largely by the police reports in dealing with these applications;

The Hon.
J. Macintosh,
Esq., M.L.C.

applications; I have never known the Inspectors of Police to report in favour of any increase; and if the police report is confirmed by the evidence of the people in the neighbourhood, and no one testifies in favour of the applicants the application is almost invariably refused. At the present time petitions are got up both for and against an application; occasionally the Bench notices that a petition bears the handwriting of but one person, and sometimes signatures which are attached to a petition in opposition to the application appear also on the petition which is presented in its favour; in fact the Bench is inclined to think that the same petition is presented over and over again under a different heading; these petitions are regarded with great circumspection by the Bench.

2423. This would not apply where the local option vote is affirmed by the people in favour of a new license, except in a very exceptional case? Yes; it does not follow that because the vote is in favour of an increase that the Bench will grant a new license.

2424. If the people have affirmed that they want no more public-houses has the Bench any discretion in dealing with ordinary applications? I have explained that the Bench has never entertained an application unless the house is of a superior quality, and meets all the requirements of the Act in respect of the number of rooms.

2425. That is an exceptional case? Yes. If there is a fair justification to grant a new license in a locality, and the house itself is a really good one, the Bench almost invariably favours the application.

2426. Mr. Colls.] Is it only since this Commission commenced to sit that these up-stairs bars have been brought under your notice? No.

2427. Are you aware that the persons who sell spirits in them are not licensed? No; I am not aware that any plaint has been filed against them for keeping these bars—the police think that it is doubtful whether they can obtain a conviction. I think that it was on the last occasion when a member of the Commission—Mr. Hutchison I think—was present in the Court-house, the Bench stated that the police had no right to consider what the Bench would do in respect of such a plaint—that if the police considered that any infringement of the Act had taken place, the information ought to be filed, and when it was brought before them they would deal with it according to law, and that the police had no right to prejudice their action.

2428. Have there been informations laid against those bars to your knowledge? Not to my knowledge.

2429. Are you aware that the character of the parties taking the bars is not questioned—that it is merely a matter of rent? It has transpired when cases came before the Courts. In a case in Lower George-street a bar was let off, I think, at a rent of £6 a week. I should not be at all surprised if the publicans let their bars at so much a week, or so much a year.

2430. Was the bar you refer to on the basement or up-stairs? On the basement.

2431. Of course that is not legitimate business? I only speak now as a matter of surmise, not as to absolute facts.

2432. Have there been cases in which receipts have been produced, intended to show that the person conducting the bar receives wages? That would be done I have no doubt. The number of methods of evading the law, which come to light in the Courts, would surprise any one.

2433. Are you not under the impression that those bars should be done away with, and no others allowed except on the basement? I think that each case should be dealt with on its own merits; I might mention a house in Lower George-street in which there was a bar on the basement, and a very large dining-room on a level with the next street—that being higher up, and on that floor also there was a bar. About a hundred persons dined there every day, and I have no doubt that that bar was of very great convenience. The bars that I complain of are bars in connection with amusements such as billiards and bagatelle. Young men frequent those bars and lose their characters.

2434. Do you think it advisable that there should not be a second bar in any hotel unless it was granted by the Licensing Bench? I think each house ought to be dealt with on its merits. There must be a large amount of discretion left to the Bench.

2435. The Bench should have power to allow bars to be opened on any floor? Yes, as long as the police can obtain admission. The houses should be reported upon by the police.

2436. We are all agreed that they are a great evil? I am of opinion that they are a great evil, though some may be a convenience.

2437. How would you deal with houses that cannot accommodate families and travellers—would you allow them to have a general license or merely a beer and wine license? They are not hotels; a common lodging-house is not what is generally known as an hotel.

2438. We are told that not 6 per cent. of the houses in any ward of Sydney will accommodate travellers? I do not suppose there are more than 6 per cent. that do. Of course Petty's, Pfahlert's, and the Royal are hotels in the proper sense of the term. There are other hotels in which they keep lodgers and sell liquor. In the hotels I have mentioned the bar trade is of very little importance. I dare say that the proprietors would be inclined to give it up if they could.

2439. I should like you to suggest some remedy for those small places that do not accommodate the public at all. It is a question that would have to be dealt with very tenderly. There is a large amount of capital invested in the liquor traffic; the houses are built for a particular purpose, and heavy rents are paid for them. Unless the matter were dealt with in a wise, prudent, and moderate manner, people would become indignant at what they would deem an injustice, and more harm than good would be done. The reaction would carry us backward instead of forward. It is a difficult question to deal with. Take the hotels in the southern end of the town—they are suitable for the accommodation of bushmen—and a great many bushmen, and men working on railways and waterworks find their way to Sydney, owing to the great facilities of transit—these people have as much right to accommodation as any other class—I have often thought that there is no particular reason why these houses of accommodation should be licensed to sell spirits—a wine and beer license would suit houses of that class. Perhaps we might allow existing houses a certain time, and then reduce the number of the houses holding general licenses. The difficulty, however, would be to decide where to draw the line. We are a democratic people, and the houses of the poorer classes require the same attention as the other houses. The question is one of some difficulty, and I cannot offer any very decided opinion on it.

2440. We are told that at some hundreds of houses they do not and will not accommodate the public? I have no doubt of it; we can see the reason why; the houses are tolerably large, but to accommodate travellers it would be necessary to keep a larger staff of servants than would otherwise be required; a small staff can carry on a bar trade.

2441. We have been told that it is impossible to get a meal at any hotel at St. Leonards, Pyrmont, or Newtown? Newtown is almost a working-men's town, and it is so near the city, and the means of locomotion are so easy that strangers have no need to stay there very long; the houses there, no doubt, have to depend on their bar trade.
2442. Has it ever been brought under your notice that bad spirits are sold? I have been informed that the spirits sold at certain places are bad, but the reports of the analysts are, on the whole, favourable; there seems to be very little adulteration, except with water.
2443. Are you aware of cases in which, when a license is applied for, a doorway is broken through the wall into the next house, and afterwards closed up again? That has taken place in one or two instances; but when the Bench become aware of it the parties receive notice that an information will be filed unless the law is complied with. Sometimes the publican transforms the house into shops, and still keeps the number of rooms required by law. He is able to do this, owing to the defects in the law. If a man applies for a license for a house having thirty-two rooms, and an acre or two of land round the house, I think he should be compelled to maintain that number of rooms and that area of land.
2444. Since the new Act came into force a great many clubs have been established, at which drink can be obtained on Sundays? A great number of clubs have started, which I think are a very great evil so far as our young men are concerned. These clubs buy quantities of spirits, which are drunk by members and their friends. That is an evil which in my opinion ought to be put down. I think that a license fee ought to be imposed in the case of a club higher than that for an hotel.
2445. Drink is procurable there on Sundays? It is procurable at any time. Sunday is the principal day for drinking at the clubs. The clubs are frequented more on Sundays than on week-days.
2446. Do you think that by opening the hotels for an hour on Sundays drinking at the clubs could be done away with? No, the class who go to the clubs would not go to the hotels; it is the working-classes who would avail themselves of the opening of the public-houses on Sundays.
2447. Mr. Withers.] Can you suggest any means of preventing the brewers from holding liens over publicans? I am of opinion that it could not be stopped; if it were, the thing would simply be transferred from the brewer to the middleman, who would be a more dangerous person.
2448. Do you think there would be any difference if the lien was in the hands of an ordinary money-lender? There is no difference in principle; if a man who is not a brewer starts a publican in business he probably would not bind him down to get all his stock from one place; it is said that the brewers do this. I do not think that any legislation would ever prevent men from granting liens; the system has prevailed in London for centuries.
2449. Do you remember some disgraceful scenes which occurred under the old Act, when the Magistrates used to be driven to the Courts by parties interested in the licensing business? I am not aware that anything of the sort occurred, though I have known publicans to ask Magistrates to go and sit on the Bench when their cases were coming on. I have always been averse to that sort of canvassing.
2450. I think you will recollect that Magistrates who had been at the Water Police Court would be found at another Court for a special purpose half an hour afterwards? I am aware of that.
2451. They went in a regular cavalcade from one Court to the other? No, I do not think so. I have been canvassed, but I invariably refused to act under such circumstances.
2452. Is there any button-holing now? I scarcely ever sat on the Bench to deal with licensing cases before I was appointed a Licensing Magistrate, because I refused to do so when canvassed.
2453. I suppose you are never canvassed now? Yes; I am told that the reason why I was appointed was, that I should be more accessible to the public than the Stipendiaries are.
2454. You are aware that some houses have a number of bars? Yes; these various matters are brought under the notice of the Bench by degrees. I recollect that at one time a man paid £2 for a license in a paddock on a racecourse, and he opened four or five bars; but the Bench considered the matter, and came to the conclusion that each bar should have a separate license. The question as to duplicate and triplicate bars in hotels has not yet come before the Bench.
2455. Do you think that an up-stairs bar like some that exist in Sydney if presided over by a reputable person would not be a convenience to the public? I do not see that it is necessary. If I went into an up-stairs room, I do not think there should be a bar for my convenience; I could ring the bell and call for supplies.
2456. If properly conducted do they not amount to private bars? They may be, but they do harm to many young men.
2457. But if they were presided over by men instead of by ladies, the attraction you object to might be got rid of? I do not consider that young ladies conduct themselves any worse than young men. I am not at all averse to young ladies serving at a bar; if they are really good the bar will not make them bad. The presence of a young lady is a great check on the coarse behaviour of young men.
2458. You do not attach any importance then to the assertion that these girls are used as decoys for the young men? No; in a properly conducted house there is nothing to complain of. I should discountenance the letting of bars at so much a week—that may lead to abuses.
2459. You said that the public were very indifferent as to the local option vote; the teetotallers want to limit the number of houses, the publicans do not want further competition, and the general public begin to get weary of it, do they not? A large amount of the indifference is created by the extremists on both sides; there is a middle class of people who will not identify themselves with either side, and they will vote neither for nor against public-houses.

Present:—

ALEX. OLIVER, Esq., M.A., PRESIDENT,

A. HUTCHISON, Esq.,
G. WITHERS, Esq., J.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

J. M. Marsh, Esq., S.M., W.P.M., and L.M., called in, sworn and examined:—

J. M. Marsh,
Esq., S.M.,
W.P.M., L.M.,
10 May, 1886.

2460. President.] You are and have been for nearly thirty years a Stipendiary and Water Police Magistrate? Yes.

2461. A large portion of which time has been spent in Sydney? Twelve years in Sydney, the remainder in Bathurst and Wellington.

2462. And you have had a great deal to do with the Licensing Laws of the Colony? Yes.

2463. The Inspector-General of Police, in his report presented to Parliament last year, states that the population of the metropolitan area was 282,845, the number of apprehensions for drunkenness were 14,946, or 5.28 persons out of every 100? A very large percentage indeed.

2464. We have been told that sometimes, as often as sixty or seventy times during a year, the same man or woman has been sent to gaol for this offence;—have you sent a great many of these old persons to gaol? Yes.

2465. You must be familiar with their faces? With some.

2467. Has it not struck you as being a very expensive as well as a very ineffective way to deal with the State drunkard? I hold that I should treat the confirmed drunkard more as a lunatic, or as a person who has something the matter with him, and who should be shut up after he has committed a certain number of offences. No punishment will prevent the insatiable thirst of an incurable drunkard.

2468. Have you ever thought then of the resort to such an expedient as a home or asylum in the city for the treatment of these persons? Very often.

2469. You think that the existing scale of punishment is very ineffective, to say the least of it? Yes, so far as drinking is concerned.

2470. And that the State virtually may go further and detain these habitual drunkards? I should be delighted if such an institution could be established, not only for the sake of the men themselves, but also for the sake of their families.

2471. Suppose a man or a woman who had been convicted several times of drunkenness were brought up before a Magistrate again should he have the power conferred upon him of summarily dealing with the case and sending the person to such a Government asylum? I think it would be safe to send the hopeless, incurable persons who have been very often before the Court.

2472. I presume you would give power also to the relatives to shut their friend up? Most decidedly.

2473. In short you would treat them as lunatics? Yes, they should be dealt with not as criminals more as lunatics.

2474. That is the result of thirty years' experience? Yes; I have held this opinion for years, for I have seen so often the misery of the family as well as of the man himself.

2475. Do you think the drunkenness in these people is absolutely incurable? Yes; they appear to reform for a time, but they ultimately recur to their old habits. I have no faith in the belief that you can cure this insatiable thirst—I regard it as a disease.

2476. Suppose the object of a licensing authority is to regulate in some way the number of public-houses so as to supply the rational wants of a district, do you consider, as a member of the Licensing Bench, that our system compasses the intention? My opinion is that it does not accomplish either what was intended or what was hoped for. There is just as much drunkenness now as there was before the passing of the present Act, judging from the numbers who are brought before the Bench. Of course that is merely superficial. I have no data to go upon except what strikes me every day I go to Court, especially on a Monday.

2477. Do you think that these people have been consuming liquor in public-houses in almost all cases—is the drunkenness effected at a public-house? I cannot say that.

2478. Probably the evidence would not tell you so, but as a matter of common knowledge these persons have got drunk at a bar? Very likely; they are the people who would go to a bar.

2479. Do you think that the keepers of public-houses behave themselves as it is supposed they ought to behave in abstaining from supplying people with glass after glass of liquor? I do not think that the bulk of them would serve a man who was becoming rapidly intoxicated; but there are judges and judges, so there are innkeepers and innkeepers, and I have had many cases before me where they positively refused, and a disturbance has arisen from the refusal.

2480. If that be so, and assuming that the drunkenness is effected in public-houses, how is it that so many appear before you drunk—if the publican exercised a little consideration for them he would not serve them? I can only account for it in this way: a man goes into a public-house, he calls for a glass all round, and perhaps the publican does not see these drunken men.

2481. And probably they go to another? When a man is primed in one house he goes to another, and so on.

2482. Is the licensing fee sufficiently restrictive? That is a subject I have thought of lately; I think it should be increased in Sydney, and perhaps that would help to weed out any questionable characters who have licenses.

2483. Would you go so far as to double the fee? Perhaps £50 would be a desirable fee.

2484. Do you think that the English custom of graduating the fee according to the character of the house in cities would be applicable to Sydney? I think that there should be some difference made between a large and respectable hotel like "Petty's" or the "Royal" and a smaller one. There must be smaller hotels for lumpers and seamen, and I think that there might well be a sliding scale in the matter of the fee.

2485. What has your experience been of the Colonial wine-license? When I was in the country I used to think that it was simply a sham in order to sell all sorts of things, but I do not think it is so in Sydney.

2486. Magisterially nothing has come before you to say that the wine-shop in and about Sydney is a shanty? I have never had any case of that kind here; I have had them in the country.

2487. You do not think that in and about Sydney the Colonial wine licensee sells spirits? I have no grounds for saying so, but I have a strong suspicion that is the case. Human nature is human nature, and if a man were asked to supply spirits I think he would give spirits, except under very exceptional circumstances.

2488. Of course you are aware that there has been great difficulty in obtaining convictions for Sunday selling—you are probably aware that the police consider that to a large extent the Act itself is to be blamed for the difficulty they experience in procuring convictions—what is your opinion on the subject? There is very great difficulty indeed in coming to a righteous conclusion, because three or four policemen give evidence, and double the number of persons—the publican and his friends—give evidence diametrically opposite to them.

2489. The police almost unanimously say that if they bring a case of this nature before any of the Magistrates they fail to procure a conviction. For instance, they see batch after batch of men going into a public-house some Sunday and see them come out wiping their mouths, but although they get either the sub-inspector or some one in plain clothes unknown to the publican to make an entry into this place, they always find that he has been equally as smart as themselves, and has removed all signs of drinking; or the publican swears—and in Court he repeats the statement—that the people are all inmates of the house. Well they consider from their point of view that it is a great hardship that the Magistrates should administer the law strictissimi juris, so to speak? They have a remedy for that. Any Magistrate with whose decision they are dissatisfied—I have done it, and others have done it—may be called upon to state a case. That has been repeatedly done.

2490. The point is this: there is not sufficient evidence to convict the publican of illegal selling. In dozens of instances such as I have described, although it amounts to no legal evidence, there is a strong suspicion? In many instances there is not that positive proof that the Magistrates require. The Magistrates have no moral doubt, but there is no legal proof.

2491. The Magistrates then have not thought fit to convict on evidence of this kind in order that the case might go on behalf of the defendant to the Supreme Court; they have not got a case stated, but have waited for someone else to take the initiative, so as to ascertain whether so and so amounted to sufficient evidence to convict or not? I am not sure about that.

2492. I am sure you have felt disappointed that you have not been able from your point of view to do justice in cases of that sort? Yes.

2493. Having the views you hold as to what constitutes legal evidence, you considered that these statements of the police, however strong morally, did not justify you in convicting? No; if there was any doubt it was right to give the defendant the benefit of it.

2494. Would you not like to see some amendment of the law? I think it would be advisable.

2495. In what direction? There is the difficulty. If the police find a number of people in a public-house during prohibited hours the publican says:—"These are my friends" or "my lodgers."

2496. Have many such cases come before you? A great many.

2497. Have you thought there has been perjury? I have had my doubts—very strong doubts.

2498. And I suppose it is not too much to say you really did think that there was perjury going on? In some instances.

2500. You think then that if we placed the burden of proof on some of these persons it would be effective? I think it would be nearly effective.

2501. If they are determined to commit perjury I suppose they will commit the same kind of perjury still? Yes; but a man would not lose his license. It is not merely the fine that the publican cares about; if he loses his license he loses his independence.

2502. Do you think that both the publican and the person who is served with liquor during prohibited hours should be punished? I think so, most decidedly. There are many respectable publicans who tell me that they lose trade by not selling on Sundays. The persons who drink, therefore, are the persons who induce them to break the law.

2503. Do you think that the total prohibition of the sale of liquor on Sundays is beneficial, or have you any reservations? Well, I have a reservation. I should be very sorry to see the slightest incentive to drunkenness; but we all know that there is a general craving for that which is prohibited. If the people cannot get drink by fair means they will get it by foul.

2504. Then I presume that you would revert to the old state of things and open the public-houses for two hours? Not for two hours. My mind has undergone a slight change on the subject since I have heard that in England they are trying to do away with Sunday selling. They have done away with it in Scotland and Wales. It is very hard on the working-men. Gentlemen go to their clubs and take their glass at all hours, and the working-men think it very hard that they cannot get their liquor. It causes a great deal of dissatisfaction amongst them. I once thought, therefore, that an hour or two ought to be allowed for the sale of liquor on Sundays, but since then my mind has undergone some little change. They will have liquor, Sunday or not Sunday.

2505. Do you think they take more of it because the sale of liquor is prohibited on Sundays? I think it gives a sort of zest; the idea that they are "doing" the police.

2506. Do people get in a supply of drink for Sundays? Many do that, and they drink it all on Saturday and they require more on Sunday; their appetite is whetted.

2507. I suppose you are in favour of the present hours for closing—11 o'clock? I think that that has been decidedly beneficial.

2508. Would you not propose any alteration? I do not think so.

2509. Not even in the neighbourhood of theatres that may have late entertainments? Well, we saw so much of it about the theatres, I should be sorry if the present law were altered; it was something frightful before the present Act was passed.

J. M. Marsh,

2510. Would you suggest that the licensing authority should have larger powers—larger discretion as to the granting, renewal, or transfer of licenses? It may be that some larger powers would be beneficial; we used under certain circumstances to disqualify a house, but that is no longer possible.
2511. Do you think that alteration of the Act was beneficial; do you not think that a house ought under certain circumstances to be disqualified as well as a licensee for continued breaches of the law? That might fall hard upon the landlord, especially upon a widow with a family who derived her income from a licensed house.
2512. No doubt it would if there were many in that position, but most of the houses are owned by wealthy men and brewers. What is your opinion of the operation of the local option clauses? In some instances the people who have a right to vote do not vote. I heard the other day that in one case only six voted, and they voted in favour of the increase of the houses. I do not speak for my colleagues, but if a respectable man asked for a license for a first-rate house I should be inclined to grant it.
2513. A house of large accommodation? Yes; I know it is prescribed by the Act.
2514. You think that is satisfactory then? Yes, I think that the good houses command good men generally.
2515. Then you have noticed some apathy with regard to local option? As I said before, only six persons voted in one case; but although they were in favour of the granting of additional licenses we refused to grant a license, because we thought that the place in which the house was situated unfit for a public-house; it was on the edge of a cliff at Woollahra.
2516. Would you extend the local option vote to a larger range of voters, or in respect of renewals would you extend the principle? I think that an extension would be a good thing.
2517. Would you limit the vote to the ratepayers, or extend it to the Parliamentary electors? Extend it to the Parliamentary electors.
2518. Would you extend the vote to women? That is going into a different question. I would neither recommend nor oppose it.
2519. You are in favour of the principle, I presume, because you think the inhabitants of the district ought to have power to say whether they will have a public-house in their neighbourhood or not? Yes.
2520. Do you not think that a woman may fairly be included under the category of "inhabitants of the district?" Well, she may be; but I should be rather loath to give an opinion.
2521. Suppose she is on the municipal roll now as a femme seule, would it be a violent innovation to extend the local option vote to her sui juris? That is a matter I have not thought about. I think I would give it to all residents.
2522. Do you think any benefit would be obtained by having something like the English ale and beer houses? I have not thought of that. It strikes me that it would not be an advantage.
2523. There has been a great outcry in some places about the grocers' bottle licenses;—would you extend that system here so as to allow the grocer to sell a quart or a pint of liquor? That would cut the trade from under the feet of the licensed publicans, who pay high license fees. I have not the slightest doubt, however, that it is sold by the bottle.
2524. Surreptitiously? Yes; I am speaking of England too.
2525. With regard to the licensing authority, do you think there would be any advantage in making all offences under the licensing laws punishable by the licensing Bench—drunkenness as well as offences committed by publicans? It is virtually so now.
2526. But the licensing authority now consists of Stipendiary Magistrates, and no other Magistrates can interfere? Yes.
2527. Would it be any gain to have a licensing authority with nothing else to do but administer the licensing laws and deal with offences under them? I am sure I could not answer that question; one could not tell until it has been tried; there might or might not be some gain in it.
2528. Have you heard of any discontent with the present system? I have, on the part of the police, as to the difficulty of getting convictions—not any on the part of the public.
2529. Do you think there would have been any discontent on the part of the police if the law had enabled them to get convictions more readily? No, there would not have been any complaint. When the Act first came into operation a constable saw a publican or his servant turn out his light one morning half an hour before the stipulated time. The constable watched the publican, never said a word to him, and summoned him. The case came before me, and I was so shocked at the whole thing that I would not convict. I retired, but the man was convicted. I mention this to show how strenuously on the first inception of the Act they strove to obtain convictions.
2530. As a Water Police Magistrate you will probably have had some experience of the packet licenses. The license is granted to the captain of the ship, is it not? Yes; but if the steward sells liquor, and you can prove that the captain did not "knowingly and wittingly" allow it to be sold, there is no punishment. I think I should hold the man who sells the liquor responsible.
2531. Then that means that you would put the packet license on the same footing as the publican's license? I think I should. There is a strong feeling on the subject on the part of the public; it is thought very hard that when people are seeing their friends off they cannot get a glass of grog. That seems rather a hard case, but as long as it is the law we must enforce it.
2532. Have you had many cases of that sort before you? I have not had many. I see Mr. Roseby here, and I may inform him that since he ceased to attend to Bench duties we have had the dock at the Water Police Court made three times as large as it was, because we could not accommodate the increased number of drunkards. It will be my turn to sit on the Bench next Monday, and if Mr. Roseby will come to the Court he can see our Monday's work.
2533. Mr. Colls.] We have been told that there are not more than ten licensed houses in any division that could accommodate any travellers;—could you suggest anything to alter that state of things? At one time in the country we never granted a license without going over the house and seeing it with our own eyes. I thought that a very good rule.
2534. We have been told that in some houses there is not a table or a chair in some of the rooms up-stairs, and that there is no accommodation for the public at all? The police ought to inspect the furniture. When we are dealing with the licenses I will bring the matter before the police.
2535. We have been told that all the accommodation is taken up by boarders;—could you suggest a remedy for this state of things? We can give instructions to the police to make periodical visits, and to bring the

- the state of the houses before the Bench when the renewal of licenses is asked for. Such objectionable practices would be a ground for refusing a license.
2536. We have been informed that a private house has been rented next door, that a doorway has been broken through the wall, and that as soon as the license was granted it has been closed up? That has not come under my notice. I can mention one objectionable thing that occurred at Balmain. A publican erected a building in his yard some distance away and gave a lease of it for three years to a respectable club, of which Dr. E—— is the President. The matter was brought before me and a charge against the publican of having music on his licensed premises. I had to dismiss the case, but I told the police to bring the matter before us when the renewal of the license was applied for.
2537. Each room in a licensed house should contain a certain number of cubic feet of air, but we are told that in some instances each room is occupied by five or six boarders, and that in others the rooms are empty? Yes; but all these things should be brought under the notice of the Bench by the police. I for one should be very glad to have recourse to the old system which we adopted thirty years ago, of visiting the houses and judging for ourselves.
2538. It has been brought under our notice that many of the hotels have a number of up-stairs bars, which they let to other persons? That I have not heard of.
2539. The matter has never been brought before you? Never.
2540. I am told that the police have brought cases before the Bench? I have never had such a case; my colleagues may.
2541. Would you be surprised to hear that there are as many as four of these bars in some hotels? It has not been brought before me.
2542. Are there not several shilling clubs in existence for getting drink? I have heard that clubs have been formed for the purpose of evading the law.
2543. Do not the grocers sell beer and spirits in Sydney? They are allowed to sell a dozen bottles of spirits, ale, or wine, of the same kind.
2544. The President spoke about wine and beer licenses;—do you not think that licenses to sell wine and beer would be sufficient, without spirit licenses, to grant to those small houses that do not accommodate travellers? I am inclined to think it would be better to keep the wine licenses to themselves, as it might lead to greater evasion of the law.
2545. Do not you think that it would be sufficient if the small houses which exist now and which do not provide any accommodation for the public were licensed to sell ale only? The difficulty is this—would they not evade the Act by selling brandy and other liquors under the colour of ale?
2546. Has it ever come under your notice that spirits of bad quality are sold? I think that that is the secret of the whole of the drunkenness all through the country. Many publicans up country do not know good from bad liquor; they take what is sent to them from Sydney. They take stuff thinking that it is sherry or port, whereas it is nothing but doctored white spirit. The publicans are blamed for it, but it comes from Sydney.
2547. I suppose that you have had several complaints about bad liquor? Never in Sydney—often in the country. The stuff makes men mad. Not only are wines and spirits adulterated, but even ale is; tobacco being steeped in it, as well as other deleterious substances.
2548. President.] Suppose that instructions were given to collect fifteen samples of imported ale and Colonial brewed ale; that these samples were taken indiscriminately from as many public-houses and analysed, and that the result of the analysis was conveyed in these terms: "All these samples of fermented liquors have been examined for poisonous organic substances, metals, mineral acids, and various articles mentioned in the Licensing Act of 1881 and nothing of the kind was found"—would you not be surprised. I ask you this because you said that you thought that a large amount of the drunkenness was to be ascribed to deleterious liquors? I say so, particularly in the country.
2550. An inspector has, in the course of his duty, been taking samples from various public-houses, and apparently with the same results; when submitted to analysis, nothing, or next to nothing, of a deleterious nature being discovered? I will mention a case which occurred some years ago: A gentleman of repute—a squatter and a Magistrate of the territory—came to Sydney, where he met a friend. The latter asked him to try some samples of sherry and port, and he expressed a liking for a particular one, remarking that it was remarkably good. His friend said—"But there is not a drop of wine in it; it is all concocted stuff."
2551. We had a similar examination of sixteen samples of whiskey, brandy, and rum. Here is an item. "Brandy, 43/6 per gallon in bond." Against that we have this remark—"Very good quality; no trace of fusel oil." "Brandy 3/ per gallon in bond." Against that we have the remark "Inferior, contains fusel oil." On the whole it is surprising how free from the statutory adulterations the spirits and liquors have been found to be, not only those in the regular examinations which Inspector Lenthal makes, but in those which we have specially charged him with? Notwithstanding that return, I should like to see inspectors appointed whose duty it would be to go around, and at any moment take liquor for the purpose of analysis.
2552. Mr. Colls.] With respect to private bars, do not you think that it would be a good thing if they were approved of by the inspectors and that they were always on the base floor? I think that it would be a good idea—I see no objection to it.
2553. That would do away with up-stair bars? I have never seen an up-stair bar, and I have never had a case connected with one.
2554. Have you not heard that they are not well conducted? No; I think, further, that if a landlord wants to establish a second bar he should apply to the Bench for permission; as far as I know the inspectors have never brought under the notice of the Bench the existence of these private bars.
2555. Mr. Withers.] As the result of your observations of the crimes which are brought about by drunkenness, I suppose you consider that it would be desirable for the Legislature to reduce as much as possible the facilities for getting drink? If it could be managed, but my idea is that if a man is fond of drink he will have it no matter how or where he gets it.
2556. Do you think that the drinking habits among young people has increased by a proportion in excess of the proportionate increase of the population;—do you think that there is a disproportionate increase of larrikins?

- larrikins? It does not appear to me to be so, taking into consideration the increase of the population. I saw more larrikinism in England than I have ever seen in Australia.
2558. What is your opinion respecting Sunday closing? Until very lately I thought that it would be advisable to open the hotels for an hour on Sundays, but my feeling has somewhat undergone a change in consequence of my learning that in England they were trying to do away with the opening of hotels on Sundays. The opinion which I first set forth was somewhat based on the fact that the hotels were opened for a certain time in England on Sundays without any apparent disadvantage that I saw; I certainly saw no drunkenness in the streets there on Sundays. It might be worth while to try the experiment of opening our hotels for an hour on Sundays, the liquor sold not to be drunk on the premises.
2559. I suppose that you are willing to admit that you cannot altogether form an estimate of the amount of drunkenness compared with that which existed when the old Act was in operation, as the cases which come before you do not represent anything like the amount of drunkenness? More than that, we have the same drunkards over and over again, and they swell the total of the drunkards' list.
2560. I suppose that you are not about the streets sufficiently on Sundays to form an opinion as to the beneficial effect or otherwise of the Sunday closing provision? I certainly see the beneficial effect of it at the watering places, particularly Manly Beach. I do not think that the closing of the houses prevents drinking in the city.
2561. Do you think that the hours prescribed by the Act during which public-houses may be kept open are sufficient? I do not think that I would disturb the existing arrangement—decidedly I should not extend the time. I am sure that Mr. Roseby recollects the scenes of riot and debauchery which used to take place when the houses were kept open until midnight.
2562. Mr. Roseby.] Have you heard that the police have been discouraged from making charges against publicans because convictions which they have had a great deal of trouble to secure have been quashed by a higher Court, on the ground of the preponderance of evidence which the publicans have been able to produce on the appeals, which practically are re-hearings? In many instances the police lose their cases through that circumstance; but the Bench do not look so much at the quantity or as the quality of the evidence; we weigh very cautiously the different kinds of evidence, but mark you, I do not see why the evidence of a respectable publican should be ignored; if he comes forward and swears conscientiously, you ought to have no reason to doubt him.
2563. The police have no pecuniary interest in securing convictions, and if one, two, or three of them, as the case may be, swear positively that they have seen people drinking at a bar on Sundays and the publican is fined, do you not think that the decision of the Bench ought to be final? I might say so, but then the publican might not agree to that; he might think that the Magistrates were wrong in their law, and might desire to test the question by appealing to a higher Court. Even the decisions of the Supreme Court Judges are reviewed and are sometimes found to be wrong.
2564. We have heard some of the most experienced of our police officers say that they never knew as much perjury in all their experience as has been produced by the Licensing Act; that is to say, that the publicans will move heaven and earth to get convictions quashed, hence they and their minions perjure themselves, so it is said, to an enormous extent;—have you heard that? In some cases—I do not say in all—the publicans have been perfectly right and the police perfectly wrong. I have had very strong doubts in some cases, but legal evidence was wanting.
2565. It has been stated here over and over again that there is a large increase in drinking among young people, that the sons of respectable citizens are giving way sadly to drink; to remedy that, would you increase the age at which a publican is allowed to serve a youth with drink? If it be a fact that drunkenness is on the increase among young people, and the sons of respectable people are giving way to drink, I should say so.
2566. We have uniform testimony that such is the case, but these young people are able to take care of themselves, and do not come under cognizance of the Magistrates? Most decidedly; if I were satisfied that young people were in the habit of indulging in drinking bouts, I should say that the age should be increased.
2567. To what extent? I should make it eighteen.
2568. Do you think that it is a proper thing for young women to be engaged vending drink behind public-house bars? I do not say that it is, but if a young woman of a certain age chose to adopt the life, would it not be interfering with the liberty of the subject to say that she should not do so?
2569. You must know what a bad tendency it must have on a poor unfortunate girl who has to stand behind a bar and listen to the obscene language of a drivelling drunkard? I recognize that it is a dangerous position for a young woman to be in.
2570. You would not allow a daughter or a friend to occupy such a position if you could help it? Certainly not. I suppose the barmaids are a sort of decoy for the young men whom you speak of; many men no doubt simply go to the bars to have a little private chat with the bar girl. I think that perhaps there might be an exception against unmarried females. Of course a married woman can do as she likes; there can be no objection to her serving behind a bar if her husband desires her to do so. At any rate I should say that only matured or married women should serve behind bars.
2571. No unmarried women? Well, not under a certain age.
2572. Did I understand you to say that you were in favour of bar licenses for steamships? I happen to be a temperate man, and I cannot say that I am in favour of the system, but suppose I were going to Queensland to-night and two or three friends went to the steamer to see me off it is only natural to have a parting glass; it would seem very hard if one could not do so.
2573. The complaint is made that people who travel by the coast steamers which leave at night go on board pretty well full, and that what with the parting glasses and the nobblers they take on the voyage they become a nuisance to their fellow-passengers? I have never heard such a complaint; I have frequently heard of people taking parting glasses, but I have never heard of any one bordering on a state of intoxication.
2574. Did I understand you to say that, as far as the principle of local option was concerned, you approved of all the residents of a district having a voice? I do, because that would give a greater number than are now entitled to vote. The other day there were only six voted in favour of it.

2575. Mr. Hutchison.] Referring to the proportion of crime passing through your hands in your long experience, what relation does it bear to the drinking customs? I think that nearly half of the crimes if not more are attributable to drunkenness. Men do not know what they do when they are mad drunk.

J. M. Marsh,
Esq., S.M.,
W.P.M., L.M.
10 May, 1886.

2576. You say that in dealing with evidence you have to consider the quality as well as the quantity? No; it is the quality.

2577. You said that certain weight must be attached to the evidence of a respectable publican—I suppose we must presume all publicans are respectable, otherwise they would not get a license? It is taken for granted that they are respectable men, if there are no police objections.

2578. But does it not strike you that having as they have an immediate interest, they are more likely to tell untruths than the police are? Let it be granted that they are immediately interested; then take a young constable—he wishes to appear an active officer in the eyes of his superior; he comes forward because he is unknown to the publican and he wants to get a conviction; he is as much interested in getting a conviction as the publican is in getting out of it.

2580. But the policeman has not the direct interest which the publican has of losing his license if he is convicted? But he must be convicted three times.

2581. I should imagine that he would defend the first charge as eagerly as the third, therefore he is more likely to be tempted to tell an untruth than the policeman would be? You know that there is a certain feeling with all men—they like to succeed. A barrister likes to win his case, and so does a policeman. One circumstance makes me arrive at the conclusion which I have stated—the practice does not exist now, as I set my face against it. In the early stage of the working of the present Licensing Act a policeman dressed himself up as a traveller; he wore a cabbage-tree hat and top-boots, and he would go to a publican and say that he had come such a distance, naming some place. In this way he would induce the publican to break the law and would then proceed against him. Surely that man was interested in getting a conviction. The Act has opened the door to another very serious evil. I do not know whether you have heard it, but I have heard indirectly, that in cases which come before the Supreme Court there may be on the Jury a licensed publican, and the moment the policeman enters the box the publican says “he is the man who gave evidence against me,” and he goes for a verdict for the defendant, or the discharge of the prisoner, as the case may be. I have heard that the Act has had an effect of that kind.

2582. A man who would tell a deliberate lie to induce a publican to break the law deserves to be hounded down; no one with any sense of fair play could defend such conduct; such evidence ought to be of no consequence? The case which I have in my mind's eye is that of a young constable who, at the time, had lately joined the force. Of course such evidence is no good, but that was the commencement of it in getting convictions.

2583. You convict a publican on certain evidence and he appeals against your decision;—is it a fact that he can reopen the whole case and bring forward fresh evidence? Yes; it is so in all appeals against magistrates' decisions. The appeal is practically a rehearing.

2584. In what other cases is it the rule? In all cases.

2585. It really means that the same cases are not being tried? We often think so.

2586. You told us that there were men who appeared before you who could not be affected by any punishment which you might inflict on them;—how long do you think that these confirmed inebriates should be confined in some place other than a gaol, as you suggest? I do not think less than twelve months; it would take that time to break them from their habits and associates.

2587. But if you send a man to gaol for three months he does not get any drink during that time? But he retains all the desire to have it when he comes out.

2588. You rather surprise me in one thing; you seemed to think that there are very few respectable publicans who will supply liquor to men who are under the influence of drink? I do not think any respectable publican would. I know several who, I think, would not do so knowingly. The only way in which I can account for men under the influence of drink being supplied with more is this:—A number of sailors who have been drinking ashore enter a public-house, and one of them who appears to be sober calls for drinks all round. These are served, and it is just possible that the publican does not observe that one or two are under the influence of drink.

2589. Suppose they go to several houses, they will all be drunk at the last? There may be one who is not.

2590. You are in some doubt as to Sunday closing? I was not until a few days ago.

2591. Do not you think that, all things considered, the largest possible good to the largest possible number—provided that our law was assimilated with that of England, so as to enable the police to have a fair chance of convicting, and that the law were strictly enforced—Sunday closing would be an advantage? In England public-houses are kept open for two hours on Sundays.

2592. But there is entire Sunday closing in Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, and they are going for it in England;—if they cannot have it applied generally, they are going to try to get it in counties. You say that you have observed that the closing of the houses on Sundays has been beneficial at Manly Beach. Do not you think that if the law were so framed that the police would have greater ease in convincing you that breaches of it had been committed it would be a gain to have all the houses closed on Sundays? The objection which I see is that they would be closed against the desire of part of the public; they see men going to their clubs to get liquor, and they think it hard that they should be denied the opportunity to go to a public-house; very likely they determine to have the drink, right or wrong. I should be inclined to give a trial to the system of opening the houses for a certain length of time on Sundays—no drink to be consumed on the premises—and if it did not cure the evil I should repeal it.

2593. Suppose that clubs were brought under the operation of the Licensing Act, would that not partly meet the objection? People drink now on Sunday. What I suggest would simply mean legalizing that which is done now illegally. I should be inclined to try the system for a year. If I may be permitted, I would like to suggest that all lodging-houses for seamen should be licensed. There is a good deal of crimping carried on—men are smuggled into houses and kept there—but if the lodging-houses were licensed we could prevent this to a large extent, as we know all the crimps, and we should refuse to give them licenses.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

James Buchanan, Esq., S.M., called in, sworn and examined:—

J. Buchanan,
Esq.
21 May, 1886.

2594. President.] Your position is? Stipendiary Magistrate and Chairman of the Licensing Board.
2595. Since when have you been Chairman of the Licensing Board? I succeeded Mr. Dillon.
2596. You are one of the original Stipendiary Magistrates? Yes.
2597. And have held the office ever since the Act was passed? Yes.
2598. With regard to the statistics of apprehensions in the Metropolitan Licensing District, I suppose you have adjudicated in a great many convictions? Yes.
2599. Do you consider that the number of convictions for drunkenness, or where drunkenness is part of the charge, has increased of late? Drunkenness, in my experience, forms part of almost the majority of cases which come before the Bench; I think that the crime with which we have to deal is in a great measure instigated and aided by drunkenness.
2600. I refer to cases in which the charge is drunkenness, habitual drunkenness, drunk and disorderly, or kindred charges;—have these been on the increase lately? I cannot answer that question very satisfactorily, as I have been absent from the Bench on sick leave for over six months.
2601. Do you think that the habit of drunkenness has increased? I do not think so in any marked degree.
2602. The difficulty in coming to any conclusion from the statistics in the Inspector-General's report arises from the fact that there are so many habitual drunkards; we have been told that some of these have been convicted forty or fifty times; there is no distinction of these cases in the statistics; the number of cases in 1885 was 20,000;—do you think that that number might be reduced to a tenth? Yes; in fact the majority of cases are confirmed drunkards—there are some men who come before us regularly. The law provides that after three informations a man is convicted as a vagrant.
2603. Then what sentence do you give as a rule? Three months.
2604. Have you ever known any cases where the man has appeared before you again within forty-eight hours after being discharged from gaol? I have known several instances.
2605. So that the punishment for drunkenness is ineffective? I think so.
2606. Do you not consider that it is in the highest degree expensive, there being a large proportion of the time of the tribunal set apart for it, police for it, and that a large portion of the gaols and lock-ups are taken up by drunkards? Undoubtedly it is expensive.
2607. Has it ever occurred to you that there might be a more efficacious form of punishment for drunkenness? If a more efficacious form of punishment could be devised it would be very desirable.
2608. Do you think that when an habitual drunkard has arrived at such a stage that he is no longer responsible for his actions, that it would be right for the State to step in and permit his friends to place him under restraint for a certain period? If feasible it would be a good thing.
2609. Is the habit not a form of insanity? It is a sort of disease.
2610. Would you have any hope of reformation in such cases? I do not think that there would be much hope.
2611. But apart from the matter of reformation, do not you think that the good to the drunkard himself, by detaining him—because he would be reformed during the period of his detention—the good to society, and probably the good to his family, would justify the establishment of inebriate asylums where men could be compulsorily detained? I am of opinion that such institutions would be a great blessing.
2612. There might also be voluntary asylums where men would go of their own accord? I think that there is such an institution in Victoria.
2613. Do you think that such an institution would be unduly expensive? I think not.
2614. I dare say that you have often sat on the Bench and been compelled, perhaps reluctantly, to dismiss cases which had been brought forward by the police for Sunday selling? I am sorry to say frequently.
2615. You have done it reluctantly—you have been of opinion that the man had probably been an offender, but the character of the evidence has not been sufficient for you to convict? I have felt morally certain in some cases of the guilt of the accused.
2616. Will you give us an epitome of your experience of that particular part of the Act which provides a penalty for Sunday selling. The Commission are very anxious to see their way to recommending the remodelling or amendment of the sixty-third section, so that persons who are really offenders may be punished. You know that there are provisions in the English Act which are not contained in ours—one provides, and it is much relied upon, for the throwing of the burden of proof on any person found in a public-house during prohibited hours; but we are told that there is such an enormous amount of perjury with respect to the matter that probably that of itself would be of very little value—that the man who perjures himself now would perjure himself then, and that he would, in order to rebut the prima facie law that he was an offender, swear anything as he does now. Has any kind of amendment of the law occurred to you? I cannot say that it has. I have felt the great difficulty of the matter. I have been compelled to dismiss cases because the evidence was diametrically opposite; there was, in point of fact, gross perjury on one side or the other, and, legally speaking, it was impossible for any Magistrate to convict, as, if his decision were appealed against, for a moral certainty the appeal would be sustained.

matter. Many cases have been brought before me where the evidence has been such as you have mentioned, but it has not been sufficient in my opinion to warrant a conviction. I must inform you that if an appeal is made to the Supreme Court in such a case it is entered into afresh, and evidence is put before the superior Court which was not given before the Magistrate; it is evidence which is exactly suited to get the appellant out of the case, and the consequence is that the appeal is sustained.

J. Buchanan,
Esq.
21 May, 1886.

2619. There is a new hearing in fact? Yes.
2620. And the appellant has power to bring forward any evidence he likes? Yes.
2621. The operative words of the Act are—"Any person, not being a bonâ fide lodger or traveller, drinking liquor in any licensed premises or found in the act of leaving with liquor in his possession"—then follows the penalty; so that the proof must be of the absolute drinking of the liquor? Yes.
2622. Or that the person is a bonâ fide lodger? Yes.
2623. On very rare occasions will the constable be able to see the act of drinking, and if he does see a man drinking that individual swears that he is a lodger? That is frequently the case—it is a very favourite defence.
2624. That being so, can you suggest any means of facilitating the securing of convictions in cases in which they are really earned? It might be simplified I think. The penalty on the man drinking is not sufficient under the Act; it ought to approach more the penalty inflicted on the publican.
2625. Suppose that the law provided that a man coming out of a public-house on Sundays during prohibited hours should be liable to a penalty, unless he proved to the satisfaction of the Court that he was a lodger or a traveller, that of itself will do no good if the man is going to perjure himself? You cannot guard against perjury if a man is determined to commit it.
2626. If we make no special proviso in favor of the bonâ fide lodger, inmate or traveller, which means that they would be prohibited from obtaining liquor on Sunday, we should be creating a hardship in another direction? Clearly so.
2627. Do you think that it is necessary to give this privilege to lodgers or travellers? I disapprove of that part of the Act relating to Sunday closing—I think that public-houses ought to be open for an hour or two on Sundays.
2628. Has it occurred to you that a publican should be required to keep each day a list of the persons who slept in his hotel the previous night, and that no person whose name was not on that list should be considered a lodger? There is no reason why he should not; the list would be excellent proof in a case where a man was drinking during prohibited hours.
2629. If in thinking this matter over anything should occur to you which it would be of interest to us to know, we shall be glad if you will communicate with us? I will; and to be frank with you, I must say that I have not given the subject much consideration. I have been unwell since I got your summons; but I will give the subject consideration, and communicate with you before you conclude your inquiry.
2630. You are aware that under the old Licensing Act, after a certain number of convictions, not only did the licensee lose his license but the house was disqualified for three years. The latter was considered too harsh a provision, because it might be equivalent in many cases to keeping the house unlet, and therefore it was repealed. Do you think that the repeal was a step in the right direction? I think so; I think that the consequences of the wrong done by a publican who has leased his house should not follow his landlord.
2631. You have often sat in cases of application for the renewal of licenses? Yes.
2632. And the police have often objected to renewals on grounds which you and your brother Magistrates refused to entertain? Yes.
2633. One of those grounds has been the habitual breaking of the law by publicans on Sunday, although it could not be proved? Yes.
2634. Am I right in supposing that the Bench in those cases refused to act on what they called the "surmises of the police," and that they required proof of convictions for breaches of the law? That we could not take action on suspicion of facts.
2635. Although you may have thought that the facts, as stated, amounted to considerably more than suspicion, though not to actual legal proof? Yes, I should have the greatest suspicion.
2636. In fact it would amount to moral certainty but legal uncertainty? Yes.
2637. Do you not think that the discretion of the Magistrates might be enlarged in such cases? I think that is desirable; but in the case of a renewal a man has a vested interest, so to speak, in his license. It is not like an application for a new license; and by refusing the renewal you might deprive him of his livelihood. Before that is done there ought to be legal proof, and not merely moral certainty.
2638. That is to say, that in such a case you object to exercise your discretion? I do not think that I should be warranted in doing so.
2639. But I suppose you will admit that if a publican knew that the Bench would exercise their discretion and refuse to renew his license if they felt morally certain that he had been habitually violating the law, it would cause him to think twice before he violated the law? Yes, I think so.
2640. Do you think that the local option provisions in the Licensing Act have had a beneficial effect? I think they have.
2641. Do you agree with the principle of local option? I do.
2642. But you think, I suppose, that the principle is only half embodied in the existing law? It is not as full as it might be.
2643. Would you extend it to renewals? I am not exactly prepared to say.
2644. With or without compensation? That is the awkward part of it. If a man is deprived of his license simply because it is politic to do so and through no offence on his part I think he is entitled to compensation. I think there are too many public-houses—particularly those of a low class character.
2645. Do you think that the license fee is high enough? If a higher fee would reduce the number of applications I think it would be advisable.
2646. You know that in England the license fee is graded according to the character of the house, as shown by the house tax? I was not aware of that.
2647. It is the case in London, at any rate. Do you think that in this Colony also the license fee, in cities at all events, might be made to bear some proportion to the character of the house? Yes; the only doubt in my mind is whether by so doing we should not tax the superior class of houses and let the inferior ones go scot free as it were.

- J. Buchanan,
Esq.
21 May, 1886.
2648. That objection might be met by giving the holders of the higher licenses certain immunities and privileges? If it could be done in that way it would be desirable.
2649. For example, the holder of a license in class A might be allowed to have two or three bars? I was desirous of speaking on that point, but I did not know whether you intended to open the question.
2650. You are aware that in this city there are many up-stair bars conducted by persons alleged to be of doubtful character, and who are supposed to be the servants or agents of the person who holds the license? I have been told that such is the case.
2651. This is said by the police to be a very undesirable state of things? I think it is very undesirable.
2652. And what would you propose as a remedy? I do not think there should be any subletting whatever—I am entirely opposed to it—I think it strikes at the root of the licensing system altogether. If a person sublets his right as licensee you have no hold upon him. I may say also that I do not think up-stair bars should be allowed at all.
2653. Not under any circumstances? I think not. While illicit drinking is carried on I think the police ought to have every facility for its detection.
2654. You stated a little while ago that you were in favour of some modification of the present Sunday prohibition? Yes; I think that a licensed house might be allowed to open for an hour at least at mid-day on Sunday. Though it may seem paradoxical, I think it would do away with a great deal of drunkenness. I would not allow liquor to be consumed on the premises, but only to be taken away.
2655. But that condition might be evaded by persons going into the street to drink the liquor? Cases in which that has been done have come before me, and I scarcely know how it could be prevented.
2656. In England the law provides that people shall not drink on a public highway—I do not know whether that meets the case; I have never seen men drinking in the streets or highways? I have never seen it, but it has been stated in evidence before me.
2657. With regard to the shorter hours during the week day, would you retain them? Yes, I would.
2658. You would not shorten or lengthen the present hours? I think the time allowed is long enough.
2659. Even in the case of houses near theatres, you would not give an extension? No, I would not alter the hours.
2660. Have you had much experience of the old law in the country? I have.
2661. In what part of the country? On all the gold-fields, west and north.
2662. You have been a Magistrate for a considerable period? Since 1853—thirty-three years.
2663. Cases must have come to your knowledge as a Magistrate showing that the publicans near the stations in the interior must have dispensed fearful poison to some of their customers? No doubt.
2664. Do you think the system still exists? I think the liquor sold in the bush is in most instances atrocious.
2665. That is still so? Yes.
2666. Could evidence be easily obtained as to the quality of the liquor sold in the bush? I think that if it were sought by clever men it could be.
2667. You have heard that in country districts some of the keepers of low-class houses make all kinds of abominations for the express purpose of stupefying their victims? I have heard so, but no cases have come under my observation.
2668. You have heard of cases in which men have given publicans heavy cheques, and have been hounded;—have no such cases come before you? I could not say positively; my experience extends over such a large number of years.
2669. Do you think the administration of the Licensing Court satisfactory for the administration of business? I think so.
2670. There is no delay in dealing with matters? No.
2671. Do you think the Courts are sufficiently strong and meet sufficiently often to transact their business regularly, and to get rid of it? Yes.
2672. Do you think the constitution of the Courts gives satisfaction? I believe so.
2673. The alteration in the new law, giving power to Licensing Magistrates and releasing the Licensing Bench itself from a number of duties, which it alone could perform—was that beneficial? Yes, that is proved by the results, I think.
2674. Some of the police have thought differently, and have said that they preferred the Court constituted as it was in Mr. Dillon's time, when all offences went to the Licensing Court, of which he was the Chairman, instead of being distributed. Do you think there are any reasonable grounds for preferring the old Act to the present? No.
2675. The old tribunal could only proceed according to law? That is all.
2676. And that is what the Stipendiary Magistrates do? Precisely.
2677. It is after all a question of what ought to be considered evidence? Yes.
2678. And whether you, as a Court, have a right to accept any but the best evidence? Precisely.
2679. Of course you are aware that a large number of prosecutions initiated by the police have failed? Yes.
2680. And that has disappointed the police? Just so.
2681. So much so that they say that they have no encouragement to lay prosecutions? Yes. I need hardly tell you that when a constable has a case he likes to succeed. He, so to speak, identifies himself with it. A Magistrate who has had any experience will guard himself against any feeling of that kind—he must be ruled by the evidence; but the constable takes an entirely different view; so much so that I have adopted a phrase of my own—"the police mind,"—as being brought to bear upon a certain thing. "The police mind" is not a Magistrate's mind.
2682. Do you think the constable, as such, has any incentive to institute prosecutions—that is, any professional motive as a policeman? I could not say that. I think he is desirous of succeeding in his case. I have heard it said that constables will receive promotion according to the number of cases or something to that effect, but I know nothing about it.
2683. Most prosecutions brought before you are by persons of higher rank in the force? The assistant inspector generally lays the information, and it is proved by a constable.
2684. The constable's mind, so to speak, has gone through that of the assistant inspector—the evidence he has would have gone through the alembic of the other mind? Clearly.
2685. It is assumed that the superior officer is satisfied of the violation of the law and of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the charge? Yes; the case to his mind is as clear as day. The Magistrate may may be morally certain that a man is guilty, but he knows that the constable has failed to prove the case, and there is no conviction; then the constable is nettled.

2686. Mr. Hyam.] When a number of persons are found in a public-house on Sunday, ought the onus of proof to rest with the publican as to whether they are lodgers or not;—do you think that such a law would have the effect of repressing Sunday selling? I do not know whether it would have the effect. It would be desirable to pass such a law. I think that the onus of proof ought to be with the publican.

2687. Mr. Hutchison.] Suppose you take evidence on both sides which satisfies your magisterial mind that perjury has been committed, and the legal proof is wanting, how can you decide in such a case, except by your feeling of moral certainty that the publican is guilty—the evidence is of such a nature that you feel morally certain that the police are right? You are mistaken. The evidence is not of the nature you state. The evidence may produce a moral certainty in my mind, but that is not legal proof; it is only a suspicion, and the things leading up to it produce a moral certainty.

2688. You think that the police should be helped? It is a Magistrate's duty to help them as much as possible.

2689. The police should be helped in some way by law to make out a case, without bringing forward evidence as to seeing the people drinking? It is a pity that a case cannot be proved legally without the necessity of seeing them absolutely drinking.

2690. Mr. Hyam.] The persons who are found by the police drinking in a public-house are fined as well as the person who served the drink? Yes.

2691. Is it right that these persons should be fined—would it not be better to produce them to witness against the publican? It is frequently the case that they are fined and then made witnesses.

2692. But they are unwilling witnesses? They are on their oath though.

2693. But if they were not punishable for drinking during prohibited hours they would be more ready to give evidence against the publican? I would place no more reliance on what they said. The usual practice in the Courts is to charge first the customers with drinking and afterwards the publican.

2694. Would it not be better to do away with that provision? No; they should be punished pretty well as much as the publican.

2695. If there were no publican to serve there would be no customer to drink? No.

2696. Mr. Hutchison.] Can you conceive of a case where the person who drank was fined and the publican got off? That seems paradoxical.

2699. You say that after three convictions a confirmed drunkard is called a vagrant, and may get three months? He is a vagrant by law when he is convicted.

2700. The extending of the imprisonment to three months has a deterrent effect? It is a very serious thing to take away a man's liberty for three months.

2701. Men do not come before you so often after they have undergone a three months' imprisonment? In all probability they would be like the giant refreshed.

2702. Ready to go in again? Yes.

2703. Mr. Hyam.] In cases where a man has been convicted three times of drunkenness he must be convicted of having been disorderly as well as drunk before he can be sentenced to imprisonment,—is that the law? He must be charged with three convictions as well as drunkenness—he is not charged with drunkenness alone—and if that charge be proved he is liable to an imprisonment of three or six months.

2704. Without having been disorderly? I think so.

2705. We have had evidence of a large number of hotels having bars up-stairs? I have known such cases.

2706. If that were reported to you would that affect the renewal of the license? I could not say that—I do not say that—I do not know why it should. I think that the Crown is losing a certain amount of money by those bars; in my opinion they ought to pay a license for each bar.

2707. Would you compel them to pay for a separate license for each of those bars? I should make them pay considerably more than for one bar. It seems to me that a house with a bar opening into one street and another opening into another street has a wonderful advantage over a house with only one bar.

2708. Would you prohibit upstairs bars? I do not like them. Every facility ought to be afforded for the police to visit them.

2709. In ordinary cases you do not care to give a decision on any but clear legal testimony, as there is a danger of it being upset, but that does not apply to the renewal of licenses, does it—I mean in a case where you have overwhelming testimony given against a house by the police? In such a case I should want to know a little about the policeman's conduct. If he gave evidence to that effect, I should want to know why he had not brought a case before the Court.

2710. In many cases this has been done, but it has been impossible to get a conviction, although it was morally certain that the law had been broken. If you refuse to renew a license where it is morally certain that the law has been broken, you will not be liable to have your decision upset; would it not be just to refuse the license? No, I would not take it away unless three convictions were recorded against the house.

2711. Then you cannot take away a license unless there are three convictions recorded? Every Magistrate keeps to the Act.

2712. I had an impression that the Magistrates had power to refuse the renewal of a license where there had obviously been glaring breaches of the law? There must be proof of those glaring breaches of the law.

2713. And if there were? If there were I would not grant the license.

2714. Although there were no three previous convictions? I did not say that.

2715. President.] If you had evidence that a number of people were seen going in and out of a licensed house during prohibited hours, would that justify you in refusing the license? I do not think it would.

J. Buchanan,
Esq.
21 May, 1886.

- J. Buchanan, Esq., 21 May, 1886. 2716. Mr. Hutchison.] Are there any grounds on which you can refuse to renew a license except after three convictions? Yes; if the rooms are not up to the required standard, if the premises are in the immediate neighbourhood of a Public School, and so forth.
2717. I have an impression that there are no refusals of licenses unless there have been three convictions? I think you had better get rid of that impression as soon as you can.
2718. Do you know anything about private clubs springing up? I have heard of them.
2719. Could you suggest any remedy with regard to them? No, I think they should be treated like ordinary sly grog selling places.
2720. Do you think they should be licensed? If a private club is to be licensed it would have to go through the ordinary course.
2721. If they got liquor in, and supplied themselves during prohibited hours, would you have them licensed? I cannot give a general opinion—each case would have to be dealt with on its merits.
2722. Mr. Roseby.] We have had considerable evidence that drunkenness is increasing among young people;—would you increase the age under which the publican is prohibited from supplying liquor, from sixteen years to (say) eighteen years? I am not aware that there has been any great increase of intemperance among young people,—it has not come before me.
2723. It has been stated that young people got drunk at these up-stairs bars, but were not so bad as to be arrested? I have had no experience of that.
2724. If that is a fact, do you think that what I have suggested is the proper remedy? You might increase the age to eighteen years.
2725. Do you think it is desirable that respectable young women should be employed to sell liquors behind bars? I do not think it is desirable that young girls should act as barmaids; but I have never in all my experience had a young woman summoned before me for any offence under the Licensing law.
2726. In any new law then you would prohibit their employment in that capacity? I do not like to touch the liberty of the subject in any way if I can help it. I do not approve of barmaids, but I do not think it would be prudent to prohibit their employment.
2727. I understood you to say that you believe in the principle of local option? Yes.
2728. You also stated that in your opinion there are too many public-houses? I think so.
2729. Do you know that as a fact scarcely any of these houses have accommodation for occasional travellers? No; but it may be difficult sometimes to get lodgings. It is in evidence that the houses have the accommodation that is required by law—it may not be sufficient for the requirements of the town.
2730. What would you think of an inspector saying that out of 180 licensed houses in his district there are not half a dozen that have accommodation for travellers? I cannot understand it.
2731. In point of fact they are mere drinking shops? I can only say, as Chairman of the Licensing Bench, that it is in evidence that they have the required accommodation.
2732. The number of rooms? Yes.
2733. They cannot provide comfortable accommodation? It may depend on the word “comfortable.”
2734. Do you not think that it is a thing which ought to be remedied? Yes, but I dispute the fact.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Whittingdale Johnson called in, sworn, and examined:—

- Mr. W. Johnson. 2735. President.] You are one of the Stipendiary Magistrates of the city? Yes.
2736. How long have you held that position? Two years.
2737. Prior to that date you were, I believe, a Magistrate in Bathurst? I was Commissioner in charge of the Western Gold-fields for ten years; I was a Commissioner of Lands for about eight years; I was an officer of the old Gold-fields staff from 1852, and I have been acting as an official Magistrate from the year 1856.
2738. Acting as Stipendiary Magistrate you have adjudicated upon a great many cases for breaches of the Licensing Act? I have.
2739. You are aware that the police, who I think nearly always prosecute, complain of the difficulties they experience in obtaining convictions? Yes, I am aware that they do.
2740. You have probably sat yourself on cases where the proceedings were foiled by the want of evidence of a sufficiently good stamp to justify a conviction? Yes.
2741. Speaking generally, what is the deficiency in the evidence in these cases—I am now speaking of convictions for Sunday selling—what is the nature of the deficiency or the legal blemish in the evidence? It is sometimes the absence of direct evidence of the commission of the offence—that is of delivery; at other times it is the multitude of witnesses for the defence who deny the facts stated by the police. My own practice is this:—If I have the evidence of two police officers of a high class, or of two men of long standing in the force upon whom I can rely, I take their evidence against any amount of evidence brought forward on the other side. I do not care how many witnesses may deny the facts which they have distinctly sworn to; I feel satisfied that their evidence is correct, and that the evidence for the defence is not. I may mention that in many instances convictions are quashed by the Court of Quarter Sessions because they believe evidence which we do not believe; that is to say, they take the evidence for the defence, while we ignore it if we are satisfied of the integrity of the witnesses for the prosecution. The only instance in which I have dismissed a case upon the evidence for the defence was perhaps one in which a constable who had been recently appointed to the force was the principal witness. I did not feel inclined to take his unsupported evidence against that of half a dozen apparently respectable witnesses.
2742. Can you tell us whether that criterion is used by other Stipendiary Magistrates? I think by the whole of the permanent officers, 2743. Have there been cases in which convictions founded upon such evidence as you have referred to have been quashed? Yes, frequently, but not so much latterly. Latterly I have been surprised to find our convictions more generally upheld at Quarter Sessions; but some time ago it was almost a certainty that if an appeal were made the conviction would be quashed. The Judges believed in evidence in which we would place no credence.

Mr.
W. Johnson.
28 May, 1886.

2744. The appeal being in the nature of an absolute rehearing lets in any quantity of other evidence, of which advantage is taken by the appellants? Yes, I suppose so; of course I cannot say what actually occurs.

2745. You cannot tell whether the evidence is better, or whether there are a greater number of witnesses? I think the Judges go by the rebutting evidence, which we do not believe; that is the only way in which I can account for it.

2746. That is rather surprising. We have two tribunals—one a tribunal of the first instance, the second an appellant tribunal; the appellant tribunal weighs evidence because of its numerical strength, while the lower tribunal ignores that circumstance; am I stating the case too strongly? Not at all; I can only account for the quashing of the convictions in that way.

2747. Have there been cases in which more than two members of the police force have given testimony of this kind, and in which the convictions based upon it have been quashed? It may have been so. I could not speak from recollection. There are seldom more than two police witnesses; one goes into the house, the officer outside at a signal follows. That is the way in which the information is obtained.

2748. Do you think that in any amendment of the law it would be well to provide for the hearing of cases of appeal in the same way in which they are heard in the Supreme Court—that is to say, would you tie the appellant down to his grounds, so that no new evidence might be sprung upon the respondent? I think there ought to be no appeal against matters of fact, because it is impossible for a Court of Appeal to judge of these cases as we can do—we have a much better opportunity of judging of the credibility of the witnesses than they can possibly have. Very often the Judge only reads the depositions. I ought to state perhaps that I have never been present at an appeal.

2749. We are justified in inferring that you disapprove of this Court of Appeal? I do. I have not known of an instance of a conviction being quashed except upon a point of law—to which I do not object—in which I did not think the Magistrate was right and the higher Court wrong.

2750. Is that opinion shared by all the Stipendiary Magistrates? By every one of us. We have been greatly hampered and discouraged by the action of the Appeal Court at Quarter Sessions.

2751. Do you think much perjury is committed in the hearing of these informations under the Licensing Act? I do—in every case where there is a defence and a conviction.

2752. Are we to gather from that answer that the police evidence is always based upon fact and the other evidence upon fiction? I have stated that when officers of responsibility in whose statements we have absolute credence swear to a fact and that fact is denied, we convict upon their statements, as against the denial of facts by the defendant.

2753. Have you ever known a case in which you thought the evidence of the police was weak? A few. There have been one or two cases in which officers of high standing were not engaged, and in which I gave the benefit of doubt to the defendants. In such cases I do not say there was perjury—at least there may not have been.

2754. Have no cases come before you in which you have had a suspicion that the police evidence might have been a little bit too professional—I mean by that, that there has been too much police evidence—evidence too much coloured by an ambition on the part of an officer to distinguish himself? I think that in one or two cases they have assumed facts which have not been clearly shown to exist—they have proceeded upon inference.

2755. As a matter of common sense do you think the police have any motives in laying informations except upon good grounds? None whatever.

2756. Not even that of promotion? No.

2757. You do not think a constable gets promotion because he succeeds in your Courts? No. The only doubtful cases as regards the prosecution have been where informers have been employed—then the evidence is always very doubtful.

2758. By informers you do not mean policemen in disguise? No.

2759. Are you of opinion that the Act could be improved as regards the kind of evidence sufficient for a conviction—at present you must prove sale or delivery—do you think that ought to be necessary? Delivery is proof of sale.

2760. But there are two kinds of offences—the offence of the man who supplies and that of the man who is supplied—; do you not think the Act is capable of amendment as regards the evidence of these offences? We take a man leaving with liquor to be sufficient evidence of sale.

2761. But suppose a man is merely found upon the premises, do you not think the burden of proof ought to be put upon him? I think that any person found upon the premises during prohibited hours, who is not a bona fide lodger, or a traveller, or servant, or inmate of the house, and who cannot satisfactorily explain his position to the Court, should be held prima facie to be drinking in the house. I think the publican should be liable for selling, upon the same evidence.

2762. We are told that the adoption of that practice would probably introduce a large amount of perjury? Perjury is inseparable from these cases.

2763. Do you not think you could devise some procedure which would not open the door to perjury, and which would yet be efficacious in gaining convictions for undoubted violations of the law? Under the plan which I have suggested the police would have no difficulty in finding out the circumstances under which a certain man came to be in a certain house during prohibited hours. In nine cases out of ten they would be able to prove that he was not a lodger or a traveller—they would probably discover that he was a labourer living in the vicinity. In the first place the man would be asked to give his name and address.

2764. The policeman's knowledge would only meet the case of some habitué of the neighbourhood. A number of people who drink in public-houses on Sunday would not be known to the police? Of course a number would not. The Bench would have to use their discretion.

2765. The police complain that they cannot get convictions? They get about 200 convictions every year; I think that in two-thirds of their cases they obtain convictions; I am certain that not one-half of the cases are dismissed.

2766. They say they do not take up many cases because they do not obtain convictions? Of course there is difficulty in getting information.

- Mr. W. Johnson.
28 May, 1886.
2767. Applications for renewals of licenses are frequently opposed by the police upon the ground that the applicant is an habitual violator of the law, or that they suspect him of being such : in cases like that do you ask for a record of the convictions? Yes.
2768. Then you accept none but the best evidence as to convictions? No.
2769. You do not believe that a man is a violator of the law until he is proved to have been convicted? No ; of course if there is a conviction it is available at once.
2770. Do you stop the police from making any statement by asking if they have convictions? We do not wish to take evidence upon which we cannot act ; we hear what they have to say, although we may not entertain their statements as valid objections.
2771. There is a provision in the section relating to objections which permits you to entertain any objection which is not frivolous or vexatious? We thought it dangerous to entertain the principle of cancelling a license already in existence upon a suspicion, there being no actual conviction for an offence.
2772. But suppose the law were amended giving you discretion in the matter expressly in words? Then we would use it.
2773. But as it stands you do not feel disposed to assume a discretion, notwithstanding the words "frivolous or vexatious"? No ; but I may mention that in cases of transfer from one man to another, where the man is not holding the license, we entertain objections of the character which have been indicated, and sometimes refuse the transfer on that ground. If a man to whom it is proposed to transfer a house has a bad reputation we do not hesitate to use our discretion. In such cases we take suspicious circumstances into consideration. The police may say that from the way in which a man has previously conducted a house he is an improper person to hold a license ; in such a case we should very likely refuse the transfer to him.
2774. Do you think the punishments for drunkenness are of any avail? Not for habitual drunkards—none whatever ; and I think they are very hard upon casual offenders. I jotted down this morning several suggestions in reference to these matters, and I will now hand them in for the information of the Commission. (Papers handed in.) I think that habitual offenders, after (say) six convictions in three months, or some such term, should be treated as rogues and vagabonds, and should be sent to gaol for a lengthened period, or, better still, to a reformatory for not less than twelve months. I fancy, speaking from memory, that nearly one-half of the cases for drunkenness in the Police Courts are those of habitual offenders.
2775. You remember old faces coming up again and again? Yes ; they go to gaol for seven days and then they come back again.
2776. Do you think it would be of any use to attach any stigma to the punishment of habitual drunkards—in France, for instance, they are taken off the list of voters? I do not think they would care very much about that. They are so degraded that the loss of civil position or status would be of no consequence to them—they are past all that ; and, moreover, a great many of the habitual offenders are women. The course you suggest might be a deterrent, perhaps, in the case of mechanics or artisans who are brought up (say) five or six times in the course of the year.
2777. Then in the statistics of drunkenness you think that one-half will be found to be habitual drunkards? Yes.
2778. Do you not think that the present system of employing the police, and having accommodation in the gaols, and so forth, is a very expensive way of treating them? Very.
2779. And you think that the other mode which you suggest would be cheaper, even though they were not reformed? I would have them work in the reformatories ; I would not send them to comfortable asylums. I would send them to institutions where they would be kept sober, and where they would work.
2780. Then habitual drunkenness would be treated by you as a crime? Yes, partly as a crime.
2781. Some people look upon habitual drunkenness as a form of lunacy, and regard it as the duty of the State to look after its lunatics without enforcing compulsory labour ; you think that at a certain stage drunkenness becomes a crime, and ought to be treated as such? Yes ; if it were arrested in the way I have suggested it would be prevented from degenerating into lunacy.
2782. Have you anything to suggest as to the forms of licenses, and as to the cost of them? I think there should be two classes of licenses. The large hotels should pay an increased fee, say £100, and for that they should have special privileges. Bars might be allowed in any portion of the building which would be convenient. The accommodation would require to be very large, and they might be allowed to remain open for a longer period.
2783. Longer than at present? Yes. I believe at home the large hotels are open at all hours of the day or night, for the convenience of persons arriving by railway or steamboat. Persons arriving here at an early hour of the morning find every place shut up.
2784. You suggest a higher class of houses, with a higher class of licenses? Yes ; I would have the ordinary houses with the present fee, and restrictions as to hours, with only one bar on the ground-floor.
2785. Are you in favour of such licenses as the English beer licenses? I do not think beer is so much consumed in this country by the lower classes as it is at Home ; I am not in favour of Colonial wine licenses—I think they are a great curse. The wine-shops degenerate into places where spirits are sold, and the stuff sold as Colonial wine is often more injurious than spirits.
2786. Is that your experience in the country? Yes ; I refuse every wine license in the city unless in connection with an eating-house ; I have set my face against granting them per se.
2787. Do not you think that opinion is based upon the inferior character of the wine sold? Yes ; I consider the places a cloak for sly grog selling.
2788. But suppose a respectable man is willing to retail the best Colonial wine he can get, do you not think it desirable that he should have a license? On a large scale ; the sale of wine by a well-known respectable man connected with a vineyard might be desirable ; but the licenses are generally applied for by small shopkeepers and greengrocers, and I do not think it is desirable to make those places drinking-shops.
2789. The Sunday closing system meets with your approbation? Upon mature consideration of the point, I think it would be better to have the houses opened for an hour on Sunday afternoon. It is impossible to prevent Sunday drinking, and I think it would be better to have a small amount legalized than that the infraction of the law should continue in the wholesale way in which it does. It is impossible to put down this drinking, without making the law much more stringent in the way I have indicated.

That,

That, perhaps, would only lead to more perjury; I think it would be better to allow the houses to remain open (say) from 1 to 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

2790. As to the hours on the other days of the week? I do not think they should be altered—I would not extend them.

2791. Do you not think the closing hours both on Sundays and on week-days have been beneficial? Yes, especially the earlier closing upon week-nights. Men find the houses closed at 11 and they go home.

2792. When you suggest that the houses should be opened for one hour on Sunday you presume that the penalty for supplying drink or drinking at any other hour will be made sufficient to act as a deterrent both to the publican and to the public? Yes; and, as I have said, I think that any person found upon the premises should be held to have committed an offence unless he can satisfactorily account for himself.

2793. And as a kind of compensation for that you would give this one hour's relaxation? Yes; I would make the law more stringent during the remainder of the day. Of course Sunday is the holiday of a large class of the population—that must not be forgotten.

2794. Would you have the Sunday selling further safe-guarded by providing that the drinking should be off the premises? No; because that would lead to what takes place upon Good Friday—people would go out on to the pavement and drink there; that of course creates more disorder than the drinking inside.

2795. What is your opinion of the local option system now embodied in the law,—is it at all effective—that is to say, does it elicit the opinion of the people, or are they apathetic? I think in many cases the vote is given to increase the value of the existing public-houses by restricting the number. I think that is quite as often the case as any bona fide intention of reducing the liquor traffic.

2796. Would you apply the system to renewals? Not unless the owners were compensated.

2797. Mr. Hutchison.] Have you any scheme of compensation to suggest? It would be monetary compensation of course.

2798. Supposing a suspensory Act were passed such as was passed in England in 1874, giving the present holders of licenses a monopoly for three years, and then submitting their licenses to a popular vote, would not that be sufficient compensation? It is a matter I have not attempted to work out—I have not thought about it at all. I do not think my opinion upon the point would be of much value. I lay down the general principle, that it would be wrong to crush out the houses without compensation.

2799. Seeing that the law is defied upon Sunday, you would meet that defiance by allowing the houses to open for one hour on that day: do not you think you would have as much difficulty as you have at the present time in enforcing the law during the remainder of the day? I would make the law more stringent.

2800. Providing the law were made sufficiently stringent, and could be enforced, would it not be well to continue the entire Sunday closing? I think that if the public-houses were opened for one hour there would not be such a persistent attempt to break the law during the prohibited hours.

2801. You are familiar with the operation of the old law? Yes.

2802. Was it not openly violated on Sunday? Yes; there was no machinery to detect violations—no trouble was taken in the matter.

2803. I think the police have an idea that if the houses were allowed to open for a short time it would be more difficult to enforce the law than with entire Sunday closing? Inspector Lenthall, who is principally in charge of public-houses, agrees with me, I believe, upon this point.

2804. Inspector Lenthall is engaged only as an inspector—he does not get convictions? He is engaged as an inspector.

2805. The police have an idea that they are hardly dealt with in the cases of renewals—they think the Magistrates are of opinion that unless there are three convictions they cannot refuse to grant a renewal? The Act mentions three convictions as a disqualification, and we considered that it would be unfair to cancel a license upon a suspicion that an offence had been committed, for which the Act requires a conviction.

2806. Yet you say that if the character of a proposed transferee were bad you would withhold the transfer? There is a vast difference between refusing to grant a thing and cancelling a thing in existence. I do not think that in the cases which have been specially referred to there were any convictions at all. We refused to destroy an existing right upon a suspicion.

2807. In such cases would you accept one conviction, or would you require three? I cannot say. As far as I can recollect, there were no convictions in the cases which have been referred to. I would not like to say what I would do in a case which has not been brought before me.

2808. President.] Supposing there were an objection to a renewal based upon only one conviction, would you consider that frivolous and vexatious within the meaning of the objections specified in the Act? No.

2809. In an aggravated case, where a constable you knew gave undoubted testimony as to the general character of a man who was continually violating the law, do you think you would be justified as a Magistrate in refusing a license upon one conviction? I think so. When the question was raised as to these suspicions of infractions of the law no convictions whatever were recorded against the men. All that we said was that we did not feel authorized in refusing a license where there was only a suspicion of infraction of the law. With one conviction and a bad character given by the police, I should myself be very much inclined to refuse a license; but we sit as a Bench.

2810. When would you begin to treat incorrigible drunkards as rogues and vagabonds? After six convictions in three months.

2811. What is the law now? They must behave in a disorderly manner, and there must be three convictions.

2812. Mr. Roseby.] I understood you to say that you were in favour of opening the houses for an hour on Sunday? Yes.

2813. Is there any general public desire for a return to the old state of things? I think the persistent attempts to obtain drink against the law shows such a desire among that part of the community, at all events, who would use the houses on Sunday—that is the labouring classes. It seems like having one law for the rich and another for the poor when these men who have no other opportunity of obtaining liquor for use on Sunday should be debarred from getting what they want on that day.

2814. Do you think it is principally the labouring classes who go to these houses on Sunday? Yes, chiefly mechanics.

2815. Is there not less open drunkenness on Sunday than formerly? There are as many cases of drunkenness on Monday as before—I have observed no difference in the sheets.

2816. Has there been any increase in drunkenness among the young people of the city of late years? I think

Mr.
W. Johnson.

- Mr. W. Johnson.
28 May, 1886.
- think there is—I think I have seen more boys and girls brought before me for drunkenness since I have been in Sydney than I had observed before.
2817. Do you not think the age at which drink can be supplied should be increased beyond sixteen—in some places the age is twenty-one? That would be rather arbitrary.
2818. Would you not fix it higher than sixteen? No, I think sixteen is high enough.
2819. Are you aware that some of the houses now licensed have upper bars in addition to the bars in the street? It is no part of my duty to inspect public-houses, but cases have occurred in the Court showing the existence of upper bars.
2820. It is said that these bars are principally presided over by females;—are you in favour of females serving drinks at the bars of public-houses? No, I am decidedly opposed to the practice.
2821. Are you aware that the majority of the houses are mere drinking-shops, and afford no accommodation whatever for the public? I am aware of the fact.
2822. Do you know that that is the case where houses have had special permits on account of having an extraordinary number of rooms? I am not aware of that fact personally.
2823. When applications are made to you in these special cases they are granted, are they not? They are not granted as a rule—we grant them if necessary.
2824. Where the houses profess to provide a large number of rooms do you attach much weight to the petitions against them? I do not attach much value to the petitions for or against—we go chiefly by the police evidence.
2825. Is it not generally against the houses? It is not always against hotels of a commodious class.
2826. Do you not think it right that the people should have a voice in the matter, and say whether the houses should be licensed in their neighbourhood? I have no objection to the local option vote.
2827. Have you not known licenses granted where the police and the inhabitants also have objected—in spite of these objections, has not the license been granted because the house had a certain number of rooms? There have been such cases; the licenses have been granted, not simply because the houses had a certain number of rooms, but because the Bench have thought it desirable to encourage houses of that class, to shut out the smaller ones.
2828. The testimony of the people and of the police have had no weight with the Bench? We have used our discretion. At the last quarterly meeting at which I sat the whole of the conditional applications were refused; no less than four large hotels were refused, because we did not consider them necessary.
2829. Mr. Fowler.] I suppose the police generally take the objection that the houses are not required? Yes.
2830. And they did so in the case of these larger houses? Yes, upon that ground they were refused.
2831. Unless the applicant is a man of bad character I suppose they would not press the objection very much? They would press the objection if they thought the house were not required.
2832. Unless the Bench are clear that a man is of bad character, and that he has been convicted, they will not refuse a renewal? No; we thought it unfair to refuse a renewal upon suspicion.
2833. Do you think that the opening of the houses on Sunday would cause less illicit selling? I think it would.
2834. Why? Because men would have an opportunity to get drink for a short period, and the law being made more stringent it would be less likely to be evaded.
2835. Mr. Colls.] Do you know that a large number of private drinking clubs have been started in the city? The fact has not come under my notice.
2836. You are not aware that there are such places? Personally I am not.
2837. You are opposed to up-stair bars? Yes; except in large hotels, where there is no danger of their being abused.
2838. The fact has been brought under our notice that there are private bars in small hotels? I think they should be confined to one bar upon the ground floor.
2839. Would you issue beer and Colonial wine licenses for small houses which cannot accommodate the public? I am not in favour of these restrictive licenses, because spirits are invariably sold.
2840. You are in favour of general licenses? Yes.
2841. You are aware that in the suburbs it is difficult to get accommodation at the hotels? Yes, I am. That is why we have encouraged the better class of hotels.
2842. Mr. Davies.] You have had very little experience of the operation of the old Act in Sydney? None whatever. Of course I administered the Act in the country, and upon a gold-field with a population of from 20,000 to 30,000.
2843. How many public-houses were then in your police district? Fifty or sixty in a single gold-field.
2844. You cannot tell, so far as the city is concerned, whether the present law has been an improvement upon the old law? I have no doubt that it is an improvement, judging from the operation of the old law in the country towns.
2846. What is the general character of the houses in the hands of the brewers—are they a lower or a better class of houses? They are being constantly transferred. I do not think they are a very high class of houses.
2847. Do you think it desirable that brewers should have control of public-houses? They are not allowed any special control; they are the owners of the property, and they lease the houses to tenants.
2848. They use some of them as places of decoy, so as to get a trade and sell at higher prices? I object to all small houses—I think they are an unmitigated evil.
2849. Under the present law there has been a reduction in the number of houses in the Metropolitan District? Yes.
2850. As far as your experience goes, has there been a general improvement in the character of the houses in the Metropolitan District? Yes.
2851. Are there frequently objections lodged against renewals and transfers of licenses? Not a large proportion.
2852. Are the objections lodged by the police, or by the police and the residents? Occasionally by the police and residents.

2853. Upon what percentage of these objections would the Bench refuse to grant transfers or renewals? As far as my experience goes, we refuse the bulk of them; we refuse wherever there is a well-grounded objection. In the last cases in which I sat I refused the whole sheet.

2854. You are in favour of opening the houses for an hour on Sunday? Yes.

2855. What is your experience of the old law, when the houses were opened from 1 to 3 o'clock? I do not think there was any exceptional disorder.

2856. Was there not a larger amount of open drunkenness? I cannot speak as to Sydney. My object in suggesting that the houses should be opened for an hour was to limit, if possible, the infractions of the law. I thought that if the publicans were allowed one hour they might close their houses during prohibited hours, and by making the law more stringent and offences easier of proof I think we should reduce the number of infractions.

2857. Have any great proportion of people expressed a desire that the houses should be opened on Sundays? No; but the fact of the working-classes risking the fine, and of the publicans habitually breaking the law, shows that there is a desire on the part of a certain class to obtain refreshment on Sunday as well as upon other days. Of course well-to-do people have drink in their own houses, and do not require to go to the public-house; it is the unfortunate artisan, who cannot keep liquor in his own house, who has to depend upon getting it at some time upon Sunday. I admit that it would be an experiment. Notwithstanding constant fines and cancellation of licenses, the illicit trade goes on year after year.

2858. Has there been an increase in drunkenness? There has been no diminution, nor has there been any diminution in the number of Sunday-selling cases.

2859. You recommend that high-class houses should be opened at all hours of the night? I am told that in England large hotels are opened for travellers at any time of the night; I would not allow them to be opened for ordinary sale at all hours, but they ought to be accessible to persons arriving by early trains and steamboats.

2860. Has there not been a vast improvement in the character and behaviour of the community in consequence of the earlier closing of public-houses? There is less drunkenness at night—there is no doubt about that.

2861. Would it not be dangerous to the morals of the community to open even large hotels at night? I do not think the large hotels would be frequented by the class of persons who frequent the others; I think they might be opened until 12 without serious risk of disorder.

2862. You are not aware that some of the largest hotels in the city were the sources of the greatest disorder under the old Act? I was not aware of that.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Glentworth W. F. Addison, Esq., S.M., called in, sworn, and examined:—

2863. President.] You were among the first batch of Stipendiary Magistrates appointed for the city? Yes.

2864. In addition to your city experience, you have had a country experience? Yes.

2865. The total period covering how long? Twenty-eight years; first as Gold Commissioner for Northern Gold-fields, and subsequently Police Magistrate at Tenterfield and Maitland.

2866. In the course of that period you have constantly adjudicated upon licensing matters? Yes, constantly.

2867. Do you consider that during the past few years there has been an increase of drunkenness in the Colony? I think so, decidedly.

2868. The habit of drinking has increased? Yes.

2869. And therefore the apprehensions for drunkenness? They have been more numerous.

2870. Do you think the increase has been a marked or a gradual one? It has been more gradual in the country; in the city it has been more marked because the Licensing laws do not seem in any way to better the former state of things.

2871. You think then that the Licensing laws, so far as the checking of drunkenness is concerned, have not been successful? No.

2872. Do you think that that is perhaps owing to the nature of the punishment inflicted upon drunkards, and especially habitual drunkards—I mean the mere repetition of the punishment? I think so, in a great measure.

2873. Do you think the punishment is ineffective? It is one ceaseless round of punishment; it is simply filling the gaols every week, without the slightest amelioration.

2874. You see habitual drunkards brought before you constantly? Yes. I have jotted down a few suggestions on the subject. In the first place, I think that first and infrequent offenders are unnecessarily degraded even in the mode of arrest. I do not know whether the members of the Commission are aware of the fact, but first offenders at this end of the city are marched under police escort through the streets from the cells at No. 4 Police Station to the Water Police Court like so many felons. There are sometimes as many as thirty and forty. I think their being treated in this way, like criminals of the worst class, tends to degrade them. In the case of the other Courts the prisoners are brought up to the Courts in vans. These first offenders are placed in the dock among the worst criminals. This humiliates the offenders themselves, while it has no deterrent effect upon the bystanders who form the audience. I would suggest that all first offenders should be brought before the Magistrates privately and discharged. I also think that they should be brought down to the Court in vans, and that they should not be paraded through the streets. I do not know any other country in the world where such a thing is done. I think it is continued from ignorance—the fact not being generally known. Why should other offenders be brought from Darlington in vans, while these men are dragged along the streets? It is, of course, entirely a police matter.

G. W. F.

2875. Mr. Davies.] Has this matter been represented by the Bench? The police authorities do not like to be interfered with.

2876. But has the Bench taken no action in the matter? I do not think so. We took action at Maitland, with the result that a van has been provided.

2877. President.] You are speaking now of the Water Police Court? Yes; only of the Water Police Court. I think first offenders should be dealt with in the manner I have indicated, except offenders upon bail, who might be fined 5s., or detained until the rising of the Court. If they were simply bailed they would receive no punishment whatever, whereas the other offenders have been in all night. I think that offenders, for a second or third offence, should be tried publicly and fined or imprisoned as at present. After three previous convictions offenders should be dealt with as vagrants, and be imprisoned without the option of a fine. Imprisonment acts far more as a deterrent than mere fining. Men will pay a fine and go out and laugh at you. They would far rather pay £5 than go to gaol for even a few days. They cannot stand imprisonment alone—they can always get the money and that is why I make this suggestion. I think that old offenders of confirmed drunken habits should be sent to an inebriate asylum and there detained for one or more years. They might be discharged during the term, if so recommended by the superintendent and two medical officers. Every such inebriate if capable, should be made to perform work of some description towards the cost of his living. That plan would take away an immense number from the gaols. Some offenders are sent there week after week. They go in and out like a whirligig. If after a certain number of convictions you send them to an asylum, you get rid of them, and perhaps cure them. Many have been cured by this system. It has been tried for many years in Belgium where they have Maisons de Santé. Those institutions are very successful. Some of the inmates enter voluntarily and are supported by their families.

2878. Are the Belgian Maisons de Santé purely voluntary? I think they are chiefly voluntary institutions.

2879. Then the Government could not use them for the purpose you suggest? In other countries they have them under State support. They have them in Victoria, I believe; but I cannot speak authoritatively.

2880. You say that at any period of the term you would discharge an inebriate upon a medical certificate? Yes.

2881. Then you regard the detention as a criminal matter; you do not look at it from the point of view of the reformation of the drunkard. Take the case of an habitual drunkard. The certificate to which you refer might not mean that he was in any way reformed. Would it not be better to have a specific period of (say) six months' detention, with no chance of release? I have suggested that the term might be, if necessary, one or more years.

2882. But suppose the man is discharged at any moment upon an examination by a person who has no knowledge whatever of any reformation? I would have the certificate of the superintendent and of two doctors.

2883. Are you supposing that some kind of lunacy is developed by drunkards? We have lunatics, from two to five and six in number, at the Water Police Court every day; this is in a great measure the result of drunkenness.

2884. In the course of a week, perhaps, a man confined in the Asylum might be discharged under the plan you suggest; that is what I should like to avoid? That is a matter for legislative detail; I give merely an outline of the plan.

2885. But do you not agree with me that there should be a given term of detention? Yes, in the first instance. I may mention that the cases of lunacy to which I have referred do not appear in the newspapers. The Magistrate in the Summons Court hears all the lunacy cases every morning the first thing. We generally have from two to six cases, and they are generally due to drunkenness; I think I may safely say that two-thirds of the cases are the result of drink. Many of the men simply have the horrors. The medical man, Dr. Egan, will perhaps ask for a remand for a week; then the case will come on again. Perhaps it may so continue for two or three weeks, then the man will be discharged. If he is so bad that he cannot be discharged, a second doctor is called in, and then the man is sent on to Callan Park. These cases are not generally known, because they are heard in private. Of course the door is open, but the cases are heard in a smaller room; they could not very well be heard in the Court.

2886. Do they stop long at Callan Park? Not long, I think. In many instances the sergeant in charge will say, "This man has been here twice before for the same thing."

2887. That raises the general question: Do you think legislation should regard drunkenness from the point of view of punishment or from another point of view—the reform of the victim? I think it should decidedly consider the reform of the victim. I conceive that drunkenness is more in the nature of a disease, especially when it reaches a certain stage.

2888. You think that drunkenness in itself is a self-regarding offence? Yes, we know that it is often hereditary. In such a case as that it is impossible for a man to prevent it unless other persons prevent it for him. We have numberless instances of that.

2889. With regard to the closing of houses, do you not think that the shutting of houses on Sunday and the earlier shutting of houses on other days has had a tendency to decrease drunkenness? I do not think it has had the slightest effect in that direction. I think that more business is done, and that it is done secretly and illegally. The police are laughed at, and there is no good effect whatever. I think that persons take more pleasure in drinking in secret, upon the principle that stolen apples are the sweetest. The time being limited, I think they drink more in half an hour than they would otherwise drink during the whole day.

2890. And you think the stuff sold is perhaps worse, because it is sold in violation of the law? I do not think that—I think it is generally bad at all times.

2891. You think that the spirit is raw and young? I think there is a great deal of white spirit used, because it can be made into anything.

2892. And the beer? I think the beer is pure as far as it goes, but that is not saying much in its favour.

I think it tends to make men more drunk than most other things. Nearly all the men brought before us for drunkenness get drunk upon Colonial beer.

2893. Do you think that the delirium tremens to which you have referred arises chiefly from imbibing Colonial beer? Yes, I think so. They take it in large quantities—they take what they call “long-sleevers.”

G. W. F.
Addison, Esq.,
S.M.

2894. Have you any suggestions to make as to licenses? I think there should be two classes of houses,—one, consisting of hotels proper, and the other of ordinary public-houses. The first class should pay a fee of £50, with an additional fee of £10 for every extra bar. As a matter of public convenience, I think these hotels might be allowed to remain open until 12 o'clock. They would include such houses as “Petty’s” and the “Royal.” I do not think the alteration would be attended by any evil effects, and it would be a great convenience to the public. The other houses would pay, as at present, a fee of £30, with the exception of those in the vicinity of theatres, which might be allowed to remain open until 11:30 p.m. upon payment of an extra fee of £10. The theatres are generally full, and when people come out they naturally want a drink; they are not drunkards, and I think that this convenience might be granted them without bad effects. In London they have night-licenses, and certain houses remain open until half-past 12 and 1 o'clock in the morning. I would not advocate that, nor would I advocate the stop I have just suggested if I thought that it would have any ill effects upon the community. The law at one time allowed the houses to remain open until midnight.

2895. One of your brother Magistrates suggested that the fee for the better class of houses should be £100, but he would make no charge for extra bars? I do not think you will find any hotels in the city with more than three bars. I would have no up-stair bars—I would have them all upon the ground floor. I think up-stair bars take away all chance of police inspection, and I do not see the necessity for them. In Wynyard Square there are two or three hotels having two bars; but they have one in each street—one in the square and one in the lane. That is the case with “Pfahler’s” and “Maloney’s,” and I think the “Café Français.” I think a fee of £100 would be too much. The expenses of these first-class houses are very heavy, and many of them do not do one half the bar business that is done by the smaller houses. Roberts’s, for instance, does an immense bar business—four or five times as much as is done by any first-class hotel. I think a fee of £100 would be disproportionate.

2896. What are your views as to the Sunday closing? I should like to see as little trading as possible done upon Sunday; but I have come to the conclusion that we must keep the houses open for a couple of hours in the middle of the day, with a view to destroy the present system of secret and illegal sale. I think the houses should be opened from 1 until 3 o'clock.

2897. You do not think that less than two hours would be sufficient? No; I think it would be a half measure, and that illicit selling would go on just the same afterwards if the time were limited to one hour.

2898. Mr. Davies.] You think it necessary to go back to the old law? Yes, unfortunately.

2899. Are you aware of the drunkenness which existed under the old Act? I am.

2900. Although the houses were supposed to be opened for only two hours, the shutters and doors were closed and the customers were retained in the houses much longer? I believe that was the case in some instances.

2901. You had not much experience of the operation of the Act in Sydney? No, I had not.

2902. I presume that in the centres of population in which you were previously located you observed that a great deal of evil resulted from the Sunday opening? Yes.

2903. There was a great deal of drunkenness? Yes.

2904. Do you think there is as much drunkenness in the city now as under the old Act? I do, and under worse circumstances.

2905. Do you think there are as many arrests and convictions for drunkenness on Sunday as prior to the passing of the present law? I think the number of cases brought before me now upon Monday is simply appalling. On Monday mornings I have to deal with say from forty to sixty cases.

2906. You were one of the first appointees to the Bench of Stipendiary Magistrates? Yes.

2907. In what year did you come to Sydney? In January, 1882.

2908. Are you aware that in 1881, the last year of the old law, the total number of apprehensions for drunkenness was 22,657, and that in 1882, the first year of the present law, the number was 19,639? Yes, there was a decrease in that year. The publicans were frightened, and they seemed to think that their best policy was not to open on Sunday. After that they gradually eased off, and those who kept shut found that it was to their disadvantage—in fact it almost led to their ruin to do so. The consequence is that in recent years three-fourths of them have been selling on Sunday, which they did not do in 1882.

2909. Was not the law more stringently administered during 1882 than it has been in 1884 and 1885? Yes, I think so. We had a far worse class of men to deal with; we have since weeded out a great many.

2910. Are you aware that there has been a reduction in the number of public-houses in the Metropolitan District? Yes; wherever we could shut out bad houses we have done so.

2911. How many out of the 822 publicans in the Metropolitan District do you suppose observe the law as to Sunday selling? We can only go by the police estimate, and what they say is conjecture. I believe they say that about two-thirds of the publicans disobey the law.

2912. The police say that only 193 out of 822 obey the law? That would be about one-fourth. Perhaps that is about the number. They have the best means of knowing; they can place their hands upon the offending publicans, although unfortunately they cannot obtain convictions.

2913. Have cases occurred in your district in which the police have laid informations for Sunday selling and other violations of the law? Yes, a great number of cases.

2914. What has been the cause of the failure to obtain convictions? Speaking broadly, I should say perjury on the part of the defence. Plausible defences are manufactured for the occasion, and there is no getting behind them. On the other hand, there may be a want of legal proof. In many cases in which defences have been set up we have convicted; the convictions have been appealed against immediately, and at Quarter Sessions, I am sorry to say, the Judges have constantly quashed our convictions.

2915. What means would you suggest to secure obedience of the law as to Sunday selling? I can say very little upon the subject, although I have thought the matter over constantly. As the law now stands I do not see how it is possible to do anything. The publican is the king of his own castle; it is locked up and no one is supposed to get in; if a man goes in, the police follow him, and they find a man and nothing nothing more. If this were a despotic country, the best thing to do would be to say that he should allow no one whatever in his house during prohibited hours; but the publican and his lodgers have friends, and he can if they like convert customers into friends. As long as they are not caught drinking—and they take care that it is not done publicly—no offence is committed.

G. W. F.

2916. You know the English law? Yes; I believe a lawful excuse must be given. But that is of no use; here the publicans are constantly making excuses which appear to be quite lawful.

2917. But under the English law the onus of proof is cast upon the publican; the fact of persons being found in a house during prohibited hours is sufficient evidence? I am aware of that; but, as far as I can see, that provision is of no use. The publican makes an excuse. Surely he has a right to see his brothers, his cousins, and his friends. You cannot deny him that right, even under the English law. I presume that no Bench would convict upon the bare fact of a man being found in the house.

2918. But according to the English Act that would be sufficient proof? That I do not know.

2919. The bar is supposed to be locked up, and no one has access during prohibited hours? Even if the bars were locked up officially and sealed you would not overcome the difficulty, because the publican would draw off as much liquor as was wanted, during the week, and keep it in other places.

2920. Do you think the earlier closing upon week-days has effected any improvement? I think that 11 o'clock is quite late enough for the houses to be opened, except in the instances I have named; and I would extend the time in those cases, to remove a great public inconvenience. We know that concert halls and theatres are very hot places—there is generally a large crowd, and when men get outside they like a glass of beer; it seems hard that they cannot get it.

2921. Have you not observed that most of the theatres now cater so as to close before 11 o'clock? I do not think so; I believe the performances are not, as a rule, over before 11.

2923. You have said that the same persons are brought before you for drunkenness again and again? Yes.

2924. So that it is in reality only a small portion of the community who infringe the law upon Sunday? There is always a good array of persons charged with drunkenness on Monday morning.

2925. How many? From thirty to seventy.

2926. A large number of these would be brought up again and again for Sunday drinking? Yes; but not so much the same persons as the same class of persons. I should say, on the contrary, that on many Monday mornings the great bulk of the offenders are strangers. We always ask if they are known to the police, and find that a great many are strangers, chiefly seamen and young men from up country, but generally seamen; they are of the same class—one ship goes out and another comes in. Just to show how many "first offenders" for drunkenness are brought before us at the Water Police Office, I may mention that during the six days of last week, viz., from 24th to 29th May, we dealt altogether with 146 drunkards, of whom no less than 96 were first offences.

2927. Have any cases in which brewers have had control of licensed houses come under your observation? Yes, indirectly.

2928. Many? A great many; because there are so many transfers to men who are evidently the servants of brewers.

2929. Do you think that is a good state of things? I think it is a very unhealthy state of things; I think it would be well if the premises were disqualified when the licenses are cancelled—not, perhaps, on the first occasion, but in the event of a second or third cancellation.

2930. What is generally the class of houses over which the brewers have control? I think they are generally of a second-rate character.

2931. The houses are used principally for vending their beer? There is no doubt about that.

2932. Are they the class of houses which give the most trouble to the police? Undoubtedly; those by the water-side—in Sussex-street especially.

2933. Is that in your district? Yes; Lower George-street also. There are some very bad houses in that locality—they give a great deal of trouble.

2934. After a second conviction for a violation of the law, what is the general practice among the publicans? If they see a probability of the police pursuing them, they immediately transfer—they do not wait for a third conviction. Sometimes, when a third conviction is pending, they will put in an application for a transfer, with which, however, we refuse to deal until we have dealt with the third offence.

2935. Is there much dodgery of that kind? Not much, because we have set our faces against it.

2936. In cases where there are two convictions they generally transfer? They try to get out of the house as soon as they can.

2937. What is your opinion of the principle of local option? I think the present system works well; I believe in the principle, but I think the franchise should be extended to all who are upon the electoral roll.

2938. Would you apply the principle to renewals as well as to the granting of licenses? That is rather a doubtful matter, because it would simply extinguish public-houses. I would not give that power, although I should certainly like to see a less number of public-houses—I should like them to be gradually cancelled by legislation; I would allow them so many years—I would give them fair notice. Of course if they were suddenly done away with I would give them compensation.

2939. How would you arrive at the amount of compensation? In much the same way that the Government arrive at the amount in cases of the resumption of land.

2940. I suppose you regard the traffic in intoxicating drink as an exceptional trade? Very; I think it is the cause of great evil and crime, and even ruin; but it is a legal occupation. The publicans pay for their licenses, and they incur considerable expense. The trade is their living; that being the case, if a house is suddenly done away with, a man should receive compensation.

2941. No license is granted for more than twelve months? No; but the renewal is subject to good conduct. As the law now stands the publican is certain to get his license renewed if he conducts himself properly.

2942. But suppose you apply local option to renewals? What I say could then have no effect, because the houses might be simply wiped out on a vote being taken.

2943. You are opposed to an increased number of public-houses? Decidedly.

2944. Have there been many applications for conditional licenses? Yes, and we have always encouraged them.

2945. The Bench have discretion in the granting of conditional licenses even where the local option vote is against any increase? The discretion of the Bench in this matter overrides the local option vote if the number of rooms is over twenty. As a rule, we encourage these applications; but during the last few months we have refused more than one of them where we thought they were useless.

2946. They have had the effect of putting down the lower drinking-shops as far as your knowledge goes? I cannot say that, because they are generally applied for in outlying districts such as Chowder Bay. Two of the last granted were at Balmain; neither of them is finished; but the applications were granted in the hope that the lower houses would be put down.

2947. Were any objections filed by the police or by the residents in these cases? There were objections, but the Bench did not consider them serious. As a rule, the police rather approve of the conditional licenses.

2948. As a rule, then, there is no objection from the police? Not as a rule.

2949. What is the general classification of the houses in your district? We do not classify them.

2950. Are they of a uniform character? That depends upon the locality; in Lower George-street there are more drinking-shops than anything else.

2951. Some of the houses, I suppose, are large houses? Yes; "Petty's," for instance.

2952. There is a wide difference between "Petty's" and some of the low drinking-shops? Yes; but except in our minds there is no distinct classification—we treat them as they deserve to be treated; for instance, we never have any complaints against such houses as "Petty's" and "Pfahlert's," whereas other houses of a lower class are constantly before us.

2953. Under the present law much larger accommodation is required from the publicans than under the old Act; what has been the effect of this increased accommodation? The extra rooms are generally occupied—in fact they become boarding-houses.

2954. People take up their residence there? Yes, they become fixed lodgers.

2955. They are not occupied by people who are travelling? No, by fixed lodgers.

2956. Do you think the houses could afford the accommodation necessary for travellers coming to the city? Not first-class accommodation. The first-class hotels are generally too full, and the lower houses are as a rule not fit for the respectable public.

2957. This provision as to additional accommodation is of little service then? If it be intended for travellers they certainly do not get the advantage; those who live in the city get such advantage as there is.

2958. But public-houses are supposed to exist to supply a public want and necessity? Yes.

2959. Do you think they supply that necessity? Not as to the kind of accommodation you mention. I think the houses are as much drinking-shops as ever, although they have had these rooms added.

2960. Are you in favour of beer licenses, as under the English Act? No, I am not.

2961. You are in favour of only two classes of licenses? Yes.

2962. You would apply the principle of the lower licenses to the roadside inns? Yes; with the exception of the £15 licenses under the amending Act, in the case of places away from any other houses. I would not allow barnmaids—I am very much against that; as a rule they act as decoys. I think the ruin of many young men is entirely owing to barnmaids. There are young men who do not drink immediately, but who hang about an hotel during the whole week, not so much for the sake of drink but to see one of these girls. Such men would not be there if there were a barman.

2963. You think the practice has a bad influence upon young men? Most certainly, and it does not improve the young women themselves, which is another important matter; the language they hear is enough to ruin any girl, I do not care who she may be.

2964. Are you aware of the existence of up-stair bars in the city? Yes.

2965. Have you had any representations made to you by the police as to the character of these up-stair bars? Yes. I am against up-stair bars on account of the difficulty of inspection; anything might be carried on there and the police not be aware of it.

2966. You know that these bars are leased from the publicans by females? That has not been represented to me; in fact it would be a good ground for refusing a license if we heard anything of the kind.

2967. Do you know of any clubs which have been brought into existence for the purpose of evading the law? No, I cannot say that I do. Of course clubs have great privileges; but I do not know of any bogus clubs, so to speak.

2968. You said, in answer to the President, that a number of cases of lunacy, traceable to heavy drinking, came under your notice, the victims being sent to Callan Park;—are those cases on the increase? They are certainly not on the decrease. I do not know what the business of the Central Court is in this direction, but I suppose they do as much as we do. That would comprise the whole city, because the cases from the suburbs are taken by those two Courts.

2969. These cases are heard in Chambers, as it were? Yes; it would not do to parade these unfortunate people in public.

2970. You have no doubt that these cases are traceable chiefly to excessive drinking? There is no doubt that the great majority of them are traceable to drunkenness. Sometimes there are cases of religious monomania, but those cases are far less frequent than the others.

2971. I presume some terrible cases of this kind have come before you, arising from drink? Very bad indeed, exhibiting most unhappy circumstances with reference to the families of the lunatics.

2972. Have you any suggestions to make to the Commission as regards legislation which would be the means of treating drunkenness as a crime? I have no suggestions to make beyond those which I have already given. I might perhaps here observe, however, that the Act says that all liquor shall be measured according to imperial measure. It may be in favour of the drunkard, but I think that the law in this particular ought to be carried out. The consequence of the present practice is that whereas some years ago you obtained a fair quantity of liquor for 6d., the quantity has been gradually getting less and less. In some houses publicans must make a monstrous profit upon the portion they give. If they sell at all they should be made to sell up to the standard.

2973. What is your experience of drunkenness among the youth of the Colony? I think it is absolutely appalling.

2974. Young girls and boys? Not so much girls as boys. Within the past few days we have had fellows young fellows of thirteen, fifteen, and seventeen up for drunkenness. They came up with the greatest effrontery and with a laugh, which would lead you to suppose that they felt proud of their position. My experience, almost without exception, is that they regard the charge of drunkenness as a distinction of which they ought to feel proud.

2975. Are they sent to gaol? When they are very young we avoid gaol as much as possible—we send them to the cells for a day or two; or if the offence is a trivial one, they are detained until the rising of the Court.

2976. Do you find that drunkenness among boys is increasing? Yes; I put it down to the very high wages the young fellows receive, and which they generally pocket, and to the entire want of control by parents or any one else. After tea, out they sally and enjoy themselves for the night. No doubt drunkenness increases with them; and one thing leads to another. They use bad language, and it becomes filthier every day. Presently they gamble. There is a great deal of gambling among the youth of the city. Only to-day I had several very small boys before me for playing pitch and toss. That is the cheapest form of gambling. In almost every lane in which they can assemble on Sunday you will find them playing this game—boys of seventeen or eighteen down to eight or nine years of age—they all join in it.

2977. Has this growth of drunkenness and vice been very marked during your experience upon the Bench? During the last three or four years it has been very marked—every year it seems to become worse. I put it down to high wages, and to the entire absence of control.

2978. Have any complaints been made to you as a Stipendiary Magistrate by wives as to the drunken habits of their husbands? We have such cases every day.

2979. Consequently you have a knowledge of the distress and misery caused in many homes by the drunken habits of the bread-winners? Yes; of course there are a large number of women who drink too.

2980. Mr. Colls.] You said that the men were marched along the Circular Quay to your Court? Yes.

2981. Are females marched along with them? Yes; there are often twelve and fourteen policemen to guard say ten or twelve offenders. The police, of course, are required at the Court, but it looks sometimes a very formidable guard.

2982. President.] The police think it a grievance that the Magistrates decline to go into evidence against an applicant for a renewal on the ground of his being a violator of the law in fact but not according to conviction; the Stipendiary Magistrates have given us their reasons for that; they do not feel justified in taking away a man's license without the very best evidence of a violation of the law; you are of the same opinion? Quite so; I think a license should not be taken away upon mere suspicion, however strong.

2983. In the 36th section of the Act there is a proviso permitting the Court to entertain any objection not being of a frivolous or vexatious nature. I cannot tell you what the Legislature meant, except, perhaps, that the general words were intended to give a large discretion to the Magistrates over and above the specified objections. The police officer opposes the license, and says that he has seen men go in and out of the house on Sunday, or that he has seen them there standing round a table in a group; but he cannot prove a conviction;—you refuse to go into evidence on those occasions? Yes, we blocked it at once. I was present when we first agreed upon the point, and established the principle upon which we have since acted.

2984. Was that at the beginning? No; some time last year. We thought that so important an objection should be specifically stated, and that we were not justified in entertaining it merely upon the ground that it was not "frivolous or vexatious."

2985. What do you consider then is referred to in the proviso to the 36th section? Matters which may have been overlooked and forgotten in legislation. I suppose the words were introduced so as to give all the comprehensiveness possible to the clause. As a matter of fact the objections referred to in the proviso are seldom raised, which shows that the specific objections seem to answer all purposes. We have seldom any additional objections such as the proviso mentions.

2986. Suppose the Legislature were engaged in amending the law do you not think it would be right to give effect to the reasonable suspicions of reasonable men? Yes; it would be different if the law expressly said so. That seems to me to be the only way to get at the matter.

2987. You will miss a great many cases if you have to depend solely upon convictions? I confess that the police are regularly cornered at the present time.

2988. Have you formed any opinion as to the extent to which adulteration is practised? No; only from what I have heard indirectly from the police. I believe the chief adulteration consists in the fact that the spirit sold under different names is white spirit doctored up.

2989. Then in point of fact it is not adulteration? Of course it is still spirit.

2990. Adulteration would seem to mean the addition of some foreign liquid or substance, such as are enumerated in the Act; but the spirits which seem to give so much trouble are actually white spirits flavoured so as to imitate brandy or anything else? It is a counterfeit—it is a sham brandy; but I suppose it is not adulteration, and the law does not touch it. If I may be allowed, I should like to make a few suggestions as to procedure under the Act. I think that all licenses should terminate upon the same day, the fees to be paid proportionately. Then as to transfers, I think applications should be lodged some days previous to hearing; at present there is no provision for that. The application is sometimes put in the day before the hearing, and the police have no time to make inquiry as to the character of the transferee. I think that at least seven days' notice should be given. I think, also, that provision should be made for continuing a license while premises are being repaired or rebuilt. Section 45 does not meet the case—that refers only to cases of tempest or calamity by fire—it does not include cases of repair and rebuilding. The stoppage of a license while premises were being repaired or rebuilt might throw a man out of his business altogether.

2991. You would have the liquor sold upon neighbouring premises? Yes. I further think that provision should be made to allow a widow to carry on a license for a longer period than three months in the event of letters of administration not being granted within that time. The other day we had a case in which a widow had carried on a license for four months because letters of administration were not taken out. Then I think that packet licenses should be removable from one vessel to another of the same class. There is no provision at present for the removal of Colonial wine licenses—and there is no provision now for change of sign. As to removals, I think the Court at which applications are to be heard should be determined; there is no mention of the matter in the present Act. I would also suggest a reduction of fee for the transfer transfer of a Colonial wine license. At present it is too high—£2—the same as for the transfer of licenses for which £30 is paid. There is at present no penalty fixed for the sale of less than 2 gallons by a wine and spirit merchant. Then as to the publication of regulations under section 75, I think they ought to be promulgated; the Act provides for them, but they have not yet been published.

G. W. F.
Addison, Esq.
31 May, 1886.

2992. Mr. Colls.] What is the position of a grocer holding a wine and spirit license? The Act says that he cannot sell less than two gallons, but it omits to provide a penalty.

2993. President.] Have you any suggestions to make as to the onus of proof in the case of persons found drinking in houses during prohibited hours? Plenty of excuses will be made, whatever the law may be—it is easy for the publican to make a lawful excuse. Of all places for perjury commend me to the Courts of Sydney, especially in licensing cases—they stop at nothing—men who were not even present will come forward and swear anything.

2994. Have you anything to say with reference to the appeals? We are all dissatisfied with the conduct of the Courts of Quarter Sessions; we do not see how we can get fair play; we are in a far better position to judge of the credibility of the witnesses—we can watch their demeanour in giving evidence. Frequently after we have determined cases the defendants will manufacture defences, and will prove alibis and all sorts of things. I think the appeals should be confined to points of law. As to the facts we can judge quite as well as the Judge in the higher Court two months afterwards. Moreover the defendant makes affidavit on appeal that certain witnesses were not procurable when the case was first heard, and new evidence is introduced. We know very well that some of the witnesses have committed perjury, and that we can almost invariably rely upon the statements of the police officers. The Judge sees a number of apparently respectable men, say six or seven, opposing the statements of two policemen, and wonders how any Magistrate could have been mad enough to convict. With regard to my remarks as to local option, I should like to say that I approve of the franchise being extended to women. I am not a great advocate for what are called women's rights; but I think that this being such a domestic and social matter, women, above all others, should be allowed to vote.

2995. Mr. Roseby.] You thoroughly approve of the principle of local option? Yes.

2996. Mr. Hutchison.] As to the application of local option to renewals, you think that a system of compensation might be worked out by giving the publicans notice for a certain number of years? Yes.

2997. If a suspensory Act were passed, giving the existing publicans the right for three years to their present licenses before the question was submitted to a vote, do you think that would be sufficient compensation? I do; it would come to the same thing as giving the publicans the notice I have suggested. For instance, in the case of State aid to religion it was announced that it would cease upon a certain date, and the denominations made arrangements accordingly.

2998. But the publicans would not necessarily be disestablished by the vote? Of course not.

3000. Mr. Colls.] Do you think the opening of the houses for a few hours on Sunday would stop the initiation of these drinking clubs? I do not know of any such clubs; I think that all the clubs in Sydney are kept strictly within the provisions of the law.

3001. I know that since the Commission has been sitting two clubs have been created for the purpose I have named? Still they must keep within the law. There was a case the other day at Balmain. The club was proved to be an athletic club, duly constituted. No one was supplied with drink except the members of the club and their guests. The case of course was dismissed.

3002. The clubs to which I refer have been instituted for the purpose of procuring drink on Sunday? I know nothing of any such clubs.

3003. Have you not many cases in which wives seek for prohibitions against the supply of drink to their husbands? No; considering the population of Sydney there are fewer than one would expect. The prohibition is so easily evaded in Sydney. The man would perhaps send a boy to a public-house with a bottle, and three-fourths of the publicans of Sydney, if a man went to them under a prohibition, would not refuse to serve him with a drink, so long as there was no policeman looking; they would certainly not send the man away—they are not conscientious enough for that. In the country towns, where there are only a few houses, the case would be different.

3004. Do you think £30 a sufficient fine for sly grog selling? I think it is quite enough for a first offence.

3005. Have you many of those cases? We have had a good many, chiefly from bawdy and boarding-houses of the lower class. With regard to urinals, I should like to mention that there is no provision in the Licensing Act for urinals. The Act requires two conveniences, which are taken to mean water-closets. The consequence is that men are brought up every day in the week for offending against decency in the streets. In nearly all these cases they come out of public-houses more or less tipsy, and the offence is committed owing to the want of urinals.

3006. Mr. Withers.] I was surprised to hear you express the opinion that no improvement had resulted to the drinking habits of the people from the closing of the houses on Sunday; do you think there has been an increase in the number of persons laying themselves out to drink, and that young persons have been initiated to the extent that they would otherwise have been? I think so.

3007. Do you think that there is a greater probability of persons who are casual strollers, and who have no great thirst, especially young men, finding their way into the houses with all these difficulties and restrictions? Of course if they had no great thirst, and if they had no taste for drink they would not find their way in.

3008. Was there not much more temptation to those persons to go in when the houses were opened all day? There might have been.

3009. Do you not think, therefore, that there ought to be a slight improvement in the drinking habits of the people? I do not know, but I think that anything would be better than the present state of things. If the secret selling could be got rid of without opening the houses I would be one of the first to advocate it. I regard the opening of the houses on Sunday as a desperate remedy.

3010. Persons who intend to get liquor by hook or by crook will generally get it; but do you not think there are thousands of persons who would not, so to speak, be initiated, if the houses were closed all day on Sunday? There are many persons who go down to Manly Beach and who obtain a liquor there who cannot be described as drunkards. These persons would be glad to get a drink if the places were opened. Another class which seems to be forgotten, is the class which send their jugs to the public-houses at dinner-time;

G. W. F. Addison, Esq., S.M.
31 May, 1886.

time; they are deprived of that advantage at present, and they also cannot be described as drunkards. Of course the higher classes have their cellars full and do not care two pins.

3011. Presuming that there is as much drunkenness as there was, do you not think that the persons who drink secretly now are a less nuisance than they were under the old Act, seeing that the publican has to shepherd them? Yes, that is so; for his own sake the publican keeps them in; the streets and their surroundings look more respectable.

3012. Is not that a consideration? Yes, it is. So far as appearances go, I admit that if you go up George-street on Sunday they are more satisfactory inasmuch as you do not see men drunk at the corners. That is an assistance to respectability; but the police get the offenders in the long run, before the night is out, and the proof of that lies in the fact that they are brought before us on the next morning.

3013. But the public gain by the evil being kept out of sight? Undoubtedly, to that extent.

3014. Is not that a good reason why you should retain the present system of closing on Sunday? I do not think any system can be good under which you have three-fourths of the licensed victuallers violating the law every Sunday of their lives.

3015. President.] Then you think that legislation which is above the average moral standard of the public must be wrong? I think so; but I think also that we should legislate at the other end, and deal with the drunkards more than with the publicans. I think that every deterrent which can be used should be used to put down drunkenness per se; the other improvement will follow. If men want to drink, they will get drunk in spite of all the publicans. I think that if drunkards were sent to an asylum you would put a stop to it to a great extent.

3016. Mr. Withers.] Do you not think that thousands of young men, having the high wages to which you have referred, when they have exhausted their recreations out of doors, are deterred from entering public-houses owing to the difficulty attending their doing so? I do not think there is any difficulty—I think they can get in anywhere. Now almost all houses will receive them; because those who shut up and obey the law find that their custom suffers. If men cannot get in on Sunday they put a black cross against the house, and they will not visit it during the week days.

3017. But they cannot get liquor as freely as if the doors were opened? No doubt; and some of them will be afraid to try. I would open the houses—and I do so reluctantly—in order to put a stop to the existing state of things. If the present law could possibly be enforced, I would be in favour of enforcing it.

3018. Do you think that if the publicans all agreed to close their houses on Sundays and adhered strictly to their bond, that it would have the effect of making the general public cry out for the opening of the houses? I do not, although I think the plan itself would be a good one if the publicans could be induced to carry it out. When we have so many trades unions I do not see why we should not have a union of that kind among the publicans.

3019. You think there would be no outcry from the public? I am sure that there would not be—that is, from those whose opinion is worth having.

3020. Mr. Hutchison.] Then you think that the publicans are factors in the opening? They are; even if nine-tenths of them would agree to close it would have the best possible effect.

3021. You have suggested that houses in the vicinity of theatres should be allowed to remain open until half-past 11 o'clock;—have you considered whether these houses would not be so densely crowded by those who have been shut out from other houses as to leave no room for the theatre-goers? I have considered that; but I think you must consider the convenience of the public as well. I do not think the houses would be crowded for so short a space of time; it would be different if they were to be opened for several hours.

3022. Mr. Withers.] In referring to the question of compensation, I understood you to say that you would give compensation in the same way as if the Government resumed the premises for any public purpose? That is the principle I laid down, with some modification as to details.

3023. Mr. Hutchison.] You have referred to youths being brought before you charged with drunkenness;—would it not be possible to put them on their oaths, and make them prove from whom they got the liquor—would not that be a deterrent to the publicans? You would not get the truth then; these boys are the biggest liars of the lot; I never knew such a place for perjury as the Licensing Court; you may hear twenty witnesses in the course of a day telling what you know to be barefaced falsehoods. There is no place in the world where there is so much sympathy with crime; I see it every day. We never have cases of indecent assault, or filthy cases involving low blackguard language, without the Court being full of fellows who are grinning, and who are positively delighted; they would cheer if they could. Four little boys were brought up at St. Leonards to-day for putting immense stones on the tramway line, so as to knock off the tram, causing perhaps loss of life; there were a large number of larrikins at the back of the Court laughing, until I had to say that I would clear the Court if I saw anything more of it. They sympathize with any offence against the law. If there is a poor girl in the box being examined by an attorney who is perhaps rather indelicate, they are delighted; the worse the thing is the more they gloat over it; there is great sympathy with crime.

3024. Mr. Rosby.] Do you think that the age at which a youth may be supplied with drink should be increased from sixteen; in some places the age is twenty-one? I do not think so, and for this reason, that young fellows of seventeen or eighteen are already men. I would not deal with a lad of eighteen out here as I would deal with a lad of that age at home. I do not think there would be any gain by the change you suggest. The two indirect causes of drunkenness among the youth of the Colony are high wages and the absolute want of control over them.

MR. DAVIES IN THE CHAIR.

Captain Arthur Money Fisher called in, sworn, and examined:—

3025. Chairman.] You are an Acting Stipendiary Magistrate? I am Police Magistrate at Yass, and Deputy Stipendiary Magistrate at the Central Police Court.

3026. How long have you been in the Public Service of this Colony? About eleven years.

3027. I presume you have had a large experience in the administration of the Licensing law? I have.

3028. Of both the old Act and the new? Yes.

3029. In your opinion has there been any marked improvement in the city, under the new, as compared with the old, law? I think the early closing has made a marked improvement, and that it has done a great deal of good.

3030. That is the 11 o'clock closing? Yes.

3031. What have been the results of the Sunday closing? I think the Sunday closing is a very good thing; but from what I have observed, I think it would be well to open the houses for one hour in the day.

3032. You are aware that under the old Act the houses were opened from 1 o'clock until 3 o'clock on Sundays? Yes; I think an hour a day would meet the case. No doubt there are an immense number of evasions of the Act; there is at the same time great difficulty in the detection of offences. I think the opening of the houses for an hour in the day might lessen those infringements of the law.

3033. Do you not know that the opening of the houses from 1 o'clock to 3 o'clock under the old Act created an immense amount of drunkenness? I do not know that there is so very much less under the present system.

3034. You are speaking more from your experience in the country? Yes.

3035. You have had no large experience of the results in the city? No; only during the five months I have been acting here.

3036. And you are of opinion that the opening of the houses for an hour on Sunday would be a means of largely preventing violations of the law? I think it would do good in that way. At present there seems to be such an immense inducement to publicans to endeavour to violate the law.

3037. Have you had many convictions for violations of the law on Sunday? Not so very many. These cases always come on in the Summons Court which each Stipendiary attends every third week.

3038. Is there much difficulty in bringing home charges against publicans who break the law? A great deal of difficulty. A publican, for instance, is brought up charged with selling liquor to persons who are not travellers, and so on, and it is proved that these persons have been to see lodgers, or something of that kind; cases fail in that way sometimes. Of course actual proof of the sale of liquor must be shown.

3039. What are the principal kinds of offences under the Licensing Act which are brought under your notice? I think the Sunday selling cases would be the principal class. I have had a few cases of delaying admittance to the police, but not many.

3040. Are the houses under the new law an improvement upon the houses under the old law? In the country the Act has done a great deal of good; the accommodation of the houses has been increased, and I think the fact of the publican having a better class of house has made him respect himself more; I think the Act has done a great deal of good in that way.

3041. There is a general improvement then? I think so, in the country particularly.

3043. You have no knowledge of the character of the accommodation found in licensed houses in the metropolitan district? I have very little knowledge of it.

3044. Do you approve of the present method of dealing with licenses by Stipendiary Magistrates instead of unpaid Magistrates? I certainly think that it is the better plan.

3045. You approve of licensing benches? Yes, I think so.

3046. Are there many appeals against the decision of the licensing court? I have been acting five months in Sydney and I have had only one appeal against my decisions; in that case my decision was sustained.

3047. Have you had experience of that kind at Yass? I have never had any appeals against my convictions, under the Licensing Act, except the one I have named. The appeal, in which my decision was upheld, was in a case of Sunday selling. Of course cases have come before me in which there has been strong suspicion, but no legal proof.

3048. Are you aware that there has been a reduction in the gross number of licensed houses in the Metropolitan District under the new law? I have heard so.

3049. Have you had occasion during your five months' experience here to refuse applications under the Act? I have refused transfers to people who have been objected to by the police.

3050. In many cases? Not so very many; I think there have been about four or five cases. In one case lately an applicant was objected to because he was said to have been seen "touting" for publicans on Sundays. Evidence was given to that effect, and although he denied it we believed it to be the case and refused him the license.

3051. Was the publican from whom the transfer was to be made a man who had violated the law, and whose license was therefore likely to be cancelled? No, I do not think so; he simply wished to get rid of his license, and said he wished a respectable man to take it.

3052. It was simply a matter of sale? Yes.

3053. Have any bogus applications for transfers from brewers' houses come before you? No, I have not seen anything of that kind.

3054. You have heard of them? Yes, I have had a good number of transfers; but, as a rule, they pass without any objection from the police. Only a few have been objected to.

Captain
A. M. Fisher.
7 June, 1886,

3055. What is your opinion of the application of the principle of local option to renewals as well as to the granting of new licenses? Local option, in my opinion, is a good thing. It seems to me, however, that at present the people interested in the matter—I mean the voters—do not think sufficiently of it; they do not seem to vote.
3056. Very little interest is taken, you think? Very little.
3057. You approve of the principle? I think the principle is an excellent one—that is to say, for new applications.
3058. Would you not apply the principle to renewals? I certainly should not be in favour of that. I should consider that there were existing rights at stake—that is to say, I should not approve of the principle without compensation. Unless provision were made for compensation I think it would be very dangerous to apply the principle to renewals.
3059. What would be the basis of compensation? The only compensation would be money value. Of course, when the license is destroyed the landlord suffers. I think it would be very hard to destroy it without compensation.
3060. Do I understand you to apply the principle of compensation to the freeholder or to the publican? That raises another difficulty. The publican may be only the lessee of the house. When the license is destroyed, therefore, the owner of the property suffers as well as the publican.
3061. Public-houses in your division, I presume, exist to meet a public convenience, and to supply a public want? Yes.
3062. And if the public, by their vote, were to say that they no longer required this convenience you think the publicans ought to be compensated? Yes; I do think it would be a harsh measure to take away their licenses without compensation. They enjoy their right under the law.
3063. I suppose you could not tell the Commission whether the arrests for drunkenness have increased during your term of office in Sydney? I do not know whether they have increased; I know that there are always a great number of persons charged with drunkenness—on Mondays particularly; but that may be accounted for by Saturday night's arrests as well as by Sunday's. At the Central Police Court I sometimes have as many as fifty or sixty drunks in a morning. A great number of these are habitual drunkards; and it is quite a farce to sentence them to the punishment which we can inflict. I always ask the serjeant sitting underneath me, about the cases, and he replies "old offender" or "first time" as the case may be. A great number of old offenders receive the full punishment of a 20s. fine or seven days; but they come up again, time after time.
3064. You think that there should be a different method of treating drunkards? I strongly think so.
3065. What would you suggest? I think that after say six convictions within a given time they should be treated in an entirely different way. I think there should be a special place for them—an asylum or a prison.
3066. You would treat them as you would treat a lunatic? Entirely. They are not responsible for themselves; it is a regular disease when it reaches that stage.
3067. Would you make the confinement compulsory? I would undoubtedly give them an opportunity to get rid of the craving.
3068. The present method of treatment fails, in your opinion? I think it entirely fails in these cases. It meets cases where persons get drunk occasionally. For habitual cases the punishment is quite ridiculous.
3069. Would you recommend that the labour of the drunkards confined in the asylum should be utilized? Undoubtedly; I think it would be an excellent plan.
3070. So that the institution would be to some extent self-supporting? Yes.
3071. Have you anything to suggest with reference to future legislation? I hardly think there is anything I could suggest, except perhaps, that there might be special legislation for the city of Sydney as to licenses. There seem to be an immense number of small hotels which do not, as far as I can see, satisfy any particular want except the craving for drink.
3072. They are simply drinking shanties? Quite so.
3073. Would you classify the houses? You might have a higher licensee-fee for first-class hotels, which might have distinctive privileges; the other hotels I would treat in a different manner. I think it would be an excellent thing if a great number of the houses were not allowed to sell spirits; beer or wine licenses would be quite sufficient for a great number of these houses.
3074. What would be the nature of the special privileges which you would grant to first-class hotels? I think first-class hotels might be allowed to remain open later, and that they might have some privileges as to Sunday selling, or something of that kind. It would be dangerous to give those privileges to the small drinking shops.
3075. At the present time a person arriving by rail or steamboat at any hour can go to any of these first-class hotels and obtain accommodation? Certainly.
3076. And in view of that fact, do you think it necessary to open even a special class of hotels to a later period at night? I do not think there would be any harm in that class of hotels keeping open later, for the sake of theatre-goers for instance; but it would have to be done carefully, and of course only a certain number of houses should be allowed to keep open.
3077. Is there a large percentage of young people among those who appear before you for drunkenness? I have not seen it at all; during the five months I have been here I have had only one lad—he might have been about 15. As a rule the offenders are well over the prescribed age at which persons may be supplied with spirituous liquor.
3078. You have no further recommendations to make which might be of use in future legislation? No, I do not think I have.
3079. Mr. Colls.] You were for some time in the Walgett district? Yes; that was a great drinking place. At times there were a great many shearers there.
3080. Used they to drink hard spirits? Yes.
3081. Could you mention any particular instance of drinking to excess? I have known of some very bad cases of "lambing down"; but one case in particular struck me as being very bad. I was going to Goodooga on the Queensland border; I was with the road superintendent in a buggy. It was an exceedingly hot day in January. We met two workmen; Mr. Adams, the road-superintendent, said they would be going to the public-house. When we arrived there we found that a number of workmen had struck work; I was not at all surprised, because the heat of the day was really awful. The two men went into the public-house, and

Captain
A. M. Fisher.

- and within twelve hours both of them were dead. I was called back to hold an inquest. When I arrived I found the bodies in a fearful state of decomposition. An inquest was held, but it was impossible to find out what were the real facts of the case. The liquor was analysed and nothing was found in it. Of course we could not tell whether it was the same liquor as that with which the men had been supplied.
3082. Are there any vineyards in that district? No.
3083. No white spirits are made there? Not that I know of.
3084. Are you in favour of up-stair bars? I think they are a mistake as a rule, but they might be one of the privileges, perhaps, of first-class and well-conducted hotels.
3085. Would you not be in favour of having all the bars on the basement floor? It would certainly render supervision easier.
3086. Would you be in favour of an extra license for each bar on the basement floor? I think so.
3087. What do you think would be a fair fee? If the licensees wish for extra bars I think they should pay for them; but I am hardly prepared to state the amount.
3088. You would recommend that they should be under the supervision of an inspector of hotels? Undoubtedly.
3089. Would you recommend a general license for the lower class of houses? The licensee-fee of course would be less. I think that many of them should not be allowed to sell spirits. I would give them beer and wine licenses.
3090. What should be the fee for the first-class hotels? It might be increased to about £60.
3091. With an extra fee for each extra bar, the bars to be on the ground floor? Yes.
3092. During your five months' experience in Sydney have you had many cases of sly-grog selling? No; I have not seen anything of the kind in Sydney.
3093. Have you many cases of lunacy brought before you? A great many; a large number are attributable to drink. I always ask the doctor as to that, and there seem to be a great number of those cases.
3094. How are these cases dealt with? Privately; there is a special room which we use for the purpose.
3095. Who is the medical man in attendance? Dr. Wilson Marsden.
3096. How long were you in the Yass district? Four years.
3097. Can you tell us whether there are any hotels in that district which have not accommodation for the public? I used to visit Cootamundra, Frogmore, and Binalong. The hotels at all those places have had accommodation for the public since the passing of the Act.
3098. There is a great deal less drinking there? There is not so much drinking in Yass, compared with what I had seen before in the country.
3099. Mr. Withers.] Can you suggest any legislation of a deterrent nature—legislation which would have the effect of lessening the drinking habits of the people? It is a most difficult thing to impose a deterrent. No doubt a great number of people will persist in drinking to excess whatever you do. I have already said that I think the habitual drunkard should be treated in an entirely different manner.
3100. It would not be well to introduce flogging? That would be a great mistake, for really many of these people are hardly answerable for what they do; they are dypsomaniacs.
3101. It has been suggested that an inebriate asylum should be established? That would be an excellent thing. If a man is convicted of drunkenness six times in a limited number of months, I think you might fairly call him a drunkard, and treat him as such.
3102. He should be treated, you think, more as a diseased man than as a criminal? Assuredly.
3103. Having had considerable experience in the country, you think that there ought to be distinct legislation applied to the metropolis? My only reason for saying that is that the country houses, as far as I have seen, give accommodation, and are really necessary, whereas in Sydney there are any number of houses which do not attempt to give accommodation at all, but which simply pander to the drinking desires of the public.
3104. You think that road-side hotels, which are kept clean, and which afford proper accommodation, are very desirable? I do. At Walgett some of the hotels were very bad indeed. I went to one place at Walgett to put up my horse; the landlord knew perfectly well who I was. I said, "Have you anything for my horse?" "No," he replied. "What am I to do?" I asked. "You must do a perisher, I suppose," he answered. So, of course, I took the horse away. I have not seen that sort of thing about Yass, where I have been lately; the place is much more civilized.
3105. The drunkards who appear before you, you expect to see until the end of their term? They will be coming up constantly unless their treatment is altered; there is no hope for them.
3106. You think it will be well to legislate so as to prevent the rising generation from following the same habits? Unquestionably.
3107. Do you think the age at which persons may legally be supplied with spirituous liquors is fixed too low? My experience does not show that the age ought to be extended; I have seen no necessity for it. In the country there were no cases in which youths were brought before me for drunkenness, and since I have been acting in Sydney I have had only one case.
3108. Do you not think there ought to be a stringent provision against females obtaining liquor until they become women? I think that it would be wise.
3109. They are frequently the cause of youths being led to destruction? Just so; and they cannot really require the liquor.
3110. Then you think that girls should be prevented from obtaining drink until they are of age? I think it would be a good plan. I see many girls brought up for riotous conduct, drunkenness, and so forth.
3111. They are within the prescribed age? Oh, yes.
3112. It has been suggested that the age should be raised to eighteen? I have seen no necessity for it myself; I do not think you would do any harm by increasing it to eighteen, and you might do good.
3113. It has been suggested to me, by a retired publican, that if the publicans were to come to an arrangement to absolutely close all the houses on Sunday for a few months it would bring about a cry from the people to have them opened. Do you think it would have that effect? I do not think it would.
3114. You think the general public prefer the houses being closed on Sunday? I think myself that there may be a good number to whom it would be very convenient to have the houses open for an hour upon that day. I have heard of cases in which a great deal of beer has been got in on Saturday; a case of that kind came before me at Redfern. If the people will have it, it is better that they should be allowed to get it legitimately for an hour on Sunday.

Captain
A. M. Fisher.
7 June, 1896.

3115. It has been suggested that it would be well to have the liquor at different strengths, in order that persons who are "nipping" may regulate their drink, so as to prevent themselves from becoming intoxicated. It has been suggested that the liquor should be ticketed, and that as it comes down in strength so should the price be reduced;—what do you think of that plan? I have never thought of such a thing. I do not think that much of the weaker liquor would be asked for. Persons can weaken their liquor as much as they want to do when they obtain it, in the ordinary way.

3116. But they would not pay so much? Well, I confess that the idea is a novel one to me, and of course I have not thought of what may be said for or against it.

3117. Do you think it would be of any benefit? I do not think so. As a rule I do not think people would care about asking for the cheaper liquors; I am afraid they would not be very largely consumed.

3118. You know the quantity of "shouting" which goes on. A man may desire to take several glasses of grog out of compliment. Instead of taking a third nip of strong grog, which might make him intoxicated, he would take a nip from one of the weaker brands? I am afraid the suggestion would be of no practical benefit.

3119. You are in favour of absolute closing on Sundays? I think it would be a good thing for the better hotels to be opened for an hour; that is one of the privileges I would concede to them.

3120. If only a few houses were opened might they not be crowded out? I do not think so.

3121. Would they not be a resort for those who would otherwise have a difficulty in getting a drink? No; I think the publicans who keep the large hotels would take care that everything was conducted properly.

3122. Have you a number of young fellows brought before you? I have many brought up for larceny and such offences, but drink does not appear to have anything to do with them.

3123. Have you found that drinking is much associated with gambling? No; I do not think so at all.

3124. Can you speak as to the accommodation offered by the houses within a radius of (say) 20 miles of Sydney? No; I cannot speak as to that.

3125. There is an impression that you can get better accommodation for yourself and your horse a hundred miles away from Sydney than within a radius of 20 miles of it? I could not speak as to that.

3126. Mr. Colls.] You visit Newtown and Redfern as a Police Magistrate? Yes.

3127. Do you get accommodation there at the hotels—that is to say, can you get a good luncheon if you require it? I applied once, but I have not tried since.

3128. It has been reported that several drinking clubs have been started in Sydney since the closing of the houses on Sunday? I have heard so.

3129. Do you think that the opening of the first-class hotels for an hour on Sunday would have the effect of abolishing these clubs? Yes, I think so, seeing that the clubs are said to have been started owing to the closing of the houses.

3130. Mr. Roseby.] You think there are too many public-houses in Sydney? Yes.

3131. And that the social and moral welfare of the people would be improved if the number were reduced? I think the drinking shops should be reduced, if possible, with compensation.

3132. You think that the people should, in some form or other, have the right to say what number of public-houses should exist in their vicinity, if some equitable compensation could be arranged? If compensation is allowed I think they should have the full right to say how many public-houses should exist.

3133. It was thought that when the Act came into force, demanding increased accommodation, the public would be able to find such hotel accommodation as they required? Yes.

3134. But your observation and experience leads you to suppose that that has not been the case in the city? In a great number of cases, undoubtedly, it has not.

3135. Would you be surprised to hear that in one metropolitan district, containing 120 public-houses, there are not ten houses which could give a man and his wife or family anything like comfortable accommodation? I can quite understand and believe it.

3136. Would you believe that that is the case in respect to houses to which you have granted special licenses on account of their large accommodation—that is, their great number of rooms? I should not have thought that.

3137. Since you have been in Sydney have you given licenses to any of these houses on account of their enlarged accommodation? I do not think a case of that kind has come before me.

3138. I was surprised to hear you say that you had not observed any increase in the drinking habits of the young. We have clear evidence, from the principal police authorities, that it is a fact that the young people in Sydney are much given to drink. In most instances, perhaps, they do not reach that condition in which people are dragged to the watch-house; they perhaps manage to get home somehow; but persons who are competent to judge tell us that of late years there has been a large increase in drunkenness among the young. If that is true, do you not think that the age at which liquor may be supplied to young persons should be increased beyond sixteen? I have seen nothing of the drunkenness of which you speak. If I found that that state of things existed I would at once say that the age should be increased to eighteen. If an evil of that kind exists it might certainly be remedied to some extent in the way you suggest.

3139. Would you have the detention of drunkards in the inebriate asylum voluntary as well as compulsory? I think it would do a great deal of good if many persons could be induced to go to such a place voluntarily.

3140. You think that fresh legislation ought to provide for an institution of that character? Undoubtedly.

3141. Have you formed any opinion as to the desirableness of employing females in the bars of public-houses? There is probably a good deal of evil attached to the custom. I am not speaking only from my experience during many years in the army in England and in India, but I have seen a good deal of harm resulting from the practice here. It seems to me, however, that some kind of harm would arise from the occupation, by females, of a similarly public position in any place.

3142. As a man of the world, do you think that the language and scenes at a large proportion of the public-houses are fit for respectable females? I think that girls might be allowed in some of the better conducted hotels. There are hotels in Sydney where the girls behind the bars come to no harm whatever; they are well looked after, and they never hear any bad language. There are other places in which they ought not to be allowed.

3143. But taking the majority of public-houses, which you say are mere drinking shanties, are they places in which girls should be allowed? Undoubtedly not; I think girls ought not to be allowed in those places. On the other hand, I suppose the girls behind the bars in these low houses do not mind the language or they would not be there.

Captain
A. M. Fisher.

7 June, 1886.

3144. Have you ever thought that the fact of the bar of an hotel being closed would not prevent it from giving to travellers comfortable accommodation in every respect? Of course it would not.
3145. It does not follow, that because spirits and beer are not sold, the hotels would not provide every accommodation required? That is so.
3146. As to the Sunday closing, if the law says that the houses are to be closed ought not citizens, such as you and I, be obliged to obey the law? Of course; if they do not obey it they are supposed to be punished.
3147. Should not effective means be employed to detect infractions of the law? I do not know what means, other than those already used, could be employed.
3148. But as a matter of principle, ought not that to be done? Of course; that would apply to every offence. I would not take these violations of the law out of the category of other offences.
3149. At present the law fails in this respect, does it not? It is almost impossible to make any law which would answer the purpose if the parties interested mean to break it.
3150. I will put a case: One of the principal police officers mentioned a house where he had seen forty or fifty people in the backyard, and between thirty and forty people in the front of the house. When he got into the house he found six men under one bed, four men under a sofa, and six men in a closet; but notwithstanding all these facts he was unable to obtain a conviction? If the publican was charged with selling liquor the police would have to prove the sale. I think it was very foolish on the part of the men to get under the beds.
3151. Do you not think the fact of all these men being seen going in and out of the house sufficient evidence that they were there for an illegal purpose? I hardly think you could say that; there might be boarders in the house, and the men seen going in might be going to visit them.
3152. But 300 men would not go into a house in one day to see boarders? I have never heard of an instance of the kind you name.
3153. Have you been in any district where railway works have been in progress? No, they have been completed wherever I have been.
3154. Mr. Hutchison.] You concede the hour upon Sunday with reluctance? Yes.
3155. If the law could be maintained as it is now you would prefer it? Oh, yes.
3156. It is because of the difficulties which have arisen in connection with the law-breaking that you would concede the hour? I concede it because I think it would be a lesser evil than the evil against which we have to contend at the present time.
3157. Is it not possible that the difficulty might be augmented by opening the houses for an hour on Sunday? I do not think so.
3158. But the propensity of men to drink when they have once begun would induce them to remain in the house, and the temptation to sell would still be as great on the part of the publican? No doubt that difficulty would have to be met.
3159. Would you accompany this concession with more stringent legislation so that the law might be rendered absolutely effective? It would be necessary to be particularly careful in the matter of renewals—that is to say, if any offence of the kind you suggest were committed on Sunday, it should be allowed to go against the renewals, without the proof that drink was actually sold.
3160. Why not treat the offence in that way at the present time? The matter is surrounded by a great deal of difficulty.
3161. You do not think there is a necessity for opening the houses on account of the public clamour for that step? I do not know; you see these clubs have been started because the houses have been closed on Sunday.
3162. But I understood you to say that you did not think there would be a public clamour if the houses were all absolutely closed on Sunday? Perhaps that is true of the general public, but it is very difficult to answer questions of this description on the spur of the moment.
3163. Do you know the nature of the proof necessary to obtain a conviction in England for selling drink during prohibited hours? No, I do not.
3164. We are led to believe that the Act there, simply requires the police to prove that any number of persons were on the premises. The publican has to prove that they were there for a lawful purpose. Would not that meet the case here? Yes; it might in some cases; but it would generally be said that the persons were there to see friends or boarders.
3165. But that would have to be proved? Of course.
3166. I was surprised to hear you say that in many cases where the police failed to get convictions, the publicans had sworn that the inmates of the house were visiting lodgers. Would that be a valid excuse? Undoubtedly; because you would have to prove that the publican was supplying liquor.
3167. You have been very successful in your convictions? There has been only one appeal, and that was upheld.
3168. Have you had many convictions under the licensing law? A fair number, I think. The appeal arose out of the first case I tried in Sydney. I dismissed a case under these circumstances which were suspicious. A publican was summoned for selling on Sunday, and another person was summoned for buying the liquor; the constable saw the man go into the house and did not notice that he had anything under his coat. He saw him come out with a bottle of beer under his arm. The man who had the beer swore that he had taken it from his son's place, and that he simply called in to see the publican. The publican's wife and the publican himself swore that those were the facts. The man's son swore that he had given him the beer the night before, having got in 5 gallons. The son's wife gave evidence to the same effect. No doubt the circumstances were remarkably suspicious; but there was no legal proof.
3169. The sale of liquor by a servant, in the absence of a proprietor, would not uphold a conviction? According to the present state of the law it would not.
3170. But you would alter it? Undoubtedly; I think a publican should be responsible for the acts of his servants in that way.
3171. Are you aware that many publicans have escaped through this loop-hole? I am.
3172. You say that no interest is taken in the present local option vote? Not much in the country; there is perhaps an endeavour to keep down the number of houses in the interests of those who already hold licenses. That is the only interest I have seen taken in the matter.
3173. Would not more interest be taken if the basis of the vote were broadened? I would widen it as much as possible.

Captain
A. M. Fisher
7 June, 1886.

3174. You would apply the principle to renewals, with compensation? Yes.
3175. Suppose a conditional license is asked for to-morrow, and the Magistrates see their way clear to grant it; they know quite well—everyone knows—that the granting of that license means putting into the applicant's pocket from £1,000 to £1,500. Do you think it is fair that the country should be asked to purchase it back again? I hardly think you should put the matter in that way; we must take accomplished facts. These houses are in existence; rights have accrued to different people, and it would be an extreme hardship to do away with these rights without compensation.
3176. Is it not an extreme hardship that so much mischief should be done to the public? Exactly, but the licensees have obtained their privileges by law, and they should not be taken away without compensation.
3177. But the licenses are only annual? It is understood though, that consequent upon their conforming to the Act, and not being convicted of offences against it a certain number of times, these privileges will be extended to the licensees indefinitely.
3178. The Licensing Act stipulated for certain additional accommodation, and all houses which failed to supply that accommodation lost their licenses. Can you see any difference between that, and the enactment of a law under which the people will say whether public-houses shall or shall not exist in their vicinity? There is a great difference; in the first place, it was in the option of the licensees to provide the additional accommodation.
3179. But some of the old houses were disestablished? Not until they had had an opportunity to bring their standard of accommodation up to the requirements of the new Act. If the licensees chose to do that, their houses were not swept away as they might be under the operation of a local option vote.
3180. You would give monetary compensation you say; but suppose a law were enacted containing the principal of local option, and that to avoid doing injury to the existing trade, it were provided simultaneously in a Suspensory Act, that no new licenses should be issued for a given number of years giving the existing licensees rights, subject to good behaviour during that period, that, being regarded in the light of their purchase money. Do you not think that that would be compensation? That might be a fair scheme.
3181. You would recognise the proposal as compensation? It would be compensation to a certain extent.
3182. You think that it would be a good thing to have special legislation in Sydney, with a view to diminish the number of worthless houses? I think if the spirit licenses were withdrawn in a number of instances, and that if beer and wine licenses were established, there would not be the same amount of drunkenness.
3183. Mr. Abigail.] Have you any knowledge of the working of the Act, when the houses were allowed to open for two hours on Sunday? Yes.
3184. Are you aware that drunkenness was then much more prevalent than it is under the existing Act? I have had no experience of that in Sydney.
3185. You have had some experience in the matter of wine licenses? Yes.
3186. Has the conduct of these houses in the city been of a creditable character? I have heard nothing against them since I have been here. I have heard no complaints of them, and there have been no cases in connection with them.
3187. You do not know that a number of the licensees of these houses have been brought before the licensing Bench, and that the conduct of the houses has been pronounced disreputable? That has not been the case since I have been sitting in Sydney.
3188. You think that beer and wine licenses would diminish drunkenness? I think so. Some of the spirits now sold in the lower class of houses cannot be very good.
3189. You think there is a strong public taste for wine? I do not know that, but I thought that wine licenses might have the effect of doing away with some of the other places. There seems to be a very strong taste for whiskey.
3190. If beer and wine licenses were granted to these houses, and they did no business, what would the licensees do? That I could not say.
3191. The present wine shops are found to sell spirits without paying the fee? I was not aware of that.
3192. Mr. Withers.] With reference to the habit of selling during prohibited hours on Sunday, how do you think it would answer to have the liquor in the licensed houses, in the bar, and in the cellar, placed under lock and key. Suppose the keys of these places were deposited with the police every Saturday night at 11 o'clock, and were returned to the licensees at 6 o'clock on Monday morning? In that case you would prevent travellers and lodgers from obtaining drink. I hardly see how you can carry out such a scheme as that.
3193. Do you think it would be an undue interference with the liberty of the subject? I think it would be exceedingly difficult to carry out the scheme.

Thomas Kingsmill Abbott, Esq., Stipendiary Magistrate, called in, sworn, and examined:—

Mr.
T. K. Abbott.
7 June, 1886.

3194. Chairman.] You are a Stipendiary Magistrate in the Metropolitan District? Yes.
3195. You were one of the first appointed? No; I succeeded Mr. Dillon.
3196. How long have you been acting as a Stipendiary Magistrate? Two years and four months.
3197. How long were you a Police Magistrate at Maitland? Two years; I have been altogether twenty years in the service.
3198. For how long have you been a Police Magistrate? Thirteen years.
3199. You have had large experience of various licensing laws—the old and the new? Yes; in the country and in the city.
3200. What is your experience of the new law in the city, as far as any improvement in public morals go? I could not say whether the public morals are improved or not; but I think the Act is a great improvement upon the old one.
3201. Is there as large a number of arrests and convictions for drunkenness under the new as under the old Act? I could not say, because I was not in the city when the old Act was in existence.
3202. In what particulars do you find the Act defective as far as the enforcement of the penalties in connection with Sunday trading is concerned? It is defective, inasmuch as the persons who are affected by its administration in nine cases out of ten can safely commit perjury, in order to screen themselves from the effects of their misdoing.

Mr.
T. K. Abbott.
7 June, 1886.

3203. Do the Bench find a difficulty in bringing home to offenders informations filed for violations of the law on Sunday? Yes, I think the police meet with great difficulty in almost every case; they are not allowed to go into hotels in plain clothes to detect breaches of the law. I think that ought to be allowed. If a man commits a murder and the police want to trace the crime, the police officer does not go down the street saying that he is a detective. I do not think the police should be deterred from going into public-houses as they choose, with a view to ascertain whether the law has or has not been violated.
3204. Do you think that if such a course were adopted the law would be more respected and obeyed? The publican would be more fearful of breaking the law; he would be disinclined to break it. I believe there is a large amount of Sunday trading done in Sydney, and it is done on account of the difficulties the police experience in detecting it.
3205. Do I understand you to say that the police cannot enter the houses in plain clothes? They can do so, but not as detectives; they must go in with some one who is entering the house. They cannot go in as detectives—that is, disguised for the purpose of detection.
3206. Then a police officer could not go to a house in plain clothes and ask admission? They do go in plain clothes, but not as detectives; they are not allowed to go to detect an offence as a detective would go to detect a murder or any other crime.
3207. You recommend that the ordinary police should have the same power as detectives in this matter? I think that a policeman in detecting an offence against the law should be allowed to do it in any dress he thinks best. It is nothing but a maudlin sentimentality which prevents them from entering public-houses in disguise.
3208. Have you dealt with many cases of Sunday trading? Yes; I think they are rather fond of bringing those cases before me, instead of before the other Magistrates.
3209. What has been the result in the great majority of cases which have come before you? In the great majority there have been convictions.
3210. Have you heard that, as a rule, the police have failed in these cases which they have brought before the other Stipendiaries? I have not inquired into the cases which have come before the other Stipendiaries. Probably the reason why more of these cases are brought before me is because I have inflicted heavier penalties than the other Magistrates. Shortly after I came to Sydney I found that there was apparently no diminution in the number of cases, and the penalty which had been fixed, by a sort of consent among the Magistrates at £3 and £5, I increased to £10 and £20.
3211. Had your determination a good effect upon the publicans? I do not know.
3212. Were there as many cases brought before you after as before your determination? There were more, because the police chose the days upon which I sat to bring up these cases.
3213. But it does not follow that there were in the gross more violations of the law? No; I think not. I think that if the penalties inflicted by all the Magistrates were higher, there would be fewer cases.
3214. Have there been many cases brought before you, in which application has been made for a transfer, after a publican has been twice convicted? I could not say how many; that would be a matter of record in the Court. I know that there are a number of cases in which publicans who have been convicted seek to transfer, in order to avoid the loss of the license.
3215. Do you approve of the principle of local option? Certainly.
3216. Would you extend the franchise to the voters upon the electoral list? I think that the persons interested in any particular locality should say whether there should or should not be a public-house there.
3217. Do you think that both women and men should be allowed to vote? The women are more interested than the men.
3218. Would you extend the franchise to both? I would, undoubtedly. The reason I say this is, that I believe that nine out of every ten houses in Sydney belong to brewers, or to wine and spirit merchants; the publican running the house is not generally the owner. The house is not run in his interest at all.
3219. I suppose a large number of these houses have been brought under your notice? Yes.
3220. You think that this practice indicates a very bad state of things? I think there are about 50 per cent. too many public-houses in the city.
3221. Coming back to the question of local option, would you apply it to renewals as well as to the granting of licenses? No. If there were something wrong in the way in which a house had been conducted then the authority of the police should come in. When local option once concedes the right of a license it should not be taken away, unless the holder of the license does something contrary to the law.
3222. Would you not give to the people the absolute right to veto the traffic? If you mean as to both the old and new licenses, I think not. I should hesitate to give to the people the power to annihilate all the houses in Sydney.
3223. But the houses exist to supply a public want, and if the public declare against them there should be no reason for their retention? I would not say that the people had a right to interfere with the renewal of licenses in the manner you suggest. I think the lower class of houses can be gradually eliminated without wiping out vested interests to that extent. I would apply the principle to all new houses but not to renewals.
3224. Are you in favour of closing the houses on Sunday? Certainly I am.
3225. Do you regard the new law as an improvement upon the old in that respect? Yes; but it is largely evaded.
3226. But if the measure you suggest were adopted, you think that greater respect would be paid to its provisions? It would not pay a person to violate the law if, while his profits were only £10, he was fined £20. But it will pay him if, while his profits are £10, he is fined only £3; because, even when he is detected, he will be £7 to the good.
3227. Do you think that the fear of a third conviction has a wholesome effect upon the publicans? I do not know, because generally the publican is merely the agent of the wine and spirit merchant and the brewer. It does not matter to him whether he runs the house or not.
3228. You say that there are cases in which there are applications for a transfer after two convictions? Yes; they are frequently refused.
3229. What becomes of the house? It does not lose the license.
3230. But it has to be conducted differently? Yes; unless there is a third conviction, followed by the loss of the license.
3231. Do you think there is as much drunkenness at the present time on Sunday as existed under the old law? I do not; I think there is nothing like the same amount. I think the new law as regards the suburbs, such as Manly Beach, Goojee, and Bondi, has had a very beneficial effect.

- Mr. T. K. Abbott.
7 June, 1886.
3232. Do you approve of the hour of closing on week days? I do not see that any harm is done by closing at 11 o'clock, but it is not of great advantage either to the public or to the publicans. I think the hour might be slightly extended.
3233. You have had no experience of the effects of the old law in the city? No. There is this advantage in the earlier closing: that a person who is inclined to drink gets away and is able to sleep four or five hours before morning. He is then able to resume work the next day; but if the house is kept open all night he will of course not be fit for work.
3234. Do you not think there would be a large incentive to drinking if the hour were extended to 12 o'clock? I should not say that it would. A man is just as likely to drink between 10 and 11 o'clock as between 11 and 12 o'clock.
3235. Are you not aware that there was a greater amount of drunkenness under the old law than there is under the new? I do not know what amount of drunkenness there was in Sydney under the old law. I admit, of course, that it is a bad thing for a house to be kept open all night.
3236. I presume you are of opinion that the greater the facilities the greater will be the amount of drunkenness? Undoubtedly, and the fewer facilities, the less.
3237. You know that the houses in your district have been reduced by 29 or 30? During the last few years the only cases in which the Magistrates have increased the number have been where the houses are well built and contain first-class accommodation. These are the only cases in which we grant licenses for new houses. There is, however, a defect in the Act; because immediately a publican obtains a license for a new house he can reduce the accommodation to the extent required under the law for the older houses—he can let the remainder of the premises. I know many cases in which that has been done and the law does not reach them. It is in the discretion of the Magistrates, however, to refuse a renewal of the license.
3238. Have there been many applications of that description? There was at Newtown a house which was said to possess forty rooms. I noticed afterwards in passing by that there were about six or eight shops in the building. The premises were partitioned off, showing plainly that they were not used for the purpose for which they were licensed.
3239. Have many of the applications for conditional licenses been refused? Some have been; a license was refused for a house in Pitt-street, close to the Congregational Church.
3240. I presume that if the police were to make such representations as you have described about one of these houses, the Bench would not grant a renewal of the license? I would not.
3241. In regard to general accommodation, are the houses in the Metropolitan Police District an improvement upon the old class of houses? I could not say; I have not inspected any of the houses. I do not think I have been into more than about three hotels since I have been in Sydney.
3242. Have any representations been made to you with regard to up-stair bars? Not directly.
3243. You have no official information about them? None.
3244. You do not even know of their existence? I do not.
3245. Have you any knowledge of the clubs which have been brought into existence? I believe the Licensing Act has introduced a number of clubs.
3246. Have you any official information about them? No.
3247. I mean the clubs which have been brought into existence to evade the law? I know nothing about them.
3248. Have you any suggestions to make as to future legislation? I could not suggest anything upon the spur of the moment; but I shall be very happy to put some suggestions in writing if they will be of any use to the Commission.
3249. Mr. Colls.] You have resided in a large wine producing district? I resided for twelve years upon the Liverpool Plains, and for two years in Maitland. Maitland is a large wine district.
3250. Are you aware of large quantities of white spirit being made there? No.
3251. You are not aware that a large quantity is consumed in the wine districts? I do not know anything about the manufacture of wine. I have taken no interest in it. I know that most of the wine shops in the colony are sly-grog shops.
3252. Have many cases of lunacy come under your notice in Maitland? No.
3253. Have you had many in Sydney? Many; twenty a week. They are brought up as lunatics; but many of them are only temporarily insane—suffering from delirium tremens.
3254. From the consumption of a bad description of drink? I could not say to what the condition of these persons is attributable; but in most cases I have no doubt that it arises from intemperance.
3255. It has been brought under the notice of the Commission that the up-stair bars are badly conducted. Would you not have the bars upon the basement floor; would it not be an improvement? They would be more liable to inspection. I think it would be better not to have up-stair bars at all; bars on the basement would be open to the inspection of every person passing by.
3256. You think there might be private bars upon the ground floor, if they were required by a large hotel? It would be better than having a bar up-stairs.
3257. Would you be in favour of two classes of houses—the first-class hotels, and then the beer and wine houses? I have never given that subject a thought. There are two classes of hotels now—such hotels as “Petty’s,” the “Exchange,” and the “Royal,” and then others which are merely grog-shops.
3258. Are you aware that there are a large number of houses in Sydney which do not pretend to accommodate the public? I believe there are many. They have the required accommodation; but they do not take in lodgers or boarders; they are merely drinking saloons.
3259. It has been brought under the notice of the Commission that there are houses which reduce their accommodation by sub-letting a portion of the premises, to which a temporary doorway has been made up-stairs, as soon as the license is granted. Have any such cases come under your notice? No, only such cases as that which I have mentioned at Newtown.
3260. Do you visit the suburbs? Newtown and Redfern.
3261. Do you get accommodation at the hotels? No, I sit from 10 o'clock until I have finished. I do not go to luncheon anywhere.
3262. Have you many young people brought before you for drunkenness? No, I cannot say that I have.
3263. Would you be in favour of extending the age at which liquor may be supplied from sixteen to eighteen? I think that sixteen is high enough.
3264. Have you had many cases of sly-grog-selling at oyster-saloons? No, I have not. I do not think I have have had more than three or four cases of sly-grog-selling since I have been in Sydney. Some cases of that kind occur in the wine-shops.

3265. Mr. Roseby.] You would extend the local option vote to both men and women? Yes.

3266. You also think there are far too many public-houses in Sydney? Yes.

3267. Do you not think that some plan ought to be adopted, whereby the people would have the privilege of reducing the number? I do not know how you are going to do it without interference with rights which already exist. They are being gradually reduced; they have been reduced to the extent of 30 within two years. There are I think only about 500 houses in my district, and in two years they have been reduced by 30.

3268. These houses, of which you think there are too many, are not places of accommodation? No, they are simply agencies for brewers and wine and spirit merchants. I think it would be a very good thing if they were swept away; but I cannot suggest how it is to be done.

3269. Would you set up the so-called rights of these people against the moral well-being of the people? I would not.

3270. It is considered necessary to remove a nuisance, even though it may entail loss to the men committing it—their neighbours are injured; upon that principle ought not these places to be shut up? I think it would be a good thing to sweep away the whole traffic, but I do not know how you are going to do it; I quite believe that 75 per cent. of the crime of the Colony is traceable to the abuse of liquor.

3271. That is the result of an extensive experience in the service of the Government? Twenty years.

3272. The law says that these houses shall close upon Sundays; but as a matter of fact, they are not closed? A good many of them do the most of their trade on Sunday I believe; my informant as to the amount of trade done, is Inspector M'Kay, a very reliable officer; he says that a good many houses could not pay their rent unless they traded upon Sunday.

3273. You think they ought to be compelled to obey the law? Undoubtedly; whatever it may be.

3274. At present the law is outraged, and there seems to be no remedy for it? It is; I do not know what remedy to provide; I have provided the best I can.

3275. Would you not make the fact that a number of persons were seen going in and out of a house, proof that they were there for an illegal purpose? I think it would be a good thing if persons found in a public-house on Sundays, and unable to prove that they were lodgers or travellers, were fined.

3276. Mr. Hutchison.] That would also carry a conviction against the publican? It should score against him on his application for a renewal.

3277. Mr. Roseby.] Have you had many of your convictions quashed by a higher Court? There have been 35 appeals, and two of them have been upheld; and in these two cases I would give the same decision to-morrow; thirty-three of my convictions have been sustained.

3278. I understood that the publicans' appeals had been generally more successful? They were at first, against decisions when the Act first came into operation; I cannot say that the 35 appeals, to which I have referred, were all under the Licensing Act; many of them were not.

3279. We have been informed that there is a great deal of drunkenness among the youth of the city, although they do not always find their way to the watchhouse? That is a thing I do not know anything about.

3280. If it were true would you not increase the age at which publicans may supply young people with liquor? Yes; I would favour the abolition of the whole traffic.

3281. Are you in favour of females being permitted to sell drink behind the bars of public-houses? I do not think it adds to their respectability, but there are many girls who have probably no other way of getting a living; it is a very difficult thing to provide for the employment of females. Some of the barmaids do well; sometimes they marry very wealthy people.

3282. Is it not a dangerous avocation? No doubt it is dangerous.

3283. Would you not prohibit the employment of females in such a capacity? I do not think it would be a disadvantage to the community if it were prohibited.

3285. Are you in favor of that? If it is confined to the passengers and their friends I see no reason why they should not sell it. There is very little drunkenness as far as my experience goes, and I have been in the habit of travelling up and down the coast for many years. I do not suppose I have seen more than a dozen persons drunk during that time; but frequently I have been two years without travelling at all.

3286. Mr. Hutchison.] It is against the law, is it not, for steamers to sell liquor when they are moored? I am not sure, but if it is I am under the impression that no penalty is provided.

3287. Unless the captain has prohibited the sale no conviction can follow? I would make the person selling responsible.

3288. Many cases fail because the landlord says that he has not been privy to the sale of liquor? I would make the landlord responsible for whatever may be sold, as under the English law. The landlord has no right to employ a servant who will disobey his orders.

3289. You do not know of the existence of these drinking clubs which have been growing up in our midst? I do not know anything about them.

3290. You are absolutely in favor of Sunday closing, and would be pleased to see some legislation which would enable the police to enforce the law? I would; I am in favor of Sunday closing.

3291. You say that nine-tenths of the public-houses in the city are run by others than the real licensees? I should think so. I am only speaking from general repute; I have not made any inquiry.

3292. You deprecate that state of things? I do, strongly.

3293. But when you were asked a question in reference to the local option vote, you began to be tender with these men? Yes; while I deprecate the existing condition of things, I also deprecate taking away rights which these persons have acquired legally and properly. If, in the way of what is being done by slow extermination of the houses, the desired result can be obtained, so much the better; but I go further than that, and say, that if you could justly sweep away the houses altogether, I would be one to vote for the measure.

3294. But how do you think that the bad houses are to be slowly eliminated? Owing to the position they occupy in the city they are being gradually done away with. Building societies, insurance offices, and banks are

- Mr. F. K. Abbott, June, 1886.
- being built upon the sites of public-houses which were situated at the corners of streets, and the public-houses are not being reopened elsewhere.
3295. You think that if the present law were enforced many of the houses would be unable to pay their rents? I think so; many houses live upon their Sunday trading.
3296. Would you make the local option vote emphatic against all licenses, conditional or otherwise? I do not think the local option vote is taken against the conditional licenses, because they are supposed to apply to first-class houses, such as the "Royal," "Petty's," and the "Exchange." These houses do no harm to the general community; they are not frequented by people who get drunk, who get locked up, and who neglect their business.
3297. Is it a fact that the conditional licenses apply to houses of that character? I do not know that it is always so. Two large hotels connected with the theatre, opposite Farmer and Co.'s, recently received licenses. These places fulfil all the requirements of the law, and they will be of great public convenience.
3298. Would you make the local option vote so effective that no new licenses would be granted? I do not think it would be any disadvantage if it were so. On the other hand, there are localities in which houses of first-class accommodation might be opened with great advantage to the public. The houses are necessary in some places if we recognise their existence at all.
3299. If the people voted for them no one would object? But, as you are aware, the people vote as they are led or directed.
3300. Now, as to the question of compensation in connection with the application of the local option vote to renewals? I have already stated that, with regard to renewals, I do not see how the local option vote could come in.
3301. Suppose that, simultaneously with the passing of the Local Option Act, a Suspensory Act were passed, giving the present holders of licenses a monopoly for three years; would you not consider that sufficient compensation? I do not think so; you would give them a three years' lease of life, and then take away their lives.
3302. Not necessarily. The question would then be submitted to the vote? But we know what that means, where a whole district have made up their minds that these houses shall not exist.
3303. You have refused renewals upon two convictions? No; that applies to transfers. As far as my experience goes the Bench does not allow any man who has violated the law twice to escape the penalties by getting a transfer to someone else.
3304. The police make some complaint upon these grounds; they say that however strong may be their suspicions that a house may be badly conducted, owing to their having seen crowds of people enter it during prohibited hours, and although they may have less than three previous convictions, the Bench maintain that the license should be granted until there are three convictions;—do you read the law so? No; I do not. At the same time I say this: That the belief of the police is no guide as to what may exist. The police may believe that a certain state of things exists, but that is not evidence upon which magistrates could deprive a man of his license. If on the other hand the suspected state of things does exist, it is the fault of the police that the publicans are not detected and punished. I would allow the police to detect offences committed in public-houses in any manner they might think fit.
3305. Do you think it would be a good thing to have a sort of detective for the purpose? No; because they would not be believed. They might be believed by the Magistrates, but they would not be believed by the Judge, and so much would be made of what would be called "hired informers" that the convictions would be upset.
3306. Do you think the Magistrates have good ground for complaint against the higher Court for the manner in which it reverses their decisions? I have none, except as I have said, in two cases out of thirty-five, and I would give the same decisions again to-morrow in those two cases upon the same evidence.
3307. Do you not think the publicans, when they appeal, ought to be confined to the evidence taken in the lower Court? They ought to be compelled to go upon that evidence as under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, unless it can be shown that they were deprived of any necessary means of obtaining evidence to prove their innocence; otherwise they should not be allowed to vary the facts placed before the Magistrate.
3308. You think that in nine cases out of ten in which publicans are charged with breaches of the law, perjury is committed? I do, indeed.
3309. Have any proceedings been taken? They cannot be taken without the leave of a Judge.
3310. If the Magistrates had permission to proceed otherwise would it have a deterrent effect? I do not know; I do not think that anything will deter people from committing perjury. My experience as to perjury is, that if people go into a witness-box to tell a lie they will do so quite independently of the legal consequences, and whether they are or are not detected they will adhere to it. The administration of the oath has no effect in making them tell the truth. It is very difficult to secure a conviction for perjury on account of the loopholes for escape. A man must be convicted of telling a lie for a wilful and deliberate purpose.

Present:—

ALEX. OLIVER, Esq., M.A., PRESIDENT,	J. ROSEBY, Esq., J.P.,
T. COLLS, Esq., J.P.,	J. DAVIES, Esq., C.M.G., J.P., M.P.,
A. HUTCHISON, Esq.,	G. WITHERS, Esq., J.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Leopold Yates, Esq., D.S.M., called in, sworn, and examined:—

- L. Yates, Esq., D.S.M., June, 1886.
3311. President.] You are one of the Stipendiary Magistrates, I believe? A Deputy Stipendiary.
3312. You have been so occupied for a short time? About two years.
3313. And prior to that, you were a Police Magistrate of the Colony? For twelve or thirteen years.
3314. In what district? Yass, Armidale, and Maitland.
3315. What impression have you formed as to the increase of drunkenness in the Colony, during your experience experience as a Magistrate? I do not think, as far as my experience goes, in both the country and the city, that it is materially affected. I think the streets in Sydney—I am speaking of my more recent experience—show very little difference.

L. Yates,
Esq., D.S.M.

11 June, 1886.

3316. You think that, in proportion to the population, drunkenness is at the same level? About the same.

3317. Is that your opinion, drawn from convictions for drunkenness? Yes.

3318. Does your experience in other directions lead you to suppose that the habit of drinking has increased in the community? I do not think it has diminished.

3319. From all sources of information open to you, you have formed the opinion that the drinking habits of the people are what they used to be? Exactly.

3320. Are you able to say that the existing Act is an improvement upon the former one? Yes; I think it is.

3321. Do you think it has been effective in reducing the habits of drunkenness, or in regulating the traffic in liquor in an improved way, as compared with the old Act? It might be so.

3322. Do you think that the appearance of the streets has improved? Very much so.

3323. I suppose the appearance of the streets would be improved chiefly by the earlier closing upon week-days and upon Sundays? I am not often in the city at night-time, but when I have been there I have noticed a marked improvement, which I should say was attributable in some measure to the earlier closing, although the drunkenness has not, in my opinion, been materially affected by the passing of the Act.

3324. Do you think then that the disposition to drink is so strongly implanted in the average colonist that he will drink whatever the law may be? I think so.

3325. If he cannot get it in one place he will have it at another? That is the opinion which I have frequently expressed from the Bench, especially in cases where prohibitions against the supply of liquor have been applied for. I think these applications are a farce, because, as I have often said, if some men cannot get liquor at one place they will get it at another.

3327. Is it not a fact that many habitual drunkards consider incarceration as a means provided by the State for their getting sober? I think that in many cases it is so.

3328. And I suppose you see the same faces again and again? Before I had been here two months I had occasion to notice at the various Courts the fact that many of the faces of those charged with drunkenness were familiar to me.

3330. Therefore no value statistically can be attached to the returns of apprehensions, as indicating the amount of drunkenness existing in the Colony? Quite so; I can understand that no value would attach to the return from that point of view.

3331. You think that the punishment which can be allotted to drunkards by law is ineffective. Has it ever occurred to you that the proper mode of punishing may not be punishment in the ordinary sense, but some form of detention coupled with an effort to reclaim—in other words, confinement in an inebriate asylum? That has often occurred to me. In many cases I should say that it would be more beneficial and effective than punishment under the present Act. I think the offenders might be sent to an asylum in the first instance, and if they were not cured under that system they might be sent to a reformatory where they should work.

3332. Are you inclined to look upon the habitual drunkard as a kind of lunatic—a person with a disease so far beyond his own powers of restraint that he is similar to a lunatic, in that he is an irresponsible agent? I should rather designate it a disease than a form of lunacy.

3333. If that is your view do you not think that the victims ought to be rather the subjects of reclamation than of punishment? I do, certainly, in this case.

3334. Have you any knowledge of the system pursued in an inebriate asylum? No; but while we are speaking of the subject I may mention that we have daily an average of from three to six persons, supposed to be of unsound mind, brought before us, and in nearly every case inquiry of the doctor elicits the fact that the case is attributable to drink.

3335. In most cases it is delirium tremens? Yes.

3336. Do you think that the habit of drinking leads to lunacy; are there many cases which have come under your notice in which you have been able to trace the drunkard to the confirmed lunatic? In many cases.

3337. What do you think is the stuff drunk in such cases? Chiefly white spirit, I think.

3338. Is it sometimes beer? I think not as a rule, although many persons who have been dealt with as drunkards have afterwards assured me that they had drunk nothing but beer, and I have had reason not to disbelieve them. They have told me that after taking one or two glasses of beer they have become quite unconscious.

3339. Was that Colonial beer? It was supposed to be.

3340. Brewed in Sydney? I cannot say; but some of these persons assured me that they were never in such trouble before, and that they drunk only a small quantity of beer before becoming unconscious.

3341. Did not the information startle you? These cases happened many years ago; but I was so startled that the fact has been impressed upon my memory ever since. It was not a solitary instance; there were many cases.

3342. Has that experience been repeated in Sydney? Not in Sydney.

3343. Can you tell the Commission that people have complained to you that they had thought that there was some kind of poison or deleterious substance in the stuff they drunk? They have complained; and

- L. Yates,
Esq., D.S.M.
11 June, 1886.
- I have often had occasion to remark from the Bench that it is often not so much the quantity as the poisonous quality of the stuff drunk which causes the mischief.
3344. Speaking from your knowledge of the Licensing Court in which you have sat frequently, is there an impression generally obtaining that spirits and fermented liquors are much adulterated? No.
3345. The fact has not come before you judicially? No; I do not think we have had an actual case of adulteration; but, while speaking of the subject, I may say that I think it desirable that the stocks of wholesale wine and spirit merchants, as well as those of the publicans, should be inspected. An officer should be appointed who would inspect and report the quality of the spirit.
3346. Do you think with regard to an inebriate asylum, that the Magistrates should have the power to send any habitual drunkard there, as they send boys to a reformatory? Yes; it would be well to give that discretion.
3347. You would detain them for a certain period? According to the number of times he has been convicted—say half-a-dozen times in the previous three or four months.
3348. But you would make the detention long enough to effect a cure, if possible? If possible.
3349. You would give the same power to the relatives or friends of the drunkard, when it is not a police case, to treat the man in the same way—that is as a kind of lunatic—by bringing him before a Magistrate, and getting an order for his detention? Yes; upon evidence to satisfy the Magistrates that it was a case for detention.
3350. Have you noticed many cases in which the intention of the law has been defeated with regard to convictions, supposing the intention of the law to have been, as some people think, that is to admit proof other than that which is strictly legal. There have been a number of cases in which the police have attempted to prosecute publicans for Sunday trading, and they complain that their efforts have been fruitless, because the Magistrates refuse to accept what are called their surmises; have you sat on such cases? Yes; the great difficulty is the lack of direct evidence as to delivery.
3351. Do you think much perjury is committed in those cases? In all defended cases more or less perjury is committed on the part of the defence. As far as my experience goes, I have always regarded the evidence of (say) two—there are generally two—police officers of respectability and position, as being more reliable than the evidence of half-a-dozen witnesses on the other side. The defendants generally bring up many more witnesses than those who are opposed to them; but in these cases I have always regarded the quality—not the quantity of the evidence. Still, when these cases have gone before the higher Court, on appeal, the convictions, founded upon such testimony as I have mentioned, have been quashed.
3352. And you attribute that to the cause assigned by your brother Magistrates—the re-hearing of the case, and the admission of other evidence? Yes; they become altogether new cases.
3353. With a considerable amount of ready-made perjury, if necessary? Yes, I think so.
3355. I suppose you think that that is your duty, having regard to the terms of the Licensing Act? Yes.
3356. Do you think that the Bench should have a discretionary power given in larger terms than the discretion now given? At present you can consider any objection which you do not consider "frivolous or vexatious"? In the matter of renewals we should be guided by the evidence I think; but in the matter of transfers I would take into consideration the character of a man, although there might be no convictions against him.
3357. You would make the evidence different in the two cases? Yes.
3358. I will state a case: A man applies for a renewal; he is one of the large majority of violators of the law on Sunday, who are said to number seven-eighths of the publicans. The police objection is to the effect that the man constantly violates the law upon Sunday. They state that they have seen people going in and coming out of the premises in bodies, some of them being under the influence of liquor. They state that they have entered the house again and again, but that all are found to be lodgers and travellers; they say they are quite sure from the facts adduced that the applicant violates the law, but they have no convictions. That is sworn to by two respectable police officers. A man asks for a renewal under these circumstances. Do you not think the law ought to be so amended as to permit you to refuse the renewal? Yes; I do, indeed, upon such evidence as that.
3359. I am giving you a fair sample of the kind of evidence the police have told us they have been able to give at renewal meetings, meeting with the response from all the Licensing Magistrates to this effect:—"These are only your surmises; there being no convictions we cannot take away the man's license"? That is because we decide in accordance with the Act as it at present stands. But I think it is desirable that we should have larger powers, and that, if there were good evidence, we should be placed in a position to consider it.
3360. I suppose it has come to your knowledge that a large number of licenses are held by brewers? I know that it is so in many instances.
3361. The man practically runs the house for the brewer? That I am not aware of—that is to say, that he has any particular or superior control over the house.
3362. Is it not a matter of notoriety that the leases are owned by the brewers, that they often hold bills of sale over the whole stock, that they give the licensee any kind of liquor they like, and that, at any moment, if he violates the law, they can put him out and put in another man? That has not come under my notice; but I know, on the contrary, that leases are being prepared, under which, if any section of the Act is violated, the licensee will be ousted from the premises.
- 3364.

L. Yates,
Esq., D.S.M.
11 June, 1886.

3364. What fee would you suggest for the larger class of houses? I should say from £50 to £75.
3365. Would you allow them to have more than one bar? I have always had an objection to there being more than one bar, and that, I think, should be on the ground floor of any house. The multiplication of bars lead to more drinking, in that it gives greater facilities for drinking.
3366. Have you any knowledge of up-stair bars? Not personally; but I know from hearsay that they exist.
3367. You think the law should be amended so as to prevent the multiplication of bars under one license? I think so.
3368. Would you object to the English system of throwing upon everyone found in a house during prohibited hours the burden of showing that he was there for a lawful purpose? I should not object to that.
3369. What is your experience of Colonial wine licenses? I think they ought to be abolished.
3370. Entirely? In the country and in the city—that is, apart from other accommodation. I think it is a bad system.
3371. Why? Because it leads to illicit trading. A more poisonous description of spirit is disposed of than is ordinarily sold.
3372. You think they keep a worse kind of liquor? I think so.
3373. Probably because it is contraband—because they ought not to sell it? I could not say.
3374. One wonders why, if they determine to keep spirits, that the liquor should be so bad? Because it is cheaper I should think.
3375. They know that if they are discovered they will be fined heavily, and they do not expend much money upon the venture? That would be one of the reasons I should think.
3376. I suppose that in the country the person who provides them with the Colonial wine, also provides them with the brandy? I could not say that of my own knowledge.
3377. Have you formed an opinion upon the question of local option—that is to say, the principle, as embodied in the last Licensing Act? I am not opposed to local option. I think the people should have a voice in the matter of the licenses to be issued in their locality.
3378. I suppose that in using the word “people” you would include more than the present voters? I would include women, for instance.
3379. Would you go beyond the ratepayers and allow all the residents in a given area to vote? Yes, the residents of a certain district.
3380. Have you any knowledge of the packet licenses? None.
3381. I suppose that in your time in the country the practice of “lambing-down” had almost disappeared? No; I can speak with an experience of twenty-five years.
3382. Is it still within your experience? Twenty-five years ago I was in the remote interior; in those days the practice was very common. I have not had much experience in later years as to whether the practice is still continued.
3383. Would you extend the local option vote to the renewal of licenses? I would not be averse to it if compensation were given.
3384. Have you thought much of the question of compensation? Yes.
3385. Would you have monetary compensation? Yes, I think so.
3386. Where would you get the money—would you pay it out of the public funds? I think it should be paid. I suppose the Government would have to find the money.
3387. A few gentlemen upon this Commission are of opinion that if you give the publicans a certain privilege of selling, which would be equivalent to a monopoly, giving them notice that in three or four years they must be prepared for a local option vote, that would be sufficient compensation. Do you think the extension of time would be the equivalent of compensation? I think that if such notice were given it would go a great way towards it.
3388. It is a matter of common complaint that much of the liquor vended at public-houses is adulterated? Yes. Years ago I had opportunities of seeing in what ways liquor was adulterated. I have seen at the bottom of casks all kinds of things—leather and iron nails for instance.
3389. Do you not think that the fact of the liquor being adulterated has a tendency to increase drunkenness and its evil effects? Yes; by increasing the desire for drink.
3390. Mr. Hutchison.] Do any of the persons who appear before you in a state of delirium come up again in the same condition? Yes; the same individuals often come up two or three times. That is not my personal experience; but on making inquiries from the doctor I have ascertained that persons have been up three or four times. The faces of some I can recognise as having been brought up on suspicion of being of unsound mind. That is the form in which they are charged.
3391. Do you think it would be a decided advantage to have the law so altered as to permit of your taking cognisance in any case of police evidence as to which you have no doubt? Yes; I think so.
3392. In the face of the perjury committed by the defendants? We often convict under these circumstances now.
3393. But the police must prove delivery of the liquor? Yes; I would have the law amended in that particular.
3394. And made uniform with the English law? Yes.
3395. You do not think the Magistrates are justified in refusing a renewal unless there are three convictions? No; I do not.
3396. I suppose that in the case of wine licenses bad spirit is sold because the licensee knows that he is not selling it under the law? I think that in some licensed houses the stuff sold is quite as bad as that sold in the other places. I have tasted liquor in the city which I thought was quite as bad as any I had tasted years ago in the remote interior, and I have said so to the publican. I have known it at once to be exactly the same as that which used to poison people in the interior years ago. This occurred in quite a respectable house in Sydney.
3397. You think that the licensing law should prohibit more than one bar, and that that should be on the ground floor? Except, perhaps, in the case of exceptionally large and respectable houses; although I admit that it might be difficult to draw the line. I think, however, that it would be better to say that there should be no bars other than those upon the ground floor.
3398. And in these exceptional cases where the privilege of more than one bar was allowed, you would add to the licensing fee? Certainly.

L. Yates,
Esq., D.S.M.
11 June, 1886.

3399. Mr. Roseby.] You think that for the requirements of our community there are too many public-houses? That is my opinion.
3400. There being such an excessive number they must tend to increase and foster the vice of intemperance? No doubt the greater facilities for drinking the more drinking there will be.
3401. Have many applications for new licenses come before you? A fair number, I think—that is conditional licenses for houses with more than the ordinary standard of accommodation.
3402. You have a number of applications for conditional licenses? I should not say a number; we had many not long since, and I think every one was refused.
3403. As a rule they are opposed by the police on the ground that they are not required? Not as a rule; other objections may be brought forward, but when they do object it is perhaps more upon the ground you have named than upon any other.
3404. Do the inhabitants frequently petition against these applications? Yes, they do, and in such cases there are generally petitions as numerous signed in favour of the houses. I do not think that as Magistrates we take much notice of petitions; we rely more upon the evidence of the police and others. We do not regard petitions for or against.
3405. Then, from the fact that most of these applications are refused, your opinion would be that there is no necessity for these hotels with increased accommodation? I should be in favour of granting licenses to these larger houses in the hope that they would extinguish the smaller and inferior houses.
3406. Do you know whether the larger houses which now exist afford to the public the additional accommodation which the larger number of rooms would seem to indicate? I am not prepared to say.
3407. Would you be surprised to hear that the police testimony is to the effect that these larger houses give no more accommodation than the smaller ones? I know that that is the case, as represented by the police.
3408. I suppose they have greater facilities for knowing than other persons possess? Yes; but I can speak from my own personal experience of the little accommodation to be had at some of these so-called large houses.
3409. It has been brought under our notice that very few public-houses indeed give the public any accommodation beyond that which they get at the bar? I am aware of that.
3410. Do you think that state of things ought to be tolerated? No, I do not. I have on several occasions been in the suburbs at the luncheon hour, when the business of the Court has been heavy. I have been directed to the best house in the neighbourhood; I could not help observing a look of great surprise on the part of the landlord when I asked that luncheon might be prepared. It has been with the greatest difficulty sometimes that I have obtained, to eat standing, a biscuit and a piece of cheese; I considered it quite a compliment to have that accommodation extended to me. I have often said that I would be satisfied with a piece of cold meat from yesterday's dinner; but it has frequently been impossible to obtain even that.
3411. It is said that there is a considerable increase in the drinking habits of the young people in the Colony—have you noticed that? Yes; I noticed this only this very morning. Boys and girls of tender years have been brought up, if not always for drunkenness, for offences which can be traced directly to drunkenness. I have frequently commented upon the fact from the Bench; I have remarked how frequently these cases now occur.
3412. Do you not consider that a very lamentable state of things? Very lamentable.
3413. In view of this fact, and of the fact that a large number of young people become intoxicated manage to get home and are not arrested, do you not think the law ought to prohibit publicans from serving them with drink? There is already a provision to that effect.
3414. The age is now sixteen; would you not make it higher? I do not think I would feel disposed to favor a higher age than that, although, as I have said, it is quite lamentable that so many young people should be brought before the Court charged with drunkenness.
3415. Do you think a public-house bar is a proper place for the employment of females? I should oppose the employment of females in bars; I think it adds to the attractions of the place, to those who are disposed to drink; it is an incentive in many cases.
3416. Have any of the dancing saloons been brought under your notice? Not in the city, but in the country they have. They are frequently attended by very bad consequences.
3417. You think they ought to be suppressed? I should be opposed to their existing.
3418. Especially in the neighbourhood of public-houses? Certainly.
3419. Mr. Withers.] What is your opinion of Sunday closing? I should not be opposed to the houses being opened between 1 and 2 o'clock on Sundays.
3420. All the houses in the city and suburbs? Yes.
3421. Have you a knowledge of the present state of affairs in Sydney, as compared with the state of affairs on Sundays under the old Act? No; I have had no experience of the old Act in the city.
3422. You cannot give an opinion as to the difference in the conduct of persons who want to drink on Sundays, and who used to hang about the doors of the public-houses? No; I can only say that the sheets presented to us on Monday morning are as heavy as they used to be; there is no material difference.
3423. Under the old Act the houses were opened throughout the city on Sunday, men being about the doorways smoking, cursing, and swearing. They were often put out of the houses in a state of intoxication. It is admitted by the police, and by your brother Magistrates, that that state of things does not now exist. If men get too much drink it is to the interest of the publican that he should shepherd them, and keep them from the view of the public. Would this fact have any weight with you; would it not give you the opinion that it would be better to adhere to the total closing of the houses on Sunday? I think there would be less illicit trading if the houses were opened for the time I have named, but no longer.
3424. Do you think there is the same danger of young men becoming initiated in drinking habits when the doors of public-houses are closed, and when there are various difficulties in the way of their getting in? It might have that effect. I would not say however that as a rule people drink more on Sundays than they drink upon Mondays; but they will drink to a certain extent if they can obtain the liquor. I think the opening of the houses would be availed of chiefly by the mechanics, and by the labouring classes, rather than by those who happen to be promenading the streets at that particular hour. I think the liquor would be purchased chiefly by those who require it with their meals or immediately afterwards.
3425. Do you not think that upon wet Sundays, young men in the suburbs, who are deprived of their walk, walk, or other of their natural means of enjoyment, would resort to the public-houses, and would by so doing acquire a taste for drink which they do not now possess? At present a great number of persons find their way into certain public-houses on Sundays, perhaps upon the principle that stolen fruit is the sweetest.

L. Yates,
Esq., D.S.M.
11 June, 1886.

3426. Do not you think it is to the benefit of society that the intoxicated men, to whom I have already referred, should be kept out of view by the publicans? I am quite of that opinion; but I think the poor man should have an opportunity to get his glass of beer on Sunday during the hour I have suggested. Some persons might prowl about the premises for the purpose of drinking from the hour of opening until the hour of closing; but I think that would be the exceptional custom.

3427. Do you think there is a general desire on the part of all classes of the community to have the houses opened for an hour on Sunday? We can only be guided in the matter by the repeated violations of the law.

3428. A retired publican has informed me that if the publicans were alive to their interests they would enter into an agreement to absolutely close all the houses on Sundays for several months. If that plan were carried out he thinks there would be such an outcry from the public that the publicans would soon obtain what they desire—permission to sell openly on Sunday? I should not say there would be an outcry.

3429. Young women frequently originate the destruction to which many young men are eventually brought. Do you not think it would be wise to prevent young women from being supplied with drink until they are eighteen or twenty years of age? I have already expressed the opinion that the age of the male should not be extended, and a girl at sixteen is more a young woman than a boy at the same age is a young man; she is within a few months of a marriagable age. I do not think, therefore, that I would increase the age in the case of girls.

3430. From the evidence given in cases of drunkenness, have you been able to form an opinion as to the general conduct of the hotels in the city? No; I do not think that evidence, from which such an opinion could be deduced, is likely to be imported into cases of drunkenness. Permitting disorderly conduct or allowing prostitutes to assemble would be a separate offence. In ninety-nine cases out of one hundred the drunkard pleads guilty; no evidence is taken, and no particulars whatever are given.

3431. Mr. Hutchison.] Provided the amended law were of such a character as to enforce the carrying out of the present system of Sunday closing, would you not prefer that to the opening of the houses for even one hour? No; I should still be in favour of opening the houses for one hour.

3432. You think that this hour should be allowed in order that the working-man may obtain his beer? I say that it would be principally by that class that the houses would be used.

3433. Would you have the liquor consumed off the premises? That I think should be optional with the purchaser.

3434. Mr. Colls.] You are in favour of two classes of licenses? Yes.

3435. Would you extend the hours of opening to the beer licenses? No; only to the higher class of houses.

3436. It has come under our notice that several clubs have been established for the sale of liquor on Sunday? Would you be in favour of licensing those clubs? Yes; I would license all clubs; I would have no distinction.

3437. You have resided in a large wine district—in Maitland? Only for a short time.

3438. Is much white spirit made in that district? I have no knowledge of it; I was there only "a few" months.

3439. Have you had brought before you cases in which it has transpired that a quantity of liquor has been sold in houses of ill-fame? Yes.

3440. Has the price at which the liquor has been sold come under your notice? Occasionally.

3441. They have been cases of sly-grog-selling? Yes; principally upon the information of informers, and it has been difficult to get convictions. The prices charged for the liquor have been very high.

3442. Could you name any of the prices? They are very extravagant; 5s. for a bottle of beer, and £1 1s. for a bottle of champagne, for instance.

3443. Have you had any cases of oyster saloons selling spirits? Yes; those also have been cases at the instance of informers.

3444. Mr. Davies.] You are in favor of local option? Yes.

3445. And of the application of the principle to renewals upon the condition of compensation? Yes.

3446. You think that a certain notice of the application of the local option vote to renewals would be sufficient compensation? Perhaps; if the notice extended over three or four years.

3447. Are you of opinion that a time compensation of that description would be more equitable to both parties than a monetary compensation? I think the notice would be quite as equitable.

3448. You think that no injury could accrue if sufficient notice were given? I should take the time to be the equivalent of compensation.

3449. Are you aware of the reduced number of public-houses under the new Act in the Metropolitan District? No; I cannot speak as to that.

3450. Are you aware of the good results of the present Act as compared with the old Act? Not in Sydney; but I believe that it is an improvement upon the old Act.

3451. Are you in favor of the early closing of public-houses on week-days? I am.

3452. You believe it is beneficial? I do.

3453. You are in favor of opening the public-houses for an hour on Sunday? Yes.

3454. Do you think it was wise, under the old Act, to open the houses from 1 to 3? I think it was too long. I have already said that I think the bulk of the patrons of the houses would be of the labouring classes.

3455. These persons would represent only a small section of the whole community? A small section, perhaps, as compared with the whole community.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Harold Maclean, Esq., Comptroller-General of Prisons, called in, sworn, and examined:—

H. Maclean,
Esq.
14 June, 1886.

3456. President.] I believe you are Comptroller-General of Prisons? Yes.

3457. You have been for a very long period connected with the administration of the gaols of the colony? I have had control of them for over twenty years.

3458. Are you acquainted with the report of the Inspector-General of Police for last year? I read the report.

3459. You remember the figures there given representing the total number of apprehensions for drunkenness or for offences of which drunkenness formed a part. It is stated that in 1881 there were nearly 14,000 apprehensions within the metropolitan police district for drunkenness, or for offences in which drunkenness was a factor. In 1882 the number was reduced to 11,800; in 1883 it jumped up to 13,312; in 1884 it was 13,925; and in 1885 it increased to 14,946, or, in round figures, 15,000. That was in spite of the fact that the number of public-houses had within the same period been reduced. I may say that these figures very much astonished the Commission; but upon inquiry we found that no attempt had been made to dissect them so as to show the number of first offences and the number of offences of habitual drunkards. Therefore they do not properly represent, as we think, the drunkenness of the community, because we make a broad distinction between the relapses of habitual drunkards and what may be properly called separate offences of drunkenness. The figures I have quoted would represent a large percentage of the whole community; but we have been told that some of these persons have been convicted twenty or thirty times in the course of one year. We want to know, Mr. Maclean, whether it is possible from any records in your own department, or in any branch under you, to ascertain how many out of these totals represent second or subsequent convictions? The apprehensions are of course figures in which I am not concerned; and in many cases the Bench discharge first offences of this kind. But if you will refer to my last report you will find that in showing the number of reconvictions, I have mixed the drunkards and petty offenders together. I give the number of reconvictions up to four; some of the fours may represent twenty convictions. But in showing the reconvictions of this class of offenders I do not go beyond four.

3460. What do you include in the denomination petty offenders? I mean by petty offenders chiefly persons who are arrested for some offence under the Vagrant Act. That offence generally arises out of and is accompanied by drunkenness. I have not divided them; but now that I know the point upon which my evidence is required I could give you the drunkards and petty offenders separately. I understood that what the Commission chiefly required to know from me was the cost of maintaining this class of offenders. I can give you that information.

3461. That was one of our objects; another object was to dissect the figures of the Inspector-General's report, if that were possible, so as to separate the convictions which would be followed by imprisonment? I can give you these returns in a more complete form; but it would require time.

3462. We should be very glad to have them? It is only a question of time; I suppose their preparation would occupy about a fortnight.

3463. Can the returns be so arranged as to compare with the statistics of the Inspector-General of Police for the Metropolitan Police District? I do not see how you can very well bring them together, because we do not touch anything beyond convictions. I could get you the returns for the whole Colony if you required them.

3464. But the Inspector-General has not taken the whole Colony? Then I will confine the return to the Metropolitan Police District. The particulars as to maintenance, which I am about to give you will be substantially for the Metropolitan District, because hardly any person is received in any place but Darlinghurst for drunkenness.

3465. Have you been able to arrive at any approximate calculation of the cost of the State drunkard from the time of his apprehension. He is apprehended; he goes to the lock-up; thence to the Stipendiary Magistrate, and thence to gaol; then back again through the regular sequence. We are very anxious to know what this kind of administration of drunkenness costs the State? I can only give you the cost after the offenders reach the prison. I can give you the cost of the drunkards from that point; also the cost of the obscene language people; I can give you them both together or separately. I have found it best for your purpose not to take the total number of these persons who come in on any one day, but to take the average daily number of the two classes. The average number of simple drunkards in Darlinghurst is thirty-three per diem. You may say that there is always that number in.

3466. That is the standing average at Darlinghurst? Yes; for simple drunkenness. I will now refer to an item which does not appear to be generally understood. There are persons who think that the prisoners are overfed; but I may mention that the cost of the rations of each drunkard under short sentence is something under 3d. a day, and that the allowance of meat which he gets amounts to half a pound in a week; hence the ration is not costly. The yearly cost of the drunkards in this respect therefore would be £148 19s. 10d. Then we have to take the cost of guarding them. Seeing that they need comparatively little guarding—that if we can keep them by themselves we do not want the same strength of guards as we require for the long-sentence men—I have estimated two-thirds as their share of the guard. It would certainly be reduced to that if we had not any of the more important prisoners. I estimate the cost of guarding these drunkards at 18s. 5½d. per diem, or £336 18s. a year. That must be added to the cost of feeding them. The cost of clothing them I will put down as nil, because this class of offenders are clothed in what we may call the half worn-out garments of the longer-sentenced prisoners, which would otherwise be destroyed. The figures I have already given, therefore, represent the cost of the simple drunkards.

3467. But drunkenness often reaches the stage of delirium tremens. The offender in that case would go to the Receiving-house, or he may go to one of the asylums. I imagine that he would be an expensive individual, but you do not trace him? We do not trace him. Some of the drunkards at Darlinghurst may go into hospital

- hospital, but they are generally treated outside. They are sometimes given some alcoholic mixture, but you could scarcely compute it as an item of cost.
3468. I suppose this mixture is intended to be a sort of a "pick-me-up?" Exactly. It is ordered by Dr. O'Connor. The number of persons in the gaol for drunkenness and obscene language I have taken to be 159; and as there are far longer sentences rationed upon a sliding scale, I have taken the cost of their rations to be £1 19s. daily. The daily cost of guarding them I estimate to be £4 10s. Taking the guarding and rations together, the yearly cost of each of these prisoners would be about £15. That would be the yearly cost per head of the 159 and 33 prisoners.
3469. The inefficiency of the punishment for drunkenness must have often struck you? I have put forward in my official reports the suggestion that the manner in which we now treat drunkards is altogether wrong, that is to say, the system of punishment. We convict them over and over again to the extent of, perhaps, 100 convictions in an offender's life-time. This is the way in which the system works: The offenders come into the gaol in an absolutely shattered condition; they are miserable creatures. The period of their confinement is from twenty-four hours to seven days. The authorities are bound to see that they are revived, cleansed, and moderately fed. Where necessary, of course they get medicine, and by the mere abstinence from drink the offender at the end of seven days finds himself feeling pretty well right again. But he returns to the gaol within the next week. My idea is that there should be a system of cumulative punishments according to the number of convictions, and that we should not be called upon to recruit these people and then let them out of gaol again. Of course we want legislation upon the subject, and that legislation would be opposed to all past legislation, and the custom of almost every country. Still I think the system ought to be carried out. If the Workhouse Bill of Sir James Martin had been in force it would have dealt with the matter.
3470. Do you think then that reform in the case of drunkards is hopeless? Absolutely, in a general sense.
3471. You would inflict punishment in the form of hard work? I would keep the drunkard confined sufficiently long to make him do penal work which would make some sort of impression upon him; but I am afraid you will not be able to suppress him.
3472. And your cumulative punishment would sometimes amount to imprisonment for say six months? Yes; we can get something out of men with ordinary physique, but out of the drunkard we can, as a rule, get nothing. Out of the total of nearly 200 in the figures I have given you we get comparatively nothing. Indeed we have to tell off persons to look after them if they are disposed towards delirium and that sort of thing. It is intended now, I believe, to make a penitentiary near Sydney for this class.
3473. But you will require new legislation to enable you to get hold of the habitual drunkard? It will want legislation; and the best step in the direction of repression would be legislation, giving to the Magistrates a power of cumulative punishment. They see the same men and women every fortnight and they cannot send them to gaol for more than a certain time, unless they have committed themselves under the Vagrant Act.
3474. Some very intelligent witnesses who have attended here—members of the stipendiary bench—seem to think that an inebriate asylum, with a long term of confinement, would be better than a penitentiary? I do not think the one would interfere with the other.
3475. An inebriate asylum may be viewed from two or three aspects. We as a Commission might possibly recommend the establishment of an inebriate asylum so that, apart from convictions, the unhappy relatives of drunkards might be able to place, it might be, their father or brother there, and in that way do their best in the direction of reformation. Practically there is no attempt at reformation now? None whatever.
3476. So that, whether the confinement be compulsory by the State, or voluntary by the action of private individuals, we are inclined to think that one of the first duties of the State, when it deals with the question of drunkenness, should be to establish an inebriate asylum? I do not see why the two systems should not be worked together. You might have permission in your legislation, for instance, for the reduction of the sentences in the penitentiary upon certain conditions, and the transferring of the offenders to the asylum. But I think you must have impressive punishment on the one hand as well as an endeavour to reform.
3477. Those who brought themselves within the domain of the quasi-criminal law by their acts of drunkenness should be first handed over to the penitentiary you think, and be afterwards drafted to the asylum? Yes; the two things would work together, and it would be in accordance with one of the first principles upon which offenders should be dealt with—the endeavour to make some break between the coercion of penal treatment and the immediate and absolute liberty which offenders now obtain upon the expiration of their sentence.
3478. The cost of the drunkard which you have already given would be considerably increased by his cost to the police? Of course.
3479. Is it not probable that the proposed penitentiary and the inebriate asylum would be no more costly to the State than the present administration of the drunkard? The penitentiary has to be erected, and a certain expenditure must be faced. There would not be any curtailment of the expenditure upon these people, because there would be another establishment; but the purpose of it would be this, the requirements of the city as regards provision for criminals have become too large for Darlinghurst, and it is thought that the penitentiary would furnish a fitting prison for those miserable creatures, the drunkards.
3480. If you could get rid of the habitual drunkards, I should say that, in a city like Sydney, the expenditure of an extra £10,000 a year would be justified? I am afraid you would not get rid of them.
3481. But the persons who would appear before the Bench would be chiefly fresh offenders? Yes; the habitual offenders, instead of coming before the Bench once a fortnight, would turn up only once in six months. Although I have not much belief in the possibility of reclaiming the drunkard in any way, I think it would have a certain beneficial effect if he were confined sufficiently long to permit of his being exercised in some penal labour. I should propose to have in the penitentiary penal labour, although it might not be productive; but whatever form it may take I think there should be some rather fatiguing penal labour. I think that a deterrent would be produced to this effect—that some of them would not return so quickly.
3482. We are under the impression that this new mode of dealing with drunkards would not be more expensive to the State than the present mode? I do not think it would cost so much.
3483. That is, with the penitentiary you describe and the inebriate asylum? I think it would be less expensive in its results than the present system.
3484. We think that the State lunatic is an exceedingly expensive individual, and that the number of State

H. Maclean, Esq.
14 June, 1886.

State lunatics would be considerably diminished by the new procedure and new treatment? Yes; there would be less lunacy arising from drunkenness if the two systems—the repressive and the curative—were adopted.

3485. You think the two systems would work harmoniously? I think they would suit each other admirably.

3486. Are you in favour of the compulsory treatment of drunkards—that is to say, of a treatment much of the same kind as is now in vogue with respect to a lunatic before he has committed an offence? I think I would carry out some such plan as this: After a certain number of convictions within a certain time, say 12, 15, or 20 in a year, the offender should go to the Penitentiary under sentence of, perhaps, eighteen months, with a provision that the Government should, upon the recommendation of the authorities, pass him over to the inebriate asylum. I would make the position at the inebriate asylum something that a man or woman would try to work into from the other place; although they would both be costly places, the general effect upon the community would be a monetary advantage.

3487. You think the system would have a deterrent effect? Yes, both places combined; but if you wish to keep persons in the inebriate asylum you must fall back upon the principles of the Martin Act, and have power to keep them there; then, if we passed offenders from the penitentiary to the asylum, the argument of there being an infringement of the liberty of the subject would fall to the ground—that is what knocked over the old plan; but in this case you would be easing off the punishment.

3488. Are you able to give us any idea of what proportion of the crime—I use the word in the ordinary sense—of the country may be considered due to drunkenness? I could not do more than guess; but I may say that a great number of prisoners in the various gaols—in fact, it has been quite a common thing—in speaking to me of their cases, have said that they were not naturally bad men, but that drink had put them wrong; it would be almost impossible to give a proportion, but I should say the number of prisoners in the position I have indicated is very large.

3489. Would any official, such as a gaol chaplain or governor, be able to give us any information upon this head? I think the chaplains would be able to give you better information than I could give you as to the comparative number of persons who tell them that they have brought themselves to grief by drunkenness. Their evidence upon this point would be better than mine or that of the governor of a gaol.

3491. Either drunkenness on the part of the offender or a condition of drunkenness on the part of his victim? I think a very large proportion of the crime of the Colony can be traced to drunkenness.

3492. But you must exclude a certain class of offences, such as highway robberies, which are not now frequent, and burglaries, and offences of that kind which require all a man's astuteness. You would not attribute that class of offences to drink? They may drink; but I would not say that they were drunkards or they could not go through their rôle.

3494. Drink is not the incentive to their crimes? No; but I think they have orgies occasionally.

3496. There would be no gain to the State from it? You cannot expect anything from them.

3497. As regards self-support then you would say nil? Absolutely nil. It is the same in all countries with that class of men.

3498. But when a drunkard had been confined two or three months, and had got rid of his fits or his craving for liquor, would you not think he could be set to work (say) making mats. You cannot do any good with a man under three months even in making mats. This particular class of offenders are generally worn out. I would not profess to do anything with them, but I would give them labour to punish them.

3499. I should have thought that the drunken bootmaker, or the drunken tailor, for instance, might be made some use of? The class of men to whom I refer have no means of gaining a livelihood of that kind. No one knows how they live. They lie down in the Park all day and they prowl about at night. How they get their food and lodging I do not know. I suppose that even the most experienced sergeant of police could not tell you. These are the class of men to whom I refer.

3500. Mr. Davies.] Have you given any consideration to the question of the operation of the present or the preceding Licensing law? I think you will find it stated in one of my back reports that after the passing of the law there was a very considerable diminution in the reconvictions. They have now returned almost to their normal condition, and, as far as my information goes, I ascribe it to the cause assigned by the Inspector-General of Police—the difficulty of securing the full operation of the law. A law of that kind is generally obeyed at the outset. No doubt it was a great check upon drunkenness in the beginning; it also improved the order of the city at night. Any one could see that.

3501. Is there not now a great improvement in that respect in consequence of the early closing? I think there is a considerable improvement yet; but the condition of things has drifted backwards a great deal. The same marked improvement in a general sense is not to be observed now, and, to my mind, the Inspector-General gives the reason; the police cannot check the Sunday selling.

3502. What is your opinion as to the Sunday closing? I think there ought to be some modification of the present law. I think it is very hard upon the class of men who are not drunkards that they should not be able, at a certain time of the day, to get their beer, and perhaps take it away. I think I would open the houses for an hour. It presses hardly upon people sometimes when they are moving about on Sunday and find that they cannot get any moderate or fair refreshment. In fact they cannot even get anything to eat. The houses are not opened. I think the Sunday selling will always be a sore point, and that you will never be able to carry out the present law. I do not like laws which are sure to be evaded by some of the people.

3503. Notwithstanding the increased population I understand from your report that the number of persons confined in the various gaols is not so large as formerly? Not relatively to the population. In 1864, when I took charge of the prisons, the number of prisoners was 1,800, in a much smaller population; now there are only 2,500, notwithstanding the enormous increase in the population.

3504. What is the cause of the decrease? I think one cause is to be found in the greater efficiency of the police. I think the new organization came in at about the time to which I have referred. Possibly as a great many changes have been made in prison administration that may have had some part in it, although it is not for me to say so.

3505. President.] The larger number in these days would not be attributable to any remnant of the old class? No; partly I think to the spurt in the wealth of the country in consequence of the gold-fields. I think the more wealthy and prosperous a community becomes it will include, among other things, a few more criminals.

3506. Mr. Davies.] But you think that the general efficiency of the police has had something to do with the decrease? Yes.

3507. Would not the greater efficiency of the police be a means of securing a larger number of convictions? The increased efficiency of the police has a deterrent effect. If a man thinks he can commit a crime with impunity he will often risk it; but if the police are smart, he will not try it. That is why there is so little bushranging now. I suppose our country police are the most effective body of the kind in the world. The bushranger knows that as a rule the police will have him within a fortnight of the commission of an offence; therefore he drops bushranging.

3508. Have you given attention to the present Licensing law? I have taken a general observation of its effects.

3509. Do you think that there are more than a sufficient number of public-houses in the Metropolitan District than is necessary to satisfy the public wants? If I were dealing with the question of licenses I would put it upon the basis of the form and sufficiency of a house. I would restrict the number by requiring a class of houses which would not be put up as mere drinking shops.

3510. You would not place the licenses upon a population basis? I would let the man make his own calculations. It would be his own mistake if he were to put up a superior class of house in a population which was insufficient to support it.

3511. You are not in favour of local option? No, I would fix a certain standard of house; I remember working the system in a similar way when I was in charge of a gold-field. I would have nothing but a good class of house upon the field, and the consequence was that there was not a plethora. I think that is the proper way in which to abate the nuisance.

3512. You would not transfer the control of the traffic to the people? No; I would not. I think you would find safety in fixing a certain standard of a house, with certain considerations for locality. Of course you would not make a man put up at Pittwater the kind of house he would put up in George-street.

3513. You know that the principle of local option is now in existence to some extent? Yes.

3514. You do not think it is a wise principle? I do not say that it is unwise. But I think the object might be accomplished without possibly subjecting a man to an adverse vote in a locality—a vote which might possibly be given from personal motives. If you go by the house and the character of the man I do not think you would have too many houses. When I say the house I mean a house of a certain standard. The authorities have not done so generally, and the consequence is that in many localities there are too many houses.

3515. But the public-houses are supposed to supply a public want; they exist for the public convenience? A man would not erect the standard of house I am thinking of unless it were required.

3516. But should not the people for whose benefit the house is licensed say whether it should or should not exist? I have not thought out the matter. I do not see that any strong reason can be urged against it. I can only say that that is not the way in which I would go about the matter. I would bring about the same results in another way.

3517. I suppose you know that a large number of the houses in Sydney are mere drinking shops? Yes; I would not have that class of house. If you fixed a certain standard you would have no more drinking shops.

3518. I suppose you fully recognize the fact that as you increase facilities for obtaining drink, so you increase drinking? There is no doubt about that.

3519. You say that the cause of the imprisonment of a large proportion of the prisoners in our gaols is attributable to drink? Yes; but I should not like to state what proportion.

3520. Mr. Colls.] I was at the Water and Central Police Courts to-day, and I saw some drunkards sentenced to three and six months' hard labour;—what does that labour consist of? It depends upon the capabilities of the offenders. For instance, some of them drag barrows of stones and other things which may be required. It depends upon their strength. Others who are quite incapacitated for that kind of work are engaged in picking oakum, a description of work which they can get through. Some would perhaps be incapable of doing anything at all. The doctor deals with them and exempts them.

3521. In some country towns prisoners who are sentenced to hard labor have only to empty night-tubs, and to cut wood? Yes; perhaps nothing else can be got for them to do.

3522. Could they not crack metal for the municipalities? They do that whenever I can get it for them.

3523. What do you charge? Is a cubic yard; it is done simply to get the men to work; but there is great jealousy about this matter in some country places. They will not have it; they say that it is taking away work from free men. At Mudgee, with great trouble and difficulty, I managed to get the gaol turned into a beehive, as one of the newspapers put it, but there was an outcry against it, action was taken in Parliament, and I was obliged to knock the whole thing upon the head, so that I have given up the idea of making the country prisons productive at all; in some places there is a great deal of metal cracking; in other places it is held that it is an interference with free labor, and a great many municipalities do not want any metal cracked at all.

3524. Is it not advisable that some of the short-sentenced men should work at so much per diem in the streets and in other places? No; because the cost of guarding them is infinitely greater than the value of their work.

3525. Then many men who are sentenced to hard labour do not get it? If we can get the labour we give it to them; but the sentence means different treatment. If a man is sentenced to imprisonment without without hard labour he is treated as a misdemeanant. If he or his friends have the means he is allowed to get in moderation his own provisions and he may wear his own clothes; he is not made a convict. The chief effect of a sentence of hard labour is to make a man an absolute convict. He is put into grey clothing and he labours under a great many disabilities as compared with the man whose sentence is imprisonment only.

3526. Would you be in favour of giving only beer and wine licenses to a certain class of houses? I would not; I do not think they would adhere to the terms of their licenses.

3527. But you would issue these licenses if the law could be enforced? I would. I do not however like any law which is habitually evaded, and I think that wine and beer licenses would in most parts of the country be accompanied by the sale of spirits.

3528. You know that several clubs have been started for the purpose of effecting the sale of drink on Sunday? I know nothing about them.

3529. Mr. Withers.] You think that these chronic offenders of the State, who cost the people we do not know how much per head per annum, could not be profitably employed outside an enclosure if they were effectively guarded? In some places where there are conveniences, or where something is required to be done near a prison, I might send out a gang of them; but the circumstances do not often occur in which that can be done conveniently.

3530. There are a number of roads which might advantageously be made near Sydney, roads which will never be made by private labour. A road for instance from Sydney to Newcastle, along the coast, would be very convenient, and it would form a very pleasant drive. Do you not think that a gang of fifty men could be put on to such a work as that? Let it be understood that if they tried to escape their lives would be sacrificed. Or so far as the drunkards and less violent prisoners were concerned would it not be better to relieve the gaols, which you say are becoming unequal to the accommodation required, by setting these men to work cracking metal per yard where they would have no means of escape, giving them a portion of the money they earn at the time of their liberation? The first difficulty in the way of your suggestion as to drunkards is that they would not have the necessary physique. Then, as to the question of sending out prisoners in gangs, you could only do so, unless at undue expense, by a system of barracking them in tents or big wooden rooms altogether, and the first principles of prison management in these modern days are opposed to the mixing up of criminals in large dormitories. A road party would probably consist of twenty-five. To guard these twenty-five men, under the conditions you name, you would require eight or ten officers, because it must not be forgotten that they have to obtain sleep. Each of these officers would cost at least £170 a year. When you have paid this money, with something more, and when you come to put it against the results of the labor, you would find the system a complete failure. No penalty will deter this class of men from making a bolt if they get the chance. The reason that they have become criminals is that they have been unable to resist temptation.

3531. Would not six officers be sufficient to guard twenty-five men—three at night and three in the day? I would not send a party of twenty-five to a road with that loose guarding; I would not send less than eight officers. That would be a very small number and even then the value of the labor would not compensate for the additional expense.

3532. I should have thought that some work could have been undertaken as piece-work? We have some long-sentenced prisoners at Trial Bay, and it is in contemplation to employ them on some system of license upon the public works there, keeping them upon the peninsula. They will be employed upon a sliding scale of wages. Before their time for labor has come to an end they will be employed outside. I have begun sending batches of them. I have intimated that if any man dares to go away there will be five years' penalty; but we cannot relax our guard over them.

3533. Mr. Roseby.] You have observed that a large proportion of the prisoners are comparatively young? Yes; a good number.

3534. You have at Darlinghurst a number of girls who, if not of tender years, are young? Not so very many young girls. At present there is no reformatory for boys, so that they have to be sent to Darlinghurst, although they are kept by themselves. I observe, however, that there are not nearly so many young criminals here as in Melbourne.

3535. Some years ago I used to accompany other gentlemen to the Darlinghurst Gaol to lecture to the prisoners on Saturday afternoon. We observed that a large proportion of the prisoners were young—that is to say, of an age varying from seventeen to twenty-four or twenty-five? There are a considerable number of them; but they are not of the habitual drunkard class.

3536. Do you not think that the downfall of many of these young people has been associated with public-houses? Yes; I think so, and with dancing saloons and resorts of that kind.

3537. Do you not think the age at which young people may now be supplied with drink is too young? If a young man or a young woman says that he or she is over sixteen, the landlord, who wants to sell the drink, does not question the matter. I am afraid you would not improve matters by increasing the age.

3538. You would not call a boy of sixteen a young man? I would call him a lad. I think that at eighteen a boy should be considered grown up. That is the rule in the navy.

3539. You have explained to us that you would suppress the drinking shops in the city by increasing the standard of accommodation, but houses which have been licensed on account of their having an extraordinary number of rooms, have afterwards become mere drinking shops? The proper way to meet the difficulty would be to have effective supervision not incidental to the police. Let there be an officer whose duty it should be to see that good accommodation is provided in every house.

3540. One of the Stipendiary Magistrates told us that he had applied for and had been unable to obtain a light meal at a so-called respectable house in the suburbs, and we have evidence to the effect that that is generally the case? I think it is quite likely; I think it is intolerable. The proper provisioning of travellers and others is the intention of the public-house; the drinking division should be subsidiary.

3541. Can you say what proportion of the young women in Darlinghurst Gaol attribute their fallen condition to drink? I think that most of the young women there belong to the streets; I do not know whether it is drink which brings them there in the first instance, but in all cases in which a young woman embarks in that line of life, she drinks; I do not think drink creates the street girl so often as it is the street girl who resorts to drink.

3542. Do you think that the vending of drink at a public-house bar is a proper avocation for a girl? I do not profess to have a large knowledge of the question; but I have seen some very respectable girls behind the bars in the superior hotels.

3543. I am not casting reflections upon the girls. I want your opinion as to whether the law ought to allow them to be employed in that business? No doubt there are some rough occurrences sometimes at public-house bars; but as far as my observation has gone, I think that the majority of the girls keep themselves very respectable, and do not take much notice of things which go on.

H. Maclean,
Esq.
14 June, 1886.

3544. Mr. Hutchison.] Have you formed any idea of the standard to which you would raise public-houses so as to purify the traffic? I would have sufficiency of room and provisioning—apart from drink—for any person who might require it.

3545. The Legislature has attempted to increase the standard and now we are told that although the rooms are there, and although the house is up to the standard, there is no accommodation? We want an official to look after that—an official who would have no other duties, and who would take cognizance of such cases as that in which the Stipendiary Magistrate to whom you have referred could not get luncheon. I was a Magistrate very early in my life, and at that time, if a man did not get a good supply of provisions at a house, the license of that house would be cancelled at the next meeting.

3546. You would re-enact that? Yes, I would.

3547. You would fix a period at which all houses should reach a given standard, and to all who had not reached it you would refuse a license? I would; but you would have to adopt a scale applicable to the population of the various divisions.

John Cecil Read, Esq., Governor of Darlinghurst Gaol, called in, sworn, and examined:—

3548. President.] You have been Governor of Darlinghurst Gaol for some time? For more than twenty-five years.

J. C. Read,
Esq.
14 June, 1886.

3549. Were you connected with gaol administration before that period? No; I was an inspector of police for five or six years before that, and I had had fifteen years' experience as an inspector in London.

3550. Do you consider, from your experience here, that habits of drunkenness have increased in the community? I think they have; more than half the prisoners in the gaol have been in for drunkenness during the last year and five months. The following return will give you the exact numbers from the 1st January, 1885, to the 31st December, 1885:—

RETURN of Drunkards from January 1st, 1885, to December 31st, 1885:—

Males.	Females.	Total.	Sentences.
1	0	1	12 hours.
909	173	1,082	24 "
325	71	396	48 "
531	164	695	2 days.
126	56	182	3 "
223	123	346	4 "
1,781	1,381	3,162	7 "
3	2	5	14 "
3,899	1,970	5,869	Total received during 1885.

I should add that the return applies to offences of which drunkenness forms a part.

3551. Do you consider that that proportion would be maintained throughout the gaols of the Colony? I do not know; I have nothing to do with the other gaols. Perhaps you may think that I am exaggerating, but I am sure I am not, when I say that ninety-nine prisoners out of a hundred have committed crimes which are directly or indirectly connected with drunkenness. I shocked Sir Alfred Stephen when I said so years ago, but I have since given him statistics which I think have in a great measure proved the truth of the statement. In many cases of course prisoners are not locked up for drunkenness, but drink is connected with their crimes. I could mention a recent case, in which a prisoner who had occupied a good position was in the habit of drinking at clubs; this led him to gambling and speculation, and finally brought about his ruin.

3552. Is that the kind of drinking to which you refer, when you say that drink is connected with so many crimes? Yes. There have been many instances lately. Take the case of the two men who murdered the constable at Canterbury. They had been drinking before hand. When I give this estimate I, of course, speak partly from facts and partly from hearsay.

3553. Have you foreigners—Italians and Frenchmen—among the drunkards? Yes. I have known Frenchmen come to gaol suffering from delirium tremens.

3554. The offences to which you refer would include small assaults, petty larcenies, malicious injuries, and offences of that nature? Yes. There is drink behind even these crimes.

3555. Do I understand that your calculation of 99 per cent. refers to cases of assault and larceny? Oh yes. Pickpockets in London have told me that their hand becomes steady after a certain amount of drinking. They end by taking too much; then they are caught.

3556. Take the case of burglars (who are not very common here);—have you known burglars in the habit of taking drink? Yes. They take a certain amount of it. They have told me that they take it to brace their nerves.

3557. There must surely be in the gaols at any given time a number of people who have committed crimes as the result of some fearful impulse of vengeance utterly disconnected with drink. A man, for instance, sees another man walking with his sweetheart; he knocks him on the head. You do not want to fall back upon drink to account for a crime of that nature? No; I can understand that there would be cases of that description.

3558. Bushrangers, for instance, they do not take drink? Oh, yes. Gardiner, Gilbert, Hall, and the Clarkes—they all drank. Gardiner used to drink a square bottle of gin in a night. He had not got over an attack of tremens when he came to me from Queensland.

3559. Cattle and horse stealers;—are they given to drink? I am not well acquainted with that class of cases, but I have heard of men going into bush-shanties and drinking before stealing horses.

3560. You have seen an immense number of persons in gaol for simple drunkenness, or for offences under the Vagrant Act connected with drunkenness? Yes.

3561. What is your opinion of the punishment awarded. I suppose it appears to you to be farcical? Yes; particularly when three or four of the offenders are put into one cell at night; they have no character

J. C. Read, Esq. to lose, they are well fed, and they are treated by the doctor. I have a tabulated statement showing the number of these offenders who are treated by the doctor:—

14 June, 1888. PRISONERS treated in Sydney Gaol Hospital for Alcoholism and Delirium Tremens from 1st January, 1885, to the 31st December, 1885:—

Males, alcoholism ..	229	Females, alcoholism ..	70.—Total, 299
do delirium tremens ...	58	do delirium tremens ...	11.—Total, 69
Total for 1885 .....	287	Total for 1885 ... ..	81 do 368

In one year, I think it was in 1883, no less than 600 cases of delirium tremens were treated by the doctor in Darlinghurst Gaol. The fact was sworn to in evidence before the coroner. But the cases of alcoholism are worse than these of delirium tremens. You may cure delirium tremens, but alcoholism, if it can be cured at all, will take a long time to cure. When I see a strong powerful man brought into gaol suffering from alcoholism I give him up. I think that a weak man gets over the effects more easily. In the first place drink upsets him more, and it sickens him to such an extent that he is unable to keep it up. The stronger man suffers more from delirium tremens.

3562. Could you let us have the returns as to delirium tremens from 1881 to the end of 1885? I could let you have them for that period, or for the last twenty years.

3563. Do female drunkards figure much among those suffering from delirium tremens? They seem to stand the drink better than the men do. The fits are not so dangerous, but they are bad enough; I have known one woman to tear out her eye in a fit.

3564. But I suppose the drink shows itself in a violent form of hysteria? Yes; they are often worse the fourth day after they come into the gaol. I have paid particular attention to cases of delirium tremens, and I can understand the cause of it, particularly when all stimulants are stopped; then it comes on very badly. I have seen more delirium tremens in one day in Sydney than I have seen in fifteen years in London; I have seen twenty-seven persons suffering in one day in Sydney, and I am sure I did not see that number in my fifteen years' experience as an inspector of police in London.

3565. Do you think that persons suffering from delirium tremens have been in the habit of imbibing spirits rather than beer? Both beer and spirits—especially rum. If it is not otherwise adulterated I believe there is a great deal of fusel oil in the rum. Some of the Queensland rum would be good liquor if it had age; but from what I have heard, I should say that there was a great deal of fusel oil in it.

3566. Do many of those delirium tremens patients become confirmed lunatics? Yes; they pass into the hands of Dr. Manning.

3567. Have you any connection with the Reception-house at Darlinghurst? No; except that prisoners pass backwards and forwards. The criminal lunatics pass, of course, to the asylums.

3568. But do you not pass any of your détenues into the Reception-house for treatment? Yes; but I send more to the Lunatic Asylum than to the Reception-house. I think I have nine or ten in the observation ward now; most of those cases have been caused by delirium tremens or alcoholism.

3569. This enormous proportion of crime through drink must have set you thinking that the punishment meted out to drunkards is a ridiculous one? The gaol is simply a hospital for them—a means of prolonging their lives.

3570. You must see the same faces circulating in a continuous stream? Yes. I may mention that the figures I have given you include many of the people who come back again and again. The gaol is like a club for them; they are brought out of the Domain, or perhaps from lying in the gutter. In the course of the day or two which they spend in gaol they are cured and cleansed; otherwise they would not live long. I have had one woman committed between 200 and 300 times for drunkenness. She would have been dead a quarter of a century ago were it not for the gaol.

3571. Then, as a matter of fact, the gaol is a hospital for the public-house? Precisely. A great many cases are taken to gaol which would not be taken to an English gaol; they would be taken to the work-house.

3573. Do you think there would be any hope for the reformation of the drunkard if he were sent for a year to an inebriate asylum? I do.

3574. You think then that the case of the State drunkard is not altogether hopeless? I do. When I have condemned drunkenness, persons have remarked to me that they do not consider it half so bad as the passion for gambling and betting on the turf. We condemn the Chinese for taking opium when there are a number of our own people shaking from head to foot from the effects of drink. I think drunkenness so far becomes a disease that many drunkards would take a glass of grog if they knew that it would kill them.

3575. Still you think that it is possible to cure them? Many of them.

3576. Could you effect a regular cure, do you think? It would be hard to say whether the cure would be permanent, so much depends upon the person. I have a number of friends in the Colony who dare not take one glass of grog. It would be quite sufficient to upset them. I would not take a drop of liquor myself if I thought I should be better without it.

3577. You are not a total abstainer? No.

3578. You are what would be called a moderate drinker? Yes.

3579. You think that, in the case of some persons, drinking in moderation is not a totally reprehensible habit? I do not think it is.

3580. You think that drink, in moderation perhaps, does some persons good? I believe that the quantity I take does me good; I hope that I should have sufficient resolution not to take a drop if I thought that it would send me almost insane, as it does some persons.

3581. We are told that it is impossible to dissect the number of convictions for drunkenness so as to show which are first and which are subsequent offences? I think you could dissect them; in one of the returns which I have given you you will see that the great majority are sentenced to only twenty-four hours' imprisonment; a lesser number are sentenced to forty-eight hours' imprisonment, and so on.

3582. But some are let off with a fine? Yes; and upon some public holidays they are let off with an admonition.

3583. Could you give us a return showing approximately from 1881 to 1885 the number of those who were first offenders, and of those who were old offenders or habitual drunkards? Yes; but it will take a great deal of clerical labor, and I am rather hard up for clerks; perhaps I ought to remind the Commission that some men get drunk forty times in the course of the year, and never fall into the hands of the police; I ought also to mention, perhaps, that the return which I have given is made out from the warrants. J. C. Read, Esq. 14 June, 1886.

3584. But in informations under the Vagrancy Act, drunkenness is always specified I suppose? That may or may not be the case; sometimes it is specified; when drunkenness is coupled with riotous behaviour it would generally appear; in such a case however as violent robbery it would not appear.

MONDAY, 21 JUNE, 1886.

Present:—

A. OLIVER, Esq., M.A., PRESIDENT, | J. ROSEBY, Esq., J.P.,
G. WITHERS, Esq., J.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

John Cecil Read, Esq., Governor of Darlinghurst Gaol, recalled and further examined:—

3585. President.] I want to know whether you retain the opinion you expressed at the last meeting that 99 per cent. of the persons in Darlinghurst gaol are persons whose crime has been caused directly or indirectly by drunkenness? I have consulted the officers in the gaol, and I wish to modify my statement; the proportion is 92 or 93 per cent. J. C. Read, Esq. 21 June, 1886.
3586. Do you include the debtors in that number? No, only those under conviction—those under long sentences, or detained under summary orders of the Magistrates—all from the various Courts.
3587. 92 per cent. are there in consequence of drunkenness? Yes. I have been questioning the warders; an experienced warder informs me that a great many prisoners in whose cases drunkenness is not named are in gaol in consequence of drunken habits. He learns this from the statements of their relations when they come to the gaol, and also from letters which they receive from their friends, who deplore that they should have given way to drunken habits and gone into bad company. I produce a document on the subject, signed by six warders, also one from the bushranger "Thunderbolt."
3588. Does he attribute his crime to drunkenness? No, he does not acknowledge that. My impression is that he was mad with drink, because on three occasions he shot at the police. The warders are of opinion that 90 per cent. of the prisoners are in gaol in consequence of drink.
3589. How do they arrive at that conclusion? From personal knowledge, and from what they learn from the prisoners' relations who visit them in gaol.
3590. These papers give fully 90 per cent., and you add 2 per cent.? Yes. (See Appendix.)
3591. Are you satisfied that the conclusions arrived at have been come to on sufficient premises—a man must not jump at a percentage? I believe it is correct.
3592. How long have these warders been there? Some of them twenty years. I asked a warder (a gate-keeper), who has plenty of opportunities to observe the habits of the friends and relations of the prisoners, and I told him I wanted statistics of the number of prisoners who were in the gaol directly or indirectly through drunkenness. He said nine out of every ten. I then told him to take time to reflect, to go through the books, to consult his fellow-warders, and give me a report on Monday morning. "Thunderbolt" signs his name Jamieson, but his name is Thompson.
3593. Does he admit that before going on a bushranging expedition he fortified himself with drink? No. He was only a boy when he commenced bushranging.
3594. What age is he now? About 30 years. He is a most intelligent man; one of the best conducted prisoners and a good workman; but he is a dangerous man.
3595. Have you given much attention to the proportion of native-born drunkards in your gaol? Yes.
3596. Are there a large number of young men incarcerated for drunkenness? Yes. Sydney natives; not country natives. They are a different type altogether. They look like a different nationality.
3597. I suppose the Sydney native is a larrikin? He is a most insignificant creature in comparison to the country native. The country native is a fine manly fellow. The Sydney native is done up with drinking, smoking, and profligacy. I have had boys fourteen years of age suffering from venereal diseases.
3598. Has there been an increase in the number of native-born offenders? There has been. These natives are not half-grown; they are most miserable creatures.
3599. You get no work out of them, I presume? Yes, of a certain kind. Whilst they are suffering from drink they cannot work.
3600. Are the young natives often victims of the delirium tremens? A good many of them are.
3601. And that shows that they drink a great deal? Yes, and smoke with it. They get bad tobacco and beer and bad rum; I understand that rum is their chief beverage.
3602. Have you noticed any increase in the number of native-born women who are sent to gaol for drunkenness? I think there is a slight increase. I have been surprised at the number of Irish women who come; in Ireland they are abstemious. The number of them in gaol here is high in proportion to the population.
3603. Do you not think that the number of drunkards detained in gaol in large seaport towns is large all over the world? Yes; and also in manufacturing towns. At Waltham Abbey, a manufacturing town in Essex, there are five times as many drunkards as there are at the adjoining village in Hertfordshire.
3604. Do you consider the number of drunkards in Sydney larger than that in any other city of the same size elsewhere? I think so; I have not had an opportunity of comparing the statistics.
3605. Have you any idea as to the percentage in any district, say in the Metropolitan Police District? No. Nearly all the drunkards we have are from the Metropolitan District.
3606. Your return shows for the year 1885, 5869? Yes; there may be a very few, not a half a dozen, from the country districts.
3607. You are in favour of the adoption of the work-house or the penitentiary system? No; I should like separate treatment.
3608. Could that be carried out in Darlinghurst? No; there is not room; I would have a hulk.

- J. C. Read, Esq.
21 June, 1886.
3609. You think there should be a place for the reception and proper treatment of these people, and if they can work they should be made to work? It is very seldom you can make a drunkard work.
3610. Is that not because you detain him so short a time? Sometimes the delirium tremens is breaking out at the time when they are going out, and I have to tell a constable to watch the man. The delirium is generally at its worst stage about the fourth day; but many of them have to be discharged in two days; they get apprehended again and they are brought back; it is folly to send them for two days in bad cases.
3611. Do they send them for two days for first offences? Very often for the tenth offence. The Magistrates take different views of the matter. I may say that I have seen a most powerful native, a dipsomaniac, lift two keepers off the ground; I thought him a giant in strength, and 5 minutes afterwards they have come to inform me that he was dead. We do not use straight jackets much or try to manage them by force; we put the dipsomaniacs in a padded room; resistance aggravates their condition.
3612. Mr. Roseby.] I understand you to say that you have a large number of young women and young men in the gaol? Yes; a large number of young men, and the young women have been increasing during the last two years.
3613. Have you noticed a very large increase of intemperance among young people? I have during the last two or three years particularly.
3614. Do you not think the law ought to be made more restrictive with regard to the selling of liquor to young people? I think that a publican who supplies them with drink, particularly when he sees them getting drunk, ought to lose his license.
3615. Do you not think the law ought to say that young persons shall not be served with strong liquors? I think that young people in their teens ought not to be served with drink.
3616. You have a number of persons, of course, who come to you again and again? If you were to send half the drunkards out of the Colony we should have the gaol very much thinned; the same people come over and over again.
3617. 50 per cent. of the convicts are really there from drunkenness? Yes, rather more than 50 per cent.
3618. Do you think there is any hope of a drunkard ever being permanently reformed? They seldom reform, and those who do generally relapse into their old habits; I have known a man sometimes to keep out of gaol for two or three years and then come back again.
3619. Have you known no case of permanent reform? Yes; there have been some but not many.
3620. Of course when they are with you they are enforced abstainers? They get nothing when they are with us, except through the doctor.
3621. He only has to deal with bad cases? Yes; medicinally he deals with them.
3622. There is an impression that a man who is soaked with drink cannot live without it; that is not your experience, I suppose; they thrive under your diet? Yes, after they get from under the hands of the doctor; they get no drink from me under the ration scale.
3623. And those who come in debilitated and broken down leave quite recuperated and renewed? Yes; sometimes they are unable to work for two or three months, but after that they are well able to work.
3624. Do you think that the sentences ought to be imposed on some more regular system than they are at present; you said that men who are brought up for the tenth time often get only two days? I should have said only a few days after they have been up four or five times.
3625. Persons who have been committed four or five times ought to be sent to gaol for a longer period? I think so.
3626. Do you not think that we ought to have asylums for inebriates, to which they could be sent compulsorily or voluntarily? It would have to be compulsory; a voluntary system would be of no use.
3627. I mean so that their friends might get them sent there? I think it is their friends who prevent them from reforming. When inebriates are let out of gaol their friends generally take them at once and give them some drink; they think that having been so long unable to get anything to drink they must require something.
3628. You think that the establishment of an inebriate asylum would be desirable? I do.
3629. Of course you believe that a large amount of drunkenness is induced by the facilities for getting drink? Decidedly.
3630. That there are too many public-houses? Yes.
3631. Do you not think that a very much less number would supply the legitimate wants of the community? I do not know what the character of the publican is now, but I think the magistrates ought to be very careful to whom they give licenses; if only respectable persons got licenses, boys and girls would not be served over the bars.
3632. Do you think that the character of those who keep the houses is largely determined by the fact that they are largely in the hands of the brewers and spirit merchants? I know nothing about the characters of those who keep public-houses now; I did about twenty-five years ago.
3633. Is it a fact that a large number of the houses are in the hands of the brewers and the spirit merchants? I have heard so, and some curious characters they put into some of them.
3634. Do you think it ought to be tolerated? No, although to a certain extent the same thing existed in London in my time; but as a rule the publicans in London thirty years ago were rather respectable men, and the goodwill of one of their houses was worth £3,000 or £4,000.
3635. Do you think that it would be wise to continue the present law and have it enforced—that is, to have public-houses closed altogether on Sundays? It is so long since I have studied the matter that I am not prepared to answer the question.
3636. You know that during the year 1882 the Act was pretty rigorously enforced; it has been considerably relaxed of late years. Did you not notice that during that year there was a substantial decrease in the number of convictions for drunkenness? Yes.
3637. In view of that fact, don't you think that it would be desirable, for the moral well-being of the community, that the Sunday-closing law should be rigorously carried out? I think so. Yesterday, when I was going to Church with my family, a drunken man staggered past us.
3638. You referred to the number of young women there are at Darlinghurst;—have you observed whether any of them were connected with public-houses as barmaids or servants? We have had some barmaids suffering from delirium tremens. I can remember the cases.
3639. Do you not think that the law ought to prohibit the employment of young women as barmaids?

I think that the occupation must tend to demoralise them. I should say that the occupation of a general servant was much more respectable than that of a barmaid.

3639. Do you not think that the people should have the right to say whether or not they wanted public-houses in a particular locality? I have not considered the question.

3640. Mr. Withers.] Has it come within your official knowledge that many young women have become demoralised through working in factories where the sexes are mixed? I think that is so.

3641. Do you not think that working in a factory alongside of men is as detrimental to young women as serving in an hotel is? It is quite as bad. I think that dancing saloons have a very bad effect. Twenty-five years ago, when I was an inspector of police, there was a dancing saloon at the Glebe, and I have seen boys and girls who frequented it in adjacent paddocks with their clothes deranged as if they were carrying on immoral practices. I should say that hotel-life and factory-life are about on a par as far as the demoralising tendency on young girls is concerned. I noticed that in England there was a great deal of prostitution where there were large factories. It has often occurred to me that the tobacco factories where boys and girls work together must have a demoralising effect when they are going away at night.

3642. Do you not think that legislation is more required to deal with the demoralising tendency of factories than it is to prevent the employment of young women in respectable hotels? I am not prepared to say that. It appears to me that both are bad, morally speaking. It seems strange that girls should have a preference for hotels and factories instead of for domestic service.

J. O. Read,
Esq.
21 June, 1886.

The Rev. Charles Hamor Rich called in, sworn, and examined:—

3643. President.] You are the Church of England chaplain at the Darlinghurst Gaol? Yes.

3644. How long have you held that office? About twenty-one years.

3645. Do your duties bring you into connection with all classes there, independent of their religion? Simply those belonging to the Church of England.

3646. What is their proportion out of the entire number of prisoners in the gaol? I can hardly say.

3647. Do your duties bring you into contact with a third of the prisoners? More than that; the Roman Catholics form the largest number, the next in order being Church of England, Presbyterian, and Wesleyan; the number of Presbyterians and Wesleyans is very small; Jews, hardly any, and Heathens, a few; the rules are very strict as to our interfering with prisoners belonging to other denominations.

3648. Are 25 per cent. of the prisoners in the gaol visited by you? More than that; I cannot tell the exact proportion; there may be between 200 and 300 belonging to the Church of England; Roman Catholics would number somewhat more; Presbyterians about twenty; and Wesleyans about the same.

3649. The Governor of the gaol has given us a return showing that in the year 1885 the total number of prisoners was 12,384;—can you state roughly how many of these attended your ministrations or were visited by you in the course of the year? I could not say, because, as I have pointed out, the number with whom I have to deal may be between 200 and 300 at one time.

3650. Will you kindly state generally what is the nature of your duties at the gaol;—do you attend there daily? Yes.

3651. More than once a day? No; sometimes, but not as a rule.

3652. Do you hold a service every day? No; there are services on Thursdays and Sundays; I attend on other days for the purpose of seeing prisoners.

3653. In your capacity a large number of those who belong to the Church of England must pass through your hands? A good many.

3654. You must have a personal knowledge of a good many of them? I have.

3655. We want to know the result of your experience among the prisoners belonging to the Church of England, whose imprisonment you or they would ascribe to habits of drunkenness? A large proportion of them ascribe to drink the offences which they have committed.

3656. Do 90 per cent. of them do so? Scarcely as many as that; many of them make drink an excuse, and of course you have to take their statement cum grano salis; my opinion is that a large proportion of the offences are attributable to drink.

3657. You think then that an opinion obtains among many prisoners that to have given way to crime through drink is something venial? Yes.

3658. They would hesitate to say that it was on account of any innate wickedness? Yes; they hear so much about drink and the excesses of it, that they are inclined to excuse themselves on that score.

3659. In stating your opinion, even approximately, of the proportion of prisoners whose imprisonment is due to drink, you have to make an allowance, and perhaps a large allowance, for those who will excuse themselves on that score; and this might reduce considerably the number who, in your judgment, have offended through drink? Yes, I think it should be so received; but of course on the general question I feel still that drink is the cause of a great many of the cases—a large proportion of them.

3660. Do you think that drink has much to do with cases of violence, such as manslaughter, rape, burglary, and bushranging? It has in some of them, but not in all cases of a serious nature. In cases of rape and indecent assault I think that drink is very often at the bottom of them.

3661. Burglary? Yes, even in that; at any rate in cases of robbery. In instance, it was only the other day I had a case of a man suffering a sentence of two years for some robbery on the railway. He seems to be a decent, well-educated man, one who is likely to endeavour to do well when he is at liberty. He told me that his crime was entirely owing to a drunken spree.

3662. With regard to cases in which women are imprisoned for concealment of birth, do you think that they are attributable to drink? No.

3663. There is a different motive in such cases—shame, or to avoid the trouble of bringing up a child? Exactly.

3664. Have you noticed any increase in the number of drunkards in the prison? I have of late, a very considerable increase.

3665. Since when have you noticed the increase? Within the last two or three years.

3666. Don't you remember that there was a large number of convictions for drunkenness in 1881? I cannot mention any particular time.

3667. Have you been struck with the number of females and young people who are sent up for drunkenness for short terms? Very much so.

Rev.
C. H. Rich.
21 June, 1886.

Rev.
C. H. Rich.
21 June, 1886.

3668. I suppose they all attend your services, independent of the time they are in for? Yes.
3669. Is there any compulsion? It is quite compulsory.
3670. If it were not compulsory, do you think that the attendance would be much diminished? No; it might to some extent, but not very much. With regard to young females I must certainly say that of late there seems to have been a great increase in their drinking.
3671. Are those who are in for drunkenness generally of the prostitute class? Yes; but at the same time there are others who may not altogether be called prostitutes—young girls.
3672. That is to say, under thirty? Sometimes under twenty, even. There are some married women who are in constantly, who have homes and families. I have often heard these people attribute their drunkenness to the nature of the drink with which they have been supplied.
3673. I suppose they describe it as being poisonous? Yes, as having that effect on them, which renders them insensible of what they are doing.
3674. Do they complain of Colonial beer having that effect? Yes.
3675. Largely? I have not heard of it largely.
3676. As a rule, do you think that the women get drunk on beer or ardent spirits? Both, I should say; I think that spirits form a considerable portion of it.
3677. Do you notice many of the larrikin class in for drunkenness? A good many.
3678. Do they appear to you to belong to the native born class? Decidedly.
3679. Their cases are almost hopeless? In some cases there would seem to be little hope of reclaiming them, their character being so vicious.
3680. Do you notice that they come back frequently? Yes, many of them.
3681. I suppose you think that a few detentions in gaol mean their ruin if they were not ruined before? I do not think that altogether. It is a common idea that once these youths get into gaol there is no hope for them; that they must consort with others who are more vicious than themselves, and thus they get contaminated and so forth. I do not think that that is the case, neither need it be the case, because as far as Darlinghurst Gaol is concerned I know that everything is done which can be done to prevent it, but of course it is impossible to prevent them mixing with others.
3682. Have you formed any opinion, generally, as to the effect of imprisonment as a punishment for drunkenness? I do not think that it has much effect.
3683. Is it not true that the gaol is rather a sort of sanatorium for these people? I think that it is for many of them,—for those who are habitual drunkards, many of whom make it a point to get in time after time.
3684. Can you suggest any other kind of punishment, either by way of imprisonment, or imprisonment combined with hard labor, for drunkenness? I have often thought that the only way to restrain some of those whom I have met would be to place them in some asylum where they could not possibly get out for a time; whether the detention should be accompanied with punishment, in the way of hard work, would depend on the circumstances very much. I think that there are some of these unfortunate people with whom it is impossible to do anything, as they no sooner get their liberty than they take to drinking again; it seems quite impossible to keep them from it.
3685. Therefore your judgment as to whether they could work or be of any service at all during their detention is affected by that circumstance? Decidedly.
3686. But do you not always see them at their very worst? Not always.
3687. Suppose they were detained for a long period in an asylum? I should still have doubts as to their capacity to do much in the way of work, because, as far as I can judge, this class of persons do not seem to be capable of doing much work.
3688. Do you not think that after three months treatment with abstinence from drink, and having fairly good food, they would be able to do some work? Yes.
3689. Oakum picking, for example? I think so to that extent.
3690. Some of the young men might be taught trades in the place of detention? Yes.
3691. The boys of fourteen or fifteen do not learn anything now, unless they get a long term of imprisonment for some offence of violence and are sent to Berrima? Quite so; they are no sooner in than they are out, and it is impossible to do anything with them. As far as the larrikin class are concerned, imprisonment for a short term seems to be no deterrent.
3692. Do you ever gain the confidence of any of these larrikins in the way that they will trust you with their story? Oh, yes.
3693. How do you account for the formation of the drinking habits of this class;—does it not often arise from the fault of the parents? In many cases it arises from their associating with evil companions, and in many cases there is a fault at home. I have often thought that parents are at fault in not looking after their boys and girls—in not keeping them at home instead of allowing them to go out and mix with others.
3694. Do you think that is the case with young girls? It applies equally to boys and girls. Of course there are cases where boys and girls are quite beyond the control of their parents.
3695. Have you thought of any plan of the nature of an asylum to which these creatures could be sent after the second or third conviction, and be detained there for a minimum period—say not less than six months. Do you think that such a plan would relieve the gaols of this class who go backwards and forwards? I think that it would in a great measure. Lately, owing to the crowded state of Darlinghurst gaol, many short-sentenced prisoners have been sent to country gaols. Under this system directly they are released they are allowed passes to take them back to Sydney, and they get drunk again and make their reappearance at the gaol. If that system were applied to an asylum it might happen that after having been detained for six or nine months those persons would resume their drinking habits directly they reached Sydney and met their old associates.
3696. Do you think that habitual drunkards are really capable of reformation: I will divide them into two classes—young people under 25 or 30, and older people who are confirmed sots. Take the latter first;—do you think that they can be reformed? I think that there would be more hope of reformation in the case of the younger people.
3697. The experience is that the older people relapse on the smallest provocation: if they taste liquor they cannot resist drinking to excess. Is that your impression with regard to the young people who come under your notice in the gaol? I do not think so; I think that there would be some hope of weaning them from drink.

Rev.
C. H. Rich.
21 June, 1886.

3698. The dipsomania would not be so strong? Not as with the others. I know an instance of a married woman who has respectable friends, whose sisters are respectably married. While she is in gaol she is exceedingly good and well behaved, but it is a most extraordinary thing that directly she gets out of gaol she gets drunk. There is nothing else against her character; her friends would be willing to keep her, but they cannot trust her as far as drinking is concerned. The Church has lately established a Home in which I have taken a great deal of interest. The object of the institution is to provide a Home to which women can go when they come out of gaol, because we have been in the habit of getting situations for them, and I thought that it might be a great benefit to them if they had some home to which they could go in the first instance. It has been found in many cases that women who have been kept there for a time take to drinking immediately they get out. This is very discouraging.

3699. Have you known many cases in which people of good education—male or female—have got into gaol, in consequence of drunken habits? Yes.

3700. I suppose that when these people reach that stage they are incurable? I will not say that it is so in all cases, but I have known two or three cases in which the persons have been incurable.

3701. I have often thought that an educated person who becomes a drunkard is less likely to be cured than an ignorant person? I am afraid that is so in many instances.

3702. When these moderately intelligent people confide their troubles to you do they tell you how it was that they became drunkards? Particularly by taking drink with other people.

3703. Have there been many cases in which they have attributed their drunkenness to a desire to drown their feelings—perhaps remorse. We are told that in nine cases out of ten prostitutes drink so that they may forget themselves? I think that is so in the case of prostitutes. Many women who have been brought up respectably and who have become numbered among that class have admitted that to me.

3704. There is no place where women of that class can be compulsorily detained? Not in Sydney.

3705. Is there not a Home for fallen women? There is a Home in connection with the Church of England which has been established about eighteen months.

3706. Do prostitutes find a refuge there? Drunkards and prostitutes. Of course it depends entirely on their own will whether or not they go to the refuge.

3707. They leave when they choose I presume? The rules of the Home compel them to remain a short time, and for the most part they remain for the specified period.

3708. If they leave before the time are they allowed to return? Yes.

3709. Do they go to and fro or are they not ashamed to go back? They are not ashamed to return. Many of them seem to have a desire to go out, and if they are allowed to do so they get drunk and then they return. They seem to have a craving for drink which they cannot overcome. Some of them remain as long as six and nine months during which time they do not taste intoxicating liquor, but if they get out on any excuse, or go to a situation, they will get drink.

3710. Then the drinking in those cases was due to a craving which has not been eradicated rather than to a desire to drown their feelings of remorse? Yes; it is not a question of drinking away their troubles; it is simply a giving way to the craving.

3711. It would appear as though the drunken women were a rather difficult subject for reformation. If, after having been confined in this voluntary reformatory for nine months, there are no better results than those you have stated, one could scarcely expect better results from a State reformatory? Exactly, that agrees with what I said before. If they were compelled to remain in an institution six, nine, or twelve months the probability is that at the end of that time they would go out and drink again. It is a very difficult matter to decide what should be done.

3712. I suppose most of the women in gaol have been town women? For the most part; although there is a good proportion from the country; on the other hand if you can persuade or arrange for them to go into the country—and it is often desirable to do so—they will, for the most part, find their way back to Sydney. As to the matter of the Home, I may mention an instance, to give you an idea of what takes place: There was a woman who had often been in gaol; she was a very respectable woman, however, and an excellent servant, and who would not go to the Home for some time. Finally I persuaded her to go and she went. She conducted herself exceedingly well, and remained there, I suppose, for six or nine months. She commended herself very much indeed to the matron. The matron, I know, thought a great deal of her. I had known her a long time before. A situation was got for her—a suitable one—and she was there for a short time. When she had been there a week or so she was allowed to go out. She had no idea herself, when she went out, of taking any drink; indeed she did not wish to do so. She was out only for an hour or two, but she met some of those she had known before. She took a little drink, and then all was over—the relapse came.

3713. Outside the gaol you do not visit places where you are brought much into contact with the effects of drunken habits? No; I do not.

3714. You are made mostly acquainted with those effects in the gaol? Yes; of late it has been so. It is not always the quantity of drink which does the mischief. In many cases a very little often has a very bad effect. In some cases the victims therefore must not be considered to have given way to drinking very much.

3715. It is a matter often of temperament, and sometimes, I suppose, of poison? Sometimes poison. I think too that many of them having been kept without liquor for so long, are quite overcome when they go outside and take even a little.

3716. Have you considered the question of local option? I cannot say that I have considered it very much. I have had some doubt in my mind upon the subject.

3717. I suppose that although you are chiefly engaged at the gaol you go about Sydney a great deal? Yes.

3718. What is your opinion as to the number of public-houses? That there are a great deal too many. That has been my opinion for a long time.

3719. You think there would be fewer people in gaol if there were fewer houses outside for the sale of liquor? I think it would be much better that there should be fewer public-houses. At the same time I believe there is even now a great deal of drinking in the public-houses at hours when they are supposed to be closed.

3720. Do you think that much drinking goes on outside of the public-houses in the dwellings of the artisan class? I think so.

3721. I suppose that as you do not now visit much, it is chiefly from report that you form that opinion? Of late I have not been visiting much. The opinion I have formed is largely in connection with reports I have heard. I believe that many of the artisan class drink with their neighbours at home.

- Rev. C. H. Rich. 3722. Has any person at the gaol disclosed to you the fact that there is much drinking going on in the houses of their class? Yes; they go to their neighbours and get some drink, and then quarrels and other things occur. That is often the case.
- 21 June, 1886. 3723. Do you hear any of them attribute their drunkenness, or misfortunes through drunkenness, to the fact that they could not get drink on a Sunday as heretofore, and that they were therefore obliged to drink more on Saturday, and so become greater drunkards than they otherwise would have been? I have never heard that.
3724. Has any mode occurred to you by which the number of public-houses could be lessened. You say there are too many? I cannot say that any mode has suggested itself to me; I have not sufficiently considered the matter in that respect. It struck me a long time ago that there were too many public-houses, although I think there is now a less number than there used to be.
3725. Mr. Roseby.] You attribute a large proportion of the crime which comes under your notice to drink? A large proportion of it.
3726. You also state that you have noticed latterly a very considerable increase of intemperance among the young, and especially among young girls? Yes.
3727. Do you know whether many of these girls have been servants or barmaids in public-houses? I think they more frequently come from their own homes.
3728. In view of that sad and alarming fact do you not think that the age at which young persons may be supplied with liquor should be increased beyond sixteen; should it not be increased to eighteen or twenty? I think the provisions for the supply of drink to persons who are sixteen years of age is reasonable. I do not think I would suggest that the age should be extended much beyond that.
3729. You think there are far too many public-houses? That has been my feeling.
3730. Do you not think that the people themselves should have some means of saying whether they want these houses or not? I think there is something to be said in favor of that proposal; but I am afraid that the system might be made to operate rather arbitrarily. I think that to some extent the people in a given neighbourhood should be in a position to judge of the desirableness of having a public-house.
3731. But is it not a proper principle that the people should say how many of these houses they will have? I have not sufficiently considered the matter to be able to answer you. I have known certain cases, however, in which it has been considered very undesirable by the people of the neighbourhood that there should be a public-house. I think that in such cases they should have an opportunity of protesting against and preventing it.
3732. Surely you consider the moral well-being of the community a paramount consideration? Certainly.
3733. Minor principles ought to give way to the moral well-being? The moral well-being of the people is the paramount matter.
3734. You think that the large facilities for obtaining drink which now exist increases the temptation and induces the indulgence to a large extent? I am afraid so.
3735. Do I understand you to say that you think there is little hope of the permanent reformation of the inebriate;—have you not known many cases in which drunkards have reformed? I would not say that; I would not say that there was absolute hopelessness with regard to the drunkard.
3736. A number of cases of reform must have come under your notice? I have known such cases in my long experience; still I think there are great difficulties in the way of reformation.
3737. But you have known cases in which the drunkard has permanently reformed, cases in which he has not relapsed into old habits? I have known such instances.
3738. You regard reformation as being attended with greater difficulties in the case of females than in the case of males? I do not think I said exactly that, although there can be no doubt that with female drunkards reformation is a very difficult matter; they are placed in different circumstances from men; when, for instance, a woman, through drink, has caused her husband and family to be separated from her, and so forth, she seems to be constantly addicted to drink; I have known several such instances.
3739. You would favour the establishment of an institution in which this particular evil could be specially dealt with? Yes.
3740. In view of the fact that so many females become addicted to drink, do you not think the supplying of drink at public-house bars is a wrong avocation for a female? I think it is very undesirable that females should serve behind the bar; the downfall of some women is to be attributed to the circumstance that they have been employed as barmaids; I certainly think that barmaids should not be allowed.
3741. You think with me, perhaps, that they often act as a decoy and induce young men to indulge when they would not otherwise do so? I do.
3742. We are told that there are several houses where there are up-stair bars—private bars—where respectable young men go. These young men may not find their way into the institution with which you are connected, but their visiting these places doubtless tends to their demoralization? But some of them do find their way to the gaol. I should certainly object to private and up-stair bars.
3743. You strongly favour the closing of the houses on Sunday? Yes.
3744. And you think the law should be made so restrictive that they could not be opened as they are at the present time? Quite so. At the present time I often pass houses on Sunday and hear people inside—drinking of course—whereas the houses are supposed to be closed.
3745. You think that the law should, if possible, be made absolutely restrictive upon this point? I think that something should be done to ensure the carrying out of the law.
3746. You doubtless visit a number of families and know something of the social life of the community. Do you think there is any wish on the part of the great body of the people to have the houses opened at any time on Sunday? I could not say that that is my experience, judging from the persons with whom I have associated. They have not complained to me.
3747. Could you suggest any plan by which the victims of intemperance, on their leaving the gaol, could be placed under surveillance when they leave the gaol, so that in the event of their meeting some of their old companions at the gaol doors, they would not be so likely to relapse into their old habits? We have established a Home; and have endeavoured to provide for both men and women when they go out. In the case of the habitual drunkard the only thing I could suggest would be that he should be placed somewhere whence he would be unable to escape for a time—some place where he would be restrained.
3748. Mr. Withers.] Do you think that such crimes as murder are often brought about by the effects of drink? Not always; I cannot say I think so. Taking the most serious or capital cases, apart (say) from rape, rape, I would not say that they are altogether attributable to drink. There may be one case here and there; but I do not think it would be the general rule. In such cases as rape, however, I think that the crime would be often attributable to drink.

3749. More so than in cases of murder? Yes.

3750. Has it generally fallen to your lot to console condemned men prior to their execution? It has.

3751. Can you remember any particular case in that category in which you have been able to gather from the statements of the condemned man that his position was due to drink? In some cases I think it has been so, but not in a great proportion.

3752. What number of persons have been executed at Darlinghurst? I could not say.

3753. Would the number exceed 100? No; nothing like that number.

3754. A great number of young persons are employed in factories where there is no division between the sexes. Has that a bad effect? I think the custom is simply abominable. Its bad results have often come under my notice. It is especially harmful to the girls. In some instances the effects have been very grievous.

3755. Would it be wise to so legislate as to restrict this custom? Undoubtedly; because I am afraid that the evil which befalls a number of girls is attributable to it.

3756. I suppose it has an equally bad effect upon the youths? I think so; but it is especially harmful to the girls. In advising them, and speaking to them as to their occupation and so forth, I have often urged upon them the desirableness of quitting the factories, and entering upon domestic service.

3757. Do you think the evil results ensuing from this intercourse between the sexes at these factories are worse than those which follow from females acting as barmaids? I think so. In the factories you see the sexes are thrown so much together—they are continuously associated. Then they meet one another in the evening when the factory hours are over.

3758. The employment of barmaids in the first-class hotels in the city would be a lesser evil? Decidedly. While I think that evil results from the position of some barmaids I believe there are others who are very respectable.

3759. You reside at Paddington? Yes.

3760. Many gentlemen whom we have examined reside outside of the city and have not been in a position therefore to express an opinion as regards the condition of things in the streets of the city on Sunday under the present Licensing Act, as compared with their condition under the old Act. Under the old Act people drank openly on Sunday, and there was an obstruction at the corner of almost every street caused by men who had been drinking. These men set a very bad example to children going to Sunday-school, and the sight of them in that condition on the Sabbath was very distasteful. That is all abolished under the present Act; although men drink on Sunday we do not see the open drunkenness which we saw before? Not to that extent; but I must say you see a great many men waiting at the public-house corners, although they may be sober. Even early in the morning, before 9 o'clock, I have met drunken men in the streets.

3761. But do you think they come under the observation of the people to the same extent as under the old Act? No; I should scarcely think that would be so. The drunkenness might not be so apparent.

3762. It has been suggested to me that if the publicans were to rigidly close on Sunday for (say) three months, there would be such an outcry on the part of the general public that the Government would be obliged to sanction the opening of the houses for an hour on that day. Do you think that that is the case. Do you think the intelligent public want the houses opened for an hour on Sunday? I cannot think that that is altogether the case. I know that it is the opinion of some that it would be better to open the houses for a short time on Sunday; I cannot say, however, that that is a general opinion.

3763. You think that many persons who have always been in the habit of taking a glass of wine or spirits occasionally do not feel the closing of the houses on Sunday a great hardship, and that it will tend to the benefit of the present community as well as of those who follow if drinking habits are restricted as much as possible? Yes, I think so.

FRIDAY, 18 JUNE, 1886.

Present:—

A. OLIVER, Esq., M.A., PRESIDENT,	A. HUTCHISON, Esq.,
F. ABIGAIL, Esq., J.P., M.P.,	G. WITHERS, Esq., J.P.,
J. ROSEBY, Esq., J.P.,	R. FOWLER, Esq., J.P.

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

Dr. Maurice O'Connor called in, sworn, and examined:—

3764. President.] You are the surgeon at Darlinghurst Gaol? Yes; the visiting surgeon.

3765. How long have you held that appointment? Eight years.

3766. Had you any gaol experience before? No. I am also connected in a similar capacity with the Reception-house for the Insane and with the Shaftesbury Reformatory at South Head.

3767. What generally is the nature of your duties? I visit the gaol twice a day, and I treat all prisoners who present themselves to me; I also attend the warders in case of illness; I attend the Reception-house for the Insane twice a day for the same purpose, or whenever I may be specially sent for.

3768. You visit no other gaols or establishments in the Colony? No; I visit the Shaftesbury Reformatory whenever I am sent for, otherwise once or twice a week.

3769. In the course of your duties you must necessarily see a great deal of the results of drunkenness? Yes, I have had considerable experience in the treatment of cases of delirium tremens.

3770. Do the prisoners often volunteer statements to you as to the cause of their incarceration,—do they make you their confidant in any way? No; I have never encouraged anything of the kind, and they have never offered it.

3771. Have you formed an opinion as to the extent to which drunkenness is a cause of crime? I have had

Dr.
M. O'Connor.
18 June, 1886.

Dr. M. O'Connor had prepared for me a return from which you may see the cases of drunkenness during the past seven years. It applies to Darlington Gaol alone, and it is as follows:—

18 June, 1886.

Year.	Total number of prisoners received into Gaol charged with drunkenness.	Under medical treatment suffering from the effects of drink.	Under treatment for delirium tremens and included in previous column.
1880 .....	4,976	662	424
1881 .....	6,156	900	607
1882 .....	4,701	352	376
1883 .....	4,639	394	207
1884 .....	5,449	746	136
1885 .....	5,669	1,050	138
1886 (12 June) .....	2,476	492	60
Total .....	34,266	5,686	1,957

3772. There would appear to be a diminution in the number of persons in the gaol for drunkenness in the present year, judging from the number up to June 12th? There will be a decided decrease unless there is a large increase in the numbers within the next six months.

3773. I observe that the proportion of those under medical treatment is fairly maintained? Yes.

3774. Taking those under treatment for delirium tremens, I presume you see them for only a short time, that is to say, you cannot tell what proportion of them become confirmed lunatics? I generally have them under treatment for a week; if the cases are bad they are remanded from time to time and are sometimes under my care for 3 or 4 weeks.

3775. I suppose your eight years experience in the gaol has convinced you that the punishment for drunkenness is wholly ineffective—you see the same faces again and again I imagine? Very often.

3776. And I suppose you infer that they will continue in that way for the rest of their natural lives? Yes; I can think of men who, as far as I can remember, came before me in the first year I undertook my present duties at the gaol, and who eventually died in the gaol from the effects of drink. The percentage of deaths in the gaol, however, is not very large. I have only about twelve in a year, and of these about eight would be directly traceable to drink.

3777. As to persons who are not imprisoned for drunkenness, has it occurred to you, in treating them, that many of them were suffering from the results of intemperance? You will notice that the third column of the return which I have handed in will show that a large number of prisoners were suffering from the effects of drink when they came in. The last column shows the number who were suffering from alcoholism and delirium tremens.

3778. Is it not frequently the case that persons who are in gaol for felonies are found to be suffering from the results of drink? Yes; suffering from organic diseases which are the result of drink.

3779. Not delirium tremens? No; disease of the liver, brain, and kidneys.

3780. We have been told that 90 per cent. of the criminals in gaol are there for reasons connected with intemperate habits? I could not speak upon that point because I do not see the warrants when they are admitted.

3781. It is no part of your duty to know anything about that? No. I only know the condition of those who come under my treatment.

3782. And they do not make you their confidant in any way? No; except that if in the case of any of them applying to me I had reason to believe that the disease was occasioned by drink I would inquire into the matter.

3783. The present system of punishing drunkards does not deter, because you say you see the same faces again and again, and it does not appear to reform, except in so far as it gives the drunkard a chance of getting better in order to get back to the gaol again. Do you not think therefore that the present system of punishment is a farce? It is no punishment at all. I have noticed that instead of sending those suffering from delirium tremens to Darlington Gaol under a sentence of three or four months, the Magistrates often send them for medical treatment for a week. When they return to the Court at the end of seven or fourteen days, as the case may be, the Magistrates, instead of inflicting a sentence upon the offenders, discharge them.

3784. Then there is no punishment whatever—merely medical treatment? Exactly. The offenders might just as well be sent to the Infirmary. It would be just the same thing; perhaps some of the men who are discharged on their return to the Court will be up again the next day.

3785. Are those habitual drunkards or first offenders? A large proportion of them are habitual drunkards; but my statement applies to both habitual drunkards and to first offenders. If they feel unwell they ask the Magistrate to allow them medical treatment. If that is marked upon the papers they escape all work, and they are supposed to be under medical treatment during the whole of their confinement.

3786. In your medical treatment you allow them a small proportion of alcohol? Yes, I generally use alcohol in the treatment of delirium tremens.

3787. It is a medical necessity? Yes.

3788. You cannot give the Commission any information as to the permanent lunacy which is sometimes the result of drink? That is connected more with the Reception-house than with the gaol. I have obtained the following particulars with reference to the Reception-house in 1885:—

Year.	Patients certified insane.	Number of cases traceable to drink.	Patients under remand.	Suffering from effects of drink.
1885	351	34	361	221

3789. Do those who have been discharged from an asylum come back to you again? Often they come back; and I recognize the face of a man who has been discharged from Gladesville or Callan Park. I could not say, however, whether they were individuals who had suffered from the effects of drink. I know that that last year at the Reception-house 221 persons suffering from the effects of drink were not detained long. They would be remanded from time to time for perhaps three weeks.

3790. Are you aware that as a matter of fact these persons are very often not detained long in the Gladesville Asylum? I am not aware of that.

3791. Have you any knowledge as to the kind of drink they have been accustomed to take. Has it been beer or spirits? It would appear to be a kind of mixture—rum, beer, and whiskey. You can never obtain a very reliable account of what they have been taking. They take all kinds of liquor. I think the principal liquors are beer and rum. They generally mention these two.

3792. Do you know medically any difference between the alcoholism produced by spirit and that produced by beer? There is no difference at all.

3793. You see no difference in the symptoms? No; there is only one set of symptoms for the effects of drink.

3794. What is the effect of delirium tremens? Has it an absolutely pathological effect upon the brain? It produces a temporary congestion of the brain with a tendency to effusion in the ventricles. It is a state of insanity; and during that time the patient is not responsible for his actions.

3795. Does it affect the tissue of the brain permanently? Repeated attacks of delirium tremens or chronic alcoholism will do so. There is not only an alteration of the tissue of the brain, but the same remark applies to other organs. There is an alteration in the structure of the liver and kidneys, and in the blood. I think there is a short extract in Parkes' "Practical Hygiene," which will answer your question thoroughly. Parkes says, "There is no question that several brain diseases, including some cases of insanity, are produced by excess of alcohol." There is a note to the following effect:—"Magnam states the two terminations of chronic alcoholism to be dementia and general paralysis."

3796. Have you thought of any system of treating habitual drunkards beyond that which now exists? I have written a pamphlet upon the relations between pauperism and crime in New-South Wales, and in dealing with the subject I referred to Sir James Martiu's Act of 1877—I mean the Poor-house Act—which, however, was repealed. I thought it a most useful Act. I think we shall yet have to pass such a measure, because, as a matter of fact, the penal system is, to a certain extent, one of pauperism more than anything else. We have some thousands of persons sent to Darlinghurst in the course of the year for no other reason than that they have no lawful and visible means of support. That is not a crime, and the association of those persons with hardened criminals is, I think, likely to produce criminals.

3797. But I was speaking with regard to drunkards especially. Have you formed any opinion as to an improved treatment for penal purposes or for purposes of reformation? I have thought of two things in connection with this matter. In the first place I think the number of public-houses should be lessened, and I would, to a certain extent, abolish public-houses in all low and crowded districts. There is no doubt that some poor persons go into houses in those neighbourhoods, and stay there all night drinking. I think the limitation of the number of public-houses is decidedly necessary. I would also endeavour to establish a superior class of houses, making the license-fee higher. I would have a thorough examination of the liquor supplied. That examination should take place in the first instance in bond. I would have a similar examination of the liquor when it is in the hands of the merchant; and I would have it repeated, when the liquor is in the hands of the publican. I think there should be three examinations.

3798. You think that a great deal of drunkenness is attributable to inferior or adulterated liquor? I fancy it is.

3799. Under your system of examination then you would only have liquor of a certain quality? I would have liquor of a certain quality and I would limit the number of public-houses.

3800. But even then you will have a residuum of drunkards—have you considered the right course for their treatment? I would establish an inebriate asylum.

3801. How would you get them there? Upon the representations of responsible people; take the case of an individual who is continuously drinking, and who is, to a certain extent, the ruin of his family. I think that, upon the representations of one or two responsible persons, he should be brought before a magistrate and confined for a certain period—say three or four months; if there were a recurrence of the offence I would have him detained until a decided reform was promised or was apparent; I would only discharge him then on bail, and I would make those who took him responsible for his good behaviour.

3802. Do you think the habitual drunkard can be cured? It depends more upon the will of the person than anything else; no medicine will cure them.

3803. Do you think that a year's or six months' treatment would be of avail? It might be, if the drunkard knew that, in the event of his being sent back to the asylum, he might be detained for an indefinite period. I think that the fear of that detention might act as a deterrent.

3804. Are they able to do any work? Some of them would be able to work; I have seen strong, able-bodied young men degenerate into the typical loafer; and they are certainly of no use when they are outside; they prefer to be sent to gaol where they are well fed and clothed to working; some of those men work well enough in gaol.

3805. What is their work? Perhaps stone-masonry or mat-making. I don't know exactly what they would have to do. It depends upon the overseer.

3806. But I should have thought that the constitution of a drunkard would be affected to such an extent that he would be unable to do hard work? It would take a long time, as a rule, for drunkenness to have such an effect upon the system. It might have such an effect in particular cases.

3807. If they were detained in a work-house I suppose that in the course of two or three months they would be able, in almost every instance, to do some kind of work? Many of them might be able to work almost at once; some of them get well after they have been a few days in gaol.

3808. You are in favour then in the first instance of passing some such measure as Sir James Martin's Act, which you have mentioned? Yes.

3809. You would relegate drunkards to a workhouse, either upon the application of people, somewhat after the fashion of the applications made in lunacy matters, or by means of the Magistrates. In other words, instead of sending habitual drunkards to gaol as a punishment you would send them to a workhouse? Yes; you might call it an inebriate asylum.

3810. Do you not think they might be drafted from such an institution as you have mentioned—a description of workhouse—from the reformatory, as it were, to an inebriate asylum; that I think was suggested to us by the Comptroller-General of Prisons? Yes; I think that would be a very good plan.

Dr.
M. O'Connor.
18 June, 1886.

Dr.
M. O'Connor.
18 June, 1886.

3811. Having had punishment they would go to the asylum upon the chance of their reforming? Yes; and another reason why I think there should be another place for the treatment of this class of offenders is that it is not right to associate them with felons. Besides, there is scarcely room for them. The space in the gaol is limited, and this class of offenders represents a very large population.

3812. You think that the association of drunkards with felons tends to make them criminals? Yes; I have no doubt about it. They generally become absorbed into the criminal classes.

3813. And you trace a good deal of that to their frequent association in gaol? Yes.

3814. Mr. Abigail.] Have you any knowledge as to the proportion of drunkards in the gaols and prisons of other Colonies? No; I have not looked up the statistics.

3815. Mr. Hutchison.] I understood you to say that delirium tremens was calculated to finally destroy the brain? No; I said that repeated attacks of delirium tremens amount to what you would call chronic alcoholism, and that has a decidedly bad effect upon the heart, brain. It alters the nerve tissue and affects the heart, kidneys, and liver.

3816. Delirium tremens is the result of continuous drinking? The result of drinking too much. A man might get it in forty-eight hours from excessive drinking, and he might not have been drinking before. It often becomes an acute mania. But in these cases it is more a congestion of the brain than any structural changes. The man is in a state of nervous excitement, and the drink instead of acting as a soporific prevents sleep. The great thing is to make them sleep in order to save their lives.

3817. I suppose the great proportion of cases of delirium tremens passing through your hands are due to continuous drinking? It may result from hard drinking; but, on the other hand, you will see persons drinking continuously and never getting into a state of delirium tremens. Drinking, however, may set up an attack of delirium tremens upon the top of chronic alcoholism.

3818. Is the profession unanimous in its belief that alcohol is required to restore a person suffering from delirium tremens? I am not aware; I think that some are not of that opinion. But I have had exceptional experience. I have treated more cases of delirium tremens, I suppose, than any other person in the colonies. The rate of mortality is very high in other countries; but out of 1,600 cases of delirium tremens treated by me during the first three years of my office, twenty-one died. I have a special system of treatment. I have written a paper upon it, and it was published in some of the English medical papers, as well as in the medical paper published in Sydney. It is an original treatment, and it seems to be very successful.

3819. President.] You find that the treatment in which you include the administration of alcohol is successful? Yes. My own professional opinion is backed up by my success. I consider that alcohol is absolutely necessary. In cases of delirium tremens men suffer from profound prostration as in other diseases which have the effect of prostrating the nervous energies. It is absolutely necessary that you should try to counteract the bad effects of this depression and stimulate the patient.

3820. In the course of my reading I have never found any large expression of opinion on the part of medical men to the effect that alcohol is not a medicine. What is your opinion? I have saved several cases of typhoid fever by using large quantities of alcohol as an adjunct to my general treatment.

3821. Mr. Hutchison.] But the temperance hospitals are successful? You must not forget that their tinctures are composed of rectified spirits or alcohol. Almost every medicine they administer contains alcohol. I could give you a dose of their tinctures which would be equal to a glass of brandy; they get out of the difficulty by giving it another name.

3822. You say that one essential in the cure of a drunkard is the exercise of his will? I say that unless he exercises his will to control himself from taking drink it is not likely that he will give it up.

3823. Is it not a fact that the power of the will is largely destroyed in the case of men addicted to drink? Not always. I have seen confirmed drunkards who have been able to give up drink, and to abstain from taking a drop for twenty years.

3824. Is drinking not calculated to destroy the power of will? Continuous drinking is. It does not destroy a man's power to resist drink if he likes to do so, unless he becomes a confirmed lunatic; then of course he has no control over his actions.

3825. How far is a man who is constantly inebriated from being a lunatic? It is very hard to say.

3826. Mr. Roseby.] Are there many young people at the gaol who are treated by you for alcoholism and delirium tremens? Judging from appearances I should say that the ages of those I treat would range from eighteen or nineteen to fifty or sixty.

3827. Have you had any young females under treatment? Yes, several.

3828. The inmates of the Shaftesbury Reformatory are girls, are they not? Yes; girls under the age of sixteen.

3829. I suppose that most of the cases of young men and young women which come under your treatment are the result of drink? I have had to treat several suffering from the effects of drink.

3830. Mr. Withers.] As far as I could judge from your evidence you are of opinion that excessive drinking disorganizes all the organs of the body? Yes.

3831. You know of no other custom in connection with our present system of civilization which brings about such a state of things? It might be produced by opium-eating or opium-smoking.

3832. But that habit is not prevalent? I have a good many cases of women in the gaol suffering from its effects.

3833. About what number in the year? I have not taken any particular account.

3834. It has not such a hold upon the people as excessive drinking? Not at all.

3835. You think that moderate drinking is not likely to result in permanent injury to the people? I do not think so.

3836. You are of opinion that some work can be got out of the drunkard? Yes; I think so.

3837. Some gentlemen have told us that it is useless to try to do so, and that we can get nothing out of them? At present they are a burden upon the State. The State keeps them in a state of pauperism; their life is quite a congenial one; they are well clothed and fed, and they have comparatively little work.

3838. You think that it is unjust that they should not be put to profitable labour? Decidedly. I would treat drunkenness essentially as a crime. Instead of sending drunkards for medical treatment I would give them a sentence. The question of medical treatment will then rest with me.

3839. Do you think it would have a deterrent effect if a drunkard were sentenced to (say) six months' imprisonment, and if he were made to do a fair day's work, handing over (say) two-thirds of his earnings to his family? Yes, I do; they seem to work very well when they know that they have to do it or to be punished.

punished. Generally when they leave gaol, however, they decline to work, although they may be offered good wages.

Dr.
M. O'Connor.
18 June, 1886.

3840. Do many girls suffering from the effects of drink come under your notice? Very few girls under the age of 16 come to Darlinghurst; they are generally sent to the Shaftesbury Reformatory. But one or two girls not more than 16 years of age, suffering from the effects of drink, have come under my notice; they generally develop into chronic drunkards, and become altogether depraved.

Mr. Frederick Fowler called in, sworn, and examined:—

3841. President.] You are the Superintendent of the Reception-house for the Insane at Darlinghurst? Yes.

Mr.
F. Fowler.
18 June, 1886.

3842. Are you a medical man? No.

3843. How long have you been in that office? Since 1868; but I was six years in the gaol prior to that date.

3844. In what relation does the Reception-house stand towards the gaol? In no relation at present.

3845. But I understand that people are sent from the gaol to the Reception-house? No, from the police court.

3846. In no cases from the gaol? No.

3847. From the gaol then they go to the asylum? Yes.

3848. You receive your inmates from the Magistrates? Yes; from all parts of the Colony except Bathurst and Mudgee.

3849. Can you give us any figures, showing annually the number of people you receive, the number you discharge, and of that number how many go to the asylum? Last year I received 548, and 229 who were discharged had suffered from the effects of drink. You will find in Dr. Manning's report the number of persons who were sent to the asylum.

3850. What proportion of those received by you went on as confirmed lunatics to Gladesville? The remainder were confirmed lunatics.

3851. It is not possible for you to say how many out of that number became lunatics through drink? A great many; but I cannot say how many.

3852. Would Dr. Manning be able to tell us that? Yes, pretty nearly; it is hard to get at it. Many of them come to the Reception-house in a state of imbecility, quite worn out, with softening of the brain brought on by drink. The papers do not show it, but I discover it from their friends.

3853. The Reception-house is, then, for a large number of drunkards, a kind of sanatorium? Just so.

3854. There is no punishment? No.

3855. Do they not come backwards and forwards? Often.

3856. There is a circuit between the public-house and your sanatorium? Yes.

3857. Do you not think this treatment is rather ridiculous, regarded in the light of a punishment? It is no punishment at all; the inmates are all very kindly treated.

3858. They do not regard it as a punishment? No, they generally get well again and leave.

3859. It does not wear them from the old curse? No.

3860. I suppose it often stimulates them to fresh excesses? Often.

3861. Do you consider that drunkenness causes a large proportion of the lunacy in this Colony? I think three out of every five.

3862. Is that Dr. Manning's opinion? It is mine; in my twenty-four years' experience I have seen a great deal of the effects of drunkenness; I have attended a great many inquests, and I have seen a great many of them die.

3863. You are speaking now only of those who pass through your hands? Yes.

3864. Do you think that frequent attacks of delirium tremens end in confirmed lunacy? Yes, very often so.

3865. There is actual injury to the cerebral and nervous systems? Yes.

3866. Do you have many cases of paralysis from drink? A great many.

3867. Do you treat them in the Reception-house for paralysis? Yes, they are treated by the doctor.

3868. Dr. O'Connor is the medical attendant? Yes.

3869. Do you think that the persons under treatment at the Reception-house, if they were detained longer, would in many cases recover sufficiently to be able to do some work? They are often detained for four, five, or six weeks, and they do thoroughly recover. Dr. Manning's opinion is that they should not be detained too long because of the overcrowding of the Institution.

3870. A large proportion of those who go from you to the asylum are discharged within three months from the date of their arrival there? Yes; a large number are discharged within that time.

3871. Would it not be more economical for the State and better for the patient if there were a longer period of detention, not in a lunatic asylum but in some penitentiary? Certainly; I think so.

3872. Do you think drunkenness is capable of eradication? Yes.

3873. You have hopes for the habitual drunkard? I do not think they are at all beyond hope; I think some of them can be reformed—that is to say, the men; I am rather doubtful about the women.

3874. Have you known of a radical and permanent reformation in the case of a confirmed drunkard? I have known of several.

3875. They have reformed of their own wills? By means of advice and resolution; I have known them to go to work and to live respectable lives.

3876. When you have seen the same faces come back again and again you must have doubted the efficacy of the treatment. Have you made any representations to the authorities as to its inefficacy? No; I have never done that.

3877. But you think the treatment is inefficacious? Yes; certainly.

3878. Mr. Hutchison.] What is the usual period of time for which drunkards are sent to you? They are sent to me for seven days, then they go to the Police Court again. They may then be remanded for another seven days and so on.

3879. Mr. Rosby.] How many inmates have you usually at the Reception-house? I have often had

- Mr. F. Fowler. had as many as twenty men and seven or eight women. Sometimes I have ten men; sometimes a less number.
- 18 June, 1886. 3880. What accommodation have you? I can accommodate about thirty men and about fourteen women.
3881. Then the number of your inmates has not been in excess of your accommodation? No; I have never been overcrowded.
3882. Are many of the inmates young persons? A great many; but I could not state the average number.
3883. Do you think that those particular cases are mostly due to drink? Oh yes; most of them.
3884. You think that the women are rarely reformed? I do; they go to the asylum and come back again.
3885. But the men are frequently reformed? Plenty of the men recover.
3886. Are all the patients who come to you placed under Dr. O'Connor for medical treatment? Dr. O'Connor sees if they require anything, and if they do he treats them.
3887. You only ask for his assistance when you think it necessary? Yes.
3888. You have had sufficient experience to enable you to treat the majority of cases without the assistance of a medical man? Yes, I think so, decidedly. I have had twenty-four years' experience of cases of the kind.
3889. You think that lunacy, both temporary and permanent, is occasioned not only by the mere drinking but also by the bad liquor consumed? Yes, I will tell you why. I have had many publicans under my care in a very bad state. If one of the unfortunate men who are in the habit of prowling about Kent-street had got into such a state he would soon have been placed in his coffin. But all the publicans pull through because they have been in the habit of consuming the best of liquor. They have a better chance.
3890. I suppose many of the patients are not only mentally but are physically broken down? Yes.
3891. Have you many deaths? I had four last year—all from intemperance.
3892. A large proportion of the deaths during your time at the Reception-house have resulted from intemperance? Yes.
3893. Do you not think that there are too many facilities offered to persons to get drunk—that is to say, that there are far too many public-houses in the metropolis? There are far too many. You may have seen a paragraph in yesterday's Telegraph about a man who went into a house to get a glass of beer. He subsequently had a glass of wine made hot for him; he lost his senses; on the following morning he did not know where he was, and he found that he had been robbed of his money and his watch. That happened at a house in Kent-street. Something must have been put into the drink. The license of the house was refused. I think that only men of good character and well-known respectability should hold the licenses of public-houses.
3894. Do you think the people should have a voice in determining whether public-houses should exist in their neighbourhood? I do.
3895. You are not a teetotaller? No; but I never go into a public-house.
3896. You believe in local option? Yes.
3897. Not only for new houses but for houses already existing? Yes; a great many of them should be done away with.
3898. You think the practice of young women supplying drink behind the bars should not be allowed? I think not.
3899. Don't you think that the age at which a publican may supply liquor to young persons should be increased beyond sixteen? I think so; I would make the age twenty.
3900. Mr. Withers.] You are not a bigoted teetotaller? No.
3901. Have many persons passing through your hands been in the habit, do you think, of drinking the best class of liquor? Plenty of them, and particularly the publicans; they all pull through; I have one at the present time in a very bad state; if he had been a poor man he would not have pulled through.
3902. Have you inmates occupying respectable positions who have been in the habit of taking good liquor? I can only be guided by the publicans, who, I know, would not take bad liquor. I have had plenty of them under my care, but I never lost one. Scores of poor fellows have told me before dying that their death has been brought about by the bad stuff they have obtained at such and such a place.
3903. Do you think that a moderate quantity of good spirits taken regularly through life would have a deteriorating effect upon the system? I do not see why it should. Every man should have a mind of his own; but some are too easily led, and make fools of themselves.
3904. If they exercised a moderate control over themselves they would not be brought to your establishment suffering from the effects of drink? No.
3905. Mr. Fowler.] You say inferentially that the publicans consume better liquor than they are in the habit of supplying to the public. What opportunities have you had of judging of that fact? I do not think a publican would knowingly drink bad liquor. Besides, instead of going from house to house he takes his drink at home.
3906. Would you be surprised to hear that Inspector Lenthall has said that the publican drinks liquor similar to that which he supplies to the public? I would not believe him. My experience tells me better.
3907. Mr. Abigail.] Do I understand you to say that the cases of the publicans are generally of a milder character? Yes. They generally recover more speedily.
3908. The majority get a worse class of liquor? Far worse.
3909. President.] What do you call bad drink? I mean the class of liquor which is kept in low shanties. I consider it poison.
3910. Can you not be more specific. Do you mean new spirit or spirit which is adulterated? I mean new spirit—Queensland rum, for instance. That is what drives so many people mad; it is a new and raw spirit.

Present:—

A. OLIVER, Esq., M.A., PRESIDENT,
A. HUTCHISON, Esq.,

THE PRESIDENT IN THE CHAIR.

James Powell, Esq., Collector of Customs, called in, sworn, and examined:—

3911. President.] I believe that you have prepared a return with regard to spirits imported for a decennial period? I have prepared a return of the consumption of all spirits imported into the Colony on which duty has been paid. I have also a return of the duty paid on Colonial distilled spirits during the decennial period (which includes 1885); a return on the duty paid on methylated spirits; a return showing the different kinds of spirits upon which duty has been paid during the decennial period; a return of the liquid gallons of brandy, rum, geneva, and whiskey imported, for the decennial period; a similar return of the export of liquid gallons; a return of the import and export of methylated spirit, and similar returns for wines, beers, malt, and hops. I beg to hand in those returns. (Vide Appendix.)

J. Powell,
Esq.
25 June, 1886.

3912. Taking the first portion of the return, I see that the quantities have been reduced to proof gallons? Yes, the duty is paid on proof gallons.

3913. Is there any return of the liquid gallons? There is a return of the liquid gallons of four kinds of spirits—brandy, rum, geneva, and whiskey. That represents the import only. The duty paid supposes actual consumption.

3914. When you speak of methylated spirit am I right in assuming that it does not include white or silent spirit? It does not.

3915. Is there a large importation of white or silent spirit into this country? I do not consider it large. We have no special return for white spirit. It may be considered as embraced in the total of "other spirits." In that line also is included cordials, bitters, and several spirituous compounds.

3916. Liqueurs and perfumed spirits will also be included? Yes.

3917. Is it not a fact that the importation of white spirit has very largely decreased as compared with previous years when it was said to be very large—I speak of 10 or 15 years ago? I don't think that the expression "very large" can be applied to the importation of white spirit. It has never at any time been very large.

3918. Is it not the case then that in years gone by white spirit was manufactured into liquor in the Colony? Very likely it was and is still.

3919. Do you think it is done to the same extent now as formerly? I think not.

3920. There is an impression that a great deal of the brandy, whiskey, gin, and other spirit which we get from abroad consists of white spirit coloured and flavoured so as to make it pass for those liquors? My impression is that a fair potable spirit can be introduced into the Colony at such a low rate that it would scarcely be worth while to import a white spirit for the purpose of manufacturing an article for the market.

3921. Do you share the belief that most of the brandy, whiskey, and gin imported into the Colony is flavoured white spirit? It is coloured white spirit.

3922. I will say coloured and perhaps flavoured—that is to say, sophisticated? It is coloured, certainly.

3923. We have been told that it is possible to make very passable brandy, whiskey, and gin out of mere rye or potato spirit, with the necessary additions; in other words, that the base of the average spirit sold in public-houses is rye or potato spirit? I think not; I see no reason why it should be. It can be produced cheaply enough without resorting to any practices of that kind. The bulk of the spirit we receive comes from France.

3924. We read that it is made there, and it comes here under the appearance of French brandy, but is said to be nothing but a base of silent spirit, artistically doctored? The greater part of the brandy we receive from Charente is of well-known brands, such as Hennessy's and Martell's, and you can scarcely imagine that such makers would resort to such practices.

3926. One reason why it is impossible that for years past all the brandy sold as such could have been made out of wine is that the vines have been destroyed by disease; we know that they imported large quantities of wine, but we heard also that they imported from various parts of Germany and Russia large quantities of rye spirit and potato spirit—in fact, spirit made of anything that was capable of fermentation: I suppose that particular subject would hardly come under your official knowledge? It could not, because we expect brandies coming from France to be French brandies; I might look with suspicion on liquors from Hamburg, or ports in that direction, where the article is not made pure, and where it may perhaps be made to suit any particular market.

3927. Referring to matters that are more within your knowledge, I take the first column of one of the returns you have handed in, and under the head of proof gallons I see that in 1876 some 970,481 gallons were consumed in the Colony; then I see that there is an increase, then a slight decrease, and again an increase. In 1882 there were 1,154,720 gallons; in 1883, 1,124,000 gallons; and in 1884, 1,239,000 gallons, which are the largest figures throughout the period; in 1885 the quantity decreased to 1,204,784 proof gallons. That return, I understand, embraces all kinds of spirits? All kinds.

3928. Including Colonial spirits? Yes.

3929. The exports have yet to be taken out of these figures? There would be no export; this is actual consumption; we allow no drawback on spirits.

3930. Do you consider that in view of the increase in population during this decennial period there has been an increase or diminution in the consumption? I have looked at the figures very carefully because I did not know what information you might desire; it seems to me, speaking roughly, that there is an increase in consumption of about 40,000 gallons a year.

3931. Will you explain why, between the years 1884 and 1885, there is an apparent decrease of 35,000?

In

- J. Powell,
Esq.
25 June, 1886.
- In 1884 there was an expected change in the duties and a large quantity of spirit was taken out of bond in the month of February; the accounts for that year did not represent what I consider to be the normal consumption which equalises itself in 1885.
3932. Can you give us a forecast from the half-year as to whether the increase of 40,000 gallons will be maintained in the present year? I scarcely think it will.
3933. Why? I think that there is a decrease in the consumption of spirits.
3934. Is that caused by the general depression? I think it is in some measure due to the depression; if you look at the return of Colonial distilled spirits you will find that in 1883 there was an increase of 11,000 gallons a year; if anything is to be said about white spirit I think that there you have an explanation.
3935. Do you consider that we make white spirit to any large extent in this Colony? The Colonial Sugar Refining Company make it, but not from potatoes and rye.
3936. Have you any knowledge of the analysis as to the purity of the ordinary spirits which go into consumption? No; I only analyse under special circumstances to discover spirit and the quality or character of it is immaterial.
3937. Do you consider that the spirit imported into the Colony is, on the whole, wholesome spirit, such as should go into consumption? So far as my experience has enabled me to form an opinion I do not consider that there is anything worse in it than water; it used to be imported at very low strength but that has been checked by legislation.
3938. You think that whatever has been put into the spirit is innocent? Yes, as it arrives here.
3939. Are you aware that a quantity of the spirit is very raw? I have no doubt of it.
3940. And, being raw spirit, would have the worst of ethers which we can have—viz., fusel oil? I should imagine so.
3941. Do you think there is any means by which this spirit could be kept out of consumption until it has been matured sufficiently to become wholesome? I do not think that any means at the command of the Customs could be put in motion.
3942. You are speaking of existing legislation? Yes.
3943. You have no means of testing for wholesomeness? None whatever; we test only for strength for the duty.
3944. Have you heard of any test for wholesomeness? I know of no such test.
3945. Admitting that raw spirit is unwholesome, do you think that there would be any impropriety, if possible, in a test, so as to prevent that spirit from going into consumption? I think your difficulty would lie in establishing a standard of wholesomeness.
3946. The only test of wholesomeness would be maturity; do you think that it would be possible to form such a test? I think that it is possible to form such a test, but I think that it would be found unnecessary; I think very little spirit comes into this market so immature as to carry its own conviction with it.
3947. We have had an analysis made of some spirits which were found to contain a quantity of fusel oil which should be sufficient to prevent them from going into consumption? I could give you some particulars as to that if I knew how it was imported.
3948. We got them through a licensing inspector out of the Bonded stores? Then I could trace it for you; I have no doubt that several brands of bottled whiskey are made of very low spirit flavoured.
3949. You are not aware of any plan having been put forward for the detection of wholesome spirit? I am not; it is left entirely to the public to determine for itself.
3950. But the publican has no defence? I am aware of that. A workman, when he is tired, asks for a pale glass of brandy or whiskey.
3951. And he is wholly at the mercy of the man who pours it out? No doubt. I would suggest, however, that any steps which might be taken at the outset, that is, at the landing of the spirits, would be altogether ineffective, because they may be dealt with by admixture. For instance, after the duty has been paid any effort to ascertain the maturity or wholesomeness of the spirit would be set aside unless the test were applied to the counter trade.
3952. If we could abolish the lower class of houses the majority of publicans would, for the protection of their reputation, abstain from selling spirits of inferior quality? Just so.
3953. If, on the other hand, the State held out no encouragement to the importation of spirits of low quality, they would not be imported? Quite so.
3954. Perhaps this appears to you to be a sort of theoretical tampering with the mercantile community? I admit that to me it does seem so.
3955. But you observe that the State attempts to regulate the traffic in spirits in the interest of the people, and does it not occur to you that if the State can prevent unwholesome spirits going into consumption it would be quite reasonable for it to do so? At present I think the State regulates the effect of the traffic more than the traffic itself.
3956. Licensing Acts are an effort to regulate the traffic. In many other respects the State takes account of the fact that people are already addicted to drunkenness, and has made efforts in the past few years to mitigate that evil. The question is: whether it should be part of the duty of the State to prevent noxious liquors from going into consumption? I think the legislation of last year did something in the direction of the introduction of a better class of spirit as to strength. Up to last year spirits of any strength could be imported; now you can only import spirits of the strength of 16.5 under-proof. Previously, brandy at 29 per cent. under-proof, whiskey at 30 per cent., and Geneva at 35 were imported. We have now a stronger, and I take it an all round better, article.
3957. The mixture of water by no means affects the others? No; nothing but age will affect them.
3958. I notice that there is a decrease in the production of Colonial-distilled spirits. In 1876 the quantity produced was 20,000 gallons, and in 1885 only 14,000 gallons. Can you account for this? I think some of the sugar refiners could account for that better than I could. My impression is that it is due to the improved machinery now used in the manufacture of sugar; there is not so much molasses produced, and consequently not so much spirit made.
3959. In liquid gallons then there would not be that result? This calculation is in proof gallons.
3960. In liquid gallons would it be the same? Of course it would be in proportion. But there is something else to be said with reference to Colonial-distilled spirits. I think the company make largely now for export to New Caledonia; they do not make so much for the Home market.
3961. Then the chief manufacturer of Colonial-distilled spirits is the Sugar Company? Yes.

J. Powell,
Esq.

3962. Passing on to wine—still wine; there again there is a reduction. It is not much but it is a reduction from 173,676 gallons to 169,161 gallons? This is a very extraordinary circumstance, and it has struck me frequently, especially when comparing still wines with sparkling wines. The consumption of sparkling wines in the same period has doubled. I take it that the people are getting more accustomed to our Colonial wines.
