Introduction

This publication provides detailed analysis of two-party and two-candidate preferred results by polling place for the 2011 New South Wales election. The publication is the latest in a series first published by the Parliamentary Library after the 1991 election, and is a companion to last year's publication "2011 New South Wales Election: Analysis of Results", (Background Paper No 3/2011).

As well as two-party and two-candidate preferred results, several tables of first preference results by polling place are provided on pages 1-10. These tables highlight polling places across the state where selected registered parties recorded their highest and lowest percentage first preference vote.

Two tables are provided on page 11 detailing the proportion of vote by vote type. The first table provides a detailed breakdown of the 2011 election, showing percentage first preference, informal and two-party preferred vote by party by vote type. The second table shows the changing proportion of vote by vote type at New South Wales elections since 1984. This table highlights the declining proportion of the vote taken on polling day as well as the rise in postal and pre-poll voting.

Two-Candidate versus Two-Party Preferred results.

The two-candidate preferred count in a contest is defined as the final tally of votes for the two remaining candidates in a contest after the successive exclusion and distribution of preferences from ballot papers for other candidates in the contest. In most cases, the final pairing of candidates will represent a contest between the Labor Party and the Liberal-National Party Coalition, a pairing that is also referred to as a two-party preferred count.

At the 2011 election, 66 of the 93 two-candidate preferred contests were two-party preferred contests between Labor and Coalition candidates. There were 27 contests that did not finish as two-party preferred contests, and additional preference counts were performed after the election to determine separate two-party preferred totals. A full summary of two-party and two-candidate preferred results by electorate can be found on pages 31-33 of "2011 New South Wales Election: Analysis of Results", (Background Paper No 3/2011).

This publication concentrates on actual preference counts conducted by polling place, with a limited number of additional tables providing estimated polling place preference counts.

A table of two-party preferred results by polling place is provided for each of the state's 93 Legislative Assembly districts, along with an additional 10 tables of two-candidate preferred results by polling place. Of the 103 tables, 92 are based on actual preference counts by polling places. The remaining 11 tables provide estimated counts after preferences by polling place. Estimates have been calculated by applying an electorate's distribution of preferences to the first preference votes recorded by candidate in each polling place.

The 10 tables of estimated two-party preferred results are for Balmain, Dubbo, Hornsby, Lake Macquarie, Marrickville, Northern Tablelands, Port Macquarie, Sydney, Tamworth and Wollongong. Estimated two-candidate preferred results by polling place are provided for Balmain, where the closeness of the contest prevented the Electoral Commission from carrying out preference counts by polling place.

Changes to Counting Procedures

As at past elections, the NSW Electoral Commission conducted indicative preference counts in polling places on election night between pairings of candidates nominated before the close of polls. For the first time, at the 2011 election these indicative preference counts were check-counted for accuracy after polling day, and in several electorates re-done to reflect the order in which candidates finished. These check-counted totals are the basis of this publication.

Having provided more accurate polling place preference counts, the Electoral Commission dispensed with conducting a formal distribution of preferences in electorates where it was not required to determine a winning candidate.

If a distribution of preferences was not undertaken for an electorate, the final two-candidate preferred result for the electorate was derived by accumulating the check-counted polling place and declaration vote results.

In a number of electorates the Electoral Commission conducted additional preference counts after the declaration of poll to determine alternative two-party and two-candidate preferred results.

Reading the Tables

Each table includes a line labelled "Grand Total". This is the final result for each electorate, whether derived by a formal distribution of preferences or by totalling individual polling place results. The line labelled "Ordinary Votes" has been calculated by totalling the preference count in each polling place, while the line labelled "Declaration Votes" is the sum of the preference counts for the different categories of declaration vote.

In electorates where preference counts were conducted by polling place and a formal distribution of preferences undertaken, there can be minor discrepancies between the totals derived from polling places and the totals produced by the formal distribution of preferences. The same comment applies to tables where the polling place results are estimates rather than actual counts. This means that there can be minor discrepancies between the "Grand Total" line and the sum of "Ordinary Votes" and "Declaration Votes".

Polling Place Names

The NSW Electoral Commission adopted a new naming convention for polling places at the 2011 election. All polling place venues are now uniquely identified by an abbreviated name. Names as provided by the Electoral Commission have been used throughout the publication. These names do not always correspond to polling place names used at previous elections.
